EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT APPOINT OBSERVER AT TRIAL OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in light of the motion concerning Mr. Anatoly Shcharansky passed unanimously by the House on February 8, and in light of new information that the trial of Mr. Shcharansky on charges of treason may start imminently, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the Canadian government request the Soviet government for permission to appoint an official observer at the trial of Anatoly Shcharansky on charges of treason so that the wide international community of concerned people can be assured that justice is done in this very important human rights case and, further, that the Canadian government repeat its offer to give immediate landed immigrant status to Mr. Shcharansky.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There being unanimous consent, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTION JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS INTENSIFIED TO REDUCE AMOUNT PAID IN BENEFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I hope the same spirit of agreement and wisdom will prevail on the motion which I wish to present under Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that Statistics Canada just two hours ago released information showing that unemployment insurance payments in 1977 were almost $4 billion, an increase of 16 per cent over the previous year, and in view of government and private forecasts showing that $4.5 billion is expected to be spent on unemployment insurance benefits this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House asserts that it is better to pay people to work than pay them not to work, and therefore urges the government to provide job-creation programs which would reduce the $4.5 billion the government will be paying out in unemployment insurance benefits in 1978.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED REFORM OF MONETARY SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the critical economic situation of the country, given the fact that that situation is primarily due to the lack of control over the social credit and also given the fact that the large financial institutions have pitifully failed to maintain and of course to improve the stable and healthy economy we had, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) seriously consider the possibility of reforming our monetary system, more particularly as it relates to the control over credit issuance.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN FLEET—SUGGESTION RENOVATION CONTRACTS ADVANCED TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that the number of workers of the Davie shipyard in Lauzon has been cut by about 200 three weeks ago and that it has dropped from 2,300 last April to 750 now; considering that the consecutive lay-offs have a disastrous effect on the economy of Lévis, Quebec City and the outskirts; considering that the Davie shipyard, which is one of the best equipped in Canada, is virtually jeopardized in its very existence if it does not obtain an important contract in the short term; considering finally that union leaders came to Ottawa last week to draw the attention of federal authorities to this alarming situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House urge the Treasury Board to sign two years earlier than expected the contract for the renovation of the Canadian fleet in order to ensure that no new lay-offs will increase the already high level of unemployment in this area and jeopardize the survival of an industry which plays an important part in the economy of this area in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ESTIMATES

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN FORECAST OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING AND ESTIMATES TABLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, eight days ago, on February 22, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), while tabling main estimates for fiscal year 1979, stated:

Total expenditures for the fiscal year 1977-78 were set at $44,450 million and . . . we fully expect total spending to be at or below this ceiling.

Yesterday, Supplementary Estimates B were tabled indicating total spending for fiscal year 1977-78 of $47,600 million. Even using the dubious accounting practice of deducting loan payments and doubling the estimated lapses, spending will still be higher than the ceiling the minister gave the House just one week ago. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House ask the President of the Treasury Board to make a statement on motions correcting the erroneous information given the House on February 22, 1978.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALL FOR RESTORATION OF 1973 PRINCIPLE RESPECTING BASIC RATE OF WAR DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that yesterday this House dealt with an outstanding matter respecting veterans, I urge that it is now time to deal with another matter which is even more urgent. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to take back to cabinet forthwith the question of restoring the basic rate of the war disability pension to the level of the take-home pay of the five categories of federal public servants so designated in 1973, it being the view of this House that good faith calls for such restoration to take place without further delay.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to this Standing Order, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL SUBSIDY PROGRAM BE DISCONTINUED FOR LA FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS-QUÉBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Since the release of a brief submitted to Minister Claude Morin in the province of Quebec by the Fédération des Francophones hors-Québec shows once again that this association does not faithfully reflect the aspirations and objectives of Francophone minorities throughout Canada by linking them to the deplorable separatism of the PQ government through artful plots which actually betray our minorities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent):

That the Secretary of State suspend immediately any grant program for the Fédération des Francophones hors-Québec so that this non-representative and deceitful organization be not supported with taxes paid by Canadians who are the victims of its plots and its betrayal.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

OUTFLOW OF U.S. DOLLAR RESERVES—ACTION TO RECTIFY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, today's published figures show that with respect to our United States dollar reserves there has been an exodus of $715 million. If we couple that with the outflow in January of $200 million, it represents an outflow of over $900 million. Another $45 million has been lost in the last two days. Over 40 per cent of our United States reserves have gone out of this country in roughly two months. Would the Minister of Finance indicate whether this is usual? Is this the ordinary type of market behaviour the minister has been talking about?

● (1417)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the month of February was particularly difficult; that is why we had to intervene. It is the reason we announced we will be borrowing on the United States market very soon in order to have more reserves on hand. I have nothing to add to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We recall that last week the minister said they did not intend to intervene: now he has indicated they have been intervening. There is obviously a large exodus of U.S. dollar reserves, which indicates the government has been caught with an unexpected outgo of United States funds. Would the minister indicate the nature of this outgo and why it occurred during the month of February. Has the government made any assessment of what relatively short-term calls could be made on U.S. dollar reserves in Canada in March or the coming months?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have said—and I repeat—that the governor of the Bank of Canada intervened to make sure that there is an orderly market. It was in the course of that policy that we intervened last month. As I have already indicated, we have made use of the facility that was organized last fall, to the tune of $200 million, and we plan to borrow some U.S. dollars later on. The intervention of the governor is always to make sure that the market operates in an orderly fashion and to diminish speculation as much as possible. This is why he had to intervene last month.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; and I thank the minister for that answer. Speaking about an orderly market, with the Canadian interest rate now at 8¼ per cent and the United States interest rate at 8 per cent, and likely to go to 9 per cent, would the minister indicate if he anticipates he will be able to hold the Canadian interest rate structure at 8¼ per cent, bearing in mind the orderly market he is referring to with respect to our foreign exchange?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the monetary policy is established by the governor of the Bank of Canada and I have no announcement to make in that regard. I would also like to point out that the interest rates set by the governor remains the same.

[English]

AMOUNT OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE REQUIRED TO COUNTERACT OUTFLOW OF U.S. DOLLARS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that we have lost 40 per cent of our United States reserves, could the minister tell the House the government's position with respect to the amount necessary in order to have adequate reserves in the foreign exchange stabilization account against U.S. dollars?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not useful to speculate on that sort of thing.

Mr. Gillies: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I asked that question of the Minister of Finance because the reality of the situation is that the last time the reserves were down was 1967, when they were running about 12 per cent of the total volume of our trade. Today, our reserves are running about 4.5 per cent of the total volume of our trade. I wonder if the government has any position on what those reserves ought to be because if they go to the norm they will have to acquire something like $5 billion. What program does the government have in mind for acquiring that sort of support?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have said many times that I do not want to speculate on these things in the House of Commons. It is not useful, because we operate in a marketplace. I said what I had to say. I estabished a policy last week with the governor of the bank, and I have made that public to the House of Commons. I do not intend to elaborate on these items.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister why he believes that not giving very specific answers to questions such as we have put forth today eliminates speculation? I would suggest that by being so vague, by not putting forth the policies, by not suggesting what the governments' program is he contributes to speculations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: I would ask the minister again in order to avoid speculation and eliminate uncertainty, if he would not tell the people of Canada and the people involved in foreign exchange transactions what reserve position the government of Canada believes appropriate, given the volume of trade we have and the sort of activity that is going on. That would eliminate speculation. It increases speculation when the minister does not answer these questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar is floating on the market at present and it would be useless for me to make further comments. If we proceed with further operations on the market, we will advise the market by making a public statement. In addition I do not want to speculate on the matter because the reserves of all countries vary from month to month and such is the situation of Canada.

INDUSTRY

INVESTMENT IN AUTOMOBILE PLANTS IN CANADA—CANADA-U.S. AUTO PACT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): We now have it officially on the record that the Minister of Finance has no intention of discussing economics either in the House or outside. I am not sure it is assuring, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a question. It was announced in the press today that the Chrysler corporation has announced a lay-off of another 5,000 employees. This is the fifth lay-off in about the same number of weeks by that corporation. It highlights the unfair pattern of investment and job losses that we have experienced in Canada in this industry.

Considering that the minister's own department, in a report to the first ministers' conference, pointed out that the auto trade deficit would reach an annual average of $2.5 billion by 1985 if the present trend continues, I would like to ask if the minister has been able to obtain from the leaders in this industry specific and important investment commitments in Canada.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in Canada the auto industry has enjoyed something like four very good years. From time to time production does get ahead of demand and there have to be some cutbacks in order to allow the market to absorb that which has been produced. We have three or four prospective plants in the negotiating stage. We are competing, and we have to compete very vigorously with lucrative offers from some of the southern states in the United States for these auto plants. That is the problem and that is what we are up against.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I assume that by now the minister has had a chance to look at the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement. If he has, he will have seen that the first clause of that agreement states that both countries are to share, on a fair and equitable basis, in future growth in the industry. That is what both countries are committed to. The reality is that we have lost, according to the Canadian Automotive Parts Association and the UAW, on any reasonable standard of comparison, some 20,000 jobs since that pact came into being.

I would like to ask the minister, since the president of Ford of Canada said not long ago that he anticipates $58 billion of new investment in the industry between now and 1985, since that announcement was made has he been able to obtain commitments from the industry for us to get at least our share of the industry—not more, not less, but at least our share, which will come to about $750 million a year?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should stick to philosophy: he may be a lot better on it than he is on figures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is what you said about Trudeau.

Mr. Horner: We have a net gain in vehicle manufacturers in Canada. The manufacture of vehicles is more work-intensive than the manufacture of parts, so one must do some subtraction in order to arrive at the total job loss. As I have said in this House, we are losing approximately 5,000 jobs a year because of the deficit in the manufacture of parts. We are striving and working very hard with Ford on two or three new automotive parts plants in Canada, but we have to compete with some lucrative offers being made by the southern states.

We have submitted bids to Ford, to Chrysler and to General Motors. The ball is in their court, and we are pressuring them as much as possible in order to obtain a decision as soon as possible. Nothing would give me more pleasure, Mr. Speaker, than to stand in this House in the next week and announce that three or four plants will be built in Canada. That is what I am aiming for.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, virtually every one of the Minister's predecessors has made the same kind of general statement of great expectations and hopes about the future. But the reality is that we still do not have what both Canada and the United States committed themselves to in the auto pact more than ten years ago when they signed it. When the auto agreement was brought into being in 1965, the then minister obtained a written commitment from the head of each of the Big Four companies in Canada about their investment plans. Why is he unable to get the same kind of commitment now, when there is such a massive deficit?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to understand the hon. member. Is he suggesting to this House and to me that we should break the auto pact? If that is what he is suggesting, I would like to know.

INTEREST RATES PAID ON FOREIGN BORROWINGS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has announced that he has secured a loan of $200 million from Canadian banks, and that he is about to seek from foreign sources a loan of equal or greater magnitude, if he has not already done so, could the minister clearly indicate to the House what the interest rate on both these domestic and these foreign loans will be, and how much these loans to support the Canadian dollar will cost?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The interest rate in the case of the loan secured following the agreement signed last fall with a number of Canadian banks will be three-eighths of 1 per cent above the inter-bank rate in London.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question.

The minister's answer is somewhat vague. In view of the fact that we lend money to foreign countries, mostly without charging interest, and that Britain itself has with Canada an account of nearly $1 billion at 2 per cent interest dating back to 1951, and in view of the fact that Canada is now experiencing great financial difficulties, can the minister tell the House if he has made arrangements to borrow on as good terms as Canada gives to foreign countries whenever it can?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I must say that we do not borrow from Britain. I indicated the interest rate which applies for inter-bank deposits in London, and I do not think I can make myself any clearer.

ESTIMATES

FORECAST OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING FOR 1977-78

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On February 16, 1977, the President of the Treasury Board indicated that for fiscal year 1977-78 the total appropriations for government spending, including a reserve for future supplementals, would be $46 billion. With the tabling of Supplementary Estimates B yesterday, we find that the total figure is $47,600 million. What transpired in the last year that precluded the President of the Treasury Board giving the House and the people of Canada an accurate, or at least a close approximation of government spending plans for fiscal year 1977-78?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the total spending of the federal government for fiscal year 1977-78 will be at or below $44,450 million. In saying that, I can point to the record of the previous year, 1976-77, when we announced that expenditures would be $42,150 million and came in finally at $41,078 million. For 1977-78 we will be at or below the figure which was announced, which was not $46 billion but $44,450 million.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, that is flimflam arrived at by doing dubious things with Crown corporation borrowings. Last year the President of the Treasury Board predicted future supplemental spending of $1,850 million, which turned out to be $3 billion, almost twice as much. What guarantee will the minister give the House and the people of Canada that this year's prediction of future supplementals of $1,550 million is not more flimflam of the type we got last year?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it was not flimflam; I have given the accurate figures. We committed to $42,150 million in spending last year; the actual figure came in at $41 billion, $1 billion less than we committed. I say now that when the amounts are all tallied in about July or August, the hon. member will see for sure, as he did last year, that our expenditures will be within the public commitment we made.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not answer the question I raised about the difference between his prediction and the actual fact of the supplementals. He also predicted that spending for the fiscal year just ending would show an increase of 7.7 per cent, though a glance at the figures will indicate that the real figure is 9.4 per cent or, actually, closer to 12 per cent or 13 per cent.

● (1432)

My question to the President of the Treasury Board is this: In order to clear up this question, would the hon. gentleman ask for an immediate reference to be made to the public accounts committee so that guidelines may be established to provide that in future, when spending estimates are presented, they will give a true and accurate picture and not the type of flimflam we have been getting in the past.

An hon. Member: Hooray!

Mr. Andras: I think the needle has stuck on that broken record somewhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: The broken record is on that side of the House.

Mr. Andras: The commitments and the figures which are given, and which are repeated today, will be met. I would be very glad to show the hon. member in the most simple form possible exactly what the record has been, using a little piece of paper and a pencil, before the public accounts committee, privately or in any other way which would make it clear to him what is already clear to so many other people.

TRADE

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON BALANCING TOURISM BUDGET

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. Before asking it, I want to remind him that in the last nine years we have experienced a deficit on the travel account ranging from $202 million in 1971 to $1,700 million last year. In the light of this situation, and remembering that we are not as gullible as the Liberal convention delegates, what did the minister mean when he said last Saturday that Canada should come "awfully close" to balancing the tourism budget this year? Did the minister, by that statement, mean that we were going to eliminate the balance of payments deficit on the tourism account? Are we going to be within $1 billion of doing so, or $1.5 billion? What did he mean by "awfully close"? What does he mean by that revelation?

[Mr. Andras.]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): If one person stands beside another, he is awfully close, but when he is as far away as the hon. member is from me, he is a long way away—and he will continue to be a long way away unless he can interpret the figures a lot better than he has.

Mr. Crosbie: Obviously, the hon. gentleman thinks he is at an accountability session at the Liberal convention. Might I try another question? The minister has announced a $1 million promotion deal to advertise in Canadian magazines to encourage Canadians to stay at home, specifically Maclean's magazine in which the minister was featured recently. In connection with this effort by the government to encourage Canadians to holiday at home, has the hon. gentleman received a pledge from the Prime Minister and from his other cabinet colleagues that they will spend their vacations at home, or do they intend to continue scuba diving in the Bahamas, skiing in Colorado, vacationing in Cuba—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION CABINET MEMBERS HEAR REPRESENTATIONS OF MRS. SHCHARANSKY ON BEHALF OF HER HUSBAND

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I have given the right hon. gentleman notice of its general nature. Earlier today, I had the opportunity to meet personally with the wife of Anatoly Shcharansky and to discuss directly with her and with some of her representatives the very serious situation of her husband. I understand that Mrs. Shcharansky has for some time now been seeking a direct personal meeting with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or he himself, would be prepared to arrange a personal meeting immediately with Mrs. Shcharansky?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Just five minutes ago I received notice from the Leader of the Opposition that he would ask this question. I had time to communicate with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who might have the answer.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the motion put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona was given unanimous consent. We hope this will prove to be significant.

Mr. Clark: I appreciate that fact, and I think it speaks well of the House that the motion put forward by one of the members on the opposition side should have received the unanimous support of this chamber. I think this is particularly important because it indicates the commitment of hon. members to stand up and defend human rights. That is why I asked my question directly, whether the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs personally would be prepared to underline that commitment to the case and cause of Mr. Shcharansky by arranging a personal meeting. Perhaps that matter could be taken as notice and answered later.

I should now like to address a question to the Prime Minister in relation to the motion which was moved by my hon. friend from Edmonton-Strathcona, in which the House of Commons indicated its view that the government should request from the Soviet government permission to appoint an official observer at the trial of Mr. Shcharansky. Since reports indicate that the trial is imminent—indeed, that it could start this week—can the Prime Minister tell us when the government of Canada intends to act on the instruction from the House of Commons and make that application to ensure as far as possible that there is a Canadian lawyer or Canadian presence involved in the trial, without any delay?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition must understand that the case of Mr. Shcharansky has been dealt with by Mrs. Shcharansky, by other relatives of that gentleman and by the minister responsible for multiculturalism in discussion with other ministers. There have been meetings on the matter. Frankly, I do not recall that there has been a request for a meeting with me. I do not know whether there has been a meeting with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On this side, ministers who meet on behalf of the government are all equal.

I would want Mrs. Shcharansky to understand that the meetings she sought with members of the government and with members of the Liberal caucus have been effective in ensuring that the government takes whatever action it considers best to ensure the eventual safe future of Mr. Shcharansky. The details would be much better given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. I shall, of course, take the hon. gentleman's question as an indication of further interest by the opposition in this case and make sure that the government continues to deal with the matter expeditiously.

Mr. Clark: So that the Prime Minister might understand the urgency of this matter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —may I point out that it is entirely likely that at the trial of Mr. Shcharansky, as nearly as we can determine, his only lawyer will be one appointed by the KGB, and that the trial could begin today. This adds an element of real urgency to the motion which was endorsed so enthusiastically today by the House of Commons. The point is this: there has been a request for a meeting with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There was a meeting, apparently, between that minister and the Soviet ambassador on December 12. Mrs. Shcharansky and her advisers have heard nothing from the government in the interim. Can the Prime Minister, or some other government spokesman, tell the House what did transpire at the meeting on December 12 between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Soviet ambassador, what action will ensue, and specifically what has been the response of the Soviet authorities to the offer of the Canadian government of landed immigrant status in Canada for Mr. Shcharansky?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition indicates by his question that he knows of the effort which has already been made by the Canadian government in its acceptance, in advance, of Mr. Shcharansky. He also knows, as his question indicates, that meetings have taken place between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Soviet ambassador. If he wishes to know anything further about this matter, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, his parliamentary secretary or the minister for multiculturalism would be prepared to deal further with the matter.

I doubt whether Mrs. Shcharansky is interested in getting anything more than results from this process. I doubt whether it is necessarily productive of results that the Leader of the Opposition should ask the question in this way at this time. If that is his opinion, or if that is the opinion of Mrs. Shcharansky, they are of course perfectly free to follow it. But she knows, and the Leader of the Opposition knows, that ministers of the government have been acting as quickly as they can in this matter to get results for the benefit of Mr. Shcharansky; and this continues to be our course.

An hon. Member: Nobody has heard anything.

Mr. Clark: I very much regret that the Prime Minister would treat a very serious question of human rights in this way. The fact is that the family has not been advised of the result of that meeting between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Soviet ambassador.

● (1442)

If there is a minister in the House—and I am looking at the Minister of State for Multiculturalism who is pointing to himself—who has some information on that question, I hope he will take this opportunity to convey to the House of Commons and to Mr. Shcharansky the concrete results of the meeting between the minister and the Soviet ambassador, and make specific reference to the response of the offer by Canada to extend landed immigrant status.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that Mrs. Avital Shcharansky, long before today and this question being raised in the House, was quite aware of the actions which were taken by myself, by other members of the government and the caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: I have met with Mr. Shcharansky and I have met with members of the Shcharansky family. It was at our initiative that the offer of landed immigrant status was made for Anatoly Shcharansky to come to Canada. They have been kept posted on all developments which I have considered to be relevant. I have been prepared to meet with Mrs. Shcharansky, the Shcharansky family or any of the Jewish federations who wanted to meet with me or talk with me at any time. So no information has been withheld. In relation to the specific response from the Soviet Union to the offer of landed immigrant status, to my knowledge at this point in time there has not been an official response.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR RENOVATION AND CONVERSION OF SHIPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the first part of my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and the second part to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the alarming situation that has existed in the Lauzon shipyards since, about a year ago now, 2,000 workers were laid off, and in view of the many representations made to the caucus by the union, municipal councils, chambers of commerce and other organizations of the riding of Lévis, does the government intend soon to meet the requests for new credits to be earmarked for new programs for repairing and renovating the ships of the Canadian navy, as previously announced by the Department of National Defence?

I should also like the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to tell us why the decision is being delayed—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Lévis for having brought up the matter yesterday at the caucus and having so allowed the government, as early as today—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I know this matter does not interest the Progressive Conservative Party in the least, but I can give the hon. member the answer he seeks.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS ON BEHALF OF SOVIET NATIONALS WISHING TO EMIGRATE FROM U.S.S.R.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Some time ago representations were made to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs by representatives of various ethnic groups, including Ukrainian, Polish, Latvian, Estonian and Jewish groups, urging the government to make representations to the government of the Soviet Union to permit immigration of Soviet citizens who have committed no crime and wish to leave that country, especially citizens of the Soviet Union who have relatives in Canada.

Since whatever representations were made on this matter at the Belgrade conference have failed, would the Prime Minister now make public representations to the Soviet president, Mr. Brezhnev, urging him to facilitate the movement of such Soviet citizens to Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member asks the question in this way. He knows the government has made many representations to Soviet authorities to this effect. I have reported to the House that I have raised the question twice, personally, in meetings with the prime minister of the Soviet Union and again with the ambassador. I believe it is a matter of record that there has been substantial improvement in the movement of Jewish Soviet citizens out of the Soviet Union. Indeed, in the area of reunification of families, there has been substantial progress. I do not have the statistics at hand. I am surprised the hon. member implies by his question that we have not obtained results. We have, and so have other western countries.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. No one questions that there has been some progress. At the same time, there are still many Jewish dissidents who have not been permitted to leave. The Ukrainian Immigrant Aid Society of Toronto has a list of some 400 families who are still attempting to get relatives out of the Soviet Union. Despite the progress which has been made, they are the ones who would like the Prime Minister to make another public appeal, and not just the usual diplomatic appeal; they feel that is not enough and what is required is an open, public appeal to the president of the Soviet Union. Will the Prime Minister give consideration to making the type of public appeal which these groups are requesting?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand that a public appeal is all they can get out of the opposition parties. Out of the government, they have got results—which is preferable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

INTENTIONS OF AECL RESPECTING EISENBERG CONTRACT

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it concerns the statement of the chairman of Atomic Energy of Canada, Ltd. to the effect that there is no binding commitment that Mr. Eisenberg's firm would be used again. In view of the fact that there is a memorandum of understanding between AECL and the Eisenberg-UDI group, signed by Mr. Campbell and approved by the minister, which clearly states that such a commitment exists, will the minister tell the House whether he approves the statement of Mr. Campbell which, in effect, is notice that AECL intends to break a written contract?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, obviously the chairman was expressing a personal opinion and perhaps providing a legal opinion in respect to the matter about which the hon. member has asked a question.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, will the minister tell the House whether the chairman's statement still stands? If it does not, will he tell the House that he takes full responsibility for implementing the terms of the March 4, 1976, agreement which the minister authorized and the Standing Committee on Public Accounts condemned because it will raise the cost of getting Mr. Eisenberg's group off backs of Canadian taxpayers beyond the $20 million originally negotiated by Mr. Gray?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the recommendations of the committee, which have been incorporated in a document placed before the House recently, are being considered very seriously. I welcome the report. I think the hon. member should also welcome the fact that we have been able to move very substantially on almost all the recommendations of that report.

RECOVERY OF MONEYS PAID UNDER EISENBERG CONTRACT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to refer to an answer he gave yesterday in response to a question posed by the hon. member for Egmont. Perhaps inadvertence or ignorance may have caused him to mislead the House on the $2 million advance payment to Mr. Eisenberg. In his answer, the minister said:

> —no payment has been made on the post-services contract. I do not know how many times I will have to repeat that for his benefit. If he likes, I will repeat it once more: the post-services contract could be as much as $5 million. No payment was made; the invoice was rejected.

It is clear from the Auditor General's report that the agreement provides for an advance payment of $2 million, which was paid to Mr. Eisenberg in April of 1976. Would the minister agree now that $2 million has been paid, and if no services are to be provided—as Mr. Campbell, the chairman, stated recently—what steps will the government take to recover the $2 million already paid?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear from the documentation which I placed before the committee on December 14, 1976, I think, that part of one payment—that is to say, of $15.3 million—or some $2 million of that payment was an advance on post-contract services. There is no question about that; it is on the record. But the hon. member should reflect that the kinds of questions that have been put forward—and, indeed, this was one of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts—invited the interpetation that payments had been made subsequent to that one payment. I think that a careful reading of the recommendations of the public accounts committee could bring about that interpretation, because there is a suggestion that further payments should be suspended.

It was also made quite clear yesterday in the question of the hon. member for Egmont that he acknowledged that the first invoice had been rejected. He then went on to refer to further payments of $2 million. I am reading from page 3340 of Hansard. I was trying to make clear to the House, as I have in the past, that no payments were made to the agent subsequent to that one payment which was made early in 1976, some time before the public accounts committee was even seized of the question and before the committee started to hold its hearings.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I am glad we have that clarified. I agree with the minister that no quarterly payments have been made. On Tuesday, the minister had not had a chance to consider the report of the public accounts committee. I would like to ask him now whether he has had a chance to see the report tabled on Monday, and does he disagree with the unanimous opinion of the committee that the chairman failed to negotiate a better deal with Eisenberg?

Mr. Gillespie: That is a matter of opinion. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member that the renegotiated agreement made by the chairman has saved, until now, Canadian taxpayers something in the order of $3 million. That seems to me to be the kind of comparison that should be made when weighing the advantages of the first contract, which was a legal contract, and those of the second one. The hon. member holds the view that it was not to the advantage of Canadians. I think most Canadians would believe that a $3 million saving is an advantage.

ELDORADO URANIUM DUMP AND REFINERY—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of which I gave him notice yesterday morning. On Tuesday morning, an environmental assessment panel under the jurisdiction of the Minister of State for the Environment published a recommendation that the Eldorado uranium dump and refinery proposal for Port Granby not be proceeded with. Even though that panel reports to the Minister of the Environment—this is the first time such a panel has come out with a negative recommendation respecting an important matter such as this—the licensing agency is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As a matter of fact, the Crown agency of Eldorado Nuclear falls under his jurisdiction.

My question is: What factor will this play in the decision by the minister and the government on whether or not to proceed with that refinery and dump project at Port Granby? Is this a binding recommendation on the government, or is it not? What is going to happen now to Eldorado's application to proceed?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think the hon. member has noted that the recommendation to which he referred was provided in the form of a press release, not a report, so I think it would be premature for me or anybody on this side to speculate about that particular report until it has been received. The hon. member asks whether or not it is binding. I think he knows that the environmental review process is one involving a recommendation on the part of the particular committee. I see the hon. member is making a recommendation that the government should overrule one of the significant recommendations of the environmental review panel.

Mr. Lawrence: No, sir, in no way is the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham making that recommendation. I think the minister should read his mail again. The Minister of State for the Environment previously gave the people of Port Hope and the surrounding area to understand that any recommendation coming from that panel would be considered by him to be binding. That is a statement of general governmental policy, and I think it is a very important one because this is the first time such a panel has come out with a negative recommendation.

What is the sense of having these hearings and having panels do that type of work unless the government is going to pay strict attention to them? Is it a matter of government policy, and is this the major factor in the government's decision on whether to proceed, or is it not? That is a simple enough question.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham issued a press release yesterday, dated March 1, in which he specifically recommended, if I understand him correctly from reading the press release, that the refinery should be built at Port Granby.

Mr. Lawrence: No, in the Port Hope area. There is a difference.

Mr. Gillespie: The environmental review process and the panel, as I understand it, have rejected that.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am seriously misinterpreted. There is a difference between Port Granby and Port Hope. There is an existing agency in Port Hope which belongs to the minister's department. It is quite different from Port Granby. I hate to interpret the minister's own agencies to him, but the minister's panel was referring to Port Granby. It is a matter of government policy whether or not these matters are going to be decided. Can the minister tell us whether it is government policy, when these environmental panels make recommendations, to consider them seriously?

[Mr. Lawrence.]

Mr. Gillespie: That has been made very clear in the past by colleagues who are responsible for this area. But I would bring to the hon. member's attention and to the attention of the House that the only application before the environmental review panel was with respect to Port Granby. I have to acknowledge that that is in the Port Hope area, but there is no other application for the Port Hope area. So the hon. member is obviously playing with words when he says to me that he is prepared to go along with it, but he wants it right beside the place specified in the application.

BILINGUALISM

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT CEASE SUBSIDIZING LA FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS-QUÉBEC

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, following the publication of the report dated October 20 and submitted to Quebec Minister Claude Morin by the Fédération des Francophones hors-Québec to invite the government of that province to take part in the underhand arrangement concerning the French-speaking minority groups of Canada, is the minister prepared to cut immediately all subsidies to this non-representative organization and, if not, what steps does he intend to take to protect the French-speaking minorities of Canada against the misleading proposals of the FFHQ that we, as the majority among these minorities, denounce and will keep denouncing?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. I am always ready to co-operate with every representative of French-speaking groups outside Quebec. We are open to co-operation and I sincerely hope that the Fédération des Francophones will try to join us to discuss all possible ways to reach our common objectives. I understand the concern of the hon. member but if there are French-speaking people outside Quebec who do not agree with the strategy of the Fédération, it is the responsibility of the members of the association themselves to settle this dispute in a democratic way in front of the Francophone federation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BUGGING OF MPs OFFICES—GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE OF WARREN HART CASE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General, but since he is with the Prime Minister I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the House how many members of parliament, in addition to a former solicitor general and the hon. member for Nickel Belt, have been subjected to electronic surveillance accidentally, coincidentally, intentionally, unintentionally or in any other way? If he does not know, will he be able to give us that information in the near future?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not in my seat and did not hear the full purport of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MacKay: Is the Solicitor General, or is the Prime Minister, now in a position to say how many more members of parliament besides a former solicitor general and the hon. member for Nickel Belt have been subjected to electronic surveillance either accidentally, coincidentally or otherwise?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on that point, I had intended to rise on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt yesterday. I have indicated outside the House that not even incidentally do we have any record of the hon. member for Nickel Belt being subjected to taping or to any other surveillance. With reference to any other members of parliament, I would like to check the record and advise the hon. gentleman. Perhaps I can provide him with that information.

Mr. MacKay: Steps are being taken in the United States to ascertain information concerning the background of Mr. Warren Hart's activities and details of his recruitment from the FBI. We were advised—I think last February—by the Prime Minister that there was no reason to suggest that the RCMP conducted itself like the FBI. We now have evidence that, in fact, the RCMP recruited someone from the FBI. Can the Solicitor General say whether this incident, if it is an isolated one, took place with the knowledge of the cabinet committee on security, the secretary of state for external affairs of the day, or at what level was this unusual arrangement allowed?

Mr. Blais: I would like to look at two aspects of the question; first, the nature of the investigations that are being conducted vis-à-vis the FBI and, second, I wish to indicate to the hon. gentleman that as I understand it Mr. Hart was not a member of the FBI. But I would like to provide the hon. member with information relating to that aspect of his question.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—NATIONAL SECURITY—VISIT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL AND HEAD OF SECURITY SERVICE TO HON. MEMBER'S OFFICE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I believe this is one of the most serious questions of privilege a member could ever raise in the House of Commons. If hon. members on the government side will permit me to outline this question, I will do so as briefly, concisely, and accurately as possible.

About noon today—I cannot state the time positively—I was visited by General Dare, head of the security service of the RCMP, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), in my office.

It took some time, due to subsequent events, for me to realize that this is a question of privilege; otherwise, I would have given the required notice to the Chair.

General Dare and the Solicitor General discussed with me the fact that I have been raising in the House certain matters pertaining to national security. Hon. members are familiar with the matters I have been raising. The Solicitor General and General Dare asked me if I would turn over to them copies of any documents I have in my possession which came from the security service.

I was then shown a document which I was told was compiled by the RCMP, pertaining to myself. That document recommended various options the government had to deal with me if I did not comply with the request that I turn over copies of documents to the RCMP.

I remember three of four of those recommendations, which I will mention. One was that a search warrant be issued so that my office in the House of Commons could be searched. Another was that a search warrant could be issued with regard to my home and other premises. Another was that a warrant for my arrest could be issued by the Solicitor General. Presumably that would mean confinement in jail at some point. Another option was that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) might be prevailed upon to exert some pressure on me to give up these documents. Another option—and I am paraphrasing—was that perhaps the RCMP or the Solicitor General could prevail upon me as a good Canadian to surrender copies of such documents. I was asked to surrender them.

I told the Solicitor General that I have never had any intention to interfere with the national security of this country. I told him I would stick to that principle. The Solicitor General told me this morning that he felt that in some ways some of the things I have done perhaps interfered with such national security. Frankly, in the interest of national security I do not wish to repeat the points he raised, unless he wants me to do so. Nevertheless, I said to him that I would like time to consult counsel, to consider what I should do, and also to discuss this with the leader of my party. I said that as any Canadian I had the right to consult my lawyer, which I do. When someone is told he might be arrested or that his premises might be searched, he has the right to consult counsel.

The document I was shown had two columns. The column on the left contained what I have said in the House of Commons. The column on the right contained the actual facts according to the RCMP. I might say that in each case the facts, and what I have said, corresponded. General Dare and the Solicitor General therefore deduced that I had in my possession copies of two specific RCMP or security service documents.

I must mention another thing. I do not like to do this, but I think it is necessary. In that document there was included a statement by Superintendent Bentham of the RCMP in which he summarized a conversation he had with me a few days ago. It is quite true that I had a conversation with him. The statement was accurate with the exception of one point. I think this is a very serious interference with the privileges of members of parliament. I am paraphrasing again. Superintendent Bentham reported to the Solicitor General and his superiors that I asked him whether he was recording or bugging our conversation, and that he replied yes. I must tell the House that that is an absolute falsehood. I did ask him whether he was bugging or recording our conversation, and he replied "no". He said, "If you mean am I making notes of what you are saying, yes I am. Do you mind?" I said, "No, of course not".

However, the report he handed to his superiors—which I saw with my own eyes because it was handed to me by the Solicitor General—said that Superintendent Bentham had said that my telephone call and the words I was using were being recorded, presumably by some form of recording device. I questioned General Dare about this, and he said it was a matter of terminology. I think it is much more than just a matter of terminology.

The main point I am trying to bring out is that I feel that any Canadian has the right to legal advice. I am saying that in effect this was denied to me. General Dare and the Solicitor General said they would retire to the corridor for a few moments, consult, and return, which they did.

We discussed what would happen to these documents. I said I would undertake absolutely not to show them to anyone between now and Monday, not to discuss them further, nor to raise them in the House of Commons. I told them that on Monday we could meet after I had time to think it over, to consult my solicitor and to consult the leader of my party. I said that I could then give an answer. When they left my office I was left with the distinct impression that that request was being granted. They more or less departed not saying absolutely "yes", but certainly not telling me that anything would be done to me.

At 1:15 p.m. in the dining room of the House of Commons today I was telephoned by the Solicitor General and advised in a very friendly way—but I am not sure just how friendly the motive of the person behind him was—that I had until four o'clock this afternoon and that he was sorry but it had to be four o'clock this afternoon, or he would have to exercise one of his options. I asked him which option he was going to exercise, and he said he would not go any further at that time. I had seen the options, of course, so I knew it had to be one of the three or four or five that I had seen.

Shortly before the House met at two o'clock I had an opportunity to discuss this matter with the Leader of the Progressive Conservative party. After I had outlined to him what had happened, he advised me that he had been telephoned or contacted, I am not sure which, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this morning and asked if he would come to the Prime Minister's office. The Prime Minister in effect told him roughly what was going to happen which, of course, subsequently did happen.

I do not choose to go into further details of what the Prime Minister said to the Leader of the Opposition or what the Leader of the Opposition said to the Prime Minister. That perhaps has no bearing on my question of privilege, other than to say that the Prime Minister, in my opinion, was using his office as Prime Minister to put pressure on the Solicitor General to take care of me and deny my rights in this House.

I think that is a fundamental breach of the privileges of any member of the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker. I am frankly surprised, very surprised, that the Prime Minister of this country should be so vindictive with a member of the opposition that he would go as far as contacting the leader of this party on a matter of this nature and, when that did not work, go to the Solicitor General and tell him to do what he did subsequently, namely, deny me the right to consult counsel.

Mr. Speaker, how could I, between the time I left the parliamentary dining room and came to this House at two o'clock, have any chance to contact my solicitor, who does not live in the city of Ottawa, have legal advice given to me, and then discuss the matter further with the Solicitor General at four o'clock this afternoon? How could I possibly do it?

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask you, as protector of the rights of members of this House, if I do not have the right to be given the time to consult my solicitor about what should be done in this case? Are my privileges being interfered with or denied by what this government has done?

I say to the Prime Minister of this country, who is probably far more responsible for what has happened today than the Solicitor General, that he has seen a chance, so he thinks, to "get" the member for Leeds. Believe me, sir, he will not get that chance because every person in this country has a right to counsel—me, yourself, sir, the Prime Minister, or anyone walking the streets of this country. Any government that tries to deny those rights, that tries to deny the privileges of a citizen of this country to consult his lawyer, I think is far more guilty than anyone who might be charged with anything. I think it is a very, very serious matter.

There is little I can add, Mr. Speaker. I think I have made it clear that the document shown to me proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that everything I have said in this House is true, because it said so. It also has proved as a result that the Prime Minister has attempted to use his position to put the—what would I call it—the muzzle on me as a member of parliament, through one of his cabinet ministers. It interferes with my privileges. I think it is one of the most serious things that could have occurred, and I ask that I be allowed to reserve the right to move a motion at some subsequent point to have this matter dealt with further.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would indicate to the hon. gentleman and the House that I did attend the meeting to which the hon. gentleman has referred and that, in all material particulars, the information he has provided is accurate. What he has not said is that on three occasions questions were raised in this House based upon information that evidently had been obtained from a source that dealt with top secret documents.

The hon. gentleman does not deny the fact that he had within his possession, and has had within his possession since at least the time when he commenced questioning in the House, documents that were deemed to be top secret documents and confidential documents.

As Solicitor General that was of great concern to me. I indicated to the hon. gentleman, on a number of occasions, that instead of making public declarations relative to documents of that nature, he ought to communicate with me and deal with the nature of those documents and provide me with such information as would enhance the security of the nation. Until I saw the hon. gentleman in his office this morning at close to twelve o'clock, I had received no communication from him.

I had been advised by the security service that the document could be in his possession. I had no indication that it was in his possession. There was an indication that those documents were detrimental, that the information within those documents, the release of which could be made by the hon. gentleman, was detrimental to the security of the state. Therefore—

An hon. Member: That is your opinion.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, surely as the chief enforcement officer of the national security of this state I have to exercise my opinion on a number of occasions.

In this instance even the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) recognizes the sensitivity of the information that he was releasing. He knew of the sensitivity of the information that document contained. The document itself was not only essential in terms of its content but also essential in terms of the source of that particular document

The nature of the document brought into play the provisions of the Official Secrets Act with which, I am sure, the hon. member is familiar. If he is not, then he is derelict because he ought to have become familiar with them. He was dealing with a document which was strictly indicated as being top secret. He knew that the release of any information within that document had to be contrary to the Official Secrets Act. Undoubtedly he has certain privileges in this House, Mr. Speaker, but surely not to the detriment of the national security of this state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in order to take every precaution, I advised the Prime Minister, as I am obliged to do, of the nature of the information that presumably was in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds. I described to the hon. gentleman the options that were made available to the government in terms of what could happen.

The document that I showed the hon. member for Leeds in complete confidentiality in order to solicit his co-operation, was a document prepared for me in terms of the options that could be taken. There was evidence indicating that there could very well be a breach of the Official Secrets Act, and it stated the remedies there were available in the event that the facts were proved. I did not choose to use any of those measures, Mr. Speaker, because I felt the hon. gentleman was a member of parliament, and my responsibility had to be to secure return of that document and to ascertain the source of the leak, if we might call if that, within the security service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: In order to achieve that purpose, with the least publicity and the least inconvenience to any party, I approached the hon. member for Leeds after having asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to solicit the concurrence of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to encourage the hon. member for Leeds to provide me with that information for the purpose I have described. I was not successful. On three occasions when speaking to the hon. member for Leeds, I indicated to him that I was soliciting his co-operation. The information I was conveying to him was complete with the revelation of the information that had been made available for me in the hope that the hon. gentleman would see the folly of the resistance that he is engaging in that, to my mind, is detrimental to the operation and maintenance of the sovereignty of this country.

When I called the hon. gentleman from his office in the centre block, when I went there in order to confer with him further, I suggested to his secretary that she should locate him. She found him in the parliamentary restaurant. I would have preferred to have spoken to him in person because it was simply an extension of our previous conversation. The reason why I asked for a reply by four o'clock was because of the sensitivity of the information that was there and because of the initial reluctance which the hon. gentleman had indicated to me to return the document which he had received, so that I could ascertain the sources of the leak of that particular information.

I was preoccupied, Mr. Speaker, with the second purpose that I described, namely, to ascertain the nature of the leak and the origin of that leak. Surely the hon. gentleman recognizes that the source of that information is an essential ingredient of the corrective action that this government has to take in order to preserve our national security.

● (1522)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: I am fully aware of the preoccupation of the hon. gentleman. He asked me whether he could be put in jail. I said to him that there was no consideration of that. I assured him of that. There were alternatives described in the paper, for my purposes, in terms of information from legal sources. They were not, Mr. Speaker, meant for the hon. gentleman except indirectly as a result of my willingness to offer to him all of the information that had been made available to me.

Mr. Fraser: Don't be so naïve.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there was no intention to intimidate the hon. gentleman at all. As a matter of fact, if indicating to an hon. gentleman his obligation under the law is intimidation, then I feel that the hon. gentleman is being misguided in that particular opinion.

Evidently the hon. gentleman is very perturbed by that, and I regret it. I regret that he has interpreted my actions as being motivated in any other way but to discharge my responsibilities, taking into account fully his sensitivities as well, his security as a member of parliament. I said to him quite openly, as he indicated to me, that I was speaking to him as one member of parliament to another and as one who has a great deal of respect for this House and all its members, and as one who would never take an action, Mr. Speaker, in order to deprive any member of this House of his liberty without the full process of the protections that are available to him.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I speak as one who has been through this process before, and I have some experience in the circumstance giving rise to the question raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). What the Solicitor General's (Mr. Blais) rhetoric cannot avoid is the time frame within which he has denied the hon. member for Leeds the fundamental right to the rules of natural justice, the right to consult and obtain advice from counsel. It is all very well for him to use phrases such as "presumably", "perhaps"—those were his words—that there were security documents in the possession of the hon. member for Leeds, and then leave the member's office with the clear impression that he would have that opportunity and the time to consult with counsel until Monday. But then he discovered the hon. member an hour and 15 minutes later in the parliamentary restaurant and issued an ultimatum to him that he, the Solicitor General, had to have a reply by four o'clock otherwise he would exercise his options, which were explained by the hon. member for Leeds. Those options concerned a search warrant of his offices, his home and other premises and perhaps a suggestion of jail. It has been denied by the Solicitor General that that term was used, but the hon. member for Leeds has used it.

It is not up to the minister to instruct the hon. member for Leeds that there has been an alleged offence committed under the Official Secrets Act. It is not up to any other member of the government either to interfere to that extent with the right of a member of parliament without the concurrent right of that member to seek legal advice and have the time to do so. That is inexcusable. That was the pressure put on the hon. member for Leeds. It was not only being done by the Solicitor General but it was apparently being done with at least the knowledge of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I prefer to believe that the Prime Minister made that call to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as a courtesy. I prefer to believe it did not go beyond that. But for the Solicitor General attending as he did with the director of his security services, the RCMP, at the office of the member for Leeds, or to attend on any other member of this parliament in that fashion and under those circumstances, and as well to compress the time frame to a point where he is denied access to and advice from counsel, is completely repugnant to my understanding of the rules of natural justice which are followed under our system.

He based his case on the fact that he was advised by his security services that documents and, I use his words, "could be" in the possession of the member for Leeds. If that was his position then he has his recourse and that recourse is not to bring the pressures that he brought to bear with respect to the circumstances as he has outlined. What he did in effect to the hon. member for Leeds, and I have experienced this myself, was to give him an ultimatum at 1.15, when he spoke to him in the parliamentary restaurant. That ultimatum was that at four o'clock this afternoon he either had to come up with an answer that he would be willing to produce whatever he "perhaps" or "presumably", to use the Solicitor General's words, had in his possession, or he would be confronted with a search warrant for his home or his office, or with whatever other alternatives were described by the hon. member for Leeds as being available.

To my mind that is the grossest form—I will not use the term blackmail—of intimidation. If that is not interfering with the rights and privileges of a member of this House, I do not know what is.

There have been over the course of weeks in this House, sir, various revelations made not only by the hon. member for Leeds but by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). I have been involved in those questions myself in the past and currently. We have a right to expose those questions. I agree on the one hand that that right has to be exercised with discretion. But when we are confronted with an announcement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) of the extent to which subversion is extant by the expulsion of 13 subversives, then surely it is incumbent upon the opposition to be even more vigilant to expose these matters. That is exactly what the member for Leeds was doing when he was bringing these matters up. All we have had is non-answers, evasion, ducking or weaving from the government, and no voluntary conduct on the part of the Solicitor General to visit the hon. member for Leeds to head this off. It is only when they think they have the goods on him, that they confront him in his office in the presence of one of the highest officers of the RCMP, the assistant commissioner.

If I heard the minister correctly, and I cannot with the sound system which exists here now—I could have in the past—I take it that he is saying the hon. member for Leeds never came to him. Surely the Solicitor General has the obligation when these questions are raised by the member for Leeds, or by my friend from Central Nova, or myself, to contact us.

Surely that obligation exists. It happened in the past with me and I co-operated with members of the force when I was visited. However, that option was not exercised. It is only when they thought they had the goods on the hon. member for Leeds that they decided to screw the screws, to put the old screw-boot on and muzzle him. That is wrong. That is a deep interference with the rights and privileges of the members of this House.

● (1532)

Members have a responsibility to be discreet when they raise these matters. We all have that responsibility. I think we have exercised it. However, for the Solicitor General to have brought in this matter in the fashion in which he has, is completely repugnant to everything I understand about the rules of natural justice in this country.

The ultimatum is unforgivable. To give the hon. member for Leeds between 1:16 and four o'clock to seek counsel about the options with which he is confronted, is unforgivable.

The options are all very serious because, from the remarks of the Solicitor General, they obviously involve the possibility of charges being laid under the Official Secrets Act against the hon. member for Leeds. Surely he has the right to expect an adequate time to consult with and obtain advice from counsel.

I do not think this is within your jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, but the events, and the solution to the problem that has been caused by these events, are within the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister. I would like to gain the Prime Minister's attention because I want him to hear my suggestion. I see he has been consulting with the Solicitor General.

The least the Prime Minister can do is allow the hon. member for Leeds an adequate, reasonable time within which he will be able to afford the opportunity to consult with and obtain the advice of counsel before he succumbs to any intimidation brought upon him this afternoon.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment on the extraordinary things which have been said about the breach of privilege and the lack of either courtesy or of honouring a privilege in relation to the right to counsel. Surely what we are involved in here is an extending of unusual courtesy to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) which would not have been extended to an ordinary citizen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: We are not involved here in a question of the whims of the government but of the rule of law of this land as enacted by parliament, the Official Secrets Act. It is to protect the security of this country. In most circles it is seen as being as important to the preservation of the state as any branch of law. In any case, it is the law of the land as enacted by this parliament. Accompanying the law of this land often go rights to lay charges and perform searches in order to obtain evidence without any notice, because the very point of the action taken is that it may be necessary to have that evidence obtained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Of course there is no doubt about the right of such a citizen, in our law, to obtain advice of counsel. However, for an ordinary citizen that often comes after the time the charge has been laid and the search has been performed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), as I understood his remarks, indicated that he had first personally asked the hon. member for the evidence and the material which are at the root of this offence against the law, which is alleged. Indeed, he was counting on the co-operation of the hon. member of which, however, the hon. member's past conduct has not given much evidence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Notwithstanding that and with presumably, as the Solicitor General has indicated, legal advice about courses of action which were possible, he thought it appropriate, because of the traditions of members of parliament, traditions which I hope all members here, including the hon. member for Leeds, will honour, in the circumstances to allow him to come forward with the information requested in order that the law of this land not continue to be flouted.

The giving of notice about the possible courses of action is now cited as a breach of the privileges of a member, when in fact it is evidence of the extension by the Solicitor General of significant privileges to this member which would not be extended in relation to such a case to any other citizen in this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pick up the debate on this very important question of privilege precisely where the Minister of Justice left off.

An hon. Member: Minister of Transport.

Mr. Broadbent: Excuse me, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), trying to act as the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The matter is serious. I am not trying to be facetious about it. The Minister of Transport just said that what was involved in the logic of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) indicates that he was calling for something that would not be granted to any other ordinary citizen of Canada. With respect, Mr. Speaker, in terms of being a privilege of a member of parliament, that is precisely what privilege is all about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Once a citizen becomes a member of parliament, the supreme legislative body of this land, he or she acquires certain privileges by virtue of being a member of this assembly.

An hon. Member: And responsibilities!

Mr. Broadbent: And certain responsibilities. I agree entirely with the hon. member. What we are talking about cannot be reduced, either in morality or law, to something that is equivalent to the notice of moral or legal rights of other citizens of Canada. It is a comparison of apples and oranges. It is not the same situation.

I wish to deal very briefly with the substance of what I see to be at stake here. As the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has indicated, it is very important if a security document which is labelled "top secret" finds its way into the hands of a member of parliament or any other citizen who is not authorized to have such a document. That is a serious situation. I think all members will fully agree with the Solicitor General that it is not something one can simply laugh off. The Solicitor General and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have to be concerned about it.

What I understand, both from what the hon. member for Leeds and the Solicitor General have said today, is the following. There is good reason to believe that documents of this kind are in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds. There are good grounds for that belief. However, from what the Solicitor General has said, there have been three or four earlier discussions in the House about these documents. This is not something that just came to the attention of the Solicitor General this morning. These documents have remained in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds for some time, presumably, if they are the alleged documents we are talking about.

Earlier in the conversation before noon today, there was discussion about certain courses of action that would be open to the hon. member for Leeds. In one sense that is an entirely reasonable set of proposals for the Solicitor General to present to an hon. member of this House, whether on this side or the other side.

In the presentation of those choices, I do not necessarily see intimidation. It depends in part what use is made after that of those options as to whether you can reach a conclusion of intimidation having taken place, or other inappropriate action. It seems there is an infringement here of the rights of a member in one sense of that term, namely, that there has to be basic trust and acceptance of the honesty and integrity of members of this House. That is why we cannot say that members on either side deliberately mislead the House.

What seems to be disturbing about what has been outlined today is this: the Solicitor General has had a conversation with the hon. member for Leeds, and among the options which he himself proposed was a situation in which consultation with the hon. member's lawyer would play a crucial role, and whether he would go for that option—

[Mr. Broadbent.]

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Broadbent: The Solicitor General is shaking his head. But it seems to me if you are talking about the possibility of arrest to a member you are raising the appropriate option of consultation with a lawyer, among other options. This was presented to the hon. member for Leeds around noon hour, and the hon. member for Leeds gave his word as a member of the House—I forget the precise wording, but this was certainly the sense of his comments—that he would not destroy the documents, that he would not take any other course of action between now and Monday, but that he just wanted time between now and Monday to think about the situation.

I am not attributing blame. I am appealing for a reasonable and amicable solution. If there was a sense of trust—the Solicitor General says he has had three or four conversations in the past with the hon. member for Leeds—

Mr. Blais: In the House. I answered questions. He has never talked to me and I have never talked to him.

Mr. Broadbent: Well, the point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that the Solicitor General has had reason to believe for a number of days that these documents were with the hon. member for Leeds. Then he presented him with a set of options. I agree that at some point, as Solicitor General, he should act in terms of exercising his responsibility. The hon. member for Leeds has said "Give me until Monday morning". If a sense of trust and integrity is to be maintained, it seems to me the appropriate course of action would have been for the Solicitor General to have said, "Yes, let us wait until Monday morning." Instead, he has closed off the options. This is so, because one of the options discussed was the possibility of legal action involving consultation with a lawyer. He has foreclosed the hon. member's opportunity to consult with a lawyer.

This is an important matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, because we all get documents. They come to us involuntarily, sometimes in little brown envelopes or in other ways; people recognize that we are members of parliament and they send these documents. The future is at stake here. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, or through you to the Prime Minister perhaps, to extricate us from this unpleasantness by undertaking to give the hon. member for Leeds until Monday morning to reach his decision.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to enter into this debate and I do not intend to discuss the matter now at any great length. I will say, though, that the subject under discussion seems to have changed its nature as the debate has proceeded.

As was stated by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I did receive a call from the Prime Minister's office and had a brief conversation with him in his office at his request. I should make it very clear that at that time I very much had the idea that the invitation from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was extended to me as a matter of courtesy by him to notify me of events which related, or might relate, to a member of parliament sitting with the Progressive Conservative opposition.

Naturally, I do not intend to disclose the nature of the conversation between the right hon. gentleman and myself except to say that I did not contact the hon. member for Leeds in relation to that conversation. This was for two reasons. One was that I did not wish to appear to be interfering in any way with appropriate legal procedures which might be brought into play, and to which allusion has been made, and, second, because I did not want to appear to be placing any pressure upon the hon. member for Leeds to take action which might limit his right and privilege to act as he believes he ought to act here on the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What has changed, as I became aware when the hon. member for Leeds spoke to me briefly before the beginning of this day's sitting, is that the hon. member for Leeds indicated to me that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and General Dare presented to the hon. member a range of different actions which might be taken in relation to the hon. member for Leeds. I do not propose to go further into that argument, one which has already been made in the House, except to say that I think the spelling out, the deliberate communication to a member of parliament of those alternatives, which might have involved the laying of a criminal charge, coupled with the compression of time, a requirement that a member of parliament reply to the Solicitor General within a matter of four hours, are circumstances which reek of intimidation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is one other matter to which I must refer. There is a reason why members of the House of Commons enjoy special protection relative to access of information. We are, after all, the elected representatives of the people of Canada. Though this is too often forgotten, perhaps, in some corners of this chamber, we are collectively the body to which the government is responsible for all its activities. It is therefore highly important that members of parliament retain intact their ability to use information which relates to the national business and which might come into their possession. This is a most important principle.

None of us should be intimidated in relation to the use, in what is seen to be in the national interest, of information which comes to us. Such information might very well affect the conduct of the government or the protection of the Canadian national interest. We have a right in this House to use that kind of information responsibly and we have the right to be free from any odour of intimidation with respect to its use.

It seems to me there has been evidence here of action which the hon. member for Leeds can only interpret as an attempt to intimidate, an attempt to force him to do something he might not otherwise have chosen to do. What underlined and emphasized that action was the very narrow time frame imposed by telephone by the Solicitor General when he, in effect, declined to extend to the hon. member for Leeds the opportunity to carry out the fullest possible consultation whether with his counsel, which is one important right available to the hon. member as a private citizen, or with others who might be able to advise him fully as to the parliamentary implications. This would include the opportunity to discuss the matter with Your Honour and with other members of the House of Commons.

That being the case, I believe the actions which were taken by the Solicitor General in going to a member of parliament, taking with him the chief security officer of the country and setting forth a range of alternatives which might be followed if the hon. member did not do as the Solicitor General wanted him to do, and then imposing a time frame within which the hon. member for Leeds was expected to react, constituted a major threat to the privileges of members of parliament. I hope it will be possible for the hon. member for Leeds to consider this matter without a threat of any kind directed toward him, in order that he might assess his position under the law and in relation to his rights and privileges as a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious that a great deal of this difficulty comes down in the final analysis to what is, or what is not, a question of national security. It is odd that this matter has not received more attention from the government in the past.

At this very time when the McDonald Commission is looking into this whole subject, it has been necessary for the Commission to appoint counsel in Toronto to provide a definition of what really constitutes national security. This is the logical culmination of events which have been building up for a long time. It is simply this: in matters of police and security affairs, members of parliament and members of the government have not been given true and accurate information. The present Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) was as surprised as anyone else when he found out mail was being opened, or so he said. I could mention many matters which have come out in the last few months and have caused the government, and those responsible for national security, to modify or change their positions.

This particular situation has caused members of parliament to be very nervous and to seek the truth. The fact that they are doing this, and obviously are being assisted sometimes by persons in security roles, is a very good reason for the government to take a hard look at what it has allowed to develop over the years. That is simply this: our security is out of control and operating without the knowledge of those responsible by law or by statute for its direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) said, this is perhaps one of the most important questions which have been raised in a little while. I hope the House will bear with me if I speak for a few minutes on it.

In a matter of national security, I hope neither this side, nor the other side, would have to act in a spirit of political contention. After all, when the security of the country is at stake, we are first and foremost Canadians. We should try to see our duty and discharge that duty. That has been the inspiration of the government's motives, and I am willing to believe that it is also the inspiration for the responses we have heard.

In this particular instance, it is so important for parliament and the country to understand what is implied here that I feel I must go into some detail on the nature and the consequences of the particular document which is in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds.

I understand he showed the document to the press. The press reported that he had a top secret document marked, "For Canadian Eyes Only". Also I understand he told the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) that he had that document, or two documents, in a conversation which took place this morning. Thus, the fact that he has a top secret "For Canadian Eyes Only" document has been established and is recognized. At any rate, the analysis of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is that there is sufficient and probable grounds to believe that he has such a document.

Last night after the House had adjourned, the RCMP through the Solicitor General, informed me of this. Also they informed me that they had a document from the law officers of the Crown, the Crown Attorney, the Department of Justice, to the effect that, in their opinion, what the hon. member for Leeds has done provides reasonable grounds to justify the issue of a search warrant under the Official Secrets Act. That is the information the Solicitor General and I received from the RCMP and from the Department of Justice.

Two courses would have been possible. The first was to say "let the police do their duty, let us not interfere, let them lay an information and have a search warrant issued, and let them make a search." That course might have raised the same kind of opposition from the Tory party as we heard today, that courtesies were not extended; that we should have considered he is a member of parliament; that he should have been asked to hand over the document, rather than seek a search warrant; and so on. The Solicitor General and I made the decision, in effect, that in this case we would not have the search warrant issued immediately, at the risk of being accused by other people of interfering in the normal course of justice and preventing the police from searching. We decided not to do that. We decided to follow the course which hon. members seem to agree was the right one, that is, to try to do it by agreement; to let the hon. member for Leeds know the grave consequences of his acts; to permit him to hand over the document; and hopefully help the police as to the source of that document and how such a secret document could come to him.

I believe the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has dealt with the legal aspect. It has been claimed by several hon. members of the opposition, and indeed by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), that he should have until Monday morning to think it over. It seems to me the Minister of Transport gave the basic legal reality of this. If anything, we were in default in not letting the police do their duty last night or this morning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I wish hon. members of the opposition would listen. I have a great deal to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There have been other instances in recent months of members of parliament having been objects of search warrants. The opposition knows that two members of my party were searched under a search warrant. I was told in advance, as I let the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) know in advance when it concerned a member of his party, that there would be a search conducted against some members of my party. I shied away, and I said, "Do your duty. I don't want to interfere in any way". It was not a different type of situation, but the act under which they were acting was not the same.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Was it not the Criminal Code?

Mr. Trudeau: One reaction was to tell the police to do their duty, and not interfere. That is what I have done when it concerned members of my party. When it concerned members of the opposition, we did them the courtesy, as is demanded by the opposition and by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, of saying, "Please co-operate. You may not know the seriousness of the crime. You may not have understood the consequences of making public this document. Please co-operate". We do not like to have search warrants issued against members of parliament. We sought for co-operation.

As I understand it, the reproach is for not having given the hon. member until Monday morning to think it over. When someone is in possession of a stolen document—and I do not say the hon. member stole it; but it is a stolen document, it belongs to the security services of this country—he is not told by the police, "We are going to search you tomorrow or perhaps Monday morning. If we find it on you, then we may lay some charge". He is not given that kind of advance notice. As the Minister of Transport correctly said, if reasonable and probable cause exists, and if an affidavit is made, the person who is suspected is searched, and he is given no courtesies. In this particular case we did give warning, and we did seek co-operation.

I believe the Solicitor General and the police, in due course, will be able to argue more thoroughly why time is of the essence here. It is because more damage can be done if more aspects of that document are leaked. Already enough damage has been done. The member of parliament could either hand over the document and settle the matter, or he could have it seized and then consult his lawyers as to what his rights are.

When I spoke to the Leader of the Official Opposition this monrning I realized I was putting a dilemma before him: should he ask his member to co-operate, or should he stand off and say, "Let the police do their duty"? Somehow this has been turned against me.

• (1602)

The hon. member for Leeds said I told the Leader of the Opposition what was going to happen. I did not, Mr. Speaker, I informed him of the information I had received from the police. I asked him to accept his responsibilities. I am aware of the difficult problem I placed before him, but quite honestly I thought that the correct course would have been for the leader of a party to go to one of his members and to say to him; "Look, I know from the Prime Minister that the law officers of the Crown are advising the issuance of a search warrant. For God's sake, why don't you hand this over to the police and we will not hear about it any more".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think members of the House would perhaps be enlightened if I spoke a little about the nature of the document in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds. I think it is very important to know—and I think it was obvious from what the hon. member said to the press—that that document pertains to the activities of foreign agents in Canada. I do not think that the handling of that document and what the hon. member has said up to now has added substantially to the debate which is going on in Canada regarding national security. I do not think it has permitted us to seek a more enlightened course of action in the future when some subversive agents are detected in Canada. But I do know that it greatly undermines the efforts of the Canadian security service to protect Canada's national security, and I will tell the House why.

Any foreign security service is interested in knowing how our security service operates—that is the first thing they try to do. To a certain extent that was what occurred a couple of weeks ago in this country. A foreign security service will pay a lot of money to break Canada's security service so that the system of operation of our security service becomes known to the enemy, to the opponents of this country. They bribe, they pay large sums of money, they attempt to penetrate our operations, they try to suborn Canadians, they use all kinds of techniques, and we had the evidence of that a couple of weeks ago. By courtesy of the hon. member for Leeds, they can get this now for free. They know from this document that our security service operates in certain ways, and they get this through the courtesy of the hon. member for Leeds—perhaps with no ill intention on his part—but it is the type of thing that unfriendly intelligent services want.

That is not the end of the damage. What is perhaps more important is that if loyal Canadians who have information on possible subversives in Canada see it as their duty to talk to the RCMP and give them the information they have, they are not guaranteed now that their names will be withheld. Perhaps their names will come out in headlines, courtesy of someone in the opposition or of someone else.

In Canada we do not have a system of forcing Canadians to co-operate with the police; we rely on their sense of patriotism, we count on Canadians to come forward and give police the information they have about subversives. Are they likely to be encouraged in this? If they now find out that they have a leaky security service, that entire documents on unfriendly operations against Canada will become known in some way and that the member of parliament who has them, when apprised of the seriousness of his knowledge, refuses to hand them back, will they be likely to give the police the information they have?

The hon. member wants to ask advice on whether a stolen document should be given back to the Government of Canada. I do not think we should have to wait until Monday morning to find the answer to that. Let me say once again: the consequences are too severe.

There is yet a third consequence, that much of the information in the document which is in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds came to us through the intelligence services of friendly countries, members of NATO and other countries which co-operate with Canada in giving us information about subversives operating against us.

We do not have the capacity in this country to gather all the information nor do we have security services in many foreign countries. We rely on information received from our allies. The document which the hon. member has in his possession contains much of that information, and the more he leaks it, and the more he has leaked it, the less willing will foreign countries be to co-operate with Canada, and the more in danger will be Canada's national security.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is why the dollar has gone down. You always find someone else to blame.

Mr. Trudeau: We hear jokes from the Leader of the Opposition about the dollar going down. Let me say I think his stock has gone down pretty badly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I will not continue in that vein any longer.

Mr. Clark: Because you have gone as far as you can go.

An hon. Member: Just watch him.

Mr. Trudeau: I think it is a sorry day when a top secret document in the possession of the security services in this country is in the possession of a member of the opposition—

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Trudeau: —and when that member of the opposition does not want to co-operate with the police and return that document but wants to think it over until Monday morning, and when his leader does not have the sense of responsibility to talk to this member, not to put pressure on him but to look at this problem with him and say, "Is this not a case where we should co-operate with the police, or is this a case where we want to continue to play games with the government?"

Mr. Clark: I acted as you acted with Rooney.

Mr. Trudeau: I am told by the Leader of the Opposition that he acted as I had acted with a member of my party. I said at the beginning of my statement that in the case of a member of my party against whom it was alleged that he had committed a criminal act, I did not tell him he would be searched by the police, nor did I tell him to hand over all his files to the police. I was not asking the Leader of the Opposition to do that. I was not asking him to help one of his members defend himself against a charge of criminal action.

Here is a case of national security. Here is a case of the Leader of the Opposition himself complaining that perhaps he should be kept better informed on national security issues. Here is a case where he had a chance to show, in a non-partisan way perhaps, that he could solve this problem without making a great fuss in parliament by simply handing over the document, and I think it would have been to his credit and to that of the hon. member for Leeds. But they chose not to take that course.

Mr. Clark: I chose to act as you acted.

An hon. Member: Ce n'est pas la même chose.

Mr. Clark: C'est la même chose.

Mr. Trudeau: I rely on the people of Canada to make the distinction the Leader of the Opposition has not made.

Mr. Trudeau: Not only are the subject matters extremely different, as I just pointed out, but I fail to see how every speaker from the party led by the Leader of the Opposition can stand up and say that, as a matter of courtesy, we should let the hon. member know and that he should be given until Monday morning. We heard the same tune from the Leader of the New Democratic Party—he should be given due notice. Now the Leader of the Opposition is somehow reproaching me for having gone this route. Somehow he is saying that he himself did the right thing in not consulting a member of his party when on this side everyone says we were obliged to go the courteous route.

The Leader of the Opposition is the only one in this House who has dispensed with showing courtesy to his own member and telling him something was amiss. I find some logical difficulty in the position of the Leader of the Opposition.

I think I have made a case as to the very great danger which results from breaking our security services in this manner. I too will reserve the right to move a motion if this matter cannot be otherwise resolved. I still appeal to the opposition to think this over and not to make it an opposition-government debate. I hope hon. members oposite will ask themselves how, in this particular case, the security of this country and the efficiency of our security services can be best served. I hope they will answer that question as the rest of the country would.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the record should be made completely clear on a couple of items. It should be made clear, in fairness to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), to the whole House and, indeed, to the people of Canada.

There has not been a refusal by the hon. member for Leeds to hand over documents. It must also be made clear that there is now only an allegation—not a finding—that the documents were stolen. Despite the rhetoric of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I think it is extremely important that that point be made. Whether documents were stolen and whether the hon. member for Leeds is in possession of stolen documents will not be decided in this tribunal, and I would like to say to the Prime Minister that the rights of the hon. member for Leeds ought not to be prejudiced by the Prime Minister in this tribunal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Prime Minister has made a statement about the difficulties of the security service as a result of this information. The allegation—and that is all it is—out of the mouth of the Prime Minister does not make that true. As I listened to the Prime Minister I began to worry somewhat about what state the Prime Minister's mind might be in—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —with respect not only to the right of a member of parliament to carry out his duties but also the rights of a citizen in a free society not to have his case or the cases of other citizens judged or prejudged in the House of Commons. I hope it has not been lost by any member of this House that under the Official Secrets Act any person, whether he be a member of parliament, the Prime Minister or otherwise, is innocent under the law until he is proved guilty by a duly constituted court.

The problem is that the hon. member for Leeds raised in this House a matter, not which affects him as a litigant before a court—he will have to live with that if a charge is laid—but as a member of this House who believed, whether we agree with him or not, that he was exercising his duty as a member of parliament to bring to the attention of parliament, and hopefully the government, a matter which he, in a free parliament, considers of some importance to a society which we sometimes say is free and open. This Chamber is supposed to be the epitome of that freedom and openness, but unfortunately it has not been that.

I want to deal with something else the Prime Minister said. The Prime Minister alluded to a meeting he had with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). It was entirely appropriate for the Prime Minister to call the Leader of the Opposition. I really wonder whether we would be dealing with matters of security in this House at all if heretofore there had been this kind of discussion between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. However, that is speculation for another place.

In any event, the Prime Minister did the proper thing today in calling the Leader of the Opposition to his office. The Leader of the Opposition answered the summons of the Prime Minister and discussed the matter with him. To any person not legally trained, and even to one who is, that would be an indication that there was something very serious afoot, at least in the mind of the Prime Minister, involving a member of this party.

The Prime Minister calls into question the judgment and, indeed, the integrity of the Leader of the Opposition in not going to the hon. member for Leeds and informing him of this conversation. However, I submit that if the Leader of the Opposition had gone to the hon. member for Leeds with this matter—and if there was something wrong afoot—that would have given the hon. member for Leeds the opportunity to obliterate that wrong or at least to muddy it. I think the Leader of the Opposition did something which was quite important. He kept the confidence of the Prime Minister. He ought not to be chastised for that. He kept the confidence of the Prime Minister so that the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), General Dare, General Bourne and others would be free and unfettered to chat with the hon. member for Leeds.

That was the act of an honourable man, and I commend the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What happened, however, in the course of that chat is now quite important because we all know—and I hope hon. members opposite will allow me to finish; I know they have always disagreed with the hon. member for Leeds, but he is still a member of this House, and he is entitled to the courtesy of every hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He will not be judged as to what is right or wrong here but in another place, if the government chooses to move.

The hon. member for Leeds has stated categorically in this House what happened. He was intimidated.

Given the greatest licence with either of the official languages, given the compression of time from one o'clock and over the week end to consult counsel to "you must do something by four o'clock or something is going to happen," and given the alternatives, no one could argue honestly or reasonably that any person faced with that situation and with the people the hon. member was facing—the top security people in the country, not the RCMP—could fail to feel that there would be intimidation. I think the hon. member could be held not to have hold of his senses if he said that.

The other side of the question is whether a member of parliament, a person who is supposed to have special privileges over the public and has them by the traditions of this House, should thereby be denied the right of counsel, is a proper thing—and that seemed to be what the Prime Minister was saying. If that is the argument, then the Prime Minister has suggested that the rights of a member of parliament are to be denied.

All the hon. member for Leeds has is a statement by the Solicitor General made in the presence of two security officers of the Crown, followed by a compression of time and a change of ground rules which led the hon. member to the conclusion that he was being intimidated. The issue before this parliament is whether the privileges of that hon. member have been contravened.

There is another aspect, Mr. Speaker, and that is the question of the bugging of the telephone. That is a very important aspect because there has been an undertaking given by the Prime Minister to the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the leader of this party that during his tenure as Prime Minister no telephones of members of parliament have been bugged. I hate to say it, and perhaps the Prime Minister has been misled, but that evidence now is contravened.

Mr. Trudeau: By whom?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to be clear on this point. I understood the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) to say he had an indication that a telephone conversation was being recorded at the other end, which is a separate thing from a wire tap on a telephone. I do not necessarily regard it as any less serious. I simply say it is a different thing. I think we should be fair.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am glad you regard it that way, sir, because I regard it the same way in terms of the kind of investigation that is being carried on of a member of parliament. If this is being done to members of parliament, then one wonders about matters elsewhere. But that is a side issue.

Mr. Trudeau: It sure is!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The issue is whether or not it is appropriate in the circumstances for any citizen who is told, in terms that a person with half an ear could understand, that he faces criminal charges or charges under the Official Secrets Act, to be allowed to consult his counsel, and faced with the compression of time that does not allow it to happen, as the hon. member for Leeds has said, whether his privileges as a member of this House have been breached. That is the issue for you, sir, as Speaker. The question of whether there has been a breach of the Official Secrets Act is not going to be decided here. It will be decided in some other place. It is on that narrow and important ground of the privileges of a member of parliament that I ask you to decide the issue.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House when this matter arose originally. I came in when the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) was speaking and, of course, I listened with interest to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had to say.

I have been here a long time, Mr. Speaker, but I have never heard a more hypocritical statement made by anyone than when the Prime Minister this afternoon wrapped himself in the garments of purity and spoke as though it were the Sermon on the Mount that this House was to receive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do I hear an interruption?

Mr. Trudeau: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would be very glad to have assistance at any time when I say this—the whole situation goes back several weeks. No one has caused the government more worry and concern than the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). He has revealed things that have caused them difficulties, so he must be obliterated, it seems. That was apparent today in the speech of the Prime Minister. To think that any member of parliament dared speak out against this government impressed him as dangerous to the safety of the state. I said it was hypocritical—it is Machiavellian as well.

His whole attitude this afternoon—and I admire a good debate and he explained himself and revealed himself with unusual clarity—was "we must get rid of the hon. member for Leeds because he dares to speak out." Only in the last few days the Prime Minister was reported as having said, "I never speak to him". I heard him say it. If the Prime Minister were to stand up when he interrupts I would be only too glad. The Prime Minister said that he would have nothing to do with the hon. member for Leeds. He said, "I just do not acknowledge his presence."

Today was the culmination of events. What a wonderful opportunity for the government to get rid of this person who has proved to them that he does things they do not like. The Prime Minister spoke of patriotism in quivering terms. I could deal with that, going back to the days of war.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The right hon. gentleman has full appreciation of what I have in mind. He speaks of the terrible risk to security in this document. I do not know what it contains. Does the Prime Minister know? He does. That convinces me it must be very bad. After all, in the last couple of weeks when revelations were made concerning the operations of the USSR in Ottawa the Prime Minister said, "I did not pay much attention to that—after all, we all spy."

Above everything else in this House a measure of respect must be shown, whether by the government or by the opposition, without which this House would not operate.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

I go further and say that, in my opinion, under the law a search cannot be made of the office of a member of parliament in this House of Commons without the permission of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: You cannot do that. It has never been done. It cannot be done without the permission of this House. Are members of parliament going to vote to permit an act of that kind? I remember well when a member of this House, Mr. Rose, was ultimately charged with a variety of treason. He had all the rights of parliament. Mackenzie King was the Prime Minister and he insisted that parliament, above everything else, was important in the preservation of the rights of individuals represented here.

• (1632)

What is behind all this? The government is afraid of the hon. member for Leeds. It is frightened of the revelations he can make. It decides to intimidate him, and every other member of this House, by a pretence that a search can be made. All that is asked for is a reasonable course of action—"Give me an opportunity. Monday I will be available and whatever orders have been determined I shall submit to."

The Prime Minister admitted a moment ago that he knows the contents of this document. Well, if he does, why the rush? He knows what the document is. It cannot be hidden between now and Monday because he knows what is in it. I did not expect that admission from him. But that clarifies the situation for me that what is happening here, Mr. Speaker, is something similar to what happened in the United Kingdom in the 1630's to 1640's when members were intimidated. He knows what the contents are. There is going to be no revelation by this search. If the member for Leeds were to hide it, the Prime Minister could produce the copy he has because he knows the particular document.

Surely it becomes more apparent than ever that what he has in mind is vindictive in every sense of the word. How dare anybody criticize him in any way or do anything that might be revealing of something he does not want seen or heard. That is the position. It is as simple as that. I suggest to the Prime Minister, while he made a very valuable and very effective speech, because I always admire that type of debating, that he give his conscience an opportunity at this moment and say, "I will give him four days. I am not going to suffer, the Government of Canada is not going to suffer, and security is not going to suffer." On the other hand, if he does not agree to that, what he is endeavouring to do is close the mouths of the members of the House of Commons because criticism has become quite general of this government today.

I remember the days when I was Prime Minister and we had a deficit of $750,000, how they howled over there. This year it is $10,000 million. They want to cover up, they want to conceal, they want to delude. Mr. Speaker, if you permit the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to dictate to this House of Commons the right of search without a decision of this House, then our rights as parliamentarians will cease.

I do not say we are above the law; we are not. This institution is based on the independence of the individual; the right to speak; the right to say what one will even though it may be wrong; the right to be free from the laws of libel and slander, not the right to commit offences. But before proceedings can take place against a member of parliament such as is threatened by the Prime Minister, then have a vote. I know how the vote will go because they will line up like so many sheep on the government side.

I make this appeal, to you, sir. Never have you had a problem more significant to the preservation of the independence of this institution, and it now rests upon you. I ask you to preserve that independence. To that end I ask you to accept the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who, in a particularly telling speech, dealt with the situation objectively, thoroughly, fairly, and effectively. Grant the right of the hon. member for Leeds to have a few days grace during which time he determines, on the basis of legal opinion, what course he shall follow.

This question has been fought out in the United Kingdom. I cannot think of the name of the son-in-law of Winston Churchill—

An hon. Member: Soames.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was 1938 or 1939. He was before the House for revealing information that would be beneficial to the enemy. It is an interesting case. But there parliament acted. It did not have behind it, in the determination that was made, the vindictiveness that was shown this afternoon by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Transport—at least until the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) came in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Provide three or four days. Nothing can be lost. He cannot conceal. The Prime Minister knows the contents; the government has the document. Why then not allow, not the quality of mercy, but the quality of preserving for this House and its membership protection against threats based in large measure on political vindictiveness?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise for just a few minutes because there is one point of detail that concerns me in this whole situation. It is because the detail I have in mind is an important one that I take the time of the House to raise it.

A few weeks ago the Royal Canadian Mounted Police wanted to search the office of a member of this House who was suspected of having violated the Criminal Code of Canada. The police officers in that case were a few levels below the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), and General Dare, but they approached Your Honour first. It so happened that Your Honour called some of us in to your chamber to discuss the matter with you. You made it clear that it was your decision whether the matter at issue outweighed the privilege of the member and whether permission should be granted to the police to execute such a warrant. In that particular case you had asked the police to be more particular, to have a more solid case than they seemed to have at first. When they did finally get a search warrant from a judge, they came to you again. You had to make the decision. I speak of that matter as one concerning which I have some knowledge because, as one of the House leaders, I was called in to your office on those two occasions.

You told us, sir, on one of those occasions, that when a search warrant was executed against Senator Giguère in the other place, in that instance the consent of the Speaker of the Senate had to be obtained before it was executed. To me this is very important. I am not revealing any secrets when I say that I admitted in the meetings in your office that our privileges did not give us the right to break the law and get away with it. On the other hand, our privileges have to be considered. It was our view then, as it has been my view for a long time, that in a case like this it is the Speaker, as the protector of the members of this House, who has to weigh the evidence and decide whether the privileges of the member entitle him not to have a search warrant issued, or whether the right to execute that warrant should be granted.

What bothers me in this case, unless Your Honour interrupts me and tells me that you were informed, is that that course seems not to have been followed. In the case of the hon. member for the other side, the police officers dealing with it were up the ladder, but they were not as high as General Dare and the Solicitor General. These two seem to have taken it unto themselves to inform the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) that under certain circumstances a warrant would be issued.

Mr. Speaker: In fairness, I have to interrupt the hon. member. I thank him for his references to the other experiences. I have to indicate that I was advised sometime this morning, at about the time mentioned, of the risk that in some circumstances a warrant would be applied for. There was nothing more than the advice of that. I took it as courteous advance notice that some points on these matters may be raised. There was no indication of any position. It did not go that far. It was simply courteous advice in advance that the matter might come up later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank Your Honour for that interruption and for filling in that part of the information. Your Honour has underlined the point that I am making. You were advised, but you were not consulted.

Mr. Trudeau: Come on, Stanley. There was no writ issued.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says, "Come on Stanley." Well, Stanley is here and he is concerned. He is concerned about the rights and privileges of members of parliament. I made it very clear that I do not think those rights give us unlimited licence to do anything, to break the law and get away with it.

Not only have we information that the Solicitor General and General Dare in a sense intimidated the hon. member for Leeds, but the Prime Minister in his speech this afternoon said that the government considered last night and this morning the various choices open to it. One of those choices was telling the police to go ahead and get a search warrant against the hon. member for Leeds.

Apart from the fact it seemed to me to be an element of intimidation, in the way the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon, I am concerned about the rights of parliament. I do not think we have unlimited licence. I do not think we can expect never to have search warrants or warrants for arrest issued, but surely it is a well established principle that before that takes place, Mr. Speaker has to be brought into the picture, not just in terms of being courteously advised but being given the opportunity to weigh the evidence and to make the decision.

In the two cases to which I referred, the case of a member of this House who was suspected of violating the Criminal Code and the case of Senator Giguère, in both cases Mr. Speaker consented. I suspect in this case, if Your Honour had been asked and you had called in the House leaders, that consent probably would have been given. However, for a government to ride roughshod over that tradition and for it, just because it is the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness, I do not think I can divulge anything more, but I must say that is not really a fair interpretation of what took place. It seems to me that the tone and the content of the advance notice this morning were an acknowledgement, in the very terms of the notice that it was my authority that would have to be invoked if a search warrant was going to be executed in these premises.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad Your Honour has interpreted it that way and that if the government is going to ask for a search warrant Your Honour will be consulted. However, added to all of this is the suggestion of intimidation. The Prime Minister and his colleagues seem to think because they have responsibility, and I recognize that they have it, they also have the control of the police and they can do what they want. This should be resisted. The privileges and rights of parliament should be maintained.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I think the number of interventions in the debate this afternoon gives an indication of the seriousness of both the matter and the documents involved. Many interventions were made, and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) as well as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated very clearly what the legal position is, in this regard, and what the position is from the national security point of view, which is clearly involved in the matter.

What the Minister of Transport indicated very clearly is that when the police get a search warrant, they do not usually consult ahead of time the person whose place is going to be searched, nor do they say to him: Please, would you be so kind as to give us the documents or objects you have in your possession, because otherwise we will have to get a search warrant and will get hold of them forcibly?

On the contrary, generally speaking, one goes to the trouble of getting a search warrant to make sure that the objects or documents wanted by the police are not destroyed, even though the courts may subsequently be asked to decide who their rightful owner is. In this instance, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) took extraordinary steps to accommodate the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) by asking him to kindly hand over voluntarily the documents in his possession, which he recognizes do not belong to him, and which he recognizes bear the mention "Top Secret" and which documents pertain to national security.

No other citizen is entitled to comparable treatment and, once again, there was no question of making any accusation against the hon. member at that point. The only matter at hand, at that time, was that he was asked to hand over the documents which obviously were stolen documents. As the Prime Minister pointed out, no one says the hon. member for Leeds stole them, but the very fact that they are in his possession proves very clearly that they were stolen from the security service.

[English]

I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has raised the point in opposition to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that before a search warrant is issued and put into operation in the House of Commons, Your Honour has authority, and your consent is required. In the present case, when Your Honour was approached today it was not to ask for authorization to serve a search warrant but simply to apprise you of the situation and the potential difficulties that may arise and that eventually a search warrant may be issued. At that time Your Honour would have been approached formally and the appropriate steps would be taken by Your Honour in whichever way you may want to achieve it.

I find some difficulty with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He argued that his leader was correct in not informing the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), and I think I quote him correctly, in order to prevent the possibility of the document being tampered with or destroyed. How can the hon. member argue that his leader is right to act in that way, and then turn around and ask the government to give the hon. member for Leeds four days to think about what he is going to do with the document? The situation is very clear.

The hon. member has in his possession documents of a top secret nature relating to the security of the state, affecting our relations with other countries, and he has already used those documents inside the House and outside the House. And the only thing which has been asked of him as a responsible member and as a good Canadian is to hand over those documents to the people to whom they belong, that is, to the RCMP.

Mr. Stevens: Because they are embarrassing to you.

Mr. Lalonde: I will not comment upon the rather lightheartedly way in which the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) dealt with this issue except to say this: as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated, what is required is not the consent of parliament, as such, but the consent of the Speaker before a search warrant can be enforced here. Since the right hon. gentleman was wrong on that point, I suspect the rest of his argument falls into the same category.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I will give the right hon. gentleman one assurance, however. He says we want to get rid of the hon. member for Leeds. I can tell the right hon. gentleman that we do not need to try to get rid of the hon. member for Leeds or to try to get rid of any of the hon. members in the opposition. They seem to be doing very well themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: This is a very serious issue indeed, and we on this side take it very seriously. It seems to me that since the hon. member claims he needs time to consult with a legal adviser, and since he claims that the time limit which has been given to him is too close in that respect, I would suggest for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, that the House might give thought to the following possibility—what is of concern, here, is the security of Canada—

Mr. Crosbie: Nonsense! The security of the government!

Mr. Lalonde: Some members across the way do not even seem to realize that those documents are extremely relevant to the security of Canada. If they do not see that—

Mr. Clark: We just have your word for that.

Mr. Lalonde: —they don't know what is relevant to the interests of this country. What are involved here are extremely important documents having to do with the security of the state. It is important that there be no destruction, no tampering, and no revelation of those documents to anyone not authorized to have access to them.

Mr. Clark: You have that guarantee from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). You had it earlier.

Mr. Lalonde: I suggest that, while reserving our right to move a motion on this important issue, we should ask the hon. member for Leeds to hand over immediately to you, sir, as a guardian of the rights of this House, all the documents relating to this question that he has in his possession.

Mr. Dick: If he has any.

Mr. Lalonde: He said himself he had documents. The hon. member who sits next to the hon. member for Leeds does not seem to realize what the hon. member himself has said. I suggest he give those documents to you, sir, with a commitment that no copies are to be made and that the contents will not be revealed to anybody until the House has disposed of this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I must say I had myself intended to interpose just a few moments ago to make a similar suggestion. We are now approaching a practical solution to an interesting problem. I would remind the House we might very well find ourselves talking the subject through until Monday morning in which case the problem would be resolved after a fashion—I do not make this comment in an entirely facetious way.

I am disposed to try to find a solution. We have now reached a point at which five or six questions, each of them important from a parliamentary point of view, have been raised, and a great deal of study will be required before I can resolve any of those questions. It will certainly be difficult to do so by tomorrow at noon. It might very well take until Monday to come up with answers to some of the problems which have been raised. I do not want to gainsay the argument, but I believe the minister has put forward a proposal which meets the difficulty.

I assume, as did the minister, that there is an admission that some documents are in the hon. member's possession; I do not know whether that is in dispute. What I am saying is that I would prefer to have until Monday to consider these matters and reach conclusions about them. In the circumstances perhaps the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) might consider that he was well served and that the House was well served if I were to keep any documents he might have in his posssession, over the week end. We might as well find out now whether that is the situation and, if it is, we can stop this discussion now and get on with the opposition motion. That would give me an opportunity to examine those questions which have been raised.

I might also say that while the arguments put forward are very interesting and complex, the position of the Speaker has not yet been fully tested in a way which would allow me to come down with a definitive decision. The hon. member for Leeds has been advised that certain steps might be taken. If they were taken, that would raise certain very interesting questions which have been dealt with in the past as questions of privilege. However, the fact that certains steps my be taken is not enough to consitutute a basis for a ruling. The more serious question is: what happens if and when the moment arises? At that point some decision has to be made. It would be helpful if some solution were reached which could enable the matter to stand until Monday and we ought to find out whether that can be done.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, you have raised a very important issue, but in the light of the statements which have been made, and knowing this government, what may we expect unless Your Honour is able to give the House some advice in case we have to deal with a repetition of these events?

We are not looking at one simple event. We are looking at a government which has shown its willingness to continue practices of this kind. We have heard an inflammatory speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which is bound to prejudice any trial which might take place at some time in the future if a decision is made to lay a charge. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) has been prejudiced deliberately by the Prime Minister in his speech today.

• (1702)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: "Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed, that he is grown so great" to be able to make speeches like that?

I listened to the hon. minister with interest when he spoke about search warrants. He is a member of a government which has made a careful study of dispensing search warrants. However, I forgo dealing with that matter at this time. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the Prime Minister are members of a government which, on a question of a breach of law, deliberately broke the law and kept breaking it for several months. The Prime Minister was aware of that, as was the Minister of Transport. They are experts at that as well.

There are two issues before the House. One is not really an issue with which we can deal. That is the question of whether there has been a breach of the Official Secrets Act, whether the hon. member for Leeds and/or some other people are in breach of that act. Abominable an act as it is in some respects, it is still the law of this land. Perhaps that is something which will have to be dealt with. Pushing that off to one side, the question is: what are the rights of hon. members of the House?

The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) indicated that he went to see the hon. member for Leeds in a friendly and amiable spirit to discuss this just as another member of the House. If that is the case, why did he take the chief of security with him? If the Solicitor General went there in a spirit of reason, why was he accompanied by the chief of security? I see the Prime Minister is laughing.

Mr. Lalonde: He is not.

Mr. Baldwin: If it was not the Prime Minister, then it was one of his followers who were expecting him to laugh.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baldwin: The Solicitor General has known about this for some time. He was asked questions in the House which indicated beyond any doubt that he realized or suspected that the hon. member for Leeds had a certain document in his possession. Whether the possession of that document, and the continued possession of it, constitutes an offence against the Official Secrets Act is not for the House to decide. I think we are all agreed on that. Under those conditions, the Solicitor General went there with a law officer. There is no question that he went there with more on his mind than merely to make a reasonable suggestion to turn the document back. That is the question Your Honour has to consider. That is the basis upon which we approach this whole question of privilege.

As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) indicated, the fact that the Solicitor General was accompanied by an officer of the law can be construed only as a method of intimidation. If Your Honour read the section of the Criminal Code which deals with intimidation you would realize there is no doubt that what the Solicitor General did was an offence against that section. There is no question about that. Why did he not go there privately as another member of parliament and say to the hon. member for Leeds, "I am here to discuss this with you privately and in a personal way"?

Mr. Blais: That is exactly what I did.

Mr. Baldwin: Why was the Solicitor General accompanied by an officer of the law? The Solicitor General should know something about law. So far in his capacity as the Solicitor General he has not displayed that he does. If he knew anything about law, he would have known that he should have given the hon. member for Leeds a warning before going there with a law officer. Anything said without a warning is not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: The Solicitor General wants it both ways. He wants to be able to stand up in the House and say, "I went there without any intention of laying a charge. I went there as a friend and as a fellow member". But he took with him the chief law enforcement officer of the—

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Baldwin: That is exactly what happened. That is a completely new and unique situation about which we have to worry. I know the hon. member for Leeds. He has taken into account what has been suggested. He has no intention or desire to do any damage to the security of this country. As I understand the situation, it was because the government was refusing to act, or not prepared to act, with regard to security matters that the hon. member for Leeds, with courage, rose in the House and asked those questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: That is the truth.

Mr. Baldwin: They stand convicted by their own words of very improper and indecorous conduct. Irrespective of what happens on the issue regarding the Official Secrets Act, we cannot leave uncontested and unchallenged the conduct of the Solicitor General and his minion whom he took with him in an attempt to intimidate and coerce the hon. member for Leeds into making statements and confessions, under the pretence and guise of being his friend. That is conduct which cannot be forgiven.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to be as brief as I can. I should like to make two points arising out of the contribution of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to this very important question of privilege, one of which I believe was important and well taken; the second of which I believe is specious and offensive. I will deal with the first one in a moment. The second one concerns the right hon. Prime Minister sitting in judgment on the patriotism of his colleagues in the House of Commons. That is completely offensive to any hon. member. I do not want to attribute to him any qualities of judgment which might put him in that exalted position.

The history giving rise to this debate started at least 10 or 11 days ago, I believe on February 21. If the assurances given to us today are true—and I doubt that—a vigilant and diligent Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) would have been warned that a very important document had apparently left the control of the security services at that time. The questions which were put in the House by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) over a period of days and weeks were not such as to embarrass the government because of a leaked document. They were such as to embarrass the government because, in the opinion of the hon. member for Leeds—and that opinion is shared by many—it was not diligent enough in enforcing security matters in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: There was no suggestion that the hon. member for Leeds, or any other member who was asking questions at that time, was embarrassing the government because there was a leak in the security services. The thrust of the questions was: get with it and do something, because assurances have been given in the House since last November, which the government has had to back up on time and time again.

When the minister responsible for inter-governmental affairs asks us to accept his assurance of the importance of this document, I will not accept it, because we have received assurances since last November which the government has backed down on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Don't you believe the RCMP?

Mr. Jarvis: I am not going to deal with the hon. minister any more. He is not worth it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Jarvis: The Prime Minister indicated quite well the choices that were available to the government. One choice was search and seizure or arrest. If anyone reads the act, he will see that choice was open to the government. The Prime Minister laid out that choice very well, and I accept that. The other choice was to solicit the co-operation of a member of the House. The Prime Minister's telephone call to the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) was well taken. It was incumbent upon him to do that, and I compliment him for it. With respect to the role of the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition having received that call, the Prime Minister pointed out the alternative. I believe the hon. leader of my party operated honourably in terms of discharging that responsibility.

I thought there was an alternative of going to Mr. Speaker and saying, "This is the problem. Will you act as arbitrator?". That was alluded to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That can be forgotten, and we can return to the other two alternatives: search and seizure or arrest on one hand, co-operation on the other. Where I quarrel with the Prime Minister is that he did not do either. He embarked on a fumbling, stupid expedition to the member's office, heavy handed, bullying intimidation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: It was completely incompetent. Clearly he should have followed either of two choices. It may have given rise to a question of privilege, but not of the seriousness of the matter with which we are dealing today, nothing compared with it. A search warrant, of which Mr. Speaker may have been apprised, could have given rise to a question of privilege, and an effort to enlist co-operation in the ordinary manner could have—although it is not likely—given rise to a question of privilege. But that is not what happened, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) pointed out.

Into the hon. member's office came, first, the Solicitor General, second, the chief security officer of the Crown, and third, a document was brought showing what would happen in terms of choices available to the government if the hon. member did not co-operate. I use the word co-operate very loosely because that is not co-operation but, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Neilsen), it was intimidation of the clearest form. When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) starts talking about the law, let me tell you that he now knows less about the law than he knows about transport, and that is rather remarkable because he knows nothing about transport.

Surely the Prime Minister must acknowledge, with respect to those two clear alternatives, that the mess in which we are now—and it is a serious one—is because he took neither choice. He did not take advantage of the right under the Official Secrets Act for search and seizure, nor did he solicit in any ordinary, acceptable way, the co-operation of a member of the House, and he has to pay the price for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Much has been said this afternoon about the position of the Chair in respect of search warrants. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made some reference to the practice that had taken place in an earlier case. That was a situation in which the circumstances were somewhat different from this, and I want to outline to the House the procedure that I followed on that occasion.

In that situation we were dealing with an investigation that had been ordered by me into allegations of misconduct on the part of a member. It was evident that, certainly if the Chair was not about to take action in that respect in the face of public allegations of misconduct, the matter would have been raised in the House in some way and some resolution or decision of the House would have been sought to take the same step. Therefore the action was seen to be one that was warranted on behalf of the House in the circumstances. In the face of public allegations of that sort an investigation was immediately ordered. Therefore, when the conclusion of that investigation was that a search of a member's office seemed to be in full keeping with the proper course of the investigation, and since it was at our request that the investigation had been made, it seemed to me to be rather untoward to suggest that the investigation should be thorough to that point only but should not be thorough enough to complete the search, if that was sought.

However, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated, I did require, if it was the intention to proceed with a formal charge, that a formal charge be laid and that, in conjunction with that charge, a search warrant be obtained and that I then be presented with those two things as a fait accompli. Having done that, after the first request I consulted the House leaders to advise them that the request had been made and of the step I had taken in telling the investigators to complete their work, and if they felt a search was necessary in the circumstances, to come back. They completed their work and came back with the information, and a search warrant accompanied the sworn information or the charge. Again I called the House leaders into consultation and asked them. "We are faced with this as a fait accompli, what do we do now?" I think I am being fair in saying there was a consensus that it would be improper to prevent in any way the execution of that search in the given circumstances. I say that as an indication that in a situation in which an investigation was ordered by the Chair, that was the attitude I took.

I would certainly think that my attitude, in attempting to safeguard the rights of members in the same way, would at least be the same, in the face of the situation where a warrant was being sought under circumstances in which it was contested, or in a controversial situation. May I therefore say for the benefit of the House that the procedure I would follow, if the option is pursued, would be precisely the same.

It is not for the Chair to decide, as has been suggested, nor indeed for the House to decide, if matters of national security are at issue, because we have no mechanism for making that decision, and it is not for the Chair to decide if an offence is suspected or being committed. It is not a decision that the Chair can make. However, if I am advised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), upon his best advice, that a matter of security is at issue and that, in conjunction with that matter of security, an offence of some sort is suspected, and also that a search of premises in these buildings is indicated, I would certainly immediately call the House leaders together to indicate to them that I have been advised by the Prime Minister of the circumstances and that, unless somebody could persuade me otherwise, it would be very difficult for me to indicate that the matter should be turned back.

However, we are in a hypothesis because the step has not been taken. Having taken that step and followed that course in the past, I would insist on that kind of assurance in the first place before I called the House leaders together. What would happen then remains to be seen. This is for the guidance of the House, and it is by no means a definitive decision or a precedent by way of laying down practice for other Speakers. It is the way I would proceed in the circumstances.

As I indicated earlier, many of these questions remain unresolved. They will have to be researched further to determine whether or not there is authority for any of the several other propositions that were advanced here today or whether in fact I am acting properly if I follow those steps. Precedents tells me that I have acted properly in the last instance. I would want to be quite sure, because of the controversial nature of this matter, that I am acting according to precedents, were I to follow the same course. Certainly that course would be the minimum that I would want to follow in endeavouring to safeguard the long-standing right that no member's premises are subject to search in this building without the permission of the Speaker. Whether or not an order of the House is required is a new proposition which will have to be investigated. However, it will take some research and some time.

On the arguments that have been put forward by both sides today, obviously the Chair will have to take some time to come to a resolution. Again I come back to the fact that, so far as the Chair is concerned, we are in a hypothetical situation. However, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) raised a question today and said he was visited by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) in his office. I suppose that theoretically it is possible to suggest that an uninvited visit by anybody, including another member of the House of Commons, might be a matter of privilege. I do not know that; I suppose that argument can be put forward. There is no motion attached to the hon. member's question of privilege at this time and no matter is before me at this time for a definitive decision.

What the hon. member for Leeds asked today was for permission to raise the matter, which indeed has been well contributed to on all sides of the House, and the reservation of his right, which of course is unquestioned, to carry the matter further depending on what circumstances take place. Therefore, in that sense the matter remains in a hypothetical state as well. I would only hope, because of the contributions that have been made, that between now and when the House resumes tomorrow at eleven o'clock some enlightened wisdom will visit both sides which may lead to some resolution which will prevent a confrontation. If there continues to be a state of confrontation tomorrow, the argument will have to be finalized in some way so that the Chair can deal with it.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I was absent from the House for a few moments, but I understand that the suggestion was made that I consider turning over anything I have to Mr. Speaker. I feel that your suggestion may have some merit. I do not mean to be critical of the Chair, and perhaps that is the wrong phrase to use, but I would like time to consider the matter.

I regret to report to the House, Mr. Speaker, that I have evidence that since the House met at two o'clock this afternoon my office was entered by persons unknown. I do not know who they are, but my office was entered. I would like to ask if permission was received from Your Honour, the Sergeant-at-Arms or any person responsible for giving such permission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been able to watch me since two o'clock this afternoon, so I think the answer to the question about permission from the Chair is clear.

However, I have indicated that the matter remains in a state of reservation at least until tomorrow when the House sits at eleven o'clock. I think the matter ought to stay under reservation to see if it resolves itself. If it is still a matter of contention at eleven o'clock tomorrow, at twelve o'clock after the question period I hope the matter will be put into some form so that the Chair can deal with it in a definitive way.

Mr. Nielsen: One further point, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know under what authority the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is seeking the floor at this time. The discussion on the question of privilege has been contributed to by him. There cannot be further discussion by him on the same question. Does the hon. member have a separate matter to raise now?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if need be, it will be a separate matter because it is far too important to let lie. This matter arises out of Your Honour's remarks with respect to the suggestion that if the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) had any documents, he might leave them in Your Honour's possession over the week end.

An hon. Member: That is not separate.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, it is separate. There are two points which lead me to suggest that the suggestion is ill-conceived. In the first instance, in my view it would compromise the Chair, if there are such documents in existence, to place them in Your Honour's possession. Second, it would certainly compromise any possible future charges which might be laid, if that be the intention of the government, with respect to the hon. member for Leeds. With the greatest of respect I say that Your Honour should not be requesting any disclosures by the hon. member for Leeds at this stage. Those are two very sound positions.

Mr. Speaker: I do not understand the suggestion to be that any disclosure be made about the nature of documents. There was a suggestion made only in the sense that the Chair might be asked to reserve for some time or the hon. member might want some time to seek advice. The possible suggestion was that one way to facilitate matters or to eliminate any risk of security, if one exists, would be to follow a course of that kind. However, the idea was certainly not perfected, and it would have to be worthy of serious consideration in great detail before it could be perfected because it is fraught with difficulties.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a matter on the same point. In the research that might be done on behalf of the Chair over the next little while, I suggest that two further points are very important and that they should be considered. The first is whether this is within Your Honour's jurisdiction.

I fully appreciate that what Your Honour may possibly be doing is extending something far beyond the Criminal Code in relation to permission for the execution of a search warrant in this building. I do not think there is any question that the precedents, both in this country and in the Mother of Parliaments, are such that they permit the Chair to do just exactly that in relation to the Criminal Code. I emphasize that in this matter we are not dealing with the Criminal Code.

Under the criminal law of this jurisdiction there are very specific instances—hoary with tradition and age—which deal with the integrity of people, the morality of people, and physical violence. Those matters are specifically included in the Criminal Code. The Official Secrets Act of this country is not by any stretch of the imagination part of the Criminal Code. It cannot be, simply because there are no standards laid down.

Under the Official Secrets Act the Attorney General of Canada has to consent before any prosecution can take place. The statutory enactments contained in the Criminal Code are not contained in the Official Secrets Act. I suggest that it is possible that there are people within govenment who believe quite sincerely that the interests of the government are tantamount to the interests of the state. That may not be the case, and I suggest that we may well be treading on very dangerous ground as far as the basic security of freedom of speech is concerned, not only in this country but even more important—because we are the symbols of freedom of speech—in parliament. There has never yet been a Speaker under the British parliamentary system who has extended those rights which are normally in the Criminal Code to a statute the type of which we have in Canada in the Official Secrets Act. This is an extremely important matter.

The second point I would like to make is with regard to research and the reporting of it to the House. I may not have understood Your Honour's words in this regard, but it seems to me that Your Honour is saying that because you have not been informed that any prosecution has been started, or that the Attorney General has given his approval for a prosecution, or that a writ of search and seizure under the Official Secrets Act has even been issued, therefore this is all hypothetical and may not even be a question of privilege. I would like to suggest that Your Honour's research should include the very basic question that a threat to a member of this House, in this building and in his office—not necessarily an act but the threat of an act—does not constitute a breach of the privileges of a member of this House and does not fall within Your Honour's jurisdiction. Sir, I think—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The latter point raised by the hon. member relates to my last remarks. At the moment the matter has not perfected itself as to form in terms of a question of privilege, so I do not have before me the ingredients of a question of privilege in a definite form which enables me to deal with it. If that is what is included in any motion which is ultimately put by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), that is what we will research.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—ANSWER BY MINISTER OF FINANCE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the question period the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) concerning the rate of interest payable on the $200 million which will be taken down pursuant to the $1.5 billion line of credit. The English translation—and I checked this with the French side of Hansard—heard the minister state that it was three eighths of 1 per cent over the LIBOR rate in London. I believe that was an incorrect representation. I believe the figure should be five eighths of 1 per cent over the LIBOR rate, and I would like the minister, if he so wishes, to correct the record.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I sent Your Honour a note during the question period telling you that I meant to say five eighths. I said three eighths; my staff verifies that. I have seen the blue. I was so sure that I said five eighths that I checked the blue, but in fact I did say three eighths. The rate is five eighths above the London rate for the first three years and, to be more precise, three quarters after three years.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a correction made in Hansard for Tuesday, February 28, at page 3331. I was speaking in the late night adjournment debate. I have written to the Hansard office about this. I compared what is recorded in Hansard against the television recording, and there are a great many differences. Lines have been left out, there are gaps, sentences have been changed around and sentences have been left out. I realize that Hansard has a very difficult job and that I do not speak from a text. I speak quickly. I have great sympathy for the Hansard reporters, and I recognize the great job they do, but I must make a complaint about this.

I would like to correct the third paragraph on page 3331. It now states:

> On February 15 during a television program the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) pretended the Gull Island program is now going ahead just because there is an election coming.

I did not say that in relation on the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I referred to the first ministers conference and said it was televised and that on February 15 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) pretended the Gull Island program was now going ahead, not the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Further down in the same paragraph the report reads:

> This was the most dishonest television program ever seen in the history of television. The Secretary of State for External Affairs should have been given an enema award instead of an Emmy award.

I meant to say that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should have been given an enema award instead of an Emmy award. I should like to have that corrected because I want to make sure the right minister is identified as getting that award.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, because of the matters that took place earlier and as you are aware by looking at the clock, the allotted day which was designated for the New Democratic Party has virtually been used up. There has been some discussion among House leaders about the way in which the right to use the day by an opposition party might be protected. That discussion has led all of us to the conclusion that perhaps if this day was designated as an opposition day or an allotted day, it ought to be now undesignated and we ought to use the balance of this day for government business. That would be on the understanding that an allotted day would be reserved to the New Democratic Party at a time we might discuss. To be fair it would have to be a long day.

The other side of this question and the quid pro quo, not unreasonable in the circumstances, is that we would deal with the bill affectionately known as COLURA and the CNR financing bill through the balance of the day to complete the stage at which those bills are now, that is, second reading in both cases, by the time the House rises on Friday. I have consulted with my colleagues and we are prepared to go ahead on that basis. I think that would be the most fair way to deal with the matter, preserving the allotted day and giving the balance of time to the government.

As well, in the event that a vote was called with respect to either of those matters of government business, those votes would be deferred until a time to be discussed by house leaders. I think that is a reasonable way to settle the use of the balance of the day.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, the proposition put forward is one that has been negotiated among the house leaders. If I could restate it, our condition would be that there be a house order that all questions relative to Bill C-17 and Bill C-7 would be disposed of by the time the House has completed its normal sitting tomorrow, and in the event of a vote, the vote would be deferred to a time determined by House leaders.

If that is agreed by all members we could proceed with Bill C-17, starting now, which is the CNR recapitalization bill, and then move on to COLURA.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the House leader for the official opposition and the deputy House leader for the government have correctly stated the agreements we reached during the last hour or so. If I might just restate the matter as we understand it, it is that today, which was to have been our allotted day, will be undesignated and another day given to us, the exact date to be determined after consultation. It is understood that just as we had the right to a vote on the motion at the end of today we will have that vote—it may be one day next week—on the same subject matter.

The other part of the arrangement is that we will deal with government business for the rest of today and tomorrow. We are prepared to agree to a House order that the second reading stages of Bill C-7 and Bill C-17 be concluded by four o'clock tomorrow.

As a contribution toward making that possible, and because Bill C-7 is so technical that it ought to be dealt with in committee, we are prepared to let that bill have second reading without debate. So far as we are concerned any time available could go to Bill C-17. We are not asking others to give up the right to debate Bill C-7 but we think this arrangement can be carried through.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House would then require, by unanimous consent, an order that, by motion of the deputy House leader, seconded by the Minister of Transport, today's designation as an allotted day be annulled with the preservation of the right to the New Democratic Party to enjoy a same day to be designated which will lead to a vote as it would have done today; and that the House will then revert to government business upon orders of the day later this day and proceed to deal with Bill C-7 and Bill C-17; and that it is understood that both matters will finalize second reading by the ordinary hour of adjournment tomorrow. If any vote is necessary at second reading, that vote will be deferred until a time to be specified.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think it was understood by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the very important subject of the status of women would be the subject on that full opposition day when it occurs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It will be the same motion moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) put down under Standing Order 58(9), which means there will be a vote.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the business of the House, and since we have disposed of business for the balance of the week, I wonder if the acting government House leader could confirm government business for next week. There is the question of designation of certain other allotted days. Would he rather designate now or wait until there is full discussion?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, in so far as business for next week is concerned, it had been agreed by House leaders that next Tuesday, March 7, would be designated as an opposition day; I do not mean that as being the replacement day in the motion we have just dealt with. Next week we will also be dealing with the bill appointing the comptroller general, Bill C-12, and Bill C-26, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Post Office Act.

In light of the events that have taken place today there may be need for further adjustment in the orders I have laid down, and as the House leader is not here I should like the opportunity to discuss this matter. There may be some flexibility in the points I have made today.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I properly detected a feeling that Bill C-7, COLURA, could be disposed of without debate. If that is the case we could call it in advance of the CNR bill; but if that is not the case we would proceed with the CNR bill and then go to COLURA later this day or tomorrow.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think we had better proceed with the CNR financing. I do not believe debate on COLURA will be long but I do not think I could say there would be no debate at all.

SALES OF CANDU REACTORS

Question No. 761—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, what amount was paid, and to whom, by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for agent's fees, sales commissions or expenses in respect of sales of Candu reactors?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows: Nil. However, retainer fees of $4,000 were paid on June 15, 1977 and November 23, 1977 to Gebhart Y Associados, Consultores, Apartado postal 5-901, Mexico, D.F. for representational services rendered in marketing Candu power stations.

UNION HIRING HALL REGISTRATION

Question No. 783—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is a claimant for unemployment insurance, who is registered at a union hiring hall, obliged to be registered also at an office of the Department of Employment and Immigration?

2. When an office of the Department of Employment and Immigration receives a request for labour for which union hiring halls have been established, what action is taken?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. No. Registration at a Canada Employment Centre is not obligatory for a member of a union hiring hall who is claiming unemployment insurance. However, following a reasonable period of time, the member of the union hiring hall is required to carry out an active job search if there are job opportunities in his occupation in the area in which he resides. He may be referred for registration at a Canada Employment Centre when suitable employment opportunities appear to exist in alternate or related occupations.

2. Normally, the Canada Employment Centre receives such requests only when the union has been unable to supply the required labour in accordance with the terms of its contract with the employer. The CEC will search for suitable workers in the normal manner and refer them to the employer or the union local according to the request. All actions taken in these cases are carried out in co-operation with the employer and the local union and are governed by the terms of the collective bargaining agreement.

Hon. The second amount was awarded for special workshops where playwrights can see their work produced on stage.

2. See answer to 1.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. In the case of operations grants, the Canada Council's policy is to provide theatre companies of proven artistic merit and accomplishment with awards that apply to the overall activities planned for a given season. Although companies are required to submit plans and budgets, Council members or officers do not read the scripts of proposed plays nor interfere with the policy or choices of the artistic director.

SALT BED DISPOSAL SYSTEM FOR RADIOACTIVE WASTES

Question No. 1,252—Mr. Robinson:

Is the government aware of the West German government's exploration of the advantages of a salt bed disposal system for radioactive wastes and, if so, is the government studying the feasibility of such a system for Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy Control Board reports as follows: the Canadian government is well aware of the work that is being carried out internationally, to study the various geological land formations, with respect to their suitability for use as media for deep disposal of radioactive waste. This includes the work being done in West Germany on the use of "salt domes", and not salt beds as suggested in the question. The Canadian radioactive waste disposal program presently includes the study of rock-salt as a disposal medium, but the main thrust of the program involves the detailed study of hard crystalline, non-plastic rock such as stable granite structures which are found along the Canadian shield in great abundance.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will have to take some direction from the House. Having now reverted to a goverment day do we find ourselves calling it six o'clock, or do we now endeavour to revert to government orders and call orders of the day? It is simpler to call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It now being five o'clock the House will proceed to the consideration of private members' business. However, it being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed from Thursday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-17, the CNR Capital Revision Act. The purpose of the bill is to cancel as of December 31, 1977 $808 million of debt owed by CNR to the government. According to the minister's press release of December 19, 1977, acceptance of the bill will give the CNR a capital structure appropriate to a mature corporation and provide it with a realistic debt/equity ratio.

After the 1952 CNR recapitalization act, CNR had a debt/equity ratio of 32.71/67.3 per cent, compared to Canadian Pacific's 31.91/68.1 per cent. Since 1952 CN has been carrying a huge debt burden despite the fact that CP Rail has earned a profit every year and never missed a dividend.

I wish to state this party's position on this bill. Bill C-17 was first introduced on December 19 last year. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) urged the opposition to pass the bill immediately. We cannot pass it immediately, but we will not delay it unduly. We will allow the bill to go to committee where witnesses can be called to explain the implications of Bill C-17.

Since this is the third time CNR has come to parliament asking to be relieved of debt, since the CNR rail passenger service will be paid by the government through VIA rail on 100 per cent of its losses instead of its original 80 per cent, since Mr. Justice Emmett Hall recommended that the government pay the railways the difference between Crowsnest pass rates and the actual cost of moving grain and recommended the rehabilitation of the railways through PRA, both of which have yet to be implemented by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the Conservative party wants to strengthen the bill and place safeguards in it to ensure that CNR will not again come to parliament to have its deficits picked up.

An amendment will be introduced to the effect that, should the CNR experience a deficit, the matter will be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, whereupon the committee will be charged with a show cause hearing as to whether the CNR executive officer and board of directors should be removed for incompetence.

There is one very serious area, and that is with regard to the CNR pension fund. Very serious charges have been laid by the Canadian railways employees pension branch, the national headquarters, and by the British Columbia branch which is located in Vancouver. They have done an extensive study into the CNR pension fund and the manipulation of the fund over the last number of years. The government had Dr. Noel Hall conduct a study into the pension funds of the two railroads. He came up with a number of recommendations which have been completely ignored by the government. They have taken no decisive action after this extensive and costly report.

In the letter addressed to me by the association under date of February 15, 1978, the national president makes some serious charges in connection with the operation of the pension fund. The letter states:

> The Railway Companies from the beginning of the present pension plans (CNR on January 1, 1935 and CPR on January 1, 1937) have avoided playing to a very large extent into the plans. Each railway company owes many hundreds of millions of dollars to the plan or plans for its employees and pensioners.

We know that last year the CNR stated it had registered a profit. I hope the pension fund is not being mismanaged with a view to showing a profit. The reason I am raising this matter tonight is so that the government can investigate these charges and have answers ready for us when the bill is under consideration in committee. The letter goes on:

> In the last 10 to 15 years both railways have invested over a period of many years more than 60 per cent of the assets for which each is a trustee in common shares, real estate and high interest rate short-term mortgages. The result of this investment policy is that today, while inflation impoverishes pensioners, inflation is enriching the railway companies in their capacity as trustees. The pension trust funds are separate and apart from the funds of CNR and CPR. Each company owes tremendously large debts to these funds.

I do not know what the railways are doing with these funds but we shall certainly require answers in committee on this subject. The letter goes on:

> As a general rule inflation increases the income and values of common shares and real estate. The interest income on short-term mortgages, in inflationary times, is exceedingly high. To pay the fixed pensions guaranteed by the Railway Companies, earnings of 4% on the trust funds are required. Earnings above the rate of 4% result in large surpluses in the pension funds. The above large surpluses apply to the trust funds for those persons on pension.
> The Railway Companies in their capacity as trustees are holding pension trust funds for tens of thousands of employees. Wages and salaries are increasing rapidly, mainly due to inflation. The reserves for such pensions are increasing steadily as payments are deducted from pay cheques. CNR and CP Limited do not match the employees' payments on a current basis. Instead their actuaries calculate what the liability is of the Railway Companies. Inflation plus the failure of the Railway Companies to match the payments of the employees, is causing the liabilities of the Railway Companies to escalate at a rapid rate to very large amounts.

> The increase each year in liability for employees exceeds the decrease each year in liability in respect to those who are now pensioners, beneficiaries or survivors. Therefore, on the whole operation the Railway Companies are able to present statements showing large net increases in liability to these funds. On that basis CNR and CP Limited plead poverty and inability to increase pensions to a figure that nearly approaches the increase in the cost-of-living.
> In ten years or maybe sooner inflation should wipe out the liability of the Railway Companies to that part of the funds established to pay those who are now pensioners, beneficiaries and survivors. Death of those now receiving such income will also be a major factor in reducing Railway Company liabilities.

These are serious charges, Mr. Speaker. The Railway Pensioners Association is to be publicly commended for the research it has done into the handling of these large pension funds which, it claims, have been manipulated by both railway companies. The letter continues:

> The railway companies plead poverty and inability to pay any of the cost of indexing pensions, yet if inflation continues for six to ten years it should be enough to wipe out the enormous pension liabilities presently owned by CN and CP.
> The philosophical differences concerning the role and function on pension plans is, in our opinion, very simply as follows:
> The Railway Companies have since the inception of these plans in 1935 and 1937 avoided the payment of their share of pension costs as long as possible, so as to be able to benefit from inflation,—if it should ever occur. (CNR and CP Limited each accumulated hundreds of millions of dollars in debts at an interest rate of 4 per cent per annum when interest rates were higher or much higher. Today, CP Limited pays 7 per cent per annum and CNR pays 7½ per cent per annum on their pension debts, while current interest rates are very much higher).
> Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association advocates that all pension plans should be fully funded from the day the plan commences. When pension plans are fully funded and when an appreciable part of the assets are invested in common shares and real estate as they are today, increased income and increased values will become available to pay an appreciable part of the costs for indexing of pensions,—or they will revert to the employer, if the employer has "generously" guaranteed a "fixed" pension and, thereby, acquired the legal but not the moral right to skim off all the benefits of inflation, while pensioners, beneficiaries and survivors suffer all the bad effects of inflation.

If the railways are not fully funding these plans as called for in the original formula, I hope the parliamentary secretary will relay through the minister what I have said tonight in order that we may be given some answers at the committee stage. If the railways, and the CNR in particular—because it is a Crown corporation—have been manipulating pension funds, it is not a matter which can be taken lightly. The association goes on to say:

> Canadian National is making tens of millions of dollars per annum because of inflation. The company wrote off $371 million in 1968. Interest on that amount should be $37 million annually. The CN is paying 7½ per cent interest on one billion dollars whereas the company should be paying 10 per cent per annum. The increases approved by the CN board of directors on March 29, 1976, amounting to $2.3 million, are truly just a few crumbs from the banquet table. This banquet for CNR has been going on for many years but pensioners who are kept in the dark really appreciate those few crumbs.

If these large amounts of money are not being handled properly, the pensioners certainly have a legitimate complaint. They go on to say in this document:

> The preposterous guarantee (of fixed pensions for life based on earnings for a fixed period of time) made by CN and CP many long years ago is the means by which those pensioners are methodically deprived of purchasing power to an increasing extent as the years go by.

The document goes on to comment on the Noel Hall report. It states:

The Government of Canada has paid an appreciable sum of money for the Noel Hall Inquiry. The recommendations were sound and would be of great value to our society if implemented. The failure to implement these recommendations may properly be attributed to a failure by the Government of Canada to use its influence with CNR and CP Limited to whatever extent would have been necessary to put Dr. Hall's recommendations into effect.

The letter concludes:

The certified bargaining agents for both CNR and CP Limited have co-operated fully with the Railway Companies in their dealings in respect to pensions and have acted contrary to the best interests of all railway pensioners. To the extent that these so-called labour union leaders are associated with the New Democratic Party, that party is culpable.

This document is signed by J. Earl White who is the national president. I spoke to Mr. White today to let him know that I would be drawing attention to his document tonight. I asked him whether he would stand behind his statements. He assured me that he would, and that I could use anything I liked from the document I have quoted.

The Pensioners Association wrote a second time, on February 20, with regard to pension plans, drawing attention to another of its concerns, as follows:

We ask only that retired railway employees be treated on the same basis as such union employees. Why should retired railway employees be discriminated against? When improvements are made in the rate of pension payable for each year of service they are for those who are still active employees. Commonly such improvements also apply to those who are already retired. This is fair and reasonable. After all if a new formula is now deemed to be appropriate surely such formula was always deemed appropriate! Except for those who retired on and after January 1, 1975 this practice has not been applied to railway employees.

● (2022)

Again, why is discrimination practised against the recipients of railway pensions?

They go on to say, Mr. Speaker:

The discrimination against those retired for 20 years and more is disgraceful!

All railway pensions should be based on 2 per cent for each year of service.

All railway pensions should be indexed to the cost of living.

They go on further to say:

The Trustees receive all the benefits of inflation on these large trust funds. The Railway Companies and the Certified Bargaining Agents negotiate improved pension benefits for active employees. By doing so they are using financial gains on retired employees to finance increased benefits to active employees.

These are serious charges, Mr. Speaker. They go on to state in this letter:

The profits being made on pensioners are being used to finance costs for active employees' pensions. The railway companies, with the concurrence of the certified bargaining agents, are discriminating against their own pensioners, beneficiaries and survivors.

They also point out:

CNR is a creature of the government. CP Limited is subsidized and regulated to the extent that it is treated in many respects like CNR is treated. One of those respects is the manner in which CP Limited act as a trustee for the CP Limited pension trust funds.

They then ask:

How can the government rationalize treating railway pensioners, beneficiaries and survivors as second class citizens? Why should these persons who do not have adequate incomes be compelled to subsidize active employees?

What possible reasoning have CNR and CP Limited for not extending the current formula to persons who retired previously? There is no logical justification.

Fair treatment for senior citizens can be legislated. Such action is clearly indicated, and, it is respectfully suggested, should now be considered—

This document is also signed by their president, Mr. J. Earl White.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will bring these matters to the attention of the minister and Dr. Bandeen, and, if necessary, he might consult with the CPR about the serious charges that pension funds are being manipulated. One statement or claim is that the only reason the CNR is able to suggest it made a profit last year is because of the manipulation of pension funds. If the CNR is manipulating these pension funds instead of investing them properly so that these thousands of railway employees might receive proper pensions, for which the plan was originally set up, then we are entitled to some answers, as is the government.

We have a few more speakers regarding this bill, Mr. Speaker, but they do not intend to speak at great length. We are looking forward to having the entire bill, as well as those charges made by pensioned employees regarding the manipulation of their funds, discussed in committee.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by noting that I have been very intrigued by the rather free-wheeling debate that has developed in respect of this very important piece of legislation. In some circles this bill has been characterized as "housekeeping" legislation. That word makes the bill appear to be minor or really insignificant. The apparent simplicity of the bill tends to lend support to this viewpoint, but I am pleased to note that hon. members on all sides have not taken this attitude to heart.

As my colleague the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has observed, as well as others, it is never an insignificant matter for the House to consider writing off a $808 million debt which is owed to the government of Canada. It becomes even more important for this bill to receive the full consideration of the House when one considers that the Canadian National Railways have requested debt relief of this kind no less than four times in the company's history, and that the total value of the company's debt that has been written off during this time is in excess of $6.7 billion. That certainly is a lot of money. Clearly this bill is not housekeeping, nor is it an insignificant piece of legislation. It is one of the more important pieces of legislation that we have been called upon to deal with in the area of transportation during this session of parliament.

In his speech when introducing the bill the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) stated that the government's purpose was to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the CNR. Among the benefits which would result from this bill is a reduction in the company's equity debt ratio, about 62 per cent to some 42 per cent, which would make the CNR more competitive when compared to other North American railway companies. According to a ministry of transport press release of December 19, 1977, the CNR will then be in a position to,

"finance all its capital requirements without payment from the federal treasury."

As further compensation for overturning this debt it was suggested that the government will no longer be required to underwrite the CNR's deficits and that "an annual payment of 20 per cent of net earnings, or such higher amount as the government may determine, will be forthcoming as a return on the government's equity."

I note that all hon. members who have participated in this debate agree with the principles underlying the legislation. I think that is important. It is agreed on all sides that the CNR's debt equity ratio is unrealistic and that it is a worthwhile goal to improve the corporation's efficiency and effectiveness. Certainly it is one of the truly great corporations we have in this country. As usual, however, there is disagreement as to the means that should be employed in achieving this goal.

In both his press release and his introductory remarks the minister suggested that the means to be employed should be ones adopted simply to improve the competitive position of the CNR and thereby encourage it to become "financially viable and self-supporting." Mr. Bandeen, the president of the CNR, puts it slightly different in his year-end statement. After listing the advantages which will result from the passage of this legislation, Mr. Bandeen makes the following observation in his concluding remarks:

> The challenge to CN will be to perform its duties efficiently and profitably while improving the quality of its services for all Canadians.

I emphasize the word "profitably", because it is the introduction of that one little word which has raised the hackles of some members of the House of Commons, notably those members to my extreme left in the NDP.

In that context, and in view of the nature of the debate which has developed on this matter, I should like to refer briefly to the contribution made by my colleague on the transport committee, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin). Although it was some time ago, I can recall clearly the interesting contribution which was made by that hon. member from that part of Saskatchewan to this debate. A careful reading of his speech demonstrates the length to which members of his party must go and the ideological juggling which is more often than not required by that party in debates of this kind, especially when words like "profitable" are introduced into the debate.

In essence, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre states that he supports the bill but that he does not like the idea that the CNR will be encouraged to make a profit. It is beyond many of us in the House of Commons how the hon. member justifies that position when, in the words of the ministry of transport press release, the whole purpose of this bill is to "impose on the CNR the responsibility and accountability to manage a financially viable and self-supporting institution."

● (2032)

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre recognizes the difficulty in this respect. I should like to refer to his speech, as reported at page 2637 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

> I would be just as happy voting against this bill as voting for it.

Elsewhere in his speech, as reported at page 2636 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

> We in the New Democratic Party are in something of a catch 22 situation. We agree with the principle of refinancing and the recapitalizing of the CN debt.

This appears to be a clear statement of that party's position, but it is not long before the "but" emerges. There is always a "but" with that particular party. Be that as it may, this particular "but" can be found also at page 2636 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

> The essential motive behind this bill is to make Canadian national more attractive for private investment.

Of course increased private investment will tend to make the CNR more accountable and more profitable. It is that which sticks in the craws of hon. members to my left.

The dilemma which the hon. member finds himself in is in fact significant. It is a traditional dilemma for members of that party. Also it is the reason that they currently find themselves in the position of having only a tenuous hold on the legislature of one province out of ten, and suffering from ever-dwindling numbers in the House of Commons. Until members of that party can overcome their psychotic aversion to the word "profit", they will never be a significant force in the affairs of this country. However, with the possible exception of hon. members to my left, I believe I speak for the majority of members when I say that the intentions of this bill are in keeping with public interest and the honourable traditions of this Chamber. Nevertheless, the government's stated intentions, and those we find in the bill, are not always completely consistent.

In introducing the bill, the hon. Minister of Transport referred repeatedly to the government's policy of encouraging efficient and sound financial management on the part of Crown corporations. I stress the word "encouraging". I point out to the minister that this policy of encouragement represents a significant retreat from the position stated in his department's press release of December 19. Although I have already quoted the relevant section of this document, it is worth repeating for the benefit of hon. members. Paragraph 5 of the document reads as follows:

> . . . imposes on the CNR the responsibility and accountability to manage a financially viable and self-supporting institution.

I have read with great care and attention all seven clauses of Bill C-17. Nowhere in this legislation is there a provision which imposes any requirements of this nature on the management of the CNR. Clause 1 of the bill deals with the conversion of CNR stock and forgives the corporation's $808 million worth of debt. Clause 2 provides that the company can retain its yearly earnings after taxes and interest on its public and private debts. Clause 3 repeals section 37(4) of the CNR Act. Clause 4 substitutes therefor a provision allowing the Cabinet to appoint the company's auditors, and a provision which requires submission of an annual report. Clause 5 repeals subsection 72(5) of the Railway Act, which places a 6 per cent ceiling on interest rates on securities of railway companies. Clauses 6 and 7 repeal the CNR Financing and Guarantee Acts of 1941 and 1942. At no point is there a provision which even hints at imposing a requirement that the CNR operate in an efficient and profitable manner. In fact, the bill does not contain any general statement of intent at all but simply forgives an $808 million debt which is owing to the people of Canada through the Government of Canada.

I cannot help but marvel at the fertile imagination of the Minister of Transport, who has manufactured a requirement when one clearly does not exist in the legislation. We might ask ourselves what has prompted this particular ministerial flight of fancy. The debate on this matter provides us with an answer to this question.

Members opposite have suggested that the requirement for an accountable and profitable operation arises from agreements reached between the government and the management of CNR. In fact, no such agreements have been reached. Rather, we have only statements of intent from the management of the CNR to the effect that the purpose of this request for debt forgiveness is to make the corporation more efficient and cost-effective in the future.

During this debate my colleagues have outlined the history of debt forgiveness as it relates to the CNR. On each of the four previous occasions that the CNR has requested forgiveness of government debt, the arguments have been the same. On each occasion the corporation has stated that it would be more competitive with respect to the CPR and other rail transportation companies in North America.

On each occasion in the past the company has argued that it would be able to provide high levels of service more efficiently and at a profit, yet we have undertaken this process four times at a total cost to the taxpayer in excess of $6.7 billion and we are once again considering it today. History has proven that all the good intentions in the world are not sufficient guarantee against the possibility that we will again be debating this proposal in 10 or 20 years.

We on this side of the House have no quarrel with the intentions of CNR's management. In fact, if there is anyone capable of reversing the recent trends of the CNR, it is the current dynamic management team in Montreal headed by Dr. Bandeen. However, we do not quarrel with the government's attempt to create the impression that this bill provides for a guarantee of future profitability in the corporation. I strongly suspect that this particular sleight of hand being perpetrated by the government is politically motivated.

Hon. members opposite realize that they are in trouble for the coming election and are attempting to do a little pre-election bridge building. By not including a requirement of future efficiency in the bill and at the same time attempting to create the impression that such a thing exists, the government is hoping to pave the way for NDP support following the election. Let me assure hon. members opposite that this is an exercise in futility.

On the same issue, we are pleased that the importance of this total piece of legislation has not been lost. We are also pleased that Bill C-17 is going to committee where we intend to introduce amendments to strengthen the legislation, and we hope to propose safeguards to ensure that the CNR will not come again to parliament to ask that its deficit be picked up by the people of Canada. We hope that members on all sides of the House will see fit to support the amendments introduced in committee, and we hope to be given a reasonable length of time to go over the legislation in detail at the committee stage.

I would be remiss if in a debate of this kind involving a major railway I did not make a few short comments on the whole question of railway rehabilitation in western Canada and the Hall commission report, of which a major part deals with the subject.

In relation to the whole question of the Hall commission report as it relates to the CNR—and I think the two are certainly linked—two points are uppermost in importance. First, I think it should be kept in mind when dealing with the legislation that the railways—now we are talking about CNR and CPR—are receiving far too much taxpayers' money in western Canada without having to account for the way in which that money is being spent.

The second point which should be kept in mind and which we hope will be brought out at the committee stage is that the railways have had until now the best of both worlds. The railroads—and CNR is certainly included—have had a subsidy plus grants to spend as they wish. It is interesting to note, when we are talking about rail line abandonment by railways which are so vital in the transport of grain in western Canada, that not one cent of the branch line subsidy has been spent on the upgrading of rail lines in western Canada in the past years. I think that certainly demonstrates that the railways have really had a free hand and that the moneys they have received from the taxpayers have not been spent on keeping up that basic and very important aspect of western agriculture.

I should like to conclude by reiterating that we will certainly discuss this piece of legislation in committee, and we hope that when it is passed the CNR, under its present capable management, will not come back to parliament asking the Canadian taxpayer to help it out once again.

Mr. Lang: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Murta: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the second to the last set of remarks made by the hon. member, I wonder if he is aware, as I presume he is, of the Hall recommendation that the railways be made whole, that is to say, that the Treasury pay the difference to the railway between the cost of moving grain and what they receive for it? That, in the view of both Hall and Snavely, is the reason why the railways did not do the upgrading. I presume he approves of that, but I would like confirmation of it.

Second, I should like to ask him if he is aware of the fact that we have committed $100 million for rebuilding the rail system, that during 1977 that program began in a very important way and that in 1978 it is continuing. This is money to be spent on the grain dependent lines on which there was a subsidy.

Mr. Benjamin: On the basic network.

Mr. Lang: Of course, the basic network was created by action of this government after the Hall Commission report. I should like to ask the hon. member whether he is aware that in that case too the government had very carefully signed an agreement with the railways whereby they have committed exactly what they are doing for the $100 million so that every penny is spent on rebuilding the rail lines.

Mr. Murta: We are certainly aware of that. It is an amount of money which we believe is badly needed in western Canada. We believe also that the money is being spent on what we call the soft areas. The government has really not grappled with some of the more difficult questions that arise from the Hall commission report. When I mentioned the branch line subsidy I was referring to up to the present time. We in this party agree with the Hall recommendation regarding the difference in the amount between the Crowsnest pass rate and the rate for which the railways haul grain, which has been documented, we think correctly, by both Snavely and Hall.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, every time we get into any kind of discussion about railway matters—and it is happening again on this occasion—the subject of the pensions of railway workers comes to the fore. This happens not only when we discuss railway matters in the House but also whenever there are negotiations between the railway management and the railway unions. It took many years, in fact many decades, to come to the point where there was any discussion at the bargaining table about pension matters, and even since the time when such matters do get discussed very little progress is made on pension questions.

I believe it was during a special session which we had in the House of Commons late in August or early in September, 1972, just before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked for the dissolution of parliament and we headed into the election of October 30 of that year, that in the dispute that took place here in the House we again raised the question of pensions and got nowhere, except that we got out of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) a promise that there would be a full scale inquiry and examination into the whole matter of railway pensions.

On came the election, so nothing happened in that vein during the next few months. When we were back here in parliament in 1973, the issue of railway matters came up again and we kept on pressing the Minister of Labour to implement his promise to institute a full scale inquiry into railway pension matters. He finally did so in July of 1974. In fact, it was on July 9, 1974, that the Minister of Labour appointed Dr. Noel Hall as a commissioner to go into the whole question of Canadian railway pension plans.

I interject to say that when we discuss railway matters we frequently find ourselves referring to the Hall report. It has to be noted that there are two Hall reports—the two or three reports of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall and the report of Dr. Noel Hall on railway pensions.

I had the feeling at the time, out of a fair amount of experience around here, that referring pension matters to a commission of inquiry was a way of getting rid of the issue. Yet somehow I felt there was a measure of sincerity on the part of the Minister of Labour and that he wanted to see the issue resolved. I dared to hope that the appointment of Dr. Noel Hall to study the question would result in some real progress being made in this area. As I say, it took from 1972 to 1974 to get Dr. Hall appointed. It was September 8, 1976, before he submitted his report to the Minister of Labour. It was some time later, I believe in 1977, before we got copies of the report. Now we are into 1978 and very little has been done to implement even the meagre provisions of the Dr. Noel Hall report.

I say that those recommendations were meagre but at least there were some proposals in the report. As a matter of fact, Dr. Hall made one set of proposals covering railways in general and a special set of proposals with respect to the CPR. He pointed out that in the case of the CPR the situation is much less favourable than for the CNR, and he felt that as a first step the CPR should be required to bring its pensions provisions at least up to the level of pensions provided by the Canadian National Railways.

The report does not mean to say that things are perfect with respect to the CNR because Dr. Hall suggested what he called a heritage fund in the hope that ways and means might be found to improve the pensions of railway workers down the line.

I think it is fair to say that during the months and years the Hall commission was sitting, railway workers and retired railway workers were hopeful something would be done. With all the time that has gone by with very little being done, railway workers and railway pensioners are beginning to feel that once again they have been sold down the river by means of a commission of inquiry.

When we got the Hall report and started asking questions about it in this House—and when I say "we", I mean members of this party and members of the official opposition—we were given the usual run-around—that these were matters to be dealt with by negotiation between management and the employees. We were told that these matters were being studied in the department but there was nothing the minister could do by way of giving any direction to the railways.

It always astounds me that the government can exercise its authority in so many ways, yet when it comes to telling railway management that it should give a better break to its employees or pensioners, the answer is always that this cannot be done.

The CPR seems to have more clout or weight around this country than the government itself. Now that we are dealing with a bill that has to do with the reconstructing of the finances of the Canadian National Railways, I think we should make the point again that the government should get into the picture and insist that the railways have to give their workers a better break, particularly when they become pensioners.

I have already said that the problem applies to both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is true that in the terms of this bill we are dealing with the Canadian National and most of what I have to say applies to it. Because the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has to deal with both companies, however, I think it is only fair to remind him that he has some responsibility with respect to Canadian Pacific as well.

A few days ago, not by any action of the Canadian government and not because of anything voluntary on the part of CPR, certain secrets came out in the United States to the effect that the 1977 salary of the president of Canadian Pacific, Mr. Ian Sinclair, was $330,450.

Mr. Benjamin: Poor fellow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is not poor at all. It is the next two who have to get along on much less. The next two senior officers of Canadian Pacific earned in 1977—$193,950 and $146,550. For a company to be able to pay salaries like that to its senior officers and plead that it cannot give its pensioners a better break, does not go down.

One of the things that Dr. Hall included in his report that was given to the minister in September, 1976, was a letter that he had received from a gentleman named Mr. B. H. Emerson. At that point he was 92 years of age so I do not know whether he is still alive, although I have no reason to suspect he is not. This Mr. B. H. Emerson wrote Dr. Hall about the experiences and record of his family as workers for the Canadian Pacific Railway. He gave Dr. Hall the basic facts in a letter to which he attached a rather lengthy memorandum telling the whole story.

Summarized, the story is of five generations of Emersons working for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Mr. B. H. Emerson retired in 1947 at age 65, and in 1974, at the age of 92, his pension was only $83.53 per month. The story is of Mr. Emerson's father working for the CPR, Mr. B. H. Emerson himself working for the CPR as did his son and two more generations. It so happens that Mr. B. H. Emerson had a son who later became president of the CPR. He succeeded Mr. Crump. Unfortunately Mr. Emerson was president of CPR only a few months before he died of a heart attack.

Several years later Dr. Hall got this letter from the father of the late president of the CPR saying here is a family of five generations working for the CPR and at 92 years of age his pension is only $83.53 per month. But President Emerson's successor, Ian Sinclair, receives a salary of more than $330,000 per year while that company cannot do better for the father of the previous president than to pay him a pension of only $83.53 per month. Dr. Noel Hall said he had not sought Mr. Emerson's permission to include this letter in his report and hoped he was not embarrassing him by making it public. But he put it in his report because he thought it indicated the human problems that are associated with small pensions in the face of rapidly escalating wages and prices.

I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that these railways could do a lot better. And although I heard one of my friends to the right the other day speaking with some disdain about the fact that we were complaining about a salary of $330,000 a year for one man, I still say it is not human, it is not decent, it is not civilized, to have a society, a country, in which some people can have great wealth of that kind and so many others have to live on the edge of poverty. If we claim to be a civilized society, if we claim to be building a society of which we can be proud, if we claim to be building a Canada which is a leading country in the world, surely the problem that we ought to address ourselves to is some equalization in the living standards and the incomes of our people.

If you want a glaring example of gross inequality which is seriously unfair, it is there in the story of the CPR paying a $330,000 a year salary to Mr. Ian Sinclair but paying only $83.53 a month to Mr. Emerson, the aged father of Mr. Sinclair's predecessor as president of the CPR. We do not have corresponding statistics for those who are in the top positions of the Canadian National Railways. I am quite satisfied they are not as extreme, that those at the top of the government owned railway are not getting salaries of that kind. But it is still true that there is a wide gap between the positions of those at the top and those at the bottom. I just do not buy it. Criticize me if you will for believing in an egalitarian kind of society or of pushing in that direction, but if we are going to be civilized, that is the direction in which we ought to move.

It is my contention that there are certain improvements that ought to be made in the pension plans of both railways. It has become very clear that the government will have to get into the picture. Appointing Dr. Noel Hall and giving three or four years for the holding of inquiries, and the making, printing and translating of reports, does not do the job. Leaving it to the companies to negotiate with the employees does not seem to do the job. The government does not mind providing all sorts of funds to these railways. Even the privately owned company has been able to milk the government and the country for all of this century, and more than that. If that is the position, surely we have a right to ask the government to intervene and say to companies like the CNR and the CPR that they should be giving their pensioners a better break.

Among the things that still ought to be done is to put the pensions on a basis of 2 per cent credit per year for each year of service no matter when that service was. This business of still paying some pensions based on 1 per cent, 1¼ per cent or 1½ per cent per year back in the earlier years does not stand up in this day of higher prices, higher wages and higher pensions. That is a minimum requirement that ought to apply to all railway pensions. If we are going to put the CNR in a new financial position and if we are going to continue to subsidize the CPR and give them anything they want, the time has come for us to say to them that their pensions should be at least equal to the 2 per cent per year credit that applies in the public service.

Something else that should apply to railway pensions is the matter of guaranteed escalation of indexation of their pensions after retirement, they should be told this should come into effect. With prices going up and living standards rising it is not putting a person on a pension if you put him on an amount that is fixed for life. If a fixed amount is all one gets as a pension, it is just a ticket to welfare somewhere down the road. If a pension is to be meaningful it must enable the pensioner to keep up with the rising cost of living. However, I think it should do more than that. I should enable a pensioner to keep up with the rising standard of living.

I know there are the Colin Browns and others around the country who are worried about what we can afford down the road apiece. If Mackenzie King had known that in 1978 members of parliament would be earning the salaries and allowances that we are receiving today, he would have said that it cannot happen, that the country would go broke, that it is impossible, that is going too far. I submit that 10 to 20 years from now salaries around here will probably be higher and wages will be higher. Can the country afford it? What really counts is the current production in any year. When we are asking for the indexing of pensions all we are saying is that as the production of a country goes up year by year, decade by decade, not only those who are working get the advantage of that increased production, but those who are retired should receive a share of the increased production which has been made possible by them in building society to that point. I say guaranteed escalation of pensions should be the rule with both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific.

Dr. Hall recognizes that. He accepts it is a principle through his book. He seems a little uncertain just how to go about it. He is worried about the finances of the railways and so on. He does come up with his idea of a heritage fund. But there it sits, a very nice recommendation, a very nice principle stated. He thinks that the case of Mr. B. H. Emerson emphasizes the point that it is a human tragedy to have to live on small pensions in the face of rapidly escalating wages and prices. These books spread around the country, a few more of them, do not do the trick. What is necessary is for the government to get into the picture and say to the railways, whether they are publicly owned or privately owned, that they are instruments of serving the needs of this country. They live on the basis of the country's economy and they owe to the workers the certainty and the guarantee of pensions that will maintain their value.

We have had some indexing. For a while the CNR came through with 2 per cent per year. Then there was a year when it was 4 per cent. Then they skipped a year and they came in with an ad hoc or a fixed amount. The CPR had done far less and Dr. Hall points that out. One of his firm recommendations is that the CPR should do at least as much as the CNR has done.

This story is a sorry one. The railway workers have not been put in a position to be sure that their pensions would enable them to keep up with the rising cost of living, let alone the rising standard of living. There was a day 30, 40 or 50 years ago when morale was high amongst the railway workers. They felt they were in almost a privileged or preferred position. They had good jobs and they were helping to build the country. When that sense of morale was there their productivity, I suggest, was higher than it has been in some other years. One of the ways to destroy morale is to create the feeling of insecurity about the future. The reverse is also true. One of the ways to improve morale is to give some guarantee about the future. I feel very strongly about escalation and indexing being guaranteed to all pensions—railway, public, private, the whole works.

But what we are dealing with tonight is the finances of one of our railways. This is the time that the government should get into this and tell the railways that it is a matter of government policy that indexing must continue. I am glad to hear the Prime Minister say when questioned about the indexing of pensions of public servants that maybe there are some abuses, maybe some adjustments need to be made, especially in the cases of the Simon Reismans and so on, but nevertheless the principle has to say. If it is the principle of government policy that pensions should be paid to federal public servants to enable them to keep up with the cost of living, that same principle should apply to organizations such as the CNR and CPR which in one way or another, both public and private, are part of the whole picture of the economy of this country.

I am arguing for something in which many in this place believe. The point is how to get there. One way of how not to get there is to just put out a report. Another way is for the government to pass the buck to the CNR and the CPR. What is important is for the government to sit down with the railways and say that this principle has got to be accepted.

Another matter that has to be raised with regard to railway pensions—and when we are discussing the finances of the CNR is the time to raise it—is the question of pensions of widows of railway workers. At the best, the pensions of widows of railway workers are 50 per cent of the pension the worker was getting or would have got in the case where the husband dies before he goes on pension.

I would have said this today in the debate on equality for women had we got into it, but I can do that when we get to it next week. I do not know why a society of men and women who are equal still accept the idea that if a man and wife together establish a home, earn a livelihood, build up a bit of an estate and reach the stage where they go on pension, when the man dies the widow's pension is only 50 per cent, but if she dies first, his pension is 100 per cent.

I hope some day people will look back on history and say who was ever so crazy as to think up that idea? However, that is what we have. That is what applies at best in the case of railway pensions as far as widows are concerned. I say at best because there are provisions, particularly with regard to a widow who married the worker after he went on pension, where there is no pension at all.

There are all sorts of little angles of that sort that put many widows in an even worse position. I contend that the survivor's pension ought to be the same in both cases. I would even say let it be 90 per cent for the husband if he lives on and 90 per cent for the wife if she lives on. Make an adjustment in the contributions to the fund if necessary, but try to achieve equality.

If that is too much to ask for right off the bat, at least the percentage of pension that is payable to a widow ought to be increased. This business of its being 100 per cent for the husband but only 50 per cent for the wife just does not meet modern standards of fairness and decency. I know this is the rule for a lot of other plans. It is the rule in the public service that the survivor gets a pension of only 50 per cent of that of the original pensioner.

In the case of the members of parliament retirement allowances plan, if an MP is on pension and dies, his widow gets 60 per cent. Even that is not good enough. That is not equality, 100 per cent for him and only 60 per cent for her. But having voted 60 per cent for our widows, we should not settle for 50 per cent for the widows of public servants or the widows of railways workers. The railway people through their unions, pensioners associations and so on are asking for 75 per cent for the widow. That is a step in the right direction and probably something that should be sought. I hope that is a move that will be considered down the line.

The pensions of widows certainly ought to be increased. Even without any actuarial change, I see no reason why there should not be some provision for the widow to stay at 100 per cent for a year or two until the adjustment has been made. We are talking about a country where women are to have equal rights. Saturday of this week is International Women's Day. It calls for more than just nice things to be said about the dear ladies. It calls for more equality and fair play. The place I would like to see that is in pensions. The railways have not been fair to the widows of their employees. That is one of the improvements that ought to be made.

That is my view about this. It is not new. I have presented it a good many times. It is highlighted by the fact that we are in the process of restructuring the finances of the CNR. It is also highlighted by the fact that within the last week or so we learned that the CPR is able to pay its president over $330,000 a year while it pays only $83 a month as a retirement allowance to the father of the preceding president, a man who gave his life to that company. This story is repeated time and again through the ranks of the railway workers of this country. They deserve a better break. Parliament ought to say that to the railway companies at the time that we are dealing with this bill.

Railway Act

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today on Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act. This bill is perhaps not as contentious as others we have debated here, but I do not believe that we should rush it through this House and pass it merely for that reason. This is the third time that Canadian National Railways has come to parliament requesting a cancellation of its debt, and while we in this party are certainly prepared to give CN a hearing, I think that reservations about this bill need to be voiced.

Bill C-17 cancels $808 million of debt which is owed by CN to government. It also cancels the 4 per cent of preferred stock which the government has until now owned in CN. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated that this will save the Canadian taxpayers $100 million. This is the total of what is left owing for the remainder of the fiscal year, that is until March 31, as well as that which the government would be required to purchase in fiscal year 1978-79. This sounds impressive, Mr. Speaker, but it must be balanced against the $65 million of interest which will be lost as a result of the write-off.

This bill is, of course, essentially a financial reorganizing bill for the CN. The $1.5 billion of preferred stock which the government now has are to be converted into common shares and provision is made for the payment of an annual dividend by the CN. This dividend is 20 per cent of the net income, but whether any of us will ever see it is doubtful, since it is not payable until after the CN's depreciation, interest and taxes are met.

The major thing which this bill does is relieve the CN from having constantly to come to parliament for appropriations to cover its deficits and forgive its debts. This was done in 1933, just ten years after the CNR first appeared as a single unified railroad system. The legislative effort for that, however, was done by a former member for Portage constituency, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, in 1919.

Just a few years after that first occasion in 1933, the CNR appeared before parliament in 1937, again to be forgiven its debt. The first time it was $1.2 billion. The second time it was $1.8 billion. Even today those figures are very large amounts; forty years ago they were astronomical. Now, in 1978, the debt is for the better part of $1 billion—$808 million. I personally do not find this situation acceptable at all.

It is our intention to propose in committee amendments, the purpose of which will be to make the company, through its chief executive officer and board of directors, more accountable to parliament. I suggest the government has not been at all accountable or responsible so far as the railways are concerned, particularly in the west. On May 16, 1973, Chief Justice Emmett Hall released the first volume of his report "Grain and Rail in Western Canada". One of the important recommendations in that report was that 1,813 miles of prairie branch lines found to be of proven traffic potential and regional importance should be reallocated to the basic rail network, which is guaranteed until the year 2000, and that

2,165 miles of prairie branch lines be abandoned over the period 1977-81. The commission also recommended that the remaining 2,344 miles of line whose future is uncertain be placed under the jurisdiction of a new body to be called the Prairie Rail Authority. Need would determine how many of these 2,344 miles would continue in existence, with the useful elevators on those lines determining the new rail configuration. The PRA was to co-ordinate this readjustment.

The Prairie Rail Authority would be a three-member body based in western Canada. Its function would be to provide a continuing assessment of branch line needs and of the administration, operation and financial arrangements necessary to best serve the public interest. In other words, it would remove the authority over prairie branch lines, which are so important and critical to the west, from Ottawa and place it in local hands in western Canada.

This seems logical and sensible but in reality it is the last thing this government wants to see happen, despite its professed desire to decentralize. To this government, decentralization is fine if it means moving a government department which should be in Ottawa to a remote part of the country; but it is not acceptable when it means establishing a regional authority to look after a regional concern like railway branch lines on the prairies. I cannot understand the government's logic, Mr. Speaker.

The Hall commission further recommended that the railways be compensated for the maintenance and upgrading of lines in the basic network, or lines subsequently added to it, and that branch line subsidies be discontinued. The Prairie Rail Authority is to assume responsibility for costs and contracting for the maintenance and operation of these branch lines.

It is important for us to remember that the commission did not recommend that the prairie rail system be refurbished to a "like new" condition. It simply recommended that it be upgraded so that it would be no more than adequate for the movement of grain. The fact that much of it is by no means adequate at the present time is only a measure of the extent to which it has been allowed to deteriorate over the years. The commission estimated that this upgrading would put costs up to $445 million.

The commission found that there are areas in western Canada in which the volume of grain handled warrants the retention of elevator services but rail service is too costly to maintain. In such cases the commission recommended that the elevator on the abandoned line be retained and that commercial trucking be employed to transfer grain to the nearest railhead, the additional trucking cost being paid by the federal government through the Prairie Rail Authority.

The one place where the commission recommended that such an off-line loading facility be established immediately, as a demonstration of how this could be done elsewhere on the prairies, was at Fisher Branch in my constituency of Portage, on the CNR's Inwood subdivision which will probably be abandoned. The railways have neglected to upgrade these prairie branch lines. They have not run trains along them. I should like to read into the record a letter which I have received from a constituent of mine who is greatly concerned about what is happening. It is dated February 2 and it comes from Broad Valley, Manitoba. It is signed by Mr. Walter Klimchuk, who writes:

> We have not had any train service on the Hodgson-Grosse Isle line since December. As a result, some 40 grain permits were taken away from our elevators and consequently approximately 65 to 70 thousand bushels of grain were hauled to Moosehorn, Warren, and Arborg. Many farmers have not delivered a bushel yet. Evidently, CP supplies box cars to Moosehorn and Arborg, and, just as evidently, CN is conditioning us to learn to haul grain longer distances in an attempt to show that our Hodgson rail line could be abandoned.
> This situation is very serious, with the stockpile of grain we have. This grain is stored in all available farm buildings and a lot of it is out in the open. The piles out on the open must be hauled out before spring thaw. The resulting financial strain is very great.
> Mr. Masniuk, please use the influence of your office and get some action on this! Thank you.

I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is not in the House but I hope his parliamentary secretary will bring this matter to his attention. These farmers are desperate and with the coming of spring a lot of this grain will rot.

The commission estimated that trucking grain from Fisher Branch to the CP Arborg railhead 19 miles away would be the cheapest alternative, costing about 12 cents a bushel as compared with anything from 50 cents to 90 cents a bushel if a rail link were built from Arborg to Fisher Branch, which was the other alternative under consideration. The farmers of the Interlake area are very anxious that this experiment be put into operation as soon as possible, but so far nothing has been forthcoming from the Department of Transport.

Speaking to a group of farm leaders in Regina on May 27 last year, the Minister of Transport said:

> With the unanimous urging of Westerners for prompt, decisive responses to the Hall Report, I am determined to act as expeditiously as possible to deal with the Commission's proposals . . . it is our intention to act in a swift and positive manner.

The minister added that on the previous day an order in council has been passed implementing the first of the commission's recommendations: the 1,813 miles of branch lines which the commission had found to be of proven traffic potential and importance were transferred to the basic rail network. The minister also stated that the 2,344 miles which the commission had recommended be transferred to the jurisdiction of the Prairie Rail Authority had been "frozen" by a similar order in council and thus protected from abandonment until at least January 1, 1979. That, Mr. Speaker, was the end of the government's "swift and positive response" to the Hall report.

On the subject of the Prairie Rail Authority whose establishment was the crucial recommendation of the report if the other recommendations are to be carried out, the minister was extremely equivocal. The two years of study by Mr. Justice Hall and his fellow commissioners notwithstanding, the minister declared at his Regina meeting with the farmers that the concept "would require further concentrated study to flesh it out in its entirety and assess all its ramifications." To use the minister's own words, to do this he planned to set up a prairie rail action committee to further examine the prairie rail authority concept. This government's fondness for study committees is well known. Its unfortunate reluctance to do anything about the recommendations of all these study groups is also very well known, Mr. Speaker.

With all due respect to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, I just do not think the Prairie Rail Authority concept requires any further study, certainly not a study which might take another year and a half. Why did Mr. Justice Hall and the other commissioners study this whole question of prairie railways and branch lines for almost two years? Surely after that length of time the Prairie Rail Authority concept is not so hasty and ill-conceived that it will now require another year and a half of study before it can be set up. The PRA should be established now. Its practicality and viability can only really be determined by having it operate, and not by any further study, however useful that may be at the time.

The minister's prairie rail action committee is really precisely the opposite of any action; it is the same stalling technique we have so often witnessed from this government in the past; that is, the appearance of taking action on a report or recommendation while actually avoiding doing so.

On May 27, at a meeting with the farmers' representatives in Regina, the Minister of Transport revealed that he wanted certain actions by the railways, the CN and the CP, on the Hall report. Specifically what he wanted was their agreement to transfer certain rail lines between themselves, as recommended in the report; concrete undertakings from the railways that they would immediately begin rebuilding and upgrading the lines involved in the basic network, in return for any cash payments which they might receive from the federal government; and, most important of all, that where any line is abandoned, the roadbed property should revert to the federal government, which, after consultation with the provinces, and only after consultation, might then be offered to the provinces involved.

This is directly contrary to the recommendations of the Hall report, namely that all abandoned lines be given to the provinces in which they are located to be disposed of as agreed between the provinces and the municipalities. The commission recommended that the federal government only should assist the provinces and municipalities in covering the higher road costs they will face as a result of branch line abandonment, and that the federal government compensate municipalities for this loss in tax revenues resulting from abandonment.

To me the establishment of another committee by the Minister of Transport to stall further the establishment of the Prairie Rail Authority, plus his recent offer of $100 million directly to the western railways for upgrading which will be overseen by the Canadian Transport Commission in Ottawa, demonstrates that this government has in fact rejected the Hall commission report. The extreme central Canada bias of this government on the issue of rail transport in western Canada is evident once again. This government just does not want authority over transportation anywhere in Canada to be controlled by a body outside the CTC.

The present head of the CTC is a former Liberal member from Kingston and the Islands, and a former federal finance minister whose partiality and political bias has been all too evident in the past. I just do not believe that this government is interested in letting regulatory authority over rail transportation in western Canada be given to a western authority, not even when it involves an issue as fundamental and as important to the west as the rail transportation of grain.

Unless there is a change of attitude on the part of this government soon, I am afraid that we are heading toward a tremendous future federal-provincial confrontation over the issues of railways, the sharing of resources, provincial property rights and, ultimately, the very division of powers under the constitution.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I too appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof.

This bill in reality, in general terms, broadens the financial aspect of the Canadian National Railways. Just prior to expressing my own thoughts on this matter may I take the opportunity to commend the hon. member for Portage (Mr. Masniuk), who has just concluded his remarks. Since coming here in 1974 it has been obvious to me and other members of this chamber that he has done a very competent and thorough job of representing his constituency, and the people in that area have been well served by his contribution in the House of Commons.

Let me take this opportunity when speaking on Bill C-17 to make some representation in respect of an area in my constituency, specifically the town of Fort Saskatchewan. Just this evening I spoke with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) when he was in the House. We discussed the possibility of the town receiving some funds for rail relocation, perhaps under the urban transportation assistance program. It is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to disburse funds under this program in accordance with the recommendations of ministers from various provinces. As a result, we would also have to deal with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) from Alberta.

Under this program $2 per capita per year is granted for projects such as rail relocation. I should like to make representations to the effect that Fort Saskatchewan receive funding under the urban transportation assistance program to move the railway out of the town. This town has a population of about 10,000 people. On speaking this evening to Muriel Abdurahman, one of the town councillors, she suggested that we have the three levels of government and the Canadian National Railways participate in the funding of this relocation. This would be the case in respect of the urban transportation assistance program because the province also has to be consulted about funding.

The town of Fort Saskatchewan has this railway line going directly through the centre of town. The town has a substantial industrial base, including a Sherritt Gordon plant, a Dow Chemical establishment and an inland chemical industrial site. The residents in this area are very concerned that at some time a chemical car might be derailed in the town itself. It is obvious that tragedies can and do occur when railway chemical cars are derailed. One can see this as evidenced by two articles which appeared in the Edmonton Journal on Saturday, February 25 and Monday, February 27. The article on Monday, February 27 appeared under the headline "2,500 in U.S. flee deadly gas". This is a story about a chemical car derailment and it states in part:

A deadly cloud of chlorine gas that escaped from a derailed freight train and has already killed eight people floated north today, triggering a string of evacuations in its path.

"We don't know how far we're going to have to go with the evacuation," a spokesman for the Bay County sheriff's department said. "The chemists are telling us when we have an unsafe area."

At least 2,500 people within a five-mile radius of Sunday's derailment were evacuated. Civil Defense Director Ron Johnson said propane leaking from one of the tank cars could mix with the billowing chlorine and explode, turning the 115-car freight train into a chain of fire.

This is exactly what the residents of Fort Saskatchewan are concerned about and fear. Let me turn to the other article which appeared in the Edmonton Journal on Saturday, February 25 under the heading "Rail 'bomb' ravages town", and again this is why the residents of Fort Saskatchewan are concerned. They fear that if a derailment occurred on this track within the town limits it would ravage the town of Fort Saskatchewan. I should like to quote from the Edmonton Journal article, dated February 25, 1978, which reads as follows:

An earth-shaking flash of flame erupted Friday from a railway tank car carrying liquid propane, hurling burning bodies into the air, showering debris and setting fires.

Six persons were reported dead in the path of destruction through a two-block area and 100 others were injured, . . .

When the first tank car exploded, 14 businesses and dwellings burned down and other, smaller fires erupted as the intense heat ignited structures up to 300 metres away . . .

The tank cars were among 24 of a Louisville and Nashville Railroad freight train that was derailed . . .

This is exactly the concern expressed by many residents in the Fort Saskatchewan area. I commend Mr. Ken Hodgins of the Fort Saskatchewan chamber of commerce for attempting to counteract this serious problem. A member of the chamber of commerce, Dr. Ralph Galvin, indicated that a public meeting will take place in Fort Saskatchewan on Tuesday. At that time an actual film of one of the explosions will be shown. This explosion occurred when a chemical car derailed. The track runs through the residential centre of Fort Saskatchewan. It passes through the downtown area, which is the main shopping centre. It is well within 1000 yards of the senior, junior and elementary schools. Mr. Hodgins indicated that they are concerned because a good many of the chemical cars coming out of Fort Saskatchewan are more potent than the ones referred to in the articles of the Edmonton Journal.

In making these representations, I am hopeful to have the participation of all levels of government in having the track moved from within the town limits of Fort Saskatchewan. This sentiment was expressed by the town council of Fort Saskatchewan on many occasions, by the mayor, Mr. Hank Powell, and councillor Bob Fraser. This area was discussed at the executive level within the Progressive Conservative party. Also it was brought forth by Mr. Mart Philbin, who lives within a 1000-yard radius of the line. Because of the railroad tracks going through the town, our concern is that the town could very easily become a chemical bomb. We hope to have the track moved in order to alleviate the possibility of a derailment and a chemical explosion, especially in light of the fact that Dow Chemical is presently following an expansion program.

I hope to follow this up with representations, both written and verbal, to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Transport and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs when I receive more communications from the town council and the chamber of commerce of Fort Saskatchewan.

In dealing with Bill C-17 and the broader aspects of the Canadian National Railways, one cannot help but refer back to a few comments which were made by the hon. member for Portage. I will keep my remarks brief because there are other hon. members in the chamber who wish to participate in this debate, such as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). We do not wish to slow the legislative process at all.

On Monday, February 27, members of my party had occasion to visit with Mr. Justice Hall in Saskatoon. I mention that because in Saskatoon there was a recent rail relocation program which resulted in the removal of the railway lines from the downtown core area. I commend the residents of that area for the lovely city they now have. Returning to the visit of February 27, 15 western Progressive Conservative members of parliament met with Mr. Justice Hall to review some of the recommendations contained in the Hall report. It is noteworthy that only six of some 92 recommendations by Mr. Hall have been fully implemented, and five have been partially acted upon. No action has been taken on the rest. The Conservative party finds that very disturbing. Neither the government nor the Minister of Transport has seen fit to sit down and discuss the royal commission report. The government went to the great expense of commissioning a report and having individuals travel in order to gain input from Canadians, yet they pay little heed to these worthwhile recommendations.

I could be critical of the government in many areas regarding this report. It is a shame that the railways are receiving far too much of taxpayers' money without having to account for the way it is being spent. It disturbs me that the government is paying no attention to the recommendation of the report which indicates that there is no government policy to assist the prairie livestock feeding industry or the oilseed crushers by offsetting the low statutory freight rates on grain. In his report Mr. Justice Hall suggested that the government should offer some type of assistance to these industries. There is much in the report which should be implemented.

I could say a great deal as far as government policies are concerned. Rather than attempt to carry on with the report of Mr. Justice Hall, I will turn the floor over to the hon. member for Dauphin in order to conclude consideration of this legislation.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise with considerable interest to speak on this bill. It is supposed to put the CNR into a profitable position. It is really only a matter of juggling figures. The government is wiping out $808 million in debt, so that the company will not have to pay the $65 million in interest charges that it is now paying. In any case the government will have to find $65 million somewhere else. Also it is indicated that the CNR will be rid of passenger service in 1980, which will provide them with another windfall of $50 million. VIA Rail is only another arm of the government. Surely the net effect remains the same. It merely aids in comparing the CNR with some other company. In Canada there is only one other comparable company, which is the CPR. Furthermore, all modes of transportation are so closely regulated by government decree that, whether managed by the government or managed by a large corporation, they are not all that different.

Dr. Bandeen, the president of the CNR, voiced the opinion that the revamping of CN will bring about a boost in the morale of its employees by removing the chronic negative image of being a loser. He suggested that the right to retain 80 per cent of the earnings will help reduce the amount of future borrowings. The remaining 20 per cent of the earnings will be earmarked as dividends for the government, which is the only shareholder in the corporation.

The CN president has suggested that a major obstacle facing CN has been a high ratio of debt, about 60 per cent to equity, which has been developing over some years. In effect, the CN is not retiring its debt, as would a private company, by selling off some of its assets but is merely asking the government to assume the debt so that the books of the CN show better balance. No doubt in the future there will be further recapitalization as CN management struggles to deal with its capital structure.

Dr. Bandeen has suggested that morale in the CN is low because of its image of a chronic loser, but in my community where there are many CN employees the morale is low because of the rapid shifting and changing policies of the company which have left the employees bewildered, downhearted and in despair. Major changes occur from month to month and from year to year, from centralization to decentralization. Indeed, most employees express the view that the CN is actively trying to get out of railroading, and the aim of the employees, or many of them, is to stay only as long as necessary to procure their pensions and to get out as soon as they can.

The so-called boost for morale may be good for the Montreal office but it is disastrous on the prairies. I have had occasion to realize that CN employees have advised clients that we would be much better served if we shipped things by other methods. The influence of railroading in western Canada is great because the western division has over half the car loadings in this country. The railways have taken to cancelling out of less than car load lots and they turn the business over to the trucking industry. In any case railways are now shipping only a few commodities and at times are not anxious to ship even those.

In the magazine the Manitoba Highway News of last month, the chief of the Manitoba Transport Board, Mr. Al Mackling, had something interesting to say. He said:

> For a long time there was no question about transportation—rails were supreme.
> Now, as shocking as it sounds, rails are playing a secondary role to truck transportation in total dollar value of goods being moved . . .
> Through rail abandonment the railways are giving up a segment of the transportation industry which they dominated, almost monopolized, for decades.
> Meanwhile, trucking is moving in, picking up in the grain industry where rails claim it is no longer viable to operate and moving the goods economically and efficiently.

The article goes on to read:

> Mr. Mackling said that with the policy of rail abandonment in western Canada, he can see no other alternative to long distance grain hauling than by highway.
> 'Already we've seen some long distance experimentation of bulk grain hauling,' he said, 'and that trend will continue'.

In the United States grain hauling of up to 1,000 miles by truck is quite common. The article continues:

> Just recently, for example, there have been a number of applications dealing with specialty grains and grain by-products—the meals produced from the crushing of particular oilseeds: rape, mustard, sunflower and soyabeans . . .
> A big reason for this is trucking's adaptation to 'time sensitive' situations.
> 'There's more and more reliance on trucking because of the time factor,' explained Mr. Mackling, 'that is, instead of a shipper having to have a fairly large warehouse, heavily stocked with inventory at either end of his transportation movement, he's now cutting back on inventory and relying on the ready access of trucking to satisfy his customers quickly.

I think that this is a significant event in the delivery of grain to country elevator points and will make considerable changes in western Canada which I do not think the railways will appreciate. They will find they have lost out in the game of transportation. For instance, I was told of a town in my riding, where I was yesterday, where there was a line-up of trucks carrying grain all the way from 20 miles to 60 miles, and in one case 175 miles, so that grain was brought to a central point, by-passing many elevators and moving the grain into a consolidated position. This is the consolidation of grain handling system in western Canada, and if it continues, what will happen is that the railways will find that their services are no longer needed to as great an extent as they have in the past.

One of the things that the Hall commission was to do was to prepare a blueprint for the railway system in the west but until now it has not done very much except to close down rail lines, which the commission had suggested should be abandoned. It is very important to note that the Prairie Rail Authority, the establishment of which was suggested by Mr. Justice Hall, has not been set up. It was considered that it would be a western based organization because, in any case, the Canadian Transport Commission is not interested in the west. The Prairie Rail Authority, it was hoped, would be a body which would have an influence on the CTC but would be based in western Canada, be sensitive to our needs and would make suggestions for the welfare of the transportation industry.

In fact, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has set up the prairie rail action committee. It has the same initials but it is an entirely different body. Whereas the Prairie Rail Authority was to report on the 2,500 miles of rails—it was doubtful whether they should be included or abandoned—it was to be an ongoing committee which would take care of things for the five to ten years in the 1980's while the consolidation process went on. In fact the prairie rail action committee was set up to make a report by the end of September, 1978.

Obviously it is far too soon for the rail companies and the grain handling companies to decide where they want to have their grain elevators, which branch lines should be closed down and which should be kept open. The action of the railways and of the Minister of Transport, with the bill now before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration regarding hours of work and dust collection, will result in the closing down of many of the smaller elevators and in practice consolidating them in a much larger area.

For instance, there is a branch line in my riding which is closed down for almost eight months in the year. As soon as the first snow comes, the line is shut down. There may occasionally be some hauling when the spring break-up comes, but in general for two or three months after the snow disappears the line is considered to be soft and no grain is hauled out of there. So in effect the farmers are gradually learning to haul grain by truck to elevators located on the main line. This means that we will lose many lines in western Canada through lack of use because the railways are not providing an alternative or a reasonable service on these lines.

One of the tragedies of railroading in western Canada is that it is controlled in the east. Management of the CNR, which used to be in Winnipeg, at least so far as the western regions are concerned, has been consolidated in Montreal. It shows in the actions it has taken that it has very little knowledge of our situation.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At ten o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MANPOWER

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR FURTHER GRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering on the one hand the very large number of projects presented under the Young Canada Works program and, on the other hand, the insufficient funds provided for this program; given the high rate of unemployment and since the private sector is incapable of creating summer jobs for all students, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the House urge the government to increase the funds earmarked for the Young Canada Works Program in order to subsidize a larger number of projects.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be debated only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

THREATENED WORK STOPPAGES—REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INVESTIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the increasing tension, as evidenced by the demonstration on Parliament Hill today, in the long drawn-out contract negotiations between the government of Canada and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers which threatens further work stoppages in the Post Office, and the growing demand for action by members of parliament from both sides of the House, including government members, as evidenced by a question directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) on February 23, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government set up immediately a special committee of parliament to investigate the Post Office to bring in recommendations for solutions and, in particular, to consider the advisability of converting Canada Post to a Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST CORPORATION ALLOW CANADIANS TO FORM OWN JUDGMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent necessity and national significance. The Ottawa Journal of March 2 quotes Mr. Al Johnson, president of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as having said before the Task Force on Canadian Unity: "I believe the Canadian people are not searching for absolute truth in the news media". That would be a futile search. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House, through Mr. Speaker, inform the president of the CBC that the people of Canada are intelligent and sophisticated enough to make their own decisions if the CBC and other news media provide them with the facts, and that he show more respect for the intelligence and judgment of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can only be done at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—NATIONAL SECURITY—VISIT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL AND HEAD OF SECURITY SERVICE TO HON. MEMBER'S OFFICE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before beginning the oral question period, and because it might influence questions put during the question period, I might take a moment to indicate that since yesterday's rather extensive discussion I had conversations this morning both with the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) and with the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais).

I am happy to advise the House that the matter appears to be resolved in the following way. Pursuant to the undertaking that was given to the House yesterday by the hon. member for Leeds, which he repeated to me in respect of the safekeeping of the document or documents, that they would not be moved or touched or used in any way during the course of the weekend, and that while it will be necessary for the Solicitor General to serve the hon. member with a document of some sort, pursuant to the Official Secrets Act, and that having been done some time today, the matter will stand in abeyance until Monday morning.

This will permit the hon. member for Leeds to pursue legal advice which he began yesterday. But, reasonably, having found a solicitor who is expert in these matters, the solicitor requires some time to properly advise the hon. member for Leeds after service of the document by the Solicitor General under the Official Secrets Act. The matter will stand in abeyance until Monday morning so that the hon. member for Leeds can communicate to the Solicitor General or to me the position he proposes to take in respect of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Needless to say, I should like to thank both hon. members and the House for their extensive contributions yesterday to a most important, fundamental matter and to a very vigorous and useful discussion. This will form part of our deliberations, no matter how this question is resolved. I want to thank all members who co-operated throughout in this rather difficult matter.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT BORROWING TO BOLSTER VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, the minister issued a press release announcing the intention of the government of Canada to go to the United States on a borrowing venture. What is surprising about that is the amount of money the government proposes to borrow.

As the minister must surely know, if we wanted to maintain our traditional reserves in United States dollars, we would need to borrow almost $5 billion U.S. Can the minister tell the House why he is seeking to borrow only the token amount of $750 million, in light of what has happened to the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we decided that was the appropriate amount of money to borrow, in the circumstances.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question was why this amount was decided upon. There is a very real question about whether the decisions that this minister calls appropriate are appropriate in fact. I should like to ask the minister whether he considered indulging in the normal practice of trying to place this proposed issue privately, and whether he was turned down. I should also like the minister to tell the House whether the original request was for a larger amount than $750 million.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we had both options, and we decided to go public. The amount was the amount discussed between my agent, the governor of the Bank of Canada, and the institutions. It is a public issue. More details will be made public later on.

Mr. Clark: Once again, the minister did not answer the question, Mr. Speaker. He said they had both options. My question was whether they decided to go public because they were turned down privately. I hope the minister can address himself to that question. Since he has made this decision to go to the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States, he must surely know it will be necessary for the government of Canada to file a registration statement with the SEC. This will mean the Minister of Finance is proposing to give the Securities and Exchange Commission of another country more information about our economic situation than he is giving the House of Commons of Canada.

Will the minister give us a commitment now that he will file on the floor of the House of Commons and make available to the people of Canada exactly the same information he is going to make available to an agency of another government, before he makes that public declaration to the SEC?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I knew I had to file a prospectus like any other institution that goes to the American market. I was aware of it and I have no problem with it at all. I think the story we can tell about Canada is a very good one. When I said I had the two options, I hoped the hon. member would have realized that when you have an option you can choose either way. We decided to go public. We were not turned down on a private placement, but we felt it was better in the present situation to go public.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Finance tell us what reasoning led the government of Canada to take the quite unusual step of going public in this matter, rather than making a private borrowing? It may be unprecedented—I have not had a chance to check the record—but why did the government of Canada choose that option, rather than the more normal option?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have chosen that avenue because we thought is was the best at the moment. If we make a private investment, our options are more limited. We wanted to have different blocks of bonds over various periods of time and we thought it would be easier to operate this way because the investments will thus be more diversified than if they were invested in one or two American institutions.

I also would like to add, with leave of the House, that the interest rates are generally better when one goes public.

[English]

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING FUTURE BORROWINGS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that we have lost about $750 million in United States reserves since the end of January, and the minister has indicated he is only proposing to borrow $750 million in the United States market, would the minister indicate if they intend to borrow still more in some future month?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when we decide to borrow more, if we decide to borrow more, I will be glad to advise the public and the House of Commons.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that it is widely speculated that the dollar may go still lower, with the faint effort put forth by the government in raising foreign funds, bearing in mind that the inflationary impact of the falling dollar is much more severe in Canada than it is in the United States, and bearing in mind that our dollar has fallen 31 per cent in relation to the Japanese yen since October 20, 1976, and 28 per cent in terms of the West German deutschemark, for example, would the minister indicate if he still believes that he will achieve a 6 per cent inflation rate in the current year, bearing in mind the heavy inflationary impact his falling dollar is going to have on Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think there is some problem, when the Canadian dollar loses some value, in terms of imports. Imports are increasing, costs are increasing, and it could put some pressure on inflation; I recognize that. But I am not advised to change the forecast for the end of the year. At the same time, I would like to report to the hon. member that I receive telephone calls and telegrams every day from many manufacturers in Ontario who tell me that they like the dollar the way it is at present, because the export position of Canada is improving considerably.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind the consequences of our falling dollar, and bearing in mind that any foreign funds the minister may borrow is simply stalling the inevitable, would the minister indicate what concrete proposals he intends to put before this House to reduce the balance of payment deficit which this country is incurring? By the end of the year it will be $20 billion that we have lost in foreign exchange. What does the minister propose to do to end this steady outflow of our funds?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have a floating dollar at present and the level of the dollar is determined by the market. Our interventions in February were made to ensure an orderly floating of the dollar, since it is the responsibility of the Governor of the Bank Canada to do so, and the value of the dollar is fluctuating. We do not know exactly at what level the dollar should be. The market will determine that. The hon. member is always giving the impression that we have huge losses when we are losing American dollars in our reserves but at the same time, we are improving our own liquid assets as it is possible that we will be borrowing less on the Canadian market if we borrow on the American market. I wish the hon. member would not give the impression that we are losing $700 million, because such is not the case. We have exchanged American dollars for Canadian dollars.

INVESTMENT AND JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS TO IMPROVE ECONOMY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Considering that the steady decline in the value of the Canadian dollar is due to circumstances here, as it is due to circumstances in other countries that are badly managed, namely, an economy that is persistently bad in terms of the rate of inflation and one that has more than one million unemployed, can the minister tell us why he took the $750 million, costly step that he has taken, instead of bringing forward measures that would lead to higher levels of investment and more job creation in the Canadian economy? Surely that is what the Canadian economy is looking for.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we presented a budget on October 20, 1977.

An hon. Member: What budget?

Mr. Chrétien: Or, if hon. members prefer, a mini-budget or economic statement; I am not fussy about words. I have stated the tax incentives we have given to Canadian taxpayers. We have cut taxes for individuals to the tune of more than $2 billion since the beginning of the year and $900 million for corporations. These are the most stimulative economic policies put forward by any western country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the reports produced by Statistics Canada on Friday of last week and on Monday of this week flatly contradict all the predictions made at the time of his mini-budget last fall, and all the predictions he made in documents for the first ministers' conference. If current investment patterns and job creation patterns are not borne out the way the minister forecast, as a result of the measures he has taken, why does he not have enough common sense to announce changes in those measures now, in order to get the economy moving?

Mr. Chrétien: If the hon. member will check what I said in my statement of October 20, he will see that what I predicted for the full year 1977 was less than the end result published on Monday. I said on Tuesday that I was disappointed with the last quarter report of Statistics Canada. However, I was not the only one who anticipated a very strong quarter. A few hours ago I had a discussion with a private group which has a good reputation in Canada. Mr. De Cotret of the Conference Board had in his predictions forecast 1.2 or 1.3 for the third quarter. They are puzzled, as are many other experts in this field, with the end result for the fourth quarter. In speaking with the retail business sector, the prediction was that all indications were very good for the fourth quarter.

Mr. Stevens: But you were wrong.

Mr. Chrétien: The private sector made the same forecast as the government. The end results were disappointing. Even the hon. member has stated that Statistics Canada can make some adjustment after reviewing their first round of calculations. I say that the predictions I made in October for the year 1977 were exactly the same as those shown on Monday.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, only the minister's colleagues and backbenchers could believe that bundle of nonsense he has just come out with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The central requirement of an economy that is going to grow is an investment pattern. The minister predicted less than three weeks ago, just days before the first ministers' conference, that we had to have a 7 per cent investment rate increase in the coming year. Statistics Canada shows it is likely to be a negative 3 per cent. In light of the figures produced yesterday, which disclosed there are only 32,000 jobs available in Canada for the more than 1½ million looking for them, will the minister immediately bring in measures to stimulate growth in the economy, instead of waiting in cynical fashion for the election campaign to make an announcement which ought to be made now?

● (1127)

Mr. Chrétien: If the hon. member would check the record, he would find that at the conference of first ministers we recognized that growth for 1978 was not predicted to be extremely good. That is why we undertook, with the provinces, to push forward big projects in the energy field. And, of course, there is the pipeline which will come very soon if the bill is passed in the House of Commons. We have taken a great many initiatives in terms of the creation of activity in the immediate future. At least the Premier of Saskatchewan is smarter than the leader of the NDP has shown himself to be in the House.

MANPOWER

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—INQUIRY WHETHER NUMBER OF PROJECTS GREATER THAN LAST YEAR

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In view of the fact that the time limit for submitting projects under the Young Canada Works program was February 17, could the minister advise the House whether he is aware of the number of projects which have been submitted this year? If so, is this number greater than the number of projects submitted last year? Also, by how many millions of dollars would the funds required exceed the credits currently earmarked for this program?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, our Young Canada Works program was tremendously successful last year and so it is again this year. I do not have the figures the hon. member is seeking, but I shall obtain them for him.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Since the minister is aware that this program has been quite successful for many years, I should like to call his attention to the fact that, in my own riding at least, the number of projects submitted has doubled this year, which is an indication of its popularity. However, the credits available being inadequate, could the minister advise the House whether he will recommend increasing the funds earmarked for this program, so that many more students may secure employment for the summer?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his representations.

INQUIRY WHETHER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM AVAILABLE IN ALL PROVINCES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister tell the House whether there is a student program in all provinces of Canada? If so, is this program consistent with the federal program so as to increase employment opportunities for students during the summer?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in most provinces we obtain the greatest co-operation from provincial authorities to promote youth employment during the summer.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CALL FOR BUDGET TO IMPROVE SITUATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman suggested a moment ago that the figures on which economic policy in this country has been based are wrong. Is it not prudent—indeed, is it not essential—today, particularly when we propose to borrow large sums of money from the United States, that the minister bring in a budget based on the realities which are now confronting us?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman should realize that before we bring in a budget we should wait to see the effect of the measures which were taken only two months ago. We have stimulated the economy to the tune of $3 billion, starting January 1, 1978. If the hon. member is advocating that we should stimulate it still further, he should not encourage his colleagues to get up in the House and complain that we are running too big a deficit. This is the type of thing I have heard in the House so many times. In 1977-1978 we have to cope with a deficit of $8.5 billion.

An hon. Member: It is $10 billion.

Mr. Chrétien: We are taking an extremely stimulative stance. We went further, starting in 1978. I am sure the hon. member will want to know exactly, in a few more weeks or months before we move again. We had a budget at the end of October.

Mr. Clark: That was not a budget.

Mr. Chrétien: We will have a budget after we see the results of the stimulation we have given to the economy for 1978.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the Minister of Finance has said. I am sure he will recognize, as most people in Canada recognize, that economic policies are an integrated set of propositions and that some of the results will be incorrect. It is quite apparent that the level of inflation which will take place in this country is quite different from the minister's forecast. I should like to ask him very specifically: what exchange rate was used in calculating what the level of inflation would be by the end of this year?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I replied to this question many times in committee. I think the assumptions made during preparation of the forecast do not have to be changed at this time. An hon. member of the NDP asked me for a prediction respecting growth in 1977. In a statement I made in October I said that growth would be around 2 per cent: I will check the record and report back, but it was less than 2.6 per cent. Thus, I do not have to change my prediction at this moment. In the last month the dollar has not changed much; it was 90.13 cents at the beginning of February and it it 89.33 cents now. We have lost only one point. That is not enough to change our prediction.

Mr. McGrath: What's a couple of points?

Mr. Chrétien: I think we are in a very complicated situation, but there is no reason to change the prediction we have made. One problem we are faced with is that while we have been able to convince the various premiers across the land that we must co-ordinate our economic policies—and they agreed—it is only the opposition in the House of Commons that is promoting doom and gloom propositions all the time.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows very well that in committee he would never say what the basic assumptions were on which the economic forecasts were made: he never made that clear. I would ask the minister, did they make their assumptions on inflation rates and growth in the economy based on the 90-cent dollar?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is in fact asking is whether we have decided to peg the Canadian dollar. There is no fixed rate that we have in mind for the dollar. We are floating the dollar and the economic situation will adjust accordingly. When you are floating the dollar, you cannot tag very precisely what will be the level of the dollar during a year.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS IN EASTERN CANADA—REQUEST MINISTER MEET UNION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, not only is the Canadian dollar declining, but the opportunities for employment in this country are declining more rapidly every day.

My question is of grave importance. It is for the Minister of Labour and arises as a result of a wire I received from the president of District 26 of the United Mine Workers of America, Mr. William Marsh. It concerns the announcement of the closure of the new Prince coal mine on Cape Breton Island and the loss of 300 jobs. Is the minister prepared to meet with the president and his executive—they are prepared to meet with the minister in Ottawa at a moment's notice—to see what can be done? Previously, the minister has been most co-operative on matters of this nature regarding safety, and so on. He has worked with myself previously and with the union on a series of matters.

This situation comes on the heels of the announcement by the Iron Ore Company of Canada, in Labrador City, of a loss of 350 jobs, and the linerboard plant in Newfoundland with a loss of 2,100 jobs. How soon can the minister meet with the executive of the United Mine Workers of America in order to discuss this very important situation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member giving me notice of his question. I have also received a wire from Mr. William Marsh, president of the United Mine Workers of America. Most certainly, I am prepared to meet with him at the earliest possible opportunity. My office is letting him know that right now. I would be pleased to have the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys there, and other hon. members involved, if they desire to attend.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUESTED GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID MINE CLOSING ON CAPE BRETON ISLAND

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who reports to the House for the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Is he, also, prepared to meet with the United Mine Workers of America as soon as possible in order to ascertain if there is not some way this mine can be kept in operation? It involves approximately 300 employees. God knows what they are going to do. The situation is very serious. Every day we hear announcements of unemployment, unemployment and lay-offs. Is the minister prepared to meet with the union tomorrow? They will come to Ottawa tomorrow, or Sunday, and meet with him if he wishes.

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the decision to close, as the hon. member referred to it, has not been taken in the sense he alluded to. The people are not going to be laid off. What the situation needs, as the hon. member already knows, is the question of security, first, and also the question of the very high cost which is involved right now in trying to mine the coal with the present system at the new Prince mine. An alternative to the present system of mining this coal is now being contemplated. Obviously, we will look for a different system of reaching the coal. We might have to go deeper, implement a safer system and a less costly one.

To attain a regular standard of security in the present system, we are required to work at a very high cost of operation, which makes the entire operation not viable. We intend to keep all the workers at work, but they will not necessarily be involved in the same operations as they are now. I understand all of them will be retained at work, but they will be doing different work in different places for some time until the present difficulties in the pillar and wall system, which is in operation, have been resolved.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR EXPANSION OF TOURISM

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Many representations from hon. members have been made to the minister for launching a program to stimulate the tourist industry in the province of Quebec, particularly in the Gaspé area. Would he tell the House whether he is still negotiating a subagreement with the province of Quebec for developing the tourist industry in that province and more specifically in the Gaspé area?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are still negotiating and as I indicated a few weeks ago when I was in Quebec City, we hope to be able to finalize those negotiations soon and ratify this agreement which is very important as hon. members know already, since some of them have been consulted and informed to some extent of the promising results which could be achieved through this proposal. So, I hope we will be able to sign this agreement during the coming weeks.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SOVIET NATIONALS ENGAGED IN SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, who confirmed yesterday the accuracy of certain statements regarding foreign intelligence activities in Canada. One such statement was made in the House on February 21, to the effect that 28 out of 61 Soviet officials in Canada were engaged in intelligence activities. Of course, we know that 13 of these Soviet nationals were expelled. With regard to the remainder, who allegedly continue to be engaged in intelligence activities in Canada, can the Solicitor General tell the House how long he or his predecessor knew about this, and what action they have taken?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been changed: the nature of the replies I made previously is not going to change as a result of the events which occurred yesterday. I am sure the hon. member recognizes that, indeed, matters of national security are not subject to public comment, no more today than they were yesterday or the day before.

I regret having had to pursue the matter in the way it was pursued yesterday, because in fact even that was detrimental to the question of national security. I did it in that way in order to be helpful to the hon. member for Leeds. I am not in any way going to be commenting on the question put to me by the hon. gentleman.

ISSUANCE OF TRAVEL PERMITS TO SOVIET INTELLIGENCE AGENTS IN CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General about travel permits issued to Soviet intelligence agents. This question has absolutely nothing to do with national security in the context in which the minister just put it. Does it remain the policy of this government to continue to issue travel permits to Soviet nationals whom the Solicitor General, on the basis of information received from his security forces, has reasonable and probable grounds to believe are members of the KGB or some other foreign intelligence unit? Is that the continuing policy of this government?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if I recall correctly, that question was asked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and a full reply was made at the time.

ACTION OF GOVERNMENT TO EXPEL SOVIET SUBVERSIVE AGENTS IN CANADA

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. By his own statement, there are 15 nationals of the Soviet Union here in Canada acting against the interests of national security in a subversive fashion. Is he taking any action, or is his government, to expel those 15 subversives who are still conducting such activities, by the minister's own statement?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to information that was made public by the hon. member for Leeds.

An hon. Member: No, that was your information.

Mr. Blais: The hon. gentleman from Leeds did not indicate when that information was compiled or whether, indeed, that situation has since changed. That, surely, is not a question the hon. member wants me to comment on.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the minister's own statement, not in respect of any event that occurred yesterday involving the hon. member for Leeds. It was his statement that there are still 15 such agents in Canada, after the expulsion of 13. By simple arithmetic, if we deduct 13 from the 28 whom the minister said were here, that leaves 15. It is those 15 I am asking about. What action is the government going to take in respect of their expulsion, if they are engaged, as he says, in subversive activities?

Mr. Blais: I cannot recall ever having made that statement, Mr. Speaker.

WARREN HART—INQUIRY AS TO RECRUITMENT FOR INTELLIGENCE WORK IN CANADA

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that is supplementary, in that it involves the security of other countries. When will the Solicitor General know the complete story of who arranged the recruitment of FBI operative, Warren Hart, whose bureau number was S4—in case there is any doubt as to what his connection was— and who arranged for him to come to Canada, keeping in mind that his file was red-flagged and inquiries and information went directly to the PMO?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacKay: Who authorized this man, Mr. Speaker—and I direct this question to the same minister—to make forays into the Caribbean, not only to infiltrate but to train revolutionaries, a seeming contravention of this country's stated policy of non-offensive intelligence operations? Was the House misled or is it our policy to conduct offensive intelligence operations in areas where we have a legitimate sphere of influence?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to the House before that there is no policy of offensive intelligence-gathering. I maintain that position. I told the hon. gentleman that the information I had received to date would indicate that this policy has not been infringed. I am getting additional information, and I have indicated to the hon. gentleman that I will provide him with that information when it is available.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that sending a trained agent to another sovereign state to train revolutionaries sounds rather offensive to me. Does the minister not agree with that?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman makes an allegation that we are dealing with a trained agent. The hon. gentleman fully knows that the role of Mr. Hart was always that of a source and never that of a trained agent.

TRANSPORT

FUTURE OF SHIP CANAL AT SAULT STE. MARIE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I have given him notice of it. Can he explain the delay in cabinet reaching a decision on the future of the Canadian ship canal at Sault Ste. Marie? Is it because new evidence has been drawn to the attention of the minister, namely, that a significant increase in western coal shipments through the locks contradicts the minister's assumption that there will be no capacity problems until after 1995 and, therefore, a cost-benefit analysis on improving the existing lock should be undertaken?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that a decision with regard to the Sault canal and the development of that area is being made on the basis of all the available facts and information. There is no special reason for a conclusion not having been reached except that we want to do a very thorough job of analysis.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister does study the new evidence about 4 million tons of coal moving through that system by 1980, because that does not seem to me to justify reducing or closing the lock. By way of a supplementary question, can the minister explain the budgetary reduction of $336,000 for operating costs for the fiscal year 1978-79? Does this mean the government has decided to reduce one work shift, which was an option suggested in its preliminary report on the future of the Sault lock?

Mr. Lang: With regard to the second part, I would want to check that. I think probably if the time estimates are being considered, I would be able to give that information. I can tell the hon. member that as far as the proposed or suggested movement of coal is concerned, we had projections of possible movements of coal far greater than that which we have been taking into account in terms of the development of the Seaway.

AIRLINES ISSUING FREE TICKETS SO CUSTOMERS MAY AVOID INCOME TAX

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. There have been news reports this week that airline companies and travel agents are handing out free airline tickets to help customers avoid paying income tax, and there are so many free tickets around that they are like money.

In light of the statement made by Mr. Claude Taylor at committee meetings last spring, that Air Canada has 80,000 tickets it cannot account for, I would ask the minister whether he has contacted Mr. Taylor to see if they have found these 80,000 tickets, or are they part of the free tickets that are floating around Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to think there is any relationship between these two matters, and I do not think anyone suggested that at any time. I have not had a recent report from Mr. Taylor on this matter, but I would be glad to obtain one.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, will the minister contact Mr. Benson, of the CTC, to make sure he allows no more air fare increases until he has complete assurance that airline companies can account for all these missing tickets and have proper accounting systems, instead of having this rip-off of the Canadian public?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will take note of that representation.

[Mr. Lang.]

PROPOSED WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT FROM INTRAPROVINCIAL FERRY SERVICES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. Given the government's stated intention to withdraw from all intraprovincial ferry services in the country, and given the settlement that was successfully negotiated with British Columbia in this regard, I should like to ask whether the minister or the government is prepared to offer the same terms and financial conditions to the province of Newfoundland in this regard that it gave to British Columbia?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, broadly speaking, it is our view that the administration of local ferry services, particularly when they may be competitive with roads or, indeed, are being replaced by the construction of road services, are better managed and better to be managed in provincial hands. Toward that end we are discussing with Newfoundland an appropriate fiancial arrangement, and perhaps an arrangement to assure improved facilities where they are required to provide the ferry services. These discussions have been ongoing for some time. I think they may have taken a change for the better fairly recently; I say that as a result of my first discussions with the new minister of transport for Newfoundland.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, although the minister did not say so, can I assume that Newfoundland can expect the same terms given to British Columbia? Can the minister give the House, and certainly the people of Newfoundland, the assurance that the vessel which has been designated to replace the William Carson on the Labrador-Newfoundland service will be adequate in terms of accommodation and safe in terms of its ability to navigate the ice situations off Labrador?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the principles which were at work in developing a solution to the ferry situation in British Columbia are the same principles at work in the case of Newfoundland, although different circumstances and different arrangements in law might well lead to appropriate results rather than identical results. The information I had was that the vessel being prepared for the substitution of the William Carson was chosen because of its suitability. It has to undergo certain changes to permit it to fit the service exactly, and those will be undertaken.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMPENSATION FOR COSTS INCURRED IN SEARCH FOR SOVIET SATELLITE

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he inform the House what further developments there have been in respect of the question of compensation by the Soviet Union for costs incurred in the search for the parts of the Cosmos satellite?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question may be prompted by press reports that the Soviets did not accept our proposal at the United Nations. That is correct, although we did get a good deal of support for it during the debate, which I believe concluded yesterday. We will continue to pursue the matter there.

• (1152)

On the specific point of the collection of costs as they relate to the work of recovery of the satellite, we have submitted to the Soviet Union a further note which indicates quite categorically Canada's view that the Soviet Union is responsible and that it is our intention to seek to recover the funds that were expended in this regard. I may say that I would have no objection to tabling it—this may cut off a supplementary question—if that note is desired by members. I would be glad to do so.

REPORT ON SHCHARANSKY CASE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of the motion which was made in the House and adopted unanimously, presented by the hon. member for York Centre and seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, to the effect that the Shcharansky case and the offer of landed immigrant status which Canada has extended to Shcharansky be raised at the earliest possible moment at the Belgrade meeting. I ask the minister if that has been done. Also, perhaps he could report to the House, if it has not been done, on the difficulties that might be encountered and what we can expect to be done in this regard.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the last word that I had from the delegation in Belgrade—by the way, it was a report which embraced some of the views of members of parliament and members of the other place who were there at the time—was that up to that moment there had not been an appropriate phase in the discussions at Belgrade which would permit the actual presentation of this resolution.

Our ambassador was looking for alternative means through which it could be done, and will advise us when he has reached the appropriate conclusion as to what the best technique would be. I think there are members of parliament and members of the other place in Belgrade who are following this as well, and I will be governed by the general conclusion. In other words, we will follow whatever conclusion the total delegation comes to as to the best way to proceed.

Mr. Fraser: The Secretary of State for External Affairs was not here yesterday—undoubtedly, he was engaged in other duties—but a motion was presented to the House by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, seconded by myself, which was also unanimously approved with respect to the Shcharansky case, directing the House to urge upon the Soviet Union that we have an observer at the trial, and also repeating the offer of the Canadian government to grant Mr. Shcharansky landed immigrant status. My question to the minister is whether he can tell the House, first of all, how soon this direction given by the House to him will be carried out, and when will we have a report on the action taken on this unanimous resolution?

Mr. Jamieson: I hope you will permit me a moment here, Mr. Speaker, to illustrate, in a completely non-argumentative way, the difficulty which these two motions present. I will answer by saying that of course they will be submitted at the earliest opportunity to representatives of the Soviet Union. However, I would point out with the best of intentions, I have no doubt the two are mutually exclusive unless we can find an effective way of putting them together.

One suggests that there should be an immediate release of Mr. Shcharansky; the other anticipates the trial of Mr. Shcharansky. This makes it extremely difficult for us to argue that the gentleman ought not to be tried and that we should continue with the initial course which we pursued, namely, of asking that he be released from the Soviet Union and that we will take him into custody. I make that point, I repeat, not in any debating sense but to illustrate the difficulties of debating these tremendously sensitive issues in public.

I will be glad to consult with hon. members opposite who have an interest in this case, and with members on this side of the House, in private or in any other way so we can reach a suitable approach to this matter which will illustrate that we all have a concern for this gentleman and for human rights in general, and so we can do it in a manner which will effectively advance our goals rather than being self-defeating which, regrettably and with the best of intentions, often turns out to be the case.

Mr. Fraser: I would like to ask the minister, again in a non-argumentative way, whether in view of his remarks he would give careful consideration to the representations that have been made to him, to members of his own party and to members of my party, which give a very strong indication that publicity in these areas is not self-defeating but, in fact, brings about—on certain occasions—some very positive results. Having said that, I recognize the difficulties to which the minister is referring, but I would ask him to consider—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the subject is being overworked.

MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH SOVIET OFFICIALS ON QUESTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence: it is concerned with human rights. Last Wednesday evening, the Estonian Central Council, the Latvian National Federation in Canada, and the Lithuanian community met in Ottawa for the Balkan evening. Since the Minister of National Defence addressed this group, I wish to ask him—because some Estonian immigrants have settled in my constituency—in view of the desire of these people to establish free democratic governments in their homelands, whether during his recent trip to the Soviet Union the minister raised the question of freeing the Balkan states and permitting them to hold free, democratic elections with all political parties participating. Has he raised this question with the Soviets and, if so, what was their response?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not been to the Soviet Union recently, nor do I have any immediate intention of going. They are sending enough guests over here.

CHANGES IN PAROLE LAWS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It arises by virtue of the chairman of the Waterloo Police Commission stating that he is going to write to the Solicitor General to ask him to consider changes in our parole laws to prevent the recurrence of an incident in which the police spent something like $85,000 to prevent sexual offenders from repeating their offences. My question is—

An hon. Member: I can't hear a word you are saying because your colleague is making such a racket.

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Crouse: The minister misled this House when he said on Wednesday evening he has been in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crouse: Tell us the truth.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In spite of the allegation which the hon. member now makes, the minister gave a clear answer to the House. I am not under any impression that it could mislead the House in any way.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I will readdress my question to the Solicitor General. It arises by virtue of the report that the commissioner of the Waterloo Police Commission is writing to the Solicitor General with respect to changes to be considered in the parole laws to prevent the recurrence of an incident there on which the police spent something like $85,000 to prevent a sexual offender from repeating his offences. Is the Solicitor General now giving consideration to changes in the parole laws and regulations which might avoid recurrence of this type of situation and, if so, when will these changes be brought before parliament?

• (1202)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the letter from the Waterloo chief of police and I do not know about the event referred to. I will have to look at the record, see the letter and perhaps provide some additional information to the honourable gentleman later.

AIR TRANSPORT

FIRST-CLASS SERVICE TO WESTERN MANITOBA AND EASTERN SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The hon. gentleman is aware of the promise made by the government four years ago to provide first-class air service to western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan. I would like to ask the minister if he is also aware that an application is now before the Air Transport Committee from Great Lakes Air Lines to provide jet service to this area at the earliest possible date, and would he use his good offices to get this service into operation as quickly as possible in 1978, as he promised he would during a visit to the Westman area last fall?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was aware that the application by Great Lakes was going forward. I would not, of course, want to comment on that application, which must first be dealt with by the Canadian Transport Commission which has been charged by parliament to determine whether any particular application is in the public interest.

At the same time, I should say that I am awaiting a decision by the commission on a number of other applications which have been before it and which would offer service under a variety of different forms to Brandon and the area of Yorkton and Dauphin, as well, in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. As soon as the CTC decision is made, I will be able to act and provide service if the CTC so recommends.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, can the hon. gentleman be optimistic and give us the encouragement that, after all these years, the service will be in operation in time for the winter games early in 1979? The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport is in Brandon today making a contribution of $750,000, so obviously the government regards this question as top priority.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am very optimistic that all the steps required to put the service in place can be completed well before the date of the winter games.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. JAMIESON—TABLING OF NOTES TO RUSSIA RESPECTING SATELLITE DEBRIS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not hear whether hon. members opposite wished me to table copies of the notes with regard to the Cosmos satellite.

Mr. Speaker: I presume it is the desire of the House that the documents be tabled. With permission, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) could table the documents forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, you will recall that yesterday an arrangement was made for consultation among House leaders as to when the allotted day scheduled for yesterday would be rescheduled. I understand that it has been arranged to have that allotted day scheduled for Monday, which is the only time it could be reasonably scheduled, that there will be a vote, and that the order will be the matter raised in the name of the Leader of the New Democratic Party on the status of women and the government's failure with respect thereto, which latter is well known throughout the country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was rising on the same subject. There were discussions yesterday, and I believe it is agreed that the allotted day we were to have had yesterday will be re-scheduled for Monday. It is true that if the deputy government House leader will designate Monday as an allotted day the motion which was filed yesterday will be filed again in the name of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. It does concern the status of women, and we shall be asking for a vote at 9.45 Monday evening.

While I am on my feet, I believe it is also understood that Tuesday will be an opposition day. I believe it is the official opposition which will have the day. However, if that is the case, both Monday and Tuesday need to be designated.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I agree that there has been an accommodation reached with respect to the designation of Monday as an opposition day to replace the one which was set aside yesterday. I gather it will be assigned to the New Democratic Party. As I indicated yesterday in the House of Commons, Tuesday will also be designated as an opposition day, and I gather it will be assigned to the official opposition.

Mr. Speaker: That designation having taken place is it agreed that Monday will be an allotted day, that the motion will be the subject matter which was to have been raised yesterday, that that will lead to a vote at 9.45, and that Tuesday will also be designated an allotted day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: So ordered.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MUIR—PROCEEDINGS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, earlier today you very graciously and kindly allowed me to pose a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). I received what I thought was quite a reasonable answer. I then pursued my question further with the minister in charge of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, who replied but did not say whether he was prepared to meet with the union concerned. I do not question Your Honour's wisdom, but in your wisdom you did not allow me a further supplementary, as you do many others in this House.

I just want the record to show that in my almost 21 years here I have not abused the rules of this House. The Chair can check that with its advisers. I speak on behalf of my people. When problems occurred in Sudbury, we heard about them day after day, and rightly so, but we also have serious problems on Cape Breton Island. I want the record to show that I attempted to do what I could but was prevented from following up my question by Your Honour.

I wanted to see if the minister, who is a very cordial and usually co-operative minister, is able to meet with the United Mine Workers of America.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Muir: Canada does not stop at Montreal. There is a lot of country beyond Montreal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member will realize that the questions he put forward today took the form of representations.

Mr. Muir: No.

Mr. Speaker: The first question was whether the minister was prepared to have a meeting, and the hon. member asked a second question. Both of those questions in their very basic form were representations. I still let them go because I thought the hon. member was proceeding, with the best of motivations, to pursue a difficult problem in his own constitutency. I allowed both questions to go, and although they were in fact representations asking the minister to meet, they were both answered at some length, particularly by the minister responsible for DREE.

I thought it was a rather long and complete answer and that, in fairness, other hon. members ought to have a chance to put their grievances, particularly since I thought the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) made his position very clear and delivered a rather complete plea for help. I regret very much that the hon. member takes the view that he was unfairly treated, but he occupied almost ten minutes of the question period, and I thought that was very fair.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My rights are being abrogated by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raised this matter. I simply indicated my regret at his view. However, the matter is now closed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today : Nos. 130, 795, 822 and 1,210.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAMME

Question No. 130—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. Is the Canadian Home Insulation Programme (CHIP) available to residents in all the provinces and, if not, which provinces are excluded and for what reason?

2. In what city is CHIP Headquarters and in what constituency is it located?

3. Who is the Member of Parliament for the constituency?

4. What Minister is responsible for the CHIP Programme?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: 1. The Canadian Home Insulation Programme is available to the residents of all provinces and territories with the exception of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. A more generous programme has been in effect in these two provinces since February 1977, because they are highly dependent on imported oil for electricity generation and for home heating.

2. CHIP Headquarters are located in the Town of Mount Royal, in the Constituency of Mount Royal, in a building where CMHC has occupied space since January 1963 and where vacant space was available.

3. and 4. See Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Citation 171 (ff).

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND AND REPEAL CERTAIN STATUTES

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-17, to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I want to participate in this debate on Bill C-17 to comment briefly on some of the concerns I have about this CNR refinancing bill, in the context of our national rail transportation policy in general and the problems we encounter in many areas of Canada because we do not have a national transportation policy due to the lack of initiative of the Liberal government under the current Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who, over the past decade, I am afraid, has allowed the situation to go from bad to worse.

This bill is an attempt to recapitalize $808 million of the CNR debt which stands at approximately $2 billion. We support the concept of trying to reduce the debt of the CNR. We think it has to be brought on to a more equal footing with the CPR, and therefore we say this recapitalization is long overdue. As a Crown corporation the CNR has carried this burden for a number of years while competing on an unfair basis with the CPR.

It should not be forgotten that the CNR was formed when private railway companies went bankrupt. In 1919 the government of the day acknowledged that rail service was an essential service and that railways should not be allowed to fold up and leave communities stranded. The history of transportation and of other areas of endeavour in this country shows that the government stepped in to maintain an essential service and, in doing so, of course saddled itself with a huge debt and committed itself to paying off the private owners and shareholders in the company. As a result the CNR has been burdened with that debt over the years.

We should not forget that the government has helped the private railway company as well. I am sometimes amused at the distortion of history that we see in the advertising of private groups in this country. I think of the Insurance Bureau of Canada and, to some extent, of the CPR. They like to glorify private enterprise and imply that it developed this country all on its own. Anyone who reads Canadian economic history realizes, of course, that is only half the truth. There is a long tradition of government involvement in Canada through direct subsidy, taxation measures, and Crown corporations, which did what private capital and industry was unable or unwilling to do. We should remind ourselves that at the close of the 19th century the CPR received $25 billion in outright grants from the federal government and a grant of 25 million acres of land, a very handsome subsidy in those days.

When we talk of private and public transportation we should not forget the context in which both were developed. It was considered that transportation was a service very important to Canada. Although that concept has been accepted from time to time, I am afraid that under the present administration the idea of service taking precedence over strict profit is being diminished. That is regrettable and will only serve to exacerbate regional inequities and the friction that contributes to the problem of national unity.

In economic and geographic terms this country does not make sense. We have tried to combine various regions of North America on an east-west axis, when all lines of geography, communication and trade run on a north-south axis. We are going against the natural trend in trying to get an entity called "Canada" together by combining east and west. It is essential, therefore, that our transportation system be strong and vital in order to preserve the fragile unity that we hold to be Canada. It is important that we have a transportation policy that does not exacerbate the division between east and west but that helps bind the country together. Where this breaks down, of course, is in the way the government has designed transportation policy. It assumes that competition is essential to an efficient transportation system and that through competition prices will be reduced and more efficiency result to the benefit of the consumer.

Another key objective of competition is to maximize profits. We run into this dilemma when we try to apply the concept of free enterprise or maximum profits to a transportation system. If that is the primary goal, and a transportation system begins to lose money on a certain section of its operations, the logic of free enterprise and the idea of user-pay demand that service on the section that is losing money be reduced or disbanded. In an ordinary business operation, the consequences of such action are usually not too severe to the consumer, as another business will take up the slack. With transportation, however, another mode of transportation is not immediately available to the area affected. If you tear up a railway line you cannot assume that an efficient highway or air service will come in to move goods and people.

The dilemma is whether you leave regions and communities isolated or with reduced transportation service in order to balance the books or make a profit. If we followed that philosophy, which I hear again and again from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in his talk about user-pay and phasing out losing parts of a transportation system, then we would contribute to national disunity. It would exacerbate the problems of people in Atlantic Canada, in northern Ontario and in parts of western Canada.

Surely we should look at our transportation system as a means of bonding the country together, as a means of removing the inequalities faced in less developed regions or regions with less natural advantages than others. I know what it is like. I come from a relatively disadvantaged region of northern Ontario where we rely on resource based industries. We have to cope with a freight rate structure that discriminates against us and prevents us from becoming independent of mining and forestry as our sources of employment and business. We cannot get secondary industry into northern Ontario, as is the case in Atlantic Canada, because freight rates discriminate against the movement of manufactured goods from secondary industry.

Freight rates are designed to move raw materials cheaply to parts of southern Ontario or to the United States where they are manufactured and resold to us as finished goods. It is always cheaper to move that kind of bulk material in its raw or semi-processed form than it is to move manufactured goods to other parts of Canada. That, of course, means that so long as we have those discriminatory freight rates we will not solve the perennial problem of boom-bust economy or high unemployment in these regions of Canada which cannot attract secondary manufacturing industries.

That is a long-term problem which has never been solved by the government. It could be solved if this bill went further than it did. The bill should look at the totality of railway transportation and financing and bring about a rationalization of the system. If the bill brought about an amalgamation of the CNR and CPR into one publicly owned and directed Crown corporation so that we could end these persistent anomalies, the problems of freight rate discrimination which continue to give advantage to certain parts of the country and disadvantage to other parts could be solved.

The community of Sault Ste. Marie has the Algoma Steel Corporation. Steel is manufactured goods, and one would assume we could move it to any part of Canada and be able to compete in the market. However, we found that freight rates work in a reverse sense, even on some of our manufactured goods. Most recently we found that it is cheaper for the steel fabricators of British Columbia to use steel produced in Japan, transported across the Pacific Ocean and landed in British Columbia. That steel is moved more cheaply than by moving steel from Algoma along the railway system to British Columbia.

Indeed, Algoma Steel has experimented with putting the steel on ships moving it through the St. Lawrence seaway, via the Atlantic Ocean, the Panama canal, the Pacific Ocean and along the coast of British Columbia. This was an attempt to discover if this method is a less costly way of moving steel to the west coast than by putting in on flatcars and transporting it by rail. What a ridiculous situation, Mr. Speaker, that we are forced into that kind of long sea route in order to land goods on the west coast of Canada so as to compete with foreign steel. It points out the problem of rail transportation in this country.

We have heard from western members in this House of Commons as to how they can never get manufactured goods out to their part of the country cheaply, or indeed set up factories in the west and move goods to the east. That is certainly a problem that the refinancing of the CNR is not going to solve. I fault the government for not bringing in a more comprehensive transportation policy in this sense.

We have to look not only at freight and the movement of it but at the movement of people by a passenger service. Those of us who live in sparsely populated parts of Canada are worried about the changes that are being made by the government in rail transportation. We know the new transportation system called VIA Rail will soon be in effect. That has meant reducing parts of the transcontinental service on the CNR line through northern Ontario. Certainly the small communities that service that passenger train will feel the effects of its reduction in lay-offs of railway workers.

My community has felt the effects of the transport minister's attempt to cut back on his budget by cutting back on subsidies paid to the railways on their passenger rail service. The passenger service between Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury no longer exists because of the government's decision a year or so ago. Again we find ourselves discriminated against because of this irrational policy. We know rail passenger service has a good future in this country in terms of its energy efficiency as well as in its cost of moving people. Yet this government seems so preoccupied with air service, with tremendous capital investment going into airport expansion et cetera to the neglect of designing a fast and efficient rail service.

We see a similar kind of policy by the present government that discriminates against smaller communities as a result of cutbacks in its transportation budget. I think of the question I raised today with the Minister of Transport on the government's attempt to reduce the operation of the ship canal and the lock at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. We have been waiting for months now for the final decision of the government on whether it will spend money to improve and upgrade this lock. We can then continue to have our workers employed and continue to have the $1 million worth of revenue or more the lock generates and that is pumped into the economy of Sault Ste. Marie.

When I think of the new evidence we have before us of increased coal shipments from western Canada to Thunder Bay, and then via ship to the St. Lawrence Seaway, it would appear to me this is an argument not to let the Canadian lock continue to be degraded and to lose its commercial viability. Here we should be thinking of expanding and upgrading it and building a new superlock at Sault Ste. Marie to handle this increased tonnage which will result from the increased coal shipments through the St. Lawrence Seaway system.

All these factors point to a transportation system that is not developing on a rational basis. It seems to me that this bill only goes part way in trying to make the CNR more viable. I say we should have a comprehensive piece of legislation which looks at both railway systems and reorganizes and refinances them both.

We must maintain the principle that profit-taking alone cannot be the primary function of a transportation system that is by any sense national. We have to have the concept of service very high in our policy formulation, and I do not see that happening with the cutbacks and policies that this government and the minister are undertaking.

I am concerned about the Minister of Transport promoting the concept of user-pay. In the smaller areas we do not have the volume of use, either through the movement of freight or the passenger service, that can justify the service receiving enough revenue solely from those who use it. They will have to continue with subsidies to the various rail and other transportation systems in order that small communities which do not have the volume can still have that essential service in their daily lives.

Any movement toward a strict concept of making a system viable only on the concept of revenues generated from those who use it will surely exacerbate the problem in the various regions of Canada. I am concerned too that part of the thinking by the minister in moving this bill was shown in his statement that at times we should sell off the more profitable parts of the CNR to private industry. He implied that once we make certain sections profitable the government should not be concerned with managing and operating those sections. They would then be attractive to private investors and we should sell off parts of our Crown corporation to them. If we move in that direction, we will be in the predicament I mentioned at the beginning of my speech.

If private operators buy the profitable parts of CN, their way of thinking and primary policy will be that their operation must always make a profit. If there are times when that operation begins to lose money, the private operator, working on the principles of free enterprise, and I do not fault him because only logically can he come to this conclusion, will reduce parts of that service in order to make a profit. That will mean certain areas of the country will be disadvantaged.

The history of transportation in this country has shown that we have to keep the concept of service on an equal footing with the concept of sound business operations in an attempt to have a most efficient and, where possible, profitable operation. Therefore I have to conclude that only by maintaining public control over our transportation system can we guarantee for all Canadians, no matter where they live, that the concept of essential service will be maintained.

In a sense, the bill is a bit of a move in the right direction in trying to reduce the burden of debt that the CNR is facing. However, I worry about what this means for the future in terms of over-all transportation plans of this government and this minister. As I stated before, my fear is that we will end up with a transportation system that does not bind our country together, providing equality of service and opportunity, but one that gives advantages to certain parts of the country because they are more blessed with markets and resources than other parts. No government worth its salt can move in that direction if it is serious about national unity and developing a sound economy.

With those reservations, we will support the bill, but we will be watching very carefully and be very critical of the minister if he moves in the direction of reducing service and privatizing parts of this very important Crown corporation.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to make some comments on this bill at the second reading stage. First I want to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) for bringing this bill before the House. It is not very voluminous but indeed it will have far-reaching consequences for the whole country. I think everybody had been expecting such a bill for a long time; we have been expecting it for many years, and I figure it is a good start towards a reorganization of our rail services throughout Canada. Also I want to say that unlike some of the previous speakers of the opposition, I will not begin my comments by saying that the government favours one province over another, or Montreal over Winnipeg, or Toronto over some other city in some other province. In my opinion, that is not the way to enter the debate, because if I speak favourably of the bill, I will do so talking about my region since it is the only one I know, just as people from western Canada do not know much about Quebec when telling us whether they are for or against the bill.

I will not say a word about other regions because I know people out west also have needs. They have to talk about their needs but not to the extent of running down or belittling certain needs in some other province they know nothing about. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I will limit my comments to my area and what the bill will mean for it. You can be sure that we support the bill wholeheartedly. This bill is entitled: "An Act to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof". In summary, Bill C-17 provides in Section 6:

> . . . would authorize the Governor in Council to cancel not more than eight hundred and eight million dollars of debt owned by the Company to the Crown, together with any interest falling due thereon after December 31st, 1977 . . .

And Section 7, I quote:

> . . . would provide for the surrender to the Company for cancellation of all four per cent preferred stock held by the Minister of Finance on December 31st, 1977.

And finally, and I quote:

> Section 9 would establish the authorized and issued capital stock of the National Company at six million common shares of no par value and provide for the value those shares are to have in the accounts of the Company.

In return, the CN shall pay the Receiver General of Canada a dividend of 20 per cent, which will leave it, finally, with 80 per cent to manage the company business. In short, Bill C-17 simply cancels the debt of the Canadian National with the government—capital and interest—roughly $20 billion, in order for the company to get back on an even keel.

Often the people are misled for lack of an explanation. Unfortunately, when a member puts pertinent questions trying to better enlighten the people, the government, through the minister responsible, often answers that it is a matter of internal administration for the Crown company and that it cannot give out the information requested. The people wonder, and rightly so, why the CN ends up in the red every year whereas CP reports net profits at the end of each fiscal year. Would it be easier to control the expenditures and the administration of a private company than those of a Crown corporation? Would it be that in a private company there are officials who have a financial interest to protect whereas in a Crown corporation there are no such people in fact and that the directors have just their salary to protect? But I shall not be that sadistic.

I owe explanations to the population, and the government should give these explanations it has in fact. We only have to check the CN balance sheet to see that the deficit of the administration would not be so high if it were not for the interests which take out a good part of its budget. The CN has in fact an operating surplus. But the CN has an old debt accrued over years, on which it pays interest which are too high. I see the reason for these loans in the fact that we force CN to maintain deficit producing lines in remote areas. I would even say that very often CN plays the part of a stop-gap. Where CP does not want to venture or withdraws because it is not as profitable as they expected, CN is ordered to go by the government. Therefore it is the government which is in fact responsible for this deficit. And to make things worse, the same government requires CN to pay interest on these loans instead of simply subsidizing it. There should be at least special supplementary assistance in non-profitable areas but, instead of that, CN has to borrow from the government and when it gets free assistance, CP takes equal advantage of this government assistance to transportation.

I think it is a kind of underhand protectionism towards CP. All this passes unnoticed. Both companies get subsidies as if both had the obligation to serve profitable as well as non-profitable areas. But if we look at our two railway systems, we realize that CN has to serve undeveloped and remote areas much more often than CP. We should beware of this in the new organization.

I also believe that over-centralization is one of the reasons for the CN deficit. I remember that when there was a minor breakdown on an engine, in my Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean area, it had to be sent to Montreal to be repaired, even if it meant just an hour, an hour and a half or two hours of work. Can you imagine that? The engine had to be sent to Montreal for repairs which meant 32, 36 or 40 hours before it was back. Then they put in servo-centres to follow the moves of coaches and know at every moment where each of them was.

It is all very well to sit in an office and admire the movement of railway cars, but what is important is that these cars can travel in all safety on the railroad. And for that, it is necessary to have adequate maintenance personnel, not people who sit in offices. This is of no use when it comes to repairing the railroads, Mr. Speaker. And there are now too many people in the offices and not enough on the lines. I believe that 50 per cent of all derailments which have caused losses amounting to millions of dollars in the last few years could have been avoided had there been maintenance teams on location and had there been enough employees to maintain the railroads. I hope that the new organization will create new maintenance sectors.

As concerns decentralization, I believe that we have just made a giant step by creating two separate organizations for the transport of goods and the transport of passengers. We are therefore very happy about the creation of VIA Rail and we have high expectations about this new agency, this new VIA Rail company as concerns quality and service. I hope that in all meetings and discussions, priority will be given to the quality of service instead of profitability. Those appointed are already at work.

I have been able to speak with a few of them and I can tell you that they seem quite prepared to provide adequate passenger service in our area of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean. If we have a modernized transportation network, well-maintained railways, orderly traffic, priority of passengers over freight and schedules acceptable for the majority of customers, you can be sure that the estimates of those now responsible will be met, that is doubling the number of users in two years. This is what the promoters now want to do.

I have assured them that they will be surprised if they do as they now plan because there are customers waiting for this service in our area. Our area has a population of more than 300,000, which means that there are many potential customers for an adequate service. I have always urged consultation with the local authorities, otherwise, the population of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean will lose interest. I am now certain that the dialogue will be helpful for the expansion of VIA Rail and to provide more adequate service to our population. Of course, we are satisfied with Bill C-17 and we would like it to be referred as soon as possible to the standing committee of the House so that it may be studied in depth and improved if required to provide better service and improved safety.

[English]

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on Bill C-17 today I will begin by pointing out that those ribbons of steel which run into northern Manitoba known as the CN rail lines are really the basis of the economic life and future of my part of the country. I think of the line which runs from the top of Lynn Lake to carry out iron ore and serve the communities along the route. I think, too, of the 500-mile line which runs from Le Pas to Churchill. The rail lines in northern Manitoba are just like milk to a baby. Without them our economic future would be bleak indeed.

I see that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is here. I know he is interested in the Port of Churchill and is following this discussion with interest. The bill before us was introduced in the House on December 19, 1977. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) urged the opposition to pass it immediately. Its effect will be to cancel, as of December 31, 1977, $808 million of debt owed by the CN to the government. According to the Minister of Transport this would give the company a capital structure appropriate to a mature corporation and provide it with a realistic debt-equity ratio.

After the recapitalization of 1952, the debt-equity ratio of the company was comparable to that of the Canadian Pacific. But since 1952 CN has been carrying a huge debt burden, though in different circumstances, CP rail has earned a profit every year and never missed a dividend.

This is the third time the CNR has come to parliament asking to be relieved of debt. The Prime Minister is asking us to pass quickly a bill which will erase CN's debt to the people, for the third time. That will put a service in the black which belongs in the red. How can the government expect taxpayers to refinance a transportation system which causes only frustration and hardship, which reorganizes attitudes and services to improve profit ratio, only to become more inefficient and inoperable?

In 1974 the transport committee promised CN $20 million for rebuilding the railway from Gillam to Churchill. When the Hudson Bay Railway was constructed, 80 pound steel was used, that is, 80 pounds per foot steel. What has been taking place over the past number of years is the upgrading of this rail line to 100 pound steel in order to enable trains to carry heavier carloads and so on.

The line which commences at Gillam, Manitoba, has now been upgraded as far as the Herchmer subdivision. The balance of that rail for 200 miles is 80 pound steel, which is causing a real problem with the movement of grain, especially to the Port of Churchill. This is because of the 100 ton hopper cars which are being used. In spite of the rail facilities into Churchill, fortunately last year during the grain shipping season there were very, very few accidents on this particular part of the line. I give a lot of credit to the running crews who have a dedication and responsibility to get grain to Churchill. They attempted to set an all-time record of some 30 million bushels. This was not quite achieved for the simple reason that two of the last ships, which were to haul grain out of Churchill, did not arrive. They were diverted to Montreal.

The rail was to be upgraded to the tune of $20 million. It was to be completed by 1978. Due to a problem as to jurisdiction or classification of the remaining mileage which required upgrading, the entire plan fell by the wayside. On that same piece between Gillam and Churchill, there is no passing track in that 173 miles. That means trains leaving Churchill and heading back into Gillam must complete the run before they meet another loaded train which is going to Churchill. It is important for the lifeblood of the north, Churchill, and that entire 510 miles of line that this last portion be upgraded to 100 pound steel in order to eliminate the possibility of severe spills because of light rail; and also in order to be able to accommodate the 100 ton hopper cars which are now being used for the transportation of grain.

In 1978 northerners are still not sure whether this portion of track will be upgraded. There could be something in the estimates at this particular time, but I have not seen any indication that the line will be upgraded to accommodate the new aluminum hopper cars which will be replacing CN's fleet that is presently handling grain. If the track is not upgraded in order to handle hopper cars, then the entire mechanism of hopper car dumping at the Port of Churchill will be thrown out. The present system was designed for dumping boxcars. By 1986 boxcars will no longer be used, and only hopper cars will be used to transport grain.

This should be a priority of CN. The remaining 173 miles should be upgraded. Actually, it is closer to 180 miles of track between Gillam and Churchill. It is a case of trying to sort out the priorities of the government as to which project should be carried out. When one looks at the potential of this 510 miles of railway to northern Manitoba and many parts of Saskatchewan, where the grain is produced which is shipped through the Port of Churchill, then one realizes it must be a priority. I hope the government will make an announcement. It would be a good area to be included in an election campaign, that is, the completion of that 180 miles of rail with 100 pound steel. It would not gain the Minister of Transport any votes, but certainly it would assist the economy of that particular area. Since the Minister of Transport comes from Saskatchewan, I am sure he will be interested in satisfying some of the grain producers who ship through Port Churchill by upgrading the track.

The Hall Commission report recommended very strongly that the government immediately upgrade the 180 miles of track in the Herchmer subdivision north of Gillam. Also it was recommended that it be designated development, rather than a grain dependent line. This is where the problem arose: the interpretation of development or grain dependent line. This is where the problem still lies. As far as I know, it still has not been ratified.

Originally CN assumed this line would be eligible for federal subsidies. They had already invested $6 million in upgrading some parts of the line. Some 85 per cent of the traffic on this particular line is for the Port of Churchill in line with the grain handling, yet CN cannot justify a further expenditure of $15 million which is necessary for the completion of the line. I cannot understand the rationale here.

May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Just prior to one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the upgrading of the rail line between Gillam and Churchill from 80 pound to 100 pound steel. Considering the investment the CNR and the government have made in respect of the railway, the town and the port of Churchill, it seems to me that to stop now when a total of two thirds of the job is completed just does not wash. I cannot understand how the government can justify spending that large amount of money to upgrade certain portions and then, all of a sudden, stop the project because of a change in policy or a change in heart.

What does this upgrading of the railway facility really mean to the port of Churchill? I suggest it means the life or death of that port, and I would ask the government to give very serious consideration to putting up the money to finish this upgrading process, because Churchill is a viable grain handling port and, in fact, has the most efficient grain handling operation in Canada. That has been clearly spelled out.

Let me point out that the government, in its wisdom and planning, has just spent something like $50 million to redevelop the town of Churchill, including an $11 million expenditure on a recreation complex. No one is really arguing about whether this upgrading is essential, but at the present time, due to government cutbacks in Churchill, with a reduction in the number of people working for the National Research Council and the CBC, following its pull-out, Churchill is now left with a total population of about 1,500 people. They can no longer afford the upkeep on an $11 million recreation complex.

The CNR has refused to commit the final expenditure on the line between Gillam and Churchill because it does not appear profitable to them, and the reason is that the government will not give a decision to CNR on what the future of the port of Churchill will be. Of course this jeopardizes everyone's livelihood and leaves people in the area with a feeling of exasperation and helplessness, not really knowing what their future will be. They thought there was a future there when they saw the line upgraded, when they saw the community redevelopment program and $50 million spent there. That gave them some hope that there was a future, but unless that line is upgraded there will be absolutely no future.

I want to get into another area regarding cutbacks and what has happened in the CNR. Perhaps what I will talk about should be classified as cutbacks, but let me comment on how the redevelopment or the reorganization of the CNR has affected northern Manitoba and the Churchill constituency.

At one time northern Manitoba produced some of the best fresh fish in Canada. This included whitefish, pickerel, and jackfish. At that time all fish were shipped out on CN rail. What we have seen taking place over the past couple of years has put this industry in jeopardy, and all because of increased freight rates. The communities out there do not have an opportunity to transport their goods by any means other than by rail. They are totally dependent on the railway. There are no roads leading to them and only the odd one has a small airstrip which it can use for emergency services. So what has happened?

Some 250 to 300 fishermen are now out of work for the simple reason that they can no longer afford to ship their fish by rail. It seems to me that the railway is bound and determined, I suppose following the minister's user-pay concept, to stop serving them. However, there are certain circumstances in which it is the obligation of a corporation such as the CNR to provide service to areas requiring it. Therefore they should be providing this service to the communities.

I should like to give you some examples. In 1974, continental whitefish sold for 24 cents a pound, or maybe in some cases a cent or two less. At that time the freight rate from Ilford, Manitoba, to Winnipeg was 11.33 cents a pound. This left the fishermen 12.67 cents a pound for themselves. On January 20, 1975, the fish was still selling on the market for 24 cents a pound. This was the Fresh Water Fish Marketing Corporation in Winnipeg. But freight rates jumped to 12.18 cents a pound for the same fish. On May 5 of the same year, with prices unchanged, the freight rate has increased to 14.3 cents a pound. This left the fishermen 9.7 cents a pound, an amount which made it virtually impossible for them to meet their commitments. But until that time at least, the CNR would transport the fish, even though the fishermen could no longer afford to transport the fish.

At today's fish prices and with the increased cost of transportation, northern commercial fishermen are hard pressed even to pay for their food bills, let alone to pay for their equipment. We must realize that the railway provides the only link that many of these communities have with the outside world, and when the Hudson Bay Railway built the railway—it was completed to Churchill in 1931—someone had a concept regarding the development of the economy in the area and serving the small communities that had sprung up because of the railway.

What we have seen happening in the fishing industry is an increase in prices, so the fishermen got together and started to ship larger shipments of fish, in that way achieving a more reasonable rate for the shipments, carload lots, and so on. Also, what fishermen had to do was to go to the province of Manitoba, which is now paying a freight subsidy in order to keep these fishermen working. When the freight subsidy was put into effect, fishermen could survive on the return they were getting after freight. But lo and behold, in 1977, the CNR, in their wisdom, tried to cut costs and services as much as they possibly could. This case was brought here to the floor of the House of Commons and to the minister, as well as in committee. What had taken place was that an arbitrary decision was made by someone—certainly not someone in northern Manitoba—that the railway would stop hauling fresh fish. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, how quickly this decision was put into place.

A fisherman at Arnaud, which is about mile 237 on the Hudson Bay Railway, had been out commercial fishing in the fall and had made some shipments of fish. He arrived at the track at 3.30 one morning to load his fish on to the train which comes from Churchill to the spot where he can put it on a truck and move it to Winnipeg by that means. However, he was at Arnaud where usually he is forced to load his fish on the train because there is no other means of transportation. This time when he arrived at the train at 3.30 in the morning—here is a man who is trying to make a living doing something he has done all his life—he was told by the conductor, "I am sorry, we have been issued orders now that we are not to haul any more fish."

The train left and the fisherman was left standing on the side of the track with his 35 boxes of fresh fish. We all know that fresh fish must be kept fresh if it is to ever reach the consumer in an edible state. Can you imagine what that has done to the fisherman! We have the highest unemployment in northern Manitoba next to that in Newfoundland. This fellow was so dejected that he was ready to quit right there and go on welfare, collect unemployment insurance, or do something else. I am citing this one example but there are many, many other examples such as this. However, through efforts made in the House of Commons, talking to the minister and getting in touch with the regional people of the CNR, we were successful in getting that fish picked up by the next train two days later. This meant that the fish had to be held on ice for that length of time. However, the fisherman was able to complete his fishing season.

We thought that everything was in place and that the CNR would continue to transport fish. When I went to CNR officials and presented the problem to them, the answer that I received was, "We are sorry, we do not have any facilities or any equipment for hauling fish". I said, "Sirs, you have been hauling fish out of Manitoba since that rail line has existed, so don't give me that hogwash because it certainly does not wash with me." This is the attitude which seems to be taken every day now. When services are cut back, it is hoped that people will not say too much, but those ribbons of steel which go into northern Manitoba are the economic future not only of Manitoba but of much of the rest of Canada.

When we consider the extraction of Arctic gas and oil which is taking place we must bear in mind that these rail lines will be very important. Road construction in the north at today's prices and because of muskeg and permafrost costs about $1.5 million to $1.75 million per mile.

When I spoke about the 250 to 300 fishermen affected by the increase in freight rates and the refusal to handle fish, I did not mention other people who are put out of work. People on shore who handle fish, packers and others, are involved. Seven hundred people are actually affected just along that portion of track alone.

This is not the only cutback we have seen. Recently it was arbitrarily decided to discontinue the service at Pikwitoni, which is a small community of about 350 people. It was decided to take the agent out of that community. There are no banks there. The people there depend entirely on the CNR to send money orders out. Many of the people have their groceries brought in by the railway. With no agent there a person cannot buy a ticket to get on the train. There is no one there to receive any shipments, but a dear price is charged for shipments into that community whether those shipments contain oil for stoves, gas for boats, which are used for fishing, or groceries.

When the decision was made to close Pikwitoni, people argued desperately for the retention of the agent so that their goods could be received. However, in the wisdom of whoever it is who decides, the station was closed.

As recently as February, 1978, a decision was made by CNR not to close places like Ilford, Thicket Portage, Cranberry Portage and Sherridon. That decision was arrived at after some consultation with those communities. At first it was decided to close those stations, but then the CNR went to the various communities and held meetings. I want to compliment those communities because their mayors, councils and advisory committees met with officials from the CNR. They presented a good case and told the railway in no uncertain terms that those stations should remain intact and that the agents should remain at those stations, not only for the good of the communities but also for the simple reason that it would be a safety measure if trains would actually use the track. It is good for those communities to have someone to handle the goods being shipped in and out.

I would like to read some of the comments of the mayor of Thicket Portage when it was decided to withdraw these services from the community of Thicket Portage, as follows:

Dear Cec.,

We listened to your recent broadcast outlining the joys of having the CNR increase its grain shipments through the Port of Churchill . . .

I was referring then to the Hall Commission report.

In order to provide some goodies to northerners the CNR was saying it would increase grain shipments to Churchill. At least that is what the Hall Commission report said, but I do not know how we are going to get this government to act on some of the Hall Commission recommendations. In a statement not too long ago the Minister of Transport said he had still not determined whether the Port of Churchill is a viable operation.

The mayor of Thicket Portage went on in his letter to explain how discouraging it is for a community which is totally dependent on the railway. Thicket Portage is a community of some 400 people. It has started a market gardening project so that it can ship vegetables to other communities in the north. This is a first for Thicket Portage and a first for the north. The community did not know what to do with the goods it produced, because if there was no agent at the station, there would be no way to load goods onto trains. One shipment of potatoes was made. The shipment had to go only 55 miles, but that took two weeks. By the time the potatoes arrived they were sprouted and soft, but the full rate had to be paid. There was no discount.

The mayor also pointed out that when the CNR was first established in that part of the country, people became totally dependent on it. They have no other means of transportation. The mayor of Thicket Portage lives in the north. He and many other people have survived there for a number of years. They are trying desperately to find jobs. They are not satisfied with living on welfare and on Canada Works projects. They want to contribute to the tax base of this country. I for one can vouch that people in the north are able to work and want to work. I wish I had the time to read this whole letter from Mayor Bob McCleverty of Thicket Portage, because it is a masterpiece.

Circumstances similar to the ones I have just outlined jeopardize living in northern Manitoba. As I said before, the CNR is to blame for much of this because it does not appear that there is any consultation with the communities involved whatsoever. Arbitrary decisions are made and people become involved after the fact. It is about time the CNR and the government realized that we have more than polar bears in the constituency of Churchill. We also have many people who are very concerned Canadians and who want to contribute to Canadian society.

I would like to speak about a couple of fishermen at Pukatawagan. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you do not know just where that is, but it is about 99 miles north of the Pas on the way to Lynn Lake. The people of Pukatawagan must move from lake to lake on the CNR. They have no choice. In this particular case these fishermen loaded their two boats onto the train and were transported about 35 miles. The fishermen unloaded the two boats themselves. They received a bill from the CNR for $294, or 1.96 cents per pound. In the face of that how can people who depend on the railway and who have no other means of transportation possibly survive? They just give up in frustration. They wonder what is the sense of trying to do anything. Because of some new policy regarding cubic footage, if a person has a full carload he must pay on that basis. It does not matter whether you have one box of fish or fifty—you pay the same price. That is fine if you are gathering from a large area, but many of these fishermen gather from a very small area and this sort of thing is hard on them.

The mayor of Ilford, Manitoba, Mr. Kip Thompson, depends totally on the CNR, and if I had time to read some of his letters into the record I am sure they would bring this government down tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read them!

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Of course the government is coming down very shortly anyway. One way to make sure to get rid of them would be to put them all on a train to Churchill.

Ilford, Manitoba, is a centre for shipping goods to places like Oxford House, Split Lake or York Landing. What has happened over the years is that the CNR delivers the cars to a siding where the goods are unloaded and then transported inland. In the last two years whole carloads of goods have been lost on that 510-mile railway. Mr. Speaker, they do not run off the track into the bush. Many of the goods lost are perishables.

I should like the government to check on the demurrage charges and the claims along the Hudson Bay Railway because I am sure the amount paid out is astronomical. There does not seem to be the will to deliver a piece of equipment or a box of groceries intact—any more. It seems as if the CNR is doing everything in its power to discourage people from using it but, of course, where there is no other means of transportation, people have to use this line in order to get the goods through.

The Railway Transport Committee Order No. R-25988 reads in part as follows:

IN THE MATTER OF the application of the Canadian National Railways to discontinue their passenger-train service between Winnipeg, Thompson and Churchill, in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, comprising Train Numbers 90, 91, 92-94, and 93-95,

The next paragraph begins the same way and continues as follows:

... passenger-train service between Wabowden and Gillam and between Gillam and Churchill, in the Province of Manitoba, comprising Train Numbers 294 and 295,

It goes on in the next paragraph:

... between The Pas and Lynn Lake, in the Province of Manitoba, comprising Train Numbers 290 and 291, and

The next one reads:

... their passenger-train service between Flin Flon and Osborne Lake, in the Province of Manitoba, comprising Train Numbers 280 and 281,

What this amounts to is an application to discontinue the passenger service into northern Manitoba in total. Thank goodness the committee decided that the trains that ran between The Pas and Lynn Lake, The Pas and Churchill and also up to Osborne Lake, should not be discontinued. Even though the CN pointed out that they are running at a deficit, they are still providing an essential service. There is an obligation on the Crown corporation to provide these services even though they may be operating at a loss for the time being. Perhaps the present type of service is not the best one and we should be looking for a better and faster means of transportation such as dayliners and other things.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank you for giving me time to point out why I feel the bill should be discussed. I think people from all parts of the country should give their views on the recapitalization of the CNR.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, we have before us this afternoon Bill C-17 which has come to be known as the CNR bill. The main thrust of the bill is the removal of some $800 million of debt from the CNR. This does not eliminate the debt, however, because before the bill came down there was a long term debt of $2,238,000 of which there is $1,438,000 remaining.

The minister said in this House that this $800 million debt should be removed so that he will not have to come back to the House for regular assistance to the CNR. A number of years ago a debt was removed which was supposed to fix things so that the government would never have to come back to the House requesting assistance for the CNR, and over the years there has been a total tax relief of debt to the CNR of some $6.7 billion. I would not be too unhappy about that if we had a transportation system, especially in western Ontario and the Atlantic provinces, doing what is necessary to enhance transportation in this country. Instead, we find the CNR trying to follow the lead of its competitor, the CPR, which has become one of the biggest industries in Canada although not completely in the field of transportation. The CPR is widely and strongly assisted by the coffers of the federal government which, of course, means the taxpayers of Canada.

We had a prize example when the CN tried to build one of the biggest edifices in Canada, the CN Tower in Toronto. Large amounts of money were probably blown which really did not have anything at all to do with transportation in Canada. CN has other similar interests. It has tried to follow the CPR. But it is not really providing a rail service of transportation that we need in Canada. It should not be trying to follow the CPR. It should be out showing the CPR what transportation is all about. It should be an example for transportation in Canada. It should become the best. It should be doing all of the things necessary to become one of the top transportation companies in North America.

I have to say that I think CN management have fallen into the same trap that government bureaucrats do. They have become top heavy at the executive level. They have not really put out the effort which is necessary in the transportation field and that is vital to Canada. We have many transportation problems in western Canada. Whenever we have a first ministers' meeting it is one of the top items on the agenda as far as the western premiers and the premiers from the Atlantic provinces are concerned.

Last year I travelled with the transport committee into the Atlantic provinces. I was astounded to find the same problems exist in Atlantic Canada that exist in western Canada. The railways were charging what the traffic would bear. This is the way they use what we might call "the two ends of Canada". They charge whatever rates the traffic will bear, whatever they can get. There is neither rhyme nor reason to their transportation rates.

There is an obligation on the railways because of the large amounts of money which have been transferred from the taxpayers to the CNR and, of course, to the CPR over the years. They have an obligation to ensure that we have a good and proper transportation system in Canada.

I have a brief here that was written by the Canadian Transport Commission concerning the fruit industry of the Okanagan valley. Over the years the Okanagan valley has been under the gun from the transportation companies because they charged and they still charge what the traffic will bear. They do not begin to compete with their railway counterparts in the United States, bearing in mind that the fruit producer, the farmer, has to compete with the producer in the United States. Apples are allowed to enter Canada duty free. There is no tariff. We do not mind this sort of thing. It is only when we find ourselves being discriminated against as far as charges are concerned as well as some of the other related industry costs that we begin to wonder what is happening to us.

We have made many representations to the railways, and quite a few to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). We have made them to the Canadian Transport Commission. This is a fairly thick document but it does not really say too much about transportation. That, Mr. Speaker, is in my opinion what the CTC should be concerned about. They spend more time telling the fruit growers in the Okanagan valley what is wrong with them. They are not really researching to find out what is in effect wrong with the transportation companies, wrong with the rates, and wrong with the charges that we have imposed on us by the CNR and the CPR in freight rates. It was so frustrating to the fruit growers because of the difference in rates between the Canadian railways and the American railways that they have practically turned to truck transportation.

A few years ago I was heavily involved in that industry, and with the agreed charges on rail rates we had to consent to send 60 to 70 per cent of our produce over the railways to get a lower rate. What happened was the railways would not, did not, could not supply the cars. They did not hold up their end of the bargain. They were the ones who said, "If you want a lower rate we will have an agreed charge. You must agree to send most of your product through us". But they could not deliver the goods when it came right down to it. They did not have any intention to deliver. We had frustration after frustration. We saw our competitors' produce coming into western Canada and going into our export markets. We were not able to compete because the transportation facilities were not there.

When I look at the $6.7 billion which the taxpayers have transferred to the CNR over the years I wonder why they have not been able to deliver the goods and become a top transportation company in Canada. That is one example. There are many other examples in western Canada of exactly the same kind of treatment that industry producers and farm products have received. We can talk about them over and over again. A former minister of transport got up in this House and I was here when he did so, threw up his hands, and said that transportation in Canada is in a mess. He was right.

Mr. Woolliams: They sent him to the Senate.

Mr. Whittaker: My colleague from Calgary North says they sent him to the Senate. That is exactly what happened. That is exactly what he got for identifying the fact that transportation was in a mess. Then they brought in the big man from Saskatchewan to become the Minister of Transport. He is pretty good at covering up; however, we do not have a better transportation system. We are not getting better service. Nothing is any better than it was before, even though the Minister of Transport said the other day that the mess in transportation in Canada has been cleaned up.

I do not know who the minister is trying to fool. I do not know why he would try to kid the people of Canada unless it is because there will soon be an election.

Every time I fly into Vancouver I can see 22 vessels in the harbour waiting to be loaded with grain. It is great that we have these grain sales. Without them, our balance of trade deficit would be much greater. Our imports would be much greater. Grain is the one item that makes our agricultural exports look good. However, it is deplorable that the grain cannot be delivered to the harbour at Vancouver and that the ships must wait there. They must pay demurrage costs of up to $500 a day. Who pays that? It is the farmer of western Canada. This is only because the transportation companies cannot make their deliveries.

If the mess has been cleaned up, why did the Liberal premier of Nova Scotia say to the minister, "For God's sake, forget user pay", something the minister has been pushing very hard? He is transferring $800 million in debt from the CNR and then talking about user pay. Over the years this has involved $6.7 billion of the taxpayer's money. Instead of user pay, why not do what is necessary to deliver the wheat from the prairie provinces to the coast?

Why did the western premiers circumvent the Minister of Transport and call on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to implement the crucial provisions of the Hall report? Of course they were rebuffed by the Prime Minister.

The other day we heard what wonderful things the Liberal government is doing with the Hall report. Of 90 recommendations, it is going to implement five or six. The government is making a lot of the fact that it might accept five or six recommendations. Is it a coincidence that the western ministers of transport are meeting with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) rather than the present Minister of Transport? The Prime Minister could not give the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the transport portfolio because the present minister wanted to retain it. That hon. member walked across the floor from this party because he had been promised a cabinet post. He is now taking on part of the job of the Minister of Transport as well.

It is cheaper for Canadians to travel abroad than to travel within their own country. I can fly to London for less than it would cost me to fly from my home to Ottawa.

The Minister of Transport says that he has cleaned up the mess. Many areas are just as messy or even more messy than when the former minister of transport—

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Whittaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member allowing me to ask a question. It is important for me to ask whether the hon. member recognizes that he is referring to something of old when he refers to fares abroad being cheaper than fares in Canada. Today if one compares schedule fares to schedule fares, they are on a rough par. If he compares charter competition fares to charter competition fares, the rates in Canada are in fact the same as those abroad. That is an example of how we have cured a problem which previously existed.

The hon. member referred to the CNR and the capacity of the rail system, making critical comments about it. Does he recognize that just yesterday CN announced the completion of calculations for 1977, that it has carried more freight than ever before in its history and has made the highest profit, after payment of full interest on debt, since 1943? That is further evidence he might take note of in seeing how things have changed in the last few years.

Mr. Whittaker: I thank the hon. minister for his interruption. He wanted to ask me a question, but instead made two statements. He said that if you compare air fares, you will find they are about equal. He is talking about charter flights in Canada that have just been introduced. There would be no problem for me to get a charter flight out of Canada to almost anywhere in the world. However, it would be a big problem for me to get a charter flight in Canada between my home and Ottawa. The government is only trying to kid the people into believing that it is doing something.

The minister also stated that CNR is handling more traffic today than ever before. We heard the same statement last year in committee. Canada is bigger today, with more people and more things happening than ever before. The percentages are not that great. The transportation services that are required are not being provided. I would not be a bit surprised if the figures which were released included the truck traffic which has come about as a result of both CNR and CPR buying out trucking companies and taking over that traffic. So they don't really have to keep their rail lines going. Once they get into that area of activity the cost falls mainly on the provinces and the municipalities which supply and keep up the roads.

Today the railways are hauling large quantities of coal and other products of heavy industry. The lumber industry in western Canada has picked up considerably, another development which has been helpful to the railways. But any increase in activity which has taken place is in spite of the railways, not because of them. The situation with regard to the transportation of apples is typical. We can haul our produce out of Okanagan across the border into the United States, load it into U.S. cars for transportation east and still end up with a rate which is much better than that quoted by Canadian railways. Of course, it costs us more than our competitors have to pay because they are not obliged to spend money trucking produce across the line. The brief I have here tells us all about that situation. It also tells us what is wrong with the fruit industry; labour costs are too high, and so on. But it does not tell us why the rates charged by the CN and the CPR are so high.

That is what the CTC's job is. It is not to tell the fruit grower what is wrong with his industry. One of the reasons that fruit growers are finding it hard to compete is the much higher rate of transportation between western Canada and cities such as Toronto and Montreal. The Commission should get down to doing its job. The Commission should take its responsibilities more seriously, take charge of what is going on and stop cozying up to the railways. As we know, the minister brought in a bill last session having a bearing on this question of supervision. He withdrew it quickly, of course, after only a few speeches had been made on the subject; maybe too many people thought that if the minister were to take the responsibility into his own hands things would be even worse than they are now. As I see it, we need to strengthen the CTC and ensure that it does the job it is supposed to do. It is not the minister's job to become a kind of dictator in this area. If my proposal were followed, maybe we would get more sense and better service.

I had intended to say a few words about rail line abandonment even though it is not directly involved in the bill before us. When the CN and the CP abandon rail lines, as they are prone to do, the corridors, the rights of way, should revert to the Crown. I have put forward a private member's bill on this subject. When I use the term "revert to the Crown" I have in mind the federal Crown. That is really the only way in which I can present the case to this House because, after all, we are the federal parliament. But I would have no quarrel with the idea of the rights reverting to the provincial governments or to the municipalities concerned. When I first introduced this idea to the House—and I believe the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) would agree that I was the first to introduce it, whether he likes it or not—rights of way which had been abandoned went back to the railway companies, which meant, in effect, to one of their real estate subsidiaries; the CNR has one and Canadian Pacific has a big one. As soon as that happens, everybody had better look out.

Mr. Speaker, the corridors the railways are using today should not be closed, particularly in cities or areas where it would be very expensive to buy them back if and when the supply of fossil fuels comes to an end and we are obliged to place far better reliance on rail transportation. I do not know whether this will happen in my lifetime, probably not; but it may very well happen in the lifetime of my children or my grandchildren. Suppose the rail corridors through Penticton were sold. There would be just no way of getting them back at anything like reasonable cost. The railway companies do not care. They do not have a sense of responsibility any more, but the government will be back where it started so many years ago when it faced the responsibility of setting up communications from one end of the country to the other.

The Minister of Transport wants to make a deal with the municipalities and the provinces. I think he should warn them that if they sell off this property the responsibility for restoring it, should railway communications be needed again, should be theirs. The taxpayers of Canada as a whole should not be saddled with the cost. In my view it would be much better to make sure that these corridors are left open.

I realize it is the intention to forgive the CNR some $800 million more of its debt. I say to the management of the company and to the Minister of Transport: Get busy and live up to your responsibility, which is to provide good transportation. We need it desperately. We need much better service. If we have to have some shake-up in the CTC and in the management of the railways to get it, then let us do it. Let us get on with cleaning up the mess. Let us not try to kid people into thinking it is cleared up.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in joining the debate on the bill before us, I do so not only with a national interest in mind but also with the interest of my area, the riding of York-Simcoe, very much in mind. We have lived for some time with this question of our transportation problems, and the question of inadequate ministers in the portfolio of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in this decrepit government that we have in Canada. Perhaps there is no place where the inadequacy of this government shows more than with respect to its operation of Crown corporations.

Fundamentally what the government is proposing now is the third sequence of burying previous mistakes with respect to previous activities of Crown corporations. Most of us realize that the excuse given by the government for this refinancing and recapitalization bill is that the CN is carrying too heavy a load of debt in relation to its equity, if that can be believed; and if the CN is relieved of its burden of debt, somehow it will go on to even better and more profitable heights. In short, relieve them of their debt and they will do better. That seems to be the message of the government, if one believes its spokesman and if one reads what the bill proposes.

In the few brief moments I have at my disposal I should like to touch on how that debt occurred. What in fact has caused the ratio between debt and equity which the CN now complains about? How does that ratio compare to its main competitor, CP? Why does CP happen to have a better ratio between equity and debt? I will deal with these areas in more detail shortly. The short answer is that CP has been able to make better earnings and better profits. In turn, that has allowed CP to build up its equity, which of course means less debt and a better ratio between debt and equity.

Also I should like to touch on the point why a government directed Crown corporation has to run in the loss position which we have experienced in CN over so many years. What goes wrong? What goes wrong that operations under the direction of government are not able to remain viable or profitable? It is partly because in the government's mind there is never a bottom line to the operation of a Crown corporation. There is never any feeling that somehow that operation, if it is to run efficiently, probably should be showing a profit.

The basic ingredient found in most businesses in the private sector is that those who invest expect to make a profit on their investments. If they do not, they start asking where the inadequacies are. They demand changes and they get changes. In short order, if they are running substantial losses, they are bankrupt. The reason I refer to this is that we deal in government in a never-never land. The government of the day for political expediency, as has been followed by the Trudeau government so religiously, agrees to non-viable ventures or activities, realizing that money will be lost, but somehow having a vague feeling that the results will be buried in the over-all estimates for the cost of government doing business and that no one will feel the pinch. The hard fact is we all eventually feel the pinch.

[Mr. Whittaker.]

The pinch we are feeling was dramatically brought out during oral questions today. We asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) a very simple question. We asked him what he proposed to do to reverse the balance of payments deficit in this country, which has been running chronically in a deficit position since 1973. Also we ask him what he intends to do to reverse that position, which is causing our dollar to collapse on international markets and is causing us to borrow more and more funds that will have to be repaid, including interest, some day. The Minister of Finance did not have the slightest suggestion to give to the House as to how he proposed to correct that fundamental error. He could have suggested that he would start running some of our activities, such as the CN in a more efficient manner. He could have suggested making them more productive in order for them to deliver better service to their clientele, at the same time as saving Canadians a huge amount of outgo in loss.

It is very, very nice for the government of the day to represent that the write-off it is asking the Canadian public to digest is simply a write-off of previous years' losses, or depreciations which should have been declared in earlier years. Also it is nice of the government to indicate, if that is cleared away, that somehow the CN will do better. When it is indicated that the depreciation should have been written off in previous years, the other side of it is that the government, in tolerating that lack of proper accounting, deliberately distorted the balance sheets of the CN in order to show a better picture over those years. That is the truth. The government tolerated an accounting principle which allowed CN to look somewhat better than otherwise, because it did not want to accept the complication of the adverse deficit position which the CN would show if proper accounting had been applied. That is a classic public service move. It is classic in the sense that it helps for the political future to disguise the facts. If that had been done in the private sector, it would have been damned from on high by the government of the day.

For political expediency, the government chose to distort and falsify, from an accounting standpoint, the statements in order to make them look better; accumulate what we are now being asked to write off, and who knows the difference? Unfortunately one can play with figures and his accounting approaches, but someone has to end up paying. If it was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I would not feel so badly. Unfortunately it is not. He pays very little in taxes. The people who pay for the sheer, reckless, irresponsible mismanagement of this government are Canadian taxpayers. It is you, Mr. Speaker, I, and millions of others. Now we are being asked to agree to a new patchover in the case of CN.

Having spoken about that, I think no one should join in a debate touching upon the CN and the entire question of transportation without dealing generally with the whole question of the lack of proper commuter urban transit facilities in Canada. That brings me to what was one of the most colossal misrepresentations that any prime minister has ever come out with in the history of Canada. Of course, I am referring to the fact that our Prime Minister, in the midst of the 1974 election campaign, solemnly vowed to inaugurate a $290 million program to aid urban transit in Canada.

● (1522)

Many who at that time still trusted the Prime Minister accepted his word. I can only assume that some even voted for him because he had spoken so forcefully about assisting urban transit in this country. That trust has been breached. In Toronto on June 17, 1974 the Prime Minister said:

—the federal government will pay 100 per cent of the cost of new commuter vehicles manufactured in Canada and 50 per cent of the cost of new stations and platforms forming part of the system . . .

He also promised "a Liberal program which would pay 25 per cent of the capital costs of all vehicles purchased for public transit". Those were the promises and many people put their trust in what was being said. The Prime Minister assured us that these promises were not pie in the sky. However, we soon realized that the immediate past minister of finance, the former member for Rosedale of all places, knew different. He told a Toronto press club conference that the government, after having spent more than $110 million to date on the stillborn Pickering airport development, and after spending another $400 million on air transport related industries, has no money left to carry out its election promises that had been so solemnly given by the Prime Minister of this country.

To me this is a clear example of the mistaken priorities of this government, and this augurs poorly for the tens of thousands who commute in the Toronto area each day. In my own area alone nearly every major urban transit project is now in jeopardy following the broken promise of this Prime Minister and his little servant, the Minister of Transport.

I recite these things because I think the day has come in Canada when politicians must realize that such broken promises are unacceptable to the Canadian public and will no longer be tolerated. In my area in particular there has been great concern in respect of the activities of our rail transit facilities and the activities of the CNR, particularly in view of these broken promises of the Prime Minister.

I have received in the form of petitions and letters over 600 requests from constituents asking me to urge the government to reconsider its priorities and to honour its vital commitments to assist commuter interests in the Toronto area as well as in the York region and Simcoe county. I have the addresses and the names of these people who have written me recorded in the 600 petition forms, all available for delivery to Mr. Speaker on Monday. In short, we have 600 concerned Canadian voters who have indicated complete disdain for the broken promises of our Prime Minister and who intend to press their request for better commuter service in the Toronto area with all the means at their disposal. Let there be no doubt; between now and the next election, whenever it occurs, I intend to write each of those constituents bringing them up to date on the activities of this government with regard to commuter travel in the Toronto area.

Let me deal with another specific. The CNR, as most of us know, has a main line that runs from Toronto up through Maple, King City, Aurora, Newmarket, Bradford, Lefroy, Stroud and Barrie. This was one of the earliest established rail lines in what was then known as Upper Canada. At one time it was a busy passenger route for people going to and from Toronto. This line was used at one time by many passengers who lived in the area and worked somewhere in Toronto or immediately north of the city. Then through lack of foresight on the part of this government and the inefficient operation of the CNR, we found that systematically that passenger service was phased out of operation. Systematically the passenger services on that line were downgraded so that eventually there was no railway at all. The hard fact is that as a result of the dissatisfaction the people who live in that area and their rather vehement, if you like, demands, we did get the promise of a commuter train. When did we get it? We got it on the eve of the 1972 election.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) who then represented the riding of York-Simcoe, in an eleventh hour repentance, somehow got someone at the government level to state the CNR would run a trial run on the line I have referred to, beginning a few days after the election on October 30, 1972. It was very fortunate that the constituents of York-Simcoe were discerning enough to realize that this was nothing more than a ploy; that it was just a base, disreputable, political ploy on the part of the government of the day to help the sitting member who was having difficulty being re-elected in that riding. The fact was that the government did not get re-elected with the majority it anticipated and the sitting member was defeated. That is why I am here. They did start a trial run and found it was amazingly successful. The government then tried to kill it, but having a minority government it did not have the guts to do so in face of the protest of those who still lived in the constituency.

The reason I refer to this is that we are now hearing ugly rumours from the bowels of this decrepit government, that somehow it thinks it may now be politically acceptable to kill that commuter train which has been running from Toronto up to Barrie. What I want from this Minister of Transport before this bill is passed is an unqualified commitment that the government will reverse its plans to end that commuter service which now runs between Toronto and Barrie. There is no reason to discontinue that line. We know it is marginally profitable—even those at CN will tell you that privately—and the figures speak for themselves.

Nevertheless this line has been carrying ever increasing numbers of commuters to and from Toronto. For example, in 1976 the total number of passengers who rode that train was 128,884. In 1977 the number was 146,037, or a percentage increase of 13.3 per cent. Most significantly, we find that in January 1977 there were a total of 309 who travelled south on the train and 301 who came back on an average each day during the month. Those are daily figures. In January, 1978, the figures down to Toronto were 388 and up from Toronto 379, in each case an increase of over 25 per cent. What those figures show is that the commuter line is becoming more and more popular with rising energy costs. With the congestion on roads leading to Toronto, more and more people are starting to use the train service. I think this is not the time for the government to be considering the termination of that service, as has been rumoured.

What is unbelievable is that while the government quibbles about running that line, they have absolutely no quibble about the foolish idea of trying to establish a second airport at Toronto, namely, the aborted Pickering development which still lies in disarray to the east of my riding. Think, Mr. Speaker, of the money that they poured into that development, the good farm land that they destroyed by forcing out various farmers. Some $10 million has been devoted to purchasing land alone. The reason I emphasize this is that clearly we have a government whose priorities are completely out of whack.

Twenty years ago perhaps it made sense for them to be concentrating on aircraft and airport type development; but today technology has changed, people's thinking has changed and energy is becoming much more costly. We are in an era when commuter train travel should be particularly encouraged, not discouraged. The day has come when this government must be convinced to stop pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into white elephants such as Mirabel and other airport developments when those people who are going to and from work on a daily basis need better facilities to get them to and from work. That is the hard issue, and it is time that this cold, politically oriented government realized the facts. We do not need a Pickering airport in the Toronto area, we need better commuter transit facilities, and if this government will not give these to the Toronto area people, it is time that they were removed from power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I say that because I think it is absolutely intolerable that we have a government which has refused to pay for the expenditure needed to realign the rail lines in the western part of the marshalling yards near Union station in Toronto. They have refused to put up the $50 million that is needed to realign those rail lines, which of course is their responsibility, and as a result of that refusal they have frustrated the GO train development throughout the northwest and western part of Toronto.

I notice the presence here of the hon. member from Mississauga, the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott). If he were honest, he would take part in this debate and say there is considerable concern in his area, in his riding, regarding the inadequate commuter facilities to and from the western part of the Toronto area. Let there be no doubt that the reason for the lack of facilities—the Ontario government is willing to provide them and it has reserved the cash to pay for them—is that the federal government refuses to spend approximately $50 million for the realignment and development of the lines. Those are the facts. At the same time, the federal government is tolerating a loss on the virtually stillborn Mirabel airport project of over $50 million a year.

It is time that priorities were straightened out. Surely those who wish to get to and from work should be given a relatively high priority. At a time when we are trying to save energy and we are asking people to use smaller cars, we must enable them to use the railways and the rail cars which are available to get to and from work as opposed to frustrating them and even resisting the development of that type of commuter transit.

If hon. members read the history of CNR they will find that it is a classic example of a Crown corporation being said to be giving great service but in fact steadily downgrading the most meaningful service of all, in this case passenger service for the use of those who need it on a daily basis to get to and from work.

I know our time is limited, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to go through some of the quotations we have heard in the past of others speaking on behalf of the CNR who have said to the government: "If you will just relieve us of the debt we have run up, we will be better boys in the future. If we can somehow or other get away from the debt load, we will become profitable in the future".

Surely members of the House have every reason to start suspecting such statements. If there was any evidence—and I hope if the minister has it he can give it to the committee—which would show that if we can go along with this refinancing or recapitalization of CN, they will provide better commuter transit service in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Edmonton or Calgary, I would say let us get this bill through with virtually no debate—because we are doing something that the Canadian public need badly. What I am nervous about is that we will be asked to give another carte blanche and, if this bill goes through, allow them to sweep under the carpet the mistakes of previous years. Then when they have a nice clean book to work on they will be up to their old tricks of cutting down service, increasing their costs, and sticking the Canadian people with a never ending increase in their deficits.

Those are the facts. If this government was serious in trying to orient the CN to a more businesslike approach, why will they not let the private sector buy into the CN? Why will they not make available at least a portion of the CN stock to the private sector? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, why they will not do that. It is because Michael Pitfield, who sits at the right hand of the Prime Minister, says he does not like the idea; he does not think the private investor in this country should have a piece of any Crown corporation. His voice is much louder with the Prime Minister than that of our poor Minister of Transport. The fact is that we are being run not by a Cabinet but by an elite sitting around the emperor's quarters upstairs, and they have much more influence with the emperor, our Prime Minister, than any paltry minister, including the Minister of Transport.

In committee I hope to explore some of these items a little more fully and to have some questions answered with respect to the operation of CN. Also I would like clearer explanations why this depreciation item was run up in the first place and, secondly, why the CN thinks it can now be virtually dissolved simply by the rather convenient recapitalization to which they refer. But, above all, I want to get some hard evidence of what they intend to do for commuter travellers in our major Canadian centres, including the Toronto area.

I think it is time the government was called to task for, first of all, making the promises which the Prime Minister made in the 1974 campaign, and, secondly, for so ruthlessly ignoring those promises, knowing the plight of the many commuters in the Toronto area.

● (1542)

With regard to this plight, Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend an invitation to the Minister of Transport. If the minister is willing, I will ride with him on a commuter train into Toronto during the rush hour. I will watch him being jostled into a car. I will watch him standing for 20 to 30 minutes in a hot, crowded car going into Toronto in the morning and back at night, and I will see if he still has that little grin on his face which is like that of a Cheshire cat. The minister knows exactly the problems Torontonians are living with.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I certainly do not mind being jostled, but the idea of being jostled with the hon. member is a little too much.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I assure the minister that I do not want to jostle too closely with him either, so we can go on separate cars. It is nice for us to be in this lofty ivory tower atmosphere of parliament and it is nice for the minister to be surrounded by his great bureaucracy, but I wish he would get down to where the action is with the people who are earning the money to pay the taxes to keep this bureaucracy in its splendid condition both here and elsewhere.

I know my hon. colleague would like to participate so I will have more to say in the committee. I will have more to say at report stage and at third reading. I repeat, this government has much to answer for with respect to its handling of commuter transit in major Canadian cities.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lang) were jostling back and forth. The hon. member said he would like the minister to be jostled on a commuter train. I am sure my colleagues from Newfoundland join me in wishing we had a train in which to be jostled.

I am pleased to have a few minutes to discuss Bill C-17 and the refinancing of the CNR. I can relate to some of the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith). In many ways the northern part of Canada has the same problem we have in northern Newfoundland.

I would like to refer to something which was said by a former minister of transport, Senator Marchand. On March 17, 1974 he noted that transportation policy in Canada was based on the principle of competition. He stated that this principle was in part wrong for Canada because, if we looked at the size of the country and the distribution of its population, we could see that we cannot have a transportation network which is economic everywhere. For example, we cannot have an economic system of transport in the north or in those regions of the country which are thinly populated. We cannot have an economic system in regions which are remote from the centre. The former minister went on to say that the principle of competition can apply where there is competition, but it will not work in places where there is no competition.

Over the years my colleagues have made the plea in this House for a good transportation policy in Newfoundland. In a submission presented by a union to the Sullivan commission we find the following words:

> Transportation as is the case in all other regions of Canada is fundamental to that particular region's economic, social and cultural development. Railway systems in particular have shaped Canada.

I think the same thing applied when at the time of Confederation it was agreed that a great railway would span Canada from west to east in order to develop all parts of Canada and to take advantage of our resources. Section 31 of the terms of union back in 1949 stated the following:

> At the date of Union, or as soon thereafter as practicable, Canada will take over the following services and will as from that date of Union relieve the Province of Newfoundland of the public costs incurred in respect of each service taken over, namely,
> (a) the Newfoundland Railway, including steamship and other marine services;

Section 32 (1) states:

> Canada will maintain in accordance with the traffic offering a freight and passenger steamship service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, which on completion of a motor highway between Corner Brook and Port aux Basques, will include suitable provision for the carriage of motor vehicles.

Much history has taken place. Many studies and commissions have been carried out with regard to the transportation system in Newfoundland and in Canada. If we were to recycle all the paper used by those commissions and studies we would probably drive the paper mills out of business.

There are only a couple of points I want to make. The minister knows there is a need to upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway, if it can be called that, in the province of Newfoundland. Anyone who has driven over the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland knows it has deteriorated. The minister knows it needs upgrading. I do not criticize the minister when he indicates that for this purpose we are going to get only $25 million, but I do not think that is enough. I realize it is the responsibility of the province to put up the remainder, but we will never do it. I appreciate the fact that $30 million to $50 million has been spent on a highway to the Great Northern Peninsula so that advantage can be taken of the natural resources there, but that highway must be coincidental with the Trans-Canada Highway from Port aux Basques to Deer Lake, which starts in the Great Northern Peninsula.

I hope the minister and his colleagues in cabinet will recognize that if we want to take advantage of the natural resources we have and if we want to contribute to Canada as a whole, we must have an economic base, and part of that is a proper transportation system. There can be no justification for the present condition of the Trans-Canada Highway on the island of Newfoundland.

Mainland Canada, God bless it, has a Trans-Canada Highway and a rail system built to a higher level of performance than those in Newfoundland. We cannot accept a lower standard for the Trans-Canada Highway or for the rail system on the island of Newfoundland. The Trans-Canada Highway must be brought up to a standard which will permit the safe and efficient movement of private automobiles, trucks and buses for passenger movement. We need a standard to meet the requirement for the short and medium term for the movement of passengers.

The present road cruiser service does not come close to providing a satisfactory passenger service. I am sure that the only part of the Trans-Canada Highway in all Canada which is below standard is found in the province of Newfoundland. I think it can be said without any fear of doubt that the CNR, which is responsible for maintaining rail freight and express service, has now abandoned that service and is moving toward using rubber traffic. The increase in the use of rubber traffic in Newfoundland on the Trans-Canada Highway has increased by 424 per cent. The number of trucks using the highway has increased from 200 or 300 to 2,800 in just the last five years. I hope the minister recognizes that and that to contribute to Canadian society and the Canadian economy we must build up the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland.

Another problem which has arisen in my district concerns the coastal service. The city of Corner Brook has been the port and distribution point for goods and services going to the Great Northern Peninsula, the northern part of Newfoundland, and Labrador further north. Through some agreement made in 1968 or 1969, this service was to be abandoned in favour of a service between Blanc-Sablon in Labrador and St. Barbe. The subsidy provided is adequate and will give a much needed service across the Strait of Belle Isle, but we should not trade off that service for the greater service from Corner Brook up the Great Northern Peninsula and to Labrador. Now the wholesalers and sellers of goods and services in that area will have to use the Trans-Canada Highway to transport goods to Lewisporte and then transship them down the coast, which is more costly and inefficient.

I understand there is a commitment to get second reading of Bill C-17 and Bill C-7 through, Mr. Speaker. I am willing to go along with that and postpone my further remarks until report stage or third reading. I want to repeat that I hope the minister will consider very carefully these two vital needs of Newfoundland. The first is that there should be reconsideration of the amount of money necessary to upgrade and strenghten the Trans-Canada Highway for the future; and the second is that he consider the appeal to the water transportation commission from certain community leaders and businessmen about the coastal service from the west coast of Newfoundland which is so necessary to transport goods and services to northern Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to support the excellent remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). Perhaps I could pick up where he left off.

I realize that the three maritime provinces have just signed an agreement with the federal government on a 50-50 cost sharing basis for the upgrading of the Trans-Canada Highway. If the minister were honest about this, I think a special case could be made for Newfoundland receiving greater federal participation in the upgrading of the Trans-Canada Highway. He knows as well as I that CN has been downgrading and withdrawing its rail services in Newfoundland since 1968 when it withdrew the rail passenger service, notwithstanding the provisions clearly set out in the terms of union. That is another argument, however.

It can be argued, and perhaps one day will be, that what the federal government is doing with respect to railways in Newfoundland is illegal and unconstitutional. But they are doing it. They are phasing out rail service in the province of Newfoundland, rail service which was given to them in trust by the people of Newfoundland in 1949 to operate for them as part of the agreement of the terms of union. We lost the railway passenger service and we are losing the freight service. They have allowed the roadbed to deteriorate to the point that it is not economic to upgrade it.

The consequence of that is that more and more traffic is being diverted to the Trans-Canada Highway. More and more freight is being hauled across the province on the Trans-Canada Highway by CN trucks. This is causing rapid deterioration of the highway because it is being used to an extent that was never planned. It was never designed to carry that amount of freight.

It was an inadequate road at best because it was hastily built. We are grateful that it was built, of course, because it was the first road across the province, but it is in desperate need of upgrading. It pays the CN to divert traffic from the rail service to the Trans-Canada Highway because they do not have to pay a cent toward maintaining that highway, whereas they have to bear the total responsibility and cost of maintaining the rail roadbed.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think a case can be made for greater federal participation in the agreement to upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland. The province has held out for a 75-25 sharing agreement and I think this can be more than justified. We do not expect, certainly under this administration, to see any move toward upgrading the roadbed by making the necessary repairs, eliminating the curves and making it an efficient rail line. It has become an expensive proposition as a result of almost ten years of neglect and deterioration. The federal government should recognize it assumed an obligation by allowing CN to downgrade its rail service, both passenger and freight; by diverting freight to the Trans-Canada Highway it has assumed a responsibility toward the cost of maintaining that road.

My colleague has described the condition of the road. There are places in the province now where the road is virtually impassable. The province is on the verge of imposing strict load limits because the deterioration is so bad. We do not know what to expect this next spring but we can expect the road will be seriously undermined to the point that it may be necessary to halt traffic altogether in order to make necessary repairs.

That brings me to the next point, Mr. Speaker, the withdrawal of another essential service, CN marine. I see my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in the House. He has written about this, and so have I. Contrary to the spirit if not to the terms of union, we see in Newfoundland a withdrawal of the administrative branch of the CN marine service from Newfoundland to either Moncton or Halifax. The minister can deny this if he will but the facts speak for themselves.

Notwithstanding the fact that a royal commission was appointed by this government to examine all phases of CN operations in Newfoundland and the undertaking given at the time of setting up that royal commission—that no substantial decisions would be made affecting the service until the commission had completed its hearings, today the CN is withdrawing the administrative branch of its marine service to the mainland. When about 78 per cent of CN marine operations, either the coastal service or the ferry service, are in Newfoundland, it makes no sense to have the administration in Moncton which is not even a seaport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being four o'clock, pursuant to the order made Thursday—

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have not had any discussion or debate yet on Bill C-7, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. Yesterday the House leaders made some arrangement that they were going to have these two pieces of legislation dealt with by four o'clock today. I want to protest against the fact that they did not make any arrangement to assure some time was spent on Bill C-7, which is important enough to deserve some debate on second reading. I include our own House leader; I did say "House leaders". I do not think a bill like this should go through the House to committee without a speech from the government and at least one from the opposition. I want to put that on the record, Mr. Speaker. I think it is intolerable.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want it on the record that it was indeed up to members opposite, particularly members of the Conservative Party, to make sure that the time be fairly divided between the two bills. They had full control over the time allotted to both bills and I ask that the motion for second reading of Bills C-7 and C-17 be put immediately as ordered by the House yesterday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. That was precisely what the Chair was going to do.

[English]

In answering the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John's West, the Chair has no choice but to act according to an order passed yesterday by unanimous consent. Therefore it being four o'clock, and pursuant to an order made Thursday, March 2, 1978, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of Bill C-17 and Bill C-7.

The first question is a follows. Mr. Lang, seconded by Mr. Jamieson, moved that Bill C-17, an act to amend the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act and the Railway Act and to amend and repeal certain other statutes in consequence thereof, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

AMENDMENT TO VARIOUS SECTIONS

Hon. Otto E. Lang (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-7, to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to proceed to consideration of Bill C-227 and that all preceding bills be allowed to stand. But meanwhile the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has a point to make about two other bills on which there is unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you will find there have been discussions and an agreement, and my friend from Calgary North is part of the agreement, to take about one minute to finish the proceedings on two private bills that were reported from committee yesterday, Bills S-5 and S-6. One of them is in the name of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre and the other one in the name of the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Is there unanimous consent that we do proceed to Bill S-5 and bill S-6?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INVASION OF PRIVACY PROVISIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved that Bill C-227, to amend the Criminal Code (invasion of privacy), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for permitting this bill to come up at this time because it is very timely. Bill C-227 is a private member's bill to amend the Criminal Code in reference to the invasion of privacy. I will divide my argument into two parts. I will deal with the contents of this bill. However, before I do so I want to say this bill has to do with one of the most important questions in reference to civil rights before the Canadian people today.

I want to read from a book by John M. Carroll entitled "The Third Listener". When I refer to privacy I am talking about wiretapping, bugging or any other kind of form of electronic surveillance. This is what the writer says in his book which was written 10 years ago, and the situation is far worse today:

> Even when there's no great hurry, getting a court order is a bother, involving a showing of probable cause to believe that the wiretap or bug will produce information about a crime. And, although law enforcers will argue this point by the hour, the fact is that very few taps or bugs produce firm evidence or hot leads. For police officers to go to court time after time for wiretap permission and then never turn up any valuable wiretap permission is embarrassing after a while. It's far easier for them to pool their own money and buy their own private equipment, tap one suspicious phone after another without an order till they find a live one, then get the court order—

With a device the size of the emblem on my ring today one can wiretap at 200 feet or more an hour's conversation between parties. It is therefore with great pride that I move this bill today having to do with a very serious amendment to the Criminal Code.

In 1972 when we had a minority government it was men like Ron Atkey from the Toronto, St. Paul's riding, Gordon Fairweather, myself and others who pressed amendments to the Criminal Code with reference to privacy of the individual in Canada. Following that, as soon as this government gained a majority they repealed those sections and took away what I say has eroded the civil rights of people in this nation.

What does this bill do? It amends sections dealing with the question of electronic surveillance, wiretapping and bugging. It proposes six or seven factors. It outlaws all authorizations, all wiretapping and all types of electronic surveillance in reference to solicitors' telephone consultations with their clients.

I hear it said over and over again that if you have nothing to hide, what have you to worry about from a wiretap?

An hon. Member: That's right.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says that's right. I am sorry to hear him say that because the whole idea of confidentiality between solicitor and client is eroded. There are many cases in which this type of electronic surveillance has taken place. I will be quoting later in my address this afternoon very important lawyers, Queen's counsel in Toronto, the Advocacy Society of Ontario, Mr. Chapel and Mr. Cooper.

The whole of the law in reference to electronic surveillance as it pertains to voluntary statements made by any person regarding charges laid, alleged or proposed, goes out the window. In fact, telephones are no longer your friend in Canada, they are your fink. These important trial lawyers say that if you are going to interview your clients, it is safer to go into the park in Toronto or drive out to a farm field in the country. Because no longer can you do business over the telephone, one of the most important instruments for a lawyer and his client.

Mr. Woolliams: Let's be serious for a moment. This is a very serious subject. I do not mind being interrupted, but not with nonsense. Under the Canadian Bill of Rights and under the common law of this country, every person in Canada is entitled to a solicitor, even the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). I want to thank the Chair for agreeing to extra time. I pay a great compliment to the Chair for granting extra time on so important a subject.

This bill would also prevent the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) from issuing warrants authorizing wiretaps and, therefore, interceptions by way of warrants against candidates after the writ is issued calling for a federal election. Why do I emphasize that? Under the Protection of Privacy Act, the Official Secrets Act was amended.

The Solicitor General may issue a warrant authorizing the interception or issue of any communication if he is satisfied by the evidence or on oath that such and such may be true. But under what conditions? We are all candidates for one party of another. The act refers to "activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada". Good gracious I have been in eight elections, in two of which I advocated a change and we got it. Since then the Liberal party has been in power. Are we going to have a law in Canada that permits the Solicitor General to wiretap candidates' telephones because they advocate a change in government? I say to my friends across the way, what may work for them on one occasion will work against them on another. I say in this bill that we must have an amendment to protect political candidates seeking public office so that conversations between them and their supporters or those who may oppose them will be kept confidential. Surely that is the very art of electioneering.

Let me refer to section 6(2) of the Protection of Privacy Act as it pertains to the Official Secrets Act, and also section 6(3) of the Protection of Privacy Act as it pertains to the Official Secrets Act, which refers to activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere. Of late we have seen three solicitors general come and go. Words they utter on Wednesday, speaking metaphorically, with reference to electronic surveillance and wiretapping contradict information on Friday coming from people giving evidence under oath before commissions and from other sources.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated the RCMP would not have been able to conduct a proper investigation and obtain proper evidence and information with reference to Japanese terrorists if it had not been for opening mail. We have seen solicitors general come and go as quickly as I change my clothes. We have heard them say that members of parliament were not wiretapped, yet we find that even the former solicitor general was wiretapped. Electronic surveillance was used against him, and the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and we do not know how many others. As the book "The Third Listener" states, we will never know unless it comes out through a witness or a commission. You cannot pry the facts out of the government. Having seen three solicitors general come and go, I would say with that record, beware.

Fourth, this bill declares that all interceptions made illegally that is, by the bugging of telephones—which produce evidence of any kind will be inadmissible as evidence in any court of law against any person unless such interceptions are the result of legal authorization granted by a judge. The reason for raising this question is that the Supreme Court of Canada has set out that the following is the law. In their Lordships' opinion, the test to be applied in considering whether evidence is admissible is whether it is relevant to the matters in issue. If it is relevant, it is admissible and the court is not concerned with how the evidence was obtained.

That is the judgment of the highest court of our land, outside of parliament. In other words, the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that even if evidence is obtained surreptitiously, by plots, illegal wiretaps or the beating of prisoners, if it is relevant to the issue, it goes in. That is against all the fundamental rules governing jurisprudence and the common law that we have in Canada and, indeed, in the United Kingdom.

I repeat, the Supreme Court of Canada rule as the law stands today is that, even if the evidence is obtained surreptitiously, if it is relevant to the issue it is admissible as evidence. The court has stated that it does not matter how the evidence is obtained. I see some good lawyers across the way. We have a very good Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Some members of that committee are not lawyers, but it is a good committee. I do not think that any Canadian is prepared to accept that kind of law. On the other hand, many Canadians do not think about this unless they, or their son or daughter, are in trouble.

A few years ago I defended people getting three or four years for simple possession of marijuana. I was criticized in my constituency for doing that; I received a letter of criticism. Not long after, the very man who wrote to me said that his son had gotten in trouble as a result of a soft drug, marijuana, and was sentenced. The shoe was then on the other foot.

Time and again the courts have said that if the law goes too far, if we usurp the civil rights of the individual, it is up to parliament to correct the law. That is what I am recommending today, that parliament correct the law. It is not for the courts to interpret the law the way they wish it to be. When the law is weak, you do not require the order which the law calls for because you can get the evidence in through the back door. As the writer of this book says, you can buy wiretap equipment as small as the insignia on my ring. Then once you find something, you rush to the courthouse to get an order. Even worse, you do not need to obtain an order but can apply to get the evidence in. If it is relevant to the issue, in it goes. I think it is high time we changed that kind of law, which was brought in by people who maintain, as they have with respect to other matters, that they are the great foundation of the Civil Liberties Association.

Further, all evidence obtained as a result of the use of an electronic device, whether lawfully or unlawfully, must be destroyed within two years of the trial and appeals being completed. In other words, after the due process of law has been carried out, evidence obtained as a result of electronic surveillance must be destroyed.

We are building up in this era of technical know-how information banks, which mean that the whole privacy of individuals has been eroded. We shall soon be able to press a button and find out how many times people go to the washroom or how many times they have gone. The time has come to take a look at the law of privacy. I am not only seeking the support of members of my party but of members generally. I see some here today who have spoken out in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; I shall not name them because I do not want to leave any impression that I am criticizing people because they have different ideas. If we all think alike, there is no thinking.

I never could accept that if the Tories or Liberals happened to disagree among themselves on some issue there was something sinister about it. I do not always agree with my party and I do not expect the party will always agree with me. I think that is healthy. I am not a trained seal. This amendment is designed to protect a person who has been subject to interception, and anyone violating this rule would be subject to prosecution for an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years. I think we have to put some teeth into this thing.

The bill also restores to the Criminal Code the 90-day notice requirement. Notice must be given to any person who has been the object of electronic surveillance. Nevertheless, a judge is permitted to extend the 90-day period if evidence is produced that longer time is needed to look into offences such as syndicated crimes and conspiracies, especially in the field of drugs. I go along with that, but I say that in ordinary cases everyone who is the object of electronic surveillance should be notified after the event. And I go further. I say that if there is no legal authorization, then evidence should not be used; neither should evidence obtained as a result of listening in be used. In the absence of such protection, every day an ounce of freedom goes. There are only so many onces of freedom in this nation, freedom which is being eroded every day. We saw an instance this week in what took place with reference to the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Ha! Ha!

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says "Ha! Ha!". Well, I shall have something to say about that in a few minutes. I knew a donkey which used to "Ha! Ha!" too.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): He ended up practising the law.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, he may have done so. I have met donkeys in law practice and I have met donkeys in business. And I have seen donkeys over there, and I suggest that from the way you talk and heckle sometimes you don't get far off the track.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Takes one to know one!

Mr. Woolliams: Lord Sankey said in the Woolmington case in 1935:

> Throughout the web of the English Criminal law, one golden thread is always to be seen, that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the prisoner's guilt . . . the principle that the prosecution must prove the guilt of the prisoner is part of the common law of England and no attempt to whittle it down can be entertained.

This principle has been asserted time and time again by the courts of Canada. Therefore, any evidence which is obtained by plots, plans or lies, or secured surreptitiously, should not be admitted. The intention underlying this rule is to ensure that the evidence is true.

Let me remind the hon. member who interrupted me that I have served as counsel during many serious cases and I have found, through interrogation of officers, that sometimes confessions have been obtained which were subsequently shown to be untrue. Suspects had confessed rather than put up with interrogation. I have not time to give many examples, but here is one. A Canadian was being beat up in jail in Chicago and he confessed to the Henderson murder which had taken place five years earlier in Calgary and which was still unsolved. What happened? When the police checked the story they found the statement was not true.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: I shall try to be brief, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make one more point to show the House how this matter has got out of hand. I want to quote from Hansard of March 2, 1978, in which the hon. member for Leeds is reported as having said:

> I must mention another thing. I do not like to do this, but I think it is necessary. In that document there was included a statement by Superintendent Bentham of the RCMP in which he summarized a conversation he had with me a few days ago. It is quite true that I had a conversation with him. His statement was accurate with the exception of one point. I think this is a very serious interference with the privileges of Members of Parliament. I am paraphrasing again. Superintendent Bentham reported to the Solicitor General and his superiors that I asked him whether he was recording or bugging our conversation, and that he replied yes. I must tell the House that that is an absolute falsehood. I did ask him whether he was bugging or recording our conversation, and he replied "No". He said, "If you mean I am making notes of what you are saying, yes I am. Do you mind?" I said, "No, of course not."

Mr. Speaker, I have had police superintendents back down in similar circumstances under cross-examination. "Recording" is not "taking notes". That is no excuse for that misrepresentation. The report continues:

However, the report he handed to his superiors—which I saw with my own eyes because it was handed to me by the Solicitor General—said that Superintendent Bentham said that my telephone call and the words I was using were being recorded . . .

What manner of nonsense is that? Is it not time we had a law which says that that kind of misrepresentation, that kind of evidence, if it got into a courtroom, should be declared inadmissible? The hon. member for Leeds continued:

I questioned General Dare about this and he said it was just a matter of terminology. I think it is much more than just a matter of terminology. The main point I am trying to brin out is that I feel any Canadian has the right to legal advice.

He asked whether he was being recorded, and he was told he was not. Then he was told yes, by Dare. So the House can see what a frightening situation we are getting into. In fact, we are getting into a very unusual and poisonous climate in this country when these things can go on in reference to even a member of parliament and when we find they are almost condoned and accepted. If this matter should go beyond this great court, this parliament, I hope that any judge would declare such a statement inadmissible on the ground it had been obtained illegally. This was bugging—illegal bugging. No notice had been given, no authorization. There was a complete lie as to whether he was being bugged or not.

Therefore, with all the spirit I have and with all the intelligence at my command, I ask parliament to change the kind of law which is whittling away the privacy of Canadians every day. If the law is not serving the public, no one will have respect for it—and no one will obey it. The law is an ass.

● (1632)

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Will the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Will the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) permit a question from the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson)?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, my question relates to clause 2 of Bill C-227. In the instance where a lawyer is mixed up with the Mafia or any illegal organization, what would the hon. member for Calgary North do? We know that in Canada there is a handful of lawyers who work hand in hand with the Mafia and are part of the Mafia's planning process. For example, in West Germany a group of lawyers acted illegally with a group of terrorists. What would the hon. member do in that instance? How would he handle it?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would require proof that these lawyers or solicitors are part of the Mafia. Even the Mafia is entitled to a fair trial and counsel. Everyone is. If the hon. member has any information which indicates that a lawyer is a member of the Mafia and is breaking the law, he should report it to the Law Society of the area in which the lawyer is practicing, whether it be Quebec, Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia. That question is very easy to answer.

Regarding consultation between lawyers and clients, there must be confidentiality. Lawyers cannot operate any other way. That is a fundamental rule. It did not come in just because of someone's whim. It has been the rule for 400 years under the British system of jurisprudence.

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate because I am interested in the matter, as the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) realized during the sittings of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs last year. That committee was studying the Criminal Code amendments suggested by the government to clear up the Criminal Code provisions governing the protection of privacy and the use of wiretapping when its use is deemed to be necessary.

In any event in spite of my comments on his bill, I am convinced that the hon. member for Calgary North will not think that I am ill-intentioned. Indeed he is well aware of my own concern about those extraordinary investigation procedures when used indiscriminately. He remembers the very specific questions I had then put to the Minister of Justice concerning the use of those extraordinary investigation procedures and safeguards available to individuals involved once those means must be used.

Mr. Speaker, first we must understand why the government of Canada has considered it necessary to include in the Criminal Code provisions specifying circumstances and conditions when wiretapping or electronic surveillance may be used to fight the criminal elements of our society and particularly organized crime. Let us not forget that some years ago, there was no such provision in the Criminal Code. With the development of technology and particularly the increasingly elaborate devices at the disposal of criminal elements and particularly organized crime, it was essential that the government be able to fight the systematic erosion of our society by criminal elements through the use of similar devices just as elaborate, I admit, but necessary to help Canadian police forces to bring those criminals to court so that they be judged and sentenced to ensure a better protection of our society. This is the background of the inclusion of these provisions in the Criminal Code. Yet, after four years of implementation, we realized that criminals became more and more sophisticated in their attacks against our society and that the existing provisions of the Criminal Code no longer allowed our police forces to fight organized crime efficiently because of the extremely severe restrictions included in the legislation to protect the civil liberties of Canadians.

In all that wiretapping issue, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely essential that we try to balance as much as possible the protection of civil liberties and the possibility of giving our police forces the investigation tools needed to bring those very well organized criminals before the courts and convict them. This is the issue, the balance between the protection of civil liberties and on the other hand the war, I said "war", against organized criminals who are infiltrating our society to destroy it.

Mr. Speaker, we shall remember that the then minister of justice suggested to expand the scope of the legislation on the invasion of privacy, commonly referred to as the wiretapping law, in order to give the police forces of our country adequate means to fight organized crime. At the time, as recorded in Hansard, I had voiced the most serious reservations about those new possibilities provided to the police. I had expressed the wish that at second reading stage the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs could examine that question in depth and try to strike that desirable balance between the two elements I just mentioned.

With leave, Mr. Speaker, I will limit myself to purely legal considerations. I somewhat deplore that when discussing a rather technical bill—and I know the hon. member for Calgary North has an obvious interest in that question, and I respect him all the more for that interest and the way he has in the past upheld his ideas in that area—he added at the end of his remarks some considerations that in my opinion have absolutely no bearing on the bill before us today, particularly when he referred to the problems we have had this week in the House when the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) raised a question of privilege, on which has not yet been decided upon.

So, except for this comment which I think shows that the question raised by the hon. member for Leeds has nothing to do with this bill, which is of an extremely technical nature, I shall proceed to simply explain the impact one of the clauses of Bill C-227 would have on our legal proceedings and also on the investigation methods available to our police forces.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to section 178(16) of the Criminal Code as worded now, and to the amendments proposed in clause 3 of Bill C-227 concerning this section 178(16). Section 178(16) clearly specifies the cases in which a judge can or cannot accept evidence obtained directly or indirectly by the bugging of a private communication. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary North mentioned earlier the case law and the state of the law in common law as far as direct or indirect evidence obtained illegally is concerned. I respect him highly as a lawyer and a jurist and I wonder whether I misinterpreted his remarks, but he suggested that the present state of the law in common Law is that, as a rule, evidence obtained directly or indirectly by an illegal bugging device could not be admitted evidence.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is the opposite and that in 1972, when we introduced these provisions in the Criminal Code . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Would the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont allow the hon. member for Calgary North a question?

• (1642)

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to rise on a point of order, without intending to delay. I know the hon. member would not want me to misquote him. I quoted directly from Mr. Justice Martland's judgment. I said that anything which is relevant to the issue is admissible. I was applying that to the common law. What I did say was that to have another law would be contrary to the principles of the common law that governed. I am not saying that under the common law the evidence is not admissible. There is the distinction.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for these details concerning his intervention. I think it was important because he had given the House a different impression from what he has just explained. But Mr. Speaker, if I may, I want to come back to the matter I was discussing. In 1972, the government deviated from Common Law tradition by not allowing in wiretapping cases the submission of evidence obtained directly or indirectly through illegal wiretaps, and that was not in compliance with the Common Law at that time.

In 1977, the government did want to realign wiretapping practices with the Common Law tradition and once again I expressed very serious reservations at that time. And in the course of the debate within the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which lasted several weeks, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) explained why according to the Department of Justice and law enforcement agencies, it was important to return to the traditional rules of Common Law concerning evidence resulting directly or indirectly from illegal wiretapping. And that evidence was not subjected to legal voir dire, so that any judge could accept or reject such evidence in order that justice be done.

The reasons were quite simple Mr. Speaker, because those so-called voir dire instances during which the judge had to listen to illegal tapes on which the disputed information was recorded, would determine whether submitting, not the tape itself—because it cannot be accepted according to our present law when it is illegally obtained—but indirect evidence, that evidence was not allowed, would prevent doing justice and that therefore he would authorize at that time by law allowing that evidence, if he thought that justice could not be done if he did not accept it. Which caused absolutely unbelievable legal delays and slowed down the normal process of justice, and I am only quoting facts, I am not making a judgment on the point in question and the soundness or not of the allegations that were made at the time. In any case, that was the reason for wanting to come back to the common law as it existed. At the time I raised a point of great concern to me, namely that from the time a judge must admit as evidence evidence obtained directly or indirectly from an illegal wiretap, the wiretap itself becomes irrelevant in the trial if the Crown decides not to introduce it as evidence. Consequently this opened the door to extremely dangerous police abuses, potential abuses, I admit, but still abuses. And here I agree with the hon. member for Calgary North that it is extremely important to protect our society against potential abuses, abuses that I do not fear in the present context of our society but, once again, the law is often there for difficult cases, crisis situations, and who knows when a crisis situation occurs if we can really rely on the established institutions.

Well, I had said, Mr. Speaker, this matter of the relevance of the tap itself was the crucial point of that whole issue because, on the one hand, once again, we want criminals to be sentenced. We do not want a relevant piece of evidence to be ruled inadmissible in a trial on the pretence that it was obtained from an illegal tap or any other means not provided for in the law and consequently for criminals to be able to get away with it and justice not being done. That is not what we want. We want to protect civil liberties and know how to protect them and be quite certain that if that evidence is accepted and a criminal is convicted on the introduction of that evidence, that on the other hand the person who acted illegally in the exercise of his duties, the policeman, the RCMP or anyone else, will not be able to get away with it since in any case as a result the introduction—and here I come to the basic point—of a small provision—it is quite small but it is fundamental—under section 178 (16) of the Criminal Code as it now stands, an amendment that was introduced by the minister before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at my instigation, an amendment which reads as follows, and I quote:

> Notwithstanding subsection (1) (which provides for the cases of admissibility), the judge or magistrate presiding at any proceedings may refuse to admit evidence obtained directly or indirectly as a result of information acquired by interception of a private communication that is itself inadmissible as evidence where he is of the opinion that the admission thereof would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Here are four words which are absolutely fundamental to this debate. Why? Because they enable the court to call prosecution witnesses to the stand and to ask them: How did you obtain your evidence? Surveillance becomes relevant to the trial and I am convinced—and this may not be the opinion of other members—that we have inluded in the Criminal Code sufficient protection to prevent police forces or unscrupulous individuals from misusing the law and tainting our whole legal system. I know that this provision has not yet been tested before the Supreme Court and I am impatient for this to happen. For the moment however, what the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) seems to want is the guarantee that henceforth the institutions no longer be free to commit inadmissible abuses. If this is what he wants, Mr. Speaker, and I also want it, I believe the provision in section 178 (16), as it now stands in our Criminal Code, is sufficient assurance on this, because at the trial stage evidence that is illegal in itself remains pertinent. Therefore the judge, although he must allow indirect evidence, will be in a position to ask the Crown: Where did you get that evidence? So he can find out whether it has been obtained illegally or not. And through this, the policemen or other law-breaking person that will have willingly abused the law to tarnish our image of justice can be charged at a later hearing, so that improprer practices may be denounced.

Were it not for that provision, Mr. Speaker, I would be in total agreement with the hon. member for Calgary North. He will not doubt remember that at that time, I cross-examined the minister for more than two months on the implications of the original proposals that would have allowed a judge to accept either direct or indirect evidence from illegal wiretapping. He could never satisfy me on the issue of the pertinence of wiretapping as such, and this is why this provision was finally introduced to meet my own objections and concerns.

Mr. Speaker, I would conclude on this. There are many other things in the bill. It is an interesting legislation, because it deals with two things of concern to Canadians, namely the protection of basic freedoms and the fight against organized crime. I commend him for discussing this today, but I feel that the concerns be voiced while commenting on the bill do not justify the suggestion that the door is now open for police forces to do as they please. Because judicial protection remains, and I myself as a member of this House am confident that our courts can enforce the law while protecting our basic liberties.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this bill because, as my colleague the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said, it is a serious question. I also welcomed the contribution, as I always do, of the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). I do not always agree with him—I do not think that is always important—but I think the thoughtfulness behind his remarks is a good indication of how important it is that this be a subject matter which continues to be examined most appropriately in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Before I get to that, I want to make a remark on the intervention of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) because he put a very important question and I want to enlarge on it, if I may. I do not remember his exact words, but I think he referred to solicitors or barristers who may be acting hand in hand with the Mafia. I think we are on dangerous ground when we talk about that. I am sure my colleague would know that there are barristers of great integrity and ability who might attract a series of clients of this nature. But I dare say he is not accusing that type of barrister of being part of the Mafia operation, and that was not what I took from his remarks. I would point out to him that it is darned hard to tell the difference sometimes.

I do not think the parallel would be a good one, but I will relate to the hon. member what happened to me when I was a very new barrister. I had the fortune—I am not sure whether the ill fortune or the good fortune—of securing an acquittal on a sex perversion charge. The next 15 months I had every sexual assault, indecent assault, incest and rape case in my county, until some other young solicitor managed to secure an acquittal on a similar charge and, thank heavens, they all went to him. Perhaps the comparison is not a remarkably good one, but I would hate to think that because I attracted all these cases, I was acting hand in hand with that type of criminal.

Let me come to what I believe is the importance of this bill. I believe in its substance but, more important, I believe it is a vehicle in which the matter can become the subject matter of discussion in the appropriate forum, namely the standing committee.

Much has been said about how well and diligently that committee has operated. I will not repeat that because it is almost trite now, and anyway, that is the way a committee should operate. I do not think we have to brag about that, and I hope it will continue. But I want the bill before the committee for one very important reason—at least to me it is important—and it is very seldom that I use the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as the basis for my argument. Among other things, at his press conference yesterday he said he detected a cynicism, a skepticism or suspicion—I cannot remember the exact words he used and I do not know in what context he put it. Well, I detect the same cynicism, skepticism or suspicion. I do not want to be overly partisan about it, but if we look at the national security side, at least one reason for that cynicism is that assurances which were given—perhaps with complete integrity, I do not know; perhaps in all good faith, I do not know—had to be withdrawn, changed or modified. I take no partisan satisfaction in saying that and I am sure I felt for the various solicitors general much the same as did my colleagues opposite. It is a very serious thing when you are giving assurances to the House and the Canadian people about a matter of national security and then several days later you have to withdraw them.

With respect to this type of legislation, obviously it can lead to suspicion and cynicism. On the side of the Official Secrets Act, the reporting is very limited. We have all received the report days or weeks ago and we know it is one page long because those are the provisions. One may say, and I might agree, that you cannot have a full report on national security matters because it would not be secret; but I say that we have no assurance whatsoever—as a matter of fact, we have evidence to the contrary—on such matters as wiretapping or the Official Secrets Act, that even the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) knows of evidence to the contrary. No wonder people are suspicious.

On the criminal side, with respect to organized crime and such things, of course we have to fight sophisticated crime with sophisticated method. But there is a danger in thinking that a husband and wife taking bets in a cigar shop are part of organized crime. Only a vigilant, diligent study of the report that we receive annually will help. That report will have to be studied in committee. I am referring to the report required under the Criminal Code and the Protection of Privacy Act.

I commend this bill to the House as a good vehicle with which to put a serious and important matter before the proper forum, that forum being the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, in joining the debate on Bill C-227 I wish to say that the hon. member who sponsored the bill has done a service by bringing it forward because it gives us another opportunity to debate this important matter.

In the very short time available to me, I want to look at the bill from the point of view of a layman rather than a practitioner of the art, so to speak. The reservations expressed by those who are solicitors with regard to the present statutes are understandable when you listen to their arguments, but I do not think the majority of the Canadian people who happen not to be lawyers are particularly impressed by these arguments. Obviously if a lawyer is in the business of defending people in a court of law, he will use every avenue open to him.

WARREN HART—ACTION TAKEN VIS-À-VIS TAPE RECORDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. On February 27 last, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) told Michael Duffy, of the CBC, in an interview regarding the taping of the then solicitor general by Warren Hart:

The recording was made known to the handler after it was done and collective action was taken immediately at that time.

In response to Mr. Duffy's next question as to whether the handler received the tape, the Solicitor General said:

The tape was received and destroyed.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Solicitor General, on motions, in connection with the affair of Warren Hart, state the name of the handler to whom he referred, identify the collective action mentioned, reveal who authorized the destruction of the tape, when this was done, by whom, and where.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT URGED TO INITIATE COAL MINING OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the announcement made by the Cape Breton Development Corporation last week on the matter of changing operations at the Prince Mine which will mean, among other things, that some 1,000 applicants for jobs in the coal mines now listed with Devco from the New Waterford area will be affected, in view of the fact that there are still 1,600 applicants from the Glace Bay area, since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), in a recent meeting with the premiers, urged as part of the national energy policy that a new coal mine in the Donkin area of Cape Breton be started as soon as possible, and in view of the offshore coal drilling program which was begun but not completed last year in Cape Breton, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this government commence the construction part of the new Donkin mine by April of this year and, also, finish the offshore drilling program during the summer months in order to lay the basis for a secure coal operation in that area of Nova Scotia for at least another generation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate is possible, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN TERMINAL AT YORKTON, SASK.—EXPANSION OF PORT OF CHURCHILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The commissioned report of a consulting firm headed by Mr. Rod Bryden, to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), rejected an inland grain terminal for Yorkton, Saskatchewan and dismissed, as a consequence, any expansion of the port of Churchill. In view of the fact that this report flies in the face of recommendations of the Hall commission on grain handling and was prepared by a firm with a well known bias against improvement and expansion of grain handling and port facilities relating to the port of Churchill, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

● (1412)

That the minister be directed by this House to make a statement on motions at the next opportunity repudiating the conclusions of the Bryden report and to announce the retention of new consultants for the suggested Yorkton terminal in tune with western concerns.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent? Is there unanimous consent?

In view of the constant tourist deficit in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That the government demand the launching of a publicity campaign to promote tourism and encourage Canadians to travel and spend their holidays in Canada so that tourism becomes more thriving and profitable.

LOCATION OF URANIUM REFINERY IN NORTHERN ONTARIO TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering the recommendation of the federal Environmental Assessment panel on February 28 against the location of the proposed Eldorado Nuclear Limited uranium refinery for Ontario being located in Port Granby, southern Ontario, and the need for jobs in the Algoma district of northern Ontario where most of the uranium for Canada is mined, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House urges the government to direct Eldorado Nuclear to locate its new uranium refinery for Ontario in the Blind River-Elliot Lake area of northern Ontario where the plant is wanted, the jobs are needed and where the company should have planned to locate it in the first place.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUESTED REDUCTION IN PUBLIC SERVICE HIRING AND GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance: It relates to the most recent report of lay-offs reported by Canada employment centres. I should point out that they are reporting lay-offs only of 50 or more persons. They indicate that in the month of February this year, almost 13,000 Canadians were laid off, the great bulk of those in the province of Ontario which is supposed to be one of the healthy provinces in this confederation.

Given the fact that the Chrysler plant, which suffered some 6,800 of these lay-offs in Windsor, has reported that car sales in the first two months of this year are down 22 per cent, and given the large scale of lay-offs generally, I wonder if the Minister of Finance will not accept that these figures are an indication that the mild stimulus he presented in his mini-budget statement last fall has not worked and that there is need for more permanent stimulus. Will he now reconsider accepting the proposal of this party to bring in permanent tax cuts paid for by a freeze in public service hiring and other cuts in government spending?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is too early to come to the conclusion that the Leader of the Opposition is proposing in terms of what I would call a double-barrelled proposition to cut taxes by $2 billion and to cut expenditures by $2 billion. I would like to see a list of these expenditures cut. I have looked at that proposition and it does not match at all. He has put forward very few suggestions to that effect. I suggest that he speak to his almost-seatmate from Grenville-Carleton and explain to the people of Ottawa that 20,000 positions in the public service would be lost in the next three years in Ottawa alone.

CALL FOR BUDGET TO IMPROVE SITUATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, once again the Minister of Finance refuses to address himself to his responsibility of trying to generate jobs and growth in this economy. In the face of these new statistics which indicate at least another 13,000 Canadians out of work last year because of the policies of this government, it is very clear that it is far too late to simply sit back and do nothing.

Will the minister reconsider, and give us a clear commitment, now, that he will bring in a new budget quickly? If he will not accept my proposal, he should at least try to understand it instead of misrepresent it. Will the minister at least consider reducing the federal manufacturing sales tax as a means of specific stimulus to the Canadian manufacturing sector, where most of the lay-offs are occurring?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the reduction of sales tax, I discussed that proposition with the provinces in the fall. I urged the provinces to again look into that matter when we had our meeting in January. The provinces did not accept a cut in sales tax. One problem with cutting the federal sales tax is that we cannot be sure that the reduction in cost would be passed on to the consumer. That is why we decided on another type of incentive when we introduced our tax incentives last October 20. We have cut taxes in the Canadian economy to the tune of $2 billion since January 1, 1978.

Mr. Clark: The October tax incentive is gone: it obviously has not worked. The new figures indicate that, on the narrow reporting base, another 13,000 Canadians are out of work because of this government. If the minister will not act on a tax cut and reduce the federal sales tax, what does he propose to do to stop this continuing decline in the Canadian economy and give jobs to Canadians who have a right to expect jobs in an economy like ours?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the best thing we can do is to ensure that Canadian products are more competitive than before. It is evident that the policies we are following are working toward that end. We have increased our trade surplus in foreign trade by more than $2 billion, and the competitive position in Canada is improving every month. That is the way to bring back stability and prosperity in this land.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance continues to try to play hocus-pocus with the real figures of the Canadian economy. I ask the Minister of Finance, or any other minister competent to answer, why Canadian Manpower statistics which normally, up until this month, were reporting lay-offs of 20 or more, are now reporting only lay-offs of 50 or more, so that the aggregate figures will look smaller and the impact of creating unemployment by this government will look less.

Why has there been a change in the reporting base of the Canada employment centres across the country? Is it simply to hide from Canadians the reality of the harm being done to the Canadian economy by this government?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting. Is he now accusing Statistics Canada of not issuing statistics that are relevant to Canada whereas a few days ago, when I was not in total agreement with the statistics, he was urging me to accept them even before the possible revision? I for one am not sure if he is accusing Statistics Canada, but I think he would be very ill advised to do so. At any rate, I will ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to give further explanations to the Leader of the Opposition if possible.

[English]

REASON ONTARIO HAS SUFFERED HEAVY LAY-OFFS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Faced with the worst lay-off report ever published by Canada Manpower—this was referred to by my leader—and bearing in mind that 87 per cent of the lay-offs reported in February were in the province of Ontario, would the minister indicate, first, whether he was aware of the impact on Ontario of these lay-offs and, second, can he suggest to the House and the people of Canada any reason why Ontario, in particular, should have suffered such heavy lay-offs?

● (1422)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I have discussed the economic problems of Ontario many times with the Treasurer of Ontario. He will be disclosing his budget tomorrow, I believe, in his own House. We have tried to co-ordinate our economic policies, and following suggestions they have made to me, I have made a proposition to help the provinces to cut the sales tax in order to stimulate demand. But the other provinces have never accepted that proposition. Tomorrow we shall see what Mr. McKeough intends to propose specifically for Ontario. As far as present economic policies are concerned, we debated them with the ministers concerned and at the first ministers' conference and there was no pressure upon us to change them.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON TARIFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Speaking about co-ordination, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in his "Report from Parliament Hill" appearing in the Hanna Herald on February 15 of this year, stated:

It now seems that the European Community, the United States and Canada will strive for a 40 per cent cut in tariffs.

Would the minister indicate, in the context of the February lay-offs, if it is Canadian policy to cut tariffs by 40 per cent?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): We are presently engaged at Geneva in tariff negotiations with other nations to make sure that international trade increases rather than diminishes. At this moment we have not decided what the final position of the government will be. I think it is very important that all the nations of the world make sure that there is a better climate for trading in the world, across the board, so that everyone will benefit, as opposed to going to extreme protectionist policies. What we should like to know is whether the opposition parties have any position between the free trade sympathies of the west and the protectionism of Ontario.

IMPACT OF FOOD PRICES ON CPI

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. A few days ago, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated that the impact of food prices on the calculation of the consumer price index will be revised starting in early summer. He further stated that the food component, which presently accounts for about 28 per cent of the consumer price index, is likely to drop to 20 per cent. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House why the government has decided to mislead the public—I can only think of it in those terms—into believing a reduction in the cost of living will take place in the early summer by manipulating the consumer price index statistics in this obvious fashion?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the government's policy consists in giving orders to Statistics Canada. That organization of the Canadian government has been working in a scientific and very professional way for many years. Nobody but the organization itself decides which base is best for the establishment of statistics relating to Canada's economic performance and traditionally, the government has never intervened in these matters. When I was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I defended on many occasions in the House the integrity, the sincerity and the competence of Statistics Canada and if the organization is now bringing changes in this field, a matter I am not aware of, I am sure that it proceeds this way for reasons of a purely scientific nature.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: A number of countries, including the United States, use a variety of indexes to measure the cost of living. Will the minister not agree that the announced intention to change the statistical basis and reduce the weight of the food component, which has increased by more than 15 per cent in the last year, will likely have the effect of showing at least a decline in the rate of increase of the index, and that this change, particularly for pensioners and other low income people, could distort reality because these people spend a much higher proportion of their income on food than do upper income Canadians?

• (1427)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I explained earlier that it is up to Statistics Canada to make those judgments in terms of their conscience and of trying to find out exactly what are the components in increases in the price of food in Canada. It could be that they have decided, because of realities, that Canadians are spending less of their income on food; I do not know, and I do not want to pass judgment. I would rather let Statistics Canada—an institution with a great reputation for making professional and scientific decisions—make that judgment, rather than myself pass judgment on the quality of work Statistics Canada is doing not for the government but for Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that there have been studies on the possibility, for example, of a separate index for pensioners, as well as for other groups. The minister knows that the government can make a recommendation to Statistics Canada to publish a comparable, different set of figures showing what is really happening in the economy. Does the minister think that changing the procedures which are likely going to show a decline in the cost of living precisely at the time of the next election is a mere coincidence?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I know of no instruction from the government on that matter. It is up to Statistics Canada to prepare the statistics the way they think is the fairest way for the people of Canada to be informed. We do not give instructions to Statistics Canada. I do not know of any such instruction. If Statistics Canada is changing its procedures, I suppose it is because they have a good, professional reason for doing so.

LOANS FOR PURCHASE OF RENTAL HOUSING—INQUIRY WHETHER CMHC APPROVAL NECESSARY

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, to give the Minister of Finance a chance to catch his breath, I shall put my question to the Minister of National Revenue.

I apologize to the minister for not having had time to send him my question but it is rather special.

Keeping in mind that when a citizen borrows money to build rental housing units he is allowed to deduct from his income part of the interest on the loan, can the minister tell us whether such a loan has to go through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? And how can such a loan be refused which does not go through the corporation?

INQUIRY WHETHER LEGAL ACTION TAKEN AGAINST HON. MEMBER FOR LEEDS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. I know he is just filled with information today, and I want to see if I can find out what it is. First, has any charge been made, or information sworn to, against the hon. member for Leeds, or has one been prepared and is dependent on the events of today?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there has not been any charge laid and none has been prepared. I am awaiting with anticipation, as is the right hon. gentleman, the announcement that will be made by the hon. member at three o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am very happy to notice a change of attitude, on the part of the minister, from one of vengeance and vindictiveness. I should like to ask him a further question. If no charge has been laid or information prepared, on what basis and under what authority have the police been harassing the hon. member for Leeds and his wife during the last several days, following him here, there and everywhere? What is the basis for that action? What is the justification for it?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would indicate to the right hon. gentleman that if he looks at the record he will see that I have never exhibited any vindictiveness nor any vengeance. I say this simply to put the record straight. Second, I gave express directions to the security service, to the RCMP, not to carry out any surveillance of any nature on the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister now want the House and the country to believe that the police have been acting without the inspiration of the vindictiveness he has shown up to the present time?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, all I want the right hon. gentleman to know is that, indeed, if there has been the harassment which the hon. member alleges, I would ask him to provide me with any details or any information he has relating to that. I have every confidence that the RCMP have acted in accordance with my express directions and instructions.

● (1432)

An hon. Member: Yes, your directions.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, my express direction was that there be no surveillance of Mr. Cossitt, and I am sure they complied with that express direction.

REPORTED GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE OF SOVIET INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General and relates to a news story, with which I am sure he is familiar, which appeared in the Toronto Sun of yesterday, written by Mr. Robert MacDonald. I would ask the minister about the investigations that presumably are taking place into the sources which formed the basis of that story—the information and documentary material. Can the Solicitor General tell us at what stage the investigations are now and, if completed, what steps does he propose to take as a result of those investigations?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, without appearing to give any indication of any attention I may give to that reporter's story, I would ask the hon. gentleman to be more specific in terms of the story to which he is referring. There have been a number of stories over the weekend.

Mr. Jarvis: I will do that, Mr. Speaker. At least one part of that story contains the serious allegation that the cabinet committee on security, a committee chaired by the Prime Minister, was warned at least two years ago regarding Soviet intelligence activities in Canada, of much greater spying and subversive attack on Canada than ever before. Can the Solicitor General confirm or deny that, in fact, the cabinet committee was warned at least two years ago of the stepped-up attack by the Soviets against our country, and why was nothing done in the last two years about it?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen that particular story. I would like to review the facts the hon. gentleman maintains are alleged in the story. I would indicate, however, that after checking those facts there may be information contained in it that has been made available to me but which I cannot make available to the hon. gentleman.

ACTION TAKEN AGAINST VIOLATORS OF OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Attorney General of Canada about a case under the Official Secrets Act concerning which questions were asked in this House. It is the case of Alexander Peter True. According to information I have—and I attempted to get more from the special assistant to the deputy minister of justice before coming in here—a bench warrant was issued for the appearance of Alexander Peter True when he did not appear for sentencing pursuant to the case under the Official Secrets Act which was tried in Montreal last December. His Honour Judge Trudel allegedly put down February 24 for sentencing.

I understand from the special assistant in the office of the Minister of Justice that no such judgment or sentencing has ever taken place. I wonder whether the Attorney General of Canada, in view of the prominence of the Official Secrets Act and what appears to be strange handling and delay here, could give the House and the country any information about how this particular case under the Official Secrets Act is being handled?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, all I know at the present time is that the evidence has been put in both by the Crown and by the defence and that a decision on sentencing was reserved. Whether or not a bench warrant has been issued, I am not in possession of that information.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, could the Attorney General of Canada, in view of the fact that the Official Secrets Act is receiving such emphasis lately, indicate whether there are any special circumstances, negotiations or matters that are in any way out of the ordinary, about which the House and the country ought to know in order to explain, first of all, the issuance of a bench warrant and, secondly, what appears to be a very strange delay in carrying out what would appear to be an important sentence in an important case under the Official Secrets Act?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there are no special circumstances that my counsel has felt compelled to advise me of, but I will inquire into the facts in question.

ARMS SMUGGLED INTO CANADA BY CUBA—DIPLOMATIC ACTION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General: it relates to confirmation by him about recent allegations which include a specific charge that Cuban arms have been smuggled into Canada for the purpose of arming subversives in this country. Will the Solicitor General tell this House, now, why the government did not take diplomatic action in response to this very serious and hostile action by Cuba against our national security?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have never confirmed that fact.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LAYING OF CHARGES UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question supplementary to and along the lines of those asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot and the hon. member for Central Nova. Section 12 of the Official Secrets Act provides:

A prosecution for an offence under this act shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the Attorney General—

In light of the answer given the right hon. member for Prince Albert by the Solicitor General, has the Attorney General of Canada been approached to give his consent to the laying of any charges against any persons or any newspapers during the last ten days?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, no such request has been made of me and, obviously, no concurrence has been granted.

Mr. Woolliams: Let me go one step further. Under that act a charge may be laid without the consent of the Attorney General, but before any proceedings can be proceeded with he must give his consent. Has he given consent of any kind, shape or colour, in reference to charges already pending, consenting that they proceed under due process of law against newspapers, against persons or anything else?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker, and the normal practice is that those wishing to lay charges under the Official Secrets Act are to consult the law officers so that the charges, fiat or concurrence are issued at the same time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter and we have not really got the answer. Have the law officers of the Crown been consulted with reference to getting consent for the laying of any charges or proceeding with any charges that have already been laid? Will the minister answer "Yes" or "No"? Have they been consulted: let's have it?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect to the hon. member, I think I have been very full in my answers. He is asking whether I have been requested to concur in the laying of charges or whether I have concurred in the laying of charges, and the answer to both those questions is "No".

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO FACILITATE FAMILY REUNIFICATION

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Belgrade Conference on European Security and Co-operation is now drawing to a close, in view of Canada's vigorous efforts there for over five months in following up the principle of family reunification, and knowing the anxiety of many Canadians with members of their families in the Soviet Union and eastern European countries to have them come to Canada, does the minister have plans to follow up this matter with the foreign ministers of European nations so as to facilitate family visits and reunification in the spirit of the Helsinki Agreement?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, obviously there is a good deal of disappointment, not only on the part of Canada but of other western countries, that the meetings in Belgrade did not achieve more substantial results. Our aim had been to put family reunification virtually at the top of the list. We will now, as a result of what appears to be the failure of Belgrade to really come to grips with this question, continue to pursue our efforts with individual governments and also, of course, continue the monitoring process that has been established as a result of the Helsinki documents and to work through all the various means open to us in this regard.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

BEEF—REASON FOR PRICE SPREAD AS BETWEEN PRODUCER AND CONSUMER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am sure the minister is aware of the strike by cattle producers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. One reason for that strike, of course, is that cattle are selling at below the cost of production. In view of the fact that the latest CPI figures showed that the price of beef in this country had gone up by 33 per cent, January over January, while the price to the producer had gone up by only 19 per cent—and I assume his department has looked into the price spread—can the minister tell the House the reason for the tremendous price spread between the producer and the consumer?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the situation of the beef boycott in western Canada and are watching it carefully. We are pleased in the sense that it has only been scheduled for a two-week period. I will obtain further information with particular respect to the question the hon. member has just put to me.

Mr. Nystrom:: Mr. Speaker, my question really concerned the price spread. To give the minister an example, a 1,000-pound steer, this year over last year, netted the farmer an extra $80, while it sold to the consumer for an extra $180. I should like to ask the minister where that spread is going. Is it the intention of his department to investigate that price spread and perhaps even establish a commission to look into it?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in that price spread as well. I do not have that information in the briefing material I have on the beef boycott. I am extremely interested in knowing the reasons for the spread. I will find out and let the House know.

SMUGGLING OF CUBAN ARMS INTO CANADA—USE THEREOF BY SUBVERSIVES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Before putting it, may I remind him that soon after assuming the portfolio he now holds, I asked a series of questions in the House with respect to the infiltration of Indian organizations. I followed that up with a letter to him. At the time, he indicated that he would be replying to me. I am still waiting. My specific question with respect to Cuban arms is: Were arms illegally imported into Canada on Cuban vessels? If so, was it done with the knowledge and the participation of the Cuban government? To the knowledge of the government, were any of these weapons used by subversives in Canada for the purposes of disrupting our society?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, those are very, very specific questions indeed. As the hon. member well recognizes, the import of those questions is considerable in terms of our national security situation.

Miss MacDonald: Right on.

Mr. Blais: In view of the circumstances we are facing, evidently relating to the document or documents which are presently at issue, I hope the hon. member will accept my taking that question as notice and I will see if a response can be provided to him at a later time.

INQUIRY WHETHER MEMBER OF PRESS GALLERY AGENT OF KGB

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Solicitor General. I should like to indicate, in the most friendly fashion I can, that I am grossly unhappy with the non-answer of the minister to that question. Can he confirm that Alexander Palladin, Novosti press, a representative in the press gallery, is in fact a KGB agent? If so, is the government now taking action to expel this individual?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this is in the nature of the previous question which was asked. It refers directly to some of the allegations made by the hon. member for Leeds. I suggest at this time that I take the question as notice.

TRANSPORT

INLAND TERMINAL AT YORKTON, SASK.—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS REGARDING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport: it relates to a rather disturbing report of a study presented to him by a firm of consultants headed by Mr. Rod Bryden. This study was commissioned in response to a Hall commission recommendation concerning the construction of an inland terminal at Yorkton, Saskatchewan, to augment shipment of precleaned grain to the port of Churchill. The findings of the report fly in the face of the recommendations of the Hall commission. Has the minister received this report? Has he repudiated the essence of it and the recommendations, or will he subscribe to the report as presented by Mr. Bryden?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is completely wrong in his statement as to the conclusions of the report. It was a report into the question of the cost of developing either a single terminal elevator in the Yorkton area, or several in that region. It analyses those costs and indicates very significant costs indeed. That may be done either way, particularly if a large terminal is used as a feeder for the Churchill terminal which is available for only a very short season; therefore, the gathering of grain has to be concentrated in a short period.

That is what the report covered; it did not include the entire question, by any means. It was a necessary consultants' study about the complications of a terminal. It was prepared by the Bryden group, which had also been very much involved in the development of the feasibility studies for the Weyburn terminal and therefore had experience in that regard. Before any final conclusion can be drawn, we have to analyse the total rail handling costs from that area into Churchill, alternative methods of gathering grain for Churchill, and also the question of the advantage in Churchill to the Wheat Board of having grain for sale there. As I indicated to the 42 or so farm and prairie organizations with whom I met to discuss this matter a few months ago, there is no doubt further work will continue, and no conclusions have been reached at this point.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that this report came down on the side of no further expansion: it suggested no further expansion or improvement of the facilities at Churchill. Why would the minister take it upon himself to engage a consultant who had a very well known bias against the port of Churchill and who, in fact, did a study just two years ago for the Dominion Marine Association, which is pro-St. Lawrence Seaway, that recommended virtually the same situation; that the port of Churchill should not be expanded or improved? Why would the minister engage someone with an obvious bias?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's statement is really extraordinary. As a lawyer, he should know that a case may be taken for one side of a problem by a lawyer, and later on a case may be taken on the other side. Consultants operate in the same way. It is quite wrong for the hon. member to allege any kind of bias in the House on the part of any consultants. The fact of the matter is that in their work in relation to Churchill and in relation to inland terminals, they were knowledgeable about the entire situation.

As I said at the beginning, the hon. member is quite wrong in saying that this determined in some way that there was no future, or a dim future for Churchill. In fact, at this very moment we are continuing our programs of expansion for Churchill. Lighting systems are being installed to allow longer hours of work at Churchill. This year we are likely to set again, for the third year in a row, a record for the number of bushels handled at Churchill. That is the record of this government. I do not know why the hon. member wants to be cynical about it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the port of Churchill has been downgraded by the removal of the head of that particular port, and in other ways, that the Hudson Bay Route Association and other people have said that Mr. Bryden went outside his terms of reference and were altogether very critical, and that these associations wanted to have somebody looking at this matter who would be in tune with western concerns, I ask the minister: in view of these observations and actions which have taken place in the past, why did he engage Mr. Bryden at all?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there were no complaints about the engagement of the consultant while the studies were ongoing. If anyone accused them of anything, I suppose it might have been that they were pro-terminal because of the work they had done on the Weyburn terminal. They might have been just as easily accused of that. I have very close working relationships with the Hudson Bay Route Association and those interested in the development of that port. They know we are going ahead with our plans for work there. They know that in our rail rehabilitation program we have included major works for the expansion of the Herchmer subdivision on the way to Churchill. Thus, all these positive acts by the government fly in the face of the cynicism and the skepticism of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. I wish he would recognize the three-year record that we have in Churchill and the fact that we will continue to develop it.

Mr. Hees: Whose campaign manager was he, Otto?

URBAN AFFAIRS

HOUSING—FUNDING OF NIP PROJECTS AFTER CESSATION OF PROGRAM

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Under section 27.7 of the National Housing Act, funding for the Neighbourhood Improvement Program will cease on March 31, 1978. On December 1, 1977, before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, the minister said: "I would like to be in a position to bring in an amendment that will extend NIP". Considering the usefulness of this self-help activity, and the problems caused by interruption of the program, can the minister inform the House what measures he plans to introduce to overcome the March 31 deadline?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this week my deputy minister is meeting his provincial counterparts here in Ottawa; they will discuss that specific matter with a view to reaching a federal-provincial agreement on that program and similar ones from which the municipalities in Canada benefit.

● (1452)

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, when the minister is discussing this matter, will he consider a change so we can talk about rural NIP and urban NIP, so that this program can be more effective?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Both programs, Mr. Speaker, will be discussed at those meetings this week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUMBER OF BOEING 707 TO BE USED AT CFB, TRENTON

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Given the age of the aircraft, the need for regular checks and retrofits, the heavy workload and the growing number of demands on their time, does the minister intend to expand the number of Boeing 707s currently used by 737 Squadron based at the Canadian Forces Base, Trenton?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no immediate intention to expand that fleet. We recognize that these aircraft are heavily taxed, but there are no definite plans for expansion at this time.

AIR TRANSPORT

FOREIGN TROOP CARRIERS USING DORVAL—AIR CANADA SERVICE TO MOSCOW AND PRAGUE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister confirm if in the past few months there have been foreign aircraft with troop-carrying capability going through Dorval without the usual registration numbers and state demarcations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no such information. I will be glad to check and inform the hon. member.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, in view of the large number of Russian, Cuban, Polish and Czech airliners using Mirabel and Dorval to carry commercial freight and passengers, will Air Canada be resuming its flights to Moscow and Prague? These flights were cancelled last year due to lack of passengers and freight.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on the part of Air Canada to do so at this time. Flights were discontinued because the very low level of seat occupancy meant that Air Canada was incurring losses. Those losses had to be borne by Air Canada in its other operations and that did not seem to us to be sensible. Air Canada stands ready to resume those services when there is a clear indication that the number of seats occupied will be higher.

NUMBER OF PERSONS BEING INVESTIGATED UNDER OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. As I understand it, very extensive investigations by the security service, and perhaps the RCMP, are going on right now. I understand that persons and/or corporations are being investigated regarding the subject with which we are now dealing. Can the minister advise how many persons are involved, and whether this investigation has come to a close? How extensive is it?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to be a little more precise with regard to the particular investigation he is referring to.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about an investigation regarding the Official Secrets Act. We are talking about only one investigation at this time regarding the Official Secrets Act. We are talking about the involvement of the hon. member for Leeds. I indicated to the Solicitor General that there are some very extensive investigations going on, including investigations of persons, corporations and, particularly, members of the press. How many people have been investigated, and is the investigation complete?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has read, interviews were conducted over the weekend by the security service. Interviews were conducted with members of the press and other individuals who might shed light on some of the declarations which have been made from time to time by the hon. member for Leeds relating to the matter at issue. The investigation is being conducted with the usual practices which are followed by the security service. I am sure the investigation is being conducted competently and that the number of personnel involved is sufficient to carry out the responsibilities with which these personnel are charged.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I take it from the minister's answer that the investigation is very extensive. As a result of the investigation, have any notices been issued in the past two or three days for the production of documents or material? In other words, as a result of this investigation, has anything come to the minister's attention so that he can determine now that notices demanding the production of documents have been issued?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as investigations are being proceeded with, it would be unusual for me to comment. It has been the practice not to comment until such time as action is taken.

Mr. Alexander: I am very much aware of that. As a result of the investigations, and as a result of information before the minister, is he about to issue a notice demanding that documents be produced?

Mr. Blais: Not at this moment, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT FURTHER DROP IN VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since the issue of $720 million in Canadian bonds on the United States market announced by the Minister of Finance to sustain the Canadian dollar did not produce any effect and that Friday last our floating dollar was more like a sinking dollar, what does the minister intend to do about it?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat once more that our dollar is floating on the market at the present time and that its level is determined by the market. Of course we have borrowed $750 million as I have indicated because we have a deficit in our current account balance of payments and because Canadians do not borrow enough on foreign markets but we do not intend to change our policy with regard to the dollar and when a currency is floating it can go up or down as the dollar has been doing for the last year and half.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, considering that the dollar is having trouble staying afloat—indeed it is drowning—and that the minister's decision to issue some $750 million worth of bonds has failed to sustain the dollar, what other step is the minister contemplating now, or would he rather wait, before taking any action, until the value of the dollar drops as low as 5 cents?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the dollar was worth about 90.13 cents over a month ago, and its value has not dropped very much since January. During February, we faced a reserve problem, but it has now stabilized. The value of the dollar is floating now and will continue to float, and in reply to the question from the hon. member opposite, I feel I can say that a floating dollar greatly favours Ontario industries which export to foreign markets.

LAY-OFFS IN EASTERN CANADA—DONKIN COAL MINE PROJECT

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to address my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I read the minister's answer to a question put to him on Friday by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys. However, I want the minister to recognize that although it is apparently true that, as he says, there are no lay-offs, there is going to be a change in that mine. People are going to move to other mines. That would drastically affect people who have applied for jobs, for example, at Lingan.

I would like the minister to give us an assurance in this respect. I have spoken to coal consultants and others, who have said that they think the construction period could be pushed forward as far as the Donkin mine is concerned. This would reduce the general unemployment level in that area. As the minister knows, 3,500 people are still looking for jobs in coal mines in the area.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, it is obvious that following the decision to stop temporarily the operations as such of Prince mine, there will be readjustments among workers who will be assigned to other tasks in other places, always within Devco operations. But as for the hon. member's suggestion to hasten the possible construction of a new coal mine in the Donkin deposit, I must say to the hon. member that the study which is necessary before making this decision is not completed, and I think it would be a little premature and incautious to set immediately to build a mine before being sure about all its implications, in order not to be in a difficult situation, such as the one which we have now with the Prince mine. So I hope that the hon. member will go on supporting the efforts we are making, and we hope that in the next few months we shall be in a position to make decisions likely to please as many people as possible.

● (1502)

[English]

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I agree in part with what the minister said, but I repeat that there is the possibility, according to coal consultants who have studied this question in the past and with whom I consulted before I asked the question, that the feasibility study as far as Donkin is concerned can be pushed ahead without doing any damage. I realize it is partly lack of planning that got this mine into trouble. I ask the minister if Treasury Board intends to grant the additional funds needed to continue next summer the offshore drilling which was not completed last year.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that under the agreement offshore drilling is to continue next year. But as for the consultants, I would like to tell the hon. member that Devco has also hired some, and that during the next few months we will probably have the opportunity to hire another consultant firm which will establish if we should encourage this new mine, based on its cost effectiveness and feasibility. It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that we will be able to announce, in the coming weeks if not the coming months, the decisions taken in this matter.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COSSITT—NATIONAL SECURITY—DOCUMENT ALLEGED TO BE IN HON. MEMBER'S POSSESSION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege pertaining to a letter dated March 3, 1978, which I received from the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Blais) and a reply thereto which I now would request a parliamentary page to come forward to deliver to the Solicitor General across the floor of the House at this time.

While it is being delivered might I just say this: I confirm the remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), made earlier in this question period, that I was under surveillance this past week end, beginning noticeably on Thursday evening, and also the fact that approximately 30 members of the press gallery have been interrogated since Thursday.

Over this past week end I have been conferring with my solicitors and certain members of parliament. Naturally I would like to express my appreciation to my colleagues in the Conservative caucus and to my solicitors, namely, from Brockville, the firm of Stewart, Corbett, Musclow and Barr, and my senior counsel here in Ottawa. I hope I may also be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to thank the hundreds of Canadians from coast to coast who have been communicating with me over the week end by telephone and telegram, agreeing with the stand that I have taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: I also feel that I should add, Mr. Speaker, before I read the reply to the House that I have given to the Solicitor General, that this whole incident has been extremely curious, and I consider it has been a breach of my parliamentary privilege.

It is an acknowledged fact that there are a number of members of this House who, at various times, have openly stated that they possess, or are quoting from so-called secret material, or from information given to them verbally. To my knowledge none of these members has been threatened with possible arrest. None of these members has been threatened with the issuance of search warrants. As a consequence, the question in my case I think is obvious—why have I been singled out by this government for the treatment I have received?

The conclusion is, I believe, just as obvious. I have never been exactly known as one who approves of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) methods of running the country, and it would appear that the whole thing has become a form of some vindictive persecution on his part as evidenced by the threats made upon me last week in my office, without notice of any kind, by General Dare and the Solicitor General, on instructions that were apparently handed to the Solicitor General by the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has said that the interests of the country are at stake—as if I had damaged the interests of the country—but in reality I believe it is the interests of the government that are at stake in view of the fact that revelations made by a number of members in this House, including myself, have shown time and again the failure of the government to act decisively in the interests of national security.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: The Prime Minister spoke of dangers to the country in the things he alleges are in my possession, and he has displayed less interest in stopping the activities of the KGB and other subversive elements in Canada and far more interest in destroying Tom Cossitt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Finally, I wish to assure this House that I have never acted in any manner which I consider prejudicial to the security of this country, nor will I ever do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Since coming here in 1972 I believe I have acted in the best interests of Canada and in the best interests of my constituents who elected me to this place.

It is not for me at this time to cite precedents of the British parliament which would indicate that, if they were to be applied here, they would show that I have not acted in any way detrimental to Canada. I wish to emphasize, as I have said many times, Mr. Speaker, that I feel it is my absolute duty to protect the identity of such persons who in any way communicate to me, as a member of the opposition, information that indicates the government is acting wrongly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I would now like to read to the House the letter dated March 3, 1978, delivered to me on that date at approximately 1.15 p.m. in the parliamentary dining room by a representative of the Solicitor General, along with my reply thereto.

The letter from the Solicitor General reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

I am satisfied that on the basis of statements made by you, both in and out of Parliament, that you are in possession of a document dated 24th March 1976, classified as 'Top Secret', entitled 'CANADIAN RELATED ACTIVITIES OF THE RUSSIAN INTELLIGENCE SERVICES' and published by the Intelligence Advisory Committee of the Government of Canada.

I am also satisfied that it would be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State for you to retain possession of that official document. In the circumstances I consider it my duty as Solicitor General presiding over the Department of the Solicitor General to direct you, pursuant to the paragraph 4(4)(a) of the Official Secrets Act, to forthwith return the document together with any copies of it or extracts from it which you may have in your possession or which may be in the possession of others on your behalf.

You may be assured that this letter is being sent to you as a Member of Parliament only after my having given the matter very careful consideration and on my being absolutely convinced that it is necessary to do so in the interests of Canada.

I can be reached at any time through Government local 6-0220 or 2-4211.

Yours sincerely,

J.-J. Blais
Solicitor General

The reply I have sent the Solicitor General across the floor of the House, dated this day, March 6, reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Blais:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 3, 1978, which was delivered to me at approximately 1.15 p.m. on that date in the Parliamentary Dining Room shortly before my departure to my home in Brockville.

In response to your said letter I have to advise you that I am not in possession of a document dated March 24, 1976, classified as 'TOP SECRET', entitled 'CANADIAN RELATED ACTIVITIES OF THE RUSSIAN INTELLIGENCE SERVICES'.

Yours sincerely,
Tom Cossitt

In other words, or in effect, to summarize the wordiness of both letters, the Solicitor General has requested me to return forthwith a document classified as top secret and entitled "Canadian Related Activities of the Russian Intelligence Services" and I have replied to him that I am not in possession of such a document.

● (1512)

In conclusion I should advise the House that I have maintained my undertaking completely that any materials in my possession would remain in safe custody, that I would reveal to nobody and in no way tamper with or destroy, etc. until such time as I complete the statement that I have now just made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) a question for clarification in order to short circuit any long debate on this issue. The hon. member rose on a point of privilege and I would like him to intimate whether he indicated in his closing sentence that he would be returning all top secret documents he may have in his possession.

[Mr. Cossitt.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The sentence speaks for itself.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) can read what I said in Hansard.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. gentleman, first of all with reference to his opening remarks that perhaps during the weekend he might have been under surveillance in some way, I would want him to provide me with all the information. I will reiterate the comment I made to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that there were indeed expressed directions given by me that no surveillance of any sort be effected on the hon. member for Leeds, commencing Thursday.

With reference to the point the hon. gentleman had raised, I ask the hon. gentlemen not to limit their analysis of this situation, merely to the request that was sent on Friday over my signature dated March 3, because the question was raised on Thursday related to the possession by the hon. gentleman for Leeds of documents—

Mr. Cossitt: A document.

Mr. Blais: —top secret documents, Mr. Speaker. It is true that the letter he read speaks of one identified document. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that that letter also speaks of extracts from that document.

We are not dealing with matters of passing importance; we are dealing with questions involving national security. When I spoke to the hon. gentleman from Leeds on Thursday morning it was in order to secure the return of a document that we felt he had in his possession. He indicated to me at the time that he had two documents—one document he had two copies of, and another he had extracts from.

The case is quite clear that the hon. gentleman himself has admitted, and I cite from the Citizen of February 22 where it states on page 8:

Outside the House, the Tory MP showed reporters the original photostat of the RCMP document he was referring to. It was headed "For Canadian Eyes Only" and was stamped "Secret".

The document listed the following numbers in the Soviet diplomatic establishment in Canada by year with the number of "Soviet intelligence officers" in brackets:

In 1970, 60 (30); 1971, 60 (27); 1972, 59 (30); 1973, 54 (24); 1974, 59 (24); 1975, 59 (24); and 1976, 61 (28).

Again in the same article by Citizen staff writer Ian Hunter he stated that he was basing his allegations relating to certain matters involving the Soviet Union's diplomatic personnel in Canada on:

—secret RCMP documents passed on to him by a member of the force's security branch.

In part that information was the justification for my attending upon the hon. member for Leeds in order to secure the return of the documents. Now the hon. gentleman is attempting to pass a red herring across the trail, Mr. Speaker, by indicating that indeed the request we made, and the obligation he has, is limited only to a reply to the request that we made last Friday. Surely that is not the only responsibility that he has.

Mr. Clark: If it was a red herring, you would give it a travel visa!

Mr. Blais: He has a responsibility to comply with the Official Secrets Act, as has any other member of this House. The hon. gentleman knows that when I attended his office on Thursday morning I had sufficient information in order to request the issuance of a search warrant. The purpose of attending at his office was to obviate any sort of legal recourse and to seek and solicit his own co-operation by the return of the documents.

Mr. Cossitt: You acknowledged you have been bugging my telephone.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, that is silliness. There was never any acknowledgement of that nature. All I am saying to the hon. gentleman is that he cannot today, as a result of this question of privilege, extract himself from the necessity of his being here and being dictated by the terms of the Official Secrets Act. That is exactly what he is attempting to do.

Mr. Stevens: You told him what you wanted.

Mr. Blais: I am sure that a number of arguments will be raised perhaps by some of his colleagues relating to the fact that, as a member of parliament, he ought to be provided with some exceptional privilege. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you there is no such authority. Once documents have been established and admitted by him as being top secret documents, matters that were leaked to him from a source within the RCMP, I have yet to read any authority to allow his refusal to hand over those documents. And I would suggest, without passing any further comment than that, that he ought to seek counsel again in order to ascertain whether that is not a very visible and patent breach of the Official Secrets Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have a notice from the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on a separate question of privilege.

To set this matter in its proper context, it was raised on Thursday and discussed further on Friday. When it was raised on Thursday it was raised as a result of a meeting that took place in the office of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) when the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) attended there in company with General Dare. At that time a conversation was held between the parties relating to documents that were allegedly in the possession of the hon. member for Leeds. At that time there was some indication that official action of some sort might be necessary by the Solicitor General.

When the point was raised by the hon. member for Leeds he brought to the attention of the House his request that he be permitted to consult counsel over the course of the weekend to determine what position he would take in respect to whatever documents about which he gave an undertaking. He gave an undertaking that any documents in his possession which would be of a certain nature would be held in safekeeping over the weekend by him. That was his undertaking. In response to this undertaking the matter was argued extensively Thursday afternoon. On Friday morning I spoke with both parties and it was agreed that the matter would stand over until Monday. That would not inhibit the serving of an official notice upon the hon. member for Leeds by the Solicitor General.

In respect therefore to one of such documents a notice was served. The response of the hon. member for Leeds this afternoon is that he is not in possession of the document described in that official notice. This disposes in a complete way of the question relating to that particular document and the hon. member's response to the notice served. It may leave open questions about other documents which might have been discussed on Thursday afternoon about which the hon. member for Leeds gave an undertaking of safekeeping during the weekend. I do not know. I have no information about the number of documents that are in his possession. However, it seems to me that the matter, having stood over in respect to any other documents at this time, cannot go any further in terms of procedural action by the Chair unless and until some other action is taken by one side or the other.

At this point, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) has raised by way of a question of privilege what is in effect his response to a specific notice under the Official Secrets Act, that is, a response to an official notice that the document is not in his possession. That may finalize that matter. It may also leave open the matters from Thursday with respect to other documents.

At the moment there is no procedural matter before the Chair for decision, and certainly no matter which has been formulated by the hon. member by way of a question of privilege that the Chair could deal with at this point. Whether or not that might arise in response to further action, now that this response by him has been made, is an open question. However, it is quite clear there is no action from a procedural point of view that the Chair can take at this moment.

MR. NIELSEN—APPLICABILITY OF OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a separate question of privilege of which I have given Your Honour notice. I do so because of my increasing concern as an individual member of this House, which concern is shared generally by all members of the opposition, if not indeed by some on the other side of the House as well. It has to do with the coming into possession, the receiving of information in any form which might be classified as secret information under the Official Secrets Act.

Over the course of my years here I have come into possession of all sorts of that kind of information which could be so classified. It is quite obvious that other members on this side have as well. I know that I cannot get into the merits of my motion now, but I am just explaining what gives rise to my very deep concern about the extent to which that act is going to negate the responsibilities of members of parliament, particularly those in the opposition.

If that act were to be applied literally, we would have to place the telephone back in its cradle each time we made an assessment as to whether information we were hearing was classified.

Because of the importance of this question and the applicability of the Official Secrets Act to members of parliament, and because there has been a precedent set in the Mother of Parliaments in 1939 by way of a decision of a select committee, I believe it is urgently timely for this matter to be brought current in this place so that members of parliament, in their freedom of speech and their freedom to act in what they feel to be in the best interests of the state, for after all there are some of us who believe that the interests of the state and those of the government are not necessarily synonymous—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Because of the urgent need to have this matter updated so that we can all feel free from arrest, free from search, and feel that we are fulfilling what are our responsibilities in this House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), and these words are taken from the English precedent which is found in Beauchesne commencing at page 417:

That the applicability of the Official Secrets Act to members of the House in the discharge of their parliamentary duties, having regard to the undoubted privileges of the House as confirmed in Section 4 of the Senate of the House of Commons Act, Section 18 of the British North America Act and the ruling of Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada made on December 5, 1977 commencing at page 1539 of Hansard of that date and referring to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton commencing at page 935 of Hansard of November 16, 1977, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and to report back to this House within 30 days.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member gave the Chair notice of his question of privilege and now follows it with a substantive motion. I would, in an initial way, have a very grave reservation about any attempt to raise by way of a question of privilege a general proposition which is not founded on a particular case. Particularly do I say so in respect to a situation which appears to parallel another event that appears, at least for the moment, not to have reached its final conclusion.

In addition, I would want to remark to the House that a committee was established, under my chairmanship, of which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was very much the inspiration, as a special committee of the House on the question of the rights and immunities of members. It has made one report to the House and it has taken under consideration a number of equally important matters.

I want to give some consideration overnight to whether or not the proper resolution of this would be to refer, or at least request that committee, since it has already the authority of the House to study a number of matters affecting rights and immunities, to priorize this subject as its next report to the House, if at all possible within the time available, and to take into account events that are unfolding at the present time as well as all of the items referred to here.

That would, I hope, accomplish the same thing in an equally effective way and would not offend the proposition that the matter is really of too general a nature to found a question of privilege on the basis of the precedents, but it is certainly an important enough matter to be given immediate attention. After some reflection, that would be a general intention. However, I will give the matter 24 hours' reflection to see whether there is any difficulty with that.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make two very brief comments. I hope Your Honour will hear submissions with regard to the validity of the question of privilege.

I might inform you, sir, I had originally drafted my motion to refer this matter to the special committee. It was because of my concern that it might somehow affect or compromise the Chair's position, because after all you are the chairman of that committee, that I avoided that. However, I would be perfectly happy to amend my motion to refer to that committee should that be the general consensus.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the comments by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to the effect that he would hope that submissions might be made tomorrow on the matter of his motion, presumably to prove that his motion raises a prima facie case of privilege, I want to say at this point that I vigorously submit that this motion does not present a prima facie case of privilege in any way, shape, or form.

It could be a substantive motion that the hon. member could put on the order paper and have dealt with in that way. However, it is worth recalling to the House that Your Honour has already ruled that whatever question of privilege or alleged question of privilege has been raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), either on Thursday or today, has been discharged. To put it another way, it has not been put forward in any way that it could constitute a proceeding of the House. I therefore take it that that episode, in so far as privilege is concerned, is closed in the way that it has been dealt with today.

The hon. member for Yukon is raising the very general question of the relationship of the Official Secrets Act to members of parliament. It is a very general proposition that is of great academic interest. However, it is not related to any question of privilege or any grievance, breach or complaint put forward by any member of parliament, not even the hon. member for Yukon. The hon. member for Yukon has not said that he has been imperilled or held back in the discharge of his duties because of the operation of the Official Secrets Act.

Having said that with regard to the motion, it seems to me that the suggestion Your Honour has made is an eminently sensible one, to have the committee which has already constituted itself regard this as an appropriate matter for priority treatment. It would certainly have my support and the support of members on this side of the House if it were dealt with on a basis of priority with no motion or further action required on the part of the House.

I believe it is essential that we deal with this matter so that we can go on to the allotted day and deal with the matter standing before the House in the name of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the statements made by the government House leader with respect to the necessity of proceeding with the allotted day. However, I must say I am very heartened to hear two things.

The first is the importance which Your Honour attaches to the question of the relationship of the rights of a member of parliament and the Official Secrets Act, particularly with regard to the way in which a member of parliament can perform his duties and what limitations there may be on him. I am very pleased with the suggestion you have made and the idea of priorizing that in the Committee on Rights and Immunities which is chaired by Your Honour. That makes it even more important. I was very pleased to hear that suggestion.

I was particularly pleased to hear the approbation and endorsation of the suggestion by the government House leader. This is a matter of extreme importance, one with which all of us should be concerned. I want to thank the hon. member for that suggestion.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lend my support to the idea which has been put forward by yourself and endorsed by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and, now, by the official opposition as well. However, in resolving the matter at this point by a reference to the Committee on Rights and Immunities, under Your Honour's chairmanship, we should be clear in our minds about what the committee would be looking into.

As I see it, this is a matter which not only affects the rights and privileges of members of parliament and the security of the country as they relate to the Official Secrets Act but also a specifically related question, which is the limits, if any, which should be placed on the right of a member not to divulge his source of information. This is a fundamental question and one which has concerned members on both sides in this unfortunate circumstance—if I may use that adjective to describe it—the rather heavy-handed action taken by the government before the week end, an action which was justified, in the view of the administration, not on the assumption that it was necessary to obtain the information in the document or documents alleged to be in the hands of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) but because the obtaining of that document or documents would be an important step in getting to the source of the leak. It was this—the question of sources which I took to be the essence of the government's interest at the time, and I also took it to be the essence of the interest of the hon. member for Leeds.

There is involved here a fundamental dilemma in a parliamentary democracy—the right of an hon. member on either side of the House to protect his or her sources of information. I need not only draw attention to the case dealt with in Great Britain, to which reference was made early this afternoon; a similar matter was before the Ontario legislature in recent months.

The committee over which Your Honour presides is particularly suited to deal with such a matter, not only because of the nature of the subject matter but in terms of its composition—its members are admirably suited to deal with such a reference. They include the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin), the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). These members have shown by their past interest in such matters that they are admirably suited to deal with this question. They have shown an understanding of what is at the root of the problem, namely, the rights of members of parliament as opposed to, or in comparison with, the rights and responsibilities of the executive branch.

What is so perturbing is that the heavy-handed action of the government just prior to the week end revealed that the government—I am inclined to say this would apply to any government of the day, including one from my own party—is inclined to define national security in terms of its own party policy. If you hold power it is almost inescapable that, in national security matters, you will identify the security of the state with the policy of your own government. When such a situation arises and power is exercised in terms of a set of options, including the possibility of arrest, being presented to a member of parliament, serious questions are raised about the propriety of the executive branch of the government making a judgment in its own case, a judgment which possibly impinges upon the rights of that member. We find the government interpreting and applying the Official Secrets Act and saying, with regard to its own case, "This is a threat to the security of the state," and so on.

In this case the difficulty is compounded by the role which has been actively played by the hon. member for Leeds. To no one's surprise, and, many will think to his credit, he has zeroed in on the activities of the Prime Minister of the day (Mr. Trudeau). I am not passing judgment on that, but he certainly has done so. So when the government, through its power as the executive branch, decides to bring down the law of the state on a member, we have to keep in mind that in this instance we are not talking about an academic or hypothetical situation but about a very real one. The government, defining its own defence policy from a set of regulations, has equated it with the national interest, and the situation is not made easier by the fact that many of the activities of the hon. member concerned have been directed against the Prime Minister.

However, what is involved fundamentally in this issue is not the obtaining of documents for their own sake but getting to the source of the leak. This brings up the question of the rights of members of parliament. It is not the case, as was said by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), that an hon. member has the same rights and privileges as any other citizen of Canada, and no more. We have added rights and privileges. For example, we can say things here in this chamber which, if said outside it, would be in violation of the law of libel. We have freedom here to criticize the government to an extent which, outside the House, would be described as licence.

To my mind the basic question is this: if we are to exercise our rights as members of parliament to express ourselves freely, to be vigorous critics of the government, if we are in opposition, or vigorous backbench members on the other side, it is of the highest importance that we protect our sources of information, especially when such information is frequently volunteered. I might say it is inevitable that it should be volunteered in a free society. This being the case, the question to be considered by the committee is: when that right to protect sources of information is weighed against the security of the state, where does one come down? Because I do not believe the executive branch is the authority which should decide that question, I support the proposal to refer the matter to the consideration of a committee of this House, the committee chaired by Your Honour. The committee would look at this possible conflict of rights or obligations, and weigh a member's right to information, and right to protect his sources, against the right of the state to maintain security.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the leader of the NDP, that he attributed to me quite incorrectly the notion that members do not have more privileges than citizens outside this House. If the hon. member will check the record, he will see that I made the point that more privileges had already been extended to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). What I was making clear was that in arguing from outside the House the doctrine which the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has about the right to counsel, and so on, he was arguing from outside the House principles of justice, but he was demanding in the House much more for members. The point I made was that when the hon. member for Leeds, as member of parliament, purports that he can break the law, I think that is an extraordinary doctrine indeed.

Mr. Paproski: He did not say that; you say that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a shameful statement for a lawyer to make.

Mr. Speaker: I did not intend at this time that the House should launch into an argument on the merits of the case. I indicated that I had grave reservations about the procedural regularity of establishing a general proposition of this sort as a question of privilege. I indicated that I would take 24 hours in an effort to determine whether or not I could get the concurrence of the Committee on Rights and Immunities to examine the matter on a priority basis. If I can, this may be an agreeable solution to the House and one that would solve the problem. If I cannot, I will undertake to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to give him and other members tomorrow an opportunity to defend the procedural regularity of the motion, but I do not want to allow any further discussion at this time.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I say with great respect that no matter is more important than the rights of members of parliament, and for Your Honour to say, "I have made a certain decision dependent on events ahead" after the discussion that has taken place, and to deny members of the House who have some experience—and I am one in that position—the opportunity to place views before the House and the country, would be, I say with great deference, a denial of our rights in the House.

Mr. Speaker: If the right hon. member insists, I will ask him to argue now the merits of the motion, and if I have to rule it out of order on the basis of strict procedural grounds, I am afraid I will have to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more important to members of parliament and to freedom itself than the maintenance of the basic principle that members of parliament do not have to reveal the source of their information. The Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) has dealt with that and I want to deal with it on the basis of experience.

Having been Prime Minister I know that matters arise that are prejudicial to government. Governments are human, and when matters like that arise, naturally they find a variety of opinions in order to offset the right of parliament. I will now quote the Sandys case. I know Sandys very well. He is today a member of the House of Lords, the son-in-law of Sir Winston Churchill. The view that he expressed on parliamentary privilege is as clear today as when he uttered these words. He relied, among other things, on expressions in the Economist of July 2, 1938, in the following passage:

> It is imperative even in a democracy that certain facts which might be helpful to a possible enemy should be kept secret. The government must be accorded adequate powers to ensure that, in such cases, this secrecy is safeguarded. But it is equally essential, both for the safety of the state and for the preservation of liberty, that the House of Commons and the press should not be hampered in exercising their traditional right—which is also their duty—of criticism. This function can only be effectively performed if members of parliament and journalists are well informed; hence it is part of their day-to-day business to secure information from all possible sources.

I do not place members of the press on the same level as members of parliament, nor do they themselves, but the fact remains that when governments do not want information to be made available to the people that may be prejudicial to them, often they assert it is prejudicial to the state. That is the danger, and once it is accepted that a government can say that a member of parliament shall reveal his sources of information, freedom ends, because no one could communicate, no matter how serious the allegation the individual has in mind, if he realizes it would be revealed. It cannot be, it dare not be. We in this parliament accept that principle.

If the individual should be named and the information given so that all who read the information may understand who it was, parliament might as well close down. Information is received over and over again; it has to be checked to ascertain whether it is well based. Often the information that is sent in is allegedly reputable and dependable, but it turns out not to be such. What has happened in the present case is that the Government of Canada, through the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), would place members of parliament in a position of being in pawn to them. That cannot be accepted by parliament if this institution is to be preserved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mentioned my own experience. On one occasion it was said that it was a breach of the Official Secrets Act, to which I said, "Possibly, technically, and maybe", but the principle of the independence of parliament does not permit any government to say to any member, "You shall only speak what we want to accept, and you shall only speak what we believe is within the provisions of the Official Secrets Act".

Mr. Speaker, you have a tremendous responsibility in this. The determination of the course to be followed is one that rests with you. The preservation of our prerogative rights, the maintenance of the principles on which parliament is founded now rest with you in view of the acceptance today of the authority which you are prepared to accept, and I ask you, in the interests of this parliament, of this generation, and of generations to come, that you do not follow the request of the Government of Canada which, in effect, would place members of parliament in the position of being subservient to them, permitting the government to determine what is or is not within the regulations on the defence of Canada.

I do not want to belabour the point unnecessarily, but let me say that not since John Wilkes took his stand, and Duncan Sandys took his stand in 1938, as I have already mentioned, has any speaker in Canada been placed in the position in which Your Honour finds yourself, as the custodian and protector of the rights of the parliament of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated earlier during this discussion of the question raised by the hon. member for Yukon, I will give it 24 hours' reflection to see if there is a way of dealing with it as I have suggested.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in my original comments on the question I took a very narrow view of what was before the House. Since then, two very substantive statements have been made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It seems to me essential that I should reply at this point, particularly to the comments that have been made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. If the opportunity is available tomorrow, then I will take advantage of it, but I do not believe that the substantive comments which have been made with respect to the motivation of the government in this case can be left unchallenged, and I will abide by your discretion as to whether you will permit me to make these comments today or tomorrow. Your Honour, may I say that—

• (1552)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At the moment the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has made a contribution to the question of privilege, which has taken on much larger proportions since it began. I had indicated earlier that I would explore the possibility of developing some term of reference for the special Committee on Rights and Immunities that might be satisfactory.

The matter which was raised here now seems to have been dealt with in rather expanded terms in respect of sources of information and matters of that kind. It may be that some subject matter can be agreed upon for priorized treatment by the committee. If a satisfactory subject matter cannot be agreed to, it seems to me I have left open the subject of the merits of the question of privilege and, therefore, I would return to that point and provide some opportunity for argument tomorrow, but today I do not think I can permit a second intervention by any member unless I am prepared to do so all around the chamber.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to co-operate with you, but if the conclusion is, as a result of activity between this moment and tomorrow, that the committee already in being should deal with the subject matter of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Yukon, then there will be no opportunity to reply to the substantive allegations made by the hon. member for Prince Albert, namely, to the effect that this issue has been raised by the government in an effort to silence an hon. member on the opposition benches.

In respect of the suggestion that there is no security issue here, and that this is a matter of vindictiveness in respect of which the government, because it is in peril, as is argued by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), is moving with the force of law against that hon. member, let me say this. The right hon. member for Prince Albert, who always tells us about the role of the RCMP in our society,and who always praises them up—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I always have.

Mr. MacEachen: He always extolls them, but that hon. member for Prince Albert ought to be told today that it is on the advice of the security service and the chief of that security service of the RCMP that this particular action is being taken by the Government of Canada. If this matter goes before the committee in the way that may be possible, the right hon. member can go and question the Commissioner of the RCM Police and General Dare, who told the hon. member for Leeds that the document alleged to be in the possession of that hon.

member, if further disclosed, would constitute a grave threat to the national security of Canada.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert may not believe the government, and I do not complain about that, but he will then have the opportunity to listen to the Commissioner of the RCMP and the chief of the security service who went to explain to the hon. member for Leeds that the document, if further disclosed, would be a threat to the national security of Canada because it contained descriptions of the activities of foreign agents in this country; material which, if made available would be valuable to the security services of other nations, and that every step ought to be taken immediately to get that document back and to ensure that its contents would not be further disclosed.

The fundamental priority is the security of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The security of this government.

Mr. MacEachen: It is still a fundamental priority to ensure that top secret documents are returned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To the Prime Minister.

Mr. MacEachen: Returned to the security service of Canada. I want to make it very clear, based upon the case the hon. member has cited, the Sandys case, it is very clear that, quite aside from whatever parliamentary action may be taken, and I have agreed to a certain type of parliamentary action, that is no substitute for the authority the statute gives the Attorney General of Canada, and in no case can any parliamentary action or agreement for parliamentary action be construed as a concurrence by the government that such parliamentary action is a substitute for further action that might be taken by the Attorney General of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LASER BEAMS

Question No. 686—Mr. Howie:

Since January 1, 1977, what amount did the government spend on research in fields related to laser beams?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): In so far as Health and Welfare Canada is concerned: $30,000.

In so far as the National Research Council is concerned: $3,644,000.

In so far as the Department of National Defence and Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. are concerned: $3,162,000.

PROGRAMMES FOR ELDERLY ALCOHOLIC OR DRUG ABUSERS

Question No. 1,150—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. What percentage of the Department of National Health and Welfare funds were allotted to alcoholic prevention programmes in (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 (d) 1975 (e) 1976 (f) 1977?

2. Were federal funds put aside for rehabilitation and prevention programmes for elderly alcoholics and drug abusers and, if so, in what amount?

3. Were funds allotted to elderly alcoholic rehabilitation programmes conducted by Addiction Centres in the provinces and, if so (a) to which programmes (b) in each case, what was the amount?

4. Does the government intend to continue its participation in provincial elderly alcoholic rehabilitation programmes and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Percentage of Non-Medical Use of Drugs' grant and contribution fund allotted to Alcoholic Prevention Programmes. 1. (a) 1971/72, 5.2 per cent; (b) 1972/73, 2.4 per cent; (c) 1973/74, 17.7 per cent; (d) 1974/75, 19.8 per cent; (e) 1975/76, 31.8 per cent; (f) 1976/77, 52.4 per cent.

2. Federal funds have not been put aside specifically for programmes directed to elderly alcoholic or drug abusers. The thrust of prevention programmes has been aimed at Canadians in general. Rehabilitation programmes are the responsibility of the provinces.

3. (a) In 1976/77 the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate funded a research project, through the Canadian Addictions Foundation, to determine the extent of alcohol-related problems of the elderly in Ottawa. (b) The project was funded through a contribution of $5,000.

4. The provinces are responsible for rehabilitation programmes. However, the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate is planning, in conjuction with the Addiction Research Foundation of Ontario, to hold a workshop in March of this year to explore more fully the problems of the elderly and alcohol. The purpose of the workshop will be to increase awareness of the problems of the elderly and alcohol, leading to earlier identification and intervention in alcohol-related problems.

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION

Question No. 1,154—Mr. Marshall:

1. Is the average processing time for applications to the Canadian Pension Commission 171 days?

2. What is the cost of processing a claim?

3. (a) What is the number of backlog claims now on hand at the Commission (b) what is the breakdown of the numbers under (i) World War I (ii) World War II (iii) Korean War (c) what is the breakdown as to the length of time they have been on hand?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. As at January 31, 1978, the average processing time for First Applications for disability pensions was 207 days. For Survivor Benefits (widow's pensions) in those cases where the veteran had not been in receipt of pension at the rate of 48 per cent or more, the average processing time was 97 days.

2. Because of the many variable factors in the processing of a claim, a realistic average cost per claim cannot be determined. A claim may be related to more than one condition and be processed through several medical advisers. Medical examination by specialist consultants, special test, admittance to hospital may or may not be required. In addition a claim may be processed through the appeal system. In comparing the total administrative costs with the total pension expenditure, the administrative costs are 2.28 per cent of the pension expenditure.

3. (a) As at January 31, 1978, 3,800 claims were pending adjudication by the Commission. (b) and (c) Canadian Pension Commission records of pending claims are not kept on the basis of periods of service.

CROWN'S PRECISE FINANCIAL INTEREST IN OPCAN

Question No. 1,173—Mr. Andre:

1. What is the Crown's precise financial interest in Opcan as administered by the Treasury Board and on what date was such interest acquired, at what cost and for what reason?

2. What was the book value of the Crown's equity on the date of acquisition and what is its latest estimated book value?

3. To date, what is the Crown's total investment, including equity costs, contributions to operating funds, debt forgiveness and what is the Crown's total realized profit from such investment?

4. In what manner is the Crown's interest represented (a) on the Board of Directors (b) in its senior management?

5. Did the government make a policy decision in regard to the future disposition of its interest?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. None. The Crown has entered into an agreement with Opcan under which the Crown will make a contribution of up to $10 million to Opcan for the administration, management and operation of a pilot-project volunteer youth programme called Katimavik. The agreement with Opcan was signed July 15, 1977.

2. Opcan is a private, non-profit corporation incorporated under Part II of the Canada Corporations Act without share capital. The Crown has no equity in Opcan.

3. As of January 23, 1978, the Crown has made a contribution of $4.770 million to Opcan. Opcan does not realize any profit from its operation thus the Crown does not realize any profit.

4. (a) An official of the Treasury Board is one of the 21 directors of Opcan. (b) The Crown is not represented by Opcan's senior management.

5. No. A decision on the future support of Opcan will be made by the Government after an evaluation of the pilot project volunteer youth programme is completed during the fall of 1978.

CROWN'S FINANCIAL INTEREST IN CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY

Question No. 1,180—Mr. Andre:

1. What is the Crown's precise financial interest in the Custodian of Enemy Property as administered by the Department of Supply and Services and on what date was such interest acquired, at what cost and for what reason?

2. What was the book value of the Crown's equity on the date of acquisition and what is its latest estimated book value?

3. To date, what is the Crown's total investment, including equity costs, contributions to operating funds, debt forgiveness and what is the Crown's total realized profit from such investment?

4. In what manner is the Crown's interest represented (a) on the Board of Directors (b) in its senior management?

5. Did the government make a policy decision in regard to the future disposition of its interest?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): The Custodian of Enemy Property is not a corporate type entity and the questions as phrased do not apply. The Custodian was appointed, pursuant to the Regulations respecting Trading with the Enemy established during World War II, to receive, hold, manage, release, dispose of and otherwise deal with all property that was reported to him, received or controlled by him or vested in him by virtue of the Regulations. These Regulations were continued in force by the Trading with the Enemy (Transitional Powers) Act, chapter 24, Statutes of Canada, 1947. The Minister of Supply and Services administers this Act and is the Custodian. At the present time, the office is practically dormant and there are no full-time staff assigned. It requires only occasional activity by senior members of the Government of Canada Accounting Branch. However, in the past, the costs of administration have been fully paid out of earnings on property vested in the Custodian and from charges levied as a fee for services rendered to former owners.

CROWN'S INTEREST IN CANADIAN PATENTS AND DEVELOPMENT LIMITED

Question No. 1,191—Mr. Andre:

1. What is the Crown's precise financial interest in Canadian Patents and Development Limited as administered by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology and on what date was such interest acquired, at what cost and for what reason?

2. What was the book value of the Crown's equity on the date of acquisition and what is its latest estimated book value?

4. In what manner is the Crown's interest represented (a) on the Board of Directors (b) in its senior management?

5. Did the government make a policy decision in regard to the future disposition of its interest?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as CPDL is concerned: 1. Original capital $100,000, March 31, 1977 capital—$296,199. CPDL is a Crown Corporation incorporated in 1947 under Part I of the Companies Act by the National Research Council of Canada pursuant to Section 17 of its Act to exploit patentable material of the Council and other government-financed research. The passage of the Public Servants Inventions Act in 1954 made CPDL the prime patenting and licensing agency for public servant inventions which by that Act, belong to the Canadian Government.

2. March 31, 1977—$999,120.

3. To March 31, 1977 (a) Total Crown investment—$296,-199; (b) Total contributions to operating funds—$400,000; (c) Surplus—$166,471.

4. The directors hold their single shares in trust for Her Majesty in right of Canada and are appointed by the shareholders. All personnel, including senior management are employed by NRC and seconded to CPDL.

5. When Bill C-26 is proclaimed, the shares of CPDL now held by NRC will be transferred to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

DIRECTOR OF SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Question No. 1,192—Mr. Andre:

1. What is the Crown's precise financial interest in the Director of Soldier Settlement as administered by the Department of Veteran's Affairs and on what date was such interest acquired, at what cost and for what reason?

2. What was the book value of the Crown's equity on the date of acquisition and what is its latest estimated book value?

3. To date, what is the Crown's total investment, including equity costs, contributions to operating funds, debt forgiveness and what is the Crown's total realized profit from such investment?

4. In what manner is the Crown's interest represented (a) on the Board of Directors (b) in its senior management?

5. Did the government make a policy decision in regard to the future disposition of its interest?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. The Soldier Settlement Act was a post World War I rehabilitation measure. At the present time the Director of Soldier Settlement holds title to only one remaining property on which the Crown's investment has been completely recovered. Title to this property will be released when the estate has settled.

2. No equity was acquired by the Soldier Settlement Board.

3. The information requested is not readily available. An extensive and costly study would be required to provide a complete answer to the question.

4. (a) There is no Board of Directors. (b) The Director Soldier Settlement is an Order in Council appointee.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—EQUALITY OF RIGHTS FOR WOMEN IN LABOUR FORCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved:

That this House asserts that the women of Canada ought to have fully equal rights in participating in the Canadian economy, and in relation thereto condemns the government for its discriminatory policies and statements regarding Canadian women in the labour force.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as leader of the New Democratic Party I have spoken many times about unemployment and its effects on the economy of our country and on every working as well as non-working Canadian. I have tried, particularly over the last two years, to get the Liberal government to provide economic opportunities for Canadians to work. Canadians want the opportunity to work, they do not want to go on collecting handouts of one kind or another.

The opportunity to work is not only important because of its relationship to human dignity and what it means to be a human being, but also in terms of its net effect on the economy. When you have more than 1 million unemployed we lose millions of tax dollars that would otherwise be collected, and we lose the production of millions of dollars worth of goods and services that are not being produced. We also pay out, as we are now paying, some $4 billion a year in unemployment insurance. Unemployment, in short, is a major problem for both human and economic reasons.

As I have said, until today I have talked in the House of Commons about unemployment in general terms. Today I want to talk about what I call the forgotten victims of our unemployment, and I refer to the Canadian women. All of us in and outside this House at this point in our history are aware of such recent economic happenings as the lay-off of men by Inco in Sudbury, and at Thompson, Manitoba, and the shutdown by Alcan of its operations at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland. A few days ago in the House of Commons we learned of another shutdown of a mining operation in Stewart, British Columbia.

Few members of parliament are aware that Canadian women are greater victims of unemployment and the resultant poor economic situation than are men. I regret to say that most members of parliament still tend to think of men as being the only breadwinners in our society. That happens to be a reality in terms of the perceptions of most hon. members. Like so many beliefs about our economy and unemployment, this is a myth. It is a myth to believe that men are the only breadwinners in our present economy. I say that because more and more Canadian families require two incomes to survive in 1978, with the cost of living rising month after month, year after year.

Canadian women, who are the subject of this debate, work in the main for the same reasons as Canadian men. They work to buy groceries, to pay fuel bills, to buy clothes for their children, and to pay the mortgages on their homes. They work for the same reasons that their husbands work: to meet the necessities of life in Canada. Approximately one half of married women who are working are doing so because otherwise their husbands, children, and families would be at the poverty level. That is the reality of working wives in 1978.

The women working in fish plants in St. John's or working as cab drivers in Ottawa, such as the ones I spoke with not long ago, are frequently putting in 8, 10, 12 or 14 hour days, rather than the normal eight hour day. This is the case with many women who are doing various ordinary jobs throughout the breadth of this country. They are putting in these long hours for the same reasons as men in similar situations. It is not to buy a fur coat, nor to have the advantage of an extra bit of material well-being. They are doing it to meet the necessity of living from day to day in Canada. That is why they are working.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I am not referring just to married women. This debate has to be also concerned about the plight of single women. They are an important part of our society as well. And they are an important part of the Canadian economy today. In addition to the working wives, there are more than 1½ million single women working to earn a living. Among that 1½ million, 200,000 women are the sole support of their families. I am referring to the single parent families, which are increasing in number. They are the widows, the divorced, and the deserted. That is what makes up the 200,000 single parent households in this country. I want to stress that most of these women are working at wages which are not equal to nor in excess of those of men. In most cases they are working at wages which are below the poverty level. That is the situation with which working single women are faced.

At the outset of my comments, I said that the majority of women who are unemployed in Canada have become the forgotten victims of unemployment. That is not simply a bit of self-indulgent rhetoric. I assert that because it is a statistical reality. If one includes in the statistical unemployment figures all the men and women who would take jobs if they were available and possible, instead of the almost one million unemployed Canadians which Statistics Canada indicates, the real figure is 1.6 million. That part of our labour market, which includes men and women who are no longer in the official statistics but want work, can be referred to as the hidden unemployed. Among that almost countless number, who are not referred to in the official statistics, more than 700,000 women would like to have jobs, need work, but cannot get it. If these are included the real rate of unemployment for last month for women was 17 per cent. A government which was at all sensitive to human issues would consider that to be a statistical scandal. Just as the government tried originally many months ago to deny the existence and significance of the category of hidden unemployed, now it is attempting to hide the reality of the women within that category, whom I call the forgotten unemployed.

Not merely is the government ignoring the myths which are still prevalent in some circles concerning working women in the economy, unbelievably the government and its ministers are perpetuating those myths. In its manpower retraining programs and unemployment insurance offices it is actively discriminating against women. At this point in the twentieth century, surely that should be totally unacceptable to a civilized government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I realize the minister responsible for the status of women will join in the debate this afternoon. Hon. members on this side of the House will listen with a great deal of interest. For the minister's benefit I should like to refer to some information that comes from the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which was responsible to his department. I refer to its annual report for 1976-1977 regarding the government's activities vis-à-vis women in government departments. Page 9 indicates that the last report revealed in the area of salaries that men were still far ahead of women, and that there had been a decrease in the number of women in senior executive positions.

In addition, the study noted that the concentration of women in certain job categories was even more marked. For example, more than three quarters of the administrative support positions are now filled by women, compared to only 68 per cent in 1974, which is the year the government launched its equal opportunities program. Those figures indicate the progress of that program. Under the category of appointments of women, over which the government and its ministers exercise complete authority, the report of that council is a very unhappy one. It indicates that the government has not lived up to the promises made some years ago in this regard. I will not quote at length from the report in that respect.

For the benefit of the minister, I should like to refer to the case of Miss Ritchie. I am sure all hon. members are aware of it. She served with distinction, skill, and indeed reforming zeal as vice-chairman of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal for the past five years. When the position of chairman became vacant, it was not offered to her in recognition of the outstanding job she did. The position was given to a man. There are many examples within government agencies to which I could refer. I should like to refer to one other instance which took place in my constituency.

Last October a young woman in my riding wrote to me. She was a distinguished high school student. She wanted to become a pilot in the air force. She had contacted the appropriate depot in Toronto to apply. She was surprised to learn in 1977—that is when it occured—that she would not be eligible. Why? Because she was a woman. She knew at the time that in other countries progress had been made in this respect. She knew that there were Russian astronauts who were women. She knew that the Americans were admitting female cadets to West Point and that the Americans were training pilots who were not exclusively male but included women.

I wrote to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) in this regard. Just the other day I received in reply a three-page single spaced letter. I knew why it was so long. I knew he was weasling his way to the conclusion of the letter and that at the end of the letter the minister would say that this young woman from my constituency would not be admitted to train as a pilot. Sure enough, that was the conclusion. There were a number of reasons given, most of them bad, but the one which offended me most was the assertion that the Americans were conducting experiments in this area. So, said the Minister of National Defence in reply to me, and the implication is clear: we will see what happens with the American experience, and if it turns out all right, it will be good enough for Canada. Surely that is not good enough. Are there not some areas in which a Liberal government can have enough courage and show enough imagination to lead instead of following American examples?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

In terms of his department's obligations the Minister of National Defence is by no means alone in discriminating against women. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is in a category all by himself in this respect. Both he and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have been reported, not once but several times, as blaming youth and women for high unemployment rates in Canada. Specifically, a couple of weeks ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration said that the government, along with Liberal backbenchers, should explain unemployment away in 1978 with this little piece of euphemistic nonsense from a statement prepared by him:

> Unemployment no longer means what it used to—loss of all family income. Close to two thirds of the unemployed are in families with at least one other wage earner. In fact, over half the beneficiaries are secondary or tertiary wage earners.

That is from the gospel according to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. That is myth No. 1 which the government is trying not to correct but to perpetuate. The myth is that unemployment among married women does not really matter because they are secondary earners. Another interpretation of the same quotation is that if a husband loses his job, that too does not matter because his working partner can still be there to bring home the bacon. That is classic twisted and deceptive Liberal logic.

The reality is that 4 million working women today make up 40 per cent of the work force in Canada. They are not some marginal part of the Canadian economy. They are a major part, 40 per cent. The reality is that almost one half of them are not secondary wage earners at all but are the sole providers either for themselves or their families.

Of the 200,000 single parents with dependent children for whom we had statistics in 1975—and they are the most recent statistics—one half had incomes of less than $5,000, which is less than the poverty level. However, what about the married woman, the secondary earner to whom the Minister of Employment and Immigration callously refers? As I asked rhetorically earlier, is she working to get a holiday in some southern climate, to buy a fur coat, or to buy a new sports car? Of course not. As I pointed out earlier, she is working to buy essential requirements for her family. The $5,000 to $6,000 working wives typically earn in no way can be construed as mere pin money. These people are not buying frills. They are buying the essentials of human life.

I want to deal now with myth No. 20. We hear it not only in conversations around this chamber; we also hear it, I regret to say, from time to time in all our constituencies in all parts of Canada. The myth is that women are causing unemployment among men. Both the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Prime Minister have referred a number of times to the allegation that increasing participation of women in the labour force has caused a recent growth in unemployment.

What are the facts? Between 1967 and 1977 the participation rate for women increased by 25 per cent, but the unemployment rate for men and women during the same period of time increased by 100 per cent. Even a Liberal economist should be able to understand the meaning of those figures. The meaning is that women coming onto the labour market are not creating unemployment among men. It is not only nonsense but cruel nonsense to blame women for doing so. However, the most alarming statistic in this regard is that for the past decade, while the participation rate for women increased by 25 per cent, their unemployment level went from 3.7 per cent to 9.5 per cent, an increase of 300 per cent over that period of time. That is a much greater increase than the increase in the rate of unemployment for men. No, Mr. Speaker, women have not been taking jobs away from men. I hope the minister who replies will deal with these issues.

Let us consider the occupations of most women in our country. The reality is that two thirds of women workers are in clerical, sales or service jobs. What is particularly significant about these jobs in the context of the argument that women are taking employment away from men? Almost all of them were rejected a long time ago by men, principally for the reason that the wages are lower than men consider to be acceptable. Those are the kinds of jobs most women still have in our society. I want to give some figures in that regard because they are important, and they are part of our attempt to document this problem. They are drawn from 1975 statistics again.

The average wage level in service occupations was $4,711. The average wage in sales occupations was $5,545. For clerical work the average wage was $7,157. The reality is that women are not stealing men's jobs at all. The reality is that they are still being held down to the lowest paying jobs in our society which, by and large, men have rejected. To twist this reality inside out by accusing women of taking men's jobs is simply to heap cruelty upon injustice. I say that to the government in all seriousness.

In the debate this afternoon I have used a number of statistics. More could have been brought forward to deepen the criticism of the government, but I will not do that. Other contributors to this debate will have an opportunity to add to that. I have used these statistics to portray through this forum to the people of Canada the picture of the economic reality for Canadian women.

I have attempted to present statistical hard core information which I hope will go some way to correct the myths which the government not only has allowed to persist but has perpetuated by its action, on the one hand, and by its inaction on the other.

I do not normally like to use personal examples in debate but, like many members of this House, I have both a son and a daughter. I have a son who is 18 years old and a daughter who has just turned five. What is so important to me is that my daughter as well as my son should have the opportunity and the expectation of not only a decent home, a decent retirement pension plan, but also a decent job. As a woman she should have that right.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say to you that it is time the government came to grips in general with the problem of unemployment for all the 1.6 million who are unemployed but, most specifically today, I say that in addressing ourselves at long last in parliament to the problems of unemployment, we should keep in mind that the dreams of Canadian women have a full and equal place in the scheme of things with the dreams of Canadian men.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed very happy to have the opportunity of participating in this debate and to have, finally, the occasion to discuss the question of the status of women in this House. May I say also how astonished, yet pleased, I am that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has at last discovered status of women issues.

The opposition appears to have asked more questions on the status of women during the past few weeks than during the last three years put together. I do not know whether there is any relationship between this new found interest on the part of the opposition and the possibility of some other event taking place during this year. When I see that even the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) is showing an interest in this matter and wants to participate in debate, I am forced to conclude that some things are happening.

Several members on this side will have the opportunity to participate in the debate during the day, so we will be able to put on record what this government has done over the last few years and what remains to be done in this regard.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party made some very derogatory comments about the government. I can understand that. He likes to consider himself a man of the left. Recently I had an opportunity to read a book by Françoise Giroud entitled "La Comédie du Pouvoir". She had many things to say about men of the left in France. She said:

[Translation]

The left has certain home tyrants and important misogynists ... Indeed we just have to look at what goes on at party and union headquarters.

[English]

I would not go as far as Françoise Giroud did about the politicians of the left in France when she wrote this, but I think it shows the importance of distinguishing between empty rhetoric and true action.

Mr. Broadbent: You are a specialist in that.

Mr. Lalonde: When the hon. member was speaking I heard interruptions from his own back bench referring to empty talk.

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Lalonde: I was going to suggest to the hon. member that if he had that much concern about the status of women—and I listened to some of the cases he mentioned—he might do something about this and start looking at his own office where, according to my analysis, I have found eight women working—for which I congratulate him—but as far as I can see, they are all secretaries. There is not one key woman staffer in his office.

Mr. Broadbent: Wrong. Dead wrong!

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad if I am wrong, but it must be a recent development because the official list does not seem to indicate a woman in a staff position.

As far as this government and this party are concerned, when it came to debating this issue this afternoon we wondered whether we should have all women participate in the debate. As the hon. member knows, there are enough women on this side of the House to speak in this debate alone. As a matter of fact, we could have had all cabinet ministers who are women occupy the debate this afternoon. This is a choice that the hon. member's party—or the opposition, for all I know—could not entertain.

Mr. Broadbent: The debate is at a lofty level so far.

Mr. Lalonde: I should like to put on the record in general terms some of the things done by this government in the last few years.

[Translation]

I would like to say that we, as a government, are proud of what we have done to improve the status of women in Canada in the last ten years. Long before governments of the western world started to concern themselves with this matter, the government of Canada, under the administration of the Hon. Lester B. Pearson, appointed an inquiry commission which gave us a blueprint under the basis of which we developed a comprehensive policy in this field, and we did not wait for International Women's Year to examine this question. Mr. Speaker, this royal commission submitted 122 recommendations to the federal government and the great majority, or about 98, have already been completely or partly implemented through legislative amendments or administrative changes.

Ours was also the first government of the western world to appoint a minister specifically responsible for the status of women in 1971. This was the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). Ours was the first government in Canada to create an independent advisory council on the status of women. Ours is the only government in the country to have established a responsibility center within the government, the Office of the Status of Women Coordinator. Moreover, much progress has been made to give women equal treatment before the law and to eliminate any discrimination, and I can give a few examples of this: the omnibus bill of 1975 to amend the Immigration Act, the Public Service Employment Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the Canadian Labour Code, the amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act, under which either parent can transmit citizenship and which were promulgated in February 1977, the 1976 amendments to the Criminal Code which amended the procedure in case of rape and increased the protection of women's rights.

Finally, we amended the Canada Pension Plan to guarantee the equality of status of contributors and beneficiaries of both sexes in 1975. There is also the amendment that provides for the possibility of sharing non-adjusted gains of a contributor in the case of divorce or annulment of marriage which was adopted in 1978. We wanted to go further in this amendment to the Canada Pension Plan so as not to penalize any person who must leave the labour force to raise children, but the Ontario government refused to co-operate in this regard.

And last, we had recently the Human Rights Act forbidding discrimination based on sex and family situation and salary differences between men and women doing similar work.

[English]

These are the steps that have been taken by this government in the last ten years. Just before that there was the creation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, and out of the 122 recommendations the commission made, 98 were implemented entirely or partially.

This is the first government in the western world to appoint a minister especially responsible for the status of women. This is the first government in Canada to create an Advisory Council on the Status of Women. We have been presenting amending legislation to this House year after year to eliminate discrimination in all our legislation, making sure that legal equality is guaranteed to women as well as to men.

We have amended the Citizenship Act, the Canada Pensions Act and the Criminal Code with respect to the status of women. But we have also acted in the area of appointment. The Leader of the New Democratic Party made a passing reference to this. I would like to point out that under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) we are the first party to have elected eight women to parliament, in the last election.

We are the first government to have three outstanding women in the cabinet. We are the first government to have appointed a woman lieutenant governor, and we are the first government to have appointed a woman as an associate chief justice in this country.

The hon. member has referred to the Anti-Dumping Tribunal. I could refer him to the Tariff Board. In that instance we went outside to appoint a woman as president of that board over the head of a competent man who was a vice-chairman.

Mr. Clark: Maybe you can tell us about Dr. Ritchie.

Mr. Lalonde: It should be clear to the hon. member that he should not use a particular case and draw a wrong conclusion from it.

Miss MacDonald: Why?

Mr. Lalonde: Under this government during the last two years the appointment of women to boards and commissions has risen by close to 50 per cent; and that includes several judges to the various supreme courts in the provinces.

An hon. Member: From two to three.

Mr. Lalonde: As well, the president of the Economic Council of Canada, two presidents of the National Gallery, the last two Speakers of the Senate have been women. The first women on the board of the Bank of Canada have been appointed. I could go on to name quite a few—the president of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and the two senior commissioners on the Human Rights Commission.

I think the record of this government, Mr. Speaker, in terms of action, not merely talk, with regard to women, stands very well and compares well to that of any other country in the world at the present time.

Mr. Paproski: Unbelievable. Incredible.

Mr. Lalonde: We are not saying that everything has been done. On the contrary there is much that remains to be done. We must remind ourselves of things that can be done and should be done at the provincial level—for example, the equitable matrimonial property legislation. I regret in that respect that the Conservative government in Manitoba is reneging on progressive legislation in this area which was passed by the previous NDP government.

Mr. Clark: You don't know what you are talking about again.

Mr. Lalonde: At the federal level we are very anxious to remove the last remnant of discrimination based on sex and still found in the Indian Act. We are committed to ensuring that the views of all Indian women are considered in discussions we are having with the National Indian Brotherhood. We will be giving the Indian Rights for Indian Women group some funds to enable them to have some input into this process which is taking place.

We still need to look at divorce legislation, income tax legislation, sexual offences in the Criminal Code, the position of women in the Armed Forces, and further means of helping women in the labour force and those who remain at home.

In order to have a fresh look at these and other questions which are of interest to women we have decided to develop a plan of action or global policy on the status of women. This will detail both legislation and practice necessary to achieve concrete goals between now and 1985, the end of the international decade for women. We have had initial discussions with the provinces on this question and we hope that many of them will be reviewing their own policies and programs with a view to responding to the needs of their citizens.

As far as we are concerned, there are 25 government departments and about 100 officials who are involved in a complete review of all recommendations made to the government in all areas under its jurisdiction.

Under the motion, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has accused the government of "discriminatory policies and statements regarding Canadian women in the labour force". In fact this was the theme of a speech which he gave in Toronto on February 19, 1978. He stated that the government was trying to hide the reality of unemployment among women and that "instead of doing the appropriate job of exploding myths, the government is perpetuating them".

Well, I would like to respond to the charge of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby by quoting from the text of a speech that I gave to the federal-provincial territorial meeting on the status of women in Ottawa on February 16, 1978, which was reported in the media. This is what I had to say:

> The growing weight of evidence points to the fact that women are entering the labour force for the same reasons as men—out of a need for self-realization and in order to maintain themselves and their families. Close to half of the three million women in the work force support themselves or others. More than one third are single. Another 10 per cent are widowed, divorced or separated. Recent studies indicate that more and more families are basing their standard of living on two incomes. A Statistics Canada study on income inequality suggests that in the growing number of families with two wage earners, employed wives play a considerable role in alleviating financial hardship, and to a lesser extent, poverty. These facts explode the myth that all women are secondary wage earners.

Clearly the government is not trying to hide the problems that unemployment poses for women in the labour force. If anything we are trying to make Canadians aware of the reasons behind the entry of women into the work force. On this point my remarks obviously succeeded in raising the consciousness of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, since three days later he echoed them in his speech.

What is happening in the economy? The hon. member referred to it in some parts of his speech. Since 1966 the Canadian labour force has increased by 37 per cent due to population growth, immigration, and rising participation rates. There has been a steady increase in the labour force participation rates of women of all ages, and adult women in particular. In the period between 1966 and 1976 the Canadian labour force participation rate of women rose from roughly 34 per cent to 45 per cent with the greatest increase in that age group often termed "prime age", that is, the age group between 25 and 44. The participation rate of adult women alone increased by 59 per cent over the same period and contributed significantly to the over-all labour force increase. In aggregate terms the economy responded well to the demands of women for employment. Employment growth among adult women relative to their population as compared to that among youth and adult males increased strongly over the last ten years.

As I pointed out, women have been entering the labour force not just out of a need for self-fulfilment, which is valid in itself, but increasingly for economic reasons to support themselves and their families. Whereas in the past women tended to enter the labour force during good times and drop out during bad times, their persistent high participation rates suggest that women in the work force are a phenomenon that is here to stay. This clearly invalidates the concept that all women are working for frills, as if they all had a "prime age male" to support them. We did not invent the "secondary wage earner" concept that economists use to describe the presence of women in the work place, nor are we stuck to it. Women want to, need to and, most importantly, have a right to work, and I agreed with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby when he stated something similar a few minutes ago.

What is important to recall, however, is that this is not something that can be done by the federal government alone. The federal parliament has authority over about only 10 per cent of the work force in this country. That implies that the provincial governments have large responsibilities over the work force also, and in a free country there are various voluntary organizations that are involved. This obviously implies the participation and the responsibility of the provincial governments as well as the federal government. It also involves a large role for the unions. I would like to pay tribute here to the women leaders of the labour movement such as Shirley Clark and Grace Hartman.

Some hon. Members: Carr.

Mr. Lalonde: I am sorry, Shirley Carr.

Mr. Clark: Clark is on your mind.

Mr. Lalonde: They are very active in the labour movement and occupy very prominent positions. I also want to compliment a few of these prominent labour leaders in this regard.

Quite clearly, there are whole areas of action that are still required in the labour movement. Here I would refer my colleagues to a research paper made public in Winnipeg recently on the labour movement, particularly in the building trades and the difficulties that women have and meet in the area of apprenticeships with regard to entrance into building trades.

If the unions have a responsibility, the employers also have a large role to play. In this regard they have to be involved in order to ensure that equal employment opportunities and equal pay for women are available in their plants. There is clearly a large task to be completed in the area of institutional change and change of attitude. For example, this implies action in the school system. What about the lack of appreciation by the school system, particularly for girls, of the benefits of working in industry and the necessity for our educational system to give more attention and more importance to training of women for the types of jobs they may later be called upon to perform?

We have been trying to act at the level of the public service. This is an area for which we, as a government, are directly responsible. This covers a large number of employees. It is quite clear that a lot still remains to be done in this area, but I would like to stress that the government has taken steps within the law and within the limits provided by the Public Service Employment Act and the autority of the Public Service Commission to try to improve opportunities for women in the public service.

I should like indeed to bring to your attention measures taken in November 1975 for instance, when guidelines were issued by the cabinet and government departments were given the main responsibility for developing action programs to reach the objectives of the government, and I quote:

> That within a reasonable period of time, the distribution of men and women within the public service by department, occupational groups and levels be proportional to the number of available, interested and competent employees of both sexes.

And for fiscal year 1977-78, on top of their annual program, the various departments had to develop long term programs, that is five year programs and measurable objectives. A study of data contained in the annual reports of the Public Service Commission shows that the percentage of women is slowly increasing in all occupational groups except in the scientific and professional category, where it remains the same. It is in the administrative and external service category that we can note the higher increase concerning the representation as well as the global distribution of women.

[English]

Steps have been taken. In 1975 directives were issued to departments to ensure that they had clear plans with regard to the promotion of women. It was insisted that they provide a five year plan to Treasury Board, showing their plan of action vis-à-vis their promotion of women. These are two very important steps to ensure that women are provided real equality of opportunity in the public service.

These plans have begun to show some results. Obviously one cannot go as fast as one would like. We are dealing here with people occupying jobs, collective agreements, and a system in the public service which everyone supports, the merit system. Quite clearly one cannot expect dramatic changes from year to year. What is important is that the trend being established is a positive one. It is quite clearly established by the statistics that have been published and made available up until this time.

While we have dealt with the promotion of women in the public service and on boards and commissions, we have also taken into consideration, in areas other than legislation, the needs of women across this country. Specifically, we have made funds available to women's groups across this country so that they might be better organized and to enable them to participate more fully in Canada's economic development. We are the only government in this country that has set aside special funds for this purpose. Some provinces will fund certain services traditionally viewed as women's services such as day care centres. However, not one government gives funds to women's organizations.

To what kinds of projects am I referring? During International Women's Year we allocated $5 million to enable the women of Canada to become aware of and knowledgeable about all the issues of concern to them.

The Secretary of State's women's program has had $500,000 every year for the last three or four years to fund projects of interest to women across the country. In that same department $300,000 is set aside every year for the funding of native women's programs. As the minister responsible for the status of women, I have a small fund which has been increased this year from $75,000 to $90,000. It enables grants to be given to national women's organizations for various activities that they might undertake. What have these been used for?

[Translation]

The Quebec Women Federation for instance has organized seminars and meetings to make Quebec women more aware of the political decision making process and encourage them to get more involved in politics and stand as candidates in municipal, provincial or federal elections—the fluency of the minister in both official languages.

[English]

In British Columbia a conference on women and economic development was held in November, 1977. Women from 42 single industry resource communities met to study the impact of economic development on women. In several parts of the country, workshops have been held. Public education programs have been organized. Newsletters have been published and annual meetings have been organized. All this is thanks to the federal funds.

In conclusion, while this issue has finally been raised at this late stage of this parliament, I wish to remind hon. members opposite that while they may be just awakening to the problems of women in the labour force, women themselves have long been taking the initiative to overcome these problems.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women will be meeting in Ottawa in mid-March to discuss women and the economy. Women are also giving a great deal of attention to the choices girls of 12 and 13 make when they enter high school, for they know that all too often the choice of a commercial course will limit those girls to a lifetime of low-paid, clerical support work. Women themselves are addressing the fundamental questions, and have been doing so for well over the past decade.

Women know, only too well, that there are no short-cuts to gaining equality. We wish there were, but there are not. Women are not impressed by the new found lip service that members of the opposition are hatching in order to try to show their latter-day opportunistic concern for women.

• (1652)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I shall be very brief. Early in his comments the minister referred to my own office. He said he was pleased to note there were eight women in my office, but he did not mention that this number constitutes two thirds of my staff. He then went on to say that none of them were in senior positions. For his information, Mr. Speaker, I would tell him that of our senior positions on the staff, 50 per cent of them—two of them—are held by women. I also wish to tell him that of a research staff numbering eight, half of them are women. The director of organization of the NDP is a woman. The post of assistant federal secretary of our party, a senior administrative position, is filled by a woman. The media director for the coming election campaign is a woman. The assistant director of organization is a woman. Four provincial secretaries—major administrative positions in the New Democratic Party—are women. The major administrative officers in Ontario, British Columbia, Manitoba and Nova Scotia are women.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, I would suggest to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) that a dispute as to facts is not a question of privilege but, rather, a matter of debate.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the interjection by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) indicated that the minister responsible for the status of women was as much in control of his facts in his speech just concluded as he usually is—which is not at all.

I want to begin my remarks by commending the Leader of the New Democratic Party for taking the initiative in introducing this very important debate into the House of Commons. I think that commendation is particularly deserved when the stand he took is contrasted with the attitude shown by the minister who, sadly for women and other people in Canada, is responsible for the status of women in this country. I was frankly shocked that a minister who has been talking so long about his plan of action, when provided with an opportunity to spell out to the people and the Parliament of Canada exactly what that plan of action is, resorted instead to petty, partisan attacks. What he has done is to show that he is prepared to demean any principle and demean any case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I was struck by his observation that he was pleased the House of Commons finally had an opportunity to discuss these things. Well, as we know and as Canadians broadly should know, it is the Government of Canada which controls the agenda of the House of Commons, and if this government were really committed and really concerned about the status of women in this country it has had abundant opportunity to bring legislation before us—

Mrs. Holt: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Instead, this minister goes around repeating recycled speeches and doing very little indeed for the women of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In fact, I think the weakness of his case has been betrayed. We have had in this House for a long time the benefit of simultaneous translation. I have listened and have envied la facilité du ministre dans les deux langues officielles du pays.

But I think this is the first time that the minister has risen in this House and has said exactly the same thing in English as he said in French. He was doing that when he was reading the list of accomplishments of the Government of Canada in the field of women. They have done so little that he had to repeat the list.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Even though the minister chose not to deal with the substance of the motion before us, I wish to do so. The two fundamental points made clear in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby are, first, that we continue to be a country where there is not equality in fact for the women of Canada and, second, that this condition becomes seriously and dangerously aggravated when we have serious economic problems such as we are facing at the present time. The women of Canada are the first to suffer when the economy is in decline; they are the first to suffer when unemployment is as acute as it is in this country now. Any government which refuses to recognize this fact, which refuses to take the opportunity to get the economy rolling, deserves the support of neither the women nor the men who comprise the electorate and citizenry of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I was amused to hear the minister talk about the degree to which women themselves are addressing the subject of the status of women. There has never been any question about that. We did not need the editorial comment of the minister to know about it. The sad fact is that while women have been addressing their problems and doing what they can, the one entity in Canada which has the power to change the laws of Canada is the Government of Canada and it has done very very little to help women in their task. That is the reason for this motion; that is the reason for the consistent concern of those of us who intend to form the next government in Canada to put on the agenda of this country and of this parliament some of the specific reforms which we want to act on very quickly. We want to see that women no longer have to put up with recycled speeches from that minister, but will instead have an agenda for action which we in my party propose, by an amendment later today, to introduce onto the floor of the House of Commons.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party and the minister referred to some of the very real problems which exist for Canadian women. I want to deal with two of the myths which I believe, regretfully, have been put forward by members of the government in trying to defend themselves for not taking action to stimulate the Canadian economy in an attempt to defend the indefensible.

More than a million Canadians are out of work. We are in an economy in which we do not know how many more people would enter the work force were there an active work force for them to enter. Particularly do I refer to women. But two very vicious myths are now in circulation. One of those is that working women take jobs which would otherwise be taken by men. Another is that many of the women who work in this country do so simply as a luxury, not because they need to do so but simply because they want to—as if that were not reason enough. I want to deal with those two aspects if I may, first, the myth that married women take jobs from married men who have families to support. The statistics are clear.

In 1977 there were 2,212,000 married women in the Canadian labour force. In 1977 212,000 married men were unemployed. The fact is clear from those two figures that if married women stopped working two million jobs would be unfilled.

One of the points is the types of jobs to which Canadian women are too often confined. Although the number of women in the Canadian labour force is increasing, the types of jobs that they are doing have changed very little. The kinds of jobs are traditionally those of secretaries, nurses, tellers, teachers or clerks. These remain basically unchanged, and this underlines the point that simply decreasing the number of women in the labour force will not significantly help the unemployment situation for men in Canada. The jobs which would be vacated by women getting out of the labour force are certainly not the jobs which men would fill. That is the first myth.

The second, and perhaps the more pernicious, is the idea that women work simply for luxuries. Again, if I may refer to figures for January 28 of this year, there were 4,015,000 women in the labour force of whom 391,000 were either divorced, widowed or separated, supporting themselves or their dependents. Another 1,167,000 were single women supporting themselves. These people were clearly not looking upon work as a luxury but as a necessity, and the right to enjoy equal access to jobs is of fundamental importance to them. Again, in relation to married women who are working, according to an economist for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, almost 45 per cent of the married women in the labour force belong to families which, but for their earnings, would be living well below the poverty line. It is these people who suffer most by the continual refusal of the government to accept its responsibilities and get the Canadian economy moving again.

I do not want to suggest that the problem is simply one the solution of which is at the feet of this government. I think there is no sector of society that can be proud of its record in recognizing the modern reality that women in this country deserve the right to work as equals with men. If we look at industry, the statistics show that discrimination continues very severely in many industries in the country. In 1976, Labour Canada statistics show that of people in management and administrative categories in the country only 18.6 per cent are women. Similarly of Canadians working in engineering, research and mathematics, categories that can be seen as being executive or senior positions, only 9.6 per cent are women. We have no absolute data on the private sector but we have some startling statistics which have to do with government incursions, particularly the incursions of the Government of Canada into the private sector relating to Crown corporations.

It might be useful to the House, since the minister who is so proud of the record of his government is here, to review the role of women in senior management in some of the Crown corporations in this country. In Canadian National Railways, in senior management positions there are 1,014 men and 2 women; in Air Canada, in senior management positions there are 158 men and 1 woman; in the Bank of Canada in senior management positions there are 17 men and 1 woman; in the National Harbours Board in senior positions there are 55 men and 3 women. That is an indication of the degree of commitment of this government to ensure that emanations of the Government of Canada reflect in reality equality for the women of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Goyer: How many women do you have in parliament?

Mr. Clark: We will have a great many more from the Dollard constituency.

Mr. Goyer: I invite you personally.

Mr. Clark: I am very pleased the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) has returned from Africa. I am sure that if an issue arises relating to his department regarding which questions might be placed to him, he will get out of the country again.

In relation to organized labour and to labour unions, I think it is appropriate for the minister to pay tribute to some of the women leaders in union movements in the country who have played a prominent role. But it is also important for us to recognize that labour unions have not been active enough in trying to organize among Canadians in lower income groups where working women tend to predominate. That is a record of which the unions of the country cannot be proud, just as industries in the country cannot be proud of their record in terms of ensuring that there is an adequate role and a more nearly equal role for women in the direction of Canadian industry.

Certainly in relation to the Public Service of Canada I will say, without getting into this matter at any length at this time, that the statistics speak for themselves. To the end of December 31, 1977, there were 95,922 women in the public service, only 33.9 per cent of the total public service labour force. What is even more striking than that is what those people earn. Of that, nearly 100,000 women in the public service only 299 earn more than $30,000 a year. That indicates again that we have not made nearly enough progress in industry, in unions, and in the government in trying to ensure a more nearly equal opportunity for the women of this country.

Naturally we intend to support the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. It is a motion which deserves support and I hope it will receive it from all corners of the House. But I think that the danger with that motion, its weakness and limitation, are that it is not sufficiently specific, and I can understand the reason for it. Later on I will be submitting an amendment which I hope will add some specific proposals on which the Government and the Parliament of Canada may act immediately. Certainly, with regard to the general nature of that motion, it is important that we recognize in the country how badly served Canadian women are by the current economic situation.

The most recent figures available to us indicate—I am quoting now from the document called "Women in the Labour Force":

> The average annual earnings of men employees who worked 50 to 52 weeks, increased $4,183 from 1969 to 1974 compared with $2,369 for women.

There is obviously a case of a double standard there. In the same publication we read:

> The average annual earnings of women employees who worked 40 to 49 weeks were $4,293 in 1974, compared with $8,463 for men. The earnings of men exceeded those of women by 97.1 per cent.

The publication goes on to state:

> Averaged across the country, average hourly industrial wage rates for men exceeded those of women in all similarly described occupations for which data were available in 1975.

Those are not new statistics. That is precisely the problem. That situation has been in existence for far too long, and this is the government which has mounted a campaign of public relations in place of action. It should have accepted its obligation to change those statistics which continue to condemn women to a secondary position in the life of Canada.

As I said, the motion of my friend, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, is clearly accurate in its generality, but it is important that we specify some of the individual reforms on which we can act now and on which the government can act now, given its control of the agenda, and could introduce quickly in the House, if it actually wanted to give priority to these matters.

We have to bear in mind that even though the problems of women are aggravated by the serious economic problems of this country, even in good times there will continue to be a double standard which is discriminatory against women in this country, unless the government in Ottawa is prepared to accept more reforms, to be bolder and to honor its commitments and act, instead of talking, in direct contrast to the way this government has proceeded.

There are some reforms that are directly within the control of the government. One of them relates to the discriminatory practices of federal government agencies. Clearly one of them is the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In the comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance program in Canada women are referred to as "secondary income earners with unstable employment patterns", thus leaving the reader that strong impression that their salaries are not an essential part of the family income. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women indicates that it has received a number of complaints from women who have been discriminated against when applying for and receiving unemployment insurance benefits. One could go on at some length quoting from that record, but the fact is that we need to eliminate those discriminatory practices. We need new training and job placement assistance for unemployed women in Canada, and that should be acted upon by this government as a priority.

We have seriously discriminatory laws which could be changed with little trouble in this country. Colleagues of mine will be speaking at greater length later. One of the problems has to do with the tax situation of unincorporated small businesses and farms. It is not permitted now to extend salaries to working wives. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) will, I am sure, elaborate on the problem that this causes for Canadian women. A second discriminatory law, which will be again a matter raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, has to do with the pension situation in this country. There are a number of matters that have to be changed there, but we want to give parliament an opportunity to address itself to the most unfair single instance of discrimination in the matter of pensions, that is, the instance of female spouses who receive spouse's allowance because their husbands are eligible by age for pensions. In this country, with a government which claims to care about women, that allowance is cut off when the spouse who receives the pension dies. This means that in the case of too many women across the country we have a situation where they are left without a spouse and without a pension at the same time. Clearly that must be changed, and any government which was prepared to honour its commitment truly to women would be acting on that change immediately and would receive quick support from this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Within the direct responsibility of the government there are a number of programs where the government, instead of repeating old speeches, can set an example of equality. I think of the career assignment program. I understand that even though this program is designed to develop the individual for advancement into senior levels of the civil service, at present the maximum quota for women is 10 per cent. That is a clear discrimination established by the government itself.

● (1712)

Again, there should be changes in the approach to the administrative trainee program. In 1976 less than one per cent of those people eligible to participate in this program actually participated. This is a statistic from the annual report of the Public Service Commission. The reason given for this is that the very low participation by women can be accounted for by the fact that the program is not at all widely promoted, and people at that level are support people who are considered to be too valuable in their present capacities to be allowed the time to improve their qualifications.

With all that in mind, and those changes that can be introduced on behalf of and in the interests of the women in Canada, in approving of the general direction of the motion introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands:

That the motion be amended by adding thereto the following words:

and consequently directs the government immediately to act to end such discrimination and ensure equality for women particularly by developing policies:

(1) to eliminate discriminatory manpower and unemployment insurance commission practices and implement new training and job placement assistance for unemployed women;

(2) to encourage women's participation in unincorporated family farms and businesses by allowing the deduction of salaries paid to spouses;

(3) to ensure that women are not deprived of spouse's security pension benefits upon their husband's death; and,

(4) to accelerate the promotion of women to an equitable share of senior public service positions by guaranteeing their access to executive training such as the Career Advancement Program.

[Mr. Clark.]

In his remarks the minister admitted that not everything has been done. What we have done in this amendment is spell out four areas in which the government could act immediately. This amendment gives the Government of Canada an opportunity to take action today on a real agenda of reformation for the women of Canada. It is a place to start in making this a country of equal opportunity for Canadian women. I hope the minister and the government will remember the reality of their claim of interest in the women of Canada by supporting these specific recommendations for action on behalf of women, action that can be taken now if the Government of Canada chooses to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I trust the House will bear with me by allowing me to consider the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). It does contain proposals that are perhaps extensions to the main motion. I should like to consider the motion between now and eight o'clock in order to make a decision. In the meantime I will recognize the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier).

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first I would want to commend the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) for putting to the House this motion that women ought to have the same rights as men, on a social level as well as in all economic sectors, and we want to condemn the present government, as well as all its predecessors, for its discriminatory policies regarding Canadian women.

This is not the first time we ask the government to table legislation which will free women from past myths and allow them to live freely in all spheres of this century of change. Quoting numerous pieces of legislation passed by the House, I stated that almost 75 per cent of our so-called social legislation is in fact anti-social legislation, from the oldest and most archaic to the most recent. The government tables an impeccable bill, which at first sight we would tend to approve, but further study reveals that it is only eyewash, although many hon. members fall for it.

The laws governing our economy were written for one purpose only, that of protecting the strong while crushing the weak; and when the weak are too poor, too much in debt, then the government acts the good Samaritan and comes to their help with a pittance to keep them from starving to death. That is the very basis of our beautiful capitalistic economy. Let us add to that the conviction that our society is made up of the stronger sex and the weaker one, and the picture is complete. Speaking of the weaker sex, Mr. Speaker, by which term we still designate today's woman, the newspapers told us the best one yet a few weeks ago by relaying some statistics. In Canada, country of traditions, the large majority of husbands still beat their wives, while in the United States we have proof that more wives beat their husbands than vice versa. We can therefore say the United States beat us to the punch on that one. Will we see the day when women will become the stronger sex? Everything is possible with modern techniques!

In revising our few statutes on women, we are surprised to discover that some of them seem unalterable. Since I have been sitting in this House, and especially during the six election campaigns in which I have taken part, how many people have I heard plead the case against the secular discrimination which has been the lot of women? Men as well as women MP's have begged parliament to do justice to the women who work and the women who have chidren. And we will hear more of them even today but will that change anything? Not much if we go by past interventions. We had the Year of the Woman and no law of substance was passed; that is to say that we still hang on to the traditional laws that go back to Canada's beginnings, or were even transmitted directly to us from their countries of origin where women had no legal rights though they participated personally and to a large extent in the economy of the country.

Perhaps some will say that I am exaggerating and that today's woman is a first class member of our society. Let us rather consider the case of a legally wedded couple and let us suppose that both spouses are working outside and that they decide to buy a house. Do you know that legally speaking the husband alone can sign the contract? If the representative of the law invites the wife to sign it is merely a gesture of courtesy on his part for her signature has only a symbolic value. The true owner of the building is the husband even if his wife pays for two-thirds of it. Yet no one among our great legal wizards who are ruling us has the courage to rid our society of this backward tradition which is so humiliating for working women.

The same system applies to the rights regarding children. Although it is the mother who bears the child and gives him birth it is the father who exercises the basic rights. However, only the mother can confirm who is the father of a child for in our funny society, one has to realize that if the husband can fool his wife the opposite may also be true. So there is a risk of granting to the man rights which he never had on the child in the first place.

When the supporter of this motion blames the government for its discriminatory wage policy toward women in the labour force I concede that perhaps the government should have acted more rapidly. However one must not forget that it is the industrial sector which opened its doors to women first, and given the fact that after the thirties the big industries were the masters in the field of employment, since the unions had not yet started to organize the workers, you can conclude that it was not for humanitarian considerations that these same companies called on women workers but rather to get cheap labour.

In spite of tremendous hardships and obstacles, women, as well as men, have slowly organized to improve their working conditions. Some will ask why the governments of the time did not react. It was just impossible. Just as it is not yet possible today for the good reason that no one can serve two masters at a time. The governments have always been dependent on financiers. This is the main reason, although unavowed, why the government can not act directly to end discrimination against female workers in Canada.

We have always advocated equal pay for equal work. We will continue to say that a woman deserves equal retribution in relation with her work in any area of the economy. As so well stated the other day by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), we will continue to fight to obtain an income for the mother at home.

Mr. Speaker, we consider that if there is an an individual who takes part in the Canadian economy it is the mother who devotes every minute of her time to her home to protect the necessary human assets for the survival of Canada. As for myself, I feel that the part of the mother working at home to educate her children and take care of them is much superior to that of a social or industrial worker. This is why they deserve more from this country. In fact, we are dealing with discrimination against women in Canada, but the worst kind of discrimination involving the greatest number of women in Canada is the one faced by homemakers. For the most part they accepted their role of their free will and accord. They are accused of having chosen the ghetto. But shopwork would have condemned them to feeding machines, a 100 times more enslaving type of occupation. At least, they have no bosses, they are self-employed. And they perform the most marvelous, the most needed type of function in the country, to which that of senior bureaucrats is no match. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I had the sad surprise of reading in Hansard for February 27, 1978 the statements by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). She could not sit here and listen to this kind of tokenism, perpetuation of role locking a woman into the role of homemaker a place in life she may not choose. Utterly ridiculous, indeed utterly false. She even added, for the benefit of husbands, if you want to pay your wife, pay her yourself; the country should not have to pay the cost. As if the freely and consciously married woman were her husband's slave. I object to that suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, how could the husband pay his wife when he gets the same salary as a bachelor, and still he has one or two or three children to support on top of that? The hon. member no doubt will say, as did the minister this afternoon, that the husband has an income tax deduction for his wife and children. Do you believe a deduction will pay for the clothes and apparel needed by his wife? Family allowances will not even pay for children's food, let alone clothes and the cost of education. Who would suggest this could balance the family budget? It is financially impossible. This financial aspect is responsible for the worst kind of discrimination at home, and the homemaker is the first victim because she will not be able to afford help for well deserved holidays. She will even have to do without things needed in order to ensure her children's future. This prompts us to urge homemakers' salaries.

As I said, I object to the comments by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. First, because outside work does not necessarily free women, and second, because homemakers, just like their husbands are committed to the care of their children the human stock needed by every country. Unless the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway feels human stock is less important than the stock of money, I cannot find an explanation to her reaction to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Bellechasse.

I see no discrimination in the fact that a mother would choose to stay home to take care of her children, since this would not be for her a ghetto, but a liberation, and a freely chosen liberation. Moreover, I do not believe that a mother who takes care exclusively of her family has been forced into it. This is not true! If the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway were to communicate with several of the charwomen who work at night in the Parliament buildings, perhaps she would change her mind because I contacted them myself and I know that 75 per cent of them would be very happy to stay home if they had a guaranteed income.

In reading the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, I wondered if she had ever met happy families, and I mean by this a man, a woman and children. There still are households where there is no discrimination, where the father and mother are partners who live in harmony with the children because there is a dialogue based on mutual trust. We do not hear about those families, perhaps because, as the song says, happy people have no story while the unfortunate proclaim their misfortune. This is why they seem to outnumber happy people. If the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway came to my constituency, I could show her families with two, three, four and even five children who would tell her: We are happy. We are not millionnaires, but we have love and basic security. Of course, it is always necessary to improve the financial situation, but the social situation is healthy and this is the most important. Of course, the husband works hard in the fields, in the plant or thousands of feet under ground in the mines for 20 or 25 years, and I can assure you that he has no time for outside amusement like the hon. member suggests.

During all those years, the housewife has a marvellous role to play and she participates voluntarily in our Canadian economy. To this woman, I would say: You deserve more credit than all social workers, all women at work in industry, all secretaries and even many members of Parliament. If we honour the soldier who gives his life for his country, how should we reward the housewife who gives several lives to her country? When we speak about discrimination, we should be very careful, because we can often provoke it unknowningly, just like we are most often the cause of our own misfortune, because we often want too much when happiness is quite near. We must never forget that happiness is a state of mind in that those who look for it exclusively elsewhere expose themselves to terrible deceptions.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) in a moment. I have examined the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Instead of waiting until eight o'clock to announce a decision, I will make my ruling now. I feel that the amendment does not add any matter which is foreign to the basic proposal contained in the motion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). I admit that the amendment does single out specific alternatives, but it would achieve the same objective. I think it just adds to the first proposal. I am therefore putting now to the House the amendment proposed earlier by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am usually careful not to attribute motives to speakers, but I really wonder what we are all doing here today. I once said to a reporter that I felt we in Ottawa were living in a fishbowl. If that is true, I think today's fishbowl is full of red herrings.

The mover of this motion, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), has been around this House for ten years. According to Hansard, in those ten years he has spent a grand total of 29 minutes speaking about the status of women. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has been in this parliament seven years, and he has spent the grand total of five minutes speaking about the status of women. At first a woman might think it is great that some people are really interested in our status, in our predicament and in our well being, and she might wonder what will come of all this, but the speakers who have given us their gems of wisdom so far have been highly selective with the statistics they have been using.

They have been even more selective with the types of women they would like to help. Members of the NDP discuss only working women. The motion before us today states the following:

> That this House asserts that the women of Canada ought to have fully equal rights in participating in the Canadian economy . . .

What a statement! Is that to say that up until now the women of Canada have had no participation in the Canadian economy? Shame! If it had not been for the women of Canada we would not have an economy at all, and hon. members should get that into their heads. The motion presumes that women have had nothing to do with the economy and have been so downtrodden that they have not done anything. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby forgets that the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada is a woman. Who appointed her? It was not the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby—he could not do that—but this government, which is now being soundly chastised for not having done its job with regard to women.

Is it not interesting that the member now speaking also happens to be a woman? I was not elected because I was a woman. I did not want that. I was elected because the people of York South thought I would be a good representative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: I said I would try to overlook motives, even though there is something asking me whether this is really real or something phony like a $3 bill.

On December 14 we were discussing the Canada Labour Code in this House. As vice-chairman of the committee discussing the Canada Labour Code, Bill C-8—and I have been around all the time—I can say that one particular clause recognizes not only the importance of women but also the needs of women. One of those needs is maternity leave. One would think that the opposition parties, which are so concerned about us poor things, would welcome maternity leave. Not on your sweet life! On December 14 the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) said the following:

Turning to the Canada Labour Code, I would like to point out that section 59(4) of the code currently prohibits the dismissal of pregnant employees . . .

Let me just stop there. In an effort to give us equal status hon. members have to find words other than "women". Let me point out that only women can be pregnant. In order to avoir being called sexist or something, he calls us "pregnant employees". Good for him. He went on:

● (1742)

. . . prohibits the dismissal of pregnant employees only if they have compiled twelve consecutive months of continuous employment. That condition—

The condition of employment, not of pregnancy.

—is now to be removed altogether, but I suggest the problem with regard to pregnancy is not solved that easily . . .

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) obviously knows that pregnancy is a very serious problem and it is not easy to solve. He continued:

I suppose legislators feel that being pregnant should not be a job disqualification under any circumstances.

I am trying hard not to laugh, Mr. Speaker.

However, with certain people pregnancy is almost incapacitating. As long as pregnant employees can do their usual work, no one complains;—

Isn't that nice!

—but in certain circumstances pregnant employees are often just 'around' and are not in a physical condition to contribute their usual work output. In some instances, this amounts to wages without any work being performed. The matter of pregnancy should be studied further.

I agree.

Pregnancy cannot be treated as a nonevent, and a pregnant person—

We are getting better, Mr. Speaker; now it is a "pregnant person".

—should not automatically receive the usual work benefits.

Mr. Speaker, is this the kind of view that would come from a person who is genuinely interested in the status of women? He could not even bring himself to say it is a woman who has a baby. If he does not understand the fundamental point it is rather superfluous to continue from there. I am not saying that his thinking is typical of the Tory party, heaven forbid! I could not bring myself to say that. I might think it on several occasions but I will never say it. This is the kind of thing that the women of Canada are faced with.

Hon. members opposite cannot even talk properly. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition was trying not to laugh. Frankly, I think he was trying not to gag and it was his nervousness that made him seem as if he were trying not to laugh. Why are people so hung up? I can tell you why, Mr. Speaker, and this is what is at the bottom of the problems of women in Canada and in the world. People use rhetoric and phrases like "equal rights", "equal pay". The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) said "equal pay for equal work." If that is what he is looking for I think we are going to be in trouble not for the next ten years but for the next ten centuries.

What I want for the women of Canada is equality of status—to know that we are exactly the same, that we have the same dignity whether we choose to work outside the home or inside the home. If people are going to get hung up on big rhetorical sentences like "equal pay" and "equal job opportunities," that will be absolutely devastating to the women of Canada. Those who prefer to stay at home and mind their children—and God bless them, they are the foundation of our society—would get a complex. Must they go out and produce for the gross national product? That is a kind of thing they are being pushed into and they resent it. We must stop these pious utterances and get down to an understanding of where we are. If hon. members do not have that understanding they should have the humility to ask.

I listened to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and thought that as a socialist he sounded terribly snobbish. He graded jobs and spoke of those that could be rejected by men. The jobs he rejected, the ones that he gave the impression he thought were a little bit below human dignity, were clerical jobs and sales jobs. What is the matter with any job at all as long as it is done by a person who enjoys doing it? The person who does the secretarial job or any other kind should never be told that he or she is inferior by reason of the job. That has nothing to do with human dignity. To tell a person that she or he is "down" is a self-fulfilling prophecy. If they want to move from jobs they should be encouraged.

How can this be done? Let us consider the work force again, and ask why most women have problems entering it. One reason is lack of education, and that it can be formal education. But more than, that it is attitude. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby spoke of his children, a boy of 18, and a girl of five. The girl is only five, Mr. Speaker, but he was worried about whether she would get a good job. If my child were still five I would be worried about whether she would be a happy human being. That is all there is to it. Does she want a job, or does she want to stay home? If she decides to stay home, will she be given the same dignity as if she had a Ph.D. in sociology or something else? Will she be given opportunities not because she is a girl but because she is a person? That is what we want in this country—equality of status; we want all to be treated the same, whether male or female. I do not know if that is happening, Mr. Speaker.

I hope I heard the hon. member for Roberval correctly—or maybe it would be better if I had not heard him correctly. I think he told us that in Canada we have a very large percentage of battered wives. That is true and it is a terrible tragedy for society. Then he said things were better in the United States because they had battered husbands and maybe one day we would catch up to them. I want to tell the hon. member that if he thinks that getting equality of status for women means that Canadian women can batter their husbands, he should forget it. We do not want that kind of equality.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to make myself clear because I have not said a great percentage. I wanted to make a joke, but she did not even understand the joke. How can she make herself understood?

An hon. Member: That's a good joke you have just made!

[English]

Mrs. Appolloni: I suggest he add that to the record, Mr. Speaker—joke, joke, joke. I was not amused but that is another point.

I hope that when speaking in this debate hon. members will try not to patronize; there is nothing we want less than a patronizing attitude, attitudes such as "Sure we will help you, little DP", as I have sometimes been called. We do not want a pat on the rear or any other part of the anatomy. We want help when we ask for it, and constructive help, not the patronizing help that we have had for so long, though not from this government.

Now I come back to motives, Mr. Speaker. I think the real cause of our problems is attitudes. We all know that attitudes cannot be legislated but they can be influenced by legislation. I have to say that this government does just that. Bill C-8 is a classic example of what the government is trying to do. Apart from the maternity leave clause, there is nothing in the bill that puts women lower than their male counterparts, and for that I am grateful.

The Leader of the Opposition said that his party is concerned about UIC. Maybe he did not know he was talking to a person who was chairman of the board of referees of the UIC. As hon. members can see, I happen to be female. But I did not get that job because I was female, I got it because I was a damned good chairman. That is what we should have all the time. Do not put us in just because we are female. You are not doing any good to any person by setting up society, Mr. Speaker. Put us in because you take the trouble to listen to what we are saying, and then act upon it.

I remember that in 1974, like every other candidate, I had to sign my nomination form in the returning officer's office. One part of the form asked for my occupation. I could have said I was a musician, which is true. I could have said I am a writer, which is also true. I could have said I am a social worker, which is also true. But I did not say I was any of those. I put down the occupation which has given me the most satisfaction in my life, that is, the rearing of my children. I could not say "child rearer" because they would have thought I was peculiar, so I put down "housewife". Mr. Speaker, you have no idea of the kind of reaction I have had to that since and during my campaign—"You, a housewife!"

I must say that this attitude, this negativeness, did not come only from men. I remember I was canvassing in one particularly rich, affluent part of my riding which contained beautiful big houses. I knocked at the door and this beautifully coiffured woman came to the door. Her nails were manicured. It had been raining that day and I had been canvassing. I probably looked like a drowned dog. I said: "Hi, I am your candidate". Behind her I could see a woman who was scrubbing the floors very hard. This woman at the door said: "I cannot vote for you, you are only a housewife, just like me".

I was not like her at all because I had no one at home scrubbing my floors and I did not have time to have my hair done or my nails manicured. The whole point was her attitude of putting me down. I could have argued and said that I am this and that, which was all true, but I decided that as a matter of privilege and principle I would not do that. I may have lost her vote, but quite frankly I do not think I was going to get it in the first place. This is the kind of attitude that we must get rid of. It is the kind of attitude that women face in the labour force everywhere. A woman applies for a job and first of all she is looked up and down. They wonder when she will become pregnant or if she will become pregnant. Whether a woman is married or not has nothing to do with that; we have got beyond that stage, thank heaven. That is the first thought, the biological one.

Then they wonder if the woman will become emotional in any given situation. Since when have women had the monopoly on emotion? This is the kind of stereotype which we have been prone to all our lives. Things are getting better, they are improving. Let us keep it like that.

I would ask members of the opposition, indeed members of all three parties, if they are sincere in their efforts, to do something concrete. But please do not give women any more platitudes. Do not patronize them. If hon. members want to find the real culprit, make sure they point the finger at the right person. It is not the government of Canada.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the two interventions this afternoon from the government benches I realized with sorrow just how far women have to go to attain equality in this country.

May I call it six o'clock at this time, sir?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, March 8, this Wednesday, has been declared International Women's Day by the United Nations. Whether it is appropriate or not that in this day and age a day must be set aside for the recognition of the rights of half the world's population is debatable in itself, but surely it is less than appropriate, in fact downright degrading, that in the Canadian House of Commons in 1978 it should be necessary to discuss the discrimination and inequities against women in the labour force. We should long ago have arrived at the point where equality of women in the work force is a matter of fact and not a matter of debate. That this issue must still be debated, that the necessity for it exists, is a sad reflection on Canadian society.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) this afternoon clearly stated where the Progressive Conservative party stands and the concerns that we have on the motion presented in the House today. However, I would like to pay tribute to one of the continuing advocates of women's rights in this House, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Consistently over the years he has spoken out on behalf of women, especially with regard to their woefully inadequate pension situation. I, along with thousands of Canadians, was appalled at the recent unkind and unnecessary reference by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the hon. member as a left-over from the depression days. I cannot emphasize enough that the country and certainly the government can do with much more of the concern and compassion shown by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That concern and compassion are rooted in his memories of the depression and the setback and resulting inequities that that depression caused the women in the labour force. The Prime Minister and his colleagues, who cannot or will not remember those injustices, seem only too willing to let them happen again now at a time when our economy is once more being hit by high prices and high unemployment.

In 1975 the United Nations General Assembly adopted the World Plan of Action as a guideline for the international decade for women, 1976-1985. The minister seemed to have heard about it for the first time this afternoon. Well, Canada supported that program. It supported the plan of action. One of the steps recommended at that time was set out in these terms:

> Governments should formulate policies and action programs, directed toward equality of opportunity and treatment for women workers, to guarantee their right to equal pay.

Further, to ensure that declaration, it recommended:

> Special efforts are needed to foster positive attitudes among employers, workers, men and women in society and to eliminate obstacles based on sex-typed divisions of labour.

When it comes to special efforts to foster positive attitudes, as the United Nations agreement recommended, this government's lack of concern and inaction are laid bare, because any special efforts that the government has undertaken in recent months seem to have been designed to foster negative, not positive, attitudes.

Why do I say that? At times of high unemployment, there is, unfortunately, tragically still a backlash against women in the work force. It has happened before and it is happening again now. Anyone who is aware of the social development and the changes of the twenties and thirties will be quick to see the comparison with today. In the twenties, women made great inroads into the labour force, but the lack of jobs in the thirties created social pressures on them and the result was that many women left the labour market.

Again in the sixties and seventies we saw women making inroads into the job market. But now at a time of high unemployment the old, socially ingrained assumptions about the status of women, assumptions which are being fostered by the government, are reappearing and serve to build up a guilt complex about whether women have the right to be full members of the labour force. Did the government fulfil its commitment to foster positive attitudes? No. Instead, the government has led the way in subtly applying pressure on women by equating the high unemployment figures with the increased participation of women in the work force.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) did this directly. In his speech in Toronto on January 16, he said:

> In the next year, unemployment will again depend to a considerable extent on the participation rate, especially among women and young people.

Then on February 16, the minister responsible for the status of women pointed to the rise in the participation of both women and youth in the labour force and said:

> This suggests a degree of competition for jobs between youth and women over 25, a hypothesis which tends to be supported by the fact that employment of young people and adult women is concentrated in similar industrial sectors.

On the surface these statements may not appear to be terribly damnable. Evidently the government does not think so.

The minister responsible for the status of women says such statements simply reflect reality. In response to a question I put to him on this matter, he replied:

> I rejoice, as does this government, in the fact that women are joining the work force in greater numbers but obviously one should not ignore this phenomenon in terms of its impact on unemployment.

In my view, these statements, which are so characteristic of the government, are damnable and they are doubly so. First, they encourage negative attitudes about women in the work force, creating social pressures on women to get out of the labour market and inciting fear in others that their jobs might be threatened.

In the second place, those statements are not true. They are myths masquerading as excuses for the government's lack of solutions to the country's economic ills. They are not borne out by the facts. Women are not taking jobs from men. Regrettable though it is, there is still job segregation in this country. Women are still filling, for the most part, clerical and service positions. They are stenographers, typists or receptionists, cooks, waitresses, hairdressers, teachers. Three quarters of all working women are employed in only five occupational categories—clerical, services, sales, nursing and teaching. The labour force is "ghettoized". Women hold the jobs that men have traditionally turned away from. Not only that, but the jobs in which the women in the work force are slotted are the lower paid ones. Women are locked into a system which pays them less when they work and less when they retire.

When I questioned the basis of that ministerial statement linking high unemployment to the participation of women in the work force, I did so with good reason. In what sectors are the highest pockets of male unemployment to be found? One immediately thinks of construction, forestry and logging, mining, fishing and trapping. We saw recently that 3,000 miners were laid off in Sudbury and Thompson. It was not women marching into the mines that put those men out of work. Adult women are not competing with young engineers or young graduates, or young welders and woodworkers. If there is, in fact, any competition going on for jobs between women and men, it is that because of the bad employment situation men are moving into areas which have traditionally been filled by women. This would be laudable if it reflected a change in attitude, if it really did mean desegregation of the job market rather than a mere reflection of the shortage of jobs. The Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario tells us that the traditional female occupation of elementary teaching has seen an increase of 10 per cent in the number of men and a drop of 5 per cent in the number of women in the past five years. Now I ask: Who is taking jobs from whom in this situation?

A second myth, one which goes hand in hand with the first, is that women are second wage earners and that their jobs are a luxury. This is simply not true. Over a million and a half are working women who are either single, widowed, separated or divorced. They do not have a husband's salary to fall back on. Many of these are single parents with just as many financial commitments as their male colleagues, perhaps more.

The worst myth of all, and the one that lurks behind the other two, is that women who work in the home and who are dependent on their husband's incomes are automatically taken care of for life. None of the myths about women fly so directly into the face of reality as does this one.

Let me tell the House something about these women, the ones who worked at home for husband, family and community and who are now widowed or divorced. Some of them are in the position in which they find themselves today because they gave in to the social pressures of the thirties and left the work force. The recent report of the Canadian Council on Social Development states, with regard to women and pensions, that the rate of poverty among the female elderly is shocking. Using the poverty line established by the Senate Committee on Poverty, $3,988 for a single person based on 1975 data, we find that almost two thirds of women aged between 65 and 70 and three-quarters of women aged 70 and over are poor; they do not receive an income of $3,988.

That is the situation of women over 65. The plight of women between 60 and 65 who are widowed, divorced or single is simply appalling. They are not entitled to the old age pension or to the guaranteed income supplement. They are not supported by a husband and they are often unable to get work because of their age. After years of faithful service to their homes and society, these women are at the mercy of the welfare rolls.

Let me read just one letter from one of these women, a widow who can no longer work and who lives on $1,850 a year. This woman was left a widow in 1953. She had three young children to look after. She writes:

> I went back to school . . . and looking after my children was all I could manage. My parents looked after my 3 while I was away at school for the few hours . . . when my oldest daughter turned 14 she went to work at Xmas, Easter and summer holidays. The same with the younger two. They all had no holidays including me. We all had to work to make ends meet.

Now, ill and elderly, her reward for her hard labour both at home and in the work force is a life of poverty.

Anyone who has been similarly following the reports of the hearings of the Ontario Royal Commission on the Status of Pensions will be only too familiar with the plight of the elderly, many of whom are as badly off as the one example of the 63-year old Toronto woman who is an unemployed stenographer. She is too young for the basic old age pension and says she lives on rhubarb and rice in the summer and onions and rice in the winter. This woman has worked steadily for 30 years and feels, quite rightly, that she is entitled to her pension now. "If they wait much longer", she says, "I'll be dead before I can collect it."

The situation about which I have been speaking is one in which women are losers whichever way they turn. If they work only in the home during their lifetime, our present pension laws do not favour them. In fact, it discriminates against them and, unless a benevolent husband has seen to their needs, they are not adequately provided for in old age.

Even the women who work outside the home get the short end of the pension stick. The Toronto woman to whom I just referred had been in the labour force for some 30 years, probably without any pension benefits. Whether or not private or public pension schemes actually discriminate against women, the fact remains that since women are disqualified from full and equal participation in the work force they are disadvantaged from the outset with regard to pensions. Their low paying jobs, their requirement to move in and out of the work force to care for children, the obstacles in their way to make it to the top of the career ladder; all of these factors work against women who seek financial independence both in their work and in their retirement. The deck is stacked against them.

Surely this government can and should be helping women to get out of this rut of dependence, this frustration of dependency. First of all, quite contrary to what the minister was talking about this afternoon, it can foster positive attitudes towards women in the work force by ceasing to equate the influx of women into the work force with the high unemployment rate. This is essential to women taking their rightful place in the economic life of the country and would work toward allowing them to better prepare themselves for their retirement, just as men are able to do.

Secondly, the government should allow women who choose to work at home to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan and to have pensions in their own right. Until the work of women in the home is recognized as a legitimate contribution to society and their need for retirement pay recognized equally with that of men, elderly women will continue to live in poverty.

I have spoken before in the House on this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but her allotted time has expired. However, she may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you, sir, and I thank the House for that courtesy.

I have spoken in the House before on this subject of housewives and pensions. I have heard the arguments of the government against such an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan, and while there may be difficulties in implementing voluntary contributions for housewives, I suggest that the difficulties can be overcome if there is a will to do so. Both Germany and France have been able to accommodate voluntary contributions from housewives in their national pension schemes. Can we in Canada not find a way as well?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the government can act now to alleviate the plight of single, divorced and widowed women in the 60 to 65 age bracket. So many of these women are living on less than $2,000 a year, most of it from welfare. The first step in this direction, and one that would cost the federal treasury less than $400,000 a year, would be to cease the Scrooge-like practice of withdrawing the spouse's allowance upon the death of one marriage partner.

What kind of a double standard do we have on the part of the government when it comes to making expenditures of its funds? We saw only last week that it allows a payment of some $2 million in fees to a sales agent for nuclear reactors without any work having been done, or any expected, and there is no effort to be made to retrieve that money, yet at the same time the government peremptorily cuts off the payment of less than half a million dollars in total to some 2,500 spouses who have worked hard all their lives in the interests of this country.

This heartless practice which causes tremendous hardship among those who least deserve it, and which represents such a paltry saving to the national budget, should be discontinued immediately. The surviving spouse should be allowed to keep her spouse's allowance.

I emphasize that this is just a preliminary step toward easing the financial burden of this particular group of people. It covers only widows and does not cover separated, divorced or single women living on inadequate incomes. It creates inequities, but it is a step in the right direction and would indicate a more positive attitude toward the needs and the rights of elderly women who have worked long and hard in the home.

If the present discrimination against women in the work force is allowed to continue, then we will still be dealing with these problems of pension discrimination in 50 years' time. Our society will be judged by how it eliminates discriminatory practices. I say to you, sir, that if that judgment were to be rendered now it would not be a favourable one.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has pointed out, it is a sad commentary on our times that it is necessary to put down a motion in the House of Commons calling for recognition of equal rights for the women of Canada; yet the fact is that such a motion is necessary, and in my view the House should support the motion tonight in the name of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

We also welcome the amendment moved by the Official Opposition. We shall be voting for it when the time comes, and we hope the House as a whole will recognize the validity of the amendment as well as of the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The two speakers from the government side who took part in the debate this afternoon but are not here tonight tried to make something of the allegation that the interest in the well-being of women from this side of the House was something new. I noticed that the charge was not levelled in my direction. It so happens that during the first year I was in this House, which is now more than 35 years ago, I raised questions about the pensions or non-pensions of widows of veterans of the first world war. I raised questions as to the inadequate pensions of the widows of civil servants; and I raised matters having to do with the low pay of the women doing the menial work in this building. In other words, I have been at this for a long time.

● (2032)

I also recall, and I checked the record this afternoon to make sure of it, that it was in 1950, 28 years ago, that I started the campaign for the establishment of a women's bureau within the Department of Labour. It was a five year battle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was supported by Miss Sybil Bennett and Mrs. Ellen Fairclough who gave tremendous help to that cause. Finally, in 1950, we got the government to establish a women's bureau. There have been some very distinguished women who have filled the position as directors of that bureau, and I think it was from then on that we began to get more interest in and concern for the welfare of the women of Canada.

In more recent years, when the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was tabled it was this party that back in that year devoted one of its opposition days to the implementation of the recommendations in that report. I point out now that, in this session of the thirtieth parliament, we as the third party have only one opposition day that we can have with a vote, and we are giving that one day to this issue.

To go back two or three years, when the Anti-Inflation Board was established it was the leader of this party who directed one of his earliest criticisms at the failure of the regulations of that body to require arrangements to be made for a catch-up where the pay of women workers was deficient. Add to this the hundreds of times that some of us have argued for a better deal in terms of pensions for the women of this country and I think the record is a lot more clear than the government would like to recognize.

What I have said and what the speaker just before me has said underlines what I feel to be one of the areas in which discrimination against women is most severe. I feel that the time to correct discrimination is not in the next century, not 50 years from now, but right now. I am prepared to listen to speeches on the recommendations in the Florence Bird report which have been implemented, but I am more concerned about those that have not been touched; and I am particularly concerned about the unfairness and inequality that women suffer in their older years.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands pointed out that in terms of women by themselves, two-thirds of them between the ages of 65 and 70 are living at or below the poverty line and three-quarters of those over the age of 70 are living below the poverty line. That flows from certain definite causes. One is the fact that in the labour force they have fewer opportunities to get decent jobs with good pay, and so it follows that their pension income in later years is behind that of men.

It also follows from three or four situations that are built into our laws respecting pensions, and I want to spell out three or four of them and to insist that there should be no further delay in correcting these unfairnesses. First of all, the law and regulations regarding the spouse's allowance is about as cruel a law as there is on our statute books. The government makes out that there is something wonderfully equal about the spouse's allowance because it does not matter whether the spouse who gets that allowance is male or female; the younger husband can get it just as can the younger wife. But the statistics show that of the married couples in Canada between the ages of 60 and 65, in five out of six cases the husband is the older one; only in one case out of six is the husband the younger one. I suggest that in most of those cases where the husband is the younger member of the married couple he is able to keep working. So for all practical purposes, the spouse's allowance is a special provision for women.

Let us not get carried away with talk about the law in this respect being equal—it is a special provision for women. Look at what that legislation does to women. It does not give them a pension because they are women, because they are persons; it gives them a pension or allowance in relation to their attachment to a man. The woman does not stand on her own feet. She does not get something because she is entitled to it, because she needs it or has a right to it. She gets it only if she is attached to a man, only if she has a spouse 65 years of age or over. How can you justify a piece of legislation which, as I say, in practical terms is for women between the ages of 60 and 65 and then turn around and draw the line between those who have an older spouse and those who are single, divorced or separated?

The hon. member who preceded me and the wording of the amendment which has been proposed concentrate on a particular evil, namely the fact that if a woman in the age bracket of 60 to 65 loses her husband, she loses the spouse's allowance and she has nothing until the age of 65. That is so cruel that one wonders how it ever got enacted. We complained about this when it was brought in, but I say it is just as cruel to the woman who starts in her sixties as a widow or to the woman who is a spinster in her sixties. This whole piece of legislation is so fraught with unfairness and cruelty that in my view it should be taken back to the drawing boards and rewritten right away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) made an impassioned plea this afternoon for women to be recognized as persons of equal status. I must say to her credit that when we had this legislation before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs she did not like its provisions. But she also said this afternoon that we should not blame the government for these things but rather blame the attitude of society.

I do blame the government for a piece of legislation which discriminates against women in the way that the spouse's allowance does. As I say, the government tries to make out that the regulation is equal because the situation is the same for a man as it is for a woman. That is a piece of nonsense. As a matter of fact, the government tries to carry this through by refusing to give us statistics on how many recipients of the spouse's allowance are male and how many are female. It even goes a step further. When a woman loses her husband, it could be the same as a man losing his wife, although I interject to say that I get letters on this every month and every letter I have had since this provision came into effect has been from a woman. I have never had a man between the ages of 60 and 65 write to me: "My old woman died and I lost my pension". No, it is women who suffer. The letter sent out from the department is one of those he/she letters: "Dear sir/madam, we are sorry that you lost your wife/husband", and so on down the line. It is completely heartless and the excuse for that is that the government does not like to keep statistics in terms of sex. This is the day of unisex. This is the day of equality. The result of this apparent attempt at equality is that women suffer in that respect, and suffer seriously.

I move on to the Canada Pension Plan, and here again I am completely in accord with the position taken by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the position that I have been taking since the days back in 1964 and 1965 when we were putting that legislation through. No matter how much you try to say that the Canada Pension Plan is based on earnings from employment and therefore you cannot enrol housewives in it, Mr. Speaker, you are still denying the very thing that the Liberal member for York South wanted this afternoon, and that is the recognition of women as persons because of what they do, whether out in the work force or at home raising a family. If we are going to believe in that principle, if it is going to be asserted even, as I say, from the Liberal side of the House, it is time that we found a way to meet that situation.

I know all the arguments about the way it is set up in terms of a contribution based on income from employment, and maybe it has to be worked out in some other ways. When I make motions about this under Standing Order 43, I call for the equivalent of the Canada Pension Plan entitlement to be made available to women who are in the home. Certainly that should be done, or motions like this will have to be made year after year. The kind of speeches which were made this afternoon by the hon. Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) and the hon. member for York South do not get away from this sort of situation. The Canada Pension Plan denial of any benefit to women who stay home and raise their families is a complete setting aside of all the fine words we heard this afternoon from the minister responsible for the status of women or from the hon. member for York South. I contend that is an area where improvements must be made right away.

I remind the House of my emphasis at the start, along with the statistics given earlier. We are concerned about the large majority of women who are at the poverty line in their retirement years. The reasons that happens are several, including the kinds of things I have already talked about—the unfairness of the spouse's allowance and, particularly, the unfairness of the Canada Pension Plan in its denial of recognition that women in the home are contributing to our society just as much as women out in the work force.

This afternoon the hon. member for York South did not like the leader of my party placing so much emphasis on the right of women to have jobs. She wants women to be free to make their choice: to go out in the work force or stay at home. It is fine to have that choice, but if choosing to go out in the work force means a pension and some protection for old age, and staying at home means no adequate pension in old age, then certainly it is not a free choice at all. I contend the Canada Pension Plan needs to be improved in that respect without delay.

The minister responsible for the status of women this afternoon boasted about the amendments made to the Canada Pension Plan a year or so ago, under which at marriage breakdown the assets the two parties have accumulated can be split 50-50. In other words, they have to die or break up their marriages to receive the benefit. What about women having rights as women, rights as persons, rights as half the people of our population?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is another area where we have been grossly unfair to women. It runs through our society. It has been in existence for years and years. That does not make it right, just because society has accepted it. I am referring to the stupid arrangement under the public service superannuation plan, and most private pension plans, which works as follows. A man and a woman live together, build their home, assets and all the rest of it. They reach retirement and go on pension. He was not the only one to earn it. He and she earned it together. If she dies, his pension is 100 per cent; but if he dies first, her pension is 50 per cent. In any place where people believe in common sense, how can that arrangement be justified? It was a nice concession! We were doing something for the poor widows by giving them 50 per cent of their husbands' pensions! But it is not just, and it accounts for these ghastly statistics showing that two-thirds of our women between ages 65 and 70 and three-quarters of the women over 70 are in this situation. The place to correct that is in the public service superannuation plan. The reason it should be started there is to give the lead to private plans.

We have done a little better for the widows of members of parliament. Our pension plan is better in all respects than other pension plans. We provide 60 per cent for our widows. Why should it not be 75 or 80 per cent for all widows? Why should it not be 80 or 90 per cent for the wife if she survives, and 80 or 90 per cent for the man if he survives? The idea of 100 per cent for the man and 50 per cent for the woman, or even 100 per cent for the member of parliament and 60 per cent for the widow of a member of parliament, just does not stand up. It cannot be justified at all. As long as that kind of arrangement exists in public service pensions, of course it will exist in the plans of the private world as well. The Canadian National Railways pension plan and the Canadian Pacific Railway pension plan operate in that manner as well. As a matter of fact, there are still pension plans which do not make all provisions for women and those which provide different conditions for women than for men.

A few nights ago that excellent documentary on the life of Nellie McClung was replayed. Those who watched it will remember the horror which was expressed by Nellie McClung when it was discovered that disability policies sold in those days provided a benefit in the case of death for a man or a woman, but there was no benefit for a woman in the case of disability, only for a man. The argument was that if women knew they could receive a benefit for disability, they might disfigure themselves or do something like that. In the documentary Mr. McClung was transferred to Alberta, because he was in the insurance business and his company could not stand the complaints his wife was making about that discriminatory provision.

That was in the dark ages which some of us remember, but it is still true that provisions exist in pension plans out in the private world which are unfair to women, and there are women who still do not receive the same benefits as men. It was not long ago that there were more inequalities in the public service system. Some of them have been ironed out, but the basic fact is still there: we provide better pensions for men than we do for women. When the death of one partner or the other occurs, it is the man who receives the gravy and it is the woman who receives only one-half of her rights.

With regard to the veterans' legislation, the same is true. That legislation is being improved. It is becoming pretty good compared with what it was a few years ago. But the widows of veterans still receive their pension rights only in terms of what the men's rights were. The woman who was a wife and looked after a veteran on a pension of 50 per cent or more upon his death receives the full widow's pension; but the wife who looked after a veteran on a pension of 45 or 47 per cent upon his death receives nothing. It is not what she may need, nor what she has done, which entitles her to a certain pension. It is what her attachment was to a man.

I would like to agree with the statements made by the hon. member for York South tonight concerning the desire that women be treated as persons and not because of their relationship to men, but I challenge her statement that the government is not to be blamed for this. These elements of discrimination are running through government legislation. We have been pressing for these improvements for a long time. As my leader pointed out this afternoon, we are concerned about the employment situation as well as the rights of native women. We have supported their moves and their organizations, as we have supported women in all of their efforts.

If your Honour will permit me another 30 seconds, I should like to indicate that discrimination is at its worst at the time of retirement where it ought not to be at all. We want these pension inequalities corrected. This can be brought about by passing both the amendment and the motion now before the House.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have only one reproach for the members of the opposition who have started in the House today a debate on the status of women and it is that they should have done so earlier. That is what the minister responsible for the status of women said on February 17 last in response to questions asked by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) whom he was congratulating for his sudden interest in the status of women, reminding him that as the new Human Rights Commission was about to begin its operations two of the three commissioners were women.

Mr. Speaker, the fate of the Canadian woman attracts the envy of women the world over; this is news to nobody in the House. It is clear that the situation can and must be considerably improved, but if we look at what the situation is in other countries, we see that we have numerous reasons to be proud and to look forward to future improvements. As a matter of fact, in my capacity as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I would like to point out today what has happened not only within the commission but for the benefit of the population as a whole through various manpower and unemployment insurance services. But I will preface my remarks with a brief outlook of the situation of women within the labour force. The minister in charge of the status of women has dwelt at quite some length on this matter, so I will limit myself to the main facts.

In 1966, 34 per cent of women participated in the paid labour force. In 1977, this rate of participation reached 46 per cent. Most of this increase originated in the 24 to 44 age group whose participation rate has gone up 59 per cent during the last decade. As mentioned before, unfortunately the rate of unemployment among women has also increased rapidly. In 1977, there were more women within the idle work force, at 45 per cent, than in the whole labour force, at 37 per cent. It has been suggested at times that female unemployment is not really alarming since their work contributes more to make up the family revenue and can serve at best to make some ready money or to allow for some luxuries. Statistics on the rate of employment and family income easily refute those allegations. Of the 4,022,000 women who worked in 1977, 30.1 per cent were single and 8.5 per cent were separated, widowed or divorced.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that those women have to work, strictly from an economic point of view, has never been doubted. Still, the work of women as second wage-earners in the family has at times been met with skepticism. That attitude does not take economic realities into account. In 1975, 70 per cent of all families in which women worked for pay had an income of less than $15,000 from the husband while the average family income was $16,113. In other words, the family income would have been lower than the average income had the woman not worked. It is also sometimes said that women take over men's jobs. Mr. Speaker, the truth is entirely different. As the minister in charge of the status of women pointed out, women unfortunately still hold jobs that are generally considered as women's jobs, and are still generally nowhere to be seen in job areas traditionally reserved for men. We know, for instance, that if all the women in professional jobs were to leave the labour force tomorrow, without registering for unemployment insurance, the rate of unemployment would not go down by .5 per cent. Mr. Speaker, I hurry to add that the existence of ghettos in the field of employment seems most regrettable to us, and we spare no effort to remedy that situation. One must come to the conclusion that, in the future, men and women will increasingly perform the same type of work. We are nevertheless convinced that, to be prosperous, our economy will need all its resources.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with what the employment and immigration commission could do to improve the lot of women in the labour force. As far as favouring equal job opportunities is concerned, it should actively promote the expansion of the labour market which makes full use of womanpower potential and help workers seeking more rewarding and self-fulfilling jobs find them.

Mr. Speaker, this main objective can be divided into five sub-objectives: one, help women get the necessary knowledge and experience to join or rejoin the labour force; two, help women find jobs in line with their qualifications and abilities; three, help women make a more sophisticated choice in the whole spectrum of trades and professions which are in demand on the Canadian labour market; four, help employers identify and eliminate impediments to the hiring and promotion of women; five, encourage women to apply for work in industries for better paid jobs in the fields where they have traditionally been under-represented.

Mr. Speaker, my intention here is not to give a detailed account of the steps we are taking to fight discriminatory practices in the labour market, nor of the steps taken to counterbalance the effects of discriminatory practices which have affected women at the economic level. I would rather give some precise facts. In 1975-76, 33.9 per cent of successful applicants for the Canada manpower training program were women. However we must point out that the distribution of these women varied very much according to the type of training. They represented 53 per cent of trainees in the basic training for skill development, generally called upgrading course, 38.5 per cent in the vocational training program but only 2.8 per cent in the apprenticeship training program.

This problem is particularly difficult to solve since it is in the industry's new ventures that most openings will be found. The Foothills project, which has been referred to earlier today, is a good example of our future ventures. It becomes essential that women receive a formation that will help them benefit from this evolution. To help women acquire these skills, the commission has greatly increased the number of courses given for their benefit. In one of these courses, women interested in trades traditionally reserved for men can gain practical experience in those trades. I want to mention two examples of this type of course: the basic trade courses for women given in Manitoba, and the introductory courses to so-called "non feminine" professions given in several centers in Ontario and Manitoba. There are also some vocational guidance courses directed to older women interested in joining the labour force for the first time or in returning to it.

Here is an example: the vocational guidance course for women given at Fredericton, New Brunswick. There is a similar program in Quebec, which is financed under the Canada manpower development program. Its goal is to develop and test various training instruments and programs that would help women better benefit from the training they have received under the Canada manpower development program, in view of their future return to the labour force.

Mr. Speaker, we ask our various manpower centers to establish a quota for female participation in the vocational guidance program, in a number of areas that are generally men's strongholds. We hope the provinces will do the same for their apprenticeship programs. Until the established quota is reached, women will be given priority for enrollment in these courses. A general information campaign will be set up accordingly.

As for the industrial manpower training program, we point out in our regional offices those trades where women are under-represented. We have asked each employment centre to designate one adviser charged with the promotion of industrial training programs among women. Objectives are chosen according to the number of women that have real chances of finding a job in those trades.

The community employment strategy is also used to encourage women to participate in training programs in various areas, including the contemporaneous program for woman heads of families in Regina, the native women's co-operative and also a program in Nova Scotia for women heads of families. The latter program has been in existence for some time. It includes workshops for women wishing to rejoin the work force, job training courses on housing renovation, employer-employee workshops on barriers to employment, and a co-operative training program in co-operation with the city of Halifax. While progress is made in our training programs, there remains an area where numerous efforts are still needed, namely apprenticeship as I mentioned earlier. Although apprenticeship is entirely under provincial jurisdiction, the federal government makes substantial financial contributions toward it. Mr. Speaker, we hope that the provinces will take the necessary steps to eliminate the discriminatory practices that are traditionally taking place against women in that kind of programs. We asked all our regional officers to appoint a senior officer responsible for co-ordinating the activities of the various regional apprenticeship programs to promote women's participation in those programs. Business leaders and unions must also change their practices in this area.

Let us now turn to counselling. Our employment offices have often been blamed for not providing an adequate service to women. The Employment and Immigration Commission is taking the necessary measures to correct the situation. A special training section on the problems of women will be included in the counsellors' vocational extension program. That section will be operational this spring. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention on several new and important facts that took place in recent months which will enable us to help women fully develop their potential in the labour market.

That program is Affirmative Action which can now be implemented at the federal level as well as in most provinces as a result of the passage of the Canadian Human Rights Act. The Affirmative Action concept which comes from the United States is now being considered in Canada as the only effective way of dealing with systems, attitudes and behaviour promoting inequities between men and women in the labour market. This approach or methodology is not restricted to women and could be used by other groups which could come under systematic discrimination. It is also intended to remove discrimination in hiring consisting in excluding certain groups or people when this is not warranted by any practical imperative, whether it be at the business level or the job to be filled. In other words, Affirmative Action deals with the roots rather than the symptoms of the problem.

Even if we do not know yet which body will finally be charged with carrying out federal activity in that regard, it is obvious that the commission will have a leading role to play and it is already getting prepared with tune-up operations. The Minister asked the commission to set up an Affirmative Action division to polarize the efforts of the commission in that respect.

It should also be pointed out that the status of working women is also being considered in the more important studies being made on unemployment. The studies examine among other things employment and unemployment statistics for women, their effort as the main breadwinner as well as the social and institutional barriers impeding their full participation in the labour market.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to speak for a few moments about the efforts of the employment and immigration commission as an employer in terms of what is being done to improve opportunities for female employees.

The commission's equal opportunities for women program began in 1972 and progress was slow but steady in increasing female representation. Nevertheless, the commission was anxious to achieve even greater results and therefore in 1977, in order to speed up the process, it developed a five-year equal opportunities for women plan. This plan was based on the rationale that female representation in all categories, groups and levels should reflect women's representation in the national and provincial full-time labour forces. In fact, this rationale became the official policy of the organization concerning its work force. In other words, we are aiming for a work force which is in similar proportion to that of the labour force.

Using the rationale as described, goals were set for each of the major occupational groups in the commission. Our plan is ambitious but the minister and senior management of the commission are determined that concentrated effort can make it successful. Already, we see encouraging results. For example, there has been a gradual shift in the distribution of women throughout the organization. Last year at this time approximately 75 per cent of all female employees were in the administrative support category—the category which is often described as the ghetto category. This year we find that this distribution has dropped to 75 per cent, and we also find that women are at the higher levels of the category in increasing proportions.

Another example is the administrative and foreign service category, generally perceived as the middle management category. Last year women comprised only 26 per cent of its total. This has now risen to 28 per cent.

As well we find that, within the category itself, women have considerably improved their standing in every major group. To give but two examples, in the program administration group and the personnel administration group particularly women have been appointed for the first time at the highest levels.

There is also abundant evidence that women are improving their career mobility opportunities through mechanisms such as staff training programs. These vehicles are assisting substantial numbers of women in moving from the so-called ghetto category to the officer levels.

Concerning the senior executive category, the commission is aiming to have 10 per cent of that category represented by women by 1982. At this point there are only three women in the category but I am confident the goal will be reached.

The sample results which I have just described have not come about by accident. Rather, they are the culmination of efforts to build the concerns of women directly into the overall management system. I am proud to say that the commission is creating a personnel system, the mechanisms of which ensure that equal opportunities for women are taken into account in all its ensuing policies, practices and procedures. As well, I might mention that there are active programs in every region which support our objectives. Individual managers are responsible for the improved representation of women and are being held accountable for their results.

Without further elaboration I would only add that, as an employer, the department and commission have concrete plans to improve the position of women, that it is vigorously implementing those plans, and that it is experiencing very positive results. We believe that we can display methodology and results to both public and private sector employers as an example to be followed.

In conclusion, I would leave the House with two clear messages: first, the employment and immigration commission will continue its efforts to improve the situation of women in the labour force; second, it shall continue to create within the commission an environment in which women will be encouraged to realize their full potential.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly want to identify at the outset with the remarks made by my colleague from Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) as well as those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when they both mentioned it was the height of irony that we should need a special debate to deal with more than 50 per cent of the population of this country who still continue to suffer from some real discrimination in the area of economic matters.

I must admit when I listened this afternoon to the minister responsible for women, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde), that my first reaction was one of anger, then one of amazement and finally one of sadness. For any minister to present such a pathetic diatribe on such a vital issue is really a shocking case of irresponsibility. In view of the problems that many thousands of women are faced with today both in the private sector and in the public service respecting employment, that kind of a speech does them a disservice.

For the minister to try and extricate himself by making cheap political shots at members on this side of the House or anywhere is nothing short of amazing. I find his response both shallow and hollow to a great degree, more than I would have expected from him. I am sorry the minister is not here to hear me say this this evening. Quite frankly, I would have had more respect for this minister had he not made that kind of presentation today.

I make no apologies for taking part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, nor for the interest I have shown in recent weeks with respect to the problems which women are encountering, particularly in the public service. Members may know that it was some time last fall when I assumed responsibility as the opposition spokensman for the status of women, taking over that assignment from my colleague for the former hon. member for Fundy-Royal, Mr. Gordon Fairweather. He now chairs, in a very distinguished way, the new Human Rights Commission. I hope I follow him in the line of his particular interest and commitment in terms of trying to deal responsibly and rationally with a major problem that confronts us in society today.

When the minister begins to use statistics, as he did this afternoon, and talks about a 50 per cent improvement with respect to government appointments through orders in council, I find this is about the most meaningless kind of endeavour he could engage in. He is not even being consistent with himself. Earlier through a quarterly newsletter he claimed that figures show 115 per cent more women appointed in 1976. Perhaps he is becoming more cautious in the use of these meaningless statistics. As we all know, statistics can say anything you want them to.

Nothing has been more the focus of attention in recent weeks that appointments to senior levels of the public service, the SX category. In a letter that I received dated October 17, 1977 from the research and analysis officer of the Public Service Commission, these statistics were stated. As I say, statistics can be used any way you want. In 1973 in the senior executive category of the Public Service Commission we had 859 men and nine women. In 1974 there were 1,053 men and 18 women. In 1975 there were 1,165 men and 21 women; and in 1976, 1,238 men and 30 women. You could, of course, mention that between 1973 and 1974, the year the minister took office, there was a 100 per cent increase in women in the SX category; the figure went from nine to 18. The fact that the number only increased from 18 to 21 women from 1974 to 1975 means the percentage increase was 16⅔ per cent. In 1976 the increase from 21 to 30 women meant there was a 45 per cent increase over 1975. In other words, in that time period in 1974 there was an increase of 194 men in the SX category and nine women, in 1975, 112 men and 12 women, and in 1976, 173 men and women. One thing is abundantly clear from those statistics: there is no great plan of action on the part of this government to remove discrimination at senior levels of the public service.

When the minister wants to score Brownie points by attacking members on this side for discovering a latent interest in the status of women, I suppose we have to accept that. That is the nature of political warfare. But what I am more concerned with is the situation that forces a number of female public servants to issue the kind of anonymous report which ironically enough I released the same day the minister was exposing his great "plan of action" for documenting, through the use of the statistics of the Public Service Commission itself, not only the present discrimination that exists with respect to public service employment but the increasing discrimination that is taking place at middle and upper level of management.

There is no way in the world that the minister responsible for the status of women, or any other minister in this House, can explain those statistics away unless they are prepared to be a good deal more forthright than they have been to date. I mentioned that the minister has now released his latest plan of action which is to take us to 1985 with respect to equal opportunities. But the minister has in no way indicated what all these various experts and task forces are actually going to do by way of any clear cut goals, strategy or any methods of implementation. Even more, he has not had the courtesy to issue the kind of report that he himself said would be necessary some years ago. The report of the advisory council on the status of women dated June, 1977, in documenting the situation of women in the public service, concludes:

> Publication of the Advisory Council's first study on Women in the Public Service in the fall of 1975 prompted the Minister responsible for the Status of Women to say publicly "it is quite apparent that a more explicit and aggressive policy is required which will involve the active commitment of departments to accelerate the desegregation of the Public Service work force." The special measures announced by the Minister in October 1975 included an annual review of the progress achieved by each department.

Where are those annual reviews? Where is the public accounting that was to take place that the minister publicly endorsed and said would take place in succeedings years in 1976 and 1977? What we have is the minister hoping, by some kind of subterfuge, by some new announcement of more experts and more task forces, to indicate that at some time, perhaps in 1985, we will have a clear accounting as to the actual situation of women in the public service. There are thousands and thousands of women in the public service who will not wait that long. As proven by this report, they are already acknowledging that there are signs of increasing discrimination against women workers.

It is a fallacy that women are the cause of the high unemployment rate today. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I think very effectively and eloquently in her speech exposed the kind of damaging myth that is fostered when that kind of attribution is made. Certainly the Minister for Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have furthered the mythology that in some way or other women are the cause of the present unemployment difficulties that this country is faced with and with which the government is failing to deal adequately.

In a recent publication from Statistics Canada it was clearly shown that, contrary to what the minister responsible for the status of women has said, the entrance rate into the work force has declined in recent years simply because women are faced, as everyone is, with increasing difficulty in finding any kind of meaningful employment. Where are women finding employment? They are finding it at less than adequate wages and they do the kinds of servile tasks that for the most part men are simply not willing to do.

My colleague from Kingston and the Islands has also mentioned the particularly acute problem faced by women over the age of 60 and the failure of this government to deal adequately with that problem. I suppose if there is any one tragic aspect to the minister's speech this afternoon, from my point of view as well as that of all members of this House it was that the minister missed a golden opportunity. It is generally acknowledged, except by the most blind, that there are particular problems today in the work force both in the private sector and in the public sector with respect to the employment of women. It would have been a service in his capacity as minister responsible to have identified those pressures, those myths referred to by my colleague, the problems making it more difficult at the present time to implement equal opportunity programs. Instead, what did the minister do? He ran through a shopping list that, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said, was so barren that he had to repeat it in both official languages.

The minister did not even take the opportunity to identify some of the key pressure points and problems today for women in the work force. He at no time tried to identify what the specific goals must be of a society really trying to achieve some kind of economic justice. There was no clear accounting as to his role since 1974 when he was appointed to this important post, and no indication of the particular problems we are faced with today. I do not know whether the government still does not know or whether it just does not care, but certainly it is very clear it is not acting. In not acting, it is contributing to the situation, certainly to a very great misunderstanding.

I sent a copy of the report that I released on February 16 to the minister. That is about two and a half weeks ago. To my knowledge, he has in no way attempted to respond to that report. The only response that I have seen in fact came from no minister at all but from somebody speaking for the chairman of the Public Service Commission, Johanna Hickey, director of the Office of Equal Opportunity. She said that this report was full of distortion, blatant error and emotionalism. I wonder when we will get the facts to document those kinds of charges, either from Ms. Hickey or anyone else who speaks for the Public Service Commission.

Within a few days of that comment, on February 22, these public servants, again through me, issued a further comment in response to that criticism. I quote one part of it:

> Well, as we said, we have nothing to hide so here are the facts: as of December 1976, there were 2,927 persons in the Personnel Administration (PE) group in the federal public service of Canada. Of these, 778 were women (nearly 27 per cent). The PE group has seven levels, with PE 1 being the lowest level. In most departments, the Director of Personnel would be a PE 7 or an SX, but in some smaller organizations, he or she (we couldn't find a "she"!) might be a PE 6. The breakdown for the PE group is as follows. Again the information is from the Public Service Staff Relations Board Pay Research Bureau Report.

What we find is that in levels one through four the participation is very heavily loaded toward women; but as it increases through levels five, six and seven we notice a rapidly dropping percentage of women and a rapidly increasing one for men. That is within the public service itself. I am waiting anxiously to find out what kind of report we are going to get on that statistic from the minister or from somebody who will speak on behalf of the Public Service Commission.

Just today I received some further information with regard to the post office. I am sorry the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) is not here this evening; he was here for a while this afternoon. The post office seems to be one of the most blatant areas in terms of discrimination against women in the work force.

In the earlier report that was released, in the listing of senior employees at the SX level it will be noticed that the post office is the largest employing department in the federal government, employing some 55,000 people, 20 per cent of whom are women. There are 43 people at the SX category, but to my knowledge there is still not one woman.

I want to read a few observations that have been made with regard to the situation in the post office at the present time. For women at the PE or 04 level and above, for 1973 and 1977 there is almost no change. In fact, in that four year period the increase has been something like .91 per cent. That means that perhaps the number has gone from something like three women in 1973 to something like nine in 1977.

In most samples of this size—that is, a group of over 500—this would be called negligible. In fact, an increase of 1 per cent is really not worth anything. That is the situation that prevails in the post office, an area where there has been literally no act of representation or equal opportunity program at work. The other interesting comment as a result of this later document came from the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who I am sorry is not here tonight. He took the opportunity of issuing a press release, again with a number of self-serving and partial percentages, on March 2 and took serious issue with some of the things said in the two earlier reports and releases.

I will not take the time of the House this evening to review the kind of misleading data that the Minister of Employment and Immigration put on the record. The information in the press release does in his own case. On the second page of his press release, which deals with the administrative support category representation, he talks about the CR 5. It is interesting to note—and this is obviously not a major management and decision making area—that whereas in 1976 there were 30.1 per cent males and 69.9 per cent females, in 1977 the figure for males had dropped to 28.6 per cent and the figure for females had increased to 71.4 per cent. That is an obvious female ghetto if ever there was one!

This is the kind of misleading information that the government to this date is putting on the record with regard to its stewardship in terms of equal opportunity programs for women in the public service. What we obviously need, and what I thought we would get when I saw the motion put down last week by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), is a frank accounting of the government's responsibility in this area for at least the period that this government, and particularly this minister, have been responsible for the status of women, which is about three and a half years. But what did we get? We got a pathetic political diatribe and nothing else.

No other minister has taken part in this debate. We had a speech from one parliamentary secretary. Perhaps we will have another. We have certainly had nothing substantial from the members of the government who carry responsibility in this area.

Mr. Crouse: There is not a minister in the House.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That further amplifies their disinterest or disdain for this topic. Surely the government must now state publicly what its goals are. It is not enough for a minister to have a meeting outside the House in the Pearson building with those who are his fans or friends in terms of the status of women and not come before this House as the minister responsible to make a clear-cut statement as to his goals objectives.

Why did he not have the courage and common sense to say what the strategy of the government will be with regard to the serious problems confronting women? What has he to tell us about the kinds of costs and benefits that will result from substantial change within the public service? The government is simply failing in its leadership in this area. In fact, the leadership is simply non-existent.

In 1975 we had International Women's Year. We have had literally nothing similar since then. In fact, as these women public servants have acknowledged, we see a deteriorating situation with regard to attitudes and programs within the public service.

In addition to the motion of the New Democratic Party, we have put down some suggestions by way of amendment which now seem to be generally accepted, at least on this side of the House. These are some specifics that we had hoped the minister or others would have talked on. Certainly the advisory council on the status of women has filled hundreds of pages with clear-cut recommendations. The minister said they would like to take action on the amendment to the Indian Act. How often do we have to hear him make that kind of statement before anything substantial happens? I happen to have a private member's bill on that subject. If the minister really wanted to do something, it could be moved forward to the standing committee.

With regard to the tax changes that have been suggested, surely a clear inequity is the problem of women who work with their husbands on farms, in rural situations, in fishing operations or in small businesses. They are not provided with the same benefits they would have in a legal partnership or an incorporated set up. The advisory council on the status of women made ample recommendations in this regard.

My colleague, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), recently received a letter from one of his constituents. With his permission and yours, Mr. Speaker, I will quote a couple of phrases from it. This woman writes:

> I work on the farm full time (this often means 12 or more hours per day) during calving, seeding, summer fallowing and harvesting as well as doing all the bookkeeping and helping whenever necessary during other times. You will find that this is also the case with most of the women in this area, as it is no doubt in every farming community throughout Canada . . .
> My husband has threatened to divorce me, and then hire me as a farm worker and so claim wages for me as an expense for income tax purposes. I am only joking, but I do think that the fact that this could be a solution, points out the foolishness of the present tax law. Just as silly is the fact that I could do the same work I do on our farm for a neighbour and get paid for it and my husband could hire a neighbour's wife to do the work I am doing here, pay her and deduct her wages as an expense.
> It also hurts to know that women who work at their own job can file their own income tax. I have a teacher's certificate, but when I got married I decided to give up teaching to raise a family and help out on the farm. I feel this has been a good decision as far as the family is concerned and has meant a rewarding way of life to me but the present tax laws do not encourage anyone to make such a choice.

In the face of that reasonable proposition, could not the minister urge his colleague the Minister of Finance to include a provision of the kind suggested in a budgetary announcement? If this debate today does nothing else, I hope it will wake up the minister and the government who seem to be immobilized at the present time in the face of a pressing national issue.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the comments just made by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) I think I should say at the outset of my remarks that several ministers have been unable to be here today. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is unable to be here. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) is ill and I am speaking in his place. I would also point out that there are two ministers sitting here now and that they were sitting here at the time the hon. member made his complaint that there were no ministers in the House.

An hon. Member: We want real ministers!

Mr. MacGuigan: All of us on this side of the House were pleasantly surprised that the NDP were presenting us with an opportunity to speak about our record in the field of women's rights, because that record is one of which the government has a right to be proud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I would not want to be misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. There are many things which need to be done in this area, especially on the side of implementation. The opposition has rightly been drawing attention to these things. There will always be weaknesses to remedy, Mr. Speaker, because here we are faced with a great historic inequity, probably the greatest inequity existing in the world today. An inequity of this dimension is not something which can be cleared up overnight. Nevertheless, Canada is on the leading edge of the movement to advance women's rights throughout the world and this government certainly has by far the best record of any government in Canada in this field.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I am sure the NDP faced something of a dilemma when making women's rights the subject of today's debate. They wanted to get in on a good thing but obviously did not wish to give the government the credit which its record deserves. I thought the solution of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was rather ingenuous. He got around this difficulty by avoiding the subject entirely, by dealing with peripheral aspects of the problem, by making comments which from his limited viewpoint he could have made about any minority group in the country—youth, Cape Breton miners, the urban poor or what have you. He really did not deal with the question of women's rights at all.

In the words of the motion before us today, the NDP asserts that the women of Canada ought to have fully equal rights in participating in the Canadian economy. Mr. Speaker, where was that party last spring when the government brought forward the Canadian Human Rights Act? If the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) had been able to be here today I know he would have brought to the attention of his colleagues section two of that legislation which was passed by the House. It reads as follows:

> Every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able or wishes to have consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices.

An hon. Member: Fine words!

Mr. MacGuigan: They are indeed fine words and a former member of this House has been given the authority to enforce those words.

Three elements of the Human Rights Act are of particular interest to women. First, sex is made a prohibited ground of discrimination in employment and in the provision of services. Second, provision is made for affirmative action programs and the Human Rights Commission is enabled to advise on and encourage the setting up of these special programs. Third, and most significant, the legislation establishes the principle of equal pay for work of equal value. This is the first government and the only government in the country to take this step. Enactment of this principle is one of the most significant advances in recent years in the march for equality for women and puts Canada ahead of almost every jurisdiction in the world.

The wording "equal pay for work of equal value" is significant and is more effective in its formulation than that used in other jurisdictions whose legislation may appear to be similar but is not because it uses the concept of equal pay for similar work. When the government was drafting the Human Rights Act it listened to women's organizations who explained how under the similar work formulation women employees could be laid off into the low pay job ghettos where they would never have a chance to do work similar to that of men, job ghettos where women could be paid less even though their work was of equal value. The government accepted this principle of equal value and put it into the legislation.

The over-all significance of the affirmative action power of the commission can hardly be overestimated. In addition to the right to make recommendations as to special programs, the commission also has the power, where discrimination has been established against an employer by a hearing tribunal, to order an affirmative action program to be instituted at the expense of the employer. In this area the American experience has suggested that affirmative action programs are a much more useful device to disadvantaged minorities than are a host of individual complaints which, even collectively, cannot usually bring about a change in the practice of an employer.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the record of the NDP in this area has been dismal. They have had many opportunities over the last five years to respond to the needs of women. In British Columbia under the former premier, Mr. Barrett, in Manitoba under the former premier, Mr. Schreyer, and still in Saskatchewan for a short time, under the premiership of Mr. Blakeney, they could have enacted legislation to give effect to the concept of equal pay for work of equal value.

Did that party which today preaches in its motion that the women of Canada ought to have fully equal rights participating in the Canadian economy ever lift a finger when it had the power to do so in those provinces? Did it ever put in place such legislation? Not once. A sad comment on a party which used to think of itself as a leading force of social reform in Canada.

Perhaps I should also draw attention to the new committee which the Conservative party has established in this election year—a caucus committee on the status of women. I believe the first public pronouncement of that body was that no serious consideration had been given to women's issues in parliament for the past two years. Well, where was the Conservative party last summer when we enacted the Human Rights Act? The hon. member for Egmont mentioned the former member for Fundy-Royal who played a very vital part in that. He is playing an even more important part in it now that it has been enacted.

Where was the Conservative party when the Criminal Code was reformed to prevent the unnecessary harassment of rape victims appearing as witnesses? Where was it when we brought about the reforms outlined earlier in this debate by my colleagues?

The assertion that we have given no serious consideration to women's issues has a hollow ring to it in the face of all this. Hon. members in the official opposition would have served Canadian women better had they directed their criticisms at their colleagues in the government of Ontario, who have so far flatly refused to adopt the principle of equal pay for work of equal value.

One of the amendments proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested the government should take some action in relation to the tax situation of spouses working in unincorporated small businesses. This is an issue the government has been looking into. Unfortunately, it is not one which lends itself to a simple solution since it would be very difficult to monitor the payment of wages to a spouse. Nevertheless, a step in this direction has, in fact, been taken by Revenue Canada. A recent Revenue Canada interpretation bulletin goes some way toward equality of the sexes under income tax rules. It makes it easier for a husband and wife to establish a partnership to carry on a business and for the wife to receive income from the business which is treated for income tax purposes as her own. Without going into the detailed provisions of the policy statement, let me simply say that among other things it provides that, if a loan is made from husband to wife on terms which are comparable to those which one businessman might offer another operating at arm's length, such loan will be treated as a contribution of capital by the wife. In other words, this major policy change will allow a husband to finance his wife's capital contribution, albeit on a commercial basis, and for the wife to be considered a fully fledged partner for income tax purposes.

This recent bulletin is an indication that efforts are continuing to be made by the government to recognize the new realities relating to women in the work force. It suggests a new approach to tax treatment of husbands and wives while attempting to prevent tax fraud through artificial arrangements.

In conclusion, I want to draw attention to the fact that the individual and social cost of unfair discrimination on the basis of sex in our society is staggering. A person's ability to contribute to society is not determined by whether that person is a man or a woman; nor is his or her value to his or her employer so measured.

An hon. Member: Now you're telling it the way it is.

Mr. MacGuigan: I have been doing it all along.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: You sound like Bryce Mackasey. Take over Bryce's job.

Mr. MacGuigan: I should say to members of the opposition that I find my present job most satisfying. It will be a long time before they are going to get jobs on this side of the House.

As I mentioned, we are dealing with a great and historic social inequality. In fact, this is not really a problem of women's rights at all; it is a problem of common human rights because the various forms of sexual inequality involve our common humanity and are harmful to all people. It cannot be tolerated by society, and government and society must work together over the years to eliminate these problems.

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House gives sad evidence of the unemployment and underemployment of women in Canada today. In spite of the existence of the advisory council on the status of women, International Women's Year, and the minister in cabinet assigned to develop a national plan of action to respond to the needs of women in Canada, we have not, to paraphrase a popular ad, "come a long way, baby".

A few women have broken through the man-made barriers to participate fully in Canadian life. I am one of the lucky ones and I have found myself walking in new areas which have traditionally been men's preserves. I have found myself involved in making decisions that will affect the lifestyle of generations to come. I have felt pride and satisfaction, as it is right for women to be involved in decisions affecting society.

As the waves of rapid change have lately increased in their intensity, I am glad we are having a debate about the role of women so we can gain a sense of perspective about the world today, its challenges and how they affect women, why it is different for women today than at any other time in history, and what tasks must now be tackled by women together with men, faced with the fact that the population of the world will double in the space of a lifetime. By the time my 15 year old daughter is my age, the population of this planet will have doubled to seven billion.

The capital, technology and management skills required to meet present needs were accumulated over thousands of years, but now we must more than double our productive capacity in the world as a whole, not simply in the rich countries but throughout the world, in a space of one lifetime. Planners looking at the resources needed to meet this incredible challenge are realizing that the most valuable untapped creative and management resource they have is womanpower.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member.

[Translation]

Order, please. It being 9:45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(9), to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings now before the House.

[English]

The question is on the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Clark), which was negatived on the following division:

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CALL FOR RETURN OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR CERTAIN MURDERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. One of the accused killers of Emanuel Jaques, the Toronto shoeshine boy who was so brutally murdered last year, admitted to a court last Friday that if capital punishment had been in effect at the time, the boy may not have been killed. As the law now stands, these deranged individuals will more than likely once again endanger our society with their presence in just a matter of years. Therefore, for the sake of preventing such killing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House reinstate forthwith capital punishment in respect of sex-related killings as well as all other first degree, premeditated murders.

Mr. Speaker: A requirement of Standing Order 43 is that there be unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRADE

IMPORT QUOTAS TO PROTECT FOOTWEAR MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that import quotas to protect footwear manufacturers in eastern Canada are causing cowboy boot retailers in Edmonton to sing the blues, since only one Canadian manufacturer of cowboy boots exists and it cannot meet the volume or the speciality demands of the western consumer, and in view of the fact that any proper cowboy boot store must have at least 300 styles of boots, as does Mr. Porayko in Edmonton, ranging in price from $65 to more than $600 and including 40 lines of boots crafted in ostrich, crocodile, alligator and other exotic leathers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this House direct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to pull on his boots, pick up his lariat and corral the rest of the cabinet to a round-up where the problems of cowboy boot sellers and consumers will be recognized and the import restrictions loosened before the said minister and his colleagues are loosened from office by the western electorate.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BROADCASTING

TELEVISION NETWORKS IGNORING IMPORTANT CANADIAN NEWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although I assure the House his condition is not a serious one, it so happens that my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), was taken to hospital an hour ago. It seems that as they were wheeling him out of this building, or into the hospital, his fervent request was, "Be sure that Stanley moves my 43".

Mr. MacEachen: It had better be a good one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So the House will recognize it is not my language. This motion has to do with the failure of the three television networks to give any coverage last night to yesterday's debate on the status of women. On behalf of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, and seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), I move:

That this House awards the Male Chauvinist Black Star to the three television networks but directs that the Male Chauvinist Gold Star be reserved for CBC radio which deliriously exceeded every conceivable male chauvinist expectation on the "World at Eight" this morning by ignoring important Canadian news, yet taking time to mention that Princess Anne took part in a debate in England yesterday on the subject of "A Woman's Place is in the Harem", miraculously compressing in one item both a colonial and a chauvinist attitude, truly a remarkable achievement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby will have to have a better ruse than that to get that kind of a motion put under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMPENSATORY DISCOUNT ON RETAIL SALES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In reply to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) stated the following:

One problem with cutting the federal sales tax is that we cannot be sure that the reduction would be passed on to the consumer.

In view of the present depression and since the Minister of Finance is undecided, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That the House immediately enjoin the government to issue a rebate to consumers—a compensatory discount—on consumer goods and thus stimulate the economy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent matter of considerable importance to the students of our country.

As the funds earmarked for the Young Canada Works program will give the green light to only about 20 per cent of the projects already submitted, as it is of prime importance that students work during their holidays to earn a bit of money and help defray the cost of their studies, as it is extremely difficult for the students, in the present situation, to find summer work, and as from the very start Canadian youths have been very enthusiastic about the Young Canada Works program, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House invite the minister responsible to look into the possibility of doubling the budget for the Young Canada Works program so that a higher proportion of our students can work this coming summer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PROTECT AQUATIC FAUNA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of a report made by a conservation agent according to which units of the Canadian army have blown dynamite charges between January 15 and 24 last in three lakes located in the riding of Pontiac, Quebec, and have thereby probably destroyed the aquatic fauna in these lakes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Minister of National Defence immediately proceed to investigate this matter and, if the report is accurate, that the minister intervene to put an end to these practices which threaten the aquatic fauna of our lakes and rivers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORT

RESTORATION OF GRAIN SHIPPING SERVICE TO MANITOBA ELEVATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that on CNR's Inwood subdivision, in the Interlake area of Manitoba, there has been no train service since last December, with the consequence that farmers of the area are now being forced to haul their grain by truck, up to 60 miles in some cases, to elevators on other branch lines on which there is service, and in view of the fact that all storage areas are full and some grain is even stored out in the open, where it will rot if it is not soon shipped, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That this House direct the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board to act immediately to restore grain quotas and grain shipping service to the elevators at Fisher Branch, Manitoba, on CNR's Inwood subdivision, and in view of the fact that this line is slated for probable abandonment in 1979, that the government immediately establish the Prairie Rail Authority so that the off-line loading experiment can be instituted at Fisher Branch, as recommended by the Hall commission, and the farmers of the area can continue to deliver their grain to the elevators at Fisher Branch with the assurance that it will be shipped out of the Interlake via commercial truck to CPR's Arborg rail line, financially assisted and co-ordinated by the federal government through the Prairie Rail Authority.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Oppposition.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question had been for the Minister of Finance, whom I understand is due in the House for the question period. I wonder if I could reserve my right to ask the question when he arrives. I ask that Your Honour recognize, in my place, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORTED GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE OF SOVIET INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the Solicitor General regarding a news story which appeared in the Toronto Sun over the weekend respecting subversive activities in Canada. In reply, the Solicitor General asked for more specific references to that story. Today, there appeared in the same newspaper a list of 16 individual instances of subversive activity directed against our country. My question to the Solicitor General is this: Are those specific allegations, to use the hon. gentleman's phrase, accurate in all material particulars?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): I did read the article to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I have also been advised there is a further article in today's edition. It is not the practice of the government to comment on anything of that nature.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are none so blind as those who will not see.

CUBAN INVOLVEMENT IN SMUGGLING ARMS INTO CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): We shall soon have to allot a day to questions taken as notice by the Solicitor General. With respect to the shipment of arms into Canada, allegedly by the Cuban government, the Solicitor General indicated yesterday that he would take a question on this subject as notice. Were the Cubans instrumental in importing these arms into Canada, and did any of those arms reach the hands of subversives operating in our country?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I took that question as notice because I wanted to familiarize myself with its nature. As I see it, the question falls directly within the category of the previous question, and this being so I shall not comment on it.

Mr. Jarvis: We shall just keep trying, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Solicitor General a question which has absolutely nothing to do with national security, in the hope it may alleviate his timidity? Is the hon. gentleman in a position to advise the House whether he continues to approve the government's policy of supporting financially and politically the present government of Cuba at the same time as that government is conducting activities subversive to the integrity and national security of our country?

Mr. Blais: I am amazed that the hon. gentleman would pose a question in those terms.

Mr. Jarvis: You amaze easily. Just tell us.

Mr. Blais: There is no indication that the government does other than what is announced from time to time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in relation to Cuba.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

CANADA-U.S. DISCUSSIONS ON REPORTED U.S. MEASURES TO INHIBIT FLOW OF FUNDS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance, who is now in the chamber. It is prompted by two circumstances: one is the fact that the Canadian dollar has now gone through the barrier of 89 cents U.S.; the second is the meeting this week between the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of the U.S. Treasury, Mr. Blumenthal. Undoubtedly, the minister has made preparations for this meeting, and undoubtedly he is aware of reports in Washington that the United States is considering reimposing the interest equalization tax which would inhibit the flow of funds into Canada and cause a further decline in the value of our dollar.

Is it the hon. gentleman's intention to raise this matter in discussions with Mr. Blumenthal, and is it his intention to request from Mr. Blumenthal an assurance that if the United States does take the course to which I have referred, Canada will be exempt?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I am aware of those rumours. This is one of the matters I intend to discuss with Mr. Blumenthal and Mr. Schultze when they are in Ottawa.

Mr. Clark: I hope the minister will answer the other part of my question: whether or not it is the policy of the government to seek a commitment that Canada will be spared the impact of that course should it be followed by the United States.

● (1422)

In light of further rumours circulating in Washington to the effect that there will be a U.S. surtax on imports, has the government of Canada looked at the impact upon this country of an action like that by the United States, and will the Minister of Finance be discussing in detail—I emphasize, in detail—the potential impact on Canada of such an action, with Mr. Blumenthal and Mr. Schultze later this week?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is dealing with hypothetical questions. These rumours are not decisions of the administration. I will discuss many matters which are of concern to the Canadian government, but I do not think those rumours will be put into legislation in the United States.

Mr. Clark: I see that the minister is as well prepared as usual and is showing as much foresight as he usually does in not taking advantage of this opportunity of a high level meeting with U.S. Treasury officials to express the very real concerns Canada would have in the event that these things did occur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—PROSPECTUS TO BE FILED WITH U.S. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with another matter relating to reliance upon the relationship of Canada with another agency of the United States, namely, the Securities and Exchange Commission, to which the government of Canada is having unusual recourse in an attempt to bolster our dollar. As the minister has admitted, he will have to file a prospectus with the SEC. I asked him the other day—once again, he did not answer—whether he would be prepared to make available to the House of Commons information on plans for the Canadian economy and plans of this government relative to the Candian dollar which he will be making available to the SEC. In other words, will he give parliament and Canada the same information he is going to give the SEC and the United States, and will he give that information to us before he goes to that foreign agency?

[Mr. Clark.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any request with regard to this prospectus which we will be filing which will force us to give any more information than is already available to the House of Commons.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Reports emanating from money markets around the world indicate that while the Canadian government has been attempting to defend the dollar, it has been buffeted by certain international investors. One particular investor from Kuwait has dumped hundreds of millions of dollars against the foreign exchange reserves of this country. Would the minister indicate whether these reports are in fact true and, if so, how did we become so exposed to this type of relatively short-term obligation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the information related by the hon. member has no basis in fact. Last month we had some problems with Canadian reserves, and that is why, in order to make sure the Canadian dollar floated in the normal manner, some of our reserves were lost. However, the type of rumours spread by the hon. member are not factual or useful in the present circumstances.

Mr. Stevens: As we have lost another $120 million of our United States reserves so far in the month of March, and as our wobbly dollar—which is now hovering in the 88-cent range—is due in part to the fall in our credit rating as far as international investors are concerned, would the minister indicate if he is aware that today, in Toronto, loan companies such as IAC and GMAC are able to borrow at a lower rate of interest than the government of Canada as far as treasury bills are concerned? If the minister is aware of this, does he expect it to continue?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member likes to spread all kinds of rumours and to create false impressions. The Canadian government has a very good credit rating and the real problem is that the number of people who want to lend money to Canada exceeds our borrowing needs.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the supplementary question I just put to the minister is no rumour. In their last report, Wood Gundy pointed out that this may happen, and the report states that for some considerable period of time Canada's credit rating may in fact be lower than commercial credit rating in Toronto. As I have indicated, as of today this has occurred, with Canada having to pay 7.33 per cent on 90-day money, compared with GMAC and certain other companies having to pay 7.25 per cent. Is the minister aware of this fact and, if so, when will he be making a proper statement to this House concerning the government's present credit standing and our foreign exchange reserves problems?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have given information to the House every day. In the last two weeks, I was asked questions every single day and I was always glad to provide every information I had. When my estimates are considered in committee, I will be happy to answer all the questions of the hon. member, even if the same keep cropping up month after month.

STATUS OF WOMEN

CONSIDERATION GIVEN TO REPORT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in light of yesterday's debate on the status of women, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Has the minister received the report of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women which, among other things, indicates that women in Canada Manpower training programs are over-represented in language and upgrading courses and under-represented in apprenticeship and skill training.

The report also notes that sex typing is still practised by Canada Manpower, so that women are under-represented in courses for managerial and administrative occupations. Can the minister say whether he has given consideration to these elements in the report? What steps does he plan to take to correct these two shortcomings?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen that particular report. I can assure the hon. member, given the respect we have for that particular group, that it will be studied very, very carefully by my department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: I see the opposition does not feel we should be studying it; they just make unkind cuts and remarks.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let us see something being done.

Mr. Cullen: In fact, we have done a tremendous amount. Certainly, we have spent more than five minutes, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition did, speaking about the rights of women.

Miss MacDonald: Where was the Prime Minister yesterday?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Where was the hon. minister yesterday?

GOVERNMENT'S COMMITMENT TO EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR WOMEN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I trust the minister will give those matters serious study and that he will report to the House on the results of that study within a reasonable period of time. I wanted to put a question to the minister responsible for the status of women, which arises out of the same report. In his absence, I will direct my question to either the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council or to the President of the Treasury Board.

In view of the criticism in the report of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women to the effect that the government's performance with regard to appointing qualified women to the boards of federal Crown corporations, to commissions, and so on, is unsatisfactory, may I ask what new policies the government will be adopting to change what the Advisory Council calls inaction on the question of the government's commitment to equal opportunity for women in Canada?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's representation as notice and see what I can do to give him a satisfactory answer later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am just wondering, has no minister bothered to read this important report? Are the ministers not interested?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE OF QUEBEC NEWSPAPERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

I am sorry to disturb the minister in his conversation but considering that the work has been interrupted for several months at La Presse in Montreal, at Montréal Matin and at Le Soleil in Quebec City, although those newspapers do not always publish what is going on in the House of Commons with regard to the work of the Social Credit Party of Canada and even if this matter falls under provincial jurisdiction, it is nevertheless a matter of justice. So I would ask the Minister of Labour if he had any discussions with his Quebec counterpart with a view to finding a solution to that serious problem which has been lasting for several months. If so, could he tell the House whether or not he expects these strikes to come to a conclusion in the near future?

● (1432)

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has already answered his own question. My Quebec colleague, the minister of labour for Quebec, indicated that he does not like or want federal intrusion into areas of purely Quebec jurisdiction. All the work stoppages which the hon. member just mentioned are in his jurisdiction and any intervention on my part would be highly resented.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, taking into account the answer of the minister, we must nevertheless consider the situation of the people involved in that strike. Would the hon. gentleman be prepared to offer his service as a mediator to find a solution to this serious problem so that we do not let the economic situation of these people deteriorate since they have the right to live and to have the means to do so?

[English]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Any request for mediation services from the federal government in this dispute would be an abdication of responsibility by the province of Quebec in an area of its exclusive jurisdiction. That being so, I think it is highly unlikely that any such request would be made.

REQUESTED INCREASE IN RESOURCES FOR SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): My question supplementary to that asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot, is directed to the Solicitor General. It refers to reports in the press reputedly emanating from senior security service forces. They state that internal security in this country is so lax that Soviet agents use Canada as a training ground for much tougher assignments in the United States and Great Britain.

In light of this assessment of our internal security situation by experts in our own security service and the KGB as well, will the Solicitor General tell the House whether he will now increase the resources available to the counterespionage work of the security service and, at the same time, take a far tougher position with regard to screening procedures for foreign diplomats operating in Canada under false pretences?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, may I say in reply to the hon. gentleman that I think the expulsion of the 13 Russian operatives less than a month ago was an indication of the efficacious service that is being provided in terms of our national security. With reference to the allegations made by the hon. gentleman, I have no comment.

Mr. Jelinek: The action which the minister took some weeks ago regarding the 13 diplomats was just the tip of the iceberg. The minister himself knows that the RCMP are very well aware of KGB individuals operating in Canada under false pretences, posing as diplomats. I should like to know whether the government will at last change its policy and take a tougher stand in its screening procedures, as well as in allowing fewer passes for travelling outside the capital region by these individuals who are known to the RCMP as KGB agents. Will the minister change his position, or not?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, that question was sufficiently addressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when a question of like nature was put by the hon. member following the expulsion of the 13 Russian operatives.

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO CUBA—KNOWLEDGE OF ARMS SMUGGLING

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of that of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot, and it relates in particular to the answer given by the Solicitor General in respect of the government's relationship with the republic of Cuba. When the Prime Minister visited Cuba, giving international legitimacy to the regime there, he said that Cuba "is a model that will be followed by other developing countries". He went on to proclaim: "Long live prime minister commander Fidel Castro; long live the friendship of Cuba and Canada".

I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether the Prime Minister, before he left our country to visit Cuba, was briefed about the arms shipments to help subversives in our country, whether the Prime Minister was aware at the time he made these statements of the subversive support in our country, and what has he done about it?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman could have asked those questions of the right hon. Prime Minister at the time he returned from his visit to Cuba. Undoubtedly, questions of such an inflammatory nature must have been put to the Prime Minister by the hon. member and some of his colleagues.

Mr. Oberle: Whether or not these statements are inflammatory, the fact is—and the Solicitor General confirmed the reports in the press in his letter to the hon. member for Leeds—that there were arms shipments to Canada from Cuba in support of subversive elements in our country, and that this is a very serious threat to our national security. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, in addition to the shipments that have arrived here from Cuba, other nations have been identified as carrying on similar activities. Could the Solicitor General enlighten us as to whether that matter is under investigation?

Mr. Blais: Yesterday I replied to a question of similar nature from the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth. Furthermore, I have never confirmed any allegation of that nature in any correspondence that I have ever had with the hon. member for Leeds.

AIR TRANSPORT

DC-8 AIRCRAFT LEASED TO CUBA—PRESENT POSITION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I would like to know the quid pro quo for the two DC-8s which we leased to Cuba two years ago. Have we received the DC-8s back, or what exactly did they do with them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The hon. member for Edmonton Centre is using "we" in the royal fashion, I suppose. The fact is that Air Canada entered into a commercial arrangement with Cuba. They did so on the basis of those aircraft being no longer required in their fleet at that time. It was a completely commercial transaction between Air Canada and Cuba.

Mr. Paproski: Does the minister know whether the planes were used to transport troops to Angola or to do any other military work for the Cuban government?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would have to ask Air Canada whether they have any such information.

SMOKE DETECTION DEVICES—EFFECT OF RADIOACTIVE MATERIAL THEREIN

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the enormous benefits to life and property of smoke detection devices installed in homes, and in view of the fact that some smoke detectors use small amounts of radioactive material, with the result that their manufacture, use and, in particular, their disposal are controlled by the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada, will the minister review the adequacy of the inspection and disposal procedures followed in Canada and particularly the information and warning notices available to the public concerning this type of smoke detector?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for notice of this technical question. I shall be very pleased to review the disposal and labelling arrangements with AECB and with my colleagues, particularly the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

At the same time, I should like to reassure the hon. member that I have checked into this question and have been assured that there is no threat to health and safety and that the radioactivity present in these smoke detectors is of minute proportions.

IMMIGRATION

ACCEPTANCE BY CANADA OF U.S. CITIZENS FOR CANADIAN JOBS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday, the minister announced that a U.S. citizen, R. Sherrell, was granted permission to enter Canada to become president of the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia, with an annual salary of $80,000 a year. The minister was quoted in the press as saying:

—the fact remains that an adequate search in Canada was not made and there is evidence that at least one qualified Canadian was available.

I should like to ask, if this was indeed the case, why did the minister not take his own advice, and why did he permit a U.S. citizen to take this job when, obviously, there are qualified Canadians available?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, I think I should point out that the Price Waterhouse Company, who usually do an excellent job in this area, flubbed in this particular case and did not contact our Manpower and Immigration offices. It was not until the day before we heard that an announcement was to be made that we contacted cabinet minister for the province of British Columbia and indicated the difficulties involved, that we had not been contacted, did not know whether an adequate search had been made, and wanted to be satisfied that that had taken place.

On the basis of evidence that we had, we were satisfied that an adequate search had not been made, so we refused to grant the necessary points to Mr. Sherrell—who, incidentally, is the innocent party in this situation. Following that, I met with the selection committee of ICBC and went through, with them and representatives from Price Waterhouse, the number of candidates they had contacted across Canada, some 274 or 275. I was satisfied that they had not made an adequate search. They had not done any advertising east of British Columbia other than one ad in the Globe and Mail.

Having been given all this information and the present dilemma that the company finds itself in, namely, with $400 million in premiums and the necessity of finding a person for this particular job, I think the fact that they appointed a Canadian as chairman of the board is a direct result of the intervention we made. I was satisfied it was an appropriate time to exercise discretion and allow Mr. Sherrell to take this particular job and, at the same time, put provincial authorities on notice that in future they will have to go through the procedures or they will be more embarrassed than they have been in this case.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that some 90,000 non-residents were working in this country last year, mainly white-collar, professional workers. In light of the high unemployment for this group as well as other Canadians, is the minister about to tighten up the regulations so that the first priority will go to Canadians who need these jobs?

Mr. Cullen: Very definitely, Mr. Speaker, but I hope I will have the backing of the opposition parties when we take this particular stance, and will not have constant representations to the effect that an exception can be made in particular instances. We have indicated it is "Canadians first". It does not matter whether we are talking about offshore labour, blue- or white-collar workers—we do take that particular stance. It is quite often necessary to bring people from outside our boundaries in order to maintain jobs in Canada. There was an instance in my own riding where 600 Americans were brought in to sustain a work force of 5,500 Canadians.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COST OF LIVING INCREASES FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board which arises from a report in today's Ottawa Journal that the government will publish a study this Thursday suggesting limits are necessary on cost of living increases for retired public servants. Could the minister confirm or deny the report? If the answer to the question is yes, will he be making a statement at the time he tables the document in the House?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, without confirming the specific suggestion in the apparent news article, I can tell the hon. member and members of the House that I intend to make a statement in the House on the subject of public service pensions before the end of this week.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, dealing with the statement itself. The report indicates that an official of the Prime Minister's office says it will be accompanied by recommendations by the government, whereas in another part of the article the author of the Tomenson-Alexander study says that the report "does not contain recommendations as such" but, rather, it is a working paper. Could the minister state which of those representations is true?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think they are both inclined to be correct. The Tomenson-Alexander report is a working paper and advice to the government, which we are going to make public—an actuarial study—but there will also be a government statement accompanying the tabling of that report at the appropriate time this week.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

CANADA'S POSITION ON NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has so often spoken in glowing terms in favour of negotiated settlements especially when Canada has been one of the parties. Now that there has been a negotiated settlement in Rhodesia, will the minister tell the House how he has made Canada's position known in favour of negotiated settlements rather than settlements through arms, terrorism and murder?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right; I have expressed my support for negotiated settlements. They only work, however, when all the parties involved are also involved in the negotiations. In that sense, therefore, the message that I have conveyed, and that I am sure will carry the support of all parties in the House, is that I hope this beginning toward a settlement in Rhodesia will be extended. I hope that Mr. Nkomo, Mr. Mugabe and the others concerned can be brought into the negotiation process. I am equally urging that group to accept the invitation to become involved in the negotiating process so that in every sense it can be a negotiated settlement.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In specific terms, would the minister say whether instructions to that effect have been sent to our delegation at the Security Council? Are they working to ensure that it is a negotiated settlement which rules in Rhodesia, and not one of force of arms?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in the way in which that question was phrased, I do not think it would be necessary to send new instructions. That has always been our position. The situation there is changing daily and there is a whole series of communications back and forth. At the moment, I think the advice of my colleague the British foreign minister is wise; that is, that we should not move too quickly or in any precipitate way at the moment, but that we should allow the matter an opportunity to settle and see what all the parties are doing and how they are going to react.

I emphasize again that it is our judgment that a settlement along the lines the hon. member has outlined, namely, one negotiated as opposed to one involving confrontation and hostility, is clearly the desired option. We will be using all the influence at our disposal to try to bring about that goal.

AGRICULTURE

PRICE OF POTATOES LESS THAN COST OF PRODUCTION—ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and it is about potatoes. In view of the fact that potato producers in eastern Canada have been since last summer supplying fresh produce to the kitchens, tables and processing plants of this area of the nation at prices substantially below the cost of production, and because no apparent improvement in present market trends is foreseeable, will the minister—the farmer's best friend—consider an early initiative to alleviate the grave uneasiness and critical financial pressures now experienced by hundreds of family farm units which are more depressed than the markets?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of the plight that some potato producers in Canada are suffering, all the way from $4 per hundredweight in the rich province of Alberta to $1.75 per hundredweight in the poor province of New Brunswick. We are concerned about this and are monitoring it. We will consider stabilization. It may be of interest to the hon. member, if he is not aware of it, that they had a vote to form some kind of marketing authority or board in that area, and it carried by a huge majority.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF POTATOES FROM EASTERN TO CENTRAL CANADA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport with respect to the very grave situation that exists in terms of adequate transportation for the movement of potatoes from the eastern provinces to central Canadian markets. Since this matter has been under consideration by the minister and a special task force of his department for well over a year, and since its initial report on the recommendation for new units was made as long ago as last summer, can the minister indicate why it has taken so long to come to this crucial decision?

In addition to the recommendation made last summer for new cars, is consideration being given to purchasing, on an interim basis at least, the 300 cars available from Hanover Trust, in the United States, at roughly a quarter of the cost of purchasing new cars now on order or the 700 cars that are presently available for shipment this shipping season?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the report last summer indicated there would be adequate cars in the fleet for the movement of potatoes during this winter period, but that a problem would have to be faced before the shipment season next year. We have been addressing that question, including the issue of where we can get cars most effectively which would be most useful for the movement of potatoes. We are very close to results in that regard and an announcement may be made within a couple of weeks.

In the meantime, of course, we have been working very effectively with the potato producers, and in many other ways, to ensure better movement of potatoes. In that regard we have greatly improved the handling facilities at some of our main ports.

TRADE

DATE AND AMOUNT OF PROPOSED TARIFF CUTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In answer to a question asked in this House a week ago today, the minister said:

> Respecting the Swiss formula of a 40 per cent cut, this represents merely a weighted average. In some instances one might grant a higher percentage, and in others a lower percentage.

● (1452)

I ask the minister when he intends to advise the manufacturing industry of Canada which tariffs will be cut by 40 per cent, which will be cut by less than 40 per cent, and which will be cut by more than 40 per cent, so that plant managers across this country will be able to calculate the effect this increased competition will have on the number of people they will be able to employ in future.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think it is the hope of most of the negotiators at Geneva to reach an agreement on the exact cuts by some time in the middle of this year—early July.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not aware of the fact that the give-away program which the government has been indulging in during the past few weeks regarding tariff cuts on manufactured articles, the products that produce the jobs, is going to cost Canadians a very large number of jobs in the future? Can he assure the House now that these large cuts on manufactured articles are not going to be made?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to set up an adjustment panel to assist industry in adjusting to the cuts. I might say that the average tariff on items coming into Canada now in the industrial sector is about 14 per cent. A 40 per cent cut on 14 per cent would be in the neighbourhood of five percentage points, just about half the advantage Canadian manufacturers now receive from the 90-cent dollar.

Mr. Hees: In other words, the minister is telling the Canadian manufacturing industry that they have never had it so good and they should be happy with the program the government is indulging in at their expense at the present time?

Mr. Horner: No, Mr. Speaker. What I am telling the opposition is that they should appreciate the 90-cent dollar, and what an asset it is to Canadian manufacturers.

An hon. Member: Jack, you should go into economics.

An hon. Member: Tell it to the British.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

PROPOSED HEAVY OIL PLANT AT LLOYDMINSTER, SASK.—PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could the minister advise the House what progress has been made, if any, since the federal-provincial conference, toward reaching agreement to build a $700 million heavy oil operating facility in the Lloydminster area as proposed by Husky Oil Company of Canada? If there has not been any progress, can he indicate why? Perhaps he might be able to outline what obstacles are now standing in the way of reaching agreement.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of discussions with Husky Oil and with other potential partners in this massive project. There have been discussions by those partners with the federal government and with the Saskatchewan government. There has been considerable understanding of the need to provide sufficient feedstock for an upgrading facility. While the Husky production might be significant in the first half of the first unit, additional feedstock is going to be needed. That matter has been under discussion with the Saskatchewan government and discussions are in an active state at the moment.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, since the realization of such a very expensive and high-risk project will require appropriate incentives from a tax and royalty point of view, can the minister indicate to the House the stage of those negotiations at the present time? When can we expect a definitive tax and incentives package to be advanced by the federal government? Also, could he advise the House of the role he expects the Crown corporation, Petro-Can, to play in the development of this project?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right when he says royalty rates will be quite important. Of course they are, and that question is under discussion right now. There has been a substantial meeting of the minds between the government of Saskatchewan and the federal government with respect to federal tax incentives that will be needed. I understand the Saskatchewan government is not at the present time in a position to outline what its royalty arrangements might be. I am told they are in the process of drafting regulations with respect to new legislation which was passed recently, so that one might look forward to a statement on the royalty regime from the Saskatchewan government in the near future.

On the question of Petro-Canada and the role it will play in such a major undertaking, I would expect it to be significant. I would expect, as well, that there might be a Saskatchewan government Crown corporation involved in addition to a number of significant private sector partners.

[Mr. Horner.]

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CUPW AND DEPARTMENT TO AVOID STRIKE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Postmaster General. In view of the fine record the Postmaster General is reported to have had, as mayor of Quebec City, in being able to avoid strikes, I would ask if he can relieve some of the anxieties of Canadians and indicate to the House the status of negotiations between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and Post Office management; and does he expect to be able to maintain his record and avoid a strike in the near future?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to point out that everything is done to try to meet with all concerned people to examine the possibility of negotiations with postal workers.

[English]

I think everything is being done to avoid a strike. I can tell you, sir, that if we have a strike at this moment, it would not be our responsibility. Everything, as far as management is concerned, is being done to avoid it, as well as meetings with the union.

Mr. Clark: Nothing is your responsibility.

Mr. Lamontagne: We are ready to do everything we can to avoid a strike, but we will not abdicate our responsibility as management.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, a further question to the Postmaster General. Now that he has had several days to consider the request of his colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, by way of a question addressed to the Prime Minister recommending that a parliamentary committee be established consisting of members from all four parties, could the Postmaster General give us his considered opinion as to the validity of the request of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Given the present situation, Mr. Speaker, I believe that an interparliamentary committee is not absolutely necessary, considering that we already have all the necessary instruments to settle the dispute and that all necessary efforts are made to try to find solutions. We all know very well the postal problems—mechanization and labour-management relations. I feel that both these problems can very well be examined by our department and our management, and I believe we can find the solution to these problems. If not, I will be very happy to agree to that request.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DEATH OF RCMP CONSTABLE IN MEXICO—GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister knows, his department has been investigating the mysterious death of a Manitoba-born RCMP constable, Lonnie Neely, while holidaying in Mexico. Are the Mexican authorities co-operating with Mr. Ken Burke, first, secretary to the Canadian ambassador in Mexico, and could the minister inform the House of the type of investigation his department is conducting? Also, has the minister received any results from Mexico concerning the investigation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be succinct and give the hon. member the pertinent details. The department, through our representative in Mexico, concluded that the first findings of the local police were inadequate and succeeded in having the investigation reopened. As a result of the reopening of the investigation, the police in Mexico have invited the RCMP to participate, and representatives of the force were sent to Mexico. I would assume they are continuing at this moment to participate in the investigation.

In that context, I can answer the hon. member's question and say the investigation is proceeding, one can only assume in a satisfactory manner. The press reports give us more detail, because I have not seen any official report on the investigation. It is fair to say there was a conclusion on the part of the representative from our embassy that the original investigation had not been adequate, and we therefore pressed for and succeeded in having it reopened.

INFORMATION OBTAINED BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, so that we have all the information available, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Solicitor General. I would ask, since the RCMP are involved in the investigation at the present time in Mexico, if he can inform the House whether he has any information in addition to that just given to the House by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. I simply reiterate that the RCMP is receiving co-operation from External Affairs and from the local authorities. We are interested in reaching a final conclusion in this instance, and the representations the hon. member may wish to make will be provided to the Mexican authorities.

OIL DEFICIT—EFFECT ON VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The major factor in the weakness of the American dollar is a very large oil deficit of $45 billion last year, which will go up to about $100 billion by the end of the next decade. Given our own problems in this direction, and estimates that our deficit could rise to about $6 billion by about 1985, what major steps are being taken to avoid that kind of deficit which would give the Canadian dollar a lower value on world markets?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not have time to go through all of them. Some of those raised by the hon. member for Vegreville are very important. The heavy oils of Saskatchewan, the tar sands of Alberta and the heavy oils of Alberta can have a very major effect in replacing our depleting conventional oil reserves. The extension of the natural gas pipeline from the Arctic to the Atlantic Ocean could have a very significant effect in backing out foreign oil imports.

The other major projects are more in the hydro-electric area in the Maritimes, an area which is very dependent on foreign oil and one which will be dependent upon foreign oil for electrical generation unless we are able to find resources such as tidal power and the project on Gull Island.

MANPOWER

YOUNG CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. According to my own information, I would like to tell the minister that I feel that it will be clearly impossible to carry out 75 per cent of the projects submitted under the Young Canada Works program because funds are far from sufficient. Considering the importance for students, and I think the minister agrees on this, to obtain a summer job, can the minister tell the House whether he is prepared to study the possibility of increasing funds considerably to enable students to find a job this summer?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday or last week, we certainly have had quite a lot of success with our Young Canada Works program. Now, we have to examine the situation. I think that the hon. member's figures are not quite accurate. So we shall have to study them.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—APPLICABILITY OF OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) raised a question of privilege which is regarded by members on all sides of the House as touching a very important and fundamental matter concerning the rights of members, their immunities, and the resolution of those in terms of the Official Secrets Act.

Some consideration is being given to having that question examined by the Rights and Immunities Committee, which is not reconstituted. As a preliminary step, that committee will have to be reconstituted and then consulted to determine two things. First, it will have to determine whether it is disposed to examine the matter within roughly the terms of reference proposed by the hon. member for Yukon, and, second, the format of those discussions or examination, because the work of that committee in the past has very much been a study of problems with an effort to come to some consensus in the form of a recommendation to the House on a particular matter. That was done in the matter of questions concerning subjects that are before the courts.

If that is to be the basis of the study of this committee, which is yet to be determined, it will be possible for me to continue to preside over it. On the other hand, if it is desired that witnesses be called before the committee and that a more formal type of hearing be entered into, it will be difficult for me to continue to preside.

Therefore, two questions have to be resolved. The first is whether the Rights and Immunities Committee, having been reconstituted, is prepared to study it and try to report back in a short space of time and, second, the format of examination of it. Discussions are taking place in the usual way as to the reconstitution of that committee and the resolution of those matters.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I agree fully with what you have said. I only wish to emphasize that it is imperative, in my view, that the reconstitution of the committee should proceed at once, and perhaps consultation with the House leaders, as to the terms of reference that should be referred to that committee so that there is no delay in the committee seizing itself with the problem that I raised.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 257, 944, 1,025, 1,147, 1,224, 1,240 and 1,291.

[Mr. Cullen.]

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

TENTATIVE RELOCATIONS IN GUY FAVREAU PROJECT

Question No. 257—Mr. Herbert:

1. Are any departmental offices tentatively scheduled for relocations in the Place Guy Favreau Project in Montreal, and, if so, which offices and from which departments?

2. Where are the personnel presently located and approximately how many are in each location?

3. What are the sizes of the premises presently occupied and are any owned by the Crown?

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): 1. We cannot, at this early date, identify specific governmental offices which will be relocated into Complexe Guy Favreau.

2. Public Works does not to date maintain records of numbers of personnel in client premises. Personnel are presently located in more than 100 leased premises and 19 Crown owned buildings, totalling some 160,000 sq. meters. An analysis is currently under way which will recommend renegotiations of economically favourable leases and renovation of some Crown-owned properties. The allocation of space in Place Guy Favreau will be made after this analysis has taken place.

3. See answer to part 2.

CMHC SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM—NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 944—Mr. Marshall:

1. Were applications received from the Province of Newfoundland under the CMHC Scholarship Programme?

2. On what date was the Programme started?

3. In each of the years since it was started, what was the breakdown of applications, by province?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: 1. Yes.

2. The current programme for studies in housing and housing-related subjects was started in 1975 under section 37(1)(e) of the National Housing Act and superseded the Fellowship Programme which started in 1967.

3. The distribution by province of applications meeting the criteria of the programme and reviewed by the Committees of Award is as follows:

Province of Residence	1977/78	1976/77	1975/76
Newfoundland	1	—	1
Prince Edward Island	2	1	—
Nova Scotia	5	7	3
New Brunswick	2	1	—
Québec	53	38	63
Ontario	122	100	110

FRANCOPHONE COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS

Question No. 1,025—Mr. Epp:

1. What is the total annual expenditure incurred for the purpose of establishing a Francophone Commonwealth of Nations?

2. (a) How many meetings has Canada attended in other countries (b) in which countries were the meetings held (c) who were the Canadian representatives (d) what was the cost for travel, lodging and miscellaneous?

3. (a) How many meetings has Canada hosted and at what cost (b) which countries attended the meetings?

4. What countries are currently negotiating with Canada to join in a Francophone Commonwealth of Nations?

5. Under the proposed Francophone Commonwealth of Nations, which country is to be the head and what kind of organizational structure is this commonwealth to have?

6. (a) What is Canada's involvement in the Francophone Co-operation Agency (b) what are the terms of reference and mandate of the Agency (c) which countries belong to the Agency?

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. No expenditure has been incurred so far for the purpose of establishing a Francophone Commonwealth of Nations.

2. No international meeting involving Canada has been held specifically for that purpose and none is foreseen in the near future.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

5. Not applicable.

6. (a) Canada has been a member of the Agency for Cultural and Technical Cooperation since it was established, in March 1970. (b) The Agency essentially works at expanding multilateral cooperation between its members in the fields of education, culture, science and technology, as well as development. (c) The membership of the Agency is the following: Belgium, Bénin, Burundi, Canada, Chad, Comores, Ivory Coast, Djibouti, Central African Empire, France, Gabon, Haiti, Upper Volta, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Mali, Mauritius, Monaco, Niger, Rwanda, Senegal, Seychelles, Togo, Tunisia, Vietnam and Zaïre. Cameroun and Laos are associate members. The provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick have the status of "participating government".

INSULATION MATERIALS

Question No. 1,147—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has there been for many years a demand for insulation materials during the winter months that has exceeded inventory plus production?

2. Has there been for many years an unutilized production capacity of insulation materials in the summer months?

3. Was an estimate received that the unutilized capacity for insulation materials in the summer of 1977 was approximately 250 million square feet?

4. Has the government taken any steps to ensure stock piling in the summer of 1978 to avoid a shortage of supply in the following winter?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: 1. Typically the greatest seasonal demand for insulation is in the fall and early winter months when new housing starts are nearing completion and existing homeowners consider re-insulation. Minor delays have occurred in delivery of some materials in some centres, but such "shortages" have been temporary and localized.

2. During the late winter and spring months demand for insulation typically drops off. Some plants do not maintain production at capacity during this period.

3. CMHC is not aware of an estimate of unused capacity for the insulation industry as a whole.

4. The federal government has not received any requests for assistance in "stockpiling". However, discussions have been held with many manufacturers who indicate that substantial increases in capacity are underway. Some of them are also planning to secure additional storage space for certain denser types of insulation.

ELIGIBILITY OF CHURCH BUILDINGS FOR CHIP

Question No. 1,224—Mr. McKinnon:

Will church buildings, other than rectories, be considered for the Canadian Home Insulation Programme in the near future and, if so, on what date?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation: the Canadian Home Insulation Programme is available to existing dwelling units occupied as permanent residences and to hostel accommodation operated by non-profit and government organizations. There are no plans to extend the programme to apply to other types of buildings.

LANGUAGE TRAINING EXPENSES

Question No. 1,240—Mr. Alexander:

1. During the period 1964 to 1973, how many public servants undertook language training at government expense and how many were trained in courses offered by (a) the government (b) outside institutions?

2. For the same period, how many were trained in (a) English (b) French?

3. For the same period, what was the total expenditure on language training for public servants enrolled in (a) government (b) outside courses?

4. Since the introduction of continuous language training in 1973, how many public servants have received language training at government expense and, how many were on (a) continuous (b) part-time or cyclical language training?

5. Since the introduction of continuous language training in 1973, how many public servants have been trained in (a) English (b) French?

6. Of those public servants who have undertaken continuous language training since it was introduced, how many (a) dropped out before meeting the required standard (b) failed to meet the required standard after the full training period (c) achieved the 02 or 01 standards or higher (d) achieved the 03 or 04 standard?

7. Since the introduction of continuous language training in 1973, what has been the total expenditure on public service language training?

8. What was the total amount of salaries paid to public servants while they were on continuous language training since the programe began?

9. Since the introduction of the bilingual bonus programme (a) what has been the total amount paid and over what period of time (b) how many public servants received the bonus?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. (a) 49,402 through Public Service Commission Language Bureau (1964 to 1973 inclusive); (b) not available since language training was not specifically identified in training programme.

2. (a) 8,064; (b) 41,338.

3. (a) Prior to 1968, language training expenditures of the Public Service Commission were included with those of staffing. A breakdown of these costs for the years 1964-68 is therefore not available. From 1968 to 1974 the total cost is $52,828,000; (b) not available since language training was not specifically identified in training programme.

4. (a) 15,847 (as of December 31, 1977); (b) 15,626 (as of December 31, 1977).

5. (a) 2,125; (b) 13,722.

6. (a) 1,434; (b) 947; (c) 6,055; (d) 5,763. (Note: 1,648 students were on course as of the end of December 1977.)

7. Until 1976-77, some direct and indirect costs to departments for the official languages programme were neither specifically identified in departmental budgets nor independently collected. This includes part-time in-house courses, capital and leasing costs, travel and relocation costs for continuous language training and salary costs of persons not replaced while on language training. Recognizing the unavailability of some of these costs for part of the period covered, the total expenditure on public service language training is $345.5 million for period 1973-74 to 1976-77 inclusive.

8. $80.3 million for persons replaced, 1973-74 to 1976-77 inclusive.

9. Exact figures not yet available. Reliable estimates are: (a) $40.8 million including retroactivity for November 1, 1976 to March 31, 1977 and all of 1977-78; (b) 36,769.

INSTALLATIONS—ARTILLERY AND AMMUNITION DEPOTS

Question No. 1,291—Mr. Jones:

1. How many artillery depots are there in Canada?
2. How many main artillery depots are in Quebec?
3. How many ammunition depots are in Canada?
4. How many ammunition depots are in Quebec?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): The information requested in this question was provided in answer to question No. 2,758 in the second session of the 30th Parliament and was published in Hansard No. 163 page 7629 dated 13 July, 1977, and to question No. 893 of this session published in Hansard No. 45 page 2115 dated 23 January, 1978. No changes have occurred since then.

NOTE: There are no artillery depots in the Canadian Armed Forces. Artillery equipment and supplies are held in supply depots and are overhauled either in workshops or by contracts.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That in the opinion of this House it is crucial to the strength of Canada's economy and the provision of employment opportunities that a vigorous program of technological research and development be promoted by the government, and to this end this House urges a policy which would:

(1) set a goal of 2.5 per cent of the G.N.P. to be spent on research and development by 1985;

(2) significantly increase the research and development tax credit for Canadian industry;

(3) give particular priority to strengthening our research and development programs, particularly in the fields of agriculture and renewable resources;

(4) extend the tax credit system to provide incentive for new employment in industrial research, design and development;

(5) encourage development work in areas of acknowledged Canadian expertise.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 32(1)(k) and Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on this motion will expire at the ordinary hour of adjournment this evening.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to engage the House of Commons in a debate which will deal with one of the most important matters that can affect our future as a modern, industrialized country. It is clear to all of us including, even though he will not admit it, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), that this country today is in a state of very real economic crisis.

We have more than one million unemployed. We have a number of Canadian plants and industries across the country that would find jobs for those Canadians but they are operating so much under capacity because of low demand and low stimulus in the economy that those jobs are not in existence.

We have a situation where the Government of Canada continues to pretend it is engaging in restraint but in fact it is engaging in the worst kind of governmental extravagance. We also have a situation where the government's growth projections are clearly wrong on the future of the Canadian economy.

What troubles most of us is that the Government of Canada, dealing with short-term immediate problems and dealing with this crisis of unemployment, seems not to care at all about the plight of the Canadian unemployed.

The Minister of Finance continues to refuse to bring in a budget. He does that even though the treasurer of the province of Ontario, who is today bringing in his own budget, has been urging the minister in the strongest possible terms to give some meaning and content to the agreement of the first ministers' conference earlier this year and to bring in a budget that will give credence to those measures that were agreed on by the premiers when they met here in Ottawa.

As I have said here before, the real reason the government does not want to bring in a budget is a political reason. It is doing everything it can to keep discussion of the economy of Canada off the floor of the House of Commons of Canada. Ministers continue to refuse to bring in any real stimulus to the economy and they continue to refuse to exercise any real restraint over the activities of the Government of Canada. Instead, they try to hide the seriousness of the problem.

• (1512)

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) goes around the country pretending unemployment doesn't matter. Well, let him try it! It certainly matters, especially to those one million Canadians who cannot find work. We find also, in that department, an example of the shameful behaviour of the government inasmuch as the basis of reporting has been juggled so as to conceal the effects of lay-offs. Until last month the department used to issue a report showing lay-offs in industries where lay-offs involved more than 20 people in a month. Now, so embarrassing does the government find these statistics that the basis has been changed in an effort to hide the real face of unemployment, to conceal its real impact upon the province of Ontario and upon other provinces.

Moreover, the government continues to refuse to state clearly the economic policy it is pursuing in relation to the Canadian dollar. Last week the government announced it was going down to the SEC. This week, judging by the interest rates, we will probably have to go to HFC!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Sir, the economic crisis in Canada is the result of the worst decade of economic management in the history of this country, a situation which is entirely consistent with a government which is the worst federal government since Confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In part, also, it is due to the complete failure of the government to give any priority to economic policy and the consequent failure to establish any coherent national economic strategy to prepare us for a much tougher, much more competitive future. The absence of any economic strategy has become clear most dramatically and most dangerously in our preparation for the GATT negotiations at Geneva.

It is difficult enough for Canada going into GATT negotiations because we are, relatively, one of the smaller economies in the world. But our problems have been aggravated in the extreme by entering into these negotiations, negotiations which will require commitments which could affect us for years, without knowing ourselves what we want to do, where we want to specialize, that direction we want our growth as a nation to take in the decades ahead.

No one pretends it is easy to establish a comprehensive national economic strategy. But ease of accomplishment is not the issue. The government has failed even to try to make a start and nobody can forgive it for failing to begin the hard work of developing such a strategy. We are paying for that failure now, and the government has an immediate obligation to begin the hard work of developing a genuine national economic strategy for Canada.

Naturally, an essential element of that strategy will be the frankest, fullest possible consultation with the other partners in the Canadian community—the provinces, organized labour, business and so on. But one element in any national economic strategy is already clear: we must emphasize high technology, research and development industries if we are to compete and grow in the modern world.

We are fortunate among nations in the extent and wealth of our natural resource base. But we have to face the fact that other countries, too, enjoy wealthy natural resource bases, including countries whose wage rates and productivity levels are much more competitive than ours. So we have also to use the other great resource of Canada—human ingenuity and innovation. We have to use our brains as well as our brawn as a nation or we shall not be able to compete in the modern world.

[Translation]

The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development published recently a list of the 110 most important technical discoveries since World War II. None of them was made in Canada. This exemplifies one of the most disquieting problems facing Canada today. At a time when progress depends largely on technology, Canada discourages research and development. Yet, technical discoveries would play an essential part in achieving all our economic objectives. They are the key to a new growth and new job opportunities. They are the key to industrial effectiveness and, by way of consequence, to greater price stability. They are the key to a better trade balance and a stronger value for the Canadian dollar.

Our problem is twofold. First, our technical discoveries are decreasing in number. Second, we are lagging more and more behind our competitors. Which means that in the area of technical discoveries, the gap between Canada and the other developed nations is forever widening. Had Canada last year applied an adequate research and development policy, nearly 50,000 scientists, engineers, research planners and other technicians would be working in the Canadian sector of manufactured industries, thus ensuring greater prospects for our economic future.

[English]

So that gap, instead of narrowing, is growing wider. The OECD has recently compared the gross expenditures of various nations on research and development as a percentage of the gross national product of those nations. In the period from 1965 to 1975 to which the study applies, the OECD selected average for all member countries remained the same at 1.6 per cent. For Canada, in that period, the percentage dropped from 1.1 per cent to 0.9 per cent.

Three points must be made about that situation. First, by investing less than one per cent of our gross national product in innovation Canada has the worst record of any western nation, the worst in the western world. Second, the Committee on Science Policy of the other place set a goal of 2.5 per cent of the GNP as being a proper national objective. Not only are we falling behind other nations, we are falling behind the goal which our own advisers have established. Third, while the OECD average has remained the same, Canada's investment in innovation has been dropping. The countries whose investment has increased include West Germany, Japan and even Italy. And all our major competitors invest considerably more in innovation than does Canada. That fact comes home in our trade.

Today we are running a $10 billion deficit in high technology manufactured goods. What is most dangerous about this deficit is that it is not remaining static—it is deepening. In the years before 1970 we ran a deficit of about $1 billion in trade in those goods. Since then there has been a straight-line trend downward. This means that Canada's situation is going to get seriously worse. We shall fall even farther behind in innovation unless there is a change in the approach and policy of the government.

Investment in innovation is not just something it would be nice to do. It is not part of an international game of keeping up with the Joneses. Unless we innovate, our trade problems will grow more severe, unemployment will get worse, prices will continue to rise.

General Electric in the United States recently commissioned an analysis of output, employment, and price behaviour over the last 25 years in high technology and low technology industries in the United States. Three facts stand out from that analysis. First, high technology products provide a positive trade balance while low technology products do not. Second, high technology industries grew in that period almost three times as fast as low technology industries, and their productivity was twice as high. Finally, in high technology industries manufacturing prices rose much more slowly, while employment grew almost nine times as fast as it did in low technology industries. So, in terms of jobs, lower prices, better trade, and faster growth we need to invest in innovation as a nation.

I think two comparisons with the situation in the United States dramatize the changes in attitude and in policy which are necessary for Canada. The first of those relates to research which is done outside government by the industries of the two nations. In the United States—and this is a startling, sobering fact—three companies, General Motors, IBM, and Ford, each on their own spend more on research and development than all Canadian companies taken together spend on innovation in Canada. In other words, each of three major companies there invest more, in total budget, in innovation than the total of Canadian companies invest in innovation in this country. That indicates a failure on the part of Canadian industry which we in this House of Commons have to recognize is related in part to the fact that much of our industry has head offices elsewhere, which tends to attract research elsewhere.

The second comparison is that the Government of Canada in its last budget took what amounts for this government to a great leap forward. In fact it was more like a stumble in the dark. The government brought the tax credit for research and development up to 10 per cent for those areas where unemployment is the most serious. In other words, a 10 per cent tax credit for innovation is the highest the Canadian government will go, and that only in the most strictly limited circumstances. A 10 per cent tax credit is where the United States starts. They start at our highest level, and that is one of the reasons for the difference in the interest in innovation by industry in the two countries. That indicates again an absolute failure on the part of this government to commit itself to innovation in this country.

These are not new words. These are not new warnings. The Canadian research community, and virtually every study into the question of innovation and research, have been warning about the dangers of the failure of Canada to encourage research and development. Now the research community—and I think this is important—and others who are concerned in the country, are joined explicitly by the ten premiers of Canada.

I think the whole country was very much amused by the degree of enthusiasm and eagerness with which this government, which has added so much to confrontation and disunity in this country during its ten years in office, claimed credit for bringing together the ten premiers. I applaud the government for finally doing that. I think it is important that Canadians note that last year, when the need to meet was most urgent, was the first year in several that the Government of Canada failed to convene a meeting of first ministers. However, I congratulate the government for finally catching up and taking the initiative it should have taken. Calling a meeting is not difficult, but acting on the results of that meeting is the true test of commitment and concern on the part of a federal government.

Miss MacDonald: And making proposals.

Mr. Clark: Indeed, as my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), points out very appropriately, making proposals is also a very important test. The most remarkable aspect of the first ministers' conference was that all the serious proposals came from the provinces.

I should make one exception. There was one specific proposal which came from the federal government. That contained a long list of projects proposed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) which included, prominently, the Kitimat pipeline, which his colleagues two weeks later turned around and scuttled. One specific agreement, which came about largely because of the inspiration of the government of Ontario but which also had the support of other premiers, found its way into the statement of conclusions, and I would like to read it into the record. The following is an agreement between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments:

Joint steps will be taken to improve tax incentives or credits to industry for research and development, the expansion of employment opportunities in these areas, and increase dissemination and application of existing technology.

That was the commitment. The question now is, where is the action by the Government of Canada? The question for the federal government now is, will the federal government honour the commitment it gave to the provinces and to the research community of Canada?

Will the minister himself, who is in the House today, urge his colleagues, and particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), to bring in a budget as soon as possible to provide those tax incentives or those tax credits? If the government is afraid of a budget, as I presume it is, will it take some other action immediately to carry out the will and the agreement of the first ministers, and to begin to make Canada competitive again in a high technology world?

I understand that the minister will be speaking later today. I hope to be able to hear him. I certainly look forward to his spelling out the initiatives—and the time-frame for enacting those initiatives—which the Government of Canada intends to take both to honour the agreement at the first ministers' meeting as well as to begin progress toward making this country competitive again in a high technology world.

I referred earlier to one of the very real problems of this country. It is a special problem, an accident of geography and history. A special problem is posed for Canada because many of the companies which are active here and many of the companies whose activities we require here send their research home to head offices. Unfortunately, we have to face this fact.

Many branch plants in Canada are miniature replicas of their parent companies. Their research and development programs often consist of very little more than adapting parental technology to Canadian tastes. As I said in Tilbury, Ontario, the other night, very often that means that we require that our rice crispies snap, crackle and pop in both official languages, but we do very little more to encourage real innovation in this country. No doubt the natural tendency—and I think this is a very important point to drive home—is to locate innovation at head offices. No doubt that tendency is encouraged by the fact that incentives for innovation in head office countries are much more dramatic than they are in Canada. That is the case with head offices in the United States and in other OECD countries, where most head offices are located. Competitive incentive by Canada could have some effect upon that trend, but the clear message for Canada is that this government, or the government we form, cannot continue on the path of pretending that a passive policy alone will be enough in the field of research and development.

We cannot afford to sit back and wait for proposals, because we have to face the fact that if there are proposals coming from many large corporations in this country for research and development, they do not come to the capital of this country.

They go to the head offices of those corporations in other countries. That is a reality we have to face. It is a reality which many of us are prepared to face because of the need we have for foreign investment. However, it is a very real and important reality which must affect government policy, and it is a reason why there should be much more emphasis on innovation instead of less emphasis, as is the case with this government.

Given the drain to other countries where head offices are located, in our view the Government of Canada should go out and actively promote innovation in areas where Canada is best equipped to compete with the rest of the world and by companies which have a clear and unfettered commitment to Canada's interest. I want to make this point explicitly: that includes small Canadian companies.

I would like to turn the attention of the House for a moment to some of the special problems which are placed in the path of small Canadian companies which want to be active and innovative. One of the most serious is the simple burden of paper work. The paper work involved, for example, with the Enterprise Development Program is so overwhelming that mainly large companies apply because only large companies can hire the accountants, the lawyers, and the other experts who can weave their way through all that paper work. If the Government of Canada is serious about having the Enterprise Development Program serve the interests of small Canadian entrepreneurs, it should cut away that paper work and give them an equal chance at being helped in innovation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The make or buy program was introduced some years ago, I believe by the present chairman of the National Capital Commission, another Liberal who has gone on to his reward at public expense. As the House will remember, that program was designed to reduce the proportion of Canadian research which was done in-house. While that make or buy program has had some success and has been of some use to the country, it has fallen far short of the success it could have registered. It was supposed to reduce the proportion of in-house research. When it was introduced, the proportion of in-house research in the country was 63 per cent in total. Today, after that program, it is 65 per cent. The reduction has been minus two. When that program was introduced, the intent was to drop the figure to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 30 per cent. Clearly the performance has fallen far short of the advertising, as happens so regularly in the activities of the government.

• (1532)

An active research policy, contrasted to a passive policy, would and should encourage development in areas of acknowledged Canadian expertise. We cannot run down the long, long list of those areas where Canadian expertise exists, but it is important to look at some of them. Clearly one is the communications industry, where some of our technology, particularly our satellite technology, is the most advanced in the world. Another clearly should concern ocean development through the Bedfords Institute, through others and through private firms, because as a country we have more accessible ocean floor than any other nation in the world. That holds untold opportunity for this country.

Research and Development

Obviously we should give much more research attention to agriculture. One of the things which shocks me about the government is the degree to which the interests of agriculture have been consistently shoved to the background. We have a minister who makes a good speech, but has little impact on the plans and the deliberations of his colleagues. That becomes evident in the plunge in farm incomes which has occurred during the life of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Also it becomes evident in the absolute failure of the government to give that kind of priority to agricultural research and development which that industry needs and, more important, which the nation needs.

Sometimes the government opposite tends to think of the food producers of Canada as some kind of group which it has to shoo away from time to time. The fact is that the food producers of Canada are the custodians of one of the most important resources this nation needs. In the long term, our capacity to grow and to produce food as a country, a capactiy which has few parallels elsewhere in the world, could be a resource as important to us as the petroleum which exists now. Unless we waste it, the food which can be harvested from our seas and fields is not a capacity which will run out as oil and other resources will run out. It is a capacity which becomes ever more important as world dietary habits change. We will not be able to take advantage of that resource for Canada unless there is a change in policy by the government.

First, we must make it profitable for Canadians to stay in agriculture, and second, we must give attention to research and development in order to take advantage of the application of technology to the great food resources of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should like to dwell for a moment on the food industry and agriculture. Potentially we are one of the richest agricultural countries in the world. We are one of the richest food-producing countries, taking into account the great offshore resources. The government has failed dismally to plan for these resources and to put in effect fishing fleets which would take advantage of the resources that exist within our limits. Yet, in 1976, despite this wealth, 82.6 per cent of the Canadian market for agricultural products was served by imports. The Agricultural Institute of Canada has warned us that Canada's low investment in agricultural research "threatens Canada's position as a major world producer and supplier of food." Naturally we think that far more attention must be given to agricultural and general food research. In keeping with the principle of ensuring that more of that is done out of government, more and more of that research should be done in the fields, farms, and feedlots across the country. It should not be confined to urban or government laboratories.

Energy would appear to be an area where the world demand for innovation, the Canadian capacity to innovate, and Canadian resources could yield very, very high returns for this nation. I am anticipating remarks which will be made later in the debate by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). Finally, we must reverse the policy of this government which has had the effect of strangling medical research in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As the hon. member for Athabasca will point out, joining with others knowledgeable in and concerned about medical research across the country, we cannot continue a situation where the policies of the Government of Canada drive away from this country the people who could be the seedbed and the focal point of our future medical research. The medical research policies which have been carried out by the government are not only hurting us today, they are hurting our capacity to prepare for the future. They are hurting that capacity in a way which perhaps cannot be remedied, unless the government turns around its policies and adopts some of the proposals the hon. member for Athabasca will be making later in the debate.

This is a country which calls forth imagination. Unlike many other countries in the world, Canada by its very nature encourages people to innovate. This is a country where people came from literally every corner in the world. They came here by choice. They came to build. In the early days of Canada our forefathers built with their hands, by their backs and with their brawn. In some parts of this country that is still necessary, but Canada lives in a different world now. We still require the determination to build which our ancestors showed. As I travel this country, I am convinced that Canadians still have that determination to build; but we must make it clear that our hands and our backs are not enough to build in the modern world. This is the age of technology. In the age of technology we require a capacity to innovate, a determination to experiment, and a determination to try new ventures, if we are to succeed as a country.

No one who travels across Canada will claim that we lack imagination or creativity as a country. Our investment in education ranks with the best in the world, as do our achievements in basic research in fields from medicine to nuclear energy. Creative talent is here in Canada. What is not here, and what must be here, is national leadership to match that creative potential with our economic objectives. Today, by introducing this motion in the House of Commons, we are giving the Government of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark: I will finish my breath, Mr. Speaker. By introducing this motion, we have provided the House of Commons, and most particularly the minister who is responsible for science policy in this country, with an opportunity to come forward and spell out a fundamental change in direction to stop a policy where Canada has been wasting our talent to innovate, and to restore to this country a respect for building and for imagination, which is the only way we are going to succeed in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as the minister responsible for science and technology, I welcome the opportunity provided by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to speak on the state of research in Canada, and in particular on the state of industrial research and development. It is a matter of fundamental importance to the future well-being of this country and of concern to all of us.

● (1542)

Without a satisfactory level of industrial research and development, we cannot expect our economy to remain competitive in world markets, to create the new industrial opportunities which will create more jobs and raise our standard of living.

It is in recognition of these facts that the government has in recent years brought forward a number of measures to help and stimulate industrial R and D. The approach has been so designed as to assist all firms having an interest in research and development—whether they be large, small or medium sized.

The measure with the widest application is the 5 per cent to 10 per cent tax credit for research and development which was introduced a few months ago in last year's budget. It provides an immediate incentive of $35 million to $40 million to Canadian industry to increase expenditures on R and D. It has the advantage of leaving firms free to decide where and when they will invest, without direction by the government. This seems to me to be the most appropriate approach to take whenever possible.

The tax credit benefits mainly the larger and medium sized industrial establishments in Canada. On the other hand, smaller firms have tended to benefit from the contracting out policy under which new research for government is, whenever this is possible, carried out by the private sector. Under the policy, contracts placed with industry, which amounted to $18.9 million in 1973-74, the year in which the policy was put in place, rose to $86 million in 1976-77, and are expected to exceed $100 million this year. This amount will increase further as a result of the application of the policy to existing research activity within the government.

For R and D proposals originating with companies, the government has a number of programs of direct assistance. The most important of these is the enterprise development program which has a budget of $23 million. Other programs to meet specific needs are the NRC's technical information service, the industrial research assistance program, and the pilot industry laboratory program which are designed respectively to assist small firms with little or no research capacity of their own, to encourage growth of research capacity in companies, and to facilitate the transfer of technology from NRC to industry.

In total, the government will spend $275 million to support industrial research in Canada in 1978-79. This amount excludes the revenue forgone as a result of the tax credit.

Industry has not been unresponsive to the need to increase Canada's R and D efforts and the measures taken by the government to encourage it. Its real rate of expenditures has risen during the seventies, but not to the extent desired. Thus, industry accounts for 34.9 per cent of all funds spent on R and D in 1977, compared to 32.4 per cent in 1971, and it performed 44.2 per cent of all research carried out in Canada compared to 41.4 per cent in 1971.

This redistribution of the national R and D effort is in the right direction. It remains evident, nevertheless, that by any reasonable standard of comparison, Canada's over-all R and D effort is too low compared to other industrial countries. For OECD countries as a whole, expenditures on R and D average 1.4 per cent of GNP. The corresponding figure for Canada is 1 per cent. A further analysis of these figures shows that while in Canada the private sector performs about 44 per cent of all R and D, in other OECD countries the percentage is something in the order of 50 per cent to 60 per cent.

It is fair to conclude from these comparisons that the shortfall in Canada's R and D effort is not mainly on the government side nor on that of the universities, but on the industrial side. Furthermore, it is clear that the shortfall is in the order of hundreds of millions of dollars. For instance, if a target for R and D of 1.5 per cent of GNP by 1983 were adopted, as suggested by the Senate committee, and if, furthermore, the industrial share of this total were to increase to 50 per cent, expenditures by industry on R and D would have to increase in constant dollars from an estimated $864.4 million in 1977 to $1.9 billion in 1983. The target proposed by the Leader of the Opposition would call for an over-all increase of $4.7 billion, or 17 per cent per annum. The task is formidable and cannot be accomplished without the full co-operation and co-ordination of all major R and D performers—the government, the universities and, most important, the industrial sector.

There are a number of general policy conclusions which can be drawn from this brief review of industrial R and D in Canada. First, Canada is seriously lagging behind other industrial countries in its R and D effort; second, while government and university research have a part to play in strengthening our R and D effort, the main responsibility and drive must come from the private sector itself; third, and more particularly, while there are no accepted criteria for establishing the amount of R and D which a country should perform, it appears that the shortfall in Canada must be measured in the hundreds rather than the tens of million dollars; fourth, the bulk of the R and D financing required by Canada must come from the private sector and not the government; fifth, the private sector must not only speak about the need for R and D, but show by its actions that it believes in investing in it; sixth, the government must continue to support R and D through not a single measure but a variety of measures, such as a tax credit, whereby we can reach and assist all companies in the industrial sector; seventh, these measures should have a high leverage and call forth from the private sector several dollars for each dollar that the government commits.

These then are the general considerations which the government must take into account in the development of its industrial R and D policy. They are entirely consistent with the agreement at the first ministers' conference that "joint steps will be taken to improve tax incentives or credits for research and development". I am actively pursuing this matter with my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). One of our concerns about such a measure is that it should not result in a lower tax to firms now carrying out R and D without producing an appropriate increase in the level of R and D performed. It is possible to overcome this potential problem, but I would be more reassured if the private sector were to give a strong and clear indication that, if such a measure were taken, it would indeed increase its R and D expenditures.

Another factor that must be taken into account in considering the R and D situation in Canada is the high degree of foreign ownership. There is no doubt that Canada has benefited immensely from past foreign investment and the technology associated with it. But it has also created a number of structural problems which carry with them serious disadvantages. Most foreign firms tend to establish themselves in Canada to serve the Canadian market. In general, they rely on their parent for much of the R and D. To the extent they do perform R and D in Canada, it is frequently only the type required to adapt a product to the conditions of the Canadian market. The end product may be satisfactory to the consumer, but considerably less so in regard to the technological capacity of our industry. The cost of adaptation can be high and at times higher than the cost of doing the original R and D.

Many of the difficulties associated with this situation would be overcome if parent companies assigned R and D responsibilities to their subsidiaries hand in hand with the assignment of a product line for world-wide development.

Certainly, the R and D component of foreign investment in Canada must receive much more attention than in the past. FIRA, with the support of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), intends to give considerably greater weight to this factor in assessing the question of significant benefit so far as Canada is concerned.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to agriculture. I would just point out that the department of government with the largest expenditure on research and development is the Department of Agriculture. It spends more than $100 million a year on research and development. The largest operation it has is located in Alberta south of the riding of the Leader of the Opposition, in Lethbridge.

The government can also support the development of Canadian research and development capacity through its procurement policy. Admittedly this is an instrument which must be used with a great deal of care. Nevertheless, it has in the past been used with successs as, for instance, in the case of national defence, space, and to a lesser extent so far, oceans. It is my intention to ensure that similar opportunities are fully exploited in the future. There are a number of areas which can be looked at, including transportation, energy, communications, and certain parts of the service sectors, all of which are technology and research and development intensive.

As I have already mentioned, the government has a number of grant programs designed to help small and medium-sized companies where cash constraints may be a serious short-term obstacle to investment in research and development. These programs need to be re-examined. Small businesses do have difficulties in getting access to new or up-to-date technology which they need to be fully competitive. There are great gains to be made by facilitating the access of these firms to this information.

Finally, I should say Mr. Speaker, that the vitality of any country's industrial research depends in the long run on basic research. The universities are uniquely capable of carrying out this task. Nevertheless, a far better bridge needs to be built between industrial and university research if the important problems affecting Canada are to be met effectively. This whole question of technology transfer was the subject of Report No. 28 published by the Science Council of Canada. It is for this reason that the government is urging universities to address more of their research to areas of national concern and to direct the results of their work, perhaps through such measures as innovation centres and changes in curriculi, to the economic and social enhancement of the lives of Canadians.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the Kitimat pipeline. I found that interesting because, I suggest, there is a conflict within his own party. It is rather difficult to suck and blow at the same time. It seems to me it is either desirable to have tankers cruising up and down the west coast of British Columbia and coming into ports there, or it is not. I know the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) is very much opposed to this. The Leader of the Opposition should state his position clearly. Either he wants tankers coming into western Canadian ports, or he does not. If he does not, he must appreciate the decision that was taken not to proceed with the Kitimat pipeline at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I think all Canadians would agree that one of the primary objectives of the people in this country should be the provision of jobs for all who are willing and able to work, yet in March, 1978, we have over one million people unemployed. The rate of unemployment is running at over 8 per cent of the labour force compared to the target of 3 per cent advocated by the Economic Council of Canada as late as 1964. It has been estimated an average of 475,000 school leavers will enter the labour market each year between now and 1985, yet in each of the last three years jobs have been found for just half that number entering the labour market.

In every industrialized country where the standard of living is high there is a very successful, very aggressive, and very efficient manufacturing industry, particularly in fields of high technology, that is, in every industrialized country except Canada. We in the New Democratic Party believe that Canada has a large enough population to maintain a successful manufacturing industry. After all, countries smaller than Canada such as Sweden, Switzerland, and Holland have built highly successful and sophisticated industries which compete on world markets.

Let us examine Canada's record, Mr. Speaker. In 1951 there were 1.3 million employees in manufacturing industries in Canada, but in 1976, 25 years later, only two million were involved in manufacturing—in other words a gain of only 700,000 jobs. To put it another way, in 1951 the manufacturing sector made up 25 per cent of the employment opportunities in Canada, but by 1976 the proportion had dropped to 20 per cent. Of the increase in jobs in this period, only 16 per cent came from the manufacturing sector and 86 per cent from the service sector. There was a net decline of 2 per cent of the total in utilities and construction.

These figures are taken from the sector papers tabled by the government at the first ministers' conference last month. They show that in primary textiles in 1973, the peak year, there were 86,000 employees, but three years later there were only 78,500, a decline of nearly 9 per cent. In clothing in 1973 there were about 125,000 employed, and now there are only 120,000; in electronics 67,917 were employed in 1966, but by 1976 only 64,000, a drop of almost 5 per cent; in electronic products 80,000 were employed in 1974, but by 1977 only 70,000 were employed, a drop of just under 13 per cent.

The problems were grave in every agency and every group I examined. One of the major difficulties is that our institutions—government agencies, universities, and even the private sector—are not contributing to research in the way that has been done in other industrialized countries. Both the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) alluded to this.

I should like to put on the record an excerpt from a brief dealing with science in Canada which was submitted to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by the Royal Society of Canada. The last paragraph on the first page reads as follows:

> Although it was generally recognized that government support of industrial R & D was far too small in 1969, and although a substantial improvement was made in 1970, by 1975 it had decreased, when considered as a fraction of the GNP, to as little as 87 per cent of that in 1969; in terms of the fraction of federal budgetary expenditures it had fallen to 68 per cent. To make matters worse, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commence has abolished its IRDIA program (for which the 1974-75 expenditures were $32 million) and has cut back its PAIT program. These programs are of vital importance to high-technology industries and these actions will seriously hamper the attempts of these industries to improve their foreign markets and increase their productivity.

It has been calculated that the proportion of the gross national product spent by the federal government for basic research through the two main funding agencies, the National Research Council and the Medical Research Council, has been steadily decreasing since 1969. Then it was a mere 0.10, in other words, one tenth of one per cent of the gross national product. By 1976 it was an appalling 0.07 per cent. By contrast, Belgium spent 0.3 per cent; Germany 0.3 per cent; France 0.4 per cent; Japan 0.4 per cent, and The Netherlands 0.6 per cent of their gross national product. In other words, Canada spent about one quarter of the average support level of these west European countries and Japan.

Or, to put it another way, in 1974 Canada's increase over the 1969 support level was about 8 to 10 per cent, whereas that of West Germany was 150 per cent, France 100 per cent, United Kingdom 60 per cent, and the United States 50 per cent. Clearly, unlike Canada, these countries recognized that their basic research capability provides the underpinning for future technological development which promotes a strong secondary manufacturing section with its high growth of employment opportunities.

As I have indicated, the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of State for Science and Technology have dwelt on the failure of Canada to meet the needs of this country in the fields of research and development. But both of them wish us to continue to depend on the private sector of our economy by providing it with more tax incentives. This type of approach has failed in the past and there is little reason to expect a real change in the future. The reasons why it has failed should be obvious. It has failed because to a large extent our basic industry is in the resource extraction area, which requires a minimum of research and development. For example, in 1969 among the 14 nations belonging to the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, Canada has the second lowest percentage of workers in the manufacturing area—23 per cent; with Ireland being the lowest—20 per cent. By comparison, the percentage in West Germany was 38 per cent, in the United Kingdom 36 per cent, and the United States 34 per cent.

As well, Canada has the highest degree of foreign ownership and control of its industry among the OECD countries. In most of these multinational companies, of which Canada has such a proliferation, a major part of their research and development takes place in the head office country. For example, Ford of Canada is a major industrial firm in Canada, yet Ford carries out no research and development in Canada and employs not one science Ph.D. in all of its Canadian operations.

We have seen in the last few years as the world economy has moved into its present state of recession that only a small amount of research and development was carried on by Canadian corporations. Let us face the fact that the bulk of Canadian research and development is carried on in most countries by large corporations. But because such a large percentage of Canadian industries, and particularly of our manufacturing industries, is composed of mere branch plants of multinational corporations, we have had very substantial cutbacks in the meagre research and development carried on by those corporations.

A classic example, Mr. Speaker, which can be repeated many times, is what happened to the RCA research facilities in the Montreal area. As the corporation headquarters, mainly in the United States, felt the fall off in business, they moved the entire RCA research facilities which employed hundreds of people in the Montreal area back to the United States.

I know that I am not exaggerating the difficulties. In a study prepared by the Science Council entitled "Uncertain Prospects—Canadian Manufacturing Industry, 1971-1977" they say in part, and I quote from page 2 of their report:

> In 1971 the Science Council was especially concerned about the viability and survival of medium and high technology industries. In 1977 there are real fears about the prognosis for Canadian manufacturing as a whole.

In other words, the Science Council is worried about our whole manufacturing industry. It goes on to say on the same page:

> It is apparent that the technological capability of Canadian industry has not improved. It has in fact deteriorated. Exports of technology-intensive goods have fallen in relative terms, and many of the industries which produce them are unable to meet foreign competition in the domestic market. Job opportunities for scientists, engineers, M.B.A.s, executives, and other specialists are scarce or non-existent . . . This year's university graduates face the most dismal job prospects of the last forty years. Human resources, which have been created at great cost, are being squandered.

Having spent 25 years developing an educational system in which our universities can compete in quality with universities the world over, we now find ourselves in a situation in which we are turning out something in the neighbourhood of 2,500 Ph.D.'s a year, for most of whom there are really no jobs in Canadian industry, Canadian universities, or in Canadian governments. This is the situation, Mr. Speaker. Neither the Leader of the Opposition nor the Minister of State for Science and Technology faced up to this situation. They did not face up to it because they refused to face up to the fact that our industry is to an overwhelming extent controlled by multinational corporations. Its policies are devised not in Canada but in other countries and those multinational corporations are under the constant pressure of the governments and the peoples of the countries in which their headquarters are located.

How can Canadian citizens and the Canadian government expect multinational corporations to act any differently when we live so close to the heartland of the industrial population of the United States? We know of the situation in which they are. We know they are facing unemployment at rates almost as high as those in Canada. Why should we be surprised if United States corporations and U.S. workers and unions are now calling on the American government to protect the jobs and well-being of the people of that country?

We find it almost impossible to deal with that situation. We are caught in the same trap as all of the other countries in the industrialized world because of the recession which has increased unemployment to a height we have not experienced since the end of World War II. To a large extent the decisions are not made by Canadian governments, corporations or workers, but by the multinational corporations. I do not say that in criticism of them. If there is to be criticism, it should be criticism of the Canadian governments and the Canadian people who elected those governments which, over the years, have failed to face up to the problems arising out of the result of this situation.

Over the years we have encouraged the development of our resource base industry. We have failed to realize, even today, that those industries are to a large extent capital intensive rather than labour intensive. Compared with our manufacturing industries, they do not employ many people. We have failed to realize that those industries face competition from other countries. A classic example is what happened at Sudbury.

At the same time that INCO, one of our largest corporations, was operating plants in Canada, employing Canadian workers and making profits in Canada, it was using those profits and the know-how it learned in Canada to develop competing sources in Indonesia and Guatemala. I do not blame INCO. It is responsible to its shareholders. It did what it thought it should do for its shareholders. However, that was not at all in the best interests of the Canadian people.

If we are to use the full potential of Canadians and have full employment, we must change our policies. We should concentrate more of our efforts on the manufacturing industry rather than the resource industry. We must concentrate on high technology and modern industries.

Canadian people are well educated. We have the research facilities, if we want to use them, to compete with other countries. Our manufacturing industries must be concentrated. We must break the stranglehold of the multi-nationals. Our efforts must be concentrated on developing Canadian owned and operated corporations which will make their own decisions and which will try to meet the needs of the Canadian people. That can be done by greater emphasis on planning and direction by the government, not only of its resources, facilities, and the use of Canadian universities, but by bringing Canadian industries into those fields that will meet the needs of the Canadian people.

We support in general the criticisms made by the Leader of the Opposition in today's motion and support most of the provisions in the motion he proposed on behalf of the official opposition. However, we believe there is a serious lack in that motion. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a semi-colon and by adding thereafter a new paragraph (6) to read as follows:
> "(6) require Canadian subsidiaries of foreign-based corporations to devote a specified portion to Canadian-based research and development expenditures, in order to break the branch-plant nature of our manufacturing industry."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am advised that the amendment is acceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, on this allotted day, to take part in a discussion on a topic of special concern to all Canadians, namely our economy. Today, serious problems such as unemployment have been dwelt upon and stressed. It was pointed out that we now have over a million unemployed in Canada. It was also pointed out, and rightly so, that a high number of our large, medium and small businesses are underemployed, that they do not produce as efficiently as they could. Now, Mr. Speaker, those are problems we must face today, and which could have largely been avoided, to my mind, if most of the recommendations that were made had been implemented fairly quickly.

The Senate Special Committee on Science Policy, set up in 1970, looked into all aspects of the science policy in Canada. They published a three-volume report explaining at length what problems we have in Canada and what would happen if we did not consider immediate reforms in those fields.

Unfortunately, the government put off implementing those recommendations. It did appoint a minister with some responsibilities in the early '70s, a few responsibilities, not too great, with the result that during the summer of 1975, the Senate had to resume its studies and publish a fourth volume to complete its study. As a result of that second inquiry, the existence of great concern came to light, and the chairman of the committee, Senator Lamontagne, revealed in November of 1977, that in real terms there had been no progress since 1970 with regard to the level and distribution of national and government effort in the field of scientific research and development.

Indeed, the Senate committee which carried out special studies in this area practically blamed the federal government for not doing anything tangible or worthwhile to solve this problem. I would like to take the opportunity of this debate to show that it is essential to have a strong Canadian economy and intensify the employment policy that the government establish a long term scientific policy; as everyone knows, strong research potential is essential to Canada's progress. That potential has yet to be developed to an acceptable level.

It would even appear that the present level of research is threatened due to a lack of young scientists involved in basic research which results in an average aging of researchers without any possibility of replacement. This problem will reach its crucial point in the 1990's and probably even before the 1990's. And one of the reasons of this lack of interest of young scientists for research is surely the freeze on grants that was imposed in December 1975 and which mainly affects university researchers.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, in early November 1977, at the Social Credit Party of Canada convention which was held in Drummondville in the province of Quebec the members who were attending that convention passed a resolution dealing with long term scientific policies, and with the Chair's permission, I would like to read that resolution into the record as follows:

Research and Development

That a government headed by the Social Credit Party of Canada undertake to reinvigorate (university) private research by establishing at least a five year scientific policy along the following three basic principles: (1) the need for an adequate budget; (2) the urgence of establishing a three to nine year long term Canadian scientific policy; and (3) the presence of a representative of the research community on grant committees.

We believe, Mr. Speaker that it is very important to have a representative of the research community on a grant committee for university researchers. Furthermore, another thing we fear is that the few researchers we have in Canada might not want to stay because long term employment opportunities are nearly inexistent in this country. So this causes them to go and look somewhere else for a steady job and results in Canada being a sort of bank of researchers for other countries.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is now investing only 80 per cent of what Italy invests in research and development. Yet Italy ranks eighth among the rich countries. It invests 1.1 per cent of its national product, and we invest 0.8 per cent. I have here a table for the year 1975 of OECD member countries. We are told that the United States spent 2.3 per cent of their gross national product on scientific research; the United Kingdom, 2.5 per cent; West Germany, 2.4 per cent; Holland, 2 per cent; Japan, 1.8 per cent; Sweden, 1.6 per cent; France, 1.5 per cent and Italy, 1.1 per cent, and Canada came in ninth and last with 0.9 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, it amounts to saying that our efforts were surely not very considerable and for a country like Canada I think that in the field of scientific and technological research we could have accomplished for many years a lot more than we have done till now. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of 1976, government investments fell to less than 0.5 per cent of the gross national product and only 0.1 per cent has been assigned to research carried in the universities and 0.1 per cent to industrial research the two most productive sectors for such spendings. The United States invest 2.3 per cent of their gross national product into research. This is why we are dependent on them as well as on the multinationals. They are the ones who have that research work done for us. They are the ones who can offer secure and long term employment opportunities for scientists.

Mr. Speaker, the issue of the non-availability of objective information is so fundamental to the solution of our problems in the field of evergy policies that it has been raised by a Liberal minister, the Hon. Donald S. Macdonald in 1974 in an interview with the representatives of the magazine Oil Week, and I quote: "One of the difficulties facing the Canadian government is that it is almost completely dependent on the multinationals for its sources of information". This is why, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely necessary that the government react right now and see to it that the monies allocated to research and to development reach 2.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1985 at the latest, in order to restore in that manner a strong economy and to increase the employment opportunities already existing in that field.

The minister mentioned that tax credits have been granted to Canadian businesses and companies. As for me, I think that the large businesses, these national corporations can well manage by themselves but the small or medium size business finds itself in a different position. Small or medium size businesses have little opportunities to undertake scientific research even if they are entitled to tax credits. This is why other institutions such as universities for instance are put in charge of scientific research work and have to constitute data banks which are made available to small and medium size businesses. In my opinion such is the way, Mr. Speaker, whereby we will meet the needs of these businesses for they do not have non the means to make this research even if the government is to grant them tax credits.

Mr. Speaker, up to now the planning of natural resources such as energy has been left to multinationals whose only purpose is not the common good but profits made even at the risk of ruining the people in years to come. I think we should increase our research, through universities, in the field of renewable energy and it is on that point that I want to conclude my comments this afternoon. In connection with multinationals, especially those involved in the development of energy resources, I think they are doing their best. Those resources are not renewable, but very little has been done to develop resources such as solar energy.

Until recently, only 0.4 per cent of the amounts allocated by the government was spent on research in solar energy, wind energy, renewable energy, whereas these are the very fields, Mr. Speaker, where heavy investments should have been made several years ago. Thus Canadians would not be running scared, constantly hearing as they do that in a few years we may lack energy for heating, for manufacturing consumer goods, for transporting them or for transporting ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, I believe one of our priorities should be to intensify research in renewable energy, and our universities, provided we grant them the necessary funding, can capture the interest of the young in that field, and ensure that we do not face a lack of researchers in a few years, because they will then be too old and unable to produce, and because we will not have foreseen the necessary replacements to carry on. Mr. Speaker, I think the motion we are debating today is an extremely important one, which should encourage the government to implement reforms which have been recommended mainly by the Senate committee, the universities and other organizations which have offered to co-operate with the government to improve this situation.

● (1632)

[English]

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in a rapidly changing technology oriented world research and development are the key to the future. Without research and development we will lose in international competition to competing countries and lose our place as an industrialized nation. Clearly, research and development are the great multiplier that enables Canadians to maintain and improve their high standard of living by producing goods in our industrial sector for sale in Canada and abroad at competitive prices, and putting more Canadians to work at good jobs to produce those goods. There is a clear need for a strategy to stimulate significantly our innovative research and development capacity in those industries in which we have the potential for a comparative trade advantage.

Canada has had some excellent success in pure research science but appears to be weak in applied scientific research.

It is not easy to determine the effect of the government's policies in achieving Canada's scientific goals because, as the latest report of the Senate committee on science policy indicates, Canada's stated policy objectives have not always been those it has implemented. In promoting industrial development the government would financially assist universities to train scientists and engineers while building its own laboratories where the bulk of the nation's research would be conducted. Industry would then be provided with the results of this scientific research to solve its problems and to manufacture new products as technology advanced.

This concept seems to prevail still although its wisdom is called into question when we consider the 30 per cent decline in research and development since 1970, last year's $12 billion deficit in end product trade, and the capture of almost one third of all domestic sales by imported goods.

As a provider of jobs, Canada's manufacturing industry has eroded to the point where today it accounts for only 19 per cent of the nation's work force as against 25 per cent in 1950. Indeed, without the auto pact, defence production sharing, and similar bilateral arrangements with the United States, Canada would have few exports of manufactured goods.

Our lack of technological innovation, the problems of inadequate industrial research, and difficulties in transferring technology from government laboratories to meaningful functions in our manufacturing industries are major factors contributing to our present economic stagnation. Canadians have demonstrated the ability to replace our absolete second-hand technology with meaningful research which can make us world leaders in selected manufacturing areas. Examples of Canadian industrial success exist, but they must be built upon and multiplied. To do this, research and development must be encouraged through the development of coherent national policies aimed at enhancing our industrial base.

In October of 1977 the special committee of the Senate on science policy published its fourth and last report in its series on science policy for Canada entitled "Progress and Unfinished Business". The report concludes that much time has been wasted and that only now are some of the recommendations of several years ago being put into practice.

The Ministry of State for Science and Technology was expected to become the pivot around which science policy decisions would be made, but in practice it has become a mere service agency assisting other departments in the preparation of their own particular scientific programs. If the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is to have an important role and make a major contribution to maintaining and expanding the standard of living enjoyed by Canadians, it will require the leadership and internal stability which can be achieved only with a full time minister through a continuity of management personnel and a minimum of reorganization. In six years MOSST has had five different ministers and three different deputy ministers. That can hardly be called stability. No wonder the Science and Engineering Council established by Bill C-26 last July has never been appointed, and neither has its chairman nor any of its members.

This same haphazard, lackadaisical approach toward science is reflected in the failure of the government to appoint the chairman of the Medical Research Council since that position became vacant last June.

No wonder the budget for the Medical Research Council in the current estimates is increased by only 5.7 per cent, which does not even keep pace with the decline in purchasing power of the dollar.

The National Research Council estimates, on the other hand, show an apparent increase of 11 per cent, and this may look good in terms of the consumer price index. The CPI measures the percentage change over time in the price of a constant basket of goods and services normally purchased by the average Canadian family in the average Canadian city. These are not, however, the same goods and services which Canadian scientists must purchase in order to do research in this country.

The Medical Research Council and the National Research Council have each developed a specialized cost index to calculate the true impact of inflation in their areas of interest. Both indices show that the erosion of the science dollar by inflation over the past seven years has been much greater than the increase in the Consumer Price Index.

For the period 1969-1976 the difference between the Consumer Price Index and the National Research Council science cost index was 28.8 per cent or, in terms of 1969-1976 constant dollars, this represented an extra loss of $23.5 million in the purchasing power of NRC supported non-governmental research.

In view of this very large discrepancy in the results shown by the specialized science deflaters on the one hand and the Consumer Price Index on the other, the government should be prepared to use a cost index which would accurately measure the effects of inflation when determining the size of granting budgets allocated for research. This returns us again to the question of how to measure the impact of government policies on Canada's scientific effort.

I suggest that the best method, and the one most commonly used, is to relate the sum of all research in private and public sectors to a fraction of the gross national product and compare it with other industrialized countries. This would compensate for price fluctuation related to inflation and would also reflect population and economic dimensions.

The conclusions in terms of Canada's contribution are not very good. Canada does not spend as much relatively on research and development as do competing industrialized countries. In fact, Canada today spends less than half as much of its gross national product on research and development as do the United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany.

Mr. Kaplan: What about Japan?

Mr. Howie: Less than Japan too. I thank the hon. member. In moving to the position where we spend 2.5 per cent of our gross national product we shall be approaching the fraction now spent in those other industrialized countries I have just mentioned.

Our performance to date is not good, and it is getting worse. What are the results? Today imports serve nearly 30 per cent of the Canadian market for manufactured goods, 88 per cent of the Canadian market for computer and office equipment, and 60 per cent of the Canadian market for consumer electronic products. Considering the decline in the value of the dollar on international markets, we can clearly see the terrific price Canadians will soon be paying for the failure of this government to stimulate Canadian industry to keep abreast of innovations in the field of research and development.

If this record were not bad enough, the tragedy is that 83 per cent of the Canadian domestic market for farm machinery is supplied by imported goods. Unless this situation is completely turned around, our hard pressed farmers will soon be dealt another cruel and severe economic blow. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) says this is good for them!

Research must be encouraged to the maximum, especially applied research. A significant increase in the research and development tax credit is imperative, and we must extend the tax credit system to provide special incentives for new employment in industrial research, design and development. These incentives must be of a continuing nature, with a definite time commitment given to industry to give it confidence that the government is convinced of the importance of research and development as an essential base for economic advancement. The government should also encourage the transfer of scientific knowledge and technology in a co-operative effort between universities, government, and industries. There are tremendous opportunities for scientific research and development to be encouraged in areas of regional disparity in Canada. I am thinking of fisheries, forestry, food processing, oceanography, and specialized fields. For example, in the area of fisheries, experimentation is warranted in fish culture and breeding, fish ranching, fish processing, fishing technique, apparatus development, fish boat construction and equipment. A new first could be achieved in seaweed culture on which very little has so far been done in North America.

In forestry I think in terms of silviculture, parasite control, and wood processing. In food processing, effective research can be done in fish and farm products. In oceanography, tidal studies as an outgrowth of the Fundy project are a natural area for development in the Atlantic provinces. The Bedford Institute of Oceanography in Halifax is the best in the world and is not adequately supported by this government.

We can expand research and development associated with using waste hot water from thermal and nuclear plants for fish growing, seaweed culture, farming and greenhouse cultivation. In this respect we have a potential to grow vegetables which we now import.

In renewable energy we have unlimited opportunities for research and development, not just in solar energy and wind energy, but also including peat moss, methanol, and wood as a fuel. We can explore even the possibilities of accelerating present research into the use of hydrogen as an energy fuel and developing it with the electric energy generated by tidal action used as a catalyst in our oceans.

Our universities have offered us a tremendous opportunity to have excellent research performed, while at the same time stimulating the teaching and learning potential of our universities and assisting in the development of the badly needed young scientists who can take their places in the private sector of our economy, after it is stimulated by the next government with a meaningful industrial strategy.

I should like to share with hon. members some relevant comments made by Dr. Thomas Vanderslice at the Financial Post conference held in Ottawa on January 25, 1978. He said the following:

> The underlying paradox in all of these trends today is the accumulating evidence that there is a high and positive correlation between technology and the things we need: jobs, improved productivity, resistance to inflation and economic growth.
> To get a fix on this, we asked data resources to make an analysis of output, employment and price behaviour in high and low technology industries in the United States over a 25-year period.
> We found that high technology industries grew almost three times as fast.
>
> The same is true for productivity, output per employee in high technology industries was double that of the low.
> The favourable labour productivity is mirrored in the price record: with high technologies much more resistant to inflation.
> An even more significant finding is that the gains in output per worker were not at the expense of employment. Employment in high technology industries in the United States has been growing almost nine times as fast as in the low.
> The same kind of favourable ratios prevail in terms of international trade. The positive contribution of "high technology" products is up to a plus of over $25 billion a year.
> While the United States trade balance in products with "low" technical content is down from break-even in 1960 to a $16 billion deficit.
> Thus, our experience clearly indicates that high technology industries have outperformed intermediate and low technology industries in terms of real growth, productivity, less price inflation, and higher employment. From 1950 to 1974, output per man-hour rose at a 4 per cent annual pace in sectors devoting an above average share of income to research and development. This is better than twice the productivity growth achieved by industries with lower than average commitments to new technology.

Ours is a young country, rich in resources, with a shining promise for tomorrow. All that is necessary to bring it about is a new attitude and constructive new policies, such as the ones just enunciated a few moments ago by my leader. My leader has demonstrated that he is the best leader of any political party in Canada today, and that he has the vision, determination, and energy to lead this nation out of the economic mess in which it now finds itself.

[Mr. Howie.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT POLICY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark:

> That in the opinion of this House it is crucial to the strength of Canada's economy and the provision of employment opportunities that a vigorous program of technological research and development be promoted by the government, and to this end this House urges a policy which would:
> (1) set a goal of 2.5 p. cent of the G.N.P. to be spent on research and development by 1985;
> (2) significantly increase the research and development tax credit for Canadian industry;
> (3) give particular priority to strengthening our research and development programs, particularly in the fields of agriculture and renewable resources;
> (4) extend the tax credit system to provide incentive for new employment in industrial research, design and development;
> (5) encourage development work in areas of acknowledged Canadian expertise.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate concerning research and development. I do not think anyone doubts the importance of research and development as part of an economic strategy in Canada to help us make a transition to more technically efficient industry. We know that research and development are an essential element in any policy for a rapid return to full employment based on expansion of the manufacturing and resource sectors. In some parts of industry, these sectors are in a cul-de-sac of technological dependency, which is a term used by the Science Council of Canada. This dependency refers to a weak capacity, to weak opportunities and to weak incentives for research and development in Canada, thus not helping us to break out of that situation of dependency into a more technically efficient base for the future.

Research and development are a key element in securing for Canadian industry a higher share of the world market and a higher share of the domestic market, which is rapidly being occupied by imports. Research and development turn the key to better performance and a more competitive Canadian industry. Thus, none of us can doubt their importance.

The resolution before the House emphasizes the tax environment as an encouragement to research and development. I do not think a great deal of argument can be found with the proposals in the resolution, so far as they go. They really go only so far as the tax system can go to assist greater research and development activity in Canada. I will attempt to present an argument to my colleagues in the House indicating that a wider policy and support framework than taxation is required. Even improved tax incentives will not prove adequate. Some reasons for this have already been mentioned. For example, the structure of Canadian industry is so highly foreign-owned that most research and development is done outside the country and transferred into it.

While the magnitude of tax incentive is important, they will not do the entire job. However, so far as the tax environment goes, from my examination of the subject I believe the tax credit for investment in research and development should be increased significantly. At present it stands at 10 per cent in the Atlantic area and the Gaspé. It is 7½ per cent in other designated regions. It is 5 per cent in the faster growth regions of the country. Five per cent is not enough. While we should retain regional differentiation, we should move up to at least 15 per cent, with a low point of at least 10 per cent. Discussing these percentages, however, is not perhaps as useful as saying that we should put ourselves on an equivalent basis with the investment tax credit in the United States.

Our investment tax credit of, say, 10 per cent works like this: if an investment is on a scale of $10 million, the investment tax credit is $1 million applied to that. This sounds like a very powerful incentive, but when you consider that it becomes taxable in the hands of the receiver and that perhaps 46 per cent of it is taxed back, it has lost a good deal of its punch. When you consider also that it is deducted from the capital cost in our example of $10 million, and one begins the capital cost allowances at the $9 million level, again it has lost some of its impact, which it does not lose in the case of our competitors in the United States. So I think the principle should be that in the research and development tax environment we should be at least as competitive as are our U.S. companies. The tax credit should be adjusted upward to achieve this goal.

I should like to refer also to the tariff environment because it is one of the important horizontal type policies under which all our companies operate. We are going through the GATT negotiations in Geneva in which most of the countries in the world are engaged, and if various formulae changes come through, there will be significant across the board reductions in tariffs, amounting to perhaps more than 40 per cent. We in Canada would have to ensure that we do not go only for an across the board tariff reduction but that we negotiate the average 40 per cent or so in terms of an industrial strategy which has singled out some industries for maintained tariff protection, while we proceed through a transitional period to a more competitive strength for them. That transition will require a host of policies in addition to taxes and tariff.

We should be highly selective, having made some choices of the industries with the promise of a future in this country. We know in general where they are. They are in telecommunications; they are in the ocean industries where we must have enormous potential advantages; they are in transport technology where we have enormous spaces to cover at low cost and therefore we must do the R and D necessary to ensure that low cost. We have advantages in petrochemicals where we should be looking at the average tariff reductions to maintain positions in the key exposed but potentially favourable sectors and to compensate with lower tariffs where we can face world competition because of world scale production and other advantages. The same holds true in the plastics industry, and I could also mention machinery, pharmaceuticals, and the construction industry, to continue the list of examples. However, the main point is that in tariff structures, as in tax structures, we should have R and D incentives in mind in certain industries.

I said I wanted to argue for a wider framework of policy than the tax suggestions indicated in the resolution in front of us, and I will do that by noting that in the forefront of our concerns now is the structure of the Canadian industrial economy. The structure of the economy need not be a difficult concept for us. Such items as I will mention enter into the question of the appropriate Canadian economic structure to face into the new world environment in which we find ourselves. Part of that new world environment is the oncoming of the Third World with industrial products of quality. We will have to face their competition doubly because we have given them preferred low tariffs. How can we ensure that Canadian industry will face that stiff new competition if we do not help reorganize its structure and reshape it?

I will mention some of the elements which I think fit into that kind of restructuring of our basic industrial plant. First, we should adopt policies which encourage a larger scale in many industrial sectors so that they can achieve the gains from specialization and so that they have a base of production big enough to support the huge R and D expenditures that are necessary today.

When we consider, for example, that Northern Telecom—which is perhaps our outstanding example of R and D work in Canada—had to spend some $70 million to bring in its latest piece of hardware for the world market, an advanced kind of switching equipment for telephone systems. It remains a leader in the world but the R and D base had to be $70 million. Surely that requires a large scale company. There will be hundreds of suppliers of equipment to Northern Telecom across Canada which will be able to produce and supply components for that piece of advanced technology developed through Canadian research and innovation. They are dependent on these big core companies being so large and specialized that they can carry the weight of $70 million. We must therefore have the policies that will support that kind of scale. Taxes alone will not assure us that. That means that our competition Act and other policies must support enterprise structures capable of specialization and scale of operations.

Second, it means that the whole market in Canada must be collected, as it were, or aggregated so that key companies have a home base and a somewhat assured market. Tariffs are one form of giving some assurance, but today they cannot be taken too far. Another form of assuring the home market is procurement policies of governments. Should our hydro systems purchase Canadian technology or should they go to Switzerland, Britain, Japan or Germany? If we are serious about aggregating the market to give a home base for our own companies, then we must consider the industrial strategy advantage of procurement policies which pull the market together. While ensuring that these are good products—and there is no question in anybody's mind that we have a leading technology in heavy electrical equipment—we need to help companies come together in consortia without falling afoul of the competition act, if we are interested in the industrial implications of employment and income in Canada, faced as the country is with new problems.

For example, let us consider the amalgamation which took place of Canadian General Electric, General Steel Wares, and Westinghouse to put together a large enough company to manufacture many lines of electrical goods, and also the consortium represented by Petrosar in Sarnia where four very large Canadian companies were not large enough individually to build a polyethylene plant on a world scale, but the four together, assisted by government encouragement, are big enough and are now in the final stages of a technology and an enterprise that will supply Canada with resins which go into the plastics industry. That leads one to look at intermediate manufacturing stages.

What about the security of the plastics industry in Canada? Thirty per cent of that market is occupied by imports, an unusually high share in terms of western countries. Why do we have a low occupation of our own market with all of these new polyethylene and resins coming into play? What can we do to ensure R and D in the plastics industry so that it will play a full role in processing the products of the petrochemical industry? Let me illustrate. Auto parts will use a lot more plastic. There are about 200 pounds of plastics in an automobile today.

In five years' time even smaller automobiles will use 600 pounds of plastics. Are we going to produce them? Will we have the R and D to do it, and will we have the other industrial policies to encourage the plastics industry to establish in Canada?

There are certain other major projects, such as the liquid natural gas project which could bring natural gas from the Arctic islands to the east coast. That major project approach embraces many technologies and would require research and development in tankers, transportation systems, liquifaction systems, electronic and processing equipment, control equipment, and so on. We need co-ordinated policies in order to put all these things together. I mention them to illustrate that more than taxes is required to form the incentive for research and development. The structure of the economy and the way we co-ordinate policies count for much. Without research and development we are not likely to pull ourselves out of our present situation.

I will quickly mention venture capital corporations and tax incentives to encourage individuals and institutions to invest in them, particularly in small and medium industries where much innovation is found. These industries need venture capital to carry them through all stages from research and development to the production of prototypes, testing of the market and getting into exports. We need policies much broader than tax policies to assist small and medium industries to come together, perhaps in research consortia and to find venture capital so that they can enter the market successfully. If we are serious about research and development we will have to do these things.

Something else we must do is to stimulate the growth of Canadian multinational companies. Our experience is that most multinationals—and we have their subsidiaries in this country—do their research and development at head office. These subsidiaries receive the technology after it has been developed and the parent company has made the product innovation and established the world market. This is no longer good enough. We must help Canadian companies become multinationals so that they will have the wide base that will enable them to afford research and development and produce goods that they can sell around the world.

I want now to come to my final remarks, Mr. Speaker, and move from the question of industrial structure to the government's approach to new policies. In the four months preceding the first ministers' conference the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dealt personally with the industrial strategy issue in Canada. I think that as a result the prospects for the future look good. The first ministers in their February meeting agreed that they would examine the Canadian economy sector by sector—they would examine the problems of the pulp and paper sector and what could be done there, the machinery sector, the furniture sector, plastics, pharmaceuticals, automobiles and so on. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) pointed out, the automobile industry is a hollow industry in Canada. There is no research and development done here.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. O'Connell: That is a good question. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) dealt only with taxes, which are important but are not the total problem.

The sector approach will mean that both levels of government and both sides of industry, labour and management, will look at the same facts and set objectives for an industry. These working groups may discuss the share of the home market an industry should seek and the share of the export market it should seek and what this would require in productivity gains or what it would require in terms of labour-management adversary relationships or greater collaboration—what it would mean in terms of federal tax policy, provincial tax policy and federal and provincial incentives. All this will be examined by working groups sector by sector. I think this is perhaps the most hopeful sign in some time of help to improve the performance of the Canadian economy in its most important sectors.

The second approach required is that the federal government put its own house in order with respect to the many departments in the economic policy field. Should the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce take the lead—the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Department of Finance, or of science and technology and so forth? There must be greater co-ordination.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must review the parent-subsidiary relationship in industrial sectors. Some parent companies do all the research and pass the technology on; some Canadian subsidiaries such as Canadian General Electric do some research and supply it to the rest of the world as is the case in heavy electrical turbines. Other subsidiary companies have a free hand, and companies such as Hewlett-Packard develop laboratories in Canada with their own engineering staff. Any product they develop they can take anywhere in the world. That is the kind of relationship we must strive for in an industrial policy, so that subsidiaries can be innovative and can do their own research and development. If there is not that relationship with the parent company, all the tax changes we can devise will not bring about greater research and development.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that tax measures are fine but they only go part way. This is a bigger question, however. We need action programs and policies in order to devise industrial strategies sector by sector and bring research and development into full bloom in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan), and to the hon. member who just resumed his seat, I am convinced that the government still has not recognized the important role that investment in research and development can play in the economic growth of this country.

I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate today and I want to deal largely with the area of medical research since it has also been neglected by this government. It seems to me that an accelerating erosion has been taking place in this area, to the point of utter destitution. I am very sorry that the minister who opened the debate for the government failed to answer questions which people across the country are asking about the future of research, and particularly about the future of medical research in Canada.

Evidence can be found everywhere in the country that the policies of this Liberal administration have demoralized and discouraged the research community to the nth degree and have given rise to the threat of massive unemployment in that community.

I suppose, to put it in perspective, one should analyze the basis of Liberal policy, or rather the lack of policy. Careful examination of their behaviour in the area of research reveals two very significant factors. First, the government does not believe that research has to be done in this country if you can get it from other countries free of charge by reading their scientific journals. That is one of the basic premises upon which the Liberal government's science policy has been based over the life of the current Liberal administration.

Another premise on which they seem to be basing their science policy, or lack of it, is that money put into research is just another expenditure. It is just like paying the light bill or the gas bill at the end of the month. That is a horrible misconception of research. Anyone who has thought about this matter for any period of time quickly comes to the realization that money put into research is one of the best investments any country, any company, or anyone can make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: If we look at some of the documented evidence that has been provided to members of this House we can easily find examples showing expenditures on research or investments which bring huge returns. I would like to cite two examples. The first is the dollar savings because of decreased mortality, morbidity, loss of earnings, and institutionalization following the development of the polio vaccine in the United States. If we compare the cost of the various factors which I have just mentioned prior to the use of polio vaccine to the cost of the development and administration of a polio vaccine program, we can see quite clearly that the costs prior to the vaccine were $6.7 billion. During the same period, the research costs and the administration of the program were $653 million. That is a ratio of return on investment of very close to 100 to one.

We can look at another area for which calculations have been made, that of immunology. The cost benefit analyses which have been done relating to immunology show the ratio of savings is again 100 to one. That is not to say all research done results in a return in permanently reduced health care costs of 100 to one. But if you tidy it all up the ratio perhaps for the over-all field is in the range of 10 to one or 20 to one.

Any government which stands before this House and tells the country we are in a time of restraint and that we must save money by cutting expenditure on health research is simply being stupid. I am sorry I have to use that word but I cannot think of a more fitting term to apply to the kind of approach this government has been following.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, evidence of the crime. I consider the policies of this government a crime. I want to cite a number of examples which can only open one's eyes more to the situation that has resulted. Not only in the long run but even in the short run all of us are affected in terms of higher costs and in a reduced ability to improve a health care delivery system because of decreased funding. On this side of the House we are not the only ones concerned about this as Liberal speakers have attempted to point out. They have suggested that perhaps we are panicking over a situation which they feel is well under control. However, all we have to do is look outside of the House to an organization known as Canadians for Health Research. That organization, which now consists of 200,000 people, was born approximately a year ago as a result of the emergency situation which exists in the area of health care and research funding.

My hon. friend from the Liberal side who has been wincing at my comments will soon be able to rise and explain. I am sorry, I do not know his constituency because he speaks so rarely in this place. Perhaps he can identify himself, Mr. Speaker. I will let him do so if he wishes. I understand he is a former scientist and will perhaps make his comments known.

We know that some 200,000 Canadians, lay people, people from various health professions and from all walks of life have demonstrated their concern at this government's lack of vision and understanding, by forming an organization known as Canadians for Health Research. Through such an organization they might increase the awareness of the public to the dirty deeds of this government and hopefully express the consternation of the research community to the public. By this method the government might be pressured in some way to change and reverse its negative role, a role which has been practised far too long.

No one says that research does not cost money. I certainly agree that it does. I contend that the benefits of research, as I have already mentioned, far outnumber the initial costs. In the past seven or eight years medical and scientific research in all fields in this country has been starved for lack of funding. The number of researchers and scientists has thinned out to a point where virtually no new people are coming into the research field because there simply is not the funding and there are no prospects of adequate employment in that area. This results in a deterioration of our research capacity together with a feeling of utter instability in the research community. We have a good peer review system in this country which reviews project applications on a regular basis in order to weed out bad projects. But the lack of funding is resulting in the cancellation not only of bad projects but of excellent and productive projects which have already been under way, setting aside any exception for consideration of new projects or giving consideration to future projects submitted to the committee for approval.

Because of these Liberal policies basic research in Canada is becoming a dying field. Yet without it we all know that Canada can never hope to contribute internationally or even put to use its findings here at home to compete internationally.

Let me point out how important increased funding in basic and clinical research is by citing some examples of significant developments in the area of cancer research—colon cancer recognition by a blood test developed by Dr. Phillip Gold of Montreal; recognition of lung cancer antigens, a protein in the blood, which is of assistance to the diagnosis and perhaps treatment of lung cancer, developed by another researcher, Dr. Julia Levy of Vancouver; recognition of leukemia antigens by Dr. Michael Baker of Toronto. Similar work in the cancer antigen field is being done here in Ottawa by researchers at the Ottawa General Hospital, and perhaps other places. All these are very important contributions pioneered here in this country.

This year because of a substantial cut in research funding many of these projects will not be funded at all, or funded to such a low level that it is impossible to carry them on in a meaningful way. The result will be that this research will be done elsewhere. Because the work has been good and internationally recognized someone else will pick it up and do it. Canada will therefore remain at the bottom of the list of contributing western industrialized nations to this important field of research. Important, I might add because cancer has become one of Canada's top killers bar none. It is a serious disease and a serious problem and the government is freezing research in that area.

The former minister of science and technology has now gone to greener pastures with the National Capital Commission. He espoused the theory that each research program should be examined in the planning stage and, if it were cheaper to buy the results abroad than to carry out the work here, we should buy it. While that is perhaps a valid view for certain limited technical questions, I wish to list its fundamental flaws.

First, the less we do here the less we will be able to do here. Research cannot be turned on and off like a water tap in a sink. It will never be economical to carry out work here unless related work is being carried out here on a continuing basis.

Second, and perhaps this is the most important consideration against this idea or notion that you can buy research, is that no nation sells knowledge except as a loss leader. They sell products and services derived from those products and they are quite properly sold at a profit. The further loss of our economic independence would be reflected by an even worse balance of payments problem if the long range effects of "make or buy" are ignored. The decline of the research capability here means that foreign advances will be applied here incompletely with lags of three to ten years. What I am attempting to say is that the economic and social costs of thinking we can buy research would be enormous.

Perhaps I can use the example of a new military weapon. A country might take the research position of Canada rather than a country like the United States which does a lot of research. Country A and country B may become locked in conflict. Country B may appear on the battle field with a new weapon that has not been seen before by country A. Obviously country B has been doing research and development. Country A might be able to go to country B and say they would like to buy their new weapon or they may try to get one, take it apart and attempt to build one of its own along similar lines, or improve on it. The battle would be lost before country A could develop such a weapon because of a time lag in such development which could be as much as three to ten years. If you are locked in battle and you need ten years to build a weapon to counter the weapon of your opponents, it is obvious who the winner will be.

That is the position in which the government has placed this country. In the area of scientific research and in all other areas of research we are taking a strange and backward approach. The results can mean nothing but harm to the public interest of this nation in the long run.

Let us take a quick look at the government's record in medical and scientific research funding. In 1975 Canada contributed only .9 per cent of the gross national product to research and development. During the same time the United States spent 2.3 per cent of its GNP. By early 1976, the actual federal expenditure on research and development had fallen to less than 0.5 per cent of the GNP. Of this 0.5 per cent spent by the government, only 0.1 per cent found its way to university research and only 0.1 per cent to industrial research, the two most productive areas for such expenditures. More current, a couple of weeks ago the Medical Research Council received their annual increase. Their principal budget for 1977-78 was $56.7 million.

The Minister of State for Science and Technology announced an increase of 7.8 per cent for the council bringing its budget for 1978-79 to $61.1 million. Even that announcement was dishonest, sneaky, underhanded, and misleading. Here's the catch. Last year the council received an added $1.1 million, a cost increase or borrowing against the future, which was substracted from the 1978-79 budget bringing the total down to $60 million, which represents an increase of 5.8 per cent not 7.8 per cent.

Even that is not an accurate reflection of what actually happened. An accurate reflection would be that that $1.1 million should be added to last year's budget because that is when it was spent, and reduced from this year's budget because it was not contained in it. The actual increase you come up with is 3.8 per cent. That is the actual increase in the medical research budget for this year, yet the minister had the gall to announce in his press release that this increase was 7.8 per cent. I cannot think of anything more despicable, and I can think of a lot of despicable things to say about this administration.

Every year the budget of the Medical Research Council has been decreasing by about 10 per cent. I say that not only to reflect the actual gross increases but taking into consideration the cost of inflation. This increase of 3.8 per cent, matched with the erosion of funds by inflation, which in the medical research field is in the range of 15 to 16 per cent this year, leaves a clearly substantial cut in the budget.

If the Minister of State for Science and Technology were honest with the people of Canada, he would not be issuing a news release stating that there is an increase in the budget of the Medical Research Council. He would have stated that there was a cut in the MRC budget of approximately 10 per cent this year. That would have been a more accurate reflection of the facts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not know how much longer the hon. member requires to complete his remarks. His time has expired and he may continue only with consent. Is it agreed that the hon. member may complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: I thank hon. members for their courtesy. Because of that, I will not give the second half of my prepared comments but will proceed to something that everyone in this country should know, namely, the Progressive Conservative policy with regard to medical research.

The stop and go policy of this government with regard to research funding has created substantial instability. It is becoming greater because the government has offered no encouragement to the field and certainly does not appear to have any plans to start pouring money into research at this time.

My main message to the people of this country and the scientific community, particularly those involved in health research since that is the area of my responsibility for this party, is that if they want a change of policy, which I am sure they do, the only way to make that happen is with a change in government. The only viable alternative to the existing government is the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh?

Mr. Yewchuk: There is no use supporting the socialists. The most that could be is an objection to the existing policy. It would not change the policy or the government. I call even on all socialists in the research field to abandon their desire to vote socialist and instead vote for the Progressive Conservative party. That is the only way to get a change in policy in the field of medical research or other research.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is the party that gave you extra time.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have already thanked the hon. member for his courtesy in allowing me extra time. I shall be very brief in outlining the policy to which this party is committed and which will become government policy after the next election. Not only shall we be aiming to keep the level of funding up to previous years, taking inflation into account, but over the next five years it will be our intentions to catch up to the level of funding provided by other nations with which we shall be competing. I have in mind, for example, the United States where the contribution to medical research is fourfold that of Canada. Over a five year period this party is committed to bringing expenditures up to that level, an investment which will yield returns as high as 100 per cent over the long term. Only with this kind of commitment can we hope to reintroduce into the research community the stability it requires, an abandonment forever of the "stop-go" concept and of the idea that we can let others do our research for us.

We intend to give adequate attention to ensuring that research flourishes in this country at all times. Research in the health care delivery field is of particular importance. We must ensure that there is an adequate base for education in the health field and that there is an improvement of scientific and technical knowledge as a foundation for health care. We must see that investigators in the health field are adequately trained and support those who make contributions to new knowledge.

The last portion of my remarks contains an outline of Conservative policies. These are serious proposals. I hope the Liberal party will take note of them; perhaps it will have a chance to implement some of them before the next election. Otherwise, it will not have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Maine: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) said he did not know my constituency because I speak so seldom. I suggest he would not know because he himself is so seldom here. He is probably stuck in the tarsands. Anyway, if he were able to read and use a seating plan he would be able to find out my constituency.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that a point of order?

An hon. Member: What is your name?

Mr. Maine: A further point, Mr. Speaker. During his remarks the hon. member said, "If the minister were honest he would admit the budget had been cut by 10 per cent." I reserve the right to raise a question of privilege on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to remind the hon. member that that is a matter of debate.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, although I may quarrel with what I consider to be the confining nature of the detail in the motion I do find much merit in the body of the motion. Indeed, it is my opinion, one shared by others, that it is crucial to the strength of Canada's economy and the provision of employment opportunity that a vigorous program of technical research and development be promoted by the government.

I am one who believes we should be spending more and more on the development of new technology. If the bubble city of science fiction is ever to come into being, surely it will happen in our land where the environment of the north cries out for solutions. Surely we Canadians could be the first in the world to develop a new technology to enable all forms of life to grow, to live better and to exist together on this planet. The Russians and the Americans have set their sights on outer space, but hopefully they will look back from the moon and see Canadians bringing forward new technology not only to make our very existence on earth possible but to ensure that the earth itself has a more vibrant and glorious future.

In helping others we will help ourselves, for new technology brings about new job opportunities and never-ending spin-off of job situations which will ultimately do much to alleviate the problem of unemployment. New technology itself may be exported. In coping with our environment and the ills which befall human beings, plant and animal life, as well as with the sociological difficulties of living together, our research should lead the world.

At the outset I suggested that the five points in the motion are restrictive. As the Hon. Bud Drury once said:

> A single science policy is not, however, a meaningful concept. What in fact exist are numerous policies for the use of science and technology, developed in relation to the objectives of federal departments and agencies and also in relation to objectives of the private sector.

I find it hard to believe and intolerable that the motion makes no specific reference to university research. I note with interest that the present science minister, the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan), gave high priority to university research in his remarks. I well remember, and with interest, that many of the speeches of the hon. gentleman's parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine), gave great support to the development of research in universities. Industries have their own facilities for research and development. Government, equally, has a need to provide such facilities. However, properly funded university research across the breadth of this country is able to serve industry, governments and all Canadians.

I realize that in this time of restraint great emphasis is placed on target-oriented research. There is also great emphasis on obtaining immediate results for each dollar spent. It would be a great error on our part, however, if we were to succumb entirely to these pressures. If we are to be the country of the future, then our future lies in true research. Our universities have been the ones which have clung to their academic purposes in the face of all pressures—with government support and without government support and with private support and without private support. Researchers have carried out their personal quest for knowledge in spite of all obstacles. I urge the minister to increase support so that great Canadian minds might remain in Canada and make a great Canadian contribution for the benefit of all of us on planet earth.

Let me quote from a letter written to me on March 3, 1976 by Donald Sprung, Dean of the Faculty of Science at McMaster University. He wrote:

As a practising scientist, and dean of one of the most research-active science faculties in Canada, I fully share the concerns expressed by Professors Yates and Polanyi. Within our faculty the vast majority of professors are actively engaged in research. Many of them have national and international reputations for the value of their work. The high quality of my colleagues is reflected in the fact that at McMaster our research support from government and other granting agencies has not fallen as far behind as it has at other universities. Nonetheless, it has fallen in value, and by a considerable percentage over the past six years. These are just the years during which they are doing their best creative work, the years at which one would expect the level of support to be increasing. In fact, it is only in very rare cases that an individual has been able to secure an increase in funds.

Time and time again researchers across the country, professors and others, write to us to give advice and suggestions. Over the weekend I had the pleasure of being present for the Canada Jaycees Vanier Award to five outstanding Canadians. Among those honoured was Dr. John F. S. Crocker of Dalhousie University. He is noted for his research into Reye's syndrome. Dr. Crocker mentioned that we had gone through a period when it was considered fashionable to say: "Do not waste money; other countries are far ahead of us and we can either borrow or buy their research". In his own case a large amount of the funding for his research had to come from outside this country. We agreed that there is a marked change in that attitude, and there is every reason to believe that there is renewed interest in and sincere backing for Canadian research at all levels.

We must remember that federal funding of university research is necessary because of the importance of highly skilled scientists who are required to tackle problems facing Canada concerning the use of limited resources, population pressures, pollution and protection of the environment, health care, agricultural productivity and developing new sources of food and materials.

I have had extensive dealings with the biology department at McMaster University. I would like to quote from some of the correspondence I have received from that department. This correspondence illustrates the understanding of that department of how this minister, his department, this government and others have responded in a real way to the requests of researchers across the country. Mr. Davidson, chairman of the biology department of McMaster University, wrote the following:

Our concern at the level of support for research is not only that our individual efforts as scientists are affected. As teachers, we also know that the approach active scientists bring to teaching is more critical and more alive because they have first-hand experience of contemporary problems in our knowledge. The active scientist is generally a more interesting teacher and is certainly a better informed teacher than a scientist who depends solely upon books for information. Thus our concern over research funding is not purely selfish; we see research as an integrated part of our teaching responsibilities.

Professor Bayley from the same department wrote:

The human population is putting increasing demands on limited natural resources. To tackle the problems this creates, Canada like the rest of the world will require all the skilled scientific talent it can get. But maintaining and training skilled scientific talent means practising science "at the state of the art." With the sophistication of much of today's science, this cannot be done cheaply. If, to save relatively small amounts of money (by national standards), Canadian science is forced to lag behind, it will take years to recoup the lost ground. In the meantime, when up-to-date experts are required in Canada, the only reasonable step would be to import them from abroad. For a country of Canada's wealth and aspirations to continue to rely on imported scientific talent would be as unprincipled in my view as expecting other countries to provide us with trained medical staff—or hockey players.

Professor Douglas M. Davies of that same department wrote:

University research differs from government research . . . in several important ways.

1) Applications for university research grants are carefully appraised by specialists in each discipline ensuring that only the best is supported.

2) Research at universities usually involves also the training of specialized graduate students who will be Canada's scientists of the future.

3) A university teacher engaging in original research is able to bring to his teaching of undergraduate and graduate courses a first-hand excitement and freshness in presenting the latest in view scientific knowledge.

The head of that department, Mr. Davidson, seems to recognize not only our research problems but also our political problems. He wrote the following:

A problem for any government is to justify to the electors the allocations it makes of public funds. Thus, it would be easier for Mr. Trudeau's government to direct funds into, say, cancer and heart research, than into basic research on, say, wood production in eastern Canada, or fish breeding in northern Canada. But, as we tried to show you, the solution of problems unique to Canada will never be achieved in the U.S.A. or Europe. We have unique problems and to attack them we must, to some extent, be chauvinistic and parochial. We need a group of highly skilled highly trained scientists who recognize Canada's problems and are given the chance to work on them. To us, the solution is an adequate level of funding to support research.

All this and more has been said by researchers across the country, written to members of parliament and presented to the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I would like to note the fact that Max Chernesky, a virologist at St. Joseph's Hospital in Hamilton, along with Donald Savage, head of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, presented a report which is quite lengthy. However, there were three recommendations in their report, and I would like to tell the House how the minister, his predecessor and others have tried to respond to those recommendations.

One of the recommendations is as follows:

We recommend that governments at all levels consult with the organizations which represent professors and researchers prior to proposing new policies in higher education and, in particular, in regard to any negotiations between the federal and provincial governments over the financing of higher education.

The almost immediate response to that recommendation was the formation of the Canadian Committee on Financing of University Research. It is not a federal-provincial committee; it is a Canadian committee. This committee almost immediately stepped in to bring those forces together as a direct response to the brief presented by the Canadian Association of University Teachers. The committee was announced on November 2, 1976. It was announced that the committee would be composed of 20 members; that the secretary of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology would be the chairman; that nine other federal officials, including the heads of the three granting research councils, would complete the federal representation; and that the provincial members would include deputy ministers responsible for universities, university presidents or principals or vice-presidents or vice-principals and representatives of university councils or commissions.

It was also announced that there would be a regional balance in the provincial contingent. The establishment of that committee marked the achievement of a new level of understanding and co-operation between the federal government and provincial governments in the matter of university research.

I now move to the second recommendation in that report which was produced in about February of 1976. The second recommendation was the following:

> We recommend that government restore some of the lost purchasing power to the granting councils (the Medical Research Council, the National Research Council and the Canada Council).

There was an almost immediate response to that. Let us consider the estimates which have just recently been placed before us. The estimates provide for inflationary increases in the costs of research supported by the councils. The estimates tabled also carry forward into 1978-79 the additional increase of $8 million provided in the previous fiscal year and now adjusted for cost increases for programs relating especially to regional balance of scientific capability, national problem areas and the support of interdisciplinary research.

It is interesting to note that the budgets in 1978-79 will be: for the National Research Council, $105 million, an increase of $7.1 million; for the Medical Research Council, $60 million, an increase of $3.3 million; and for the social sciences and humanities program of the Canada Council, $31.1 million, an increase of $2.3 million. That is a direct response to a representation made by the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

The third recommendation is as follows:

> While we would favour a change in the delivery system for the funding of universities and colleges, we recognize that the moment may not be propitious for such significant change.

This recommendation itself admits that it would be difficult at this time to engineer changes in delivery systems, but a direct response to this recommendation was the presentation of what was Bill C-26. That legislation has not as yet been proclaimed, but in time it will and it indeed makes a dramatic change concerning delivery systems. It does a great deal to bring forward some ideas which are a conglomeration of thoughts of people in many areas.

Granted, we have merely a reorganizational task at this point, but last session's Bill C-26, which was passed by parliament in June, 1977, has as its main thrust the creation of two new granting councils: the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, formed by separating the support for university research in the natural sciences and engineering from the National Research Council; and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, formed by separating support for university research in the social sciences and humanities from the Canada Council. The Medical Research Council was not reorganized by the bill, although its mandate was modified.

The three granting councils, NSERC, SSHRC and MRC, will be responsible for the majority of direct funding of university research by the federal government. Each of the councils will report to parliament through its own minister. The members of the councils and their presidents are appointed by the governor in council. The councils themselves are subject to certain administrative and financial constraints. Otherwise, the councils are free of government intervention and enjoy independence and autonomy. Neither the governor in council nor the designated minister can direct or instruct the councils. However, the minister may refer matters to the councils for advice.

Of course, the councils depend on the government for funds. In deciding on the amount of funding, the government will be influenced by the separation and revision of the councils. Therefore, it is only fair that the councils be made aware of the government's objectives and wishes. The manner in which they are conveyed to the councils is important and is being considered carefully.

In these few remarks I have been able to indicate my own desire to serve the research communities, my own confidence in Canadian researchers, and my own belief that we should be much more interested in all universities across the country which can, in a very real way, serve all of us by pure research in itself. All research must not be target-oriented. All research must not only be done on the basis of a dollar out is a dollar back, or a dollar out is ten cents back. Much research must be done on the basis that we have confidence in the minds in our universities and the minds the universities will have some participation in forming. No respectable researcher believes he is dealing with anything but plastic character when he deals with his students. He recognizes fully that he may be a sounding board, he may be somewhat of an example, he may open a few doors, but really he is dealing with the development of minds which will lead us on to much greater things in the future.

As I said at the opening of my short remarks, who else but Canada would be involved in the great plastic dome cities of the Buck Rogers world or the space world? Who else but Canada should really know how to deal with the environment? Who else but Canada will really have concern for those small pieces of life which exist on some of the islands in the north? Who else but Canada, sitting at the crossroads of the world between the United States, Russia and China, will have the responsibility for exporting not only technology but human technology? That is the technology which comes from the social sciences. As was mentioned earlier by an hon. member of the opposition, the basic idea is how we on planet earth can live together, healthy in a physical way, healthy in a mental way, and healthy in a way to exist on a planet so that we ourselves do not bring about the demise of the planet. That is a great challenge for Canada.

I appreciate the fact that the motion has been introduced. I believe we are taking steps in the right direction. Perhaps some think we should move more quickly. I doubt if anyone thinks we should move more slowly. The hon. Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology has indicated direction. First, he responded immediately to recommendations placed before him; second, he established delivery systems which will ensure the involvement of all facets of the Canadian people; and third, he has shown a great recognition for the role our universities and research minds must play in any future which Canada wishes to lay any claim to at all.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) presented what amounts to a total condemnation of the government's performance in science and technology. I compliment him on his speech. As he indicated by reading the record of his former colleagues at McMaster University, their community is less than happy with the government. I found the hon. member's comments rather interesting.

In view of the hour, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. At six o'clock the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) had the floor.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this debate. Since I have been here this is the fourth opportunity to discuss this subject on the floor of the House of Commons. Three of those opportunities were created by this party using one of our allotted days to indicate our concern and interest in this subject.

The recent history of the science policy in Canada can only be described as pathetic. By way of historic perspective it might be recalled that the first movement in this area occurred in 1919 when the Conservative government of Sir Robert Borden created the National Research Council. From that time until 1941 there was little concern or interest in a science policy. As a result of the interest created by the war, a Privy Council committee on science matters was created but in the period between 1950 and 1958 when the St. Laurent government was in office it did not meet even once.

Research and Development

In 1961, the Diefenbaker government introduced as a tax measure or 150 per cent write-off of incremental increases in research and development which had a very beneficial effect, but that measure was withdrawn by the Pearson government which, as a sop, created a science secretariat within the Privy Council.

In November of 1967, the other place created a special committee on science policy to look into such questions as recent trends in R and D in Canada; research and development carried out by the federal government; federal assistance to research and development; and the principles and structure of a science policy for Canada. This committee did an excellent job. I am not in the habit of praising the other place, but in this case I admit they did an excellent job.

I will not try to summarize the findings of that committee because they are rather extensive. Suffice it to say that they came out with three volumes, with a subsequent addendum, but their initial analysis was characterized by four rather profound and disturbing comparisons of Canada's performance. They concluded—this was in their first report in 1970—that Canada at that time invested a smaller percentage of its GNP in R and D than did most industrialized nations. They also concluded that of the tax money spent by the Canadian government, Canada spent a greater proportion on government labs than any other country of the western industrialized nation; that there was less spending on R and D in the private sector than in most industrialized nations; and that Canada spent a greater percentage of its R and D funds on basic research than did most industrialized nations.

That was the deplorable situation which existed in 1970. How has it changed in the last seven or eight years? Let us look at some figures. In 1967, Canada spent about 1.4 per cent of its GNP on R and D. The Lamontagne Committee recommended a goal for Canada of some 2.5 per cent as being appropriate. At the time the U.S. was spending 3.6 per cent, so they gave, as an appropriate target for Canada, something less than what the United States was spending. By 1971 the proportion of the GNP devoted to R and D in Canada had dropped to 1.2 per cent. By 1974 the figure had dropped to .85 per cent, and by 1976 this figure had dropped down to .8 per cent. In other words, a situation which was bad in 1967 became much worse seven or eight years later.

That performance can only be described as absolutely tragic for Canada, and there are a number of very good reasons why that is so. One of the foundations of a nation's future is its ability in the area of science and technology. Historians who like to pigeonhole epochs and areas describe this as the technological age. Obviously that is an accurate description.

How we use science and technology will clearly define both our standard of living and our quality of life. If governments feel they have a responsibility to the people and are concerned about our standard of living and quality of life—and I believe they are—surely they would give science policy a very high priority. Science and technology is vital to the performance of any nation in areas such as trade. No economic unit can indefinitely buy more than it sells whether it be a family, a corporation, or a nation.

As a nation we have three commodities to sell to the rest of the world in order to generate the funds to buy the things we need but do not produce. Those three commodities are renewable resources, such as agricultural products; non-renewable resources, such as energy, minerals and the like; and our human value products or services. The latter can come in the form of brains or brawn. I do not think it desirable, nor do I think it possible, to expect Canada to compete with third world nations in terms of brawn. We cannot expect Canadians to endure the decrease in their standard of living that would be necessary if we were to compete with third world, low income nations for commodities and services in which sweat or backpower is the main component. This means that if we are to compete in the world marketplace in human value added materials, we have to do it in terms of brains, skill, talent or technology. In this regard Canada's performance is absolutely abysmal.

Last year our trade deficit in high technology manufactured goods was between $10 and $11 billion. That is an astronomical figure, but it is even more disturbing when you look at the trends. A decade or two prior to 1970 we ran approximately a $1 billion deficit—in constant dollars—in manufactured or high technology goods and paid for it easily with the export of agricultural products and non-renewable resources.

Since 1970 there has basically been a straight line deterioration in trade imbalance in manufactured, high technology goods from $1 billion to $10 billion. The trend is devastating and there has not been a single policy initiative from this government to try and arrest the trend or turn it around. If this is not done we are going to think that 10 per cent unemployment is nirvana compared to what we will experience in the future.

It is absurd in the extreme to have our officials in Switzerland talking about reducing tariffs and thus curing all our problems. The government has no apparent understanding of what is happening in Canada in terms of our deteriorating trade position. Cutting tariffs will only make a bad situation worse. We need a careful strategy, of which research and development is a fundamental element, to ensure that we can compete in the world. As long as we play "monkey hears nothing, monkey sees nothing, monkey speaks nothing," which is the posture the government has adopted, we will continue to have this kind of deterioration. Cutting tariffs will only speed the day when 15 per cent unemployment is the mean in this country.

In order to provide jobs for Canadians we must look to manufacturing, and that means high technology. We cannot compete with third world nations in manufacturing where there is a small skilled component. Primary industries simply do not create the jobs necessary to reduce unemployment. It is estimated that about 6½ cents of every dollar from primary products goes into wages, whereas in manufacturing it is something like 35 cents of every dollar. For each dollar earned from manufacturing products there are six times as many jobs created as from the sale of primary products.

If the government is sincere about addressing the problem of unemployment, not just unemployment today but the unemployment we will have in the next three to four years, they should tackle the question of science policy and research and development and recognize that our performance in these areas is worse than any other industrialized country in the west.

That cannot be said often enough, Mr. Speaker. Our performance is the worst of all western industrialized nations. That cannot be blamed on international factors, on the weather, on the EEC, or on any of the unknown forces which seem to be causing all our other problems with dollars and so on. The fact is it is Canada's fault—the fault of this government.

What has this government done? When the Science Committee reported in 1970 the government quickly established a Ministry of State for Science and Technology to look after our problems. It was designed to generate policy, I assume. It generated one policy statement and that was the "make or buy" policy. It was a good policy designed to reduce the amount of government funded research conducted inside government labs. At that time, 1971, 62 per cent of all money spent by government directly was spent on research done inside government labs. As a result of that policy the figure has gone up to 65 per cent. So the one policy this ministry has produced in six years has had exactly the opposite effect to that which was intended.

I have said before, and I say again, that if that department were abolished we could save $6 million immediately. There are people in this country who think the government is concerned about science and technology just because there is a department with people making up to $60,000 per year sitting around thinking about science policy. People expect they will come up with great ideas because this government knows what is best for all of us and all these high priced people who are going to find out the answers. Mr. Speaker, they have produced nothing. I say we should get rid of them immediately. We would save that money and the attention of the public would not be deflected by that flim-flam.

I should like to elaborate a little on the problem that the government was trying to arrest with this policy, the amount of research being done in government laboratories, rather than in the private sector. I should like to point out for the benefit of the House the importance of research performed in the private sector. It is important not just from the point of view of the more efficient and effective action you get from the private sector as opposed to the government. It is also important because of the time lag between new discovery, innovation and implementation in a commercial way, which is greatly reduced.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, you have to look no further than the area around MIT and Harvard in Massachusetts, or the area surrounding Stanford and Berkeley in California, to see the tremendous number of high technology industries, which have spun out of the fundamental research that has occurred at those institutions, research by and large funded by governments but performed in the private sector. If an idea is generated in the private sector, the time lag between idea and commercial application is greatly reduced. When those ideas are generated in government labs there is an unwarranted delay between discovery and implementation.

In this party our opinion is by and large, except for some areas where it may be necessary, that government should not do research and development. Government should sponsor research and development. They should help pay for research and development but they should contract it out to the private sector and not do it in-house.

We also believe that there is a role for government funding for fairly large projects. In addition, that activity can be used in a beneficial way. As an example, the largest research project of this century has to be the NASA program to put a man on the moon in the United States. As a result of powerful southern Senators primarily, but for other reasons as well, a good deal of the research money provided by the National Aeronautical and Space Administration went to companies and institutions which were located in the southern United States rather than the more developed northern United States.

In the southern United States, in the so-called sun belt, one of the effects of that benefit was to create tremendous growth of high technology industries, the net result being that regional discrepancies and regional economic differences between the north and the south were greatly reduced. What would happen if we took the $500 million a year that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is spending—to no avail because regional problems are getting worse in this country and not better—and we used that vast amount of money to create worth-while large scale projects which would be of value to Canada? The benefits would be considerable.

In the Canadian private sector in 1971 it was estimated that industry spent .41 per cent of the gross national product on research and development. By 1977 the figure had dropped to about .3 per cent. In other words, a very serious situation in 1970 had become much worse by 1978. The last budget of March 31, 1977 had a small tax credit for R and D activities of 5 per cent, rising to 10 per cent in the high unemployment areas. The United States, which is already doing four times as much R and D as Canada, has a tax credit of 10 per cent across the board. If the government was really interested they would be looking at tax credits in the area of 25 per cent, going up to possibly 50 per cent in areas of high unemployment.

Why is this so? Very quickly, I believe the answer was given by Dr. Robert Uffen, former head of the science secretariat that existed before the creation of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. He said, and I am quoting from an article in Maclean's magazine:

> The Trudeau government views science and technology as instruments for political manoeuvring both domestically and in international affairs.

That is dead accurate, Mr. Speaker. That is all this government recognizes science and technology for—as instruments for political manoeuvring. It is nice to go to Moscow and sign a scientific exchange to send a couple of scientists back and forth. It is nice, when one feels a little pressure about energy, to set up a research institute and say: "Hey, we are doing something", and wave a flag. It is strictly a political instrument for the government's manoeuvring both domestically and in international affairs. There is no recognition whatsoever by the senior gurus in the government opposite of the importance of science to the long-term future of the government.

It is sad to say, but investments in science and technology have a long-term payout. Investment today may not yield a return for 5, 10, 20 years. As this government thinks only of next month's Gallup poll or next year's election it is not going to make that kind of investment in Canada's long term future. It is very sad for the nation, but that is the case. That is only one of a whole score of reasons why it is essential we get rid of them, and soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be talking about this subject today. I would like to congratulate the opposition on putting forward this motion. In general terms it is a very good motion; the general thrust is right. The specific details of this motion probably require some further study with a fair bit of caution. There is absolutely no question, I agree with my colleagues in the opposition, that we need to be doing more research and development in this country. This is particularly so in the industrial and free enterprise sector, especially in contrast to the research that has been done in the government sector along with the universities.

We have a definite need for research and development at the present time because we have a definite need for an increased industrial thrust for an improved economy. Research and development and innovation, without question, is the base, I am sure we all agree, for a new type of prosperity and a new type of direction for this country.

Having been in research and in industry, I feel confident that we have the potential in this country to do much better and more effective R and D to produce a much more efficient industry. We have the scientists, an excess of them. They are excellent; they are as good as any in the world. Many of them have had to leave the country and go to the United States or elsewhere to follow their careers because there is not enough potential for them in Canada and in some cases they become over-specialized for a country like ours. This is not the biggest or the most powerful country in the world. We cannot enter all the brand new specialities the way our neighbour the United States does. But in the meantime we can probably provide more satisfying work for the vast majority of our scientists.

As the opposition party which proposed this motion has indicated, we also have many natural areas of research and development of industrial thrust in this country, areas of immense advantage to Canada such as the north, forestry, mining, the oceans, agriculture. These areas also should be exploited.

In the past we have had some misguided notions, however well meaning, particularly in the 1960s. We had a very strong thrust in consumerism that led us down some wrong roads. We have had some strong ideas about economic nationalism, wanting to do everything for ourselves, by ourselves in isolation. That has been a handicap to our thinking and planning at times. We have learned our lesson on those scores. Our thinking is more in balance now. That is an advantage we could use in terms of scientific and industrial policy.

We have had some concerns about helping the big multinational corporations that maybe do not need help. These multinationals would use our efforts and money to their own advantage, perhaps for other countries' advantages and not for the advantage of Canada. Possibly there is some truth in that. It is rather a mixed picture. I still think we need to work on the multinationals, the big corporations in general, because they have a great deal of ability, a great deal to offer this country. Aside from the big companies, this is essentially a country of small business, small industry, small factories. There is a great deal we can do both in a positive and negative way to help our small businesses, which form the majority of the businesses in this country.

Of course, we know the usual government measures. We have technocrats, highly skilled experts both in the government and outside, who can tell us just how to help our companies, big and small, and our research and development with tax exemptions and grant programs of various kinds. Fortunately, we are tending to get away from giving people money, giving them packaged programs. As has been said in recent times, probably the most useful thing we can do is get out of their way with our restrictions, bureaucrats, red tape and so on. Many government policies and other kinds as well should, frankly, be simply eliminated. I will talk about that again in a minute.

There is something that is important which other countries have discovered much more effectively than Canada, certainly the United States, many European countries such as Switzerland and Germany and, in more recent years, Japan. It is that there must be a general thrust of research and development. It must be much greater than we have had up until now, one that is less academic and more applied, one that goes into producing new products, new exports and so on. That would make this country much stronger industrially than it ever has been, and it certainly has been strong in recent times.

Government also has a responsibility which it perhaps has not fulfilled. When I say government, I am not only talking about the federal government but all levels of government, because this is a very layered country in terms of government. This is a very important function I would like to see fulfilled: government should act as a catalyst in trying to bring together the private sector, industry and businesses, on the one hand, and universities on the other.

[Mr. Philbrook.]

There is, unfortunately, something that has happened in this country to which we have not addressed ourselves. Aside from the cultural solitude, the French and English Canada, we have many sectoral solitudes such as government, business and universities. We have not pulled together as effectively as we should have. This is probably one of the causes of our problems. This will have to be absolutely essential in future if this country is going to compete in a much more competitive world. Our government has the prime responsibility for doing that.

In terms of what has happened in recent years, I wish to give some of my own experiences with a couple of examples. One is the pharmaceutical industry. I would like to say quite a bit about that. Second is the plastics industry, of which I have just become a little more aware and which I think is equally important. I hope to at least support that, if not make some contribution.

First, I wish to talk about the pharmaceutical industry. It is a very unusual and interesting example. In the fifties, as far as Canada was concerned, this industry consisted of a few small companies that made many simple medicines. At that time—and it is easy to forget because companies change so fast—there were not many powerful complex medications. We could have our small companies, our simple formulas, our Galenicals, whatever they were called.

Things began to change very quickly, namely through research and development. All of a sudden the industry became huge. It became very complex and expensive. We found the products could only be purchased in countries such as the United States and shipped here. Like any responsible country—and this is probably a carry-over of the C. D. Howe thrust which had many benefits as well as creating certain problems—we found we could induce our American and European friends to locate some of their plants here. They located more and more of their functions here, not just the packaging and assembling, and not even just the manufacturing. We actually began to have a pharmaceutical industry here. Granted it was almost totally foreign owned, but we began to have what looked like a modern, competitive pharmaceutical industry. It even began to catch on with some of our native Canadian companies like Ayerst and Frosst. We did not have many, but a few started to develop as full modern companies of which we could be proud.

What did we do? We got into a way of thinking in the sixties which was new to us. Hopefully, we will now look at it in a more balanced, moderate way. Things were going well. They were producing a lot of benefits. However, some things were going wrong. We swallowed the line about new wonder drugs being expensive—unnecessarily. We believed there may have been monopoly agreements in order to keep up prices and so on. Therefore, we decided on laws which stated these companies had to share their new products with other companies, so-called compulsory licensing. They had to share the fruits of their efforts and lose their competitive advantage. In some cases they could not even regain the expenditures they had made in the development of new wonder drugs. By law they had to share these commercial, medical advantages for a very small return, something like 4 per cent. This may have been well meaning, but I am not sure it was wise or accurate.

That example is not directly related to research and development policy, but it has most certainly affected research and development in the field of pharmaceuticals. Even if that field was mostly foreign owned, we still gained many advantages. It had a great deal to offer, including keeping many of our top scientists active and satisfied and working in their own country.

Now we are into patent laws. There is a suggestion of further patent restrictions coming forward. These patent laws will only give the pharmaceutical companies an exclusive right to their own development and production for a particular number of years, for example nine years, which may not be long enough to regain their expenses. Sometimes it takes 25 years to develop a drug that will receive government approval. That is the nature of the game; it changed drastically overnight.

These are matters which we need to thoroughly rethink. They are not directly research and development. They do not come in the form of direct taxation or tax exemptions, but nonetheless result in a lot of pharmaceutical research and development being withdrawn from this country. That is a shame. It is entirely the wrong trend.

I wish to state a few of the advantages that we have from our pharmaceutical industry. It is the most research intensive of all intensive industries. It has the highest percentage of funds devoted to basic research, 25 per cent versus 4 per cent for the industry in general, toward the advancement of scientific knowledge without specific commercial objectives.

Almost 25 per cent of all research in Canada is done by pharamceutical companies. It is the highest self-financing of research and development expenditures as a percentage of sales, 36.8 per cent versus 1.5 per cent for an average of all industries. It is by far the largest employer of research and development scientists compared to the total number of people employed. It accepts a lesser percentage of research and development money from the government, about 4 per cent, while other industries average four times that much. In other words, it gets by on its own. It asks for less help and makes a great contribution. It is one of the leading recipients of dollars from outside Canada for research and development done here.

One in five research and development employees has a Ph.D compared with one in 20 in industry in general. It is very highly science oriented. It had nearly twice the rate of growth in terms of intramural research and development from 1963 to 1975 by comparison with industry in general. In fact, growth has doubled every five years. Finally, the pharmaceutical industry spends the third highest amount on current research and development for value added. If every industry in Canada were capable of accomplishing that much, I think we would be on top of the heap in terms of prosperity, the economy and industrial power. Yet for some reason, as I said before, the pharmaceutical industry is a peculiar example; we have singled it out because it is small, very visible and very susceptible to government regulation. I think it has provided a valuable example and we should be very careful of that type of practice in future.

I also mentioned the plastics industry. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Maine) knows more about that than I do. It provides another example. He has probably talked about it already. The great concern of that industry is not directly related to research and development. What affects them most is the subject of trade regulations. They wonder where the GATT negotiations will end up. They do not know and they are very worried. This industry is important to us. It is new. It has grown fast. It has a great future. It has much to offer. It is already providing products to our Canadian people that we are not even aware of, products we take for granted in the food industry, in health care and so on. Yet here we are at the moment, those people feel, leaving them high and dry and not knowing where they are going to be in terms of competitive advantage.

Many of our industries are in this position. All they want to do is compete. They do not mind competing at all, but they are terribly worried that their representatives in Geneva will agree to arrangements which leave them at a great disadvantage. Many other countries would do things we are not prepared to do, particularly in the area of non-tariff barriers. It is all very hard to sort out and for some reason or other many of our most important Canadian industrialists are not yet convinced that we are going to protect them as properly as we should. That certainly applies to the plastics industry.

What has been our performance? I know this has been talked about many times today in this debate, probably in a partisan way, which is fair enough. I still am not clear myself but I think I see some trend. I certainly stand to be corrected on this, Mr. Speaker, but I am not entirely satisfied with the figures I have from Statistics Canada. I have tried to see some trends in them today, and I think this is what they are. I think it is important we should at least try to put an interpretation on them to find out what we have been doing in research and development and why.

What do the figures tell us about ourselves? I do not think there is any question that, compared to other countries, our spending has been relatively low, for whatever reason. I suppose somehow or other it has to come back to policy, but whether it is a conscious policy or not I am not sure. I referred a while back to one of our former policy setters, Mr. C. D. Howe, who helped this country develop very quickly but who also left us with an awful lot of foreign ownership. Perhaps this is what most of the trends tell us. Maybe there is more to it than that, but it certainly seems to me that this is one of the reasons. As long as we are a branch plant economy it will be difficult for us to keep up with all the leading countries, particularly in terms of private enterprise industrial sectors.

We spent more on research in the government sector than in the private sector compared to other countries. This may be interpreted as bad or good. We seem to have fed more government money into industry, at least on a relative basis, and all of this suggests that somehow or other we have fallen into the unfortunate habit of having government try to make up for what is lacking in the private sector. It is the government which spends most on research in this country, even if it does not spend enough, then business and then the universities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in this debate and deal with a specific area which was touched on today by the Leader of Opposition (Mr. Clark) but which has not been discussed at length by other speakers. I refer specifically to agriculture and the contracting out provision which is very worrisome to the agricultural community.

The contracting out proposals we were talking about today in terms of allocating more money for research to the private sector is a sound proposition as far as most areas of the economy is concerned. But agriculture is the exception. Agriculture is different. It is not at all practical to make this provision applicable to certain sectors of the agriculture industry. In fact, it would be detrimental. As far as I am concerned, two people are principally to blame for the position in which plant breeders, for example, find themselves. One is the minister responsible for science and technology for not really understanding the implication of this policy for agriculture; the other is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for not fighting harder for the farmers who might otherwise have been exempted from these provisions.

There is no doubt that in the future agriculture will be Canada's largest earner on the export market. At present it is about number three on the list of dollar earners helping with our balance of payments. As the incomes of countries around the world rise they will demand food of increased quality and variety. It is interesting to note that the standard of living in Russia is rising, and as this happens the demand for meat increases. The significance is that Russia is importing more cereal grain than ever before. The only major region in the world from which extra supplies of food can be grown in the foreseeable future is North America. Agricultural research is going to be a very important factor in this question of food production.

What has happened to agricultural research over the past few years? Mr. Speaker, it has not fared very well. In fact, it is not really keeping up with inflation. One of the greatest returns on dollars invested results from investment in agricultural research. What will be the result in years to come if we follow this same policy? If the agricultural research dollar investment is not increased, there will be reduced production. The result of reduced production will be higher food prices for the consumer and lower export earnings. On numerous occasions rapeseed producer organizations have lobbied the government for greater research assistance, but their needs have not been adequately met. Funding is inadequate with regard to machinery research, especially in western Canada. Unless research is increased, farmers will not be competitive.

The recent policy of reducing agricultural research in the public service should be reconsidered. Most organizations are against the government's proposal. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture which represents organizations all across Canada is against the proposal. At a western agricultural conference held recently in Regina, representatives from western Canadian farm organizations were against the proposal. The Agricultural Institute of Canada, speaking for professional agriculturalists across Canada, spoke against the proposal. In its brief the Agricultural Institute of Canada said, and I quote:

> The latest proposal from government to transfer research from government laboratories through normal attrition to industry contracts will inevitably lead to chaos and to the destruction of the present ongoing and effective agricultural research programs, with only a remote chance of successfully establishing them on a permanent basis in industry.

The Agricultural Institute of Canada said that Canada needs a greater research effort in the industrial area but, and I quote:

> . . . this must not be accomplished at the expense of established research teams in either government or university where a capability in the primary industry is presently non-existent.

The only solution, the AIC says, is to increase expenditures for research in three areas: government, university and the private sector. The AIC is, of course, correct. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which represents farmers across Canada, has stated:

> Farmers are under increasing pressure to compete with producers in more favourable climates, and if Canadian agriculture is going to keep abreast we simply must continue to seek new potentials in breeds, breeding, technology and management.

The greatest concern is the policy of the federal government to reduce research in the public sector. Obviously farmers were not consulted when that policy decision was made. Farmers and farm organizations have repeatedly contacted various departments but to no avail.

The title of the directive which has caused all the concern in the agriculture community is "Policy and guidelines of contracting out of the government's requirements in science and technology". It sets out the principle that, except in certain circumstances, research requirements are to be contracted out to the private sector. Once again that is all right, except when it comes to agriculture. A very important part of agricultural research would be jeopardized, and that part is plant breeding research. Operationally under the proposal, for the Department of Agriculture to decide it necessary to carry on a plant breeding program it would be required to consult with the Department of Supply and Services and with the Minister of for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) to confirm that there are no private facilities capable of performing the function. In some circumstances it might be required to consult with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Finally, Treasury Board would have to be satisfied before funds for this purpose could be approved.

This procedure is not in keeping with the nature of plant breeding research in this country. Plant breeding research is an ongoing operation. There could be circumstances under which a university might have a particular expertise upon which the department might wish to draw to augment its own resources in a given project. This could be contracted out under the Treasury Board proposal, but that is hardly necessary since there are already arrangements for grants for that purpose.

There are few, if any, crops with which the department is involved for which any private facility now has the physical or scientific resources to duplicate what the department is now doing. That is one of the key arguments in this whole debate. In order to provide those resources to the private sector, government funding would be required, and of necessity that funding would be restricted to one or very few firms or organizations. This would present the practical and political problem of deciding which private facility should be contracted. For a major crop like wheat this would be completely impractical.

Finally, one particular feature of the Treasury Board proposal is completely impractical for plant breeding research. Under the proposed contractual arrangement the government would finance the cost of the research project conducted for it by a private sector facility. In return for that, the right to technical information, designs and so forth arising out of the contract would remain with the government. With regard to plant breeding this would mean that if a seed firm working under a government contract developed a useful variety, it would turn over to the government the rights to that variety.

This type of arrangement might be workable in some areas of research—and I concede that it probably would be—but not in plant breeding research. When a private firm develops a variety of grain it retains the right either to the price at which it sells the seed or to the royalty which it collects on its sale. It finances its costs and makes a profit which, of course, is the purpose for which it is involved in plant breeding in the first place. Under this proposal that would not be allowed; hence there would not be any activity in the private sector in any event.

Agricultural research is not a stop and go affair. It must continue in the light of new products and new technologies. It is difficult to see how it can be maintained by calling in outside researchers for a variety of programs. Private researchers do not have the incentive to maintain lenghty research programs. This applies not only to plant breeding but also to animal breeding research. This is not to discount the research now being carried out by various industries. Progress being made in the development of pesticides, herbicides, insecticides and fertilizers is significant and should be carried on in the private sector, but government programs must differentiate between the various kinds of agricultural research.

What is being said loudly and clearly by farm organizations across Canada is that the government must drop the idea of contracting out agricultural research because it would ultimately increase costs for consumers and would worsen our balance of payments deficit.

Farmers are going to be put in a position of competitive disadvantage in relation to other farmers in North America, mainly those in the United States. The policy we have been talking about and about which the agricultural sector is so concerned was drafted by bureaucrats who had no idea of the importance of agriculture or the effect this kind of intervention would have on this most basic industry. I urge the government to look very closely at dropping its agriculture proposal.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity of making a contribution to this very important subject before us today, namely, the state of Canada's economy, especially as it applies to the manufacturing and industrial sectors and the relationship thereto of research and development in this country.

Before beginning my main remarks let me say that I was listening with interest to the comments by members of the Conservative and Liberal parties. I wish for once the Conservatives could get their act together. We heard one spokesman say that the government should get out of research and another one say he wants the government to maintain its involvement, and he was castigating the goverment for its plans to withdraw from certain sectors of research.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member knows full well that the area I was talking about was a specific area of agricultural research. If he does not agree with me I hope he will stand up and say so, but I would not want him to misrepresent the remarks of members of our party in the way he has just done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: I was just listening a little bit earlier to one of the official spokesmen on science policy, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who argued just the opposite to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta). That is my difficulty, finding out where the Conservatives stand on this important issues. I agree with the hon. member for Lisgar, who I assume is a minority in his party, that there is a place for government research in Canada, especially in the field of agriculture and elsewhere.

Then I listened to some of my Liberal colleagues who say there is a problem but they do not know what is the cause. I should like to go into what I think are the causes of the difficulties we are in. I lay them right at the doorstep of this government and its lack of science and industrial policy over the past few years.

Research and development is essential to any modern industrial economy, and it is sad to note when we look at the history of science policy, especially in the field of research and development, that Canada has one of the worst records of any modern industrial state.

Research and Development

Research can be divided into three major areas. First, what we call curiosity or motivated research; that is, research of a general nature to create more information in the general pool of scientific knowledge. It is important for scientists and those in universities to pursue this field.

Then there is a second area of research and development, the mission-oriented kind of research, or research that is addressed to some of the fundamental problems facing any country, involving things from the environment and industrial health to renewable energy, urban transit and so on. That is a very important sector of our research that likewise has been neglected over the years.

The third area, which is the area we seem to be concerned with in the motion tonight, is applied research. That is research we can apply directly to industry in the economy to enhance our manufacturing sector and our ability to produce and trade.

When we look at this government's policy—and this government has, of course, been in power for such a long period of time it cannot say this is something that has just occurred overnight—and when we look at past ministers of science and technology, especially the former minister, Mr. Drury, we find that the policy has been that we move to interdependence in terms of science; that we rely on importing from other countries much of our technology and research. It is argued that it is too expensive for a country like Canada to embark on research in these major fields, and it is much easier to import it.

As a result of that deliberate government policy of withdrawing from these very important fields, which every other modern country recognizes as necessary, we have seen a 30 per cent decline in research and development in Canada since 1970. As a result, is it any wonder that members of parliament when they are in their constituencies have more and more young people with university degrees coming to them with the lamentable story of how they or their parents have invested a great deal of money for their training and education yet now they cannot find jobs? That kind of problem in respect of unemployment among highly skilled young people today has to rest right at the doorstep of this government. The government has pulled us out of that kind of field of research, and we now find that our bright young engineers, technicians and scientists are having to leave the country. Indeed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that if they cannot find jobs here they should leave the country. What kind of future hope is that for the young people of Canada? It is a lamentable state of affairs.

Research and development has been downgraded by this government and we are seeing the results in terms of higher unemployment. We are also seeing the results in terms of a declining manufacturing sector that has not been able to keep up with modernization, redesigning plants and moving into new basic areas that research and development could provide for them.

Today we rank almost last of all the industrial countries in terms of our commitment to research and development. I think we are second to that little country of Ireland in that sense. In 1975 only .36 per cent of our gross national product was devoted to research and development. It should be a minimum of 2.5 per cent.

Why are we sliding into this abysmal state of affairs? As I said, we have to look at the government, its lack of goals and its lack of planning. I am really amazed sometimes when I listen to the debates in this House and the contributions by members of the Liberal and Conservative parties who assume that, if we just let business alone and just let the economy return to the good old days of laissez-faire and Adam Smith, somehow we will solve all the problems we face now and achieve great progress. Those days have gone.

Any modern industrialized country today is involved in highly sophisticated economic planning. The governments of these nations have played a very activist role. No longer can we go back to the 18th century and that kind of competition and free enterprise. It does not exist any more in the world because we have moved into a more monopolistic kind of situation with the advent of the large and powerful multinational corporations. Even the multinationals undertake planning on a long-term basis. Modern governments undertake planning on a long-term basis. However, Canada moves from month to month and year to year without any coherent plan.

Is it any wonder, then, that we are facing economic difficulties today? You just cannot survive in the modern industrial world with an ad hoc policy or no policy at all. You have to commit yourself to goals and planning, and you have to bring the state into an interventionist role in the economy in order to survive, in light of the very powerful interest groups that exist today in the world economy.

We have to move along that line, and I do not see that direction forthcoming from this government, either in terms of economic strategy and planning for our economy or in terms of enhancing research and development through an impetus that government can put into this field. The great danger today is that we are moving toward a state of staid industrialization. We are going downhill rather than progressing so far as our manufacturing sector is concerned.

The Science Council of Canada and many other studies have shown that the Canadian manufacturing sector is very sick. We have a trade deficit in manufactured goods which has grown by approximately $9 billion since 1970. That has resulted in a loss of at least 350,000 jobs in this country over the past seven years. That was as a result of the trade imbalance, the American DISC program, and the repercussions of an auto pact which benefits the United States more than us. Also we have been locked into an economy which goes back to the days of C. D. Howe: Canada is used as a resource hinterland. Our minerals are mined from the ground, our trees are cut down and our wheat is harvested. Then these raw materials are exported to other countries. As long as Canada is locked into that type of economic development, we export jobs at the same time as we export raw materials.

Jobs can be found in areas where raw materials are refined, processed and manufactured into finished goods which are sold to consumers. That is where the labour intensive sector of the economy is. We export our resources and in turn import the finished product. Mainly we export our raw materials to the United States. The raw materials are turned into finished goods which we import from the United States. Thus the Americans receive jobs. It has been estimated that for every job created in the Canadian resource sector, perhaps we forgo two to five jobs which could have been created in manufacturing. The resource sector is capital intensive. All one has to think of is Syncrude and other energy projects. A large amount of money is poured into those sectors of the economy. One should compare the number of jobs produced as a result of those projects to a similar investment of moneys into the manufacturing sector and the amount of jobs produced there. We are losing out in that sense.

Because Canada depends on the export of raw materials and the import of manufactured goods, we are faced with perpetually high unemployment. Until that type of economic development is changed, Canada will continue to be faced with high unemployment. Projections have indicated that there will be 475,000 young people graduating from or leaving shcool each year between now and 1985. Yet when we look at the past record, in 1976 only 209,000 more jobs were provided than in 1975. As long as we depend on a resource based economy, jobs cannot be created to meet the demands of more and more young people coming on to the market. We require an industrial strategy which eliminates dependence on resources alone and which moves toward developing a strong and healthy manufacturing sector where the jobs are.

I have looked at many studies which I do not have the time to go into. The Belgium study has shown that the return on research and development investment is two to four times the return on investment in fixed assets. We are beginning to appreciate how important it is to develop that sector. We must move toward creating a viable manufacturing sector in Canada. When we recognize that research and development is so essential to creating a healthy manufacturing sector, why do we continue to import so much of this research and development? Why is it not done in Canada? One of the reasons is the lack of policy and direction from the federal government. Another important reason is the degree of foreign ownership in the Canadian economy today.

When one looks at foreign ownership and the policies of parent companies which affect the branch plants in Canada, one finds an active and deliberate policy to discourage research and development in Canadian subsidiaries. I could document this by referring to various cases. Foreign ownership has discouraged research and development as well as having fragmented and distorted the entire structure of our manufacturing industry. For example, as of 1970, 53 per cent of our manufacturing was foreign owned. I will not bore the House with figures, but we are aware that it ranges from a high of 96 per cent of our petroleum industry being foreign owned to 53 per cent of our manufacturing industry. If so much of our economy is foreign owned, how can we expect to develop an independent policy or strategy in terms of manufacturing research and development?

Ford of Canada has sales amounting to billions of dollars, but not one Ph.D is employed by that company. Ford has no research and development facilities in Canada. Research and development is done in its parent company in the United States. That is where university graduates are being hired, not in Canada. That is evident in every industry. The foreign parent company retains research and development in its own country, mostly the United States. The foreign parent company does not want to release that information and technology to a subsidiary company located in Canada.

Thus, research and development to design a car that can withstand Canadian winters is not done here, it is done in the United States. We do not have openings for our young people to find jobs, nor is there a chance for indigenous industry in Canada to strike out on its own on a path which would benefit our economy. It is controlled by the parent company in the United States or wherever. Canadian branch plants have mainly become assembly points for the products produced by foreign parent companies. Canadian employees merely put the pieces together. That does not require highly skilled people, such as the scientists and technologists that would be necessary in order to partake of research and development.

In 1975 $4½ billion in auto parts were imported into Canada. Those auto parts were produced in the United States and provided jobs for Americans. Another problem which results from foreign ownership is: if there is a slowdown, the parent companies lay off people in their own countries. Thus, if there is a slowdown, Canadians are laid off before Americans and Europeans employed by the parent companies.

Another disadvantage Canada faces is the outflow of profits, dividends, royalties and management fees, which could have remained in Canada and provided us with capital to expand. Because we are so highly foreign owned, the profits and dividends leave the country and benefit the parent companies. As a result, we are all the poorer.

Canadian industry is faced with a situation where there are such powerful multinational corporations in the world that any Canadian company is at a real disadvantage when attempting to find export markets. The parent companies do not want subsidiaries to be competing with them. Thus, Canadian subsidiaries are discouraged from going out into the world market in order to participate in trading, which would create more jobs for our country.

The other problem, of course, is that any Canadian industry now is faced with the problem of high competition from the multinationals which are moving into third world countries where there is cheap labour, where there are very few environmental laws, etc. As a result, we find the Inco situation and others where Canadian workers are being laid off, all symptoms of how we as a nation have lost control over our economy and have lost the ability to plan, which every other modern country worth its salt has been able to do.

This is why I argue that we need government planning and involvement. If we cannot rely on industry alone to solve the problems in Canada because industry is foreign owned, we will never move beyond the branch plant economy in which we are now. Therefore, we must have government planning, economic planning, and government investment decisions in co-operation, or in some cases maybe with coercion, with some of these companies operating in Canada. We have seen how West Germany, Japan and the Scandinavian countries have been able to do this successfully.

It is amazing to me that that lesson has not been learned by my colleagues opposite. Laissez faire will not do in Canada any more. We have gone beyond that. We are in too much of a predicament. We need research and development; we need government initiatives. I am afraid that unless we have a change in government, we will never solve this fundamental problem facing our economy today.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the opposition motion before us is an important one and probably there would be no disagreement with the principle, although obviously there is a good deal of room for disagreement on methods of application and on deciding priorities. The motion states that it is crucial to the strength of Canada's economy and the provision of employment opportunities that a vigorous program of technological research and development be promoted by the government. It goes on to deal with industrial research, to which the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) have already directed their remarks. The motion also addresses the question of agricultural research, and I would like to speak briefly on this.

The Department of Agriculture's expenditures have increased very greatly in the past three years on work on new crop varieties, the efficiency of animal hybridization in the development of modern strains of animals and poultry, and the protection of plants and animals from diseases, insects and weeds.

The budget of the agricultural research program since the 1971-72 financial year has increased 2.4 times. Science expenditures related to agriculture by all departments have increased from $116.8 million in 1975-76 to $159.5 million in 1978-79. Expenditures on science and technology in 1978-79 will be $134.1 million in Agriculture Canada and will represent 18 per cent of Agriculture Canada's total estimated expenditures. Of this, it is expected that $5 million will be spent extramurally, compared to $6.3 million in 1977-78, of which $0.8 million will be spent in industry and $3.3 million in universities.

The agriculture industry produces nearly two thirds of the food consumed in Canada. In addition, agricultural exports play a significant role in our international balance of trade. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) aims to preserve and influence the productivity and prosperity of agriculture in Canada within the context of a total food system.

The research branch of Agriculture Canada has as its mission to ensure the efficient production of an adequate and appropriate supply of food and agricultural products and to help maintain a stable and profitable agricultural industry in Canada. The research program has a management-by-objectives philosophy. Most of the objectives are based on various crop and animal commodities. Goals are set so as to provide real targets for assessment, accountability, and cost benefit analysis. Some objectives, however, embrace a broad class of agriculture; for example, soil survey or environmental protection. In others a discipline basis is used for setting objectives and goals.

Apart from administration and research services, the program is organized into 14 research areas, namely, horticultural crops, cereal crops, forage crops, beef cattle, biosystematics, oilseed crops, land and water resources, field crops, dairy cattle, environmental quality, poultry, swine, sheep and honey bees and other animals.

The department operates 47 science establishments, sited across the country so that local factors in the production and utilization of agricultural products are considered in research programs.

To ensure that department research is co-ordinated with research in the provincial, university and industry sectors, and that the national research effort is responsive to needs, the branch uses three national advisory groups: the Canadian Agricultural Services Co-ordinating Committee; the Canadian Agricultural Research Council; and 17 Canada committees, each concerned with a specific commodity, discipline or subject area. Each of these groups has representation from the federal, provincial, university and industry organizations concerned.

Within the research programs, increasing emphasis is being placed on the breeding of new crop varieties; the efficiency of animal hybridization in the development of modern strains of animals and poultry; the protection of plants and animals from diseases, insects, and competing weeds; the culture of plants in a way that uses space, light, and nutrition with the greatest efficiency; the storage of primary products for off season demand and future export; and the utilization of agricultural production to provide Canadians with a greater variety of more appealing and nutritionally processed products.

As the petroleum sources of nitrogen for fertilizer manufacture become scarcer and more expensive, one new avenue of research will focus on the microbial fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. The fact that many leguminous crops naturally draw, or fix, nitrogen directly from the air challenges scientists to attempt to extend this symbiotic relation of plants and bacteria to other crops.

A program of soil classification and mapping being run co-operatively with the provinces is one of Agriculture Canada's most important activities. It will take many years to complete but is already providing useful information to planners who are attempting to improve the efficiency of land use. Only 5 per cent of Canada is improved farm land, and only about 2 per cent, or 20 million hectares, is available for future expansion, much of it marginal or located in less desirable climatic areas. In fact, the arable land of the Canadian north is one of the last agricultural resources still awaiting development. The department's staff is studying northern soil capacity, climate and crops.

Also being investigated are more efficient ways to use energy in agricultural operations and the possibility of saving energy by modifying cultural practices, even though at the farm level the industry is not a major user of gasoline.

In addition, research is being done on the use of waste products for methane production and the use of biological materials—biomass—as an energy source. Another program is to study the conversion of agricultural waste into animal feed.

Science activities in the Department of Agriculture include the activities of the economics branch which conducts research into the behaviour of economic and social variables affecting the agricultural industry, with particular emphasis on issues affecting policy development and implementation.

Research on animal diseases is carried on by the animal pathology division of the health of animals branch in Ottawa and at eight regional laboratories. In addition to studying the causative agents of animal diseases and methods of transmission, the division develops and improves tests for detecting diseases as well as producing diagnostic reagents and biological products for halting outbreaks of disease. Tests are also developed to qualify breeding stock and meats for export and to prevent the entry of foreign animal diseases into Canada.

The grain research laboratory at Winnipeg monitors and assesses the quality of cereal grains and oil seeds grown and marketed in Canada and also conducts research on quality related to the end-usage of these crops.

The production and marketing branch expects to continue its contributions at about $1 million in 1978-79 to provincial agencies, industry and universities to stimulate, develop, and adapt new agricultural crops and varieties for commercial production.

I should like to conclude by reference to some figures for the research program of the Department of Agriculture. In 1971 total expenditures were $50 million and for 1978-79 they will be $121.5 million. Of course, there is always room for disagreement on priorities. However, this must remain a matter of disagreement since we have not heard this evening the precise proportion the opposition recommends for agricultural research.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, it is a full year since the government's new restrictive policy on research and development was initiated. Tonight I wish to make a few personal and quite specific remarks about the effects of this policy, especially in the field of Canadian agriculture.

Research and Development

In the opening speech of this debate by my leader this afternoon he quite properly pointed out that agricultural research and development must have a much higher priority if only because of the obvious and very necessary association with human food production. He pointed out that Canada's capacity to produce food is one that will not run out but is truly a renewable resource. Those are facts that we should always remember.

At the food strategy conference in Ottawa last month, the agricultural producers took some obvious satisfaction out of one of the stated objectives of this much publicized conference which said that the conference was aimed at improving farmers' incomes and lowering food prices.

Peter Hannam of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and Dobson Lea, the new president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, were quick to point out the disparity or dilemma in this statement about improving farmers' incomes and lowering food prices. This is impossible, of course. One might argue that there is a very slim possibility of some improved efficiency, but farmers are getting sick and tired of being told to be more efficient. If you tried that approach on a cattleman who survived last summer's drought and who is not yet through a severe winter, you would get a very frosty and sarcastic answer. Nevertheless, it is possible to improve farmers' incomes and lower food prices through adequate research and development. This is really the only way it can be done.

While there is a definite place for contracting out some research occasionally at the expense of some in-house research, I make a plea tonight for a continuation of, and even stepped up support for, the research branch of our federal Department of Agriculture. I have been pretty well in touch with the Department of Agriculture's research activities in western Canada, especially for many years beginning in 1938 when I was a student at the Swift Current research station or, as we called it in those days, the experimental farm. Later the Lethbridge station became a favourite place to meet and visit, as well as the Manyberries sub-station, the only truly short grass cattle research station in Canada.

The new research building in Lethbridge must be the foremost of its kind in the world. It was jointly planned, financed and operated by the federal Department of Agriculture and the Alberta agriculture department, and, of course, it was officially opened last summer. It is a good example of federal and provincial agricultural forces working together.

The Lethbridge research station is ideally suited to cattle breeding research along with the Manyberries sub-station. This type of livestock research does not lend itself to contracting out to the private sector, essentially because its research projects take so many years to complete properly.

Southern Alberta now has approximately 500,000 acres of irrigation and more is being added every year as a result of the sprinkler techniques. The Lethbridge station has become the headquarters for all western research related to irrigated crops and the techniques of irrigating. In many respects this aspect of research and development is in its infancy—that is, dealing with irrigated crops and the technique of irrigating them.

Research and Development

There is a real need for alternative irrigated crops to the traditional ones such as sugar beets, edible garden crops like beans, peas, corn, carrots, onions, and so forth. The alternative is needed because of suddenly increased costs of specialty equipment in some of those earlier irrigated crops.

With suitable new grain varieties developed for irrigation, greater dollar returns are possible using standard grain seeding, cultivating and harvesting machinery. For example, there are now about 170,000 acres seeded to soft white spring wheat in the irrigation areas of southern Alberta. Most seed varieties for this soft white spring wheat come from Idaho; our growth season is just too short for these varieties. In addition, these imported varieties eventually become infected with mildew mutations that require a new southern Alberta variety. There is only one place they can possibly be developed and that is in the Lethbridge research station. Tremendous yields of this particular crop of soft white spring wheat of over 100 bushels per acre make the research worthwhile and necessary.

Soybean production under irrigation has never been good enough, at least in western Canada. New varieties for our latitudes are needed and needed now. The Faba bean has probably the greatest potential of any of our legumes presently under irrigation because of two important factors. First of all it has a very high protein content, being well over 30 per cent. Secondly, the nitrogen-fixing characteristics are the best of any of our legumes. But improved irrigated varieties are needed.

The same argument can be made for irrigated varieties of malting and feed barleys. There is a growing demand for the white malting varieties instead of the traditional blue malting varieties. There will always be a demand in the cattle feeding country of southern Alberta for high yielding barley grown by irrigation. In general there will be an increased demand for R and D in cereal breeding just to keep ahead of the disease problems in cereal grains grown with irrigation. As irrigation costs, energy costs and land costs continue to increase, it is only a matter of time until our systems of irrigation will have to change. By that I mean the methods of physically distributing the water. Research and development will point the way from present, open systems, which are very wasteful of water and very inefficient, to totally enclosed systems both for the total distribution system and for the individual farm.

The Lethbridge research station is a unique institution in Canada in many ways, not the least of which is its opportunity to serve Alberta's continually growing irrigation. This station's research budget should not be restrained.

On a related research subject I want to say a few words in support of the VIDO concept, meaning the Veterinary Infectious Diseases Organization. This is a new organization based in Saskatoon working in conjunction with the Western Veterinary College at the University of Saskatchewan. It has been set up for research on cattle, hogs and poultry in the disease field. It began in September 1975 and will eventually be staffed by about 50 research scientists and veterinarians. VIDO is already deeply involved in calf and pig scours, especially in those matters that need intensive research. In Alberta alone calf scours cost Alberta cattlemen $17 million in 1974. Losses to the Canadian beef and dairy industry comes to $74 million per year, which amounts to about $8.67 for each live calf born.

Here is how this worth-while institution has been financed so far: $2.2 million from the Devonian group of charitable foundations in Calgary; $1.87 million from the government of Alberta; $200,000 per year for five years of operation from the government of Saskatchewan, and it is in its third year now. In addition, the government of Saskatchewan has put up another $50,000 for expenses this year. I should point out that the Devonian grants are on a matching grant basis only up to 1982. Another $1.25 million will be on a declining matching basis. In addition there is some financing from other sources. For example, the Saskatchewan Veterinary Association gives $1,000 a year; the Manitoba Veterinary Association $200; the Alberta Veterinary Association $5,000; the Alberta Egg and Fowl Marketing Board $10,000; the B.C. Swine Breeders $250; and the B.C. Cattlemen $5,000. The Alberta Cattle Commission, which is the organization that makes the check-off from every cattle animal sold in Alberta, has subscribed $70,725 in ongoing projects up to now. It is very likely that they will continue to support VIDO in future on a project by project basis.

VIDO now needs operating funds. Considerably more are needed, something over $1 million a year for the next five years. Up until now the federal funding has been very, very limited. Surely the need here for funding is beyond question. Cattlemen fully recognize this by subscribing their own research dollars.

I want to close, Mr. Speaker, with a very brief tribute to a fine Canadian scientist who retired at the end of last year. I am referring to Dr. Bert Migicovsky. I want to recognize the contributions of Dr. Migicovsky who retired at the end of the year as director general of research in the Department of Agriculture, or he may have been known as the assistant deputy minister of research. At any rate, he was one of Canada's top agricultural scientists. His regular appearances before the Standing Committee on Agriculture over the last five years have become one of the highlights of that committee every year. His broad knowledge based on such wide experience, always expressed so forcibly, made those meetings very special occasions. There is no question but that we should salute him for a job well done at his retirement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to join with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) in paying tribute to Dr. Migicovsky, the recently retired assistant deputy minister of the research branch of Agriculture Canada, for the extremely fine job he has done there. He helped me a great deal in setting up my tours of the research laboratories of the agricultural departments across the country as well as those in Ottawa. He did a very fine job in helping me to understand the research that is going on in Agriculture Canada. I understand very few members have taken advantage of this opportunity, which is a shame since so much is talked about agricultural research and development. I think few have had a first-hand opportunity to learn what is going on in Canada.

I support in general the motion put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) this afternoon. There is no question that we have far from succeeded in the task of tackling industrial research and development in this country. I would differ with the Leader of the Opposition only in the details and strategy to pursue this goal. I agree with most of the speakers who have spoken today, with the exception of the extremely partisan and irresponsible comments made by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) as well as the recommendation from the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) to abolish the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. The news release of the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) on the estimates was an effort to try and elucidate exactly what was going on. Great care was taken to make sure the data were accurate. It is totally irresponsible to accuse the minister of being dishonest in his representation. If the hon. member for Athabasca would check to find out how those figures were arrived at I suggest he would see they are quite validly prepared and he may find that some of the assumptions he is making are erroneous, not those of the minister.

The suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre to abolish the Ministry of State for Science and Technology will not accomplish anything. The work that the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is doing is essential. The only question is where is that work to be done. Should it be done by a department or a ministry of state that is separate from the rest of the government branches, or should it be done in conjunction with one of the other departments, such as the Treasury Board secretariat or other policy areas of the government, including the Ministry of Finance which is also a policy setting department of the government? The work which is being done is valuable and necessary. It would have to be done in any event whether or not MOSST is abolished. His comments are extremely spurious and only politically motivated.

My main comments today will be directed toward industrial research and development. The major factor here is the make-up of industry in Canada.

I would like to quote some information from a Statistics Canada study that shows the degree of foreign ownership in this country. It was released just last month. Of almost 30,000 companies engaged in manufacturing, mining and forestry operations, essentially the business sector of our economy, 100 account for 46 per cent of business activity, almost half. Of that 100, 66 are foreign controlled.

Going through the top 1,000 companies of those 30,000, which represents roughly 3 per cent of the number of companies in the country, 57 per cent, or 572, are foreign controlled. These represent over one third of the companies of the top 1,000.

We only have a small percentage of the total number of companies in Canada, foreign owned and controlled, 5.5 per cent or 1,626 of the 29,812 companies. They are mostly concentrated in the top 1,000 and have a tremendous effect on the economy. It is therefore relatively easy to see from that that we need a different policy to deal with this sector of the economy as opposed to the balance of industry which is largely Canadian owned and controlled.

As mentioned during the debate today, there is a different motivation for the foreign based multinationals to do research and development in this country. There is absolutely no incentive for them to do it here. In many cases there are incentives not to do research and development in Canada but in the parent's country.

I have outlined many times some of the disincentives to do research and development in this country and some of the areas the Canadian government should tackle to reduce the level outside this country which we have to pay for in using the results of research and development done outside of Canada. To be positive and constructive as to how to tackle the situation, I suggest there be joint efforts with the foreign based multinational companies involved in the top 1,000 companies. This would mean about 500 companies. Discussions should be held with them to make sure they are fully aware of the situation in Canada. They should know it is not acceptable to have this very low level of industrial research and development conducted in Canada, this low level being concentrated in the foreign based multinationals.

We should try and agree on a fair rationale whereby industrial research and development is increased in Canada. Certainly the best way is the example of companies like General Electric or Pratt & Whitney, whereby the Canadian operations are made responsible for a product line worldwide and research and development for that product line. That is a very responsible attitude, one I would like to see encouraged.

The attitude of the three major automobile companies, Ford, General Motors and Chrysler, is totally unacceptable. They do absolutely no research and development in this country, yet the Canadian market represents 10 per cent of the North American market. It is justifiable in our case to have 10 per cent of the research and development of those three companies done in this country. Work is done primarily in the Detroit region. The environment in Windsor is no different from the environment in Detroit. Therefore, this could easily be accomplished without any loss of communications or other problems that may be raised as reasons why this should not be done.

It is irresponsible for the big three auto makers not to show their concern for fair practice in Canada as far as research and development is concerned. I admonish the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to tackle this problem seriously in the negotiations they have with the auto companies, especially with regard to the auto pact. This area was not negotiated in the past. It is an example of what is not done at present but what should be done.

We should find out the attitude of the various types of industries in this country. A year ago the Ministry of State for Science and Technology wrote to the largest 125 companies in the country and asked what they were doing and why. A lot of them, both Canadian and foreign based multinationals, were fairly responsible in their answer, interested and encouraged by the concern of the Canadian government.

There were some notable exceptions. I found it totally unacceptable and irresponsible when United States based multinationals said that they were doing their research and development in Houston and intended to leave it that way. That kind of attitude is completely insensitive to the realities in this day and age of the needs of both our countries. If we are to work co-operatively in this regard, we need a much more positive approach than that kind of crass, bald statement. The words I think of are not parliamentary. However, I think hon. members appreciate the sentiments I am trying to express.

The problem is being recognized and worked on at the policy level. I look forward to seeing very soon some concrete results of these efforts which have been presented, as the Minister of State for Science and Technology said in the debate today. I hope we will see some positive results in the not too distant future.

We have come a long way in the past decade in recognizing the problems in industrial research and development. They were spelled out by a Senate special committee on science policy. We have tried a variety of techniques to fully understand the whole problem and all of the nuances. We have come to the realization that the investment tax credit is the best way to handle this situation. It minimizes the amount of bureaucratic involvement. The decision is left to industry, as it should be in a free enterprise system. The only involvement of bureaucracy is in the taxation system of the end of the business year.

I agree with several comments made today to the effect that the amount of the investment tax credit is too low. It being a taxable item, as all National Revenue tax credits are, the real effect of a 5 per cent investment tax credit is only 2.6 per cent. That 2.6 per cent real benefit is of negligible use to industry. Therefore, to be effective as an incentive it has to be increased substantially.

I certainly agree with several sectors of industry that have recommended a 25 per cent level for the investment credit which, after taxes, would be in the order of 12 per cent or so. That is a reasonable incentive, one that governments can responsibly handle. I urge all members to encourage the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and his department to look very favourably on the suggestion in the next budget.

Miss MacDonald: Make it 100 per cent instead.

[Mr. Maine.]

Mr. Maine: I think a 100 per cent investment tax credit would be a very expensive proposition. Whereas I applaud the idea and the direction of the suggestion, it is somewhat irresponsible for us to assume the amount at this time, keeping in mind that we are trying to keep some serious kind of restraint on our budgetary and fiscal policy.

There is no question that we have to increase industrial research and development in this country. We can do it. I urge that we do it co-operatively with the foreign based multinationals. They have many reasons to be seriously interested in doing research and development in this country. There are many examples of good corporate citizens, but there are also many examples of those which are not good corporate citizens.

These problems should be tackled by the government of Canada. This is a very sensitive, serious and ticklish problem. Both the parent companies and the governments of parent companies must realize just how serious this problem is that we have to tackle. I notice it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to section (11) of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—PROPOSED RAISE IN RETIREMENT AGE—CAPPING OF INDEXED PENSIONS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on January 30 of this year I directed a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). There had been a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail that a document had been presented to the conference of federal-provincial finance ministers suggesting that a cap be placed on the indexing provisions applied to pensions paid to retired public servants and that there would be changes concerning the age of retirement. In reply, the minister indicated that proposals of this nature were not made to the conference. Nevertheless, a series of reports was carried subsequently in the press. Today, in response to a question from the opposition side, the President of the Treasury Board indicated that later this week he would be tabling the Alexander report on the public service retirement plan and that he would be making a statement at that time.

I believe there has been a great deal of misconception about the present superannuation plan for public servants. That superannuation plan account presently has in excess of $8.6 billion to its credit. Interest is being accumulated at a rate in excess of 7.6 per cent per annum, and the rate is increasing.

The basic fund is now being credited with interest at the rate of more than $650 million a year and the fund itself is increasing at a rate close to $1 billion a year. The fund of which I am speaking is used to pay basic rates of pensions.

There is, in addition, a supplementary retirement benefits fund which is supported by contributions of one per cent from the employer and the employee, out of which the indexed portion of pensions is paid.

The criticisms which are being made in many quarters relate to the actuarial soundness of the supplementary retirement benefits fund. If we look at the two funds together we see that there is very adequate provision made for the payment of benefits. The original actuarial calculations were made on the basis of a rate of 4 per cent. The yield today, as I said earlier, is in excess of 7.6 per cent.

A number of actuaries have looked at this fund and made projections which suggest it could be in difficulty in the future. In so doing they have had to make assumptions with regard to the rate of interest in the future, the rate of inflation, the age at which people are going to retire, and so on. On the basis of very unfavourable assumptions they could forecast difficulties; on the basis of a good combination of assumptions they could reach the conclusion—as I believe to be the case—that the plan is over-funded.

The fund as it now exists is more than adequate to pay for the basic pension rate and escalation. One of the complications which arise in the assumptions which actuaries are making relates to retirement age. It is the policy of the government of Canada to be a good employer. The superannuation scheme as it presently exists is a good plan and the objective of all of us should be to provide equal protection for all Canadians in order that the cost of living should not rob retired people year by year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: About 8 per cent of all Canadians have retired. They receive something like 5 per cent of our national income. All we are asking—and I am pleased to have the applause of hon. members on the other side—is that the same proportion of the national income should be afforded to retired people. They should have the same protection. The suggestion that the provision of the same amount of purchasing power throughout the years of retirement is something which would bankrupt Canada is one which I simply cannot accept.

All of us have looked at horrible examples of senior public servants retiring at age 55 with 30 years' service and getting pensions which are not reduced and which are escalated from the date of retirement. The particular examples which have been cited are very difficult to comprehend as such, but the overwhelming majority of thousands now retired—I believe over 80 per cent—are getting an average pension of about $6,000 a year. The actual pensions being paid are nowhere near the sums which have been cited in a few individual cases.

If we have to make a choice, over a long period there is a good case for saying that there is a limit to how far premature retirement at an early age can take place, but every effort must be made to protect those who are retired against the constant erosion of their incomes which inflation brings about. The priority must be to protect indexing so that those who are helpless and cannot look after themselves will not become victims of inflation. If the price of this is some sacrifice in the reduction of the age of retirement, I would be prepared to say that we could look at those provisions of the plan; but I would not be prepared to support any changes in the indexing provisions.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) has once again brought a subject of very deep concern to the attention of this House. We are all aware of his continued interest in the wellbeing of his constituents, including those who are members of the public service and who have retired from the public service after long and valued careers.

The hon. member has cited some very important figures on the subject of public service pensions. In view of the fact—and the hon. member mentioned this in his remarks—that the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has committed himself to making a public statement on this suject later this week in this House, I am sure the hon. member will understand the dilemma I am presently in. I do not wish to go too far on this subject. I ask the hon. member to show the patience he usually does. I am sure that on the day the President of Treasury Board makes his intervention on this subject the hon. member will have an opportunity to make further statements and to question the minister in this regard.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—REDUCTIONS IN HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT REASONS FOR CHANGE IN POLICY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for her reply to be found at page 3313 of Hansard for February 22, stating she would bring my suggestions to the attention of her colleagues across Canada. The minister went on to state, however, that each province is at a different stage in the development of extended health care, so she felt she could not impose minimum standards which were applicable under the hospital insurance and medical care programs.

The minister knows that under the Medical Care Act four criteria must be met. There must be 95 per cent coverage, quality of care, portability and comprehensive physicians' services. These criteria must be provided as insured services by participating provinces. The Medical Care Act empowers the government to include any additional health services under terms and conditions which may be specified by the governor in council. Let us settle that once and for all.

These additional health services are insured without exclusion. I hope I have made that abundantly clear. The reference is at page 270 of the Canada Year Book, 1969 under the heading "Public Medical Care". Since that time there have been changes—$20 per capita, tax points and the Canada Assistance Act—but in no way do they change those basic rules.

There are five types of health care. First, there is intensive care for people who are very ill. There is active treatment. Costs for active treatment run from $100 to over $200 per day. Patients are transferred as quickly as possible to chronic care at $40 to over $100. They are transferred from there to an extended care home, which runs to about $14.10 per day. We then have home care, which at the present time is on a trial basis. There are three pilot projects underway in the province of Ontario in three major cities, but what the results will be I do not know. In any event it is a patchy thing right now.

Home care is only for short periods, obviously designed to keep costs down. The transition is made as quickly as possible from stage one to stage four, keeping in mind the patient's condition. Many of the extended care homes do not have the necessary equipment for treating minor illnesses, or conditions such as emphysema or cardiovascular disease. They do not have the ability to render oxygen occasionally to bring up a patient's oxygen level. As a result, the patients have to be transferred back to the hospital under emergency conditions by ambulance with all the attendant increases in cost and inconvenience to the chronically ill.

This situation should be remedied without delay through the provision of a sick-bay in the extended care homes and trained personnel who know how to operate an oxygen tank safely. This surely could be done as it is now under the home care program with certain instructions, warning signs and intelligent personnel in charge. I hope I have made myself clear in this regard. I am sure the minister is an intelligent lady and will see that the act is carried out responsibly, cutting costs by efficient methods which will improve medical care without cutting quality.

There is one other thing I should like to add which is perhaps not relevant, and I apologize in advance. I do not believe court orders in respect of the production of a patient's history should be issued at any time except under extreme conditions. If a patient's chart is required the patient should be contacted and asked to sign a consent form. In that case the doctor can release the patient's case history. We must make every effort not to break up this relationship that exists between a doctor and a patient. If the relationship is broken up there will be a deterioration in respect of histories. No doctor who has been given information by a trusting patient will include that information in a case history, particularly if there is any danger that such information may be used adversely against that patient.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that the government is quite aware of the doctor-patient relationship and would certainly not like to see this hampered in any way. This is a point well taken by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard).

What the hon. member has pointed out is that there may in fact be a gap in services. Although he knows that the present plan provides for quality, portability and comprehensive service, there may in fact be gaps in carrying this out. The hon. member speaks from his extensive knowledge and experience about intensive care, active treatment, extended treatment, chronic care and home care. All these have to be kept in mind when we are considering the kind of health care citizens of Canada need, expect and are entitled to. The hon. member has made this very clear.

I am pleased to comment on the important concerns raised by the hon. member for Simcoe North. His continuing and learned support for the provision of high quality and cost-efficient health services, particularly for Canada's senior citizens, is well known to all members of the House of Commons.

This government, in collaboration with all provinces, has in recent years been promoting the development of alternative forms of health care so that the high costs and trauma associated with transferring patients to costly forms of hospital care can be avoided. The hon. member has pointed this out very well.

Detailed discussions have been held for a number of years about the possibility of increased federal financial support for lower cost forms of health care such as home care. These discussions culminated with the introduction, as of April 1, 1977, of the extended health care services program. Through this program the federal government provides a substantial financial contribution to assist provinces in the provision of many forms of lower cost health care.

Specifically, this new program provides all provinces with assistance in the provision of nursing home and adult residential care, home care, and ambulatory health care services. For example, this program encompasses the provision of home oxygen therapy for persons suffering from chronic heart diseases and emphysema. As well, the federal financial contribution will assist the provinces to provide renal dialysis in the home, rather than in expensive hospital settings.

I should like to make one other point. The licensing and inspection of hospitals, nursing homes and other institutions providing care to the sick and disabled is, of course, a provincial prerogative under our constitution, as is the responsibility to ensure that adequate standards are met. Nonetheless, the minister is always prepared to discuss with provincial counterparts such important matters as the standard of care to extended care patients in nursing homes. The technical advisers of the Department of National Health and Welfare also are available to provide assistance to provinces in developing programs and standards of care.

FISHERIES—SINKING OF TRAWLER "CAPE ROYAL"—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on August 9, 1977 the side trawler, the 132 foot side trawler, Cape Royal left Burgeo on the south coast of Newfoundland to go to Marystown in Placentia Bay, to the shipyard there for some work to be done on the vessel. She was not going out fishing. She was just travelling to Marystown for repair work. So she did not have a full crew. She had a captain and seven men on board. Now, that voyage, Mr. Speaker, normally takes something like 13 hours. She left around 6 p.m. on August 9. She should have been at Marystown by 10.30 a.m. the next day. For some unknown reason, Mr. Speaker—well, the reason is known. Fishing vessels do not usually report when they are going to arrive or where they arrive when they go out fishing. Apparently this tradition was kept up, although the vessel was only going to Marystown for repairs. Nobody apparently expected to hear from her when she got to Marystown. Nobody checked, Mr. Speaker, for 2½ days to see whether that vessel had reached Marystown or not.

When somebody did happen to call Marystown 2½ days later on Friday, August 12, they discovered that the vessel had never reached Marystown and she was lost. After an extensive search, all that was ever found, Mr. Speaker, was one lifeboat. It was found on August 17, and nothing else has ever been found. Now, of course, this is a case that called out for a public inquiry. Because radio station CKCM in Marystown and the people on the south coast were not getting any action from their member, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), and could not get any information from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), they contacted me.

On October 26 I put a motion under Standing Order 43 before the House, asking the House to direct the Minister of Transport to proceed immediately to appoint a public commission of inquiry into the loss of this side trawler and her crew, and into the adequacy of safety procedures and regulations governing transport by sea on the south coast of Newfoundland, with such inquiry to commence immediately and to report its recommendations as soon as humanly possible. The motion was not passed because an hon. member on the government side would not give it unanimous consent and said no.

On the same day I asked the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), in the absence of the Minister of Transport, whether an inquiry would be ordered. Well, eventually in December, Mr. Speaker, which was four months after the vessel sank, the Minister of Transport told me when I inquired of him that he was going to have a public inquiry; and I was able to pass that information on to the people of Newfoundland four months after this vessel was lost with all hands. However, from December there was still no one appointed in January; no one was appointed to the inquiry in February. But now, finally on March 1, a commissioner has been appointed to hold this inquiry, Judge Rupert Bartlett of the District Court in Newfoundland. So some seven months after the vessel was lost the commissioner is finally appointed, and he is going to start his work in the inquiry on April 4, 1978, eight months after this vessel and all her crew were lost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is an inexcusable delay, in my opinion an unnecessary delay. There is no reason for this. But another thing I have to point out is that I was the man who initiated the questions, the Standing Order 43's, and the private discussions with the Minister of Transport. The minister issued a release on March 1 but did not even send me a copy. I was not given the courtesy by the minister of a copy of that release or the information that the commissioner was appointed. It is a scurvy kind of behaviour.

The minister is morose. He is as morose as a moulting mule. He is some kind of a sorehead that he would not give a member of the House of Commons the courtesy of sending him a release when an appointment was made like that. I had spoken to him three or four times in that connection, but at last, finally, this inquiry is underway. Hopefully it will recommend better safety procedures on the south coast of Newfoundland and recommend that fishing vessels and all vessels should report when they leave the harbour and when they arrive at their destination, and should report every day so that this kind of an incident where a vessel is missing for two and a half days and nobody knows that it is missing will not happen. In that case it was not known until a phone call was made at Marystown by a relative of one of the crew who discovered that the vessel was not even there. Of course, It would even be that much better if the inquiry can find out why the vessel was lost.

While I have this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the fund raising committee for the Cape Royal disaster fund—their spokesman is Mr. George Coley who, I believe is from Burgeo-Ramea on the south coast—has collected $134,000 for the lost eight crew members on that vessel. Of course, their families also get workmen's compensation and compensation of that nature. Donations came from all over Newfoundland and from parts of Nova Scotia. In the old Newfoundland tradition a fund is being started, and this $134,000 will be used to help the six widows and 17 dependent children. It is a very, very sad affair and I cannot understand why we had to wait for eight months for the inquiry to even commence. There is an inquiry into the William Carson which I do not think has reported as yet, but in that case there was not even loss of life. Here eight lives were tragically lost.

In connection with safety around the coast of Newfoundland, the question arises as to what the minister is doing with icebreaking services for Newfoundland. The Canadian government has six heavy icebreakers. Three of them are stationed in Quebec City and three are stationed in Dartmouth; and here is Newfoundland, in the middle of the Arctic ice, in the middle of the ice that comes through the straits of Belle Isle, through Labrador down our north east coast, and we have one medium icebreaker in St. John's, the Sir Humphrey Gilbert, and one icebreaking cable vessel, John Cabot, which is supposed to watch the patrolling of cables off Newfoundland in the Atlantic. So there are three in Quebec and three in Dartmouth, when they should be in St. John's, Newfoundland.

We have two more large icebreakers under construction. One will be commissioned on July 1 of this year. I think they were built in Vancouver. That icebreaker will go to Quebec. We have a second one under construction which will be in service in 1979, and that vessel is to go to the Halifax-Dartmouth area. Why is it that everything in the Department of Transport is so patently political? There are four heavy icebreakers to be stationed in Dartmouth, one medium icebreaker in St. John's, four in Quebec. What is up, Mr. Speaker? These icebreakers should be stationed in St. John's where they are close to the scene of the action, where they are needed off the coast of Newfoundland.

I want to ask the minister to do something about that and to improve safety and the icebreaking capability of his forces off the coast of Newfoundland by stationing at least two more heavy icebreakers in St. John's or some other suitable port in Newfoundland. If Gander were a port—it would get these icebreakers, but Gander is not a port—so perhaps St. John's can have some hope. I would like the minister's apology. He is not here tonight—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has run over his time.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to say to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) that I think the matter he has raised is in fact a serious matter, as he has pointed out. He has also made some very serious representations, particularly with regard to safety and the whole question of the use of icebreakers and where they should be located. I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) will take notice of this because the representation appears to be well founded.

It is unfortunate that the hon. member did not receive a copy of the news release of February 28, which I assume is the one he is referring to. I am sure it was an oversight and was not done deliberately.

The Cape Royal, a 132-foot side trawler of 350 tons gross tonnage, sailed from Burgeo on what should have been a 15-hour voyage to Marystown, Newfoundland, where she was to undergo refit. In preparation for drydocking, all her fishing gear had been removed and when she sailed the vessel was without ballast or ice. Eight persons were on board, all of whom are presumed lost.

In brief, the sequence of events appears to have been as follows. First, at 1820 hours local time on August 4, 1977, the Cape Royal left Burgeo. Second, at 1920 hours that same day, the Cape Royal called the fishing vessel Gulf Gerd but when the latter replied she received no answer. This was the last time any message was received from the Cape Royal. Third, that the vessel was overdue was not realized until 1620 hours on August 12, when a routine message from Burgeo to Marystown concerning her refit drew attention to the fact that the Cape Royal had not arrived. A check with St. Pierre established that she had not taken shelter in that area. Fourth, at 1905 hours on August 12, traffic control centre in St. John's was advised that the Cape Royal was overdue. Search and rescue operations were put in hand immediately.

Nothing has been seen or heard of the missing men to date. The vessel's overturned lifeboat was located on August 17, the indication being that it had not been launched, and two life rings were subsequently found ashore in the St. Bride's area of the Avalon Peninsula. The exact cause of the casualty could not be determined, but the absence of any distress signals and the apparent failure to make use of the lifesaving equipment would seem to indicate that disaster struck suddenly. No further wreckage has been located despite extensive search, and it now seems unlikely that anything further will be found. In consequence, the coast guard commissioner recommended to the minister that a formal investigation be ordered.

As you may be aware, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport announced February 28, 1978 that there would be a public inquiry into the disappearance of the trawler Cape Royal to begin in St. John's, Newfoundland. As was pointed out by the hon. member, on April 4, 1978 Judge Rupert W. Bartlett of the district court of Trinity-Conception has been appointed commissioner and Eric C. Facey, of Gander, will be commission counsel.

I realize that a lot of time has passed since this most unfortunate accident, but at least now something is going to be done by way of an inquiry which I hope will clarify matters for the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:28 p.m.

STATUS OF WOMEN

EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN IN PUBLIC SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in light of recent representations made through my office on behalf of the more than 100,000 women who are employed in the public service with regard to their concern over the "job ghetto", which has increased from 68.2 per cent in 1972 to 78.8 per cent, they continue to work in—in spite of the minister's assurance that "the government has taken steps . . . to try to improve opportunities for women in the public service"—and in light of the fact that of all the women in the public service, over 33,000 or about one-third, earned less than $10,000, in comparison with less than 10 per cent of the men, and that the Advisory Council on the Status of Women stated in its most recent annual report with regard to the appointment of women, "this inaction calls into question the government's commitment to equal opportunity for women in Canada", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission immediately review each department's five-year plan of action to ensure no further erosion of the advancement of women, to upgrade the salaries and responsibilities of women in the public service and to report back to the House on a new plan of action within 30 days.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT URGED TO ACT ON RECOMMENDATIONS OF ADVISORY COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is one with which I am sure all hon. members will agree. I hope they will permit it to be passed. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House takes note of the fact that this is International Women's Day and calls on the government to act forthwith on the recommendations made recently by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, particularly in terms of employment, training for skilled occupations, appointments to management positions, and pension equality, and this House expresses the hope that in the next parliament the number of women members will be substantially increased.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGE CAUSED TO AQUATIC FAUNA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move an important motion of pressing necessity.

In view of the activities of the Canadian army in Quebec during January 1978; considering that such activities violate the legislation and regulations governing fishing and hunting, the quality of the environment and wildlife conservation; since no permission had been requested to do so, taking into account the considerable damage caused by dynamiting, manoeuvres of tanks and other heavy military equipment; and since these were clearly provocative activities owing to existing tensions between the federal government and the Quebec government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the federal government officially apologize to the Quebec government for such disorderly and irresponsible activities of a Canadian army force and that all damages incurred be paid.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ADMONITION FOR BELOW-STANDARD NEWS COVERAGE OF DISASTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the rules of Standing Order 43. It arises from the CBC coverage of the Pacific Western plane crash at Cranbrook, B.C.—coverage which combined the worst aspects of sensationalism, irresponsibility and inaccuracy. The problems in the initial reporting were compounded by the later announcement of the story on "Front Page Challenge" when it was categorically stated that the airplane crashed while trying to avoid a snow-plow which was on the runway. This statement was made well in advance of the completion of the inquiry by the Ministry of Transport.

I seek to move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That this House admonish the CBC for reporting well below the standard expected of the Crown corporation and urge that it review its procedures in reporting disastrous accidents.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be made at this time only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

APPARENT DISCRIMINATION IN APPLICATION OF OFFENSIVE WEAPONS PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the fact that when, in 1972, the police in the province of Quebec charged six Cubans with unlawful possession of machine-guns, the federal government intervened to get the charges dropped and then apologized to the Cubans involved. In view of the fact that under present gun control laws many Canadian citizens are subject to charges for merely possessing a firearm in contravention of the regulations—without, I might add, any chance of the same treatment accorded the Cubans—I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House repudiate restrictions which infringe on the rights of Canadians at a time when the government apparently neglects the use of much more offensive weapons by foreigners resident in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—PROSPECTUS TO BE FILED WITH U.S. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take up with the Minister of Finance an answer he gave me yesterday when he said he did not expect the government would be giving the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States any new information which was not already available to the Parliament of Canada.

My clear understanding is that the SEC requires that any government going to them, as the Government of Canada proposes to go to them, must give details of its budgetary and fiscal position for the current year. In other words, it would appear that the government of Canada would be required to disclose Canada's 1979 budgetary position. Will the minister tell us now whether the government, in filling out its prospectus to an agency of another country, will be setting out in detail such matters as estimated economic growth, any changes in fiscal policy which may have resulted from the first ministers' meeting, and the anticipated budgetary deficit?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I verified this problem with my officials and they have assured me that there is no information that is required by the filing of that prospectus with the SEC that has not been made public already in Canada.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could address himself to the specific question I put to him, as to whether or not the government of Canada will be detailing the growth estimates for 1979, any changes in fiscal policy resulting from the agreements reached at the first ministers' meeting, and the anticipated government deficit. Will those matters be part of the prospectus given to the SEC?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the way I replied to the question covered all those points, Mr. Speaker. I said—and I repeat—that there is no information which will be given to this organization that is not public information. I verified this fact this morning with my deputy minister and other officials and they have assured me of that.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We will see, when the time comes, whether the minister is more forthcoming to an agency of a foreign government than he is to the House of Commons of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: But on the question of the minister's very unusual reluctance to bring in his first budget as Minister of Finance, given the fact that now, after the first ministers' meeting, the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Ontario yesterday brought down budgets, and given the fact that the treasurer of the province of Ontario has been asking the government of Canada to prove its sincerity in the discussions at the first ministers' meeting, will the minister explain to the House of Commons why he is not acting now on the agreement of the first ministers' conference and why, in light of the dollar situation that gets worse every day, he continues to add to the uncertainty of our economic policy by refusing to bring in a budget? Will he tell us when he intends to bring in a budget for the people of Canada.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member would not want me to present the same type of budget that was presented yesterday, when the Ontario government increased taxes. The Leader of the Opposition is asking us to cut taxes. I think some notes should be compared in that party.

On the question of the Canadian dollar, I was very pleased yesterday to hear the man who shows a lot of responsibility as treasurer of the government of Ontario say that he likes the Canadian dollar as it is. I can see that the view of the Ontario administration, vis-à-vis the Canadian dollar which makes Canadian goods more competitive, is acceptable to Ontario. But, of course, it is not acceptable to the official opposition.

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The sadness for Canada is that we have a federal Minister of Finance who continues to refuse to accept his responsibility to provide some economic leadership to the country. The ministers of finance of other jurisdictions are prepared to act on the agreements of the first ministers' conference. This minister continues to play games and evade bringing in a budget.

Will the minister now confirm to the House of Commons that he has let it be known to private groups with whom he has been meeting that the question of when a budget will be brought before the House of Commons of Canada is now out of his hands and has been turned over to the Prime Minister and his political advisers; and that that decision will be taken on the basis of the political interests of the Liberal party and not the economic requirements of this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, about five weeks after I became Minister of Finance, I brought into this House what I call an economic statement; some call it a mini-budget and others call it a budget. It took me less than five weeks to change the economic policies of the government. In that statement I provided a stimulative stance for the Canadian economy in 1978 to the tune of $3 billion. That started on January 1, 1978.

I think it is only common sense that I should wait to see what the effect will be before I bring down a budget. I said that there will be a budget. There will not be a budget, however, until I have had time to assess the stimulative stance I took in my economic statement of October 28. I will not write a budget because the hon. member wants me to bring down a budget; I will have a budget when it is time to have one.

● (1422)

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—BORROWING TO SUPPORT RATE OF EXCHANGE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my follow-up question to the Minister of Finance relates to the $200 million he indicated the government intends to take down, or has taken down in respect of our $1.5 billion line of credit with Canadian chartered banks. Will he indicate if the government have taken down any further funds, or have they made any initial preparations to take down further funds in respect of this credit, in order to support our dollar?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said at the time I made the announcement about the first $200 million that if there were to be further drawings from that facility in the marketplace, it would be indicated at the time we publish the reserve figures at the beginning of next month.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the government has acknowledged that a falling dollar triggers inflation, is the minister aware that in the three months ending January, Canada had the highest three-month annualized inflation rate of any of our major trading partners: higher than the United Kingdom, the United States, Japan and Germany? If he is aware of that, will he indicate whether the government is totally indifferent to the decline in the dollar and, in fact, is saying a lower dollar is good—inflation be damned?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when the figures on inflation were published early last month, we say that the inflation rate had dropped from 9.5 to 9 per cent. We are still confident that we shall fulfill our objectives, namely a rate of inflation of about 6 per cent by the end of 1978.

STATUS OF WOMEN

GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME FOR SINGLE-PARENT FAMILIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the status of women. In view of the fact that 200,000 women in Canada are single parents, one-third of whom are living at or below the poverty level, and in view of the fact that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women recommended eight years ago that the federal government institute a guaranteed annual income for single-parent families with dependent children, will the minister tell us when such a program will finally be implemented?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, the proposal of the government is to institute an income supplementation program that would not be aimed only at single-parent families with children, but at all families with children and at people of an age between 55 and 65.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Such a proposal was discussed with the provinces in the course of the social security review. There have been differing views expressed by the provinces. My successor is currently studying this matter, examining whether there are various alternatives to implementing such a proposal. The exact time when these studies will be concluded and when we will have the financial resources to put this particular proposal into effect is a matter that will be considered by cabinet at a later stage.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, the minister is quite right in saying he is having difficulty getting this expanded program accepted by the provinces. I was referring to a particular, narrow program involving single-parent families headed by women. We could have achieved more progress in that regard. Because of the concerns expressed that women are not receiving proper attention under government programs and planning, the cabinet issued a directive in 1976 entitled "Integration of Women's Concerns into Policy and Program Development", which was to be monitored by the co-ordinator on the status of women. Why has there been no accounting to date of the progress that has been made? Will the minister table the report, or is he too embarrassed about the results?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Mr. Speaker, there is no embarrassment about the results as such. There has been no formal report on this particular subject. This is a matter of continuing concern. The co-ordinator on the status of women has been in touch with all departments of the federal government. She is working on a regular basis with the department, seeing that the directive of the cabinet in this respect is being implemented by the various departments.

At the level of the cabinet committee and the cabinet itself, I am charged with the responsibility to see that those particular concerns are taken into account in cabinet decisions. In that respect, there is no formal report that has been written and none will be forthcoming. It is a matter of current and continuing concern which arises on every issue as it comes before parliament or as important decisions are taken by various departments. So it is a matter that is integrated into the current operations of government. We are trying, in every policy decision, to make sure that these concerns are taken into account.

• (1427)

Mr. Symes: That is a disappointing reply, because we have no way of knowing just what progress is being made, when we cannot have the information.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

PROGRAMS TO UPGRADE SKILLS OF WOMEN

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I view of the fact that the unemployment rate among women is 17 per cent, when the hidden unemployed are taken into account, and that the minister recently indicated that of the $450 million for the employment strategy fund, $48 million would go for native programs and $117 million for youth programs, can the minister enlighten us as to how much will be spent on programs meeting women's needs, especially in light of the report on the status of women which states that in the minister's own departmental programs women are underrepresented in the apprenticeship and skilled programs that are available?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not pretend to have all the statistics at my fingertips, but I should point out to the hon. member that in the upgrading and language courses the percentage is about 54 per cent for women. In the skilled courses the figure is 40 per cent for women. In the managerial and administrative courses it is 34.5 per cent for women.

I believe I indicated earlier that under our Canada Works Program the percentage of participation of women is actually higher than the percentage of women in the labour force. That is not to say we are satisfied with those statistics; that is why there are programs like Affirmative Action which convince firms to do upgrading and to give training courses to move women into their untraditional forms of employment. All these things are necessary. I think most assuredly that day-care centres to give women an equal opportunity to participate in the work force could be improved upon.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGE CAUSED TO AQUATIC FAUNA BY CANADIAN FORCES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister say whether he was aware of the manoeuvres of the Canadian forces in Quebec during an exercise of the Canadian detachment of the allied forces of NATO and would he say to what extent these manoeuvres were authorized?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): I have had questions on this matter from the hon. member for Pontiac and other hon. members on this side who have expressed concern. There is no need for concern. This is normal training for the Canadian armed forces prior to deployment to the Arctic Express exercise in Norway. It has taken place in the past with the permission of the licensee, who in this case is the E.B. Eddy Company.

The local conservation officers are aware of this situation and some concern was expressed this year—in January, I believe. As soon as that concern was expressed, the operations were stopped. We then asked if they wanted the training discontinued, but the conservation officers did not want that. Inspections were made and it appears there was no damage to wildlife—animals, fish or beast.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I understand very well that there are such manoeuvres but they take place under an agreement with the authorities concerned. As there was apparently no such agreement in that case, could the minister tell us now whether he has received official complaints from government authorities in Quebec and what he intends to do to deal with this conflict, given the impact of these incidents?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no conflict. Authority has been received from the licensee who has the cutting rights there. I think it would be appropriate for future operations to have such a clearance with the province of Quebec, in view of the fact that it could affect—although it has not affected—game and wildlife. There is no conflict whatsoever.

STATUS OF WOMEN

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my questions relate to concern about women in the work force. I have an additional problem. A moment or two ago a ministerial briefing book was put on my desk: it seems to be a briefing book for the minister responsible for the status of women. I expect one of these books shortly, but I may have to wait for an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): While giving the minister time to review his music, I would like to pose a question relating to the same matter to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A few days ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration issued a report refuting some of the serious concerns raised by a group of women in the public service about growing discrimination and non-application of equal opportunity programs. In his somewhat fragmented reporting of statistics from his department, the minister gave statistics only for the CR-5 group and omitted, noticeably, CR-6 and CR-7 as well as the important categories of PM and AS. Can the minister indicate whether substantial progress has been made in those areas, as indicated by the general nature of his press release? While he is on his feet, can the minister also indicate whether the 44 acting appointments of females which were made on a temporary basis were made permanent? What percentage later became permanent appointments?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the release was not to refute that which was said by the group referred to by the hon. member, but to put it into some kind of perspective. A suggestion had been made that there were none in the SX category and none in managerial roles, and that there were no women in charge on the Immigration Appeal Board staff. In response to that suggestion, we felt we should put some of the counterstatistics on the record, and in effect that is what was done.

With respect to the particular categories to which the hon. member has referred, the odds are that we have not improved in those areas. That is probably why that was not included in my report. However, I would be very happy to check it out to see what the situation is. I do not have at my fingertips information regarding movement from temporary to permanent positions, but I will check that out.

REQUEST FOR ANNUAL REPORTS ON EFFICACY OF EQUAL OPPORTUNITY PROGRAMS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, now that the minister responsible for the status of women has had a chance to review his notes, and because of his over-all responsibility since 1974 for implementing equal opportunity programs for women and the commitment made in the fall of 1975 with respect to reviewing, on an annual basis, the progress being made in various government departments and Crown corporations, can the minister indicate why no yearly accounting has taken place?

Very obviously, the Minister of Employment and Immigration is interested in trying to set the record straight. When can the minister responsible for the status of women give us a firm indication that we will have a comprehensive report so that doubt, uncertainty or anxiety on the part of women presently employed in the public service will not continue?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for returning my documents. I am glad that there is at least one hon. member opposite who returns documents that do not belong to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I want to assure the hon. member that reports which have been requested of all departments have been filed and have been received by Treasury Board. Treasury Board has assigned officers to review these reports with the individual departments to see whether further improvements can be made in terms of plans. I will be glad to see what information can be made public in this respect, in addition to all the information which is being made public by the Public Service Commission on an annual basis and also in appearances before the parliamentary committee.

If Treasury Board can also provide additional information to the hon. member when the estimates come, I will certainly be very happy to help: and I am sure my colleague will be very happy to make that information available. At the present time, these reports are being reviewed with individual departments by officials of Treasury Board.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate why he feels it has been necessary to keep these annual reports secret? There is very real interest and concern that people in the public service, and the public generally, have in the leadership the federal government can provide in this area. Will the minister make a firm commitment that the reports will be made public? He shows no reluctance in issuing plans of action and making general statements public.

Will he give us that information, particularly because of the offhand remarks of his colleagues, including the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, about women being marginal or of secondary importance to the work force? What steps is the minister taking to clear up the very great disservice these ministers are doing the women of this country?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I think the greatest disservice that could be done, not only to the women of this country but also to the cause of women generally and the cause of honesty in politics, would be to make the kind of statement the hon. member has made about my three colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I challenge the hon. member to indicate a single instance in which any of those three colleagues of mine have made any statement of the kind referred to by the hon. member. I hope the hon. member will stop peddling that kind of stuff, because I believe he is an honest man.

With regard to the question, the hon. member knows those documents are not under my control or responsibility. I will be glad to raise the matter with my colleagues. I think this matter should, indeed, be further examined and, if possible, I would be very glad to see those documents tabled or made available to a parliamentary committee when the secretary of the Treasury Board appears. I will explore this matter.

INDUSTRY

CONSTRUCTION OF FLOATING DRY DOCKS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It arises from the growing sense of urgency about resolving the problem of the construction of floating dry docks on both the east coast and the west coast. Because there is a potential buyer—either the province of Nova Scotia or a Canadian shipping company—and because of the uncertainty which still surrounds the finalization of the sale, I wonder if the minister or his colleague could give the House an indication of the stage the government's plans have reached or the stand of the department involved with respect to replacing the floating dock, particularly at Halifax but on the west coast as well.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I said some time ago, my department is carrying out a study on where best to assist the development of large and small dry dock facilities on the east coast. Until that study is completed, I really think I should not comment.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This matter has been before the government for three or four years. In light of the urgency, will the minister indicate to the House when he expects to receive this report and when, having received the report, he expects to make a decision? I ask this question because some 1,400 jobs are directly involved at the port of Halifax.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I expect the report very soon, and as soon as I get the report the decision will be made rather quickly thereafter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON BELGRADE REVIEW MEETING OF HELSINKI FINAL ACT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs when we in this House can expect a comprehensive report on the Belgrade Review Meeting of the Helsinki Final Act.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to say with precision, but the meetings ought to conclude within the next few days, although that is by no means certain. As quickly after that as it is possible to assemble a full and comprehensive report, I will be glad to make it available to hon. members in whatever is the most appropriate forum.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT OF YUKON

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, based on a story in this morning's Globe and Mail indicating that a proposal was made by the minister, secretly, late last week to the executive committee of the Yukon territorial government and to the Council of Yukon Indians with respect to setting up a public inquiry which will be charged with inquiring into constitutional development.

Will the minister explain whether the story is accurate and, if it is, why there was this gross intrusion into the affairs of the people of the Yukon who should make these decisions through their elected representatives in their own assembly?

• (1442)

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that last fall I met with the members of the Territorial Council and we discussed the question of the next phase of constitutional development. I told them at that time that I felt we should focus on a process which could lead us in that direction. I promised the Council that I would give it some thought, discuss the matter with my colleagues and come back to them with a proposed process. That is what I did Friday of last week in Whitehorse. I am awaiting a response from them.

Mr. Nielsen: The article goes on to stipulate one of the considerations and says that such a public inquiry created by the federal ministry, instead of by the elected assembly of the Yukon, will create a resource revenue-sharing program with one-third of resource revenues going to the native people in the Yukon, one-third to the other 80 per cent of the population of the Yukon, and one-third to the federal government.

Does the minister not realize that such a proposal, including federal intrusion by setting up such an inquiry, is furthering the creation of an apartheid situation in the Yukon, and by such a suggestion he is encouraging the inevitable result of seriously imperilling the pipeline legislation which is now before the committee?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I categorically reject the piece of alarmism that my proposal on Friday will in any way jeopardize, compromise or affect the pipeline. I think it is irresponsible for the hon. member to make that sort of suggestion. Secondly, he knows as well as I do that we are both trying to work toward avoiding any form of apartheid in the Yukon. Dean Lysyk drew to our attention that a fracturing is taking place there. I am trying to find a process that will abridge that fracturing. I would hope to have the hon. member's support in that effort.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the minister will have my support, as he has all along, with respect to the avoidance of an apartheid situation in the Yukon, which I suggest he is furthering. The only method by which he can circumvent that situation is adopting the policy which has been expressed on this side of the House by our leader and create a province of the Yukon. That will solve his problem. Will the minister consider that?

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

STEPS TAKEN TO AVERT STRIKES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General rose in his place in this House yesterday and said, concerning the Post Office:

> I think everything is being done to avoid a strike. I can tell you, sir, that if we have a strike at this moment, it would not be our responsibility. Everything, as far as management is concerned, is being done to avoid it—

In view of that, could the minister now tell the House when the CUPW first made its contract proposals, when the department first responded in detail to these proposals, and why the conciliation process has not yet started?

[Translation]

Hon. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the question put by the hon. member for Nickel Belt is very clear. As everyone knows very well, we are now at the conciliation stage and each party is discussing what clauses may or may not be negotiated. As soon as that matter is resolved, conciliation as such can start, which should be within about a week.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Postmaster General's answer reveals a complete lack of knowledge of what is taking place with respect to the negotiations within the department, in view of the fact the union first made its proposals to the department ten months ago, in April, 1977, and to this day the Post Office Department has not responded to those proposals of the union, and in view of the fact that after requesting and having the union agree to conciliation in November, 1977, the department turned around in January and asked for a delay so they could respond to the union's proposals of ten months earlier, could the minister tell the House just how this lack of response and record of inaction constitutes the fact that management is doing everything it can?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I think we are doing everything we can. It might be useful for the hon. member for Nickel Belt to know exactly what I have done in the last month. I have met with all the union leaders. I have met with top management. The GLT agreement has been exercised and we do not have any rotating strikes at the moment. We have nominated the president of the conciliation board. The Hubling commission is reacting now concerning the horror stories of last December.

We have visited many plants in Toronto and other places and talked to the workers. I have repeatedly invited CUPW to come and talk with us. I have even invited the president, Mr. Parrot, to discuss his "pet baby", which is the establishment of a Crown corporation. I said to him, "We will discuss it together". Up to now we have had only refusals.

SOCIAL SECURITY

PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—REQUEST GUARANTEES BE GIVEN CONCERNING USE OF FUNDS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, the minister signed an agreement with the provinces on the block funding of social services.

As the Saskatchewan Social Services Minister stated that there is no guarantee that the money will be spent by the provinces on social services and not, for instance, on roads, I ask the minister whether, in addition to the provisions of the agreement requiring that the provinces publish a report on the money paid to the provinces by the federal government, the minister can give this House any guarantee that the money paid to the provinces by virtue of the block funding formula will in fact be spent on social services?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the House of the agreement reached yesterday by the ministers responsible for provincial social services and by the federal government, an agreement which aims at block funding of social services and grants to the provinces all the flexibility and autonomy in what relates to decisions, priorities, resource allocation and so on. Since the provinces have control over that type of decisions, it goes without saying that we agree.

The hon. member's question will certainly surprise his New Democratic Party colleagues as I cannot see how the government of Saskatchewan would fear that funds given to that province for social services might be used for road construction. I think this kind of accusation could lead us to believe that the provinces have no commitment whatsoever towards social services and that consequently the funds will be dilapidated. It means that federal-provincial relationships are not based on trust and therefore, I am not sure I understand the hon. member's question.

The agreement is based on three conditions: one relates to the resident status and provides that Canadians and landed immigrants are eligible for all services, and another to the data concerning future developments in that area. Besides, we will sign an agreement concerning the role the federal government will play in financing services and a mechanism will be established within the next five years which, should a problem arise, would allow me to give notice and end the program.

Mr. Grafftey: It is quite regrettable that the minister does not understand my question since it is of the utmost importance that we know if the money granted by the federal government is actually spent by the provinces on social services. I ask this supplementary question because in the past, for instance, the money granted to the provinces by the Secretary of State in Ottawa for education in the second language was used for entirely different purposes. Let us say that after one year, a province says that the money granted under the agreement signed yesterday was not spent on social services but for other purposes. Could the minister tell the House if other provisions of the agreement that she has signed yesterday with the provinces provide that in addition to provisions related to the needs of the provinces, they have to explain how they have spent that money? What guarantees and what powers does the minister have to correct the situation where money would not be expended for social services?

[English]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, there are three grounds on which payments to the provinces can be withheld. I do not think the best way to start reciprocal agreements is by talking about but not believing in Canada and Canadians. That is certainly not the case on this side of the House. This agreement is an historic one, on several counts. Among other things, it gives—at a very critical time for the economic situation of this country—a five-year guarantee on a ten-year proposal for payments escalated according to population, for the benefit of a very vulnerable sector of this country. The current budget of $516 million for social services will, in ten years' time, be approximately $1.9 billion. That is the extent of the federal commitment to social services, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

REQUESTED LOWERING OF IMPORT RESTRICTIONS ON CHEESE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Due to the fact that an announcement should be made shortly on the dairy policy for next year, and also the fact that there will be increased facilities in Canada for the manufacture of specialty cheeses, will the minister confer with his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and have the import restrictions on cheese lowered for the next dairy year by 15 million pounds, as requested by the dairy industry?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we think the quota we have at the present time is realistic. We know that production and consumption of cheese has increased substantially in Canada, especially in the last two years. There are three cheese manufacturers and processors from other parts of the world considering locating in Canada: one in Prince Edward Island, one in Quebec and one in Ontario. Our producers can provide enough for them to produce the high quality special cheeses that these industries intend to produce.

We are quite satisfied that we have adequate controls at the present time to allow our industry to develop. If other entrepreneurs want to take hold of things and go ahead and produce the cheese that we know they have the ability to produce, they can compete with imported products.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the answer of the minister. It is another indication that he is failing to look after the people that he was given the job of looking after.

AMOUNT SPENT IN PROMOTING SKIM MILK POWDER

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It is prompted by his actions and the reasons given for the abrupt removal of the skim milk powder subsidy, meaning a loss of some $13 million. What advertising or promotional programs, if any, were carried out by the government to encourage greater utilization by lower income groups of that product, bearing in mind that the minister's own agency, the Canadian Dairy Commission, had a budget of $4 million to spend on advertising and promotion. What portion of that $4 million was spent in promoting skim milk powder?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say how much was spent to promote skim milk powder. I am sure we all recognize that Canadian society was never more educated with regard to the fact that skim milk powder is a highly nourishing type of food and was put on the market at a very cheap price. That knowledge was available to all. Surveys show that some of the people who are the greatest users of skim milk powder did not read either one of the official languages, but they knew the value of it.

The ads were provided by the supermarkets and the dairy industry promoting this product. The people who use skim milk powder to the greatest extent are not those for whom the subsidy was intended. Continued use of skim milk powder is taking place in the upper income groups; therefore, it is contrary to what the whole policy was for.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, obviously the minister has not answered my question. Will he reconsider his decision and give serious consideration to providing a subsidy to regions of the country with high unemployment or those regions where the wage rate is lower than the national average? Also, will he make available to us the study on which he based his decision to discontinue the program?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the study was made by Statistics Canada. With regard to the use of skim milk powder in the far reaches of Canada, that is not only being considered by my department but by other departments. They know that this is the easiest way to ship this highly nutritious food, skim milk powder, which contains so many of the minerals that are necessary for those in our society to survive. Therefore, we are doing that very thing.

SPORTS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ASSIST CERTAIN CITIES TO OBTAIN NHL FRANCHISE

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

In view of the fact that the minister has publicly indicated that she hoped Quebec City, Winnipeg and Edmonton would obtain NHL franchises, and that the Quebec Nordiques announced yesterday that they would apply very shortly for such a franchise, could the minister advise the House whether the government would accept to grant financial assistance to these cities and help them meet the NHL requirements as to the capacity of their sport facilities?

[English]

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, not only with regard to hockey facilities does such a need exist. I draw the hon. member's attention to a number of Canadian cities where stadium needs are also paramount for Canadian Football League survival. I am in favour of examining this question with the provinces and the cities involved to determine whether there is a disposition to enhance facilities such as the hon. member suggests. In respect of hockey, I think we are primarily speaking about Quebec City and Winnipeg. I do not think that is the case in Edmonton, because this government has just put $3.8 million into the coliseum as a result of the Commonwealth Games facility.

PENSIONS

REASON SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE REDUCED

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It concerns the double standard which has developed with regard to the payment of government funds. How does the Prime Minister justify the advance payment of $2 million to Shaul Eisenberg for post-contract services on the sale of a Candu reactor for which no work has been done and for which the chairman of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has said he expects no work to be done, yet the government does not request the return of that $2 million, while at the same time the government persists in its tight-fisted attitude of withdrawing from some 2,500 Canadian women who were in receipt of spouse's allowance but for whom the spouse's allowance was cut off on the death of the husband, an amount that comes to less than $500,000? How does the government justify paying to Mr. Eisenberg on one hand and taking away from Canadian women on the other?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the premises of the question asked by the hon. lady are, of course, false. In the first case, the facts are not as she stated. In the second case, the question is, does the government apply the law as it exists and does it try to bring in better policies, as the ministers have suggested, of working toward a guaranteed income for certain persons, or does it not apply the law? I wonder if the hon. lady is suggesting that we should not apply the law.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I now understand why the Prime Minister was the only party leader not in the House on Monday to take part in the debate on women's rights. In light of the report of the Canadian Council on Social Development respecting women and pensions, which shows that single, divorced and widowed women between the ages of 60 and 65 are among the poorest of the poor in Canada, without any access to pensions, without husbands supplying support for them, and in most cases without access to the job market, will he explain by what criteria the government decides that married women in that age bracket are entitled to pensions, while at the same time single or divorced women, who in many cases are worse off, are not entitled to the same benefits?

● (1502)

Mr. Trudeau: The simple answer, of course, is that we do not want to force two people to live on the pension of one person. The course the hon. lady suggests would have the effect of expanding even further Canada's expenditure in the social welfare area. Of course, the government is always prepared to spend more money, particularly on needy cases—

An hon. Member: Like Shaul Eisenberg.

Mr. Trudeau: —but she and her leader have been saying that the government has been spending too much. She has to make up her mind what her policy is.

Miss MacDonald: Would the Prime Minister personally undertake to read the letters from single women, widowed women, divorced women in the age group 60 to 65, detailing the hardship under which they are living at the present time because of the policy of the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought I had extended a lot of leeway to the hon. lady in her first two questions, but now she has gone a bit too far.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—APPLICABILITY OF OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: Discussions have been held concerning the motion put forward a day or two ago by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Preliminary to any resolution of that problem, of course, would have to be the reconstitution of the Committee on Rights and Immunities which may take place at a later time. It is not, therefore, opportune for me to comment on that aspect now. I would only want to wait to see whether that committee is reconstituted. There have been some discussions about the possibility. I can, however, without prejudice, inform the House that, as I undertook, I have entered into some conversations with members of that committee, not with all of them, but with the majority of them, and have determined that there is a consensus among the members of that committee that the subject raised by the hon. member for Yukon could be canvassed very usefully by that committee in an effort to come back with a report quite soon.

As hon. members are aware, that committee has met in the past and has reported to the House on one matter affecting rights and immunities, and would be quite pleased to discuss other matters, particularly to discuss the subject of rights and immunities on a priority basis as they are affected by the Official Secrets Act, and attempt to analyze the position of a member in the face of that Act when there is confidential information in possession of a member, and also, if possible, to canvass and examine the matter of a privileged source of information if, in fact, it does exist, and, if it does, to try to define it and determine whether or not in fact there is any legal authority or precedent for the existence of such a right in the hands of an elected person as there is in the case of lawyers who receive confidential or privileged information.

I should stress that in the past the committee has functioned in a format which is conducive to this kind of work and that it would wish to continue to do so, so it would not be the kind of meeting which would lead to the taking of testimony or the examination of an individual grievance. Rather, it would be a study of the general subject raised by the hon. member in the hope of producing some consensus which would be worthy of report to the House, possibly before the Easter recess. If the committee is reconstituted, and if there is a consensus in the House, it would be my hope that we could begin work right away and, if so, it would not be necessary to pursue to the end the procedural regularity of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Rodriguez: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member for Nickel Belt would permit me to make an announcement before we take up his question of privilege, about which he has given me due notice and which relates to previous notices he has given me?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMISSION

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of all hon. members at this time to the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished visitor in the person of the Right Hon. Roy Harris Jenkins, President of the European Economic Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ALLEGED ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF HON. MEMBER

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I want to read into the record a letter which I received yesterday from the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais):

Dear Mr. Rodriguez,

On Wednesday, March 1, you raised a question of privilege in the House of Commons asking the Speaker to obtain any tapes or other objects resulting from electronic surveillance against yourself, and to discover why that electronic surveillance operation was undertaken and why the tapes have not been turned over to you.

Unfortunately, I was not in the Commons when you raised your question of privilege but I gave assurances to reporters outside the House that no such tapes existed. On Thursday, March 2, in reply to a question from Elmer MacKay, I stated that:

"not even incidentally do we have any record of the honourable member for Nickel Belt being subjected to taping or to any other surveillance".

The full text of my response to your question of privilege is as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the question of privilege raised by the honourable member from Nickel Belt yesterday. I wish to advise you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, members of this House that I am informed by the RCMP that no authorization was ever given to Warren Hart to conduct electronic surveillance on any member of parliament.

The RCMP advised me that they do not have any tape or any record of tape existing of a conversation between one of Mr. Hart's targets and the member for Nickel Belt. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for me to turn over any tapes or transcripts to you or to the honourable member because if they exist, they were never in the possession of the RCMP.

In view of this reply, Mr. Speaker, the other concerns of the honourable member as to the reasons for the undertaking of an electronic surveillance and to why he was not informed do not apply".

If you so wish, I would be pleased to state this in the House as a formal reply to your question of privilege.

Jean-Jacques Blais, P.C. M.P.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have no reason to question the veracity of this letter. It was written by a person who is both a member of parliament and the Solicitor General. There is, however, an important problem. We have in our possession a copy of the sworn affidavit of a Mr. Warren Hart in which he says:

On explicit instructions from members of the security service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I conducted electronic surveillance on the then Solicitor General of Canada, namely the Hon. Warren Allmand, a member of the Canadian House of Commons, and John Rodriguez from the Nickel Belt riding, and the NDP in British Columbia.

There is clearly a contradiction between the sworn statement of Mr. Hart and the statement of the Solicitor General in the House and in his letter to me. There is a further complication here because the Solicitor General did state in the House on February 27 that Mr. Hart was in the employ of the RCMP. He is also reported in the press as saying outside the House that the taping of both the former solicitor general and myself was "accidental", although he changed that word to "incidental" on February 28.

Let me repeat that I am not questioning the word of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) who, as a member of parliament and a minister, we must believe would not deliberately mislead the House. However, I must make the point that the Solicitor General's statement may be seen as irrelevant to my point of privilege, for two reasons.

First, over the course of previous months we have seen frequent occasions in the House when it was made clear that present and past solicitors general had not been fully aware of activities under the jurisdiction of their departments. We were told, for example, that the solicitors general had no prior knowledge of certain illegal acts and, again, that as members of parliament we should believe them. Thus, we may be lead to the conclusion that once again in this case a solicitor general may lack certain knowledge.

Even if the Solicitor General's statement is accurate, however, there is still a question of privilege to be dealt with. Mr. Hart has stated in a sworn affidavit that he conducted electronic surveillance operations against me under the orders of the RCMP. If his statement is true, if he did conduct electronic surveillance operations against me, whether or not he was acting on the orders of the RCMP, then my privileges have been breached since such surveillance breaches the confidentiality of my communication with my constituents and with it my ability to perform my duties as a member of this House.

If, however, Mr. Hart's statement is completely false, my privileges have still been breached. Mr. Hart's notarized statement has been made public, and both the statement and the specific allegation that I have been the subject of electronic surveillance have received extensive publicity.

A Canadian press article, for example, in the Ottawa Citizen of February 28, 1978, has as the headline, "Blais Confirms Hart Taped Allmand, M.P." and reads in part as follows:

Solicitor General Jean-Jacques Blais confirmed in the House of Commons Monday that Warren Hart, an FBI informer working for the RCMP, accidentally eavesdropped on former solicitor general Warren Allmand and MP John Rodriguez (NDP-Nickel Belt).

Again in a Canadian press story in the Ottawa Citizen of March 1, 1978 there appears the headline as follows:

'Control' of Informer Arranged by RCMP

And in the article this statement occurs, Mr. Speaker:

Hart claimed part of his duties were to electronically eavesdrop on then solicitor general Warren Allmand and NDP MP John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt). Blais has said conversations of Allmand and Rodriguez were taped accidentally while Hart was bugging someone else.

And, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Hart has gone further—to make statements on national television in which he again stated that such electronic surveillance operations had taken place. Thus, whether or not Mr. Hart's statement is true, it has been given such extensive publicity as to call into question in the minds of my constituents the confidentiality of our communications. This, as I have stated before, distinctly impairs my ability to perform my duties as a member of this House.

The government has established in the McDonald Commission a mechanism whereby certain actions of our federal police force may be examined, but I believe in this case that is not the mechanism that should be used. In this case we are not discussing general policies or actions but rather the possibility of a specific breach of the privileges of a member of this House. As such I believe that breach must be examined and dealt with by members of this House.

Only by taking such an action will it be possible to ascertain clearly what has taken place, and what has not taken place. The question of whether or not I was the subject of electronic surveillance, whether officially sanctioned or not, must be clearly answered. If the action did not take place, then the sworn statement of Mr. Hart must be discredited by investigation so as to reassure my constituents.

If the surveillance did take place, then the circumstances surrounding that surveillance must be investigated and reported on in a public manner. I believe the only body which can and should undertake such an investigation is the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House. I, therefore, move, Mr. Speaker:

That this matter of privilege concerning possible electronic surveillance against myself, the sworn statement of Mr. Warren Hart and the statements of the Solicitor General be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that that body be requested to undertake to bring before it any persons having or claiming knowledge of this affair, so that the whole truth may be discovered and publicized in such a way as to restore the confidence of my constituents in the confidentiality of our communications and thus end the breach of privilege which exists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a brief contribution, and I should say at the outset, sir, that it is in support of the motion that has just been moved now by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

It seems to me, sir, that we have facing us in this House, particularly during the time the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has held his portfolio, some rather curious events and circumstances with respect to his answers relating to matters within his jurisdiction. The reason I support the motion now placed by the hon. member for Nickel Belt in one aspect is that this is another example of a situation in which we receive in this House, or have received, a categorical denial with respect to activities of the security service or of people who have been engaged by the security service with respect to the members of parliament.

I should point out that it is not from the point of view of the interests of the members of parliament that this motion should in fact be accepted and supported by all members of the House but, rather, on behalf of those people whom we represent because, sir, the fact of the matter is that the point of confidentiality does not lie in the interests of the member of parliament. We derive, sir, no particular benefit from that confidentiality. It is the constituent, the person who has the grievance, the complainant in many instances, who wants, requires, and, indeed, should have this particular confidentiality in dealing with a member of parliament in the highest court of the land, as is parliament.

The reason that I am quite concerned about the answer that has been given by the Solicitor General, and the apparent contradictions which now appear in the national press, on television, and in other ways, is that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) received from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a categorical assurance by letter that there was absolutely no instance of any member of parliament being under surveillance by the security services or any other police force under the federal jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not qualify that by saying that this was incidental—that the person was under surveillance incidentally or indirectly. He made the categorical statement in that letter and assured the Leader of the Opposition. The fact of the matter is that, out of the mouth of the Solicitor General himself, now comes an exception, an exception to this particular proposition that was put forward by the Prime Minister.

I say to you, sir, that if this is in fact the kind of answer we receive, it not only speaks badly of the Solicitor General but I want to say, sir, that it speaks absolute volumes about the Prime Minister and the way in which he cavalierly gives assurances to officers of this House.

So, sir, I simply want to say to you that as far as I am concerned I support very strongly the position that this particular motion is an ideal situation by which a direct conflict is documentable in that the Solicitor General has said one thing in the House, and said another thing quite the opposite, outside the House. It should be referred to the committee on that basis alone, but, more important, the whole question of the rights and privileges of a member of parliament to receive representation and information from constituents from the people of this country on a confidential basis, should be examined thoroughly by this committee, using this particular instance as the focal point for its examination.

Sir, I therefore wish to support very strongly the motion put forward and assure the hon. member of my support in this particular endeavour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge the House to accept this motion and send it to the committee, and I do so, Mr. Speaker, because of the sleazy way the government has of answering charges that are made in the manner that this one has been made.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) points out that the minister changed his wording from "accidental" to "incidental", and that that should make a difference. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that it certainly makes a difference, and that probably the wording was not loosely used but was correctly used.

My knowledge of the former solicitor general is not good enough for me to be able to say what the intention was, but I am sure in the case of the hon. member for Nickel Belt, it was incidental to the taping that Hart was doing in relation to Rosie Brown or Douglas Brown or Rosie Douglas, or whoever it was. He was probably the person under surveillance and it was incidental that words of the member for Nickel Belt, who is usually quiet and reserved and non-vocal, would accidentally get on that particular tape. But, Mr. Speaker, I, as a member of parliament, frankly do not believe that tape was destroyed. That tape was used, and undoubtedly was translated into a document. That document does not refer to the member for Nickel Belt. That document, Mr. Speaker, refers to an investigation that was going on against someone that we agree was under surveillance. We certainly did not hire the police to make a tape that they were going to destroy because "incidentally" they would get some background noise.

I am surprised at some of the things that have happened recently and at the reluctance of most members to look at the RCMP in relation to the problem of security.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have said that no members were under surveillance, to the best of their knowledge. I suggest the key words are "to the best of their knowledge", and that their knowledge is not very good.

I sincerely believe that I observed the surveillance of a member of parliament in the Toronto airport by an officer acting under the jurisdiction of the RCMP within the last two weeks. This was not done by myself alone. There were two other members of parliament discussing this openly.

• (1522)

The gentleman who was carrying out the surveillance was well aware of the fact we were discussing him. He was doing one of two things; he was either carrying out surveillance of that hon. member of parliament or, worse still, he was attempting to intimidate that member of parliament. He was not intimidating me. I do not think I was important enough in the circumstances to be kept under surveillance, and the gentleman who was with me, that other member of parliament, was not involved to a degree that surveillance could be justified.

I have been here long enough and have been involved in enough things of various natures that I am sure intimidation would not really be effective. This leads me only to the conclusion that another member of parliament was under surveillance.

Let me suggest that the Solicitor General does not know anything about this for one of two reasons; he does not want to know and has never asked, or the RCMP is not about to tell him anyway.

It is my belief that these things should be in the open and discussed. It is very doubtful if the hon. member for Nickel Belt will be damaged, but a member of parliament could be damaged as a result of the fact he is given this great amount of attention on the national media. Intimidation is a two-edged sword as far as a member of parliament is concerned, particularly having regard to the information he may accept.

The Solicitor General may well suggest this was incidental or accidental and the surveillance no longer exists, but I doubt if that is true. I think it would be very hard to make any kind of case against someone who has been under surveillance for sometime, during which time a tape has been made which has whole sections missing. I doubt if any case could be made with a tape that has blank spots every few minutes. We know what happened in another country regarding a tape with missing sections. I think some questions would be asked again in respect of a tape made during an inquiry which had blanks, or missing sections in a record made from such a tape. I cannot visualize the RCMP carrying on that kind of surveillance over a period of time, bringing a man in from another country, and all the other things that have happened, if they were then all of a sudden going to destroy the tape and the evidence which had been gathered during that period of surveillance.

We have not yet reached the point where we are burying our mistakes in this country. I believe it would be wise to bring them to light and have a look at them. Undoubtedly when we established the security apparatus of this country we really never spelled out what it was supposed to do. I am sure that some types of activity which may be anti-government, and that means anti-Liberal, would appear to be subversive to some officers. I am sure one would not have to go as far as being against a provincial government to be considered by some as being subversive. It may be felt that an individual was subversive if he said something during an angry moment about somebody who was considered the boss.

This matter should be examined, because I believe that after a full examination of this and a number of other matters before Your Honour at the present time we would have a much better system of national security and a much more clear understanding of what members of parliament can do and the protection which exists for them. Lastly, I am sure that we could establish once and for all what are the real responsibilities of the Solicitor General regarding our national police force, what accountability on their behalf he must have to parliament, and how open he should be with this institution.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I submit that this involves a question of fact. The whole matter revolves around a statement I sent to the hon. gentleman in letter form, which I am sure he received today. I am just reiterating what I said, that I have conducted a very thorough and full investigation with the RCMP, and I am saying in this House, as I indicated in the letter I submitted to the hon. gentleman, that there has been that very thorough investigation during which I interviewed supervisors in the RCMP relating to this matter. I did so because of my concern about the rights of members of parliament, and I would use my best effort to allay any suspicion that may arise.

As a result of that very thorough investigation, for which I take full responsibility, I can assure the hon. gentleman that his fears ought to be allayed, because there is not, and never has been, any tape of any conversation involving the RCMP in relation to this matter, in any particular. As I indicated to the hon. gentleman, the RCMP—

Mr. Benjamin: They are not going to tell you.

Mr. Blais: Surely the hon. gentleman does not—

Mr. Benjamin: They lied before to your predecessors.

Mr. Blais: I am suggesting to the hon. gentleman that he ought to have a bit more respect in terms of the RCMP than he is manifesting now. I suggest to him that the statement I made to the hon. gentleman, and the replies I have given in this House, were quite categorical. There is no indication that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has been the subject of any taping. What Mr. Hart has said in his affidavit is just what he has said in that affidavit, and I understand that matter is now a matter at which the McDonald Commission will be looking. It is seized of the matter and is interested in having Mr. Hart attend before it.

In terms of proceedings in this House, Mr. Speaker, I, as a minister of the Crown, have stated there is no cause for the hon. gentleman to make the allegations he has made.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that I have to support the motion of my hon. colleague, particularly as it has been clear for a few months that we should use all available means to know the truth. We can no longer be satisfied with the answers of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) which, as it has been proven, can vary from month to month according to the immediate circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, we do not care about how the Solicitor General manages to escape his responsibilities, we want to know the truth because the famous issue of national security has paved the way for so many illegalities that nobody even in this House is safe, since we have no form of guarantee with regard to our real freedom.

The motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) being referred to committee, this could provide the opportunity to shed more light on all these matters more or less relating to security, and especially to this interference with individual freedom. Mr. Speaker, I would personally have many incidents to relate on this matter, and that is why I believe, on behalf of all my constituents, that we have the duty to tell the people of all the means available to some authorities who, under the cover of national security, push their weight around. Not only do they not bring about this security, but on the contrary they are traumatizing the whole population. That is why I wholeheartedly support the motion put by the hon. member.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I have another thought on the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones).

[Mr. Blais.]

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this subject, which should be referred to the committee, is very serious. I know that debate in this House on the subject could continue from now until eternity. It seems to me that this is not a matter such as the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has indicated will be investigated by a judicial inquiry. We are a body which should not have to look to judicial inquiries to correct our problems. We should be able to wash our linen within our House through a committee of the House.

I think the motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is a proper motion. It might certainly clear the air on this matter and a lot of other matters if the subject matter of the motion is referred to the committee without too much rehashing in public. I believe it should be done immediately.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I earnestly hope that Your Honour will find that my friend, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), has a question of privilege, and, if you do, I shall be pleased to second his motion for the reference of this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

It seems to me, sir, that what is at issue is not the activity of the RCMP, not even the question of why the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) said one thing at one time and another thing at another time, in both cases being properly advised by his officials. The issue is whether or not the hon. member for Nickel Belt has had his name brought under a cloud. The issue is whether his capacity to do his job as an MP has been impaired. I suggest that the answer to that is yes either way.

If it is true that he has been the subject of surveillance by somebody working for the RCMP, surely that, by definition, is an interference with the rights and privileges of a member of the House of Commons. On the other hand, even if it turns out that there was no electronic surveillance, in view of the sworn statement by Mr. Hart and in view of the nation-wide publicity given to that, many people in this country, particularly many people in the constituency of Nickel Belt, think that my hon. friend has been made the subject of electronic surveillance. I suggest that that puts him in a very difficult position.

I have listened with interest to the debate on what the RCMP is doing or not doing, and whether we should say things about how the RCMP informed the minister, and all of that, but when it comes down to the question that Your Honour has to decide, it is a very simple one: does a member of the House of Commons have a question of privilege? I feel very strongly that the hon. member for Nickel Belt does have one.

Having said that, may I say that it seems to me the things that must be investigated relate, on the one hand, to the statements made by the Solicitor General and, on the other hand, to the sworn affidavit made by Mr. Warren Hart. The Solicitor General has said on one occasion outside the House that the hon. member for Nickel Belt was the subject of surveillance, accidental or incidental. The Solicitor General has admitted that Mr. Hart was in the employ of the RCMP. The hon. member for Nickel Belt admits that he was in a certain automobile with Mr. Warren Hart. So there do seem to be things that have to be cleared up. I think we need to know why the Solicitor General was advised to say one thing on one occasion, and now says that there is no record of any such surveillance. I come back to the main point: we need to have that cleared up, not for the sake of the good name of the RCMP or the good name of the Solicitor General. We need to have it cleared up because a member of this House has had his position impaired. That is one aspect that needs to be considered.

The other aspect that needs to be considered is the question of Mr. Hart's affidavit, his assertion that in a car, along with the hon. member for Nickel Belt and Mr. Rosie Douglas, he recorded certain conversations. As I said, all of that is before us in the form of a sworn affidavit. My insistence is that the issue is not how the RCMP acts or how Mr. Hart acts. The issue with which Your Honour should be concerned and with which we should be concerned is with regard to a member of the House. Has he been molested outside the House—to use some of the language in the book—has he been interfered with, or has his position as a member of parliament been impaired? It seems to me that it has, and on that basis Your Honour should rule that there is a prima facie case of privilege and allow the motion to be put. If you do that, I certainly will be happy to second the motion and, if Your Honour puts the motion, I hope the House will agree to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) mentions is a matter of fact, and in support of his statement he invokes the affidavit of an individual known as Hart. Running counter to his statement, that fact, we have the categorical, clear, specific and non-equivocal version of the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Blais) who formally denies the assertion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. As Speaker of this House, you are therefore up against the fact that there are two absolutely contradictory versions. After looking into the procedural aspect of the situation and consulting Beauchesne on the matter, I respectfully suggest that this cannot be considered a matter of privilege. Beauchesne, on page 102 citation 113, edicts clearly as follows, and I quote:

But a dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfill the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

In addition, I have often heard you say in this House, Mr. Speaker, that when opinions differ on facts, the question of privilege cannot be invoked, and you turned them down accordingly. At this time Mr. Speaker, there is a motion before the House and I maintain respectfully that this institution is being abused by a deliberate attempt to nourish an atmosphere of suspicion with regard to the RCMP. What the hon. member for Nickel Belt is suggesting, and what comes out of the argument of all hon. members who rose in support of the motion of the hon. member for Nickel Belt is nothing else but an attempt to undermine the credibility of the RCMP who, in the present case, assured the Solicitor General of Canada that the hon. member for Nickel Belt has not been subjected to electronic surveillance. So if the members of all opposition parties want to use this institution to move a motion with the obvious intention of blaming the RCMP, we on this side of the House are not prepared, Mr. Speaker, to take advantage of this situation to abuse this House and blame the RCMP. Furthermore, this is obviously a lack of respect for an institution established under federal legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the MacDonald Commission has been established to inquire into a number of facts related to the RCMP. The question raised by the member for Nickel Belt will be examined by the MacDonald Commission. Why should we approve this overlapping and force a House committee to play the political game of the opposition and investigate facts that are categorically denied by the police and by the Solicitor General of Canada?

Mr. Speaker, maybe because I talked too fast the hon. gentleman could not catch the translation of what I said, but if he would just take the trouble to listen, I am sure he will bow to common sense. A federal body, established by a law of Parliament and, as such, entitled to our respect, will investigate the very matter raised by the member for Nickel Belt. Given the circumstances, and pursuant to section 4 of the Inquiries Act, which the Leader of the Opposition can very well read, the commissioners are granted the authority and the privilege to interrogate even ministers. This should take care of his objection. The investigation will be thorough, but meanwhile this motion on a question of privilege is contrary to the rules of this House. It is a question of conflicting facts, of differences of opinion, but not a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

• (1542)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would like to hold the matter under consideration. There has been a considerable amount of argument put forward this afternoon to the effect that, in order to support the motion of privilege by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), it is necessary to discredit the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and the RCMP, and I think I ought to disabuse the House of that proposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the situation is such that the hon. member for Nickel Belt—and I will have to examine the transcript—began by saying he had assurances from the Solicitor General, which he accepts—the Solicitor General had put them in writing—that certain facts were true. Again I say I will have to examine the transcript. I do not want to put words into the mouths of those who have argued, but I think we have to examine two things.

First, accepting the assurances given by the Solicitor General that no instructions for this alleged activity were given by the RCMP and therefore that the RCMP was not responsible for them—and this has not been recorded or kept by them—in the face of those assurances there may still be a question of privilege relating to the position of the hon. member about whom an allegation had been made by way of a sworn statement that he has been the subject of electronic surveillance. That may stand on its own, and it may not. I do not know.

The point is that it seems to me there is a very serious possibility that the hon. member for Nickel Belt may have a question of privilege while the Solicitor General's assurances may be totally accepted, in which case one of the difficulties I will have will be in resolving the matter of the reference of the statements of the Solicitor General to the committee. That may be a problem, but basically the possibility of electronic surveillance of a member of the House of Commons and a sworn statement to that effect by some sort of an intelligence agent is, on the face of it, a very serious matter.

I am concerned that by allowing that to stand alone as a question of privilege we may be opening the door to questions of privilege which would be raised in every case that a member, no matter where he may find himself, either inside or outside this building or in or outside the performance of his duties, may be interfered with in any way and that we may be extending the parameters of questions of privilege.

However, I do not want to inform the House that I take this motion seriously and that I accept, along with other members who have spoken today, the assurances given by the Solicitor General. He has told the House today in his letter to the hon. member for Nickel Belt, and he has stated on the record of the House of Commons, that those statements given by him were upon advice in his ministerial responsibility, and they are accepted as true, as they always have been in this House. Nevertheless, there may rest in the hands of the hon. member for Nickel Belt a very important question of privilege, and I need some time to reconcile these problems and to try to sort them out. I will try to come back to the House with a decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if I might just interrupt the right hon. member for one moment. I think there are one or two ministers who have been waiting to table documents, and I wonder if, out of courtesy, we might permit them to do that and allow them to go before the right hon. member's question of privilege. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—PROCEDURE ON S.O. 43 MOTIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, today we have witnessed once more what has been taking place here with regularity, namely, a denial of the opportunity for hon. members to raise questions under Standing Order 43. I say at once that the individual who speaks on behalf of the government is the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard). I have watched him in action day after day and week after week. He spoke with sonorous emphasis this afternoon, but normally he speaks with bated breath. Whenever a motion which the government does not want is moved, in those subdued, sibilate tones he uses he says no, and the wishes of the House of Commons are thereby denied. I did not know until today that the hon. member had such a vociferous capacity, but one learns. I have only heard him in operation when denying the right of hon. members in this House to introduce resolutions.

Today two were introduced, one by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) in connection with this day of days, International Women's Day. The resolution the hon. member for Egmont was asking permission to move was a reasonable one. I am not going to read it because I do not want to clutter the record, but it was reasonable. In effect it said that the Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission should immediately review each department's five-year plan of action to ensure no further erosion of the advancement of women. I thought that would be generally accepted, but the hon. member, the voice of the government, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, said no.

Then a little later the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) endeavoured to move the following resolution:

> That this House takes note of the fact that this is International Women's Day and calls on the government to act forthwith on the recommendations made recently by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women . . .

Again I am not going to read the entire resolution.

Mr. Pinard: And report within 30 days.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman had an opportunity to speak, and we now learn that he has a voice. He said no. This is the type of thing which makes a farce of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Members in all parts of this House have spoken today in mellifluous language on behalf of the rights of women and about International Women's Day. Members of the government have done so. Outside the House the greatest of ejaculations have been uttered in favour of women. When a member of parliament tries to move a resolution, however, it is turned down because of a rule which is unjust and unfair.

I mention this because the time has come when Canadian people should realize that it is impossible to get resolutions before this House because of one member. I do not say in this case that the hon. member was speaking for himself because he spoke for the Government of Canada by virtue of his position as a parliamentary secretary. However, he has turned down the women of Canada, and they are being deceived. They think parliament turned them down. Parliament did not turn them down. It was the Liberal government through a parliamentary secretary acting for the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman is raising by way of a question of privilege the operation of a rule of the House which has not, to my knowledge, in any way been transgressed. The rule reads fairly clearly that a motion can be moved with unanimous consent. It is the right of any member to withhold his consent, and I am not sure that it is the right of any member to comment on the withholding of that consent or to identify people. It may be an impropriety to comment on a proper invocation of any rule.

● (1552)

I wonder if we are anywhere near a question of privilege in discussing the unfortunate effects of a rule which is operating the way it is written on the books. It may be appropriate to move to change that Standing Order, but I have grave reservations, first, if it can be done by privilege, and secondly, unless there is some impropriety in the exercise of the rule, if it is proper to make reflections on the invocation by any member of this House of any Standing Order so long as he is doing so in the proper way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have been here a while in this House and I have never seen anything to equal what is happening today. I am simply pointing out to the women of this country that what happened was the voice of the Liberal party, hypocritically on the one hand supporting women's rights, and in the House of Commons denying the statement. Your Honour rules that that is not a question of privilege, and I accept your ruling as I always do. I simply put it on the doorstep of these people with their hypocrisy, pretending to the Canadian people that they believe in women's rights, and then preventing discussion in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) for making a suggestion which could be described as what would seem to me to be a constructive intervention. I have a lot of respect for institutions and I also have a lot of respect for this institution, including the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Theoretically, if one takes the political flavour out of his comments, what he is actually complaining about is a rule—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: No politics. The politics are from over there.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I let the right hon. member talk and he even blamed me for not talking often enough. I think he occasionally talks too often. So I would ask him to have the courtesy to show respect for this institution and let me talk as I have been given the right to do, Mr. Speaker.

I would say it has been obvious for some time now that abuses have taken place with respect to Standing Order 43 which requires an emergency that is not always set forth. Mr. Speaker, you have heard recently motions under Standing Order 43 with excessively long preambles which were sometimes frivolous and sometimes tainted with political partisanship. Motions introduced under Standing Order 43 sometimes contain very positive elements, I admit. As it happens, a motion was introduced today dealing with the status of women and, generally speaking, on the whole, that motion appeared to me, as a private member, to be quite acceptable. However, it included restrictions which would make the government's job very difficult with respect to the proposed business for today because that motion—in which the right hon. member for Prince Albert, probably by inadvertence, omitted to read everything—specifically said at the end, and I remember it quite well, that the committee would have 30 days to report to the House.

This institution wants the government elected by the majority of Canadians to be responsible for establishing the priority of subject matters submitted to this House. If every time a motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 must be passed because it includes some good provisions we would never be able to achieve a program serving Canadians and we would deny the right of the government to establish priorities. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this is why I emphasize the necessity for motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 to respect the nature and spirit of this Parliament and to be written in the future with a preamble which will be less binding on the government and not compel us to change the legislative program we must follow to solve the various problems we are facing.

Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert implies a change to the Standing Orders of this House. I fully agree with him but I think he has suggested only 1/116 of the parliamentary reform that should be done here in the Canadian parliament. There are 116 Standing Orders and the hon. member complains about only one of them, but a more serious reform should be considered to modernize our parliament, to make it more efficient, to rejuvenate this institution and also allow our constituents whom we meet regularly and who are now watching what happens in this House through television, to allow them to witness a performance that would be more worthy of parliamentarians and politicians.

In conclusion, I subscribe to the intent of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, if I made a right interpretation of his desire to change this institution to make it more efficient, but I contend that he does not go far enough and that he suggests only 1/116 of the parliamentary reform for which we have been asking on this side of the House at least since my coming here, three years ago, and which is often denied to us because of the lack of consent from opposition members.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the parliamentary secretary in the latter part of his remarks attacked the institution which he purported to revere at the beginning of his remarks. I listened to his submission with great interest. He mentioned the rules of this place, and he is quite right in respect to some of them.

One of the problems in the House of Commons is that the government has always tended to use the Parliament of Canada, the House of Commons, and view it as a legislative mill as if the only business which was important was the business the government chose to designate as important. Over the course of the last little while the private member in terms of being able to advance something in this House has slowly but inexorably had his rights limited and removed, all in the name of the legislative necessities of the government. That is a fact.

We have been sitting in this House now since October, the beginning of the session. Unfortunately there has been no move on the part of my hon. friend's senior to put a reference before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, not one. What has happened, therefore, is that these rights have been limited. As the government has come to regard parliament only as its own precinct for legislation we have tended to look away from the other side of parliament, and seek an opportunity that all members on all sides of the House ought to have to examine the relevancy, the propriety, and direction of programs. Somehow or other, Mr. Speaker, this whole thing has gone out of whack. We might as well be candid with each other. One of the reasons that Standing Order 43's are shouted down, sometimes by one and sometimes by many—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Generally by one.

[Mr. Pinard.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —is that the government is always concerned that there will suddenly be a debate if consent is given and then the matter becomes a matter for discussion before the House or potentially so.

I say to the hon. member that members of parliament do not put motions frivolously under Standing Order 43 most of the time. They put them forward using one of the few vehicles left to private members to put a point before the public and perhaps influence the government, or at least bring public opinion to bear on a matter that may concern them with respect to their constituents.

There is this ungodly fear that something from a private member might come forward to upset the government's program, and if you look at the order paper today the program is pretty slim in terms of meeting the necessities of the country.

The other day when speaking on this topic, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) proposed a solution to this matter. You will recall the solution, Mr. Speaker, I do not have to repeat it. I do not know whether that is appropriate to get by this impasse which led the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council to call two motions with regard to the status of women on International Women's Day frivolous. They certainly were not advanced in any frivolous way.

• (1602)

Mr. Pinard: You are not being honest.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): When he said today that he was concerned about the government's program, he was admitting that this matter, the whole question of the operation of Standing Order 43 and the right of private members to advance these motions, was always subject to the convenience of the government. It was not intended that way.

It is time the public realized what is happening in terms of my right and the right of other private members to bring forward motions under Standing Order 43. It is important that those motions do not just occupy members of the opposition. There are members of the government who are suddenly having the courage to get up under Standing Order 43. Some of those motions should be examined.

It is unfortunate that backbenchers are having denied to them, day after day, the right to have something dealt with by the House of Commons, something that is important to them as members and that may indeed go beyond the importance of a particular member's responsibility.

If we are to get out of this impasse, it would be well to remember that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization dealt with matters that were presented prior to the last session of this parliament. It is equally important that there is anxiety on all sides of the House to deal with reform of the parliamentary process.

Perhaps the right hon. member for Prince Albert in dealing with this matter under Standing Order 43 has managed to focus the attention of the public on a House of Commons where the rights of the private member are being overburdened to a greater degree each day by the movement toward the government considering this House as purely its own.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) with the usual respect I have always had for him and other speakers. Of course Your Honour's comment that this is really a matter of concern about the rules affecting this chamber rather than any question of privilege hold absolutely true.

I was interested in the rather outraged approach to the fact that denials for the movement of Standing Order 43 motions are always on this side of the House. I heard a very reasonable motion put forward the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee). After a logical explanation as to why it was urgent, it stated:

> That this House condemn the artificial distinction made by the Leader of the Opposition as to North American and European Canadians, and that this House recognizes the great contribution of Canadians of European descent to our society and our nation.

That was denied. There was a no. The reasonableness was attested to by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) who rose in outrage saying that the no came from this side of the House. Of course it had not. It came from the opposition. In that sense, this works both ways.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what I regret most of all about this is the determination indicated once again by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) to treat this very fundamental reduction of the rights of private members of the House of Commons as an insignificant matter, a matter to which some kind of debating trick response can be deemed to be sufficient.

As has been pointed out by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and very important for parliament, there has developed on the government side of the House the practice of designating a parliamentary secretary whose single responsibility in this House is to say or to indicate no when private members of the House of Commons raise Standing Order 43 motions to try to have the House of Commons consider matters of very serious importance to those members of parliament.

Of course it is going to occur from time to time when there is an unreasonable motion put forward, as there are from all sides of the House from time to time. It would be natural that in the face of unreasonable motions from time to time there would be members of the House who would say no because they took exception to the particular matter being proposed.

We are dealing here with a very different case. We are dealing with a regular practice of the parliamentary secretary to the leader of the government in the House of Commons. Virtually every time a motion comes from this side from a private member who wants to exercise the traditional right of a private member to have parliament consider a matter of very real importance to that private member, when that matter is put forward a representative of the Liberal government automatically says no. That is a very different situation from a matter being judged on the basis of its merits.

What we have here is a clear determination by the government to use, in a way in which the rules were never intended, the opportunity to object to a private member for party purposes, trying to stop the House of Commons from considering matters that, in the view of at least one of our members, are very important.

This becomes doubly important. It is part of a continuing process which we have seen through this decade of the limitation of the powers and rights of individual members in this House of Commons.

The other very important matter here had to do with changes with regard to the control of the estimates. No member here is able, with the rules that are now in place—I do not intend to disinter history, but it is important to bear this in mind—as a matter of practical fact to limit or control in any particular one five cent piece, if I can quote an historical phrase, spending by the Government of Canada, given the changes in rules relative to estimates.

That is a very serious restriction upon the prerogatives of an individual member of parliament. One of the few prerogatives that a private member now has is the opportunity to raise a matter of very real importance on the floor of the House of Commons and to have the possibility erected of that being debated. That has been resorted to by many members of the House of Commons. The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) is in the chamber. On occasion he has used Standing Order 43 for a matter which I presume to be of very real personal interest to him, something he believed that the House of Commons should debate.

On these matters which are of very real concern to private members of parliament, who have few other means by which they can have their concerns considered by the House of Commons, there is one person in this House who has been given a responsibility, given a job by his party, to say no. That is the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). That is a very serious limitation on the ability of private members to bring business to the attention of the House of Commons.

The argument has been made on the other side, and I accept its legitimacy in part, that from time to time noes have come from both sides of the House. However, any fair examination of the record will show that far more frequently matters are turned down by that side of the House. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert said, almost every day on almost every question, the no comes automatically on assignment, as the job of that particular parliamentary secretary, from the parliamentary secretary to the leader of the government. In my judgment, that is a very serious limitation upon the ability of any private member in this House which was designed not just for governments but for private members as well. It is a very serious limitation on the ability of a private member to have this House of Commons seize upon a question which that member considers to be important.

As he has done so often in the past, the right hon. member for Prince Albert has performed a signal service to the House of Commons today by rising in his place to take exception to an automatic practice which severely limits the rights of private members of parliament in this House of Commons.

● (1612)

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton-Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to straighten out the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). I do not think he was in the House when I stood up after that motion under Standing Order 43. As reported at page 3244 of Hansard of February 27, I said:

So there will be no misunderstanding, I said to the motion by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) that this motion is not true and it should be debated.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief because I know the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and others are waiting to bring forward important legislation. However, I cannot help making a few comments on this subject. I have been sitting in this House for about 12 years now and I have noticed the increasing number of motions presented under Standing Order 43. I estimate that during this present session the number of such motions has doubled or trebled. I hope the House leader for the New Democratic Party will say a few words on this aspect. He knows that, if even half these motions were accepted, the legislative calendar would be completely cluttered up. There is no way in which an already overloaded House could accept the legislation involved.

I listened to what was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who made a very thoughtful contribution. I think we all recognize that backbenchers must be able to use this parliament as well as the leaders of the parties. After all, they represent a lot of people. The problem is that some of these motions under Standing Order 43 imply important changes, or amendments to government legislation—legislation which might have taken weeks to get through the House in the first place.

An hon. Member: Months!

Mr. Lefebvre: Other motions would involve major items of government expenditure. How is one to reconcile an already overloaded legislative calendar—members are saying we are already sitting too long in Ottawa, spending eight, nine or ten months here when we should be getting out in our constituencies—with the need to allow adequate time for the consideration of initiatives put forward by private members? I would suggest that the House leaders should hold discussions and maybe come up with proposals to submit to Your Honour, or to a committee of the House, designed to reconcile the legitimate rights of backbenchers on both sides of the House with the need to make progress with the legislative calendar.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) for his invitation—

Mr. Howie: It was too much for you to resist!

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Even so, I rise to speak on this subject for only a few minutes. I have a hunch we are not going to solve this problem today. But it is my earnest hope that immediately after the forthcoming election, when a new parliament assembles, we shall appoint a committee which will grapple with this task. The difficulty, as I see it, is this: the government, as has been said today—and I agree—must have arrangements by which it can put its business before the House. There has to be a schedule which cannot be upset or interrupted in an unplanned way. I support that position. But it is also true that private members of the House ought to have an opportunity to present their ideas.

We have rules which are supposed to provide for this. We have private members' hours. There, however, it is not the case of somebody saying, no; it is a case of somebody on the other side saying too much until the best of ideas are talked out. I believe, there is almost as much farce connected with the private members' hour as there is with the period having to do with motions under Standing Order 43. We have developed the late show and, if I do say so myself, having had something to do with the introduction of the procedure, I think it works very well. Members get the opportunity to say more than they can in the question period, and they do get an answer. Still, we have not solved the problem of balancing the right of the government to time it can count on with the right of private members on both sides of the House to have their ideas considered.

I have served on a number of committees on procedure back in the days when there were special committees, and in more recent days when there has been a standing committee. A lot of study and a lot of research has been done but the main thrust of most of the reports which such committees produce is to limit the rights of private members and make sure that the government gets its business through. I think that is the reason why these reports do not reach the floor of the House; they are too one-sided.

It seems to me if we are to solve the difficulty of getting the proper balance between the government's rights and the rights of opposition members we shall have to find a means to get the government business through a little faster.

I say again, as I have said on other occasions, that I think the time has come for us to consider categorizing government business as "important", "routine" and "very minor". I would be quite happy to see an arrangement made whereby the opposition parties could say that they wanted, say, three or four bills open to unlimited debate but in return would be prepared to see some eight or ten unimportant bills go to committee without any debate. If we could get some method of better planning and make better use of time spent on government legislation we could then leave a little more time—whether an extra hour here or a day or so there—for private members' ideas to be considered.

I am not cynical—I have been around here too long and I love the place too well. I think it is a good place. As for motions under Standing Order 43, I realise that most of the time those I move get turned down. But there is some satisfaction in being able to make them, to get an idea into print. Maybe it gets shown over the television, too; the people out there know what we are proposing, and to what those people over there are saying no. I think there's value in that. In the last few days, using what few devices there are, we have been pressing the case for equal rights for women. We haven't won any battles on the floor of the House this week but we have asserted the principle of our position and I think it has been good.

As I say, I have no hope that in the atmosphere of the House, where we are just wondering on what date the election will take place, we will be making any major changes in the rules.

An hon. Member: What's your guess?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is my prediction? June 26. If I am out a bit, if will be only by a week, so don't call me a false prophet.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is good we have had this discussion. I think it reflects the experience of members in this parliament, namely, that we have not done either job well—we have not handled the government's business with an eye to the best use of time and we haven't given recognition to the proper rights of private members. I think we should have the wit and the wisdom very early in the next parliament to sort out this whole business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): As vice-chairman of the committee on procedure for the second session I want to say, briefly, that although discussion of this question may be of value to hon. members, only the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) can decide to bring forward matters and refer them to the committee. He has not done this for two sessions. I am afraid representations should be addressed not only to the Chair but to the President of Privy Council urging him to let go and refer some of these problems to the committee so that it can act and make references back to the House so that a lot of these difficulties can be eliminated.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank all hon. members for their enlightening observations on a very difficult subject. The right hon. member made reference to this in the House a few days ago. At that time I indicated what I think, what has been expressed again here today by the right hon. member and by others who have contributed, that there are severe constraints on the operation of this rule as there are constraints on the operation of any other rule.

Indeed, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) set aside one of these motions the other day for a very important reason, and that is that often when a motion is put forward, no matter how meritorious it may seem, members may take an objection in principle to being asked, because if the solution seems to be that the matter be voted upon, or carried without debate, that in itself is often an affront to members of the House of Commons who say that on important subjects they were not elected to this House to pass motions in a wooden way without debate.

The rule has very severe limitations on it, because if the solution proposed is that motions be passed without debate, that is not very satisfactory. If it is because it is worthwhile they are debated, then that obviously is not satisfactory either because there is no time and, therefore, the rule is now being used primarily as a replacement for a grievance procedure which is non-existent. Again, I say that perhaps the most important note was that from the hon. member for Edmonton West, that is, if changes in this and other procedures are going to be made, it will have to be a matter for study and recommendation by the procedure committee.

It is not a matter for the Chair and it is not a matter of privilege in its basic form, but it certainly is an admonition and a hope that the procedures committee might examine this at the earliest possible moment. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was very realistic in saying that the hope it might be done between now and a general election is very slim indeed, but perhaps his prediction may be right for the date and wrong for the calendar year, in which case there will be lots of time to get it through.

MR. ALKENBRACK—EXTENSION OF ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege which has a relationship to the important point of privilege raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and other hon. members of the House, including the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). It is just of a little different nature.

In my 16 years as a member of this House this is the first complaint, sir, of this nature, that I have ever made to you, or any other able or respected occupant of the chair, and I am confident that it will be given your able consideration. It arises because of my inability to ask an important question in the interests of 120 petitioning constituents that I tried to ask twice last week, and again today.

Sir, there is nothing more important than the oral question period in the operations of this House and the rights of members and their constituents. The following is my point of privilege, with my constant respect for the Chair.

The privileges of all backbench members are lately very much limited and denied by too protracted questions and unreasonably long answers permitted in this House, resulting in many members being precluded from placing important questions before you. If these intolerable conditions continue, then as a reasonable concession to the privileges of all backbench members, I ask the Chair to consider the extension of the oral question period in order that important problems of our constituents might be made known to this House, and to the government, and or failing that, that there be strict limitation on the length of questions and long speeches by ministers serving as answers.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, during the past number of weeks I have been trying to ask questions that were very important not only to my constituents but probably to other members and people across the country interested in these questions, and I have been unable to catch Mr. Speaker's eye. During my observations here in the House I have noticed many backbenchers become very discouraged when they have repeatedly tried to ask a question on behalf of their constituents, something that is not only very important to them but very very important to the people that elected them.

I know that your job is sometimes a very very difficult one, Mr. Speaker, but I think that probably there should be more consideration given to backbenchers in the question period, particularly to the opposition, I often think that some people must envy your position, with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, because I see you get prompt attention from your mailmen and little notes that go up to the Chair. I know that all this has placed you in a very awkward position, but I would like you and other members of the House to realize also the position in which it puts the ordinary member. He has to answer to his constituents at home, not only why he was not on his feet in the House of Commons on every subject, but why he was not bringing to the members of this House the problems that are facing this country today in which they are all interested. I would like to speak at some length on this but I realize our time is precious. An hour and a half have been taken approximately on questions of privilege today, and at this time I will go no further on the matter.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I heartily agree with the hon. gentleman because even my constituents are wondering why, on this side, members do not ask any questions. In fact a very wonderful lady not only wrote me, Mr. Speaker, but she asked me why we do not ask questions of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). She was wondering why, since we have television in the House, Liberal members do not ask questions of the other side. It is very important and it shows that the people of the country are very very interested indeed in what we are saying.

I have all the sympathy in the world for the opposition in regard to the backbenchers on that side having to take a second place in many instances to those who are asking questions because, as is obvious, Mr. Speaker, many of our members on this side do not get a chance to ask questions. We are batting an extremely good average if one or two of our members ask a question in this House in any one day. We realize, of course, that it is the role of the opposition to ask questions, but we also realize that the general public, since we have television in this House, are wondering why we on this side sit like dead ducks and are not ourselves asking some pertinent questions. It would be wonderful for us to send Hansard back to our constituents and to let them know the questions we have asked in this House, and also to show them the interest that we have in representing them here which we like to do as well as does the loyal opposition.

I want to let it be known, sir, that the rules to be brought forth, the important matters which the loyal opposition bring to your attention should also apply to us on this side of the House on an equal status.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) shared with that good lady who wrote him the news that he will be able to ask questions of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, since this has been brought up by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) I, too, would like to express a certain amount of frustration with regard to the question of privilege raised by my good friend, the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack). I think that a good deal of the problem stems from the lengthy answers that we receive from the ministers on the opposite side.

I am sure you realize the frustrations that the average backbench member of parliament experiences when seeking your recognition, and I say this with the highest amount of respect for yourself, Your Honour. But the difficulty lies in a backbench member rising to seek recognition. He can do it for the period of a week and by then the question is outdated. He also has to work in conjunction with the timetable of the minister opposite, hoping that he will be in the House.

I just wish to take this opportunity too, sir, to share with you my deep respect for the hon. members on this side of the House who took time to raise this very important issue in regard to the privileges of backbench members of parliament. It shows the legitimate concern they have for we more junior members in this House of Commons. I would like to pay tribute to the right hon. member for Prince Albert for bringing this to the fore, and to the leader of our party.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, this is a very, very amusing interesting debate on the "ordinary member". I am beginning to wonder which member of this House is the ordinary member unless it is the Independent member of the House of Commons—the one who was elected as an independent member of the House of Commons, sir. There is no person in this House who really has been discriminated against more times and in more ways by the legislation that is presented.

I ask the government and I ask the opposition to examine the debate today on the word no. I heard a debate today on the word no. It is an amazing thing to me for the leader of that party to use the word no. I have had it said to me by members of that party so many times it is not even funny.

• (1632)

Getting back to the question, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) does not speak to me, and I do not speak to him, according to the papers, but this question of privilege is a good one. I have been on my feet for at least three or four weeks straight trying to ask questions in this House. During that time I have been in to see Mr. Speaker. He has promised me that the next day I will be permitted to ask a question. However, I do understand his problem, and he has a devilish problem. He has members of the opposition parties, and I am not a member of an opposition party—God forbid—asking lengthy questions which could be shortened down into very brief questions. If questions are to be asked during the question period they should be brief, and supplementary questions should be shortened.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the preambles are too long you should cut them off, snuff them out, and if the answers are verbose, toss the answers out. I think we could reduce these questions and answers so that we could all get a break and a crack at asking questions and receiving answers. If members were given this break, and Cabinet ministers did their homework and knew the answers, we would be better off. If ministers do not know the answers they should say they do not know.

I know kids who have gone through school and graduated with Ph.D's who still at times have to say they do not know the answers but will get them for me. The ministers should be truthful and tell us they do not know. That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to ask a question tomorrow!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: In fairness I must note there are several other members who want to participate in this discussion. This is a matter of great importance raised by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack), the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott), and others who have contributed.

I think we all understand the very difficult constraints we operate under during the question period. There have been times when I have had to admonish members on both sides of the House about making questions and answers brief. We have a show of splendid co-operation then for a short period of time, which soon tends to dissipate. It is difficult for the Chair to see members of the House trying day after day to be recognized, and know that their legitimate questions are being deferred because of pressing matters of national concern that do take up a good deal of time.

On the other hand, it is not very appropriate for the Chair to be intervening constantly to keep members on both sides of the House under check. We have to try to strike a balance.

It is ironic, I think, that today, if my memory serves me correctly, and I tend to remember these things with great relish, the question period began on an exemplary note. It seems to me the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), in leading off today, asked questions on matters of the economy. He and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) had a series of four questions and answers in the space of less than five minutes. If we could do that every day it would be a wonderful thing. However, thereafter it seems that things began to run downhill. Many questions and many answers were lengthy. Both sides were equally at fault.

Perhaps I should, after these representations, try to intervene more often. I do not like to intervene too often. On the other hand, I do see the problem building up. It will be interesting to note tomorrow how much assistance and co-operation we can get. Perhaps it will be enough to last us all the way through until Easter.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-28, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect for your position and for you yourself, and I want to preface my remarks by saying I have the greatest admiration for you any your sense of justice, I do feel that backbenchers on this side did not have a chance even to comment on a debate about the ability of backbenchers to ask questions. I rose in the hope that I could make just a short comment, but I was not recognized. I would appreciate being given the right to speak for the backbenchers on this side of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) was standing, as was the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) and two or three other hon. members in this corner, including the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). I think we all recognize that the matter was not essentially a question of privilege but a very serious grievance. Therefore, I attempted to get a general participation. There was, I thought, a rather able respresentation from the government side of the House by the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay). I might have carried on and heard all other members, but I thought I had heard sufficient on the matter.

I regret that all hon. members were not given a chance to participate. If I wanted to take a very hard line perhaps I should have closed it off right at the beginning because the matter was not essentially a question of privilege, but rather a serious grievance. I have been well advised of it and I hope we can improve the situation as quickly as possible. I regret that all hon. members who wanted to contribute could not do so.

4. 1975-1976: No record; 1976-1977: No record. As the term Multicuturalism Directorate denotes a structure unit created for the implementation of the multiculturalism policy, all employees of the directorate are involved in the implementation of the Multiculturalism Programme.

Question No. 891—Mr. Mitges:

Of those programmes of the Multiculturalism Directorate which are not involved in distributing grants and contributions, in what way is the productivity of the programme assessed?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): The productivity is assessed by the intensity of liaison with client groups; volume of correspondence; reports of conferences, seminars and workshops; summaries of research studies and surveys. As multiculturalism deals with such socio-cultural concepts and problems as inter-group relations, cultural integration, cultural sharing impact on ethnic groups, etc. an effective asessment would necessitate a costly socio-metric study.

Question No. 892—Mr. Mitges:

1. For 1977-78 what new programmes have been or are going to be introduced into the Multiculturalism Directorate and, in each case, which ones will (a) be involved (b) not be involved, in distributing grants?

2. What number of staff are expected to be associated with each programme and how many will be (a) permanent (b) part-time (c) on contract (d) term?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): 1. The only new programme introduced for 1977-1978 is the Cultural Enrichment Programme to encourage and support voluntary organizations which undertake projects and activities of cultural enrichment through the preservation and development of languages other than English and French.

2. One person (permanent) will co-ordinate this program at headquarters. The operations by and large are decentralized and are being implemented by existing field staff.

INVESTMENT INCENTIVES PROGRAMME

Question No. 922—Mr. Herbert:

Does the government intend to introduce a combined grant and tax incentive programme to encourage companies to invest in research and development in Canada in cases where there is presently a choice of another and more attractive location?

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): In 1977 the government extended the 5 per cent investment tax credit for a further three years and expanded it to cover both current and capital expenditures on scientific research and development. In addition, the rate of the credit was increased in areas designated under the Regional Development Incentives Act. In Saskatchewan, Manitoba, northern Ontario, northern Alberta, northern British Columbia, the Northwest Territories and all designated regions in Quebec other than the Gaspé, the rate of the tax credit was raised to 7½ per cent. In the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec the rate of the credit was increased to 10 per cent. In addition to the investment tax credit, an immediate deduction is allowed under the Income Tax Act for both current and capital expenditures on scientific research related to the business of the taxpayer. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce provides assistance to business under the Enterprise Development Program. This program, introduced in 1977, replaced a number of assistance programs to business including: PAIT: Program for Advancement of Industrial Technology; IDAP: Industrial Design Assistance Program; GAAP: General Adjustment Assistance Program; AAA: Automotive Adjustment Assistance Program; FTIAP: Footwear and Tanning Industry Adjustment Program, and; PIDA: Pharmaceutical Industry Development Assistance Program; PEP: Program to Enhance Productivity. The government is very much aware of the vital importance of maintaining the competitiveness of Canadian technology. Accordingly, the effectiveness of these incentives and the need for additional stimulus is under review.

CANADA MANPOWER INDUSTRIAL TRAINING PROGRAMME

Question No. 1,075—Mr. Benjamin:

1. Did the Department of Employment and Immigration provide funds in the past two years to Canadian Pacific Railway for on-the-job training of trainmen, apprentice engineers, engineer trainees, road foremen or carmen and, if so, what amount was provided in the (a) Moose Jaw (b) Saskatoon division?

2. Was there any cost of living arrangements made for instructors and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Yes, in the past two years, sixteen brakemen (yard) and ten locomotive engineers were trained under the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program, which includes on-the-job training. (a) Moose Jaw Division: $4,412. (b) Saskatoon Division: $18,411.

2. Yes, in the amount of $288.

PUBLICATIONS SUSPENDED BY DEPARTMENT OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Question No. 1,079—Mr. Stevens:

Was publication of any newsletter, information sheet or other similar document produced by the Department of Employment and Immigration suspended at any time in the last year and, if so, in each case (a) what was its title (b) what was the subject-matter (c) for what reason (d) how long did or will the supsension last?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a) Canada Manpower and Immigration Review. (b) Information and statistics on Canadian labour market from public sources and reviews of manpower and immigration developments in Canada. (c) Economy measure. (d) For an indeterminate period.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. JONES—DELAY IN ANSWERING STARRED QUESTION NO. 145

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to re-hash this, but I have starred question No. 145 which has been on the order paper since October 19, and was previously on the order paper in July, 1977. It has not been answered. I think if the parliamentary secretary would get those who should do the leg work, some of those lazy bureaucrats, off their butts, they could get that answer to us, and get it to us forthwith.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a question which concerns various departments and, generally, those departments' public servants do a very good job of answering questions for the House. As for the hon. member's question, I will make sure he gets an answer as soon as possible.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

Hon. Judd Buchanan (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think that hon. members are aware that in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board I have been asked to present in his name the remarks he would have liked to make himself before the House this afternoon. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in his statement to the House last April, on the occasion of second reading of the Auditor General Act, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced the intention of the government to create the office of the Comptroller General of Canada. That measure follows the main recommendation of the annual report of the Auditor General of Canada presented in 1976.

The object of Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, is to establish a position of deputy head of a department whose incumbent, made accountable to the Treasury Board, would be made responsible for ensuring the quality and the integrity of the financial administration systems and the related practices and methods used in the federal public service. Hon. members will not fail to notice that the wording of the proposed amendment reflect the provisions of section 4(2) of the Financial Administration Act. This section describes the rank and status of the Treasury Board secretary. The Comptroller General will be responsible to the President of the Treasury Board and this office will actually be a new and somewhat specialized body serving the Treasury Board. It is therefore important that the part of the act governing among other things the structure of the board as well as the implementation of its responsibilities in the field of management, be modified.

In his previous statement, Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board described the main tasks and responsibilities of that new function. Not only will the Comptroller General have to answer to the Treasury Board on the quality and the integrity of the financial management policy, on the ways and control systems, but he will also have to establish and implement the policies, procedures and ways needed to assess the efficiency and the working of government programs, and submit reports on those matters. To prevent any misunderstanding, I would like to take a few moments to discuss the nature of the relations between the Comptroller General, on the one hand, and the other deputy heads of departments, the government, the Auditor General and the secretary of the Treasury Board, on the other hand.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, to keep in mind that in matters of financial management and control, basic responsibility and accountability are at the subhead level, where they should remain. However, as pointed out by the Auditor General in his report of last year, efficient control includes the distribution of responsibilities and system so that the work of one person or system component be constantly and automatically checked by another person on component, without unnecessary overlapping.

Therefore, while comptrollers in the various departments will report directly to their subheads, a functional relationship will develop with the Comptroller General, who will be the outside official responsible for scrutinizing department systems. The Comptroller General will issue guidelines to help departments discharge their responsibilities in respect of financial management and program evaluation practices.

Mr. Speaker, as is clearly stated in this legislation, the Comptroller General would report to the government through the President of the Treasury Board. This involves a logical and necessary relationship. Systems under the Comptroller General are aimed at ensuring that the government have pertinent, precise and complete information. In the development of systems, the incumbent should therefore consult the people who will be using them and account for the resources used. Such a relationship with the government would also enhance the Auditor General's efficiency, allowing as it would the nomination of a high-ranking official who would be charged mainly with financial control and other control and reporting systems, and to whom the Auditor General could give certain precise comments.

[English]

The Auditor General will continue to be the person who reports to parliament and who will examine the public accounts to make sure they satisfy parliament's interests. Any differences between the office of the Comptroller General and the office of the Auditor General will normally be resolved through discussions between the respective offices and, when they remain unresolved, would be reported in the Auditor General's annual report. These interrelationships should promote not only improved managerial effectiveness of government operations but also more complete and accurate information to parliament.

In light of the close functional relationship between the proposed position of Comptroller General and the existing position of Secretary of the Treasury Board, I want to reiterate that the introduction of this new office will not in any way change the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury Board in the field of resource allocation.

As explained in detail to the Public Accounts Committee last April 26, the Secretary will retain responsibility for the direction of the resource allocation and the control processes of funds; and ensure that they will not be reallocated without due authority. The Comptroller General will ensure compliance with the financial and other related control policies of the government. In other words, he will oversee the practices and procedures to ensure that the government's operations are as efficient as possible.

In terms of specific allocation of human resources and functions, hon. members will recall that many of these duties which the proposed Comptroller General will assume are, at the moment, assigned to the financial administration branch and the efficiency evaluation branch of the Treasury Board secretariat. These two branches will therefore be transferred to and form the nucleus of the comptroller general's organization.

Beyond these changes I must add, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of the work undertaken to date on certain aspects of financial administration, a variety of more technical amendments should be made to the Financial Administration Act. It is hoped that these proposed amendments can be introduced in the near future. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that our demonstrated efforts, and indeed achievements in this whole area of financial management, are a tangible proof of our determination to maintain the highest possible standards of control in this all important area of governmental administration.

The Auditor General, himself, commented in this annual report that the initiatives this government has taken with respect to guidelines for Crown corporations, the new Auditor General's Act, and the increase in funds allocated to his office, and I quote:

> . . . taken together . . . comprise strong appropriate and effective measures to achieve, ultimately, a satisfactory system of financial management and control within the federal government and restoration to parliament of an appropriate degree of control over the public purse.

[Mr. Lefebvre.]

We are happy with this recognition of our efforts and our accomplishments by the Auditor General while, simultaneously, agreeing with his observations that there is more to do in the area of financial management and control. The "action-oriented leadership" that he hopes for will derive from the position of comptroller general.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that this bill will be given speedy approval, thus enabling the incumbent of this new position to get on with the further improvements that we wish to make in this vital area.

● (1652)

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are considering at second reading today what I am sure must be the shortest bill of this session and perhaps of any session, but it is a bill which could have profound implications for the operation of the administrative functions of government. This bill, therefore, is vitally important.

The bill purports to establish a senior financial officer for the government who would, in carrying out his functions, assure that proper financial management and control procedures are used within the government. I use the word "purports" because that is in fact not what this bill does. This bill merely creates another deputy minister. That is the sole impact of this bill. The bill ascribes to that position a title different from those currently in use in the civil service. That is all the bill does, absolutely nothing more, and let this House and the country not be led to believe that merely through the passage of this legislation we are proceeding toward better financial management and control which, as the Auditor General has pointed out, are so necessary because of the sorry state of financial management and control in this government.

I have to ask, what is in a name? The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) through press releases and other comments, including those in this House—although they were uttered today by his parliamentary secretary because the minister evidently does not feel this legislation is important enough to warrant his being here to introduce it—would have us believe that this legislation, coupled with the hiring of Mr. Harry Rogers, who is to occupy the position created by this legislation, is somehow an adequate response to the recommendations of the Auditor General in his report of 1976, which were repeated, incidentally, in his report of 1977. I do not believe it is unfair to ask what magic occurs when, instead of designating the position title as deputy minister, secretary or under-secretary, as these positions are known throughout the civil service, the person is instead designated comptroller general? What magic occurs as a result of that designation which gives that individual the authority to fulfil the obligations and responsibilities the Auditor General clearly indicates are in such desperate need of fulfilment?

Unless this legislation is substantially amended to define within this act the roles, obligations, and responsibilities of a comptroller general, then through the passage of this bill we will have done absolutely nothing more than create another deputy minister. Frankly, it is medicine show flimflam. The President of the Treasury Board is the flimflam man who stands before the House and the people of Canada and says that in this medicine he is now flimflamming he has the cure for the Canadian government's financial management and control problems. All he has is a bottle with a different title, but the bottle is the same as the other bottles on the shelf.

I want to make it clear that in no way am I expressing criticism of Mr. Harry Rogers. While he is not known to me personally, by all accounts he is a man of outstanding capabilities and precisely the type of man who will make a very welcome addition to the senior levels of government, particularly in the area of financial management.

However, we are terribly concerned that by giving Mr. Rogers a title and absolutely nothing else by way of authority we shall be causing him to operate under such a handicap that his chances of truly addressing and arresting the trends of financial mismanagement so clearly outlined by the Auditor General will be minimal at best.

It is well worth recalling the observation made by the Auditor General in his 1975 report in which he stated as an initial conclusion of the financial management and control study started in May, 1974, that:

> The present state of the financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

In support the Auditor General gave numerous examples of the waste which was resulting therefrom and proposed a number of recommendations for remedial action. One year later, as a result of further study, in his 1976 annual report the Auditor General was moved to state:

> Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General financial management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

That kind of audit for a privately owned company would result in the bottom falling out of its share prices on the stock exchange, probable delisting by the regulatory authorities of the provinces, and certainly the immediate dismissal of at least the senior financial officers of that corporation. Of course nothing of the sort happened in this instance.

The Auditor General offered a number of recommendations for ways to improve the financial management and control of the federal government's operation, and key amongst these was the recommendation that a Comptroller General be selected and appointed. The Auditor General then went on to describe in some detail the type of person who should be hired for this position and the types of functions that would come under the authority of this individual.

In addition, he proposed other changes in the operation of government which would lead to better and more effective financial management and control. I will not repeat all of these, but I think it is worth repeating for the record paragraph 2.15 of the Auditor General's report of 1976 in which he stated:

> To avoid any possibility of misunderstanding, I should emphasize my belief that a fundamental restructuring of the Treasury Board secretariat is required. The functions relating to resource allocation, personnel policy, administrative policy, and management of the official languages program, would remain with the Secretary of the Treasury Board or would be otherwise assigned as the Government may decide. All functions relating to financial management and control would be assigned to the Comptroller General of Canada, a deputy head like any other but with a status comparable to that of the Secretary of the Treasury Board. His responsibilities relative to other deputy heads and his relationships with departmental financial officers are described in Part 3 of this Report. His basic responsibilities would include the design, development, implementation and monitoring of adequate systems and procedures to ensure that the form of the Estimates provides a sound basis for the Government's budgetary control system, that public moneys and assets are under effective custody and control at all times, that accounting procedures and financial reports throughout government (including the Public Accounts) conform to acceptable accounting principles and standards, that expenditures of public moneys are made with due regard for economy and efficiency, and that satisfactory procedures measure the effectiveness of programs where they could reasonably be expected to apply. The responsibility for maintaining the central accounts of Canada would be transferred to the Office of the Comptroller General from the Department of Supply and Services where it is now located.

In other words, the Auditor General was very specific as to the functions and responsibilities of the Comptroller General and defined clearly what his role should be. Thus it comes as some surprise and, indeed, is somewhat disturbing to see that the legislation the government produces in response to this very proper recommendation of the Auditor General really only creates another deputy minister and gives him the title of Comptroller General. As I asked earlier, what is in a name? How can just a name provide the necessary authority to fulfil the responsibilities which clearly should come within the range of responsibilities of the new Comptroller General? To understand this obvious omission from the bill we have to examine the government's initial responses to the recommendations of the Auditor General. We have to speculate some about the internal debate that must have occurred in cabinet prior to the decision being made that indeed somebody would be appointed and be given the title of Comptroller General.

The House will recall that when the Auditor General first made his recommendation in his report in the early winter of 1976 the initial response of the government was negative. Then the government said, "No, we do not want a comptroller general, an appointment such as that would interfere with such things as ministerial responsibility, the smooth operation of the civil service, the Privy Council office" and all other manner of things. However, the gross mismanagement brought to the attention of the House and the public of Canada through the Auditor General's report caused the public to state that that was quite an unacceptable response from the government. The government could mutter about ministerial responsibility all it wanted, but the people of Canada wanted much more control over the management of their tax moneys. This pressure caused the government to do a flip-flop.

In April of 1977 the President of the Treasury Board indicated that the government had decided, after all, to accept the recommendation of the Auditor General and hire a Comptroller General. While we can never be sure why the government did not accept this proper recommendation of the Auditor General straight away, we can engage in some fairly accurate speculation as to the reasons. Certainly we all have our sources and we have heard of the rumours and mutterings that were part of this debate.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the office of the Comptroller General will result in another central agency function which will restrict the flexibility of the managers of existing departments and agencies of the government. Nobody wants another authority looking over their shoulder to ensure that they are performing their financial functions properly. It is an additional annoyance to deputies, assistant deputies and so on. Consequently, they resisted it, and resisted it quite vigorously. Such resistance may well have been merited had these senior officials been demonstrably efficient and effective in fulfilling their responsibilities, which clearly the Auditor General indicates they have not been.

It is common at this point for ministers and their deputies to invoke the principle of ministerial responsibility in defending their position. Their arguments go something like this. They say: "Look, we have a job to do, we have certain responsibilities to perform and a department to manage." Let us manage that department and, under the principle of ministerial responsibility, the minister is thereby accountable for any mismanagement in his department. We need no further checks. Let us manage. We have ministerial responsibility. Ministers will be responsible and then democracy will take care of things. We have a great deal of recent experience, to indicate that when in fact it becomes time to face up to the responsibilities the principle of ministerial responsibility seems to collapse. We have especially during this administration had numerous instances where examples of gross incompetence have been evidenced all the way from the Bonaventure to the recent AECL escapade. We have had examples of clear-cut illegal activity.

The Auditor General's report is full of examples of sheer mismanagement. Yet at no time in the last 10 years has any minister resigned or been asked to resign as a result of incompetent or illegal activity occurring under his area of ministerial responsibility. Nor indeed, Mr. Speaker, have there been any examples of any senior civil servants having to pay the price for gross mismanagement under their areas of responsibility. Therefore when any minister or deputy minister or Prime Minister or anybody else tries to claim to this House and to the public that the doctrine of ministerial responsibility provides the necessary safeguards, checks and balances, they are guilty of peddling the flimsiest and shabbiest flimflam.

The net effect of that whole operation is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his principal secretary, Michael Pitfield, make the decisions; the ministers are merely mouthpieces. That is the net result of this horrible complex collegial system which the government has put in place. Under those circumstances how can we talk about ministerial responsibility?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is being told by his officials today to bring forward a budget. He would like to bring forward a budget, but it is not his decision. Some committee in cabinet is sitting before the Privy Council office. The Minister of Finance is the mouthpiece, he is here to explain. If he does not explain a situation properly he will be transferred to another job and another mouthpiece will be appointed. But to suggest the Minister of Finance is making decisions and to hold him responsible is ridiculous.

There is no opportunity for the public to supervise ministerial responsibility. Can we supervise ministerial responsibility as members of parliament? We had a discussion this afternoon about the difficulty of members of parliament in even getting their questions before the House. There is no way that a committee of the House can summon a minister before it. There is no way we can force a minister to answer. There was a time when the House could hold up the estimates of a minister's department until he gave members the answers and they got the answers they wanted.

When it comes time to cover up and hide and to resist freedom of information action, we have ministerial responsibility trumpeted forward. When it is time to face up to responsibilities aften something has happened and when a "boo-boo" has been brought to the public's eyes, well, ministerial responsibility is quickly abandoned. How are we expected to supervise ministerial responsibility? How is that responsibility ever measured, assessed, or how does anyone hold a minister responsible? Can it be done at elections?

There have been 115 ministerial changes in the last 10 years. If someone is dissatisfied at the way the Post Office is being run, what minister will they hold responsible? There have been four or five ministers over the last few years. If someone is angry at the solicitor general's operation, who will they hold responsible? How can there be ministerial responsibility when no minister stays put and they are moved around? It is musical chairs. Then there is the cabinet system, the so-called collegial system which this government runs. Ministers do not make decisions in this government. Decisions are made in committee in this collegial apparatus. There is committee upon committee upon committee. That procedure has been taken away from us. There is no such authority. There is absolutely no way in which the House of Commons can hold a minister responsible or can force him to live up to his responsibilities.

To talk about ministerial responsibility is strictly a sham. It should be dismissed from the lexicon of arguments. We do not have ministerial responsibility under this particular government.

It is necessary therefore for parliament to build into this legislation the type of activity and performance we expect from a Comptroller General so that he can in his day to day administration, ensure that proper respect is paid for the taxpayers' money, otherwise the government will do whatever it wants and we will have had no change from the current situation which the Auditor General points out is in disarray.

Nobody in this party likes the notion of imposing new central control or more bureaucracy, more red tape on an already overburdened government. However, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing we like less and that is the waste and mismanagement of the public's funds and, therefore, because of the failure of this government truly to be responsible or to exercise ministerial responsibility, we see no alternative but to accept and strongly advocate the prescription of the Auditor General, namely, to put in place a Comptroller General with the necessary authority to fulfil the functions as defined in paragraph 2.15 of the Auditor General's report of 1976.

• (1712)

The other argument used internally to try to dissuade the House or the internal decision makers from the idea of a Comptroller General, making sure that the Comptroller General never in fact has any authority, is that you are really not talking about very much money after all. It is really peanuts. If we had brought in a Comptroller General and he really did his job, he might save a few tens, hundreds, or maybe millions, and what is that in terms of a $50 billion budget? That is the argument on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: It used to be said that if you looked after the dimes, the dollars would look after themselves. In this case, if you look after the millions, the billions will take care of themselves. More important than the amount of money, and I agree in terms of a $50 billion budget sometimes $10 million, $20 million, $30 million or $100 million, does not have that much impact, is the attitude of disrespect for money which the public has. That is extremely important.

As a member of parliament I am running into a situation that I am sure honest members opposite would have to admit exists. There is a reluctance to pay tax. Because they read and know about the $2 million given to Shaul Eisenberg, the $17 million spent here, blown there, poured down the drain here or poured down the drain there, there is a genuine reluctance on the part of people to pay taxes.

Accountants tell me they are being asked by their clients to do things in terms of their tax returns which, if they had suggested them to their clients ten years ago, the clients would have fired them. There is a change in attitude. They feel the government has so little respect for their tax dollars that there is a sort of gamesmanship building up whereby they will do their best to prevent the government from getting any of it. They will keep back as much as they can. That is a change in attitude in ten years. Ten years ago the feeling was that a citizen had a responsibility to contribute his share. That responsibility was looked upon as an honour, one of the privileges of living in a free society.

The other aspect of mismanagement and wastage of money which is having a terrible effect upon the body politic is the contempt the public is beginning to feel toward government and politicians. They watch the manner in which their money is being poured down the drain. They read of wastage in the Auditor General's report. They read that the situation in terms of financial management is serious, grossly inadequate. That causes them to have serious contempt toward the government and toward the politicians because we get lumped in with the government, in their view. That is not healthy for the country and our democratic system.

We hear from cabinet and senior officials comments such as "Even in industry things are not handled properly. Occasionally something is spilled, but so what? It is not very important in the whole scheme of things. It is not that much money." We hear ministers and deputies talk as though it is their money. They talk as though the money involved belongs to the government. They say the government tries to do a good job of spending, but if they spill a little bit here and there, corporations do the same.

It is not like industry where the money belongs to the corporation. If they want to spill it, that is their business. Here the money does not belong to the government, but to the taxpayers. The government is merely the trustee of those funds. As trustee, it does not have the right to state that it will sacrifice a little efficiency for speed, flexibility, and all those things that senior officials and cabinet ministers want. It does not have that right when acting as trustee of the public's money.

We need ongoing, regular, day-to-day precautions, procedures and control mechanisms to ensure that this money is treated as it is, namely, money held by government in trust for taxpayers. It does not belong to the government, to those who play with it. When they start thinking that way, we are in trouble.

Colleagues from my party will have more to say about the government's failure to manage its responsibilities properly and, indeed Mr. Speaker, we in this party have a considerable number of recommendations to make to the government on ways in which it could reorganize itself, and indeed divest itself of some of its responsibilities so that it might better manage the ones that remain. I will not take up much time in the House in my remarks but I do indicate to the President of the Treasury Board, or his parliamentary secretary, that while we intend to support this legislation at second reading because we strongly believe in the necessity for a Comptroller General, we are most unhappy with the fact that this bill does not provide a definition of that function, and in committee we will be demanding that additional clauses be added to the bill so that Mr. Rogers, when he assumes his responsibility, has the necessary legislative authority to perform this most vital function which he is called upon to perform.

Without legislative authority, there is one chance in ten that the Comptroller General will be able to perform the job he is called upon to perform. The cabinet and the senior civil service do not want a Comptroller General and resisted it mightily, and only the overwhelming weight of public opinion caused them to rescind on this resistance.

An hon. Member: How do you know that?

Mr. Andre: I keep my ears open. You should do the same. In the interest of proceeding expeditiously with this bill in committee, I wish to repeat something for the benefit of the parliamentary secretary. I hope he will take it to his boss who, for some reason, did not think it necessary to be here when this bill was being discussed. I refer to the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. That is a remark the hon. member should regret. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has a very important bill for first reading on the PSSRA amendments. After waiting in this House for over an hour while another debate was going on, he was called to a conference to explain the details of that bill. I have been a member of this House for 12 years and a member of the Public Accounts committee for seven years. I believe I am quite able to represent the minister on an occasion such as this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: As the parliamentary secretary indicated, the President of the Treasury Board scheduled these events so that he could not be here this afternoon. He sets his own priorities. That is up to him. He can do what he wants.

I will repeat something for the benefit of the parliamentary secretary who, if he is as competent as he indicated, will have no trouble communicating this message. It is vital that there be a Comptroller General in place in the government apparatus to bring the serious situation, to use the words of the Auditor General, under control. It is absolutely essential that he have legislative authority to perform his function. Without that, he will be gobbled up in a huge mass of whatever. There is not one chance in ten that the necessary controls can be brought in unless he has the authority of parliament to perform his function. We will be insisting upon that. We shall be insisting upon it. I do not think it is an unreasonable request, provided the government is sincere in its desire to have a Comptroller General with muscle. There will be no difficulty in agreeing with us that legislative authority should be granted. On that basis we could get the measure through committee in half an hour, get it back before the House, and implement it in short order.

● (1722)

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the measure before us relates to one of the recommendations presented by the Auditor General to parliament in his 1976 report. Hon. members will recall the language of the 1976 report by the Auditor General. He said that expenditures were out of control. He indicted the system which had developed following the implementation of the recommendations of the Glassco Commission of a decade earlier. He drew attention to the fact that there had at one time been an office of comptroller general, one which had been abolished in a desire to decentralize government operations. The philosophy of the Glassco Commission was to let the deputy ministers manage. In the name of that philosophy, the central controls which had previously existed within the Treasury Board were substantially relaxed and the mechanism which Mr. Glassco had devised to replace them were not put into operation.

The response of the government to the serious charges made by the Auditor General took many forms. The first was a substantial improvement in the staffing of the Auditor General's department and a significant increase in its budget. The second was the presentation of special legislation relating to the Auditor General which had been a dream of his predecessors in office. This bill, introduced by government and passed by parliament, pioneered some of the concepts of the functions of an Auditor General. In addition to a post-audit of expenditures, the Auditor General was empowered to consider the question of value for money spent and to break new ground in trying to improve the efficiency of government operations. But the government's response has not been limited to these things.

In the field of Crown corporations, a special investigation is under way under Mr. Lambert. We have issued guidelines to improve the operations of Crown corporations. The Public Accounts Committee, which includes the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre)—I am sure he will listen to me as courteously as I listened to him—has laboured long and hard trying to deal with the precise recommendations of the Auditor General and his staff. The government has decided that the recommendation concerning the Comptroller General, and his establishment at the level of deputy minister, are acceptable.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre is a good friend, and when we meet in committee our relations are always amiable; but I wonder whether he has really represented the response of the Auditor General correctly. I quote from the record of the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee—this is a direct quotation from the Auditor General:

> I would like to speak briefly on the Comptroller General, an announcement made by the minister yesterday and confirmed this morning. I am biased, completely biased, and I declare my bias. My bias lies in the fact that I think this is a tremendous forward step for the Government of Canada . . . I think—I will put my neck out here—this is going to represent a brand new chapter in financial control by the government of funds contributed by the taxpayers.

The record is there for anyone who wants to examine it.

No one can say the Public Accounts Committee or the government took lightly the criticisms which were put forward by the Auditor General. Quite the contrary. Every single major recommendation the Auditor General has put forward has now been given legislative effect. The bill before us today creates a new office. It is important to realize that under this bill the Comptroller General will not be responsible for day-to-day decisions as to how money is to be spent. That will still be the job of the deputy ministers. But within Treasury Board there will be two deputy heads, both with the rank of deputy minister. They will be responsible on the Treasury Board side for the allocation of resources and for the implementation of those financial control procedures which have been spelled out in such detail by the Auditor General.

In addition, as the hon. member for Calgary Centre has pointed out, the Comptroller General will have the responsibility of making sure that the estimates are in a form in which they will be of maximum use to members of this place when examining the record of public accounts. This is not an easy task as estimates get bigger and bigger. When you are spending upward of $45 billion a year it is a tough job to stay on top.

I listened again this afternoon to a version of the Golden Age from the hon. member for Calgary Centre. There was a time, he told us, when parliament could do things, when it could hold up a minister's estimates. Mr. Speaker, I was first elected to this parliament in 1963. There was no Golden Age. I remember a time when estimates were all taken in Committee of the Whole House. The opposition would zero in on one particular estimate. The government would rally in its defence. There would be division after division, and we would not change one dollar. The progress made, though, was very small and slow. I see my good friend from Nova Scotia sitting opposite and I know he will agree with what I am saying.

No really satisfactory mechanism has been devised either by this parliament or by any other parliament to vote supply in the way it was done a generation ago when supply was a relatively small item of business which could be easily envisaged and examined by an elected parliament of the nation.

The bill before us makes specific provision for what will be essentially a staff function provided within Treasury Board to the various departments of government. The Auditor General has enthusiastically endorsed it, and hon. members on the other side will, I am sure, all vote for it because they know in their hearts that it has to be done There will, of course, always be ways of improving the manner in which we deal with estimates. The sums of money now involved present a very great challenge to the parliament of any nation. I am pleased to be here today to lend my support to this bill.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, as a former chairman of the Public Accounts Committee I welcome the opportunity to speak on this bill. On the face of it, the measure looks rather simple and inoffensive, but I say that the necessity for introducing it shows there is something seriously wrong, otherwise the country would not require the services of a comptroller general.

I should like to take the House back to my native province for a minute or so. In Nova Scotia, in the old rum-running days, the ships used to carry a man called the supercargo. He was in addition to the captain. It was the supercargo's job to see that the rum was delivered to the right place and the right man in the right quantities. While today we are not dealing with rum, I submit to you, sir, that the principle is somewhat the same. We need a comptroller general to make certain the taxpayers of Canada receive value for their tax dollars, and that moneys allocated are used for the expressed purpose outlined by parliament instead of being spent on some pet project far in excess of the original estimates. We, of course, on this side support the thrust of this bill.

Someone may well ask, however, why we need a comptroller general? In my opinion, we need this super bureaucrat because our ship of state is way off course, and if we continue to follow our present route, our nation will find itself floundering on the rocks of disaster and despair.

In Ottawa today we have a government that ignores or intentionally misreads the lessons of history. Cabinet ministers call for national unity, for public confidence, and for spending restraints. They stand in this House and enunciate noble policies, high principles, and shining goals, but then they forget this high purpose, Mr. Speaker, when the day-to-day political game is played.

The diagnosis of Canada's sickness really does not require prolonged consultations or reference to complex charts. The reasons for our malady can be stated very clearly and very briefly. In the past two years or more we have tried to hide both the symptoms and the sickness like a social disease. We had hoped that our ailment would go away by itself if it could only be hidden or covered up. The truth is that it can only be cured when we expose it, when we recognize it, and deal with it now before more damage is done.

This, I submit to you, sir, is one of the reasons why we need a comptroller general, but I also believe there are others. We are still in the grip of serious inflation—something like 9 per cent annually. We have priced ourselves out of the world markets as well as out of our own markets. We are paying the penalty of high unemployment, again at the expense of our youth where we see admittedly something like 910,000 unemployed, and heaven only knows how many more who are not legally on the record. We are spending recklessly. We are borrowing needlessly, mindlessly. We are committing our children, and our children's children, to a debt for years to come—a debt we do not have the courage to face in our lifetime. We buy the dream of having the highest wage rate in the world, by printing more dollars, by issuing more bonds and by borrowing more money abroad—borrowing it almost on a daily basis now.

We accept almost without a murmur a budget deficit this year that will be as great as was our entire budget when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power. There are younger members of the House who may doubt that statement. They need only look back to the Treasury Board's publication of February 19, 1973, put out then by the Hon. C. M. Drury, President of the Treasury Board. In it you will see some very interesting figures. I hold it in my hand and you will see there listed under 1967-68 the total expenditures for all of Canada. We were a nation at that time of 20 million people. The total budget for all of Canada on that date was $9,872 million.

On March 31, 1977, the finance minister, Donald Macdonald, called for expenditures for 1977-78 of $41,900 million, with an estimated deficit of $7,160 million.

According to the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), on page 2 of the 1978-79 edition of "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent", we read the projected total spending is $44,450 million for 1977-78. Therefore this represents an increase of 8.2 per cent over the total 1976-77 expenditures. I say to you, sir, that it is also $2,550 million more than was predicted by his predecessor, for a total deficit of some $9,710 million to service now an estimated 23 million people in Canada.

These figures are frightening. Yet these people who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, have the gall to call this restraint. We have been preaching this type of restraint, according to Charles Lynch, as reported in the Gazette of February 23, for the past five years, so there is no question of where the fault lies. Now we know why the Auditor General stated in his 1976 report that he was deeply concerned that parliament and, indeed, the government, have lost or are losing effective control of the public purse.

What do we see on page 1 of the summary of the 1978-79 expenditures? According to the minister of finance, for the 78-79 fiscal year the target ceiling for total spending is $48,800 million. This, he states, would represent an increase of 9.8 per cent over projected total expenditures of $44,450 million for 1977-78. Because of its magnitude, Mr. Speaker, because of its importance, and to emphasize my point, I wish to recap those figures. This government under the present Prime Minister was elected in 1968, ten years ago. In that year "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent" listed total spending for Canadians by the federal government at $9,872 million. Now we are told, total spending—ten years later—will total $48,800 million or, in round figures, $39 billion more to service only an additional three million Canadians. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that we have massive unemployment? Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that we have horrendous inflation, plus a devalued dollar?

The financial insecurity brought about by the government's mismanagement of our economy has also brought us rates of crime, drug addiction, child abuse, violence, and sex perversion that are soaring to staggering levels. And as if this is not bad enough, we as Canadians must endure scandals in public affairs that make headlines every week. In these circumstances who should be surprised that our country is facing its most severe test of national unity in its 110 year history? The wonder is that other provinces as well as Quebec are not talking of leaving Confederation.

We must ask ourselves how this national tragedy happened when we are blessed with the second largest and richest land mass in the world. We are blessed with enormous resources in fresh water, minerals, forests, and arable land, with untold resources in and on three oceans. As well, our boundary to the south is protected by a powerful and friendly neighbour. The future is bleak, but our place in it is not entirely hopeless.

Present government spokesmen keep saying that our problems are largely due to general world conditions and that they have no remedy for this problem. This is a false doctrine. There is a great deal we can do about our future and our fate if our leaders have the courage to lead. Canada and Canadians can meet the challenge if we face up to reality. The road to national recovery may well be long and difficult, but the signposts now show the route very clearly.

Before this government can expect to command respect, it must first clean up its own act and make itself respectable both politically and economically and in its concept of public service. Members of the government must convince themselves and the nation that a united Canada is possible and worth striving for. Supporters of this government, some of whom refused to stand in this Chamber when I rose and led in the singing of "God Save the Queen" on the anniversary of her Silver Jubilee, must learn that patriotism is not an obsolete and ridiculous word.

This government must learn and must recognize that it can no longer buy its way out of trouble by more borrowing. More spending cannot cure inflation. If we pump up the money supply only to fund what in some cases amounts to useless projects, we will simply have more inflation, more unemployment, and nothing else. This government must realize that this nation can only be held together by encouraging a unity of spirit within the public mind, not by confrontation, wise-cracking, threatening, posturing, or through compulsive legislation. Without respect in high places, there can only be contempt, discontent, and disunity. These are simply some of the reasons why we in Canada need a comptroller general. Our problems are primarily economic while this government tries to deal with them from a cultural and linguistic point of view.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is insane to contemplate tearing our country apart simply because of pride of language or culture. The Prime Minister and Mr. Levesque, both of whom are cut from the same cloth, and came out of the same mould, must be made to realize, with the tragic examples before them of Ireland, Viet Nam, and Africa, that matters of culture, language, and religion cannot be enforced by oppressive legislation, or even by force of arms as has been suggested by the present Prime Minister, but can only be done by the desire of people to work together and live in tolerance, with mutual respect for each other.

The Prime Minister and Mr. Lévesque must learn that there are matters of greater human benefit and importance, not only in Canada but also in the world family of nations, than pride of language and emotional fervour over racial origins. These two men must learn that there are opportunities and there is plenty of room for everyone in Canada, except, I say to you, sir, political bigots.

International forecasts about the future of Canada are not very bright, and as a result of this there is a loss of confidence in Canada's future. Our dollar today is hovering around the 88-cent level vis-à-vis the American dollar. This is not due to a loss of confidence in Canada. I say to you, sir, it is due to a loss of confidence by the international financial community in the present Prime Minister and his colleagues.

These grim forecasts about our country going down the tube need not necessarily come true. I disagreed violently with the Prime Minister, for example, when he said on a CTV interview on December 28, 1975:

> We haven't been able to make it work—the free market system—the government is going to have to take a larger role in running institutions. It means there is going to be not less authority in our lives but perhaps more.

This is not the way in which leadership must be provided to this country if we are to go forward. There are solutions to our problems, but it is up to us as a people to find and implement them. To help remedy our national sickness this government must first set an example. This government must heed the old prescription of "physician heal thyself." The cure cannot be achieved with sugar-coated pills, cover-up tricks or clever repartee here in parliament. The nation is waiting to be convinced, waiting to work toward holding Canada intact, united, and strong.

Canadians, with few exceptions, know that Canada is worth fighting for and, who knows, this bill that we are debating today may well be a beginning. The Chinese say that a journey of a thousand miles begins with the first step. Hopefully this first small step is one in the right direction, for the need for a comptroller general is due to weak financial management and control of government programs, the lack of strong central direction by the Treasury Board, the growth of government spending, the lack of accountability to parliament, and the impact of government spending on Canada's economy.

As stated in the explanatory note of the bill:

> The purpose of this amendment is to establish the office of the Comptroller General of Canada and to provide for the assignment of duties and functions to the incumbent of the office.

The first part of the above objective formalizes the government's intention to create the position of comptroller general which is a positive response to the Auditor General's principal recommendation in his 1976 report.

The second part of the above objective, however, only provides for the assignment of duties and functions of the comptroller general. It does not, I repeat, spell them out in the legislation. Certainly, in my opinion, an outline of the major duties and responsibilities, if contained in the bill, would have strengthened this piece of legislation.

Even a person of Mr. Rogers' capability, the recent appointee to this position, will need all the support he can get from this parliament if he is to have a fighting chance to regain financial control over the federal government, and that is why I gave the earlier figures of the outlandish lack of control which has existed during the ten years of the present administration.

I say to you, sir, unless this bill is amended, parliament and the people will have no control over the role that the comptroller general will play, either now or in the future. In my opinion the duties of the comptroller general must be given legislative authority. I also find it regrettable that there is no provision in the bill for the comptroller general to report to parliament. I believe the annual report of the comptroller general to the Treasury Board should, by legislation, be referred to parliament for consideration by the Public Accounts Committee during its review of the Auditor General's report.

Just what have we on the record regarding this position? On April 25, 1977, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced in the House the government's intention to establish the position of comptroller general. He also placed on the record the relevant duties and responsibilities of the position, namely:

> The Comptroller General will report directly to the President of the Treasury Board. The office will carry the rank and status of a deputy minister. The Comptroller General will be responsible to the Treasury Board for the quality and integrity of the financial control systems and administrative policies and practices in use throughout the federal civil service.

It is worth while noting here that the greater part of these responsibilities will comprise those that were assigned to the financial administration branch of the Treasury Board secretariat, as created in March, 1976, under a deputy secretary, then Mr. Stuart Mensforth. The President of the Treasury Board also stated:

> A special functional relationship will exist between the Comptroller General and the chief financial administrators of departments, agencies and corporations, thus enabling the Comptroller General to provide necessary direction on financial matters.
> The Comptroller General's authority and responsibility will be applicable to expenditure control systems and related administrative practices and procedures, after and within the authorization of the allocation of resources by the Government and Parliament.

Here it is worth noting that the entire responsibility for the control and direction of the resource allocation and control processes will remain with the secretary of the Treasury Board, and will not be transferred to the comptroller general.

What does the Auditor General think of the comptroller general's responsibilities? In his 1976 report, page 16, he considers such a key position as "the most important and responsible financial position in both the public and private sectors of Canada."

Both the President of the Treasury Board and the Auditor General have indicated that a major restructuring of the Treasury Board secretariat will be required. The Auditor General sees the position of comptroller general as having a status comparable to that of the secretary of the Treasury Board. He also sees the responsibilities of the comptroller general to include clearly:

> The design, development, implementation and monitoring of adequate systems and procedures to ensure that:
> (1) The form of the estimates provides a sound basis for the government's buddgetary control system;
> (2) public moneys and assets are under his effective custody and control at all times;

I would point out that Bill C-10 does not deal with this interesting and necessary recommendation. It goes on to state:

> (3) accounting procedures and financial reports throughout government (including the public accounts) should conform to acceptable accounting principles and standards;
> (4) expenditures of public moneys are made with due regard for economy and efficiency;
>
> (5) satisfactory procedures measure the effectiveness of programs where they could reasonably be expected to apply; and
> (6) he should be maintaining the central accounts of Canada, a job which is presently being carried out by the Department of Supply and Services.

Again, sir, this recommendation is not a part of Bill C-10, and I submit that it should be.

In effect, what the Auditor General has advocated, and so far the government has agreed to only in principle, is the type of financial control exercised by the chief financial officer of virtually every business organization of any size in Canada or throughout the world.

The Auditor General also spells out the selection criteria for this position, and I quote him when he states:

> The Comptroller General must have the appropriate professional qualifications, with a proven record of outstanding competence and achievement at senior levels of responsibility, and with extensive experience as a senior financial executive in a large scale organization in either the public or private sectors. He must have the ability to gain quickly the confidence and respect of the Treasury Board, cabinet, parliamentary committees, heads of departments and Crown corporations who will look to him for functional leadership in financial matters.

● (1752)

These are very special qualities and I hope that when the government appointed Mr. Harry Rogers—a man whom I do not know personally but of whose abilities I have heard glowing accounts—the government was thinking about the Canadian people and their basic needs.

It is obvious from the facts that I put on the record that we are sadly in need of a comptroller general, for in his 1975 report, the Auditor General stated:

> The present state of the financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

The Auditor General further buttressed these comments by stating in his 1976 report:

> In the majority of the Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control is weak and ineffective. Moreover, co-ordination and guidance by central government agencies of financial management and control practices in these Crown corporations are virtually non-existent.

That is a frightening admission of the manner in which Crown corporations look after the tax dollars of the Canadian people.

After two years, the Auditor General finally reached the opinion, and I will quote the following statement from his 1976 report:

> Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control in the government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

In closing, I say to you, sir, that this is a damning criticism of this government's over-all management of the Canadian taxpayers' money, and I hope that by appointing a comptroller general we will help rectify the serious problem as it relates to the financial control of expenditures made by this government. This is the challenge he faces. The manner in which he carries out his duties may well determine, in light of what we hear today, whether Canada remains solvent or whether its financial structure is totally destroyed by the present government's incompetent management of our affairs.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate there are many things I would like to say on behalf of my party in addressing myself to Bill C-10 which has been a long time coming before the House for second reading. In view of the fact that the Auditor General suggested very strongly over two years that we should institute in our civil service in Ottawa the office of comptroller general, and in view of the fact that it is now about four minutes to six, I would appreciate it very much if I could call it six o'clock so that tomorrow I can begin the major portion of my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 5.55 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONDEMNATION OF ACTIONS OF CUBA ENDANGERING WORLD PEACE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, to move the following motion:

That this House views with alarm the conduct of President Castro of Cuba, the only communist leader in the Americas, for having recently increased the number of Cuban troops in Africa to 30,000 who are mobilized for action to remove existing governments and to substitute therefor communist administrations; and that this House calls on the government to inform Castro that his deplorable and shocking action is dangerous to world peace and must be discontinued and, if not, will cause Canada to consider terminating diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CENSORSHIP

REQUEST FILM "MANY FACES OF JESUS" BE BANNED IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that Swedish film producer J. J. Thorsen has made a pornographic film picturing Christ as a drunkard, a fornicator and a homosexual; considering that the film, which is entitled The Many Faces of Jesus, has been banned in Israel, in England and in France; and considering that the film will be shown in Canada as early as next fall, thanks to the help of a Canadian financial backer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the House order the government to take as soon as possible all necessary steps to prohibit the circulation or distribution in Canada of that film or of any other of the same sort.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion can only be made with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

LIVESTOCK—REQUESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTHORITY TO MONITOR PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, cattle producers, as the House knows, are in the second week of a boycott of auction yards and packing plants in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, having experienced constant losses in the cattle business over the last four years. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of Agriculture to introduce legislation immediately, as he has promised, to establish a meat authority with the power to rationalize and plan the livestock industry so that farmers will receive a fair price for their product.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent is required before such a motion can be put forward under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

GOVERNMENT RIGHT TO SCRUTINIZE STRIKE VOTE PROCEEDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which relates to yet another possible postal strike. In view of the fact that a number of essential services, particularly those supplied by the Post Office, are being jeopardized as a result of strikes and walk-outs, and since many of these work stoppages are a direct result of questionable practices and discrepancies surrounding the taking of strike votes—I refer, for example, to the atrocious and undemocratic way in which the CUPW staged its strike vote last fall—I seek to move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams):

That the Minister of Labour introduce legislation which would give federal government authorities the right to observe and scrutinize any or all union strike vote proceedings within the public service sector.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRESENCE OF MINISTER WHEN ESTIMATES UNDER STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the fact that instead of coming before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to discuss the very important subject of estimates, the Minister of Agriculture chose instead to visit his predecessors, Senator Olson and Senator Hays, in the Senate of Canada. Since the minister was presumably trying out the furniture with a view to taking his place where he hopes to be after the next election, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That this House respectfully requests that the Senate does not prepare for the addition of yet another Liberal minister of agriculture to its ranks, and further requests that the present Minister of Agriculture be present at all future meetings pertaining to agriculture estimates if he is serious about getting them passed.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SOVIET INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the outpourings of support reported in today's Ottawa Journal which the policies of the Prime Minister has received from the Soviet Union—outpourings which presumably represent the successful outcome of the government's policy of detente. Since the stated view of the Soviet government is, "We're very happy with Trudeau in power", and since the U.S.S.R. wants to do as little as possible to change the situation, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

● (1412)

That this House believes that there can be no distinction between the KGB and the government of the Soviet Union and, despite its praise for the Prime Minister, condemns the intrusion of the forces of Soviet imperialism into the national security of this nation.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SPRUCE BUDWORM SPRAYING PROGRAM—MEDICAL OBSERVANCE OF NEARBY POPULATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that a ten year old child from Saint John, New Brunswick, was recently flown to Halifax for treatment of a confirmed case of Reye's syndrome, a disease that has been linked to the spruce budworm spraying program, especially through the clinical studies done by Dr. Crocker of the Izaak Walton Killam Hospital in Halifax, and since this is the thirteenth case of the disease since 1968, resulting in at least five deaths, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare direct her department to undertake epidemiological and toxicological studies of the population living in the environs of the spray program to complement the clinical studies being done by Dr. Crocker.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion at this time only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the bank rate increase announced yesterday by the Bank of Canada. Bearing in mind that it is over a year since the spring of 1977 when the bank started moving the bank rate down, and in January, 1977, the unemployment figure was approximately 100,000 less than it is today, would the minister indicate why he has chosen to raise the bank rate at this time when so many Canadians are out of work?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the bank rate was raised yesterday by the governor of the Bank of Canada. As is customary, he consulted with me and I agreed with the general thrust of the monetary policy of the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, again my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As a former minister of finance twice removed from the present minister, in a similar situation in 1974, asked each of our Canadian chartered banks to give favoured treatment to the smaller businessmen in the country—farmers, fishermen and those in distressed areas—would the Minister of Finance indicate if he, likewise, has asked our chartered banks to save those sectors of our economy from the full impact of this interest rate increase which they have determined?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that in my contacts with the banks and, as well, through my department, they are aware that the policy of this government is to make sure that the credit necessary in the low growth areas of Canada should be of sufficient proportions. I will be asking them to do whatever they can in the special circumstances.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind that we now have a bank rate in Canada which is higher than that of any of the other seven main industrialized nations in the world—with the exception of France, which is fighting off communism, and with the exception of Italy, which really has no government—would the Minister of Finance indicate whether he has at least considered giving some relief to those who will be paying mortgage interest rates in future as a result of his policy, with a view to allowing them to charge at least a portion of their mortgage interest prior to paying their personal income tax.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. member forgets to mention one aspect of the policy—that some time ago the spread between the interest rate in the United States and the interest rates in Canada was 4 per cent. It has come down half a point to a point, but it is still three points better than it was a few years ago, if you compare the two situations.

Mr. Stevens: How about mortgage interest?

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. At the first ministers' conference on February 15, which the minister appears to have forgotten, part of the communiqué of the meeting stated that action was required now to speed up the economic recovery which has now begun. Since then, Statistics Canada surveys have shown that the real value of business investment is declining in 1978 by at least 2 per cent, and 4 per cent in manufacturing, the increase in the bank rate will make it more expensive to raise capital—it will be a disincentive to invest—and those businesses faced with a higher cost will pass the cost along in higher prices.

Will the minister explain to the House how, in view of the communiqué of the first ministers and the effect on business investment, he could support this increase in the bank rate and interest rates in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have just explained that the difference in interest rates between Canada and the United States was such that the governor of the Bank of Canada could really not accept it. He increased our rate by half a point. But I do want to point out that a year and a half ago, the difference in rates between Canada and the United States could reach up to 4 per cent. Now, there is a one-point difference but because there exists in Canada considerable need for foreign capital, of necessity there must always be a difference between the Canadian and the American rates of interest.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the minister should try to be consistent. It is the minister's position that Canada has a floating exchange rate and that he is not interfering with the exchange rate, so why does he now bring forward this story about interest rates and Mr. Bouey?

I want to ask the minister the following question. When the minister started interfering in the market a few weeks ago, he said that the provinces approved his policy. Were the ten provinces consulted by the minister before he approved the increase yesterday by the governor of the Bank of Canada in the interest rate of a half per cent, and did they approve what the minister says is his policy?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member does not know how the monetary system operates in Canada. Monetary policies are established by the governor of the bank in consultation with the minister of finance. But it is the responsibility of the governor of the Bank of Canada to make those decisions, and he is a very responsible gentleman.

Mr. Crosbie: Is the Minister of Finance now stating the government of Canada has no responsibility for the monetary policy and that only the governor of the Bank of Canada has that responsibility, and does he agree with the governor of the Bank of Canada in his statement yesterday, that too large an exchange rate adjustment over too short a period of time would not be helpful in restoring our international competitive position, and there would be a risk that we could not overcome inflation if we do that? I have two questions: Does he say that only the governor is responsible for monetary policy, and does he agree with the governor's statement on the inflationary danger?

Mr. Chrétien: I said that I agree with the general thrust of the monetary policies established by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

EFFECT OF BANK RATE INCREASE ON INVESTMENT

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. It also concerns the raising of the bank rate by half a percentage point, presumably to attract foreign capital into Canada and thus buoy up the Canadian dollar. Completely outside the question of what effect this change in the bank rate may have on our foreign exchange rate—there are many reasons to think that it will have little or no effect—I should like to ask the Minister of Finance some questions about the consequences of this policy on our domestic economy.

Assuming that this change in the bank rate will raise interest rates, it will have a depressing effect on new capital investment—particularly that of Canadian firms—and, while it might attract some foreign investment, it seems to me that it will kill investment by Canadian companies and will in many ways work contrary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, will he put it forthwith.

● (1422)

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the perverse effects this will have, what measures does the minister intend to propose to the House to offset this attack on investment in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member reads the statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada I am in complete agreement with him; that increase in the bank rate will have very little influence on the expansionary financial policy of the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the bank rate increase comes a day after Statistics Canada announced that sales of some key durables such as stoves and ranges are down about 26 per cent over last January. Assuming that this bank rate increase will further depress the sale of comsumer goods—which it might well do—what does the minister propose to do to offset the increase? To say that a .5 per cent increase in the prime rate in Canada will not have a depressing effect is really to ignore the experience of history.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to argue with the hon. member, but in reply to his question—if it was a question—I think it is very dangerous to pass judgment after one month's publication. We have to look at the question with a broader perspective. I think the governor of the Bank of Canada had all these factors in mind when he made his decision.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Saltsman: I appeal to the Minister of Finance to stop monkeying around with the machinery and let the economy recover without damaging it as he is doing now.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Rimouski.

CENSORSHIP

REQUEST FILM "MANY FACES OF JESUS" BE BANNED IN CANADA

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Despite the fact that the province of Quebec has control over the censorship of films, can the minister tell the House whether he intends to oppose the entry in this country of the film Many Faces of Jesus?

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the film to which the hon. member is referring and I do not know of any basis on which I would oppose the showing of a film in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since the minister does not seem to be aware of the propaganda now being spread in Canada about that horrible film which some would have shown in Canada and which was turned down in England and France, I should like to ask him to kindly confirm with the people or the companies that they want to show this film, and then take the necessary means to oppose the move because we have enough problems here in Canada without importing them from abroad to corrupt our youth even more.

[English]

Mr. Roberts: No, Mr. Speaker, it is not part of my responsibilities to censor films.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DISTRIBUTION OF SECRET REPORT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. I am sure the minister is aware of the situation, first revealed by the CBC yesterday and discussed on national television by ex-RCMP Commissioner Kelly today, wherein there apparently has been distributed among several government departments 58 copies of a report or a summary or précis of a report entitled "Canadian Related Activities of the Russian Intelligence Service".

This report, or its précis, allegedly contains information which has formed the subject matter of questions in the House of Commons recently and the subject matter of a Toronto Sun story listing 16 subversive activities carried on in Canada. Is the Solicitor General now able to confirm that this classified material emanated, not from the RCMP but from one or more of the 58 government employees or offices who are recipients of this classified material?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman perhaps noted from comments I made relating to this matter outside the House—and there were no questions relating to it yesterday in the House—it has not been our practice, and it is not my practice, to comment on the nature of such information.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, because of his silence, the Solicitor General permits the festering of suspicion about a serious security leak in the RCMP. Is it accurate to say that the 58 copies of the report, or its précis, were distributed by or under the authority of the Intelligence Advisory Committee? This is not an RCMP committee, but is composed of representatives of various federal departments, including the Solicitor General's department, I believe the Department of Justice, National Defence, the Privy Council office, and there may be others. Was it that authority which authorized the distribution of the 58 copies?

• (1427)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member's question is of the nature of the previous question. Therefore, my reply is the same.

Mr. Jarvis: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister said clearly last Thursday that the security of this country was in peril and was vulnerable because contained in this report, allegedly, was the source of information, the names of informants, the methods of operation, and so on. I would like to ask the Solicitor General, if that report was such a challenge to our national security, why would 58 copies be produced and circulated among various government departments?

Mr. Blais: Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is making certain allegations and I am not going to comment on those allegations.

INQUIRY WHETHER AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT HAVE BEEN DRAFTED

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance inform the House whether he has received from the Department of Justice the bill amending the Bank Act and, if not, when did he send that bill to the Department of Justice for the drafting of amendments as he indicated to us a few days ago?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no to the first part of the question. I have not yet received this bill. Concerning the second part of his question, I would say to the hon. member that communications between my department, the general director of banks and the Department of Justice began last fall and that I do not have the precise date of those discussions.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary.

Could the minister tell the House when cabinet developed the principles on which the amendments would be based, when they were submitted to the Department of Justice and when they will be sent back?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot discuss in the House the specific dates for those decisons. I can merely tell the hon. member that the Department of Justice has been working for a very long time on that review of the Bank Act. There have been many consultations between my department and the Department of Justice in that regard. Many times, some items have been reexamined by cabinet, as it happens regularly. But the hon. gentleman being a former cabinet member, he should know very well that I am not at liberty to give any more details.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

RIGHT OF AGGRIEVED PERSONS TO CALL WITNESSES BEFORE BOARD OF REFEREES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Is the minister prepared to overrule the decision of the UIC re the case of Robert Richardson, of North Bay, who was denied natural justice and labelled a fraud? This matter was raised by the CBC ombudsman last Sunday, who presented evidence to support the position that this man was denied the right to have witnesses testify on his behalf. If so, will the minister take steps to reimburse Mr. Richardson and compensate him for the damage done to his good reputation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it was determined by our officials that Mr. Richardson was working. While he took his appeal to the Board of Referees, which is comprised of labour, management and government representatives, the decision was unanimous that he was working at the time he was drawing unemployment insurance. He made application for an appeal and that was turned down by the chairman. The penalty for fraud was removed, however, as a result of the investigation, not because of the work by the ombudsman of the CBC but because of the work we did which indicated that, in my view and in the view of the department, there was no call for that particular penalty.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he would at least review the file personally at this time?

● (1432)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, not only did I personally review the file, but my predecessor reviewed the file. We checked out the facts. One of the witnesses the employee was going to bring was to attest to his character. We said that was not in question and, therefore, that individual would not be required. The one thing I want to check out in dealing with the three members of the Board of Referees who made that decision is whether they in fact refused to allow any evidence in support: the only information I have so far is that it was information in support of his character or reputation, not having to do with the facts. I want to check that out before I come to a final conclusion.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RECOVERY OF SECRET DOCUMENTS DISTRIBUTED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Solicitor General. Before I put the question, I remind him that he cannot hide behind the shield of security by not saying anything in the House and then talking outside the House.

Has the Solicitor General given any direction, order or suggestion with regard to the recovery of any of the 58 documents—whether classified or alleged highly classified—or copies, or any number? If so, how many have been recovered? I ask this question in light of the fact that he is now not only intimidating members of parliament but members of the media.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, evidently that question relates directly to the question previously asked by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. Therefore, the same reply is going to be provided: I am not going to comment on it.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising that the Solicitor General will not answer these questions. Taking into consideration the fact that there are 58, or some other number of documents—they may be fractured, so we do not know how many are out—I ask the minister whether any charges are anticipated against any members of this House or any part of the media? Has he gone to the Attorney General of Canada to get consent to lay any charges? Has the consent been obtained with reference to any warrants issued and to proceeding with those warrants and searches of the media in this country?

Mr. Blais: As I indicated before, Mr. Speaker, the investigation is an ongoing one. The hon. member will be made aware, as will all hon. members, in the event that consent is sought from the Attorney General.

[Mr. Cullen.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF MEDAL FOR NATO SERVICE

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It has been more than two years since the government, through the then minister of national defence, committed itself to establishing a medal for NATO service. When will the minister be making an announcement on that subject, for the armed forces and the people of this country?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question. The matter has been under study for a long time. It raises some complex questions. The hon. member has expressed to me his concern about this matter. I am looking into it personally, as is the Chief of Defence Staff, to perhaps find some other method of accomplishing the same purpose.

NATIONAL SECURITY

NUMBER OF COPIES OF SECRET DOCUMENT CIRCULATED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General: it relates very directly to the information sought by my colleague from Perth-Wilmot. I should point out that the government of Canada has recently been taking very extreme actions based upon the premise of a leak of security documents. There are now reports to the effect that the document in question has been circulated in large number.

Will the Solicitor General tell the House of Commons whether there is any accuracy in the reports that the document, or documents in question have been circulated in more than one copy, perhaps as many as 58 but in any event a number of copies?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's belated interest in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: His co-operation would indeed have been appreciated last Thursday when it was sought. Under the circumstances, the hon. member's question touches on the questions of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot and the hon. member for Calgary North. The same reply applies.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General well knows that the co-operation sought from me was a request from the Prime Minister that I use my office to ask the hon. member of parliament for Leeds to come to my office, without any advice as to why he was coming, where he would be surprised by the Solicitor General of Canada and General Dare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That sort of request was, of course, going to be rejected. I want to know why the Solicitor General attaches "Top Secret" to information which is surely important for the House of Commons and the country to know, namely, whether this document which his colleagues claim was very tightly circulated was, in fact, circulated in some number. He told us he will not confirm or deny that fact. Consequently, we must accept that it is confirmed. Will he tell us why he refuses either categorically to confirm or categorically to deny reports that that document was circulated in some number?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the hon. member's explanation. It took him more than a week to compile that particular justification. With regard to the reply, should I give it, replies are motivated by parliamentary tradition, based upon the nature of the information sought.

Mr. Clark: Will the Solicitor General advise whether a review is now under way as to the extent of the circulation of documents that are classified as "Secret" or "Top Secret" from the security service or any other agencies? I am speaking of a review of the procedures of circulation within the public service or, indeed, among ministers and staffs of ministers.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would expect the hon. member to ask me that question when we are dealing with estimates. I will take it as notice.

Mr. Clark: I would ask the Solicitor General to stop being so chippy with the House of Commons.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He is an under-achiever; he is over-reacting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Since he has claimed that security would be in danger—that is the effect of his claim—will the Solicitor General tell the House of Commons how the security of Canada would be endangered by stating whether or not there was wide circulation of this supposedly secret document? How would it be endangered by giving that information to the Parliament of Canada to whom this government is responsible?

Mr. Blais: Mr.Speaker, in order to provide that judgment for the hon. member, I would have to refer to the information that the hon. member is seeking from me; and that is exactly what I am not doing today.

DISCLOSURE OF NUMBER OF SECRET DOCUMENTS DISTRIBUTED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have witnessed a number of examples of hypocrisy in this House, but nothing to equal that of the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: With regard to his knowledge of parliamentary procedure, on what basis is he making the statement that it would not be parliamentary to give this information? Is it parliamentary to hide the truth in order to benefit the minister?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member is the only one on that side of the House who has had any experience in leading a government of this country. Surely he knows the nature of the information which is sought from me, and he knows that matters affecting national security are not the subject of comment if the information that is sought may be detrimental in relation to national security.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why, then, has the minister been such a babblemouth outside the House of Commons? Has he been instructed by the Prime Minister to keep his mouth shut from now on and endeavour to delude parliament into reaching the conclusion that what he has been babbling about he must not explain because he knows he would be in difficulty?

• (1442)

Mr. Blais: Mr.Speaker, outside the House I have provided exactly the same sort of information as I have given in the House—

An hon. Member: Blabbermouth!

Mr. Blais: —in discharging my role to communicate to the Canadian public the truth in respect of these matters and the position the government has taken, one which has been justified by the public reaction we are obtaining, a reaction causing so much preoccupation on the opposition benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATURAL RESOURCES

PROPOSED TAX CUTS FOR NICKEL MINING COMPANIES—REQUEST PROPOSAL BE ABANDONED

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has to do with the recent budget proposal by the Ontario government to allow Falconbridge and Inco to deduct from taxable profits the full costs of operating European refineries to process Ontario ore.

In view of the fact that recent lay-offs in Sudbury, Thompson and Port Colborne by Inco and Falconbridge are attributed to depressed nickel markets, not to lack of nickel resources, and since the Ontario proposal will continue to lock Canadians into the position of being hewers of wood and drawers of water, is the minister prepared to meet with Darcy McKeough, the Ontario Treasurer, to have him reverse this atrocious proposal? Further, is the minister prepared—if he is not successful—to initiate within his own level of government offsetting tax legislation to negate this blatant example of the selling-out of Canadian interests?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would, of course, be very pleased to meet with the Treasurer of Ontario with respect to the important subject of mining taxation. I hope such an opportunity will arise in the near future. As the hon. member will recognize, a decision was taken at the first ministers' conference that the finance ministers and resource ministers of the provinces and of Canada should meet with a view to examining fiscal arrangements and other questions which affect the important mining industry.

As to the specific question the hon. member asked with respect to offshore refining, particularly by Falconbridge, I believe he is fully aware of the importance of this matter to the Falconbridge operation.

Mr. Rodriguez: Bearing in mind that the minister met with his provincial counterparts not so long ago with a view to developing a national mining strategy, can the hon. gentleman tell us whether this sort of tax concession has been discussed in general and, further, how it fits within the concept of a national mining strategy which, surely, ought to put long-term Canadian interests first?

Mr. Gillespie: As I am sure the hon. member realizes, questions of precise tax policy fall within the purview of the Minister of Finance rather than within my own portfolio. From the point of view of the provincial governments, I might suggest that it is the mines ministers who can make recommendations, but it is the finance ministers who consider those recommendations.

Mr. Rodriguez: One final supplementary. Can the minister tell the House whether he, personally, supports that sort of tax concession to multinational mining companies which sell out Canadian resources for ever and ever?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Moncton.

POST OFFICE

REQUESTED IMPROVEMENT IN POSTAL SERVICES

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new Postmaster General, not to the minister who is presently Solicitor General. There are some serious answers I should like to get. When will the Postmaster General do the following: first, provide complete postal facilities for Riverview, New Brunswick, which has 16,000 inhabitants and is one of the fastest growing communities in the maritimes; second, when will he provide house to house delivery in all built-up areas—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If every member were permitted to use the question period to make representations about constituency problems, I am sure we would have to deal with 265 different questions every day.

SHIPBUILDING

FUNDS FOR REFIT AND CONVERSION OF SHIPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question which I put last week but which was not answered. In view of the alarming situation at Davie Shipbuilding Ltd., where there have been nearly 2,000 lay-offs and where the situation is growing progressively worse, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence what he intends to do in view of the many pressures that have been exerted on me and on him by organizations and municipal councils in my region to make funds available for the refit and conversion of ships in the Canadian fleet of his department.

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): We have tried to accelerate the ship refitting program to increase the flow into the dockyards, though we cannot accelerate it as fast as I would wish. However, I am able to say, in response to the hon. member's present and previous representations, that work on one of our ships, the Protector, could begin at an earlier date than has been suggested. The specifications are now ready, enabling the Department of Supply and Services to invite tenders as soon as possible. Hopefully, we can bring that ship into dock for refit in the latter part of May.

ST. JÉRÔME—PROGRESS REPORT ON HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Solicitor General, and I hope that in this case his answer will be more specific. In view of the current problem at the St. Jérôme detention centre, and it seems that the conditions demanded by the mutineers come under federal jurisdiction, could the Solicitor General tell the House what progress has been made in the negotiations to free the hostages?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, this is a provincial institution, and the provincial authorities have assumed this responsibility and are in charge of the ongoing exchanges. Now, as I have already indicated, the government intends to lend its full co-operation as regards the information on file relating to individuals under jurisdiction of the federal penitentiary system.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Given the increased number of those hostage takings, is the Solicitor General considering more severe penalities to discourage those experts in hostage takings and to satisfy Canadians who are quite shocked by the deterioration of our system?

Mr. Blais: Well, I merely wish to indicate to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that it is a provincial responsibility. The specific event is a provincial responsibility. I wish to point out that during a recent debate in this House, the matter was raised and on Tuesday next I invite the hon. member to attend the sitting of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to discuss that problem and learn about the progress made in connection with his concerns.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF INCREASED BANK RATE ON ECONOMY OF DEPRESSED AREAS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. What steps does the minister propose to take to offset the disastrous consequences of an increase in interest rates on slow growth regions? I think specifically of the five eastern provinces which enjoy the distinction of having half of the total unemployment in the country.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the interest rate, even with the increase of yesterday, is still a point and a half lower than it was a year ago.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the question put to me today by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chrétien: This morning—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, who seems to be blind to the fact that we have a serious problem of regional disparity in this country which will be even more exacerbated by the action he took yesterday in increasing interest rates, whether he has consulted his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and if he will undertake specific measures now to offset the disastrous consequences that this move will have on investment in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, which will seriously aggravate the already critically high unemployment situation. Let him answer that question.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the opposition do not want to know the truth. They like to spread doom and gloom rumours, just as the Leader of the Opposition did when he said, when putting two questions to me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I reply to the hon. member by telling him that the interest rate as set yesterday by the governor of the Bank of Canada is 1½ points less than it was a year and a half ago. The hon. member does not want to recognize that. When the governor of the Bank of Canada administers the monetary policies of the government, the governor has to vary the interest rate from time to time; and I have great confidence in the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Oral Questions

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

EFFECT OF INCREASED BANK RATE ON REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is one thing for the minister to make a fool of himself in this House, but to do so before his colleagues from the United States is something else again. I ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion if he has consulted the Minister of Finance and has he satisfied himself that this move of increasing interest rates will not seriously undermine regional development policies in this country, especially in the four Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. gentleman that right now we are not receiving that many applications, and this situation will not change very much. I can refer the hon. gentleman to a point when the interest rate was quite high, even higher that it is with the present increase. We have a substantial investment in his province of Nova Scotia—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Newfoundland.

Mr. Lessard: —and this will not have the impact of, nor will it be a major factor in, preventing investment in Canada.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

AKAMINA-KISHINENA, B.C.—RESPONSE OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I would like to thank the minister for providing me with copies of correspondence to the provincial ministers of forestry and the environment of British Columbia dealing with the Akamina-Kishinena Valley. Has the minister received responses from the provincial authorities to his intervention?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check. I will do so this afternoon and report back to the hon. member.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

AKAMINA-KISHINENA, B.C.—PROTECTION OF WILDLIFE

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): My question is to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wildlife Service, the Minister of State for the Environment. I ask the hon. minister if he has had occasion to make representations, on behalf of the Canadian Wildlife Service, to provincial authorities in British Columbia with reference to the concern for certain wildlife elements in the Akamina-Kishinena Valley area?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the matter. All the species involved in this particular area come under provincial jurisdiction. I have not yet made any representations, because whatever goes on there is dictated by provincial jurisdiction.

ENERGY

GULF OIL REPAYMENTS TO SHAREHOLDERS—PROPOSAL AECL TAKE SIMILAR ACTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it relates to a very interesting decision by a federal appeals court in the United States, released Tuesday afternoon. Officers and former officers of Gulf Oil Corporation were required to pay back to their shareholders the sum of $18.8 million illegally paid out by Gulf Oil. Coincidentally, some of that money may have been paid to one, Shaul Eisenberg, for a transaction in South Korea.

My question to the minister is this. Has the minister or the government given any consideration, as the shareholder on behalf of the people of this country in Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, to looking at the possibility of attempting to recover a similar amount paid out by the officers and former officers of that corporation for what has obviously been concluded by a committee of this House to be for corrupt or illegal purposes?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the allegations in the preamble of the hon. member's question. I am sure he realizes—I believe this was put before the committee of which he was the chairman—that the contract entered into by AECL and Mr. Eisenberg or his company is regarded as a legal contract.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that. If the minister is correcting me, I am glad to have that correction. For instance, in respect of the Argentinian transaction there was no reference whatsoever to the $2.5 million, or a total of $5 million, U.S., that was paid out by AECL on behalf of the minister and on behalf of me to an unknown agent, for unknown purposes, using very suspicious means of payment. Is the minister now indicating to the House that that transaction was included in the contract between AECL and the Argentinian authorities? If so, this is the first time we have had that information provided to us.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be very confused. If he casts his mind back, he will realize that the arrangement made with Mr. Eisenberg and his companies was with respect to the Korean contract and not to the Argentinian one.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DATE OF TABLING OF BRYCE REPORT

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will the minister advise when he intends to table the royal commission report on corporate concentration, or the Bryce report?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that matter does not fall within my jurisdiction.

Mr. Clark: What does?

Mr. Paproski: What is your job?

ENERGY

CONSTRUCTION OF GAS PIPELINE FROM ALBERTA TO QUEBEC AND MARITIMES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Will the government be announcing shortly the construction of a gas pipeline from Alberta to Quebec and the maritimes?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, no announcement can be made of such a construction until an application is before the National Energy Board. I very much hope there will be one, or more than one application to extend the TransCanada system right to the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, are studies going on by the government as to the financing implications, in view of polar gas and LNG tankers, and will these be published before a decision is taken?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, studies are going on in my department with respect to some of these questions. Studies are also being undertaken by Petro-Canada in conjunction and co-operation with Alberta Gas Trunk Line on possible applications with respect to Quebec and the maritimes. There are also, of course, studies going on by Petro-Canada with respect to liquefied natural gas and bringing that gas down from the High Arctic. With regard to Petro-Canada—which is a very important agent; one which your party does not seem to recognize—it is because of their initiative there may well be a pipeline.

Privilege—Mr. Rodriguez

NATIONAL SECURITY

SEARCH WARRANTS ISSUED RESPECTING TELEVISION NETWORKS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It is on the question of warrants issued with regard to the Global and CTV television networks. Would the Solicitor General advise whether those warrants were issued under the Official Secrets Act, and would he also advise whether his office inspired or initiated that action respecting the issuance of the warrants?

● (1502)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I cannot inform the hon. gentleman of the specific nature of the warrants which were obtained. I am advised that they were obtained from a justice of the peace. I have not seen them, nor have I received a report today relating to the events that followed, except those that have come to me through the press.

Mr. Leggatt: The question dealt with whether they were initiated in the Solicitor General's office. Perhaps the Solicitor General would deal with that specifically in his reply. I would also like to ask whether he has now received a researched opinion from the law officers of the Crown as to the duties and responsibilities of members of parliament vis-à-vis the Official Secrets Act. Does he now have a legal opinion upon which to act, in terms of his investigation of any member of the House?

Mr. Blais: The two questions are really intertwined and they relate to an ongoing investigation. As the hon. gentleman knows, the investigation, being ongoing, is not subject to comment at this time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—ALLEGED ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF HON. MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) again raised the question of privilege which he had raised on two previous occasions, the first time about a week and a half ago, and the second time a few days ago, relating to the possibility, as has been alleged publicly, of electronic surveillance against himself.

First of all I want to reiterate the importance with which this matter must be viewed, I am sure, by all members of the House, because the classic definition of privilege has been based upon precedents which predate even the possibility of electronic surveillance, and therefore electronic intervention in the freedom of communication and movement of a member of the House of Commons is a new question as it relates to privilege.

I am sure all hon. members would agree with me that any possibility of electronic surveillance of a member raises a very serious problem and should be given utmost priority by the House. However, the contents of the motion which has been put to me raise at least two, and perhaps more, serious problems of both a procedural and a substantive nature.

The first is that the terms of the motion seek a referral to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, not just of the possibility of electronic surveillance and of the statements made by Mr. Hart, who is alleged to have carried out the electronic surveillance, but also of the statements of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais). That calls into play, it seems to me, not only a procedural but a substantive problem, because indeed in the course of his remarks the hon. member for Nickel Belt indicated that he accepts the statements of the Solicitor General as a member of the House and a minister of the Crown, and yesterday the Solicitor General in his intervention reiterated that those statements were made by him after a careful investigation.

Based on the precedent of the recent and very thorough analysis which was done of the procedure by which any misleading statement of a minister would have to be questioned but clearly not by way of a question of privilege, to permit a question of privilege on statements of a minister, at least calls them into question.

It seems to me totally inconsistent to say, on the one hand, that statements have been accepted and, on the other hand, that they should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Furthermore, it would be a dangerous precedent to accept, as part of a question of privilege, the referral of a minister's statement to the committee because it would go directly contrary to the ruling which I just made in respect of recent attempts to deal with any suggested misleading of the House by any minister. That would have to be done by a substantive motion, or it may be the subject matter of a debate.

Therefore, it seems to me that it would be contrary to our practices and precedents to permit the inclusion of the reference to a minister's statement. I do not say for one minute that if the matter does go to a committee ultimately, the minister would not want to make some contribution, but I think the formal reference of the minister's statement seems to call into question those very statements which have not been called into question but have been accepted by the hon. member. If there was any doubt about that reasoning on my part, one would have to examine the arguments presented yesterday because a good many of those who participated in the discussion yesterday—although the hon. member for Nickel Belt and others accepted the Solicitor General's statements—have called those very statements into question. I think we would have to guard that procedure very carefully.

May I say that I am also concerned about the assumption which seems to be made in the motion about the confidentiality of sources and of communications to members. That is a very important aspect of the life of members of the House of Commons, but the fact that it is contained in the motion seems to me to presume upon something which is not supported by our precedents and, at the very least, is presently under review in some ways in our courts and in other legislatures, and is far from an established right or privilege of members. That seems to be under question. I do not consider that as fatal a defect as I do the inclusion of the statements of a minister, but I do have that concern.

May I also add that there is other language in the motion which may be simply superfluous, although it might not be procedurally out of order. I refer to expressions such as "the whole truth" and "the matter being publicized" as a direction to the committee, and "this breach of privilege" in the motion. It seems to me that the latter expression "this breach of privilege" prejudges entirely the question which is to be put to the House. Again I say that this might simply be superfluous language.

The basic procedural difficulty I have is the inclusion of the reference of the minister's statement, and I hope the hon. member will examine the reasons I have given today and rethink his motion, because I want to stress that this decision today should not be taken as a final decision in respect of a matter of this sort. It is entirely without prejudice to the hon. member to endeavour, after examining precedents and the reasons I have endeavoured to put forward today, to rephrase his motion in such a way as may—I have to say "may" because I cannot prejudge the issue—receive the favourable decision of the Chair. But I do not want it to be taken that by setting this matter aside, because it is a contest of fact or an argument between a member and the minister, that is not a question of privilege and should not be dealt with in this way. Therefore, it has to be accepted that the minister has made a statement to the House and, that statement having been accepted, it does not remain in contest, and even if it did, it could not be part of a question of privilege. That is a very substantial part of our procedure, not simply a matter of form.

However, some questions remain that are of fundamental importance to the House, because I think it is possible to visualize events which have taken place which, although entirely consistent with the assurances given by the Solicitor General to the House, and entirely consistent with the investigation which he undertook and with the results of the RCMP investigation, may still leave questions to which the House may want to address itself.

I think I should stress here that the role of the Chair, if there are questions about the surveillance of a member, is very difficult. Perhaps the surveillance did take place in the orbit which is classically the privilege of a member, but the possibility of some connection with official surveillance of any sort seems to me to be very close to questions with which the House would want to come to grips, and it is not the function of the Chair to prevent the House from attempting to deliberate on matters which come reasonably close to being questions of substance.

Having explained the procedural difficulties and, in some ways, the substantive difficulties for which I have to set aside this motion, let me say that I do so without prejudicing the right of the hon. member to consult on the motion, to rethink it, and to try to rephrase it in such a way that may—again I say "may"—receive the favourable decision of the Chair and ultimately the consideration of the House. In the final analysis, and this has to be stressed as well, the decision is not up to the Chair in the final sense but up to the House.

I leave the matter with the hon. member on that basis but, on the grounds which I have stated, for the moment I must set aside the question of privilege.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to express my thanks to Your Honour for the way in which you elucidated the problem with which we are faced. I will look at your comments in Hansard, and I reserve the right to bring another motion which is more in line with the explanation you gave to the House this afternoon.

● (1512)

MR. JARVIS—NATIONAL SECURITY—REFUSAL BY SOLICITOR GENERAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Your Honour will be well aware that over the past few days questions have been put to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) which he has refused to answer. Up until today most of those questions related to specific events of alleged subversive activity. Today, however, I and others put questions not about specific events but about certain procedures for which the Solicitor General and his department are responsible. Today I put a question as to whether copies of a certain report were printed and distributed. The question related in no way to the contents of that report, nor did it refer to any individual incidents of alleged subversive activity.

Last Thursday on a question of privilege the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) contributed to a rather lengthy debate on this issue. In his intervention he referred to the contents of a particular document. With relation to that document he raised three matters which, in his view, were matters seriously affecting national security. The first of those was that foreign security services now know how our security service operates. The second was that the contents of the document involved would indicate sources of information and thus cause a situation whereby loyal Canadians would be reluctant to offer information in aid of our security service. Finally, the Prime Minister alleged that we were being judged by intelligence services of friendly countries, some of which we are closely associated with, such as our NATO allies.

In each of the three points raised by the Prime Minister the Prime Minister alleged that a particular security document would imperil our national security. By refusing to answer questions the Solicitor General has given support to all three points raised by the Prime Minister, but for the very opposite reason.

What the Solicitor General fails to realize is that it is not our security service which is being judged. The government and the department are responsible for the security service, and the government and the department are being judged.

The point I raise today—and I gave the Solicitor General an opportunity to negate this—is that reportedly 58 copies of a document are floating around Ottawa. We also gave the Solicitor General the opportunity to advise how many had been recovered. What has happened as a result of the refusal of the Solicitor General to answer questions? Why would foreign security services not know about our operations if there are 58 copies around? That has to do do with the Prime Minister's first point.

Second, loyal Canadians want to give information but might be discouraged from doing so if they thought their names would be revealed. Why would they think their names would not be revealed if there are 58 copies around?

Finally, with regard to friendly countries judging our intelligence services and having a negative reaction, why would they not have a negative reaction if there are 58 copies floating around, unless the Solicitor General can assure the House that they have been recovered or that they never existed? The importance of all three of the Prime Minister's points is this: I gave the Solicitor General an opportunity today to state that the leak was not within our security service but within the Government of Canada or one of its departments. The minister refused to assure the House in that regard.

Your Honour will recall the events leading up to last February 6. The Solicitor General refused to answer questions on the ground that the matter being inquired about was before the McDonald Commission. That resulted in a very lengthy debate on questions of privilege, and on February 6, as recorded at page 2567 of Hansard, Your Honour said this:

> I think I have exposed the difficulty and I hope I have made my thinking as clear as possible on decisions on which I really do not need any help from the standing committee. Therefore, I think the appropriate action for me to take would be to reserve my judgment on both these motions, not for one day but for several days, because I think I can be aided in my deliberations by determining, in the manner in which I described, exactly what the intentions of the minister are and what will be the reality. Therefore, I propose to set these motions aside for a few days and see what happens.

Those motions were proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In my view what happened on February 6 was that the Solicitor General was put on probation. I believe he has breached that probation, patently and obviously, today. In the interest of national security I therefore ask Your Honour to reconsider the events which led up to that decision on February 6.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. One needs only to have been here since last Thursday to know that a certain number of events have come to the fore and that certain allegations have been made. I have indicated to this House today that certain allegations are still under very active investigation. I did not comment on the questions asked of me today for the reason I set forward, namely, that the matters involved were under investigation, that they involved national security and that, in accordance with the traditions of this House, no comment is forthcoming. That is exactly the position I still maintain.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the question is not quite as simple as the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) puts it. Let me put it into perspective. As this matter first unfolded we found out that there was alleged to have been a leak of some kind which caused the Solicitor General, in the company of the head of the security service of the country, to take the unprecedented step of visiting a member of parliament. I leave to Your Honour's imagination the atmosphere of that visit.

Mr. Blais: A very friendly atmosphere. Ask the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt).

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The next step was a debate in this House. It was a crisis debate. That is how one would have to describe it if one were not a member here. Yesterday there were raids, with warrants, on two television stations in this city, involving a leaked document. Surely if the government is to be believed at all, this matter must be extremely serious and, of course, secret. I do not have to mention the fact that a whole host of allegations have been published in newspapers, and all the rest of it. As a result there is a threat of prosecution in the courts of a member of this House for a violation of the Official Secrets Act. I think that is a pretty serious thing.

● (1522)

Now, sir, we have a report that the Solicitor General refuses to confirm or deny in the House of Commons today that there are 58 copies of that document on the loose somewhere, a monstrous leak if the document is an important one. Mr. Speaker, I think we are beginning to doubt the extent and the nature, and the depth of concern there ought to be in terms of the security leak in view of the fact that in this city there are 58 of these copies. The question that was put by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) was not on the merits, not on the contents, of any documents. The question was put as to whether or not there was this broad distribution. It was a very simple question. That is all there was. It did not elicit an answer that could damage national security, but if the answer to the question were yes, the answer would damage the security of the government and its credibility in this whole issue. I have the suspicion that that is the reason the refusal was given. I am sorry to have to say that, but it is just beyond belief that all of these investigations could occur when there is alleged to be 58 documents loose in this city. I cannot believe that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would do that. I cannot believe that the security service of the country could be so negligent, but I can believe that the Government of Canada could be so negligent and the Solicitor General be so negligent—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —if, indeed, the document is as important as has been stated.

Now, sir, getting to the heart of the motion and dealing with the obligation of the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Are the motions earlier referred to, the motions to which the hon. member is referring?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, sir. It is the motion referred to again by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis).

Your Honour said some very important things on that day about the obligation of a minister, and I want to recite them for the record. I am looking at page 2567 of Hansard. You said this, and I quote:

> In the final analysis, the most serious practical difficulty we have to face is the matter of the executive accountability to parliament. We are dealing with a matter which is fundamental to the whole question period, and the question period, as I have said publicly many times, is a source of great pride to the Canadian parliament. In my opinion the question period here is a session of daily accountability, which is an absolutely paramount feature of the Canadian parliamentary life.

I would be the first to say, sir, that if a question is put as to content of a document of the nature that it is alleged this document is, the minister is justified in saying no. That is one thing. It is quite another thing, sir, to refuse to answer a question not relating to the content, but relating to whether or not 58 copies of that document exist somewhere in the city. You went on to say, sir:

> Therefore, in the final analysis, the Chair is not in a position to compel an answer—

That is true. Then you went on to say:

> However, that does not diminish the importance of this exercise and the importance of the theory of ministerial responsibility, which makes the question period work on a daily basis in the Canadian parliament. Therefore, we are dealing with something which is fundamental to the most important aspect of our Canadian parliamentary system.

And further on you said:

> The way for the House to find out what the Solicitor General is going to do in response to questions is to proceed to the question period and ask him questions.

We have done that, sir. You put him on probation, and today we found that he breached his probation. You went on to say:

> On the other hand, I think it would be disrespectful of a very serious argument and of the very serious position put forward by the opposition which is fundamental, simply to push these motions aside.

You then went on to propose that the motion stand aside to see what happens over the next few days.

Sir, a member of parliament is in danger of being charged. If he is charged, there is a matter before the court. It is germane and important to the consideration in this House of the propriety of the minister's actions as a minister here in the House in answering questions, and of the minister's actions outside the House, for us to have the answer to the question of whether or not this document is so unimportant that it could be photostated and distributed through government departments, and re-photostated and distributed again. That is the question we have to ask ourselves. Or did the Solicitor General overreact in the circumstances, and is there a necessity for the raids on television stations, for subjecting a member of parliament to a possible charge, in this specific case, to interrogating newsmen, and all of the other things that have gone on? Sir, you put the minister on probation. I think the time has come now to answer the very simple and direct question put by the member for Perth-Wilmot, and that the minister should come into this House and answer that question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I will hear other members in a moment, but I think it may also be time to put an end to the phrase of the Chair "putting a minister on probation." I think we ought to keep in context, first of all, the nature of the motion that was put forward on that day. Both motions really called into play, or proposed to call into play, statements of the minister of his intention in how to deal with questions. The action that the Chair took at that time was to indicate that there was no feasible way, in my opinion, that a committee could be asked to make judgment upon the intentions of a minister, and how he was going to deal with questions, because the way to determine that was to get on with the question period and put the questions. I did not put the minister on probation by doing that, but I did, I think, give respect to the importance of the motions and indicated the way to find out the answers to the motions was not to send them to a committee to examine what a minister was going to do, but to get on to the question period to find out how he was going to deal with it.

I also think, in fairness, that if one wants to quote all of that judgment, one will verify that I made it quite clear the Chair could not compel an answer, and that under no circumstances could our precedents or practices be taken ever to impose upon a minister an obligation other than a political sanction to make answers.

I think it is always the right of a minister to refuse to answer any question or, in fact, to take no action at all on that question. That remains fundamental.

In so far as the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot raising the question today about the refusal of the minister to answer questions today is concerned, it may relate in some way to these motions that remain outstanding, which I will finalize, but in so far as it relates to the refusal of the minister or any other minister to answer questions, of course it has no basis in privilege at any time.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) and also with our House leader in reference to the question of privilege.

I asked two very simple questions. In those questions there was no request to disclose anything which would affect the security of the nation. The first question I asked was whether the minister had given any direction or order to cover 58 documents. If those documents are copies of the document we have been talking about, and which is worrying the government and giving it some anxiety as to the security of the nation, and there are 58 copies in different agencies and departments of the government—that can be multiplied by four or five because they are probably copied, and there are helpers, executives, and directors, so there are probably a great number.

A finger is being pointed at a particular member of parliament when the leak took place elsewhere. The leak probably took place in an agency of the government through the government's own negligence. That is why I wanted to find out whether there had been an attempt or direction to recover the 58 plus—and a big plus—documents in question.

• (1532)

The second question I raised was that we heard today that a warrant had been issued for the search of various offices of the media, television, and possibly radio stations, and the press. As we all know, the Fourth Estate has a very important function. It has been stated in this House on many occasions.

We try to get information. We do that by interrogating the government during question period. The answers we elicit are carried by the media across the country so that the public are properly informed. Without that Fourth Estate, this parliament, our democratic system, and this process could not operate effectively or efficiently.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The second question I put to the minister was not anything in reference to being harmful to the security of the nation.

The 264 members of this House realize their responsibility with regard to the security of the nation. We have a pretty severe act, the Official Secrets Act, which deals with that. I want to place on record Section 12 of that act. I quote:

> A prosecution for an offence under this Act shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the Attorney General;

Except for when I flushed him out the other day, the Attorney General (Mr. Basford) has been very quiet about this whole affair. We do not know what part he is playing. We do not know whether the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), to use the term of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), is babbling outside the House but dries up like a dry brook when he gets into the House. He babbles outside, and dries up inside. We cannot get the information.

The section continues:

> —except that a person charged with such an offence may be arrested, or a warrant for his arrest may be issued and executed and any such person may be remanded in custody or on bail, notwithstanding that the consent of the Attorney General to the institution of a prosecution for the offence has not been obtained, but no further or other proceedings shall be taken until that consent has been obtained.

That means the consent of the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, the highest law officer of this land.

We heard that warrants were issued. I might as well say it, because I have been thinking about it for a long time. I have the feeling that this government is not concerned with the security of the nation, but concerned with the security of the government. They are worried because they have been so soft on security for the past ten years, and now they have something to hide. It is time somebody in this House said that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: They cannot get any action by intimidating members of parliament, so now they are going to start to intimidate the Fourth Estate. If ever there was a question of privilege, it is surely high time that this whole matter was discussed in committee. Possibly we should reserve our right to move a special motion in that regard.

We then come to the point made by Your Honour. Throughout the time I have been in this House, I have always accepted the fact that a minister does not have to answer. I have always known that you can draw inferences just as you can draw inferences in law. When a minister dries up like a dry brook he has something to hide. I want to know what the minister and the government are hiding.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen): is today replacing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who has gone to western Canada, with or without the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I say to him it is time that we got some answers and clarification. It is time for intimidation to be shelved. Is this merely an election gimmick to scare the opposition and frighten public opinion into thinking that maybe the opposition is doing something to the security of this nation? If there is anyone who should be concerned about security in this nation, it is the Liberal party and the Liberal government headed by the man who heads the party now as Prime Minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret the necessity of participating in a series of questions of privilege that have been raised almost every day. I had been planning today, yesterday, and earlier to raise points of order, because it is obvious that, through the guise of questions of privilege, debates are being held on subjects that are not before the House. However, I did not raise a point of order because if that were done, even though I regard this practice as being a very bad one, it would obviously draw the charge that we were attempting to close off debate.

I want to make it clear that in my view there is not a valid question of privilege before the House. There has not been. The Speaker has consistently ruled that these are not prima facie questions of privilege. Almost every day he is obliged to make a new ruling, restating his same decision. That is the historical fact.

I just wonder whether members are going to continue using this vehicle of privilege. If they do, when a true question of privilege arises, and that is a rare event, it will be of not much use.

Today the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) declined to answer specifically certain questions which had been asked by the opposition relating to security. It is very obvious that if the Solicitor General had provided to the House of Commons the information requested with regard to the number of copies of sensitive security documents that were in circulation, where they were to be found, either in government departments or in the security service, that information would be of some value to persons and agents who may have an interest in penetrating the security service of Canada.

It seemed to be a very obvious refusal, to decline to add to the information that other countries might want to have about our security system. I thought it was a legitimate approach to have been taken by the Solicitor General. I think it would be of very great use to other countries to have this kind of information made available in the way that has been requested.

Quite apart from the security situation, the Solicitor General was entitled to answer, and I believe he would have answered as ministers generally do, except when there is some good reason. In this case it is a matter of judgment. There is a good explanation for the way the Solicitor General exercised his judgment.

References have been made in this debate by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to the fact that investigatory steps have been taken and possibly they were in the direction of a member of parliament, I think that both raised that point, and directed against the members of the media in the way of search warrants.

I remind the House that not so long ago allegations were made in the Globe and Mail with respect to the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Rooney). The privileges of that member are as great as those of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). It was alleged that the hon. member had violated a statute. The Speaker ordered an investigation. Subsequently a search warrant was issued, and the hon. member was charged. It was a regrettable occurrence, as any one of us regrets when any other hon. member finds himself in any difficulty of any kind. I apply that same view to the hon. member for Leeds.

The treatment given to the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception, however regrettable, demonstrated a very valid principle, that no member of parliament is above the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1542)

Mr. MacEachen: There has been a great deal said in this debate and in earlier debates about privilege. I agree there are privileges inherent in the office of member of parliament, some of which, as has been said, are outdated. Anyone who wishes to examine the Sandys case, as I have attempted to do, will find there were privileges asserted in that report which have fallen, and properly so, into disuse.

There is privilege. It ought not to be exaggerated, though, and members of parliament ought not to be giving the impression that in some way they can breach the law in a fashion which is not open to the ordinary citizen of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The people of Canada are watching to see how the hon. member for Leeds is going to be treated. Many of them are saying, "If I were suspected of having breached the law, or of having in my possession in an unauthorized manner certain documents, or having in my possession stolen documents—"

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Allegedly stolen.

Mr. MacEachen: —they are saying that in such circumstances they would be pressed to the limit. The citizens of Canada are watching the House of Commons. They are watching the government, and they are asking the government to deal with this matter in a just way.

Some hon. members are suggesting that the government is acting in order to persecute the hon. member for Leeds. That is a canard, a disreputable argument. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and members opposite, that we do not regard the hon. member for Leeds as being any formidable threat to the government or to the Liberal party. But we do believe that the fact he is in possession—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is an allegation and you know it!

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member concerned has made it clear in this Chamber that he has. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has only to look at what has been said by the hon. member for Leeds. He will find he has made it very clear that he has in his possession material which the security service of Canada has advised the government has been taken from, or is sourced in, security documents. No one has contested that, not even the hon. member for Leeds.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Let me put the argument in another way. If hon. members opposite find that line of argument unappealing, may I draw attention to the fact that it was the assistant commissioner of the RCMP, not the government, who went to the office of the hon. member for Leeds and asked him to co-operate with the police and return the documents in his possession.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: And he answered that request in this House.

Mr. MacEachen: It was not the government. Hon. members may say this was a political move. It should be apparent to the opposition that the reason the assistant commissioner accompanied the Solicitor General was to underline that this was not a political matter but a security matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is abundantly clear. Why was it important to secure that document? Obviously it was important to the police, to the security service, to trace the source of the leak. Obviously somebody with access to a highly sensitive document had broken his obligation to Canada and has made it available in an unauthorized way. Surely it was reasonable that the Solicitor General and the assistant commissioner should go to the hon. member for Leeds and say, "Will you please co-operate with the police in a matter affecting the security of Canada and give us that document so that we may preserve its contents and, if possible, find out who is the bad apple who is giving out this measure of comfort to the enemies of Canada?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Let us talk about privilege, but let us also talk about responsibility.

Mr. Nowlan: Hogwash!

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest that the responsibility of a member of parliament with respect to security is absolute. It is nothing short of that. Do not think for a moment that this matter is ended. This matter will be of great interest to the people of Canada. It will be of great interest to them as they adjudicate the attitude not only of the hon. member for Leeds but of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Nowlan: You are a great actor, Allan. You should have gone on the stage!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to be permitted to hear the argument which is being put forward as I have heard the other arguments which were put forward.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I have not very much more to say except that this is a matter which will not end today. It is one which will be of great interest to members of parliament and to the public because they will ask: what are the obligations of a citizen? What are the obligations of a member of parliament when asked by the police to co-operate in a security matter and to return a document? What is the responsibility of even the lowest among us, let alone a member of parliament? They will ask these questions. They will ask: what is the responsibility of the Leader of the Opposition in a situation of this kind when he was appealed to for assistance by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), who is the man primarily responsible for the security of this country?

Hon. members opposite may say: we are doing this because, you know, we are afraid; we are doing this because of the security of the Liberal Party. That is what the hon. member for Calgary North says. He knows, deep down, that that view is very foolish. I have a great deal of respect for the hon. member for Calgary North. He knows that that is just a debating point. He knows that the assistant commissioner of the RCMP could not be moved to take the action he did unless he was convinced this was a serious security matter. He knows that if the RCMP deserve the commendation they receive from the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as I believe they do, then surely, when they obtain a search warrant and put it into effect, they are not doing so for frivolous reasons but because they believe there is a matter which must be investigated, a matter which cannot be allowed to peter out without some conclusion.

● (1552)

I would appeal to hon. members opposite not to try to make politics on security and to attack the government every day on a question of privilege. I have resisted getting into this question of privilege earlier. Today I want to remind hon. members opposite that no matter how much smoke they put forward in these debates there is still one question that they must answer within their heart of hearts and that is what is the responsibility of a member of parliament when he is asked to co-operate with the chief of the security service of Canada, the assistant commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Has he any obligation to co-operate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I too have resisted getting involved in this particular debate. I believe, sir, that there are some legitimate questions raised by my colleagues with respect to points of privilege concerning the Solicitor General's approach to answering questions in the question period. It amazes me greatly to see the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) get up and, under the guise of discussing this whole matter, deal in a political and most shameful way with respect to a very serious matter. It is a grave dereliction in the carrying out of the responsibilities of one of his colleagues in cabinet, namely, the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais).

The point which was raised initially was whether or not the Solicitor General can come into this House and adopt a position with respect to his refusal absolutely to answer any questions and to give notice to this House that he will not answer any questions respecting matters under his specific jurisdiction. I believe that is the point originally raised and it is the one to which I wish to address myself.

We have had some developments, and the genesis of this is rather interesting. We have had the complete and absolute ineptitude on the part of the Solicitor General by bringing in a senior law officer on the premises of parliament without the consent of the Speaker of this House, who is after all the person to whom all these requests should be made. Whether it is a request for co-operation or an attempt to intimidate a member of parliament there are a number of alternatives that can be taken by the police, including incarceration, charges, and search warrants. That particular tactic and the ineptitude shown indicated to me a "jackboot mentality" on the part of the Solicitor General and members of this government.

I want to say one other thing in support of the position taken because it is important to understand the background of the situation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rose in the House and delivered a long, prepared speech. It was typed because I saw it across the aisle. He appeared to be dealing extemporaneously with this matter as if he had come in to the House and taken copious notes. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in the course of that long dissertation put a certain member of parliament not only on trial but he convicted and sentenced that member of parliament by his speech. The Prime Minister has offended every principle of civil liberty by that outrageous speech which he made where there have not been any particular charges laid, just simply allegations stated under the aegis of the Official Secrets Act in this House.

Any of us who have looked at that particular piece of legislation know that definition of national security is a discretionary matter subject to considerable judicial review. The Prime Minister made a presentation to this House which tended to cast innuendo and slurs upon a man who represents a constituency, and thus constitutes a threat to the Prime Minister. With the Prime Minister setting that kind of background, the Solicitor General comes into this House and, after he indicated the first time around that he was not going to answer any questions on the topic of the investigation now under consideration by Mr. Justice McDonald, he has now in effect done the same thing with respect to this aspect of his responsibilities. What he is doing is giving notice to you, sir, and to the rest of the hon. members of this House that as far as any aspect of any investigation which can be remotely termed, in his opinion, national security, he is simply not going to answer. Rather he will stand in his place, as he did today in a rather contemptible position of snickering and taking rather cheap shots.

In this particular case we have serious allegations made against a member of parliament which are continuing to be carried on by the Deputy Prime Minister. An answer has been given in this House by that member to the specific request made by the Solicitor General apparently in consultation with his chief law enforcement officer in that area. Now we have the spectacle of him trying to perpetuate the allegation after an answer has been made in this House without the basis of any charge having been laid, just merely on the basis of allegations such as have been made by the Deputy Prime Minister today.

The reason I support the position taken by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) is that initially the Solicitor General gave notice to you, Mr. Speaker, that he would refuse to answer any questions, and it seems to me the basis of your decision and observation when the matter was first brought up was that one would have to consider the answers given from time to time in response to specific questions. But I suggest to you, sir, that the Solicitor General has indeed indicated that he is refusing to come into this House to answer any questions. He has given us a blanket assurance time and time again. This bears on the whole concept of ministerial responsibility; it bears on the whole basis of your observations, as pointed out by the House leader on this side, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

We have the continuing threat and intimidation by the Deputy Prime Minister who says, "This is not going to end". We have the intimidation that has been practiced on a member of this House, an answer given, yet the continuation of intimidation by the fact that the Solicitor General continues to refuse to answer any questions in dereliction of the responsibility of that portfolio.

Mr. Speaker: I see two other hon. members who want to join in the debate. We began with the proposition that it was a question of privilege that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) today refused to answer questions on the grounds of national security. The argument has been interesting, but it really has not addressed itself to that fundamental point. No one has alleged that the Solicitor General does not enjoy that right, and I would be most surprised if anyone did. I am prepared to hear from the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), but I would ask them to confine themselves to the merits of that particular point.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) in his comments certainly raised some questions here which you are going to have to ultimately decide, one of which he says is: what is the obligation of a member of parliament? Well, you are considering the question about what is an obligation of a member of parliament who is a minister.

There is a minister who says that on national security grounds and grounds that he deems to be national security—no other impartial body is yet to be asked to decide whether they are national security grounds or not—he does not have to answer any questions. That is what the minister says. The Deputy Prime Minister wants to know what is the obligation of an MP. As I see our obligation, the obligation of an MP is to do what he considers to be right for the country, based on the best advice he can get. It is not to bow down to the government.

When the government says, "This is a national security matter and therefore you are doing the wrong thing and we want to know the source of your information, you must give it to us because we, the government, say this is national security". I say "Who are you the government? You are the executive which, down through the centuries, has tyrannized the rest of the population whenever you have had the chance to do it. Your power is only fettered by the rights of members of parliament, and therefore I do not trust you. Whether it is you, an NDP executive, a PC executive or a Liberal executive, I do not trust you." I do not trust the executive, and I am never going to trust them. When a member of the executive says that a matter is a matter of national security, I say, prove it, go to some third party, go to a joint committee of the House which is seized of these matters. If that joint committee with members of both parties on it, says this is a matter of national security and that member X should do so and so, then I will be glad to do it. But I do not agree that I should do something because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), or the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) says it is a security matter.

Today we heard a remarkable proposition from the Deputy Prime Minister—one of the longest serving members in this House—that the right of national security is absolute with respect to members of parliament. He used the word "absolute". In effect, the Deputy Prime Minister says that when he decides it is a security matter, I have no rights vis-à-vis him. This is at least a dubious proposition that the Deputy Prime Minister has put forward. I say, if that is correct, we can wind up this parliament and forget it because, if that is the case, executive has an untrammeled power and authority based on national security.

The Deputy Prime Minister compared the case of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) to that of the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Rooney). They are in no way similar. The hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception has been charged with certain breaches of the Criminal Code in relation to his responsibilities as a member of the House, and the matter was handled quite properly. We all regret that it had to happen and that it did happen. But the cases are not the same. No charge is laid against the hon. member for Leeds and, if there are charges, they will not be laid under the Criminal Code because of some personal dereliction of his but because of a disagreement about what is in the interests of this country and what is a genuine breach of national security. So the cases are not similar.

In the case of the hon. member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception, was the CTV network raided by the RCMP, was the Global network raided, and were newsmen dragooned to interrogate them throughout the week end? Nothing like that was done, so we are not dealing with a similar case. What we are dealing with now is an organized attempt by the government to put fear into the media and into the opposition parties as an election looms on the horizon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: That is all it is. If another proposition of the Deputy Prime Minister is correct that we only have the same rights and responsibilities as an ordinary citizen, why were we elected in the first place? If my rights and responsibilities are exactly the same as those of anyone else in Canada, why am I a member? This is a new doctrine. We are supposed to have certain rights and duties that are different from those of the ordinary citizens.

The Deputy Prime Minister said that the public is watching the hon. member for Leeds to see if he is prosecuted. That is what in effect he said. I say, yes, you are a good one to give us that example. They were watching also to see if the former solicitor general was prosecuted, but he was not, and for the most part everybody is agreed that in the circumstances he should not have been. But let it not be said that the former solicitor general was treated exactly the same as any member of the general public would have been treated. We all know that is not the case.

Mr. Andras: He co-operated with the police.

Mr. Crosbie: Do not give us that applesauce that everyone is watching the hon. member for Leeds and that he is somehow different. Do not try to bluff us with your talk of national security.

Is it not peculiar, Mr. Speaker, that the government have been saying for 18 months that they know nothing about national security, the Prime Minister said that they should know nothing about security, they do not know about barn burnings, they do not know about breaking and entering, they do not know what the security services are doing, but in the case of the hon. member for Leeds, they know every small detail? The Prime Minister is not staying out of this one, nor is the Solicitor General. Because it affects the hon. member for Leeds, they both have their snouts right into the trough.

Ever since October we have been told, "No, we are not going to have anything to do with security. We are the cabinet, we do not muck around with that, we might be accused of interfering with the police". But I say, yes, I accuse them of interfering with the police and security forces. That is what they are doing now in the case of the hon. member for Leeds. After the statements the Prime Minister made in the House telling us that we are breaching national security if we do not do what they are telling us to do, and after the Deputy Prime Minister ended with a threat to all members of the House of Commons, I say he will not influence me one whit, one jot, or one tittle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If the hon. member for Leeds is persecuted by the bunch opposite, I will be right there with him if he ever goes to jail, and so will everybody on this side.

The Deputy Prime Minister had the gall today to glare at us and say this matter will not end today. In other words he meant that they have not finished yet with their writs and searches, and with the media. "We are not finished with you yet," he said. I tell him what he can kiss. I will not say it in the House, Mr. Speaker, but I for one do not agree with the version of the Deputy Prime Minister of what are our rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief, I would like to deal with the specific question of privilege because it is similar to the question of privilege which was raised when the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) was initially appointed to his present role. At that time the questions that were asked, which dealt with the Keable inquiry or the McDonald inquiry, met with silence. There was a blanket refusal to deal with the subject, and the ground that was given by the Solicitor General at the time was that it was a matter which was before another body or another inquiry. That decision was subsequently reversed by the Solicitor General himself. What I say is that today the Solicitor General has made exactly the same kind of decision. He will now refuse to answer any questions dealing with the subject related to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), or to deal with anything surrounding that.

It is vital and important that there be a response to questions by this government where a warrant is issued that is as serious as the one which affects the out-tapes, not merely the videotapes, of Global and CTV. The principle of freedom of speech is so intimately involved in this question that surely it is incumbent on the Solicitor General to respond without unconsciously misleading the House. Where I say the House is being unconsciously misled is in the excuse for not answering the question, that it is a matter which deals with national security.

The questions I asked today were, first, who initiated the issuance of those warrants, was it the Solicitor General's office? On the surface of it, it is not a question which would be a matter affecting national security. My second question was whether a legal opinion had been given by the law officers of the Crown in respect of the rights and privileges of members of parliament vis-à-vis the Official Secrets Act. Again that met with a refusal to answer. The minister would not say that he has even received appropriate legal advice with regard to the actions that had been taken.

What we have before us in another example of a blanket refusal to deal with the subject. The government cannot get away with that. It can refuse to answer a question, but there is a political ramification when a government refuses to answer such questions day by day because it says it does not like them. That is a violation of my privileges, Mr. Speaker, a violation of the privileges of every member of the House when there is a refusal, not to answer a single question, but to answer any questions on the general subject. That is exactly what the Solicitor General did when matters were before the McDonald and Keable inquiries, and that is exactly what he did again in the House today. He has simply refused to answer questions on the total subject.

Will we now be in the position to ask any more questions concerning a fellow member of the House? That appears to be the position of the Solicitor General. He will take the political consequences of his refusal to answer these questions. In terms of privileges, I submit it is a violation of our privileges when any minister gives a blanket refusal and says in effect, "I will not answer any questions on that subject." This is a complete dereliction of his duty to members of the House and of his responsibility as a cabinet minister.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, there remains but little to say except to analyse some of the reasons that have activated the government in this attack on the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt).

● (1612)

I recall very well that very recently some mention was made to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the hon. member for Leeds, and the answer the Prime Minister gave bore a relationship to an expression he used one time in this House which, interpreted, was quite different from the words which had been used. "Fuddle duddle" is approximately the expression of the Prime Minister in its original form concerning the hon. member for Leeds.

I am sorry hon. members opposite have all gone. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) has disappeared. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) has disappeared. Where have they gone? Have they gone to western Canada? After all, there is a pilgrimage going on there. As a member for Saskatchewan I am deeply concerned to find that the minister from Saskatchewan is among those left behind. That is an attack on my own province which I resent very greatly. Where are they? Have they gone with the birds?

The Deputy Prime Minister wrapped himself in the garments of legal righteousness in his references to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Not many months ago members of the RCMP were regarded as the enemies of the nation by the Prime Minister of Canada.

An hon. Member: Hogwash.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister had reasons. If he was here, I would take him back to 1944, but he is absent. If he reads Hansard, he will know what I have in mind. All over the city of Montreal the mounted police were chasing after one who, in those dark days, was doing everything he could to undermine the authority of the mounted police. I could go into details. I did on one occasion, and I gave the Prime Minister an opportunity to answer. He disappeared right after I started to speak, and he did not come back.

I will proceed to recent days. Three years ago the Prime Minister decided to change the name of the RCMP from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I could understand his antipathy with regard to "Royal". He has shown that over and over again. However, the "RC" was knocked out, and what was left was "Mounted Police". I raised the matter in the House, and the Prime Minister said there was no foundation for my raising it. All over western Canada the "RC" was removed from detachments and the like. When western Canada rose in its might and told the Prime Minister its views about him—and it is going to tell him again when the next election comes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —he said he did not quite understand, and the initials "RC" were restored. Before they were restored the explanation of the Prime Minister was that the reason for removing them was that if a robbery was taking place across the street and there was a car with "RCMP" on it, Canadians would not know what that meant, and the robbery would go undetected. Well, the "RCMP" was restored because the Prime Minister did not dare continue the course he had been following. In the present instance the RCMP is being used in a way which cannot be justified.

Why was the hon. member for Leeds approached? Why was the hon. member for Leeds interrogated—there was at least the expectation of interrogation—by General Dare and the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais)? They had no business whatsoever coming into the precincts of the House of Commons. What were they trying to do? That is what is called the badger game.

The Deputy Prime Minister says this will be an issue in the election. It will, and it will leave fewer Liberal members from western Canada than ever before. All over this nation there is a realization of what is happening. There is intimidation, and there are threats. I defend no one who breaks the law, but I defend the right of a member of parliament to speak without intimidation and without threats. The Liberals have a big majority. The opposition is small, but there is one custodian of our rights, the Speaker of Parliament, who represents all members of parliament, and I want to suggest to Your Honour—you might have certain views concerning what has been happening over the last few days—that the freedom of parliament is at issue, and if there has been wrongdoing, let it be punished.

However, what has happened? There has been intimidation of the press because the press has dared to publish something the Prime Minister did not like. Are there 58 different varieties—one more than Heinz—or documents spread all over this country? Today the minister refused to answer. I can understand that, if he had answered, the truth would have been out, and it would have been recognized that this document, which is presumed by the Liberal party to involve the safety and future of the nation, is in the hands of 57 different people besides, allegedly, the hon. member for Leeds. Are we to be intimidated the way Charles I endeavoured to intimidate parliament and the way Cromwell later tried to do so? Not as long as there are members who believe in the British tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled again to intervene. I listened with absolute horror to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Some of these gentlemen have total contempt for certain aspects of parliament and the democratic system. I have been told by them that parliament and the democratic system are valuable and precious. But now they are contemptuous of it. I rise, however on another point.

Privilege does not allow any citizen of Canada, member of parliament or corner grocery man, to break the law. It does not protect a member from prosecution. If the government erred, it erred in not immediately laying charges and prosecuting that man who committed so terrible a crime against the state. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) has committed a crime that is beyond all—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Andre: That is privilege. Withdraw! Withdraw now! You can't make a charge like that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is against the rules.

An hon. Member: Learn something about parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mrs. Holt: I will listen to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I trust that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) used that expression in a metaphorical sense.

An hon. Member: No, she did not. She must withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: If that is not the case, perhaps upon reflection there is some explanation for her choice of language, and the hon. member might want to withdraw that.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I would rather listen to your instructions than those of hon. members opposite. I apologize. I withdraw that statement.

● (1622)

I do say this, Mr. Speaker, that if it was the corner grocery man who had been involved in an incident of possession of something that did not belong to him, he might have suffered different consequences than a member of parliament.

I would like to say too that I am concerned with what has been happening in this House, with the backdrop of long experience as an observer of crime and the extent of crime in society. We are in a third world war, gentlemen. You have no ladies over there. We are in a third world war of terror. I have done research in terror and because of that happen to know things that I do not bring into the House of Commons that are secret and to which I am privy. I know certain things have been happening in the last year. International terrorists today have billions of dollars, more than any state or nation has. The thin blue line between the police—you cannot take it, you men opposite, can you?

It is a tragedy that the members of parliament over there cannot stand a little bit of other information besides their rhetoric. I tell you that I know that terrorism was a possibility and the thin blue line of protection by the police between the public and the terrorists entering Canada—

An hon. Member: You are embarrassing your colleagues.

Mrs. Holt: I would not have embarrassed my colleagues if you people could stop howling. I notice that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) called in the gentleman from Crowfoot when they disagreed with him publicly. He called in the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) when he insulted him. He called in the former member from Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. But when something as serious as this happened, he did not have the strength, the intestinal fortitude to call in the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt).

I am deeply concerned, Mr. Speaker, with one thing in this House. I know the importance of the place of the police in society. I know the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and how he respects the police and the law; I know that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has great respect for the police and the law. I am not sure of one or two others who have spoken, because I do not know them as well, but I do know, Mr. Speaker, that the thin blue line is so fragile—that line provided by the police for the safety of our society is fragile.

Contempt for the protection of the people, Mr. Speaker, is just frightening to anyone who cares. I just ask, and I plead in this House for the safety of the people of Canada, I ask members not to play with the information, the secret information the police may have. I have often investigated cases where my information, if published, would have destroyed the investigation. I see it happening here on the largest possible scale. I beg you, Mr. Speaker, and I beg the responsible members opposite to please think of our country and our people, and the safety that the police provide for this country. Perhaps there is sensitive information, and perhaps the way the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) handled this crucial situation has not satisfied some people, but let us not be ready to destroy our police force unless we have a substitute.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) initiated this discussion by referring to a question of privilege on the refusal today of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), to answer questions on the grounds of security. He referred back, as did other hon. members, to the motions that remain outstanding as a result of earlier discussions.

I want to reiterate that my intention in dealing with those earlier motions on that occasion was to stand them out of respect for the substantive nature and the importance of the motions. I feel I made it clear at that time that no obligation exists. I think it is well understood that it is impossible to enforce an obligation to give answers during the course of a question period. However, it was a separate question at that time which related to the declared intention on the part of the hon. minister in terms of certain kinds of questions and, therefore, I felt that the most effective way to get at the answer to that question was not to send the matter to the committee, but really to see what would happen in the question period.

I have heard all of the argument today. I will give the matter further consideration and attempt to finalize those motions as soon as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TABLING OF TOMENSON-ALEXANDER STUDY OF PUBLIC SERVICE PENSIONS

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in both official languages a study of public service pensions conducted by Tomenson-Alexander and Associates.

* * *

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions through the usual channels about the fact that the statement that is about to be made by the hon. minister, and perhaps the comments, responses and questions will certainly run us into the private members' hour. I believe it is generally understood that we would agree to that, and perhaps approaching six o'clock we could deal with Bill C-1001. We could proceed with that following the statement of the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, so that we could clear up some of the other matters, would it be possible for us to change our proceedings a bit? I know that my friend wants to put two motions standing on the order paper in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister, and we are prepared to deal with those very quickly. Perhaps we could get them out of the way and then we can deal with the minister's statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The sensible solution might very well be, in the circumstances, to try to finalize routine proceedings and leave outstanding the statement on motions and orders of the day only. That would enable us to do that, and I hope we can move to do that with dispatch in a few minutes. We could then get to the minister's statement, and that would leave only his statement and the responses and questions, and then orders of the day later. Whatever is left of the private members' hour before six o'clock could be used, of course, in the way described. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—DIRECTOR OF EVALUATION

Question No. 498—Mr. Herbert:

1. What are the terms of reference of the Director of Evaluation in the Department of the Secretary of State?

2. How many personnel are employed in the offices under his control and what are their categories?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. Under the general direction of the director general, planning, systems and services, develops the departmental framework within which program evaluation is to be accomplished; coordinates, insofar as necessary, departmental evaluation work; recommends to senior management policy changes, based on evaluation results which will improve the effectiveness of the department; encourages the establishment of criteria of effectiveness and performance indicators for departmental objectives; guides program managers in the conduct of evaluations; conducts evaluations where more than one program area is involved.

2. Three people—all ES 5's. The director of evaluation is an AS 7. In addition, there are a small number of officers in the policy and planning units of certain program directorates in the department who, among other duties, plan, develop and direct evaluation of the effectiveness of their respective programs in meeting program objectives.

NOTE: The under secretary of state recently authorized the establishment of an evaluation and audit branch which will become the senior departmental coordinating body for program evaluation and financial and operational audit. Responsibility for organizing the new branch has been assigned to an assistant under secretary who will be assisted by a small task force with the following mandate: 1. To define the objectives and features of an evaluation policy for the department's programs. 2. To determine the methods required to make objective, quantifiable evaluations as far as possible, and share responsibilities. 3. To draw up a plan for evaluation and audit activities. 4. To determine the structure of the new evaluation and audit branch and make it operational.

COMMUNITY SERVICES EQUALIZATION PROGRAM

Question No. 882—Mr. Marshall:

What are the details of the programme known as the Community Services Equalization Programme which is to replace the Neighbourhood Improvement Programme?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): There is not a program known as the Community Services Equalization Program to replace the Neighbourhood Improvement Program. Rather, in discussions which I have had with my provincial colleagues over the past year, I have expressed my concern with ensuring that federal urban related programs are both flexible and equally accessible to all potential users. In this regard, I have outlined three broad alternatives for discussion purposes. The three broad options which have been identified and which have been discussed in general terms with many of my provincial counterparts at various tri-level meetings are: (i) increasing federal assistance programs for such projects as home rehabilitation, neighbourhood improvement and sewerage treatment; (ii) providing funds to the provinces under the condition that the money be passed along to municipalities; and (iii) establishing a direct tax rebate system to reimburse Canadians for some of the heavy tax load they now bear. These matters are continuously being reviewed and reflect a concern with ensuring that programs are achieving their objectives in an effective, efficient and equitable manner.

EXPENDITURES IN CONSTITUENCY OF NICKEL BELT

Question No. 1,114—Mr. Rodriguez:

For each fiscal year since 1970, what amount was spent in the Constituency of Nickel Belt by the Department of the Secretary of State and those agencies that report to it?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned: records are not kept in such a way as to permit the ready provision of accurate information on grants by electoral districts without inordinate time and expense.

In so far as the Public Service Commission is concerned: the Public Service Commission does not maintain details of expenditure by constituency and is therefore unable to provide the information requested.

In so far as the National Film Board is concerned: Nil.

In so far as the Public Archives are concerned: Nil.

In so far as the National Library is concerned: Nil.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

Question No. 1,194—Mr. Andre:

1. What is the Crown's precise financial interest in Canadian Commercial Corporation as administered by the Department of Supply and Services and on what date was such interest acquired, at what cost and for what reason?

2. What was the book value of the Crown's equity on the date of acquisition and what is its latest estimated book value?

3. To date, what is the Crown's total investment, including equity costs, contributions to operating funds, debt forgiveness and what is the Crown's total realized profit from such investment?

4. In what manner is the Crown's interest represented (a) on the Board of Directors (b) in its senior management?

5. Did the government make a policy decision in regard to the future disposition of its interest?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The financial interest of the Crown in Canadian Commercial Corporation based on unaudited quarterly financial statements at December 31, 1977 is as follows: Interest on loans, $156,234; Loan payable to Canada (CCC Act S.8(2)), $3,300,000; Equity of Canada: Working Capital provided under authority of CCC Act S.8(1), $10,000,000; Unrealized gain on U.S. Exchange, $360,873; Surplus, $320,993; Total financial interest, $14,138,000. The Canadian Commercial Corporation was established as of May 1, 1946, by act of parliament, for the following purposes: (a) To assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations, and (b) To assist persons in Canada: 1. To obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada, and 2. To dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada. By the terms of the act the corporation took over the whole of the undertaking of the Canadian Export Board (established by Order in Council P.C. 70 of January 31, 1944), which agency was at that time carrying out procurement functions in Canada on behalf of foreign governments, United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, and the Canadian Mutual Aid Board. As a result, the corporation continued without interruption all procurement action being taken on April 30, 1946, by the Canadian Export Board, and continued to render similar services to foreign governments. In addition, for some time, the corporation was able to give assistance to Canadians in the procurement of goods from other countries where, by reason of regulations in those countries, it was necessary that transactions be handled in whole or in part through a government agency. From February 5, 1947 to March 31, 1951, the corporation also acted in effect as agent for the Minister of Trade and Commerce in procurement for the Department of National Defence. On March 31, 1947 the Crown's equity was $2,500,000 in the form of an advance for working capital, there being no fixed assets acquired.

2. From the figures aforementioned the book value of the Crown's equity is as follows: at incorporation, $2,500,000; at December 31, 1977, $10,681,866.

3. To December 31, 1977, the net amount "invested" by the Crown in CCC was $81,312,651, not including $10,241,953 recovered from the Canadian International Development Agency for grant aid procurement services. Since 1962, CCC has not charged any handling fee for its services due to statutes in various defence related agreements and also in a desire to encourage exports. Most expenses have been covered by annual appropriations so that the corporation operates on a break even basis. Therefore the concept of realized profit in dollar terms is inapplicable. These costs must be taken in the context of an over-all business volume of about $6.8 billion to date.

4. (a) The board of directors and the president of the corporation are appointed by the Governor-in-Council pursuant to S.3(1) of the act. It has been the policy of the corporation that all directors be public servants with the exception of appointment of a president from the private sector from 1961 to 1965. (b) Since April 1, 1964, all staff have been employees of the Department of Supply and Services and its predecessor the Department of Defence Production.

5. It is not intended at the present time to make any change in the current relationship between the government and CCC.

CANADAIR LIMITED

Question No. 1,197—Mr. Andre:

1. What is the Crown's precise financial interest in Canadair Limited as administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and on what date was such interest acquired, at what cost and for what reason?

2. What was the book value of the Crown's equity on the date of acquisition and what is its latest estimated book value?

3. To date, what is the Crown's total investment, including equity costs, contributions to operating funds, debt forgiveness and what is the Crown's total realized profit from such investment?

4. In what manner is the Crown's interest represented (a) on the Board of Directors (b) in its senior management?

5. Did the government make a policy decision in regard to the future disposition of its interest?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a) Financial interest: $46,618,715. (b)(i) At date of acquisition, January 5, 1975: 251,700 Preferred Shares, $25,170,165; 1,408,463 Common Shares, 12,979,835. (ii) At December 31, 1976: 1,693,743 Common Shares, 8,468,715; Total interest, $46,618,715. (c)(i) In exercise of the option agreement to purchase; (ii) additional subscription, consequent on the repayment by Canadair of a $6 million loan, plus accrued interest, to the Defence Production Revolving Fund.

2. (a) At date of acquisition, $30.919 million; (b) At end of 1977 (estimated), $40.929 million.

3. Equity Costs, $46,618,715. Contributions to Operating Funds, Refundable inventory financing, during period since Crown took ownership of Canadair, resulting from agreements standing at the time of purchase, $16,006,996. Debt Forgiveness, Nil. Crown's Realized Profit, Canadair has operated profitably since the purchase. Net earnings have been retained.

4. (a) The Canadair board of directors is appointed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Mr. A. M. Guérin, assistant deputy minister, Industry and Commerce Development, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, directly represents the minister on the board. With the exception of one other government representative, Mr. Guy Lavigueur, vice president, Federal Development Bank, the other board members are drawn from the Canadian private sector. (b) Canadair is constituted as a business entity under the Canada Corporations Act. The appointment of the senior management of the company is the prerogative of the board of directors.

5. Not yet. Mr. D. A. Golden, president Telesat, is currently assessing for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the restructuring options open to the government in respect of its ownerhip of Canadair Limited and of de Havilland. Mr. Golden plans to submit his report at the end of March, 1978.

MR. LIONEL ORLIKOW

Question No. 1,208—Mr. Epp:

1. Is Mr. Lionel Orlikow employed by the Department of the Secretary of State and, if so (a) what is his job designation (b) upon what basis and on what criteria was he hired (c) for how long has he been hired (d) what salary and what expense account per year is he receiving?

2. Will he be submitting an annual report of his findings and will the report be Tabled in the House of Commons?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

CBC—FOOTAGE OF RUSSIAN SATELLITE CRASH LANDING

Question No. 1,272—Mr. Beatty:

1. Since the first report of the Russian satellite that crash landed in Northern Canada was broadcasted up to and including January 31, 1978, how many minutes of footage concerning the incident was made available to local stations by CBC?

2. Of the total footage, how many minutes were produced by CBC?

3. In the case of footage supplied by other networks, what were the networks in question and how many minutes produced by each were made available to CBC affiliates?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. By Evening News Service and syndication, 24 minutes 59 seconds. This total does not include The National, which is carried on all CBC-owned and affiliated stations.

2. CBC produced 21 minutes 54 seconds of the above total.

3. One minute 36 seconds produced by NBC, and one minute 29 seconds by CBS.

Mr. Young: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have one brief question. Today is Thursday. I understand the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has it within his care to give us the order of business as we look ahead into next week.

Mr. Andras: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My colleague has indicated it is the intention to proceed after the immediate events with Bill C-10. After the disposition of second reading of that, it is intended to proceed with Bill C-26, followed by Bill C-4, and then Bill C-21. Of course March 15 is an allotted day.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LEGISLATION WITH RESPECT TO INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this occasion to announce the government's intention to introduce legislation to amend several features of the public service pension program with respect to the indexing of pensions to changes in the cost of living.

The amendments that will be proposed will apply to members of parliament, public servants, military and RCMP personnel, and all other individuals who are subject to the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

Over the past two years, Mr. Speaker, the government has been carrying out a special examination of public service pension arrangements in conjunction with its expenditure restraint program, its total compensation analyses, and the comprehensive review the government is carrying out of the retirement income situation facing all Canadians. This examination has not been completed, but it has reached a sufficiently advanced state to indicate that some changes can be introduced to the program at this time without compromising the conclusions of the other reviews.

The objectives of the changes that will be introduced, briefly stated, will be to place a curb on some undesirable practices that have crept into the program; to close off some loopholes in the program; and to fortify the financial viability of the program against unexpected financial setbacks that could conceivably arise in the relatively distant future.

To achieve those objectives, the amendments will propose: first, that indexing payments be deferred to age 60 for individuals who, in future, retire before age 60.

To ensure that this change is applied equitably to those who are presently close to early retirement ages, the bill will propose that it be introduced on a gradual basis so that those who retire during the balance of this year will be unaffected by the change, but for those retiring with unreduced pensions next year, indexing would be deferred to their 56th birthday, and for those retiring in 1980, indexing would be deferred to their 57th birthday, and so on.

Another way of putting this is that those who will be 54 at the end of this year would, if they take early retirement, have their indexing payments deferred by one year; those who will be 53 would face a two-year deferral; and those who will be 52 would face a three-year deferral.

As a result of this transitional feature, therefore, full implementation of this change would not occur until 1983. I have been informed in the last few minutes that in the press release on some of these points I am making here, which was set out in French, there is an error on that particular point. That correction will be made. I think it is important.

Second, that the first indexing adjustment received by pensioners be pro-rated monthly so that it only reflects the inflation that occurs after retirement.

Third, that the current continuing commitment to index pensions fully with changes in the consumer price index be replaced by an arrangement under which cost of living adjustments would be determined on an ad hoc basis, three years at a time.

Fourth, that the first ad hoc arrangement would apply for the three years commencing January 1, 1979.

Fifth, that each triennial arrangement would be determined no later than the end of October preceding the commencement of each three-year period, and would be determined by a statutory formula which would provide that (a) full indexing for any three-year period could be set aside if it can be established that the costs of full indexing for the period are likely to exceed the amount of extra interest it is expected will be earned on the pensioners' share of the accounts of the program for the period, plus the 1 per cent employer and 1 per cent employee contributions that have been made to the indexing account by and on behalf of pensioners, and (b) when full indexing is set aside, the ad hoc arrangement authorized for the period shall provide for the maximum adjustments that can be financed by expected pensioners' extra interest earnings for the period and the indexing contributions that have been made by and on behalf of pensioners.

The first two proposals to defer cost-of-living adjustment payments to age 60, and to reduce the size of the first adjustment received by public servants who retire toward the end of the year are basically designed to curb the incidence of artificial early retirements that appears to have cropped up in recent years. I think hon. members have increasingly had their attention drawn to a practice that is followed by some public servants who leave the public service with early retirement pensions, but do not leave the labour market. In my view it is a misnomer to say that such individuals have retired. And second, to plug the loophole which now allows public servants to get the best of all worlds by retiring toward the end of the year.

At present, public servants who time their retirements toward the end of the year can build up their basic pensions, and then in a matter of a few days, weeks, or months receive an adjustment on the highest possible basic pension. I am confident that most public servants will share my view that this arrangement is an unfair one.

The other changes, Mr. Speaker, are designed to firm up the financial underpinnings of the program to ensure that we are not storing up future trouble for taxpayers and public service pensioners. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the decision to propose that public service pensions be adjusted for changes in the cost of living on an ad hoc basis was only reached after considerable thought and soul searching on my part and that of the government.

The source of the dilemma—and that is what it is, a dilemma—centres around the responsibility the government has to both pensioners and taxpayers. On the one hand, it is the government's view that the measures that have been adopted to protect the purchasing value of public service pensions are based on a sound principle. In the government's view, it is unjust and unfair to allow the rate of inflation to determine arbitrarily the real value of pensions, and that is exactly what happens when pensions are not adjusted for changes in the cost of living.

In short, the principle of maintaining the purchasing value of pensions so that pensioners can maintain their access to the same basket of goods and services is a principle to which the government is committed, and remains committed.

The government, however, is also committed to the principle that public service pension arrangements must also be just and fair in terms of their impact on taxpayers.

These two principles are not necessarily incompatible with each other.

There are experts who feel we can count on seeing a long-term situation in which interest rates, on average, will be 3 per cent to 4 per cent ahead of the rate of inflation, and 1 per cent ahead of salary increases.

If this were to occur, and it would not be a new experience by any means, a fully indexed public service pension program could be carried by government employer contributions that would not exceed the level of those that were met by taxpayers prior to the introduction of indexation.

In recent years, of course, interest rates have not maintained a 3 per cent to 4 per cent margin over inflation and a 1 per cent margin over salary increases.

Some experts feel that this is not a temporary situation, but is a state of affairs that can be expected to prevail over the next 50 years or so. What these experts, in essence, are saying is that while interest earnings may rise in the future as a result of inflation, they will not keep pace with faster rising inflation. If that were to occur, it would mean that a fully indexed public service program while experiencing rising revenues would face indexing costs which were increasing at a faster rate. Eventually, then, something would have to give. That is, if the situation continued long enough, pension benefits would have to be cut back drastically or taxpayer payments to the program would have to be increased substantially.

● (1642)

Faced with such a gulf in the views of these two camps of experts, I think we have but two basic choices. One approach would be to adopt a "wait-and-see" attitude, that is, to wait and see who is right. The other approach would be to say "a plague on both your Houses" and then take a practical, down to earth attitude to the matter. Adopting a wait-and-see approach means that if we eventually discover that those with a bullish attitude about future interest rates are right, then there is no problem and there will be no problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: If, on the other hand, the "bears", those who take a more pessimistic view about future interest rates, are right, the result could be a wrenching experience for future taxpayers and/or pensioners. In my view the stakes, namely, the welfare of future taxpayers and pensioners, are just too high for such a gamble. Given the current state of uncertainty and the division of expert opinion on these economic issues, the sensible thing to do, in my view, is to adopt a shorter time frame for looking at these issues. In this way, if difficulties are encountered, it will be possible to take the needed stitch in time so as to avoid a future unravelling of the whole program. At the same time, it would avoid creating a situation in which current employees and taxpayers might be required to make large sacrifices today in order to cover contingencies which may never arise.

To achieve this goal, the legislation which will be introduced will require the President of the Treasury Board to carry out a triennial review of Public Service pension arrangements with advice from the chief actuary and in consultation with representatives of interested parties. These reviews will be directed at determining, the amount of money which will become available for pension adjustments for the coming three years from, first, the interest earnings which will be realized from the pensioners' investment in the program and which are over and above the interest earnings required to finance basic pensions, and, second, from the special contributions for indexing which have been made by and on behalf of pensioners. The reviews will also seek to determine the fairest and most reasonable way of allocating the money becoming available for cost of living adjustments to pensioners, including those in receipt of survival and disability benefits.

I may say that in making these proposals I have been very much influenced by advice I have received from my advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act and by consultations which have been held with bargaining agents. I want to acknowledge publicly that this advice and consultation resulted in a number of constructive suggestions being advanced and, in fact, accepted. However, I also wish to say that the proposals I have described, and particularly my decision to announce them today, have also been influenced by the study carried out by the actuarial consulting firm of Tomenson-Alexander Associates which I tabled in the House today.

This study, hon. members may recall, is one which I commissioned last spring to give me an independent view on a variety of Public Service pension issues. I believe that when hon. members have had an opportunity to examine that report they will find that much of the evidence and data amassed by the consultants corroborates the central financial projections contained in the paper "Basic Facts About Pensions in the Public Service of Canada" which I tabled in the House on October 18, 1976.

Many parts of the report, however, are quite critical of the Public Service program. Here, Mr. Speaker, I am referring to the findings of the consultants that if the Public Service program were placed on a fully funded basis, the program would require a continuing government employer contribution of 15.3 per cent of payroll and would face an initial unfunded actuarial liability of $5.9 billion.

In analysing this finding I think it is important to realize that these projections are in many ways a product of the assumptions made by the consultants, particularly their assumption with respect to interest earnings. I should also like to point out that $5.6 billion of the $5.9 billion unfunded actuarial liability estimated by the consultants is attributed to the indexing part of the program. According to the consultants, the argument for fully funding this part of the program rests on the fact that the indexing commitment is, at present, a continuing and automatic legislative commitment. These features, in the view of the consultants, are the true conditions which necessitate advance full-funding for the indexing part of the program. And these are the precise features of the program which I shall be proposing be changed.

Hon. members will find that the news release I am issuing on the consultants' report deals with these complex technical matters in a much more comprehensive manner than I am able to do this afternoon. What I have tried to do is describe the broad principles and policies which will be advanced in the legislation. The bill itself will spell out the day-to-day details with respect to the manner in which these principles and policies would operate in individual and special situations and ensure that the changeover to the new rules will be carried out in a smooth and equitable manner.

[Mr. Andras.]

In developing the proposals which would be included in the proposed legislation I shall be consulting with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson)—because of the Armed Forces pension program—with the Solicitor General, (Mr. Blais) having the pension interest of the RCMP in mind, and with my own Public Service Superannuation Advisory Committee as well as with other interested parties.

Finally, I should like to assure hon. members that the whole Public Service pension program will be up for review upon the completion of the current actuarial evaluation of the program now being carried out by the department of insurance and upon the completion of the government's comprehensive review of the retirement income situation of all Canadians. The review will also take into account all the findings of the consultants, as tabled today, and the detailed analysis of the Treasury Board secretariat.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF LEGISLATION WITH RESPECT TO INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, we have all been awaiting most eagerly the report of the Tomenson-Alexander investigation as it relates to pensions. First of all I must say "thank you" to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) for giving this side of the House, and I think I can speak for all members on this side of the House, the opportunity of seeing not only the statement but the press release together with the actual actuarial report. I believe I can speak for all members on this side.

I must say we have had an opportunity of reading the minister's statement and the press release but we have only had an opportunity of having a cursory glance at the report itself. In the event you do not know it, Mr. Speaker, this report is extremely complex, with many ramifications, implications, and complications. Half of the report, in about 154 pages, is an analysis, and we have at least 75 pages of charts, tables and schedules. On behalf of my party on this side of the House I might say that it would be quite difficult in three hours to analyse material which the minister has had for three months. I am not making light of this; I am not trying to be too severe, but I want the minister to know that because this is an important document we cannot have it for three hours and reach a conclusion as to the several analyses, charts, graphs, and schedules related thereto. I say we are now faced with a debate that will continue within the public sector and private sector relating to pensions.

I refer to the minister's statement regarding an important matter found on page 5. He says that "the union representation in these sessions made it quite clear to me that they would not be prepared to endorse it in its entirety, the package I have just announced." I will not dwell on this too long. I wonder what kind of consultations we have with the bargaining agents for the public service. It is my understanding and, of course, the minister will correct me eventually so I do not want to take too much time on it, that there was very little. If there was it was not too meaningful.

I believe the minister has an escape clause in the end. I refer again to the speech on page 6 where it says that the bill itself will spell out all of the day-to-day details on how these principles and policies will operate in individual and special situations and ensure that the changeover to the new rules will be carried out in a smooth and equitable manner. That is extremely important. The minister has indicated without any hesitation that he is in favour of indexing pensions; that they should be actuarily sound, and they should not paid for out of the public purse.

This is our policy, sir. There is no question about it. I hear the good doctor on the other side saying "hmm". I am trying to be as responsible as I can. This is extremely important. We listened to the minister without any catcalls because we realize that it is a very sensitive subject. I do not want any undue intervention from members on the other side who have not read the minister's statement or who have not read the press release and have no idea as to what is contained in the Tomenson-Alexander report.

Without getting waylaid with inconsequential facts, let me say that this is an important statement which the minister has made. As I said, it is an approach which does endorse indexation even though the minister likes to play games with words and leaves them out at times, but then he brings them back again. This is a form of indexing, Mr. Speaker. All he has stated now is that we cannot afford the type of indexing we have had in the past because it is mortgaging our future. Therefore, we have to have another look. We will have indexing but it has to be actuarially sound. This is what my leader has been stating over the past few months.

The minister's statement raises many questions as to what is happening around here respecting old age security. In terms of the guaranteed income—I see the minister is shaking his head but I just want to put it on the record—it will raise questions by those not affected by this bill but who are curious. It is my humble submission that you cannot trust this government. And I did not say the minister. I have shadowed him for a number of years and I have to watch him very carefully. He is slick and slippery, but basically he tries to be honest.

I want to put in a plea for the old age security recipients, the recipients of guaranteed income supplements, of veterans pension, and of CPP. This legislation does not affect those things, and I see the minister nodding his head in the affirmative that we do not have to worry. He will stand up later on in the question period and reply to that and say "Yes, the hon. member is quite right, they do not have to worry". You remember, Mr. Speaker, when the government said they were not going to affect the old age security payments, the minister said, "We cannot afford to have the social services we have right now and we are going to take a long hard look at them". I may be paraphrasing. But just as long as the minister lets me know now that today he is not playing around with our senior citizens, those who, because of the ineptness and mismanagement of the economy, cannot afford to exist. He gives me that assurance, but I want to make sure that this is a statement that can follow my remarks and others because the wage and price controls are still in my head.

I remember when the government said that wage and price controls never worked in Great Britain or the United States and that government would never bring them in. What do we have now? I do not have to tell you. I notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sent a letter dated October 12, and I will not say that he deliberately misled the Canadian people because that is unparliamentary, but I will say that he was less than honest. He was talking about people and in that letter he said:

> Protecting pensions from inflation by indexing them to increases in the cost of living should be an integral part of our pension schemes. . . They are not the cause of inflation; they are its victim. We have an obligation to help protect them.

Mr. Andras: What has changed?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister now says, "What has changed?" My point is that the implication was that the indexing would stay as it is. So there is a change because we are not having the same form of indexing. We have the Prime Minister's letter, however, of October 12. I believe this is the same position he put to the defence employee association, that they should have comfort in saying, "We do not have to worry because the Prime Minister is speaking."

With respect to total compensation, this seems to be a new theme. The Treasury Board, on introducing the Public Service Staff Relations Act, indicated that civil servants' benefits which include indexing add about 30 per cent to base wages. I want to emphasize that. We have to examine the impact this new scheme will have. Does this reduce the 30 per cent and, if so, by how much? The Public Service Staff Relations Act refers to an advisory committee on pay research. In other words, this whole question of total compensation, as it applies to the public service, as it relates to the private sector, is under question. We need passage not only of the bill in which he is going to talk about total compensation but as well passage of the bill which will bring in amendments to the supplementary benefits.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, that we mesh all these bills together. We cannot deal with one bill prior to another bill when they are involved with the same principle; that is, total compensation. It is noted that the amendments with respect to the public services pension program will apply to MP's as well. I do not want to dwell on that too long, but I know that many people will say "hear, hear" with respect to that, so I will just leave the matter alone.

• (1702)

A very important principle is placed before the House and the people of Canada which the minister has explained well enough. There is a deferral of indexing to the age of 60 if you retire before, and the minister has explained it.

Mr. Francis: The indexing does not apply to MPs.

Mr. Alexander: I am not talking about MPs. My comments with respect to MPs are finished and I am not getting into that one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not?

Mr. Alexander: Because the minister will be involved with it, so why should I? I made my point. The minister recognizes that there is a problem and he has indicated it will be dealt with.

As I said, the deferral is an interesting point. The third point is that if you retire before the end of the year, the indexing would be fairly decent. We know what the minister is talking about in this respect, and I do not want to mention any civil servant by name. Let me simply say that his name starts with R. In this regard he did all right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And his first name is Simon.

Mr. Alexander: We will have no more of that nonsense. You cannot put your hands into the public trough to that extent. That was a significant abuse, and I am pleased to know the minister has seen to it that there will be no more unwarranted dipping of big, greasy hands into the public trough.

The most important point in the minister's statement is that he has brought about a new formula. If I understand it, it is a cost of living formula based on CPI which is now to be applied on an ad hoc basis, determined three years in advance. This is still indexing. Let no one in this House or outside the House think that we do not have indexing. We do, and I have already explained what form it will take. But I am concerned, and so is the government, about those who are on fixed incomes, those who are not able to buy bread and milk. In short, we are concerned about the poor and those who can least afford to be caught by inflation but who are most burdened by it.

The minister understands that we must have some form of indexing so as to deal with inflation which is the result, to be kind to him, not of his incompetence but of the incompetence of the government. The government has spent money like mad and has printed money like mad. The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), when the minister tabled his estimates for 1978-79, took the minister over the pole because there did not seem to be any restraint whatsoever. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Calgary Centre indicated that the operating cost of the federal government will rise by 13.6 per cent in 1979, whereas the minister referred to some 9 per cent. We have to watch the minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He called it flim-flam.

Mr. Alexander: That is what I call it, too. The first thing we are concerned about is that there be recognition that not everybody in this place receives a $35,000 pension. That is something on which the minister should have dwelt because it concerns many of us. Many people outside this place think that everybody here will get a $35,000 pension. The vast majority of pensions here will be in the neighbourhood of $5,000 or $6,000, and that is nothing great in this day when the cost of living is accelerating madly.

Even though the minister recognizes the problem and is moving in the right direction, I do not know whether this is the right approach in terms of the minister's answer to the problem, because there are questions. I want to know who pays for those who are already retired and who have never contributed. This is the problem we are facing now. Are they included in the plan? I think the minister in due course will give me an answer to that. Are we looking beyond the three year period when indexing takes place in January of 1979?

Even though I appreciate what the minister is doing, I do not know in particular whether this is the right program. As I said, we want comments from the public service bargaining units, from the private sector, and from all other interested parties after they have had an opportunity to read the mninister's statement and, what is more important, to read the bill.

If we are only talking about a three year period, what will happen in the fourth year? The minister is smiling, but this is a complex matter and I have only limited time. We will be involved in this in the standing committee, so we have plenty of time for that. Suppose we have high inflation in that fourth year, will the contributions be raised or will there be no indexing?

I raise these questions to let the minister know that we are aware of what is happening here, and we are concerned. We are concerned about one thing in particular. The minister has said that the plan must be implemented on January 1, 1979. This means that the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act must be amended. In view of the fact that there is an election climate right now, everyone is talking about the forthcoming election, is this not an election gimmick? I am reluctant to suggest this, but the minister knows he will be involved with actuaries, he will have to introduce legislation which will have to be given first and second reading, then go to committee, come back here for report stage and be given third reading, and yet I hear we might be going to the people. All I am saying is that I hope the minister is not flim flamming the Canadian people.

When we are finished, I will have a few questions to ask the minister with respect to this extremely important matter. Will all the actuarial evaluations be completed and available with regard to this new three year thrust? Will they be available when the bill is given first reading? The minister nods his head in the affirmative, and I am pleased to see that.

I see you rising, Mr. Speaker, but this is important—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I might be able to give the hon. member an extra minute or so, but I wish to refer him to Standing Order 9. He himself said that this question will be debated, but the Standing Order provides that, after a statement by a minister, spokesmen from each party are authorized to make brief comments. I know that representatives of other parties want to speak and that other hon. members want to ask questions. There has been an agreement not to see the clock, but if I were to allow the hon. member another four or five minutes, I would be abusing the rule as well as the rights of other members.

• (1712)

Mr. Alexander: I am finished now, Mr. Speaker, so I can close. I think I have made all my points. I just want to say that we appreciate the direction in which the minister is going. We do not know whether this is the method by which the problem can be solved, so therefore we are waiting anxiously for the minister to introduce legislation so that we can deal with this matter properly and hopefully come up with a solution whereby we can have peace with the public service and the private sector and so that we will not have a continuous harangue about who is paying for what and dipping into the public purse.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although I may not go along with everything which has been said by my friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I am delighted that he recognized that the statement made today by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is a reaffirmation of the government's commitment to the principle of the indexation of pensions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As one who has been involved with this issue from, I think, the time it was first talked about—in fact, I think I was the one who started the talking more than 30 years ago—I was glad in particular to hear the minister say:

> In short, the principle of maintaining the purchasing value of pensions so that pensioners can maintain their access to the same basket of goods and services is a principle to which the government is committed—and remains committed.

That applies to all public servants and to many others who come under the aegis of government pension plans. Just to get one point clear, we are not in today's discussion dealing at all with old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, family allowances, veterans disability pensions or war veterans allowances. Those benefits are all indexed to the full cost of living. They are not being touched.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Or the CPP.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or the Canada Pension Plan. I thank my friend for reminding me of that one. I hope the fact that the government has come down, with respect to public service pensions, for maintaining the principle of indexation means that there will be no more nonsense in the cabinet about cutting out the indexation of those other social programs.

If we were really on television and the country out there was hearing us right now, I would like to say to the retired public servants of Canada who are on their pensions and who are wondering whether all this talk means they are going to lose their indexation that, even if this program is implemented in full, for the vast majority of them there will be no change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They will continue to have their pensions indexed to the full amount of the cost of living. I will go into that in detail in a moment. There will be some at the top who have got increases by abusing the possibilities in the system who may suffer. Even those who have already got it by abuse may not suffer, but the same abuse is something others will not be able to practice. However, before I get into details about the announcement of the minister, I want to say—and I think there have been some interjections along the same line—that the answer to the Colin Browns and all those characters around the country carrying on a campaign against these pensions being indexed because public servants have it and those with private pensions do not, is that it should not be curbed or taken away from those who have it but that the principle of indexing pensions should be extended to all pensions both in the public and in the private sector.

I was happy to note that within the last day or two at least one prominent firm in the private field, the Mercer Company, has indicated that it believes that the day will come when private pensions will have to be put on an indexed basis as well. Even if that means a contribution from federal funds toward the indexing of pensions for people in private plans as well as in public plans, I agree, but with costs going up all the time a pension which stays fixed, or a pension which does not rise at least to the extent of the rise in the cost of living simply is not a pension. It is just something to keep a person off welfare for a little while. If pensions are going to be meaningful, they have to be indexed. As I say, that has to apply across the board. In my view a good deal of harm is done and a good deal of distortion takes place by the talk that the insurance people and the people in this report I have in my hand indulge in with regard to accounts, funding, interest rates and all that.

When people are living on pensions, they are not living on food, clothing and shelter that they have saved. They are living on food, clothing and shelter which are being produced at that time. No matter how you bookkeep it and no matter how you theorize about it, pensions are in reality on a pay-as-you-go basis. What we have decided by our pension programs like old age security, Canada Pension Plan, Public Service pensions and all the rest is that in an economy such as we have in Canada it is perfectly possible, with the wealth that we produce, to decide that some of that wealth should go for the care and maintenance of children, some for the care and maintenance of those who are ill, and a portion of it for the continued security of those who are in retirement, and it does not render any aid to the cause to talk about what pensions have got to be in the year 2000.

In the year 2000 it will be the goods and services produced in that year which will determine the standard of living of those who are working and the standard of living of those who are on pensions. I am sure that when Mackenzie King was here and saw to it for a while that our pay was only $4,000 a year, he would have been shocked at the thought of what we are getting today.

The Colin Browns like to talk about what these pensions might be 10 or 20 years from now, but what about wages and salaries 10 or 20 years from now? I say that a good deal of distortion comes into this picture when all these figures are used. What counts is current production, and out of current production we can afford to do it.

One of the things which has happened recently and which shows the need for a better scale of indexing, and also which shows that even indexing does not put pensioners in a preferred position, is what we have done with respect to the veterans disability pension. In 1973 we brought it up to the average take home pay of five categories in the public service. Some of us wanted—and there were reports in our favour—to let that formula apply year by year and to let the rate of that pension also be equal to the average take home pay of those five categories. The government would not buy that. The government set the rate at that level in 1973 and then let the consumer price index govern it from there on.

Now we have reached the point where the veterans on full disability pensions are several hundred dollars a year behind the formula we accepted in 1973. In other words, full indexation of that group has not put them in a preferred position. It merely enables them to buy the basket of goods and services they bought in 1973, but it gives them no opportunity to share in increased production or the increased standard of living. So I say that those who are arguing against pension indexing ought also to argue against wage increases and against higher salaries for those who run the insurance companies.

The fact of the matter is that indexing is a sound principle. It is good that it is here, and I am glad the minister has confirmed again today that it is government policy. I am glad the hon. member for Hamilton West, whether he thought he was complimenting the minister or finding something wrong, at least underlined that this statement is not a case of backing away from indexation but a case of endorsing it.

As to the proposals which are in the statement, in a couple of cases the minister intends to correct some abuses. One of these proposals certainly has to be supported. The other I want to comment on briefly.

The proposal that the indexing that anyone on pension for the first time gets in January should be related to the length of time he was working in the previous year, his last year of work, is absolutely sound. This idea that a person can retire on December 29 or 30 on full pension, and then get a year's indexation two or three days later, just does not wash, and I accept completely the proposal that indexation of that first cheque should be prorated.

● (1722)

The proposal about pensions being indexed for those who retire at age 55 after 30 years service, is one that I guess I have to go along with, because those who have profited by that rule have been persons away at the top. We had the initials of one here a while ago. They have been people who abused the system. It bothers me a bit that that indexing at age 55 has been taken away because for a long time I have been arguing that it should also apply to those who are retired from the Canadian Armed Forces and those who are retired from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In most cases those individuals are not off in some other employment, they are retired. They have done their tour of service, and I think they should have had that benefit, but if the government is not going to give it to them, then I think the government is quite right in not giving it to the preferred group in the Public Service who can apply the age 55 with the 30 years of service rule. That rule has not been abused in all cases, let that be clear. The publicity is because of a few.

At any rate I buy completely the pro-rata provision I was talking about a moment ago, and I will accept this one.

Now, as to the main provisions in this proposal of the three-year review, this means that in October of this year the government will review the situation and then make a decision on the basis of what is in the accounts, as to what it can afford for the next three years. That will determine the indexing for the years 1979-80-1981, and then in the year 1981, by October, there will be another review for what can happen in 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Speaker, my fear is that the kinds of stories that the newspapers write about this will scare all the pensioners. They will hear that the pensions are being curbed—something is being done—there is a cut-back. They will hear about this in scare terms and they will say, "Fine, I am all right for three years, but what happens after that?" The minister's press release which he gave outside the House, which is in addition to what he gave us in the House, said that the extra interest being earned—just on the employees' portion in the main fund, the public service superannuation account, not the inflationary account on the side, but the extra interest—is nearly $500 million a year.

There is plenty of money there so that as the minister sees it now, when October of this year comes and they review the situation, there is not any question but that indexing for the next three years will stay where it is. He does not make that statement flat out, but he says it in the guarded language that he has to use.

I gather that all he is telling us is that the only change that will take place in the years 1979, 1980 and 1981 is that the abuses that a few have practised, will be corrected. Despite the fact he talks about fifty years and some danger of interest rates going up, he goes on to say that with the credits being applied for this purpose, the extra interest earned on the employees' portion in the pension fund, the 1 per cent put in by employers and employees, that there will be enough there to stay at that level.

When I first got this statement about noon today I read it with some apprehension. The stories I have been reading in the newspapers in the last few days gave me some concern. But as I read the statement through I realized that really what the minister is doing, and I am not going to say he is trying to have it both ways—I think he did fairly well on this—is saying to the critics of pension indexing, "All right, boys, we will look at this every three years, and we will make the decision on the basis of how the account shapes up, but we are of the opinion from the experience we have had thus far that the account will be big enough that, even though we cut out the abuses of some of those at the top, the main indexing will continue." I do not mind it being done that way. I am so convinced about the rightness of indexing and the soundness of it, on the basis of our economy, that I think it will stand up. I do not mind him saying to the insurance people who are concerned that there will be this required look at the problem every three years.

Even so, Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that if the minister was going to talk about the possibility of something other than full indexing for any one of these triennial periods, that he would have told us in the statement,—and maybe he will do it in answer to questions—what kind of formula he had in mind. I do not like to press him too hard on this because I rather believe that there will not have to be any cutting back, but if there is any cutting back I hope it will not be a decision that the percentage rate across the board will be less than the CPI. If the CPI has gone up 6 per cent I do not want the government to put on a 4 per cent ceiling, or a 2 per cent ceiling which we had a number of years ago.

If he has in mind picking a level of pensions of, say $10,000, $12,000, $15,000 and saying that if we are in trouble we will give full indexing only up to those levels and a lesser or no indexation above, I think we would have to agree with it if the economy of the times called for it.

I think, as I say, it would have been useful if the minister had made that kind of a finding. I note that he has emphasized the fact that the credit into this account is to be based on the extra interest earned by the pensioners' portion in the fund. Why not the extra interest earned by the government's portion in the fund?

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are getting to the edge of your chair, and I can finish most of this when we get to questions. I hope we will get some of these questions answered, but the main thing I hope comes out of this today is not scare headlines about indexing being cut back but rather that indexing is going to stay and all that is going to happen is that there will be this review every three years, along with the correction of a few abuses.

The hon. member for Hamilton West chided me about my introduction of MP's pensions. Time does not permit me to say all that I would like to say, but I point out that, critical as I am of the generosity of members' pensions and the fact that they start too early, I am not critical of indexing. The same thing should apply to both groups, so I say to the minister who promised in his statement that somewhere along the line there will be a complete review of the Public Service Superannuation Act itself, that I hope that will come forward soon, and that with it will also come a review of some of the abuses that are in the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

With respect to the Public Service Superannuation Act, I hope the minister will give some concern to the position of widows, and to their lesser rate of pension. I hope he will give some concern to the position of those widows where the marriage took place later in life, rather than earlier. There are a number of things that need to be sorted out.

Mr. Speaker, I am this time going to end, and hope that the message that will get out today is that after all this study, the wild proposals made in this big book did not carry the weight that some people might have hoped, but that instead the principle of indexation is being retained and the public servants who are out on pension need not have the fears that tonight's headlines might give them.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the minister's statement and the answers of the representative of the official opposition and that of the New Democratic Party, it was easy to understand that the minister raised a very important point that has been expected for a very long time and I think that an election year is appropriate for such statements, such amendment proposals to a legislation affecting such a large number of employees in Canada as the government is, to my knowledge, the main employer in Canada.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) complained a moment ago that he had a chance to study the report and the statement of the minister only three hours in advance while it has been in the hands of government members for three months. I can tell him he should consider himself lucky as I did not even have three minutes to read it before the minister made his statement. But I did listen carefully and I realize how important and at the same time how difficult it was. To fully appreciate a proposal like the one we just heard, we must quote some figures, if not all of them, concerning the people that will be affected by the proposals included in the bill that will be presented in the near future by the minister. We should have some figures to appreciate exactly the effects of those changes.

Some people worry, following the rumours that have been circulating concerning the amendments that have been proposed today or that will be proposed some time in the future, that indexation could be affected. I for one, Mr. Speaker, think that the indexation of other programs like old age security, family allowances and others is there to stay because the inflation that brought it seems also to be there to stay. Obviously, this government is unable to stop this inflationary trend, and it is absolutely necessary, if salaries, retirement plans and savings are to keep some value and keep their purchasing power, to maintain and apply this indexation.

That kind of overfaced amendments are often proposed but after careful examination we realize that we may win on some aspects and lose on others but eventually we are not better off. I had the feeling when listening to the minister's statement that we are following the trend and keeping several years behind the cost of living index, as this has been the case in about every other area.

Whatever their level, increases in salaries or pensions always lag behind price increases.

This statement, this proposal was long overdue, however if be appreciated by all involved. The legislation that will be put forward will no doubt receive close scrutiny, because we will be looking at the report in very fine detail. We will study it in depth, and every clause of the bill will also receive close attention and, if needed, valuable amendments that may be suggested by officials at whatever level would be introduced.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). In listening to his statements today and the projections which the Tomenson-Alexander report made, I understood him to indicate there was on a fully funded basis a deficit of $5.9 billion of which $5.6 billion was on the indexation account. In making this kind of projection, I would like to ask what assumptions were made for future rates of interest, future rates of inflation and future rates of salary increases. I would like to know what the President of the Treasury Board thinks of these assumptions, because I heard him give a scenario about the pessimists and the optimists. I think we got a truly pessimistic projection in the Tomenson-Alexander report. That is my view. I would like to hear the view of the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can give the hon. member the precise interest rate, inflation rate and basic salary increase rate assumptions of Tomenson-Alexander except to say that they were unquestionably lower and more pessimistic than any assumptions that we would permit in the application by law to private sector pension plans. They certainly are assumptions considerably below those now applied to the Canada Pension Plan and that sort of thing.

Apart from that, I consider the issue to be resolved with regard to any argument toward full funding by the three-year ad hoc arrangement. One could theoretically accept, I suppose, that full funding might be necessary if the commitment were to be there permanently under any circumstances of inflation, but I think the argument is dissolved. The Tomenson-Alexander report says that if this were moved to a more frequent examination and ad hoc adjustment, as we are proposing, the demand for, or insistence upon, full funding would be somewhat diffused. They are in the Tomenson-Alexander report, but I will get the precise equations that were used.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) suggested in his comments that cost-of-living adjustments will be computed over three year periods starting from January 1, 1979.

My question is this: Will the President of the Treasury Board be in a position to indicate as soon as possible the relevant date to the people entitled to indexing I ask this because I understand from his report to the House that every triennial computation will be made, not on October 31, but in the month of October before the start of each period, at the latest.

Will the President of Treasury Board be in a position to indicate as soon as possible, for the coming three years, the escalation rate for retired civil servants and also other pensionee groups, referred to. I have no fear for myself, because the retired member of parliament is not entitled to escalation before age 60.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, when the full phasing out of the early retirement access to fully indexed pensions is completed in 1983, everyone involved in the public service will be on the same basis. That is, indexation will commence from age 60 on.

As to the first part of the question, this is subject to parliament's will in terms of amending the basic act, and if that were to take place, we would be in a position to confirm by October of this year. This is not a very complex actuarial calculation. Really the cost of living is rather secondary in this sense to the calculation of the availability of funds legitimately applicable to indexation.

I can tell the hon. member now basically what the formula might be in that sense. It is the calculation of actuaries, confirmed by more than one actuary, that about 30 per cent of the basic fund which now stands at approximately $8.6 billion and is going up at the rate of approximately $1.3 billion a year, is owned by the pensioners, those people now on retirement. That includes the interest that has been paid on their portion of the fund up until now. Their portion of the fund is the contribution made by them and on behalf of them by the employer up to that date of retirement, plus that earned interest.

What this means is that the basic pension fund, not the indexing portion, based upon the actuarial calculation, together with continuing contributions and 4 per cent interest basically assigned to that fund, is sound actuarially, fully funded, with certain adjustments from time to time as the five-year actuarial review takes place, mainly on salary increases. We are now paying on that, by act of parliament—and it is only fair that we should pay—the weighted average interest of 20 year bond issues which at the moment is 7.6 per cent, a rate which inevitably will go up over the next few years as low interest bond issues of the past mature and as the higher bond rates of the past years and of the immediate future weight the average upward.

What we are proposing at the moment is that on the 30 per cent of the fund which is owned by the pensioner, the excess in interest, the difference to which I have referred, should be the difference between that basic 4 per cent payable to the basic fund for the basic pension and the 7.6 per cent; in other words, 3.6 per cent. That is of the current 20 year bond weighted average. That, in my opinion, is legitimately applicable to the indexation to its mathematical limit of the pensioners already out there. It is their money.

● (1742)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: In addition, we are saying, of course, that the contribution made on their behalf, the one-and-one, is also available for that calculation. We think it is sufficient for the next three years at the present rate of indexation, but I will not be pinned down right now because we want to get all these formalities completed, but it is approximately from those sources $525 million, without any taxpayers' money other than the fact that it is made up from that employer-employee matching contribution.

So I think the situation we have reached is eminently fair. The indexing will be switched from full indexation at any rate of inflation with regard to interest, extra money to be found from the taxpayer, to the available funds in accordance with the formula I have described as applied to the supplementation of the basic benefits. We think this fund is over the hump now. After those first few years of retirement benefits, with the one-to-one contribution, it is not in trouble now, and as the situation matures over the years, we get away from any inter-generational transfer, the point the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was talking about.

I think that without any subsidy from the taxpayers this plan is sound. Let us not forget that it has been in existence for 60 years with very few changes over the years. We are assuring everybody that it is going to be actuarially sound. We are answering the critics and fundamentally making sure that, if interest rates change and if the inflation rate changes, if that very important equation down the pike somewhere does get out of line, we are not facing our pensioners with some shock they do not know about. But I think it is "easy as you go".

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have two relatively short questions to ask, Mr. Speaker. Let me say by way of preamble that I share the views expressed by the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am happy to see that the principle of indexation is being preserved. I made a speech in the House about this matter when it was first dealt with in this parliament during my period here. I take the view that nothing else could have been done which was reasonable, fair and just.

May I direct this question to the minister; it relates, I suppose, to the business of the House. Has the legislation been drafted?

The minister indicates that it has not. If that is the case, when does he intend to introduce it? What is the period of time he has in mind? Would he consult the government House leader with a view to referring the Tomenson-Alexander report, as well as the other reports available, to a committee of the House so that they might be dealt with even in advance of legislation, perhaps? In this way we might be able to deal with a number of questions and fears in the minds of public servants.

Mr. Andras: No, the legislation has not been drafted. We have certainly had consultation with the Public Service Advisory Committee on Pensions which includes representatives of the senior bargaining units and other officials, all public servants incidentally. We have discussed this subject with the bargaining agents formally. I may say they are not jumping with joy at the prospect of any change whatsoever. We still have to work out some complexities, so the bill is not ready. Quite honestly, I am not sure it can be ready until the next session of parliament—

An hon. Member: And when is that going to be?

Mr. Andras: Probably in the fall. As to the other suggestion, I am intrigued by it and I will definitely give consideration to the suggestion that a more formal examination of the report be undertaken. I will discuss it with my colleague and see what can be done.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My other question concerns the minister's statement on page four in which he deals with the introduction of the legislation and talks in terms of consultation when three year adjustments are being considered. In view of the uncertainty which discussions of this kind cause in the public service, whether they take place today or three years hence, and since it is not unreasonable to suggest that these matters ought to be considered by those who are affected, that is to say, the public service pensioners, would the minister consider, when he is drafting the bill, changing his arrangements so that the body which meets will include, in a structural way, representatives of the public service unions? Thus, the minister would not merely be consulting them; they would be included as a structural part of the decision-making process.

Mr. Andras: I will give that suggestion my consideration. Again, without making any final commitment, I repeat that the Public Service Advisory Committee is to be part of the development of this program, and that committee does, of course, include representatives of the Public Service Alliance, the very senior and large bargaining units. I am conscious of the desirability of what has been suggested. One of the reasons I need more time is so that I can consider the precise structure and mechanism to be set up.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the President of the Treasury Board who has corrected in his remarks to the House the French version of the text, which, I am afraid, contained some inaccuracies in paragraph A(1), that may have been confusing.

My question, Mr. Speaker, relates mainly to the figures given a short while ago by the President of the Treasury Board. If I am not mistaken, he said that the basic fund amounted to $8.6 billion, at an anticipated interest rate of 7.6 per cent. I wonder if he could tell the House how much money is provided for the next three years, because these figures are calculated on a three-year basis. I think he has mentioned that $525 million would derive from indexation, what would then be the amount required to maintain the present rate of indexation for the next three years?

● (1752)

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, this gets into forecasting of certain things which one has to be careful about. I think that $525 million to $535 million would be sufficient to maintain the indexation the way it is now which is, of course, sufficient to meet the inflationary trends. I can confirm also at least $525 million is available from the sources which I described earlier, subject to final check.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the minister. I refer to the three-year term that he has mentioned with respect to the triennial review. If I understood him correctly the minister indicated that at the beginning of each three-year term a rate would be struck in relation to the indexing, and that rate would prevail throughout the whole term. For example, how does this relate to the consumer price index which could fluctuate up and down quite rapidly during that three-year term? Would the indexing still be at the flat rate?

Mr. Andras: Probably it would, Mr. Speaker. Those are final details we would want to work out. I am saying that indexing will be up to the maximum of the fund available unless, of course, the consumer price index were lower than that, in which case there might be a surplus. That is not impossible to forecast in the future if the present equations hold.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, the minister has very capably explained the actuarial soundness of the pensions fund and how he intends to keep it sound. To add to some of the constructive remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about the fears that might appear in headlines, I would like to add another statement to his. I have a statistic here which says that 85 per cent of the retire public servants in Canada today are receiving less than $7,000 per year. That is a figure that should be emphasized, not the bigger ones.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not all of them will be hurt.

Mr. Hopkins: The minister said he will be consulting with the Minister of National Defence. Several questions have been asked about the public servants and I would like to ask him what the status will be of a former member of the Canadian armed forces who is now on retirement at age 50. Can he give me this information in advance? Does it mean that with the five year prorated plan that he will find himself 60 years old before he gets any indexing? If he qualifies under the magic "85 formula" and by virtue of his being on pension now, even though it be a different system from the public service, will he or she receive indexing at age 55 or will that pension have to wait until age 60 also?

Along the same lines, what will happen to a member of the armed forces who has presently only one, two, three, four or five years to go for a pension; will he or she be prorated in the same way? In addition, what about the members of the armed forces who are presently retired between the ages of 51 and 55; what will happen to their prorating? Can the minister give me any information at this time?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the plan is to bring all our pensioners, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the armed forces and public servants to the 60 year old access for indexed pensions. Those who are in the ages which the hon. member has referred to will move into that access in the same manner as I have described in my statement. If they are indexed now or are 55 years of age now, they will be all right. But one year at a time we will phase this out until everybody will be indexed at age 60.

As for the final question concerning the 51 to 55 age group, they would have to wait. They would be caught in that sense, I believe, and phased in the same way as I have described for public servants' indexation.

Mr. Hopkins: On a prorated basis?

Mr. Andras: Yes.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to ask this question of the minister. In the event an individual does retire down the road at age 55 and the indexation does not take place until the age of 60 as the minister has announced, during that five year period when the cost of living may increase, is it completely done away with, or at age 60 is it accounted for, or is it completely lost?

Secondly, when the actuarial evaluation is made at the beginning of each three year period, is there any provision to look beyond that three years? In other words, is the decision based simply on what is expected to occur in the next three year period? If so, could this not lead to a situation where four years down the road a person might be faced with high inflation and insufficient funds to provide adequate protection?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, to answer the first question, at age 55 when this program is phased in a person could still take early retirement on the 85 rule, or even a discounted pension but he would get no indexation until age 60, as is the case now for members of parliament. The pension rate is adjusted for the inflation that has taken place in the meantime, but there is no retroactive cash payment. That actual adjustment is lost to the person but the rate is adjusted upwards to catch up.

The answer to the second question is no. If the hon. member thinks through the intent of our proposal of the three year actuarial review, we are really pinning the indexation or supplementation to what is available in the fund. Of course, the paramount consideration is to set the rate for the next three years—every three years. I think the hon. member's concerns would be met by this mechanism.

[Translation]

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, my question is quite simple. I would like to say, however, that I thought the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) made a comment about me when he spoke. I merely heaved a sigh of relief because it is not that often these days that the opposition seems to approve principles put forward by this government. So, it is the only remark I wanted to make.

My question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is the following. It is obvious that statements such as the one we heard today are going to create much uncertainty among retired officials. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and my hon. friend from Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins), many have said that it would be as if there were not any change. I would like the minister to tell me the number of retired officials whose indexing provision will be directly affected? Will it be 90 per cent, 95 per cent or 85 per cent? I heard that at least 85 per cent to 90 per cent of all retired officials will not have to undergo any change with regard to indexing. Would the minister confirm that allegation. Are they accurate figures? I am sure in doing so he would reassure thousands of retired officials.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I want to hold to the principle of the three year actuarial review which I have proposed here. I will go on record as saying that it is my personal opinion that a very small percentage of public servants, perhaps 2 or 3 per cent, might be affected if those calculations down the road six years from now face up, unlike the adjustment between the ratio of interest, inflation and wages, and that sort of thing. So I think that the hon. member's 95 per cent figure is probably quite right. However, I want to make the final reservation that the actuarial review is just that, an actuarial review. So on that basis I am quite sure it will make very little difference.

• (1802)

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, first of all I shall congratulate the minister for his good intentions. I thought I heard him say, a few moments ago, that the bill had not yet been printed. Can he tell us whether he intends to implement his good intentions through a bill, and when he will introduce it to the House? Will it be in the spring, before the next elections? I wish the minister would advise the House in this regard.

[English]

Mr. Andras: I will repeat the answer I gave the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. It is our intention to have it available for the next session of parliament.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I understood the minister to say that no government funds would be used to supplement the indexing in the future, such as the $100 million that was needed to shore up the indexed portion of the fund last year. If that is correct, I have a two part question.

That deficit was caused by payments to pensioners who had not paid any indexing premiums because they retired before indexing came into effect and they are now indexed; also, the earnings in the fund were not adequate. The actuaries have said that even the excess earnings from the regular pension fund will not be adequate to cover indexed pensions in the future. It would seem to me, therefore, that the indexing is doomed to be cut back because of the inadequacy of the earnings. That is one part of the question.

Second, going back to pensioners who are already getting indexed pensions but have never paid into the indexing fund, where are their pensions going to be carried?

Mr. Andras: The injections of funds from the consolidated revenue fund really came because parliament had not yet authorized my proposal, which is the recognition, as the actuaries have said, that 30 per cent of the basic fund, or some $9 billion by the end of this year, belongs to the pensioners, retired people now. The excess interest over and above the basic 4 per cent, which is part of the actuarial calculations to protect their basic pension, has been credited back to the main fund, so that they have no access to it. It is our view that it is legitimately available for supplementing their benefits. Otherwise, how the devil will they ever have access to that additional interest which is being earned on the portion of the fund which they built up over their years of service? Granted that the 1 per cent they put in and the 1 per cent the government put in as the employer has only been in these last few years, but they would not have a sizeable nest egg from that, and that is the first that is used up.

I am satisfied, subject to correction, that this adjustment which I am proposing, which will be, at the present rate of interest, an additional 3.6 per cent on 30 per cent of $9 billion, will be sufficient to meet the index funding. I think the actuarial claim that it was not fully funded on the indexation is based on the more pessimistic projections of that all important ratio between interest rates, inflation and wage rate increases for the future, and also, of course, was projected on a demographic retirement age which they felt was being forced down by the somewhat generous access to fully indexed pensions at the age of 55, which of course is an aspect we are changing.

So between all these measures I am on safe ground in saying that there will be no need for fully funding, which was their argument. That is an actuarial theory. I think that the moves we are taking here will remove the theoritical necessity, as well as the practical necessity, to frontload it by $5.6 billion, and the money will be there to meet the indexation problem. If there is some inter-generational transfer, I can tell hon. members that the bargaining agent and the advisory committee with whom I have discussed it have said that, for the sake of the few years involved here and the few people involved, it will not bother them and, as I said, it is their fund.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York Centre has requested the floor. He will be completing the first round of questioning. Following him, I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who will be the second questioner for his party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There has not been one from our party yet.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is the first speaker for his party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am to decide. The hon. member for York Centre.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I have been concerned about this matter of indexed pensions for public servants and I am reassured, from what I have heard about the actuarial aspect of the problem, that, with the adjustment the minister has made, it appears clear that the taxpayers will not be called upon to make up large deficits because there can be none with the three year review that is to take place.

Another of my concerns about this fringe benefit for public servants was the exemplary effect that offering indexing to public servants had. There is a question about whether or not it is possible for the private sector to be able to match the same kind of benefit. I know that the minister has organized an investigation of pensions which is being conducted by officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and of the Department of Finance. Does he have anything to say at this time about this other great concern with respect to indexed pensions, namely, the exemplary effect they might have on the private sector?

Mr. Andras: I would make two comments, Mr. Speaker. First of all, the federal public service pension plan will still be one of the best for employees in the country. We cannot deny it; that is the fact. Of course, it will be considered in our concept of total compensation when we compare it to plans in the private sector. On the other hand, there is no doubt about it in my mind that even the confirmation that this is actuarially sound will probably bring greater pressure on the private sector to do something, and as the hon. member opposite has indicated, there are movements within the private sector, even among the actuarial groups, to look at this with a more open mind.

I say quite candidly that they will have difficulties. It is one thing to say it is fair and just and should be done, but there is the other reality of the availability of funds and the method of paying for it. I cannot indicate to the hon. member yet what the findings of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Health and Welfare are, except that I hope they will be available very soon and will give some stimulation to the private sector. Because in my view, there will have to be an improvement in the private sector plans. Forty-seven per cent of plans in the private sector are non-contributory, and the Tomenson-Alexander report indicates that 80 per cent of the admittedly relatively small sample of the private sector that they took to determine what they were doing about adjustments in pensions to meet the cost of living have been adjusting. That is somewhat different from the propaganda we were hearing. Eighty per cent of them have adjusted on an ad hoc basis to sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of the cost of living. Let me make the point that the total cost of that adjustment was borne by corporations themselves out of their own revenue, whereas our indexation is borne partly from the contribution of our employees and partly from the contributions of the employer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank the minister for clearing up the point about the extra interest to be earned on the money of the pensioners which is declared to be theirs. I confess that earlier I was thinking of it as the employees' contribution, but when the minister explains it, this is the money of the pensioners after they have gone on retirement. It is their money. I think the minister puts it in its proper light and does answer a number of questions.

I also thank him, if I may say so, for helping me to make it clear to the retired public servants out there that if there are scare headlines, they need not worry about them and that about 85 per cent or 95 per cent simply are not going to be touched. I think that is good news.

I also thank the minister for the answer he just gave to the hon. member for York Centre. I have many questions, but I shall narrow them down to one. The minister was answering the hon. member for Gatineau about the situation whereby everyone gets his indexation only at age 60. He put it in those terms. The point would be reached, when the whole thing has been phased in, when nobody would get indexation until age 60.

I think his earlier statement provided a couple of exceptions, and because of what he has said now, I hope he will confirm those exceptions. In other words, is it not a fact that persons who are on pension because of disability or persons who are on pension because they are survivors get indexation without having to wait until age 60? I hope that will continue.

Mr. Andras: I am very glad the hon. member brought that up; I do want to clear that up. It is not our intention to tamper with those kinds of involuntary situations, so disability or early retirement for health reasons and that sort of thing will get the same treatment as in the past. That will be an exception from this change.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the same not true for widows and other survivors?

Mr. Andras: Whatever the present practice is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what the minister said in his press release.

Mr. Andras: Yes.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been consultations among the House leaders concerning eight private members' public bills on the order paper, all having as their object the changing of names of electoral districts. As a result of discussions among House leaders I believe there is agreement to pass these bills through all stages this afternoon without debate in order to effect the changes which hon. members from both sides of the House deem desirable. However, I understand that there is one bill in the name of the hon. member for Compton which has not as yet been introduced, so I ask the Chair to call that public bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because there has been some agreement not to see the clock perhaps we can get into private members' hour as we normally do and consider that the House has reached the point where we can now proceed to private members' business as listed on today's order paper, but by agreement the House will consider some private members' bills concerning changes of names of electoral districts. In particular, we will deal with the proposal of the parliamentary secretary to introduce a bill proposed by the hon. member for Compton and consider it together with the six or seven other bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CHANGES IN NAMES OF CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Yvon Pinard (for the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-423, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the House, second reading will follow with that of the other bills enumerated by the hon. member. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, on behalf of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) to move this bill, which will now bear number 423. In consequence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker): That Bills C-267, C-358, C-412, C-414, C-415, C-417, C-418 and C-423 be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole House.

[English]

Motion agreed to, bills read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I understood the order of business for today, Bill C-1001 in the name of the hon. member for Scarborough East was to have been brought forward. However, because of the events of the day and the important statement which has been made, that has proved impossible. I understand that there have been some arrangements with respect to that bill which may facilitate its passage. Can I assume that that bill will be called next Thursday? Is there agreement to that effect, or can it be called now? If it is to be called now, I would indicate on behalf of my own party that we would be prepared to have that matter cleared away immediately. It was to be the first item of business today. It has been forced out by events, the member is here, and there may be more members who wish to speak; but I think it is appropriate, because of the sense of unanimity that there is in the House, that we might deal with the bill at the moment. I would say to you, sir, that my contribution to the bill would be approximately three lines, and I would think it would be most fair if we allowed the member to proceed now.

• (1822)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, if we do not immediately dispose of that bill as mentioned by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), as far as we are concerned we will see that it is allowed to stand, in accordance with the standing orders.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is true that there was a hope that we would have 15 or 20 minutes in the private member's hour to deal with Bill C-1001 but events beyond our control have changed that situation. We do not feel that the House should be asked to put it through in a minute or two, but rather that there should be consultations to make sure that it is dealt with at some other appropriate time.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the problem that the House finds itself in and also its willingness earlier in the day to have considered the bill at this time if we could.

The nature of the statement which I would make at this time would be to refer to some amendments which I am prepared to move at committee stage. They are important and it would take perhaps five or six minutes to inform the House of their nature. That is all the time that I would require but, of course, I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is at the service of the House if hon. members wish to consent.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, we in the New Democratic party originally intended to see this bill move to committee after private members' hour today, assuming that we had had the hour, or a large portion thereof, to comment on the significant amendments that the member for Scarborough East was going to announce on behalf of Bell Canada. I feel these amendments are too important to devote only one or two minutes to comment on them. I would hope that we could arrange that the Bill C-1001 be brought forward next Thursday at private members' hour, but I am not prepared to proceed at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There being no unanimous consent I assume that this completes the consideration of private members' business. It being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6:25 p.m. the House took recess.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Buchanan (for the President of the Treasury Board) that Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I had just begun my remarks late yesterday afternoon when six o'clock came. I should like to proceed now with my remarks with respect to Bill C-10.

While it is true this particular piece of legislation has not received a great deal of attention from the media—we are certainly not in the headlines of the major papers across the country—it is probably one of the most important bills to have been introduced in the House in some time. Indeed, my first question is: Why has it taken the government so long to bring the measure forward? This is a bill which, if properly implemented, could save the Canadian taxpayer a heck of a lot of money. We know this from experience. I was a member of the public accounts committee for some three years. We heard some horror stories there with respect to government expenditure and management—the AECL and Polysar were outstanding examples to which I shall refer later in my remarks.

In all responsible households across the country people budget. They do everything they can to control expenditure on a weekly or monthly basis. Even though we have a House which seats 264 members at the present time and will be accommodating up to 282, let us not forget that what we are doing here in Ottawa is essentially what families are trying to do at home, whether in my riding of Brant or in Regina, Windsor or elsewhere. Today people are desperately trying to make ends meet. If they cannot do so, they go into debt. In some cases they go into debt through lack of knowledge or knowhow. Here in Ottawa we have gone into tremendous debt, perhaps not deliberately in some cases but because of a lack of knowhow.

Bill C-10 provides for the appointment of a Comptroller General who will be able to keep a check on government spending. We must certainly get a tighter grip on the handle of government spending. The same can be said about small businesses. Today more than ever before they are desperately trying to control expenditures in rough times. We can relate households, small business, and even large corporations with what we are attempting to do here and, through legislation hopefully our objective will be reached.

I have considerable reservations, though, about the form of the bill. I am not opposed to the measure. Looking at this piece of legislation, I find the following in clause 1:

> The governor in council may appoint an officer called the Comptroller General of Canada to hold office during pleasure and to perform such duties and functions as may be assigned to him by the Treasury Board and the Comptroller General of Canada shall rank as and have all the powers of a deputy head of a department.

That is all it says. I do not want to sound like a prophet of doom and gloom but frankly I have a lot of sympathy with Mr. Harry Rogers, whom I do not know. When he took a look at the bill he probably sat back—I am hypothesizing—and wondered what he was going to be able to do. Hopefully, when the bill goes to committee, something more positive will be proposed by way of amendment.

The Auditor General, Mr. Macdonell, first recommended the establishment of the post of Comptroller General in his report for the year ended March 31, 1976. In that report he stated:

> Parliament, and indeed the government, has lost, or is close to losing, effective control of the public purse.

This was not the first time Auditor General had expressed his concern about mismanagement of the government's finances. In his 1975 report he had stated:

> The present state of the financial management and control systems of the departments and agencies of the government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

A massive two-year study on financial management and control in the government was launched in 1974. When it concluded in 1976, the results led the Auditor General to the opinion that:

> Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control in the government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

Since the situation was recognized as being critically serious almost two years ago, why has no action been taken before now? Last April, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced in the House that he had decided to establish the post and that a search for the right man was beginning. This was a welcome change of attitude. Until then the President of the Treasury Board and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had originally rejected the proposal out of hand. I understand there was considerable Cabinet opposition as well as opposition from senior civil servants to the appointment of a Comptroller General. Is this the reason it has taken a year to find one? Given the government's original reluctance to accept the recommendation for a Comptroller General, we must do all we can to ensure that the position carries with it the power to exact the co-operation it will need to carry out the tasks envisaged by the Auditor General.

● (2022)

On April 2, 1978 Mr. Harry Rogers, former vice-president of Xerox Canada, will become Ottawa's first Comptroller General, a job which can make him one of the most powerful figures in the federal bureaucracy. This will be the case only if the position has all the power the Auditor General originally intended. It is at least encouraging, Mr. Speaker, that the government chose to look outside the civil service for a person to fulfil this position. It will require a fresh and objective approach to counter many years of government mismanagement. Mr. Rogers will face the prospect of controlling the finances of ministries which will be spending $48.8 billion of taxpayers' money in the coming year, according to Treasury Board's blue book estimates for the coming year, and running an annual deficit of more than $9 billion.

Federal government spending will go up 9.8 per cent in the next fiscal year. These increases must be closely scrutinized to ensure Canadians are getting top value for their tax dollar. According to the President of the Treasury Board, to quote a statement made by him:

> The comptroller general will be responsible for the quality, the integrity of the financial administrative policies, systems and practices of the federal public service.

However, the full responsibility for the control and direction of resource allocation and control processes will remain with the secretary of the Treasury Board. How effective will the Comptroller General be in view of the fact that the government has put us into this sorry state because of its weak management and control of ministerial programs, the lack of strong central direction by Treasury Board and, just as important, the lack of accountability to parliament? The really important point is the accountability to parliament, to the people's representatives who have been democratically elected from coast to coast.

Bill C-10 does not specify the exact powers the Comptroller General will have. It says only, and I quote:

> —perform such duties and functions as may be assigned to him by the Treasury Board—

Parliament will still not have an opportunity to fully examine the Comptroller General's activities or effectiveness. That is significant. There is the possibility that this bill could merely expand the bureaucracy and create yet another deputy minister. The bill makes no provision to ensure exactly what responsibilities the Comptroller General will have. This bill is no guarantee of improved financial management and control. The government would have us believe this legislation is an adequate response to the Auditor General's recommendations in 1976, recommendations that were repeated again in 1977.

This bill does not define the powers, responsibilities or obligations that will rest with the Comptroller General. Without legislative authority defining his responsibilities, what assurance is there that the Comptroller General will operate any more effectively or have wider powers than another deputy minister? Mr. Harry Rogers could conceivably be arriving in Ottawa with a very impressive title and very little authority. Without legislative authority to address the problems of financial mismanagement so clearly illustrated in the Auditor General's reports, Mr. Rogers will be operating under a considerable handicap.

In his report of 1976, the Auditor General defined clearly what the duties and responsibilities of the Comptroller General should be. He would have a status comparable to that of the design, development, implementation and monitoring of adequate systems and procedures.

There are six important points which the Auditor General made perfectly clear to the public accounts committee and to the members of the House of Commons in his report. They are as follows. First, that the form of the estimates provides a sound basis for the government's budgetary control system; second, that public moneys and assets are under his effective custody and control at all times; third, that accounting procedures and financial reports throughout government—including the public accounts—should conform to acceptable accounting principles and standards; fourth, that expenditures of public moneys are made with due regard for economy and efficiency; fifth, that satisfactory procedures measure the effectiveness of programs where they could reasonably be expected to apply; and finally, that he should be maintaining the central accounts of Canada, a job which is presently being carried out by the Department of Supply and Services.

Those were the recommendations which the Auditor General made with respect to the responsibilities, power, and duties of the Comptroller General if and when a Comptroller General was appointed. However, there is no such job definition included in this legislation. The cabinet and senior civil servants originally resisted the recommendation for a Comptroller General. That is obvious. They knew they had a dirty house, they knew it had to be cleaned up. They did not want somebody coming in from the outside and pointing it out to them directly.

An hon. Member: Sure they did.

Mr. Blackburn: I heard somebody from the Liberal side saying "sure they did." Why has it taken two years to get a Comptroller General appointed? Obviously top civil servants, department heads, were fighting this and have been fighting it for two years. Do not talk nonsense to me. So I ask, "Are they to be trusted to set the powers and responsibilities for the position?" Can hon. members see senior civil servants who are trying to cover up their past mistakes defining the powers and responsibilities of the newly appointed Comptroller General? That is the major question in my mind right now and that is why I said our party would support this bill but with very grave reservations. We have to have a lot more information on this bill before it gets past third reading.

The Comptroller General will face a massive task. The fact that this legislation has been introduced recognizes the well known fact that something is seriously wrong with the government's management of our finances and the pressing necessity that something be done about it. Government spending is seriously out of control. Its rate of increase has far exceeded the rate of inflation. We do not need to look at the Auditor General's report to see it. We just need to look at the government's financial record over the last 10 years.

Projected total spending for 1977-78, according to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the 1978-79 edition of "How your Tax Dollar is Spent", which is somewhat of a joke, will be $44.45 billion. This is an 8.2 per cent increase over 1976-77 expenditures. Our total deficit will be $9.7 billion. For 1978-79, according to Treasury Board blue book estimates, the target ceiling for total spending is $48.8 billion. This will be an increase of 9.8 per cent over the previous year.

It might be instructive to look at government spending now in relation to what it was in 1968, when the Prime Minister first came into office. In that year, total government spending was $9.8 billion. Our national deficit almost totals that amount. Our national deficit this fiscal year will equal total government expenditures of 10 years ago.

The matter at issue is not so much this increase in government spending, but how the spending has been managed or, rather, mismanaged. In view of the government's past financial track record the question arises: Can the Comptroller General's office be used as another means of hiding financial mismanagement? Without a more clear definition this is a risk we run when expanding the powers of the bureaucracy. Every effort must be made to increase the accountability of the government. There has been a remarkable lack of efficiency and effectiveness in much of government spending, as has been documented in past Auditors' General reports.

During the time I sat as a member of the public accounts committee, Polysar and AECL were the most notorious examples of mismanagement. The government is still dragging its feet on the investigation into what happened to millions of dollars spent by AECL on commissions to foreign agents. The latest revelation has been that AECL may not get full value for the $2 million it paid out for post-contract service on a nuclear reactor sale to South Korea. This money was part of $15.4 million paid in advance to Mr. Shaul Eisenberg, I believe from Tel Aviv—or that is where his head office is—for future services. This is still less than the ill-advised flat $20 million fee AECL originally negotiated with Mr. Eisenberg. Still to be accounted for is some $2.4 million paid by Atomic Energy as an agent's fee for the sale of a nuclear reactor to Argentina. The money was deposited to a numbered Swiss bank account, but Atomic Energy says it does not know who got it or what the money was used for.

The government has been incredibly careless in maintaining its agencies and in discharging its financial responsibilities. I could go into the AECL and Polysar fiasco or mess, whatever one wishes to call it, but I suppose I would be out of order at that point. However, I think the AECL and Polysar situation in Sarnia is important and does relate to this bill. I feel it does relate to what the Comptroller General can do, hopefully, if we get the proper regulations and if he has the power to intervene.

When we are talking in terms of Atomic Energy, for example, we go back to the 1940s. It was always clouded in secrecy and was something you did not talk about. If business was transacted it was transacted under the table. When I say that I mean it was done in a sort of surreptitious manner, in almost an espionage type situation. I am not referring to Canada but to any other country that had atomic power.

This situation carried on over the 1950s and dragged into the 1960s. Then the government decided, after it had spent all this money, it had to build a reactor and sell it. I charge the Canadian government for sinking to the lowest possible commercial denominator in attempting to sell our CANDU reactors. In doing so it entered into the worst kind of business practices with rather questionable individuals around the world, and without ever asking them what they were doing or how they were doing it. These foreign agents set the fees. They said: "Give us millions of dollars and we will sell the CANDU reactor for you."

We are not living back in the days of the cold war or the late 1940s. We still have a problem in respect of national security as every country does, but we have come a long way from those dark days of the 1940s and early 1950s. Surely the government of Canada should set an example for all businesses in this country or anywhere in the world in order to establish good, above-board commercial relations. We do not have to hire unknown agents to sell something that is made in Canada by a Crown corporation, and the obvious evidence is before us. We have misspent millions of dollars because we dealt under the table, not above with good business practices.

It is my hope that the new Comptroller General, Mr. Rogers, will have the power on day-to-day and week-to-week basis to keep the government, departments and ministers informed as to what is going on, and what is right and what is wrong, because that is what this bill is all about. If he is just to be another deputy minister sending reports, not to parliament and not to the public accounts committee, but to the secretary of the Treasury Board, and from him to the President of the Treasury Board, who is sitting across from us now, and then on to the Cabinet, where will this lead? Where is the democracy in that situation and where will it lead us?

Is this office to be another cover-up? Will it hide facts that are embarrassing to the government? What disturbs me about this bill is the lack of regulations. We do not even know what we are voting for. We do not know what will be the powers of the Comptroller General. I hope all members on both sides of the House will address themselves to this matter. I hope that members of the Liberal party who speak later this evening will indicate their concern about the accountability of the Comptroller General.

I visualize accountability in two ways. There is financial, technical accountability, and that is important. That is one thing we are talking about here. We are also talking about another kind of accountability. To whom is the Comptroller General to be accountable in his reports? Will we as members of parliament and as members of the public accounts committee—I am not presently a member but I was—get this information second, third, fourth or fifth-hand after reports from the Comptroller General have gone through the bureaucracy, through the minister's office and through the Cabinet and been watered down? Are we going to get the reports just as quickly as possible so we can raise these issues in the House and ask the various ministers responsible if in fact there has been malpractice as far as financial accountability is concerned in their respective departments or ministries?

We spent a very good afternoon today, although I did not participate in the debate, discussing the question period and whether ministers should or must answer questions. Of course, we know that according to the rules a minister does not have to answer a question if he so desires. If under this bill the Comptroller General is allowed to publicize his facts, figures and statistics and give them to members of the House of Commons, this will enable members on both sides of this House to ask questions and put ministers on the spot so they will have to come up with substantive answers instead of evasive ones such as those we have been getting for the last, heaven knows how long.

There is an old saying, Mr. Speaker, that "I want value for my money". I suggest that has a very special meaning in relation to this bill. This matter has come up in the Ontario legislature as well as in two or three other legislative assemblies across the country. When the government spends money for the purchase of anything, how do we as members of parliament, who are supposed to have some control over the purse strings of government spending, know whether the government is getting the best deal? When the government orders desks, chairs, rugs, typewriters—I do not care what it is, even pencils for that matter—how do we know we are getting the best value for the taxpayers' dollar? Are there any other members of the House who can actually go to a department head in the Department of Supply and Services and grill him at length? Surely, we can ask a few questions of a minister a couple of times a year, and that is what it amounts to in most cases.

The problem is that we are keepers of the public Treasury. We are all keepers of the public Treasury, not just the government, the cabinet, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) or the President of the Treasury Board. We are all responsible to our constituents as keepers of the Treasury to make sure that we get value for our money. This is what an intelligent individual Canadian attempts to do when she or he goes out and buys food, furniture or clothing. They want to get value for their money and yet, because of lack of control over our economy, we do not have that information; we do not know whether we are getting value for our money.

Let me go back to where I started out in my address this evening. Even though it is a huge bureaucracy, we should instill in the minds of the senior bureaucrats and all the way down the line that it is the individual taxpayers' money that the government are spending and they should be as careful in spending that money as they themselves would be when buying their groceries. That is the way it should be. We have the taxpayers' money in trust. It is not our money to throw around as members of parliament or as members of the government.

I do not intend to speak much longer, Mr. Speaker, but there is one point I would like to raise which I raised before in another debate, and that is a problem with the public accounts committee. No doubt this relates to other committees as well. I think we have a committee system in this country—I hope that some members on the government side will agree with me on this because I think they feel just as frustrated as we do on this side—that is a sham in many respects, a system that really does not function. We cannot subpoena witnesses. Whenever something happens that is important, or perhaps even catastrophic, something that is significant to the House, how does a member of the opposition, or indeed a backbencher on the government side, go about getting a reference to subpoena witnesses, to have counsel, to have adequate research staff; in other words, to have everything a committee should have? We have to go to the government House leader, who is a politician, who is a member of parliament and who is a member of the cabinet—who in other words is a member of the government. If he does not want to give us that reference, he does not have to. Is that democracy? I see a Liberal over there nodding his head in the affirmative. We have to go to one man in one party in one government to get a reference to subpoena witnesses before a committee.

I maintain that the committee system is an absolute sham. Why do we not democratize committees in this House? Why do we not make ourselves democratic in our committees? Why do we have to act according to party lines in committee? In some of my statements in committees I have disagreed with my party, and I know there are some Liberals and some Conservatives who have done the same. Why can we not stand up in committee and express what we really want to express without fear that we will be stepped on and kicked around by the House leader, regardless of what party is in office?

This relates directly to the changing times, and while one or two members may be laughing at present, there is one thing of which they may not be aware, and that is that the government is moving toward a congressional or republican system. If the government is moving in that direction, it only stands to reason that our committees should go the same way. We cannot have it both ways. We cannot have a sham of the parliamentary system—in fact, it is going republican; it is becoming an administration, not a parliament—and on the other hand try to hold on to the old, strict party line approach in committees. We must have more power.

I will conclude by saying that unless Mr. Rogers, the newly appointed Comptroller General, is permitted to report directly to a committee of the House before his information is hidden somewhere over there on the Treasury benches, this legislation is just a piece of nonsense. All we are doing is adding another bureaucrat at a high salary. Because what will happen is what happens with public accounts. In committee we come up and debate problems, inaccuracies, gross negligence, irresponsibility and non-accountability on the part of the government a year later, instead of having a handle on it when the problem is facing us and the country.

Unless the government is prepared to make the Comptroller General responsible to the House—

Mr. Andras: No way.

Mr. Blackburn: —I see no reason why this legislation should even proceed. However, I am prepared to support it, hoping—probably hoping against hope—that when it comes to committee changes will be made, that the government will introduce regulations which will make the Comptroller General responsible to parliament, not just to a few cabinet ministers. We have had enough of executive governing in this country. If we do not stop it now, we will end up without a democracy in this House. It will become only a little debating society. In fact, that is what it has been for almost all the time I have been here. So I hope that substantive changes will be made in the legislation before it becomes a statute.

[Mr. Blackburn.]

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be entering this debate tonight on this very important 15 line bill which seems to be drawing so much fire from the opposition side, based on the comments of the two official spokesmen for each of the parties. This is a bill that establishes what is probably one of the most significant positions in our federal government public service of recent years.

There are a number of points that I would like to mention during the course of my remarks tonight, but first I would like to refer back to a few points that have been raised by the two official spokesmen from the opposition parties who—and I know them to be people of high repute—amazingly enough are taking this 15 line bill, a very simple bill doing a very important thing, and attacking it in such a hard way.

We have been in business in this country for almost 111 years. For the first time we are now officially establishing a position of Comptroller General which may be equated in most people's minds to a position of chief financial officer in the private sector.

● (2052)

The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) commenced his remarks by being very vindictive toward this bill and this appointment. In my view, that does nothing to help the man who will be the first incumbent of this position. We all agree that he will have a very difficult task. It will be exceedingly difficult for this man to walk into a 300,000 plus organization in terms of people having an expenditure budget of somewhere in the neighbourhood of $45 billion. The new Comptroller General will be asked to ensure that there are adequate financial controls and systems in place throughout the entire system. That will be a very delicate and tricky task, and the new Comptroller General will need all the support that we as parliamentarians can muster for him.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre suggested that we are simply "purporting" to establish the position. He went on to say that, in his view, the bill would do nothing more than simply create another deputy minister. The hon. member played down the appointment to the extent that if he and his party had their way the Comptroller General would not be able to function in the manner intended by the government and by those of us who have been involved with the public accounts committee. The members of this committee fully supported this concept of a chief financial officer and urged the government to make the appointment. The hon. member for Calgary Centre spoke in a manner that would make it extremely difficult for the Comptroller General to accomplish the job that has been established for him.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), who is the official spokesman of the New Democratic Party on this Bill, has taken a very active part in our public accounts committee both during my time as vice-chairman and my other three years of active involvement with that committee. I know the hon. member's concerns. We have shared some of these concerns over the years—concerns about the state of financial control within the over-all government service.

While I am certain the hon. member is endeavouring to be as sincere as possible, I feel that he is significantly off base in suggesting that the legislation establishing this position, unlike legislation governing the establishment of other departments, should be defined in such specific language that it would tie down the Comptroller General, who after all will be a very senior civil servant. The hon. member indicates that the bill should define the role of the Comptroller General to the extent that he would have inadequate freedom of movement and inadequate ability to fill out his responsibilities and to make himself the effective official he must be in order to accomplish the tasks which are set before him.

Rather than condemning the fact that the bill contains only 15 lines, I think this is a most positive aspect. Mr. Harry Rogers—the appointee designate—himself has said in the few public comments he has made since his appointment that he will need at least six months to sort his way through and to determine an approviate course of action. As one who has been involved in financial administration in the private sector I understand exactly what Mr. Rogers is saying. His job will probably be the most difficult financial administration job anyone in this country could be asked to do.

I understand that Mr. Rogers will be taking a very significant cut in his own remuneration in order to devote himself to this task. He obviously thinks it is important or he would not accept it. I think it is essential that we give him all the leeway we can so that he can be as effective as possible. He will have to determine his detailed responsibilities and work in close collaboration with senior civil servants in all departments, and hopefully in Crown corporations as well. He will have to establish his credibility.

There is no question that any large organization looks upon a person coming into the area of financial control with a certain degree of concern. They wonder what this individual will do and what effect he will have on their operations. They wonder how they should respond to and interact with him. This is natural and understandable. Senior bureaucrats on the Ottawa scene will be looking at this new position with a great deal of interest and concern. I think it is important that we give the new Comptroller General all the leeway necessary to establish himself and to make himself as effective as the Auditor General and President of the Treasury Board intends he should be.

In my view, the simpler this bill is, the better. In its present form it is simple. It contains only 15 lines, and I suggest to the hon. member for Brant, the hon. member for Calgary Centre and others who will be on the committee examining the details of the bill that we should leave it that way. We should let the new Comptroller General do his job and help him by leaving the bill in this existing form.

The hon. member for Brant raised many other points regarding committees and so forth. I would like to touch upon those points in the course of my remarks, but I want to come back for a moment to the bill itself. There is no question in the minds of most members of parliament that it is high time this kind of position was established. The annual expenditures of the government are now between $40 billion and $50 billion. Ten or 11 years ago expenditures were $8 billion to $10 billion. The Glassco commission recommended a great deal of decentralization in its report back in the early sixties when expenditures were around $5 billion. Decentralization was accomplished to such a degree of success that the control features which existed after decentralization was put into place were so thin and tenuous that decentralization tended to take over.

In the meantime budgets were growing at a rapid rate, and the controls which should have been in place were never put into place. On the one hand, decentralization was taking place. We were moving away from the old green eye-shade, centralized accounting, which was an extremely good move. But at the same time budgets were increasing substantially, which had the over-all effect of loosening control from the central area to such an extent that in many cases it almost ceased to exist.

The Auditor General brought his own expertise which he had developed in the private sector. Many corporations had gone through this same scenario in years gone by. Over the last 25 or 30 years hardly a major corporation in North America has not gone through this same business of moving from the old centralized, detailed type of accounting control to a decentralization phase, but with the establishment, in most cases at the same time, of a more modern concept of financial management which ensured that sufficient controls were indeed in place to meet the needs of the growing and modernizing phase that most corporations were going through. The only difference here is that we are seeing the process happening in government some 25 years later.

I suggest that the response which has been made by the former president of the treasury board, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and by the present President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) to the suggestions made by the Auditor General, members of parliament and active members of the public accounts committee is an example for other levels of government across the country. In my view they are likely to copy that example in the not too distant future.

I think, Mr. Speaker, generally this augurs well for the ordinary Canadian taxpayer because if there is one thing that concerns people today it is to be sure that moneys spent in their interests by the various levels of governments at least are spent in a manner that ensures that the normal types of financial controls are in place similar to those that they expect to find in large companies with whom they are familiar—oil companies, department stores, etc.—in endeavouring to ensure they run successful businesses.

So, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the bill is before us at this time I think is indeed another encouraging sign of the way in which this government is prepared to respond to the real needs of the day. I want to make that point and again emphasize that I think it would be a mistake to try and tie the new appointee's position down to such an extent that he would virtually prove ineffective. He must not be restrained in any artificial way.

The discussion on this bill gives me an opportunity to make one other point, as a member of parliament in my first term here in Ottawa, that I think is important at this time. A week or so ago there was a lead editorial in one of the major newspapers in this country, the Toronto Star, to the effect that there is no incentive whatsoever to be a member of parliament; that indeed, unless you are a cabinet minister you might as well forget it. You might as well not even go to Ottawa. This was the thrust of the article. It is the kind of argument that influences a good number of people who might otherwise be prepared to stand for election in their various ridings for whatever party they might be interested in. The editorial commented on the inability of members of parliament to have any input, the inability of the committee system to be meaningful, and made various other general comments demeaning to the role of an MP. These comments could be extremely discouraging, not to myself, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure not to members who are here and participating, but to people from the private sector who might want to join this forum and become involved in the national democratic process.

I want to take a few minutes in connection with this bill to indicate one small example of how that editorial is so very wrong—extremely wrong. I cite my own experience, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure I speak for other members of the public accounts committee in connection with this. Two years ago, Mr. Speaker, the whole matter of the chief financial officer or comptroller general was discussed at great length in the public accounts committee. I, among others from that committee, made the point on March 18, 1976, that in my view it would be most gratifying just to know that there was a chief financial officer among the 300,000 odd people employed by the federal government.

We discussed the matter with the Auditor General. We even tried to pin him down in committee as to whether or not he was recommending that appointment. At one time he was suggesting it might be a good thing but he did not have a firm recommendation. Later, Mr. Speaker, when he published his report for 1976, he did indeed make a very clear point. He referred, I might say, in his report to a question I had raised in the House of Commons and in committee regarding the establishment of just this type of position. By this time he had determined his own point of view firmly as supporting the concept of a comptroller general.

I only raise this, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me a clear example of how members of parliament can indeed make a most useful contribution to the governing process here in Ottawa. This comment should be noted—but in all likelihood it probably will not—by this editorial writer of this leading Canadian newspaper. He should realize that he is quite wrong in his concept of what does and what can go on in the parliamentary process.

I would like to come back to the comment of the hon. member for Brant about committees. Mr. Speaker, committees in our system can be most useful. Not only has the public accounts committee had a great deal to do with support for this particular appointment, and support for Bill C-10 that we now have before us, but it has been useful in many other ways. What is needed is the input of individual members on committees. Too often, Mr. Speaker, we go to committees and for one reason or another the party representation is very low. Often we will be discussing an important piece of legislation, and for one reason or another members may wish to raise matters that are peripheral but which particularly interest them in the over-all subject, whether it be energy or some other area. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that before we criticize, before we as members of parliament—I do not care on what side of this House—try and take the existing committee system apart, before we try and dismantle it or try and change it for something else, we should do our utmost to make the existing system work. And work it can.

It is possible to get general references made to committees. It does happen. We have noted this in a number of committees in the past four years. The people participating in committees can be fully satisfied with their participation. Certainly we had some problems in the public accounts committee when trying to get a man like Mr. Eisenberg from Israel to come before us. But I am not sure that any number of subpoenas would have done any good. Never in my experience, Mr. Speaker, have we had to resort to that sort of thing to get a witness before a committee.

It seems to me that before we give committees a lot of new powers, we should make sure they are using the powers and the abilities they have to the fullest extent. Staff is available to us from the research department of the Library of Parliament. We have all kinds of help available to us, Mr. Speaker. I have not been on one committee of this House where members have wanted some help, whether it is of a financial nature, the need for outside counsel or whatever, and have been turned down.

Now, Mr. Speaker, until we have used the existing committee system to its fullest, I do not believe we have any point to make to you, Mr. Speaker, to the government or to anybody else as to its ineffectiveness. We have the ability to make those committees effective. It is up to us, to each one of us in this House to do so.

I would like to conclude my comments tonight by again coming back to this particular bill and expressing, I am sure on behalf of most members of the House, the great confidence that we have and will place in Mr. Rogers when he assumes his most difficult and delicate task. I exhort members on the other side of the House not to rush to define the job description in the form of legislation. It would be a big mistake. We do not do that for other deputy minister positions in the government service but, rather, give them a great deal of leeway. We should also give this appointee an opportunity to "get his feet wet" in the job and interact with his senior public service colleagues—to have an opportunity to establish his own credibility, which will be very important. His background certainly indicates his ability to do just that. He must be given adequate time, Mr. Speaker, to become installed in the job and to obtain the kind of background that he will need in order to perform in a meaningful way. Again I say a great deal of understanding will have to be shown him by his colleagues in the senior bureaucratic service.

It concerns me a little, Mr. Speaker, to have heard a comment recently that one department was feeling that perhaps there was a need now to hire some people who would be able to interact with the new Comptroller General. I think that, of course, is simply unnecessary and really ridiculous. If individual departments have the kind of financial controls in place that they should have, then they do not need any new people to interact with the Comptroller General. Hopefully he himself will establish only a small staff. He indicated it is his desire to have just a small nucleus of people. They will interact with the existing staffs in the departments and seek out those areas where financial controls may need improving. Many of the departments may have already had weaknesses pointed out for them by internal audit systems in their own department, yet they may not have adequately addressed the matter for one reason or another.

I hope the President of the Treasury Board will take steps to ensure that departments are indeed not permitted to go out and hire people, simply to interact with the new Comptroller General, if, indeed, there is some consideration in the departments of doing that.

This new appointee is not going to be some sort of ogre, seeking out all the wrong things in departments. That is not his task. We have an Auditor General who will continue to examine accounts after the fact. This man's job will be to interact with the senior people in other departments to ensure they have the kinds of systems in place that will help them to render a more effective performance. Any senior bureaucrat in our system should be proud that he is able to produce the kind of results that may be sought from his department, at the best price possible and in the most efficient way. The Comptroller General will indeed be helping these people in achieving that goal.

If in some departments there are inadequate controls in place at the present time, obviously corrective measures are needed. Before hiring extra people to do that, however, such departments should look at their potential to put appropriate measures in place by making some basic decisions and possibly adjustments in allocation of existing staff.

A good deal more could be said about this bill. I hope as it moves into committee and is passed into law that the opposition parties will take a fresh look at their concern about the need to have much more definitive legislation. I hope they think about it and come to the conclusion that the leeway we grant to this position, as indeed is granted with all deputy minister appointments, is not curtailed by imposing in the legislation inappropriate detailed restrictions. Such an approach would do far more harm than good.

The basic guidelines are there for the job. They are currently in the bill. Any further definition of the role of this new appointee must be worked out with the President of the Treasury Board and his colleagues over the course of time.

In conclusion, I commend the President of the Treasury Board and his predecessor, the present Minister of Finance, for having moved this item to the point where today, for the first time in 111 years in our Canadian history, we are going to have in place a chief financial position that any major corporation in our modern economy would simply accept as a basic organizational function in the course of carrying on its business. Government should never consider that it has less need for up to date financial control concepts than is the case in the private sector.

I wish Mr. Rogers the very best as he commences in this challenging new position in the near future. I hope he will receive the kind of support from members of this House of Commons that he will so obviously require, particularly in the initial term of his appointment, in order that he may render the effective job that is intended by the government and is certainly sought by all members of parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this matter even though I did not have any time to prepare a speech since I received the minister's statement late this afternoon. Mr. Speaker, the decision to create the position of comptroller general was made in accordance with the general purpose of the main recommendations contained in the 1976 report of the Auditor General.

According to the President of the Treasury Board, the position of comptroller general can be defined as that of chief financial officer of the federal public service. The comptroller general will be directly responsible to the President of the Treasury Board and will have the rank of a deputy minister. In general, he will be responsible for the quality and harmony of the financial administration policy and practices within the entire federal public service. He will be responsible for developing expenditure control systems as well as related administrative mechanisms so that the expenditures stay within the limits authorized by the government. In fact, the responsibilities of this new position will include the majority of those given to the financial administration branch of the Treasury Board on its establishment in March 1976.

According to the President of the Treasury Board, there will be special functional relationships between the comptroller general and the senior financial officers of departments and Crown corporations to enable him to give the necessary instructions while maintaining the concept of decentralized management.

It has been noted that the entire responsibility for the control and orientation fo resource allocation and control processes will remain unchanged and come under the secretary of the Treasury Board. Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board added that the creation of this position will entail a reorganization of the secretariate of the Treasury

Board and that the details of this change will be announced after the appointment of the comptroller general.

Mr. Speaker, the idea is good in itself but we shall make sure that we are not going to create another administrative position that will only add to the burden of bureaucracy. The so-called functional reports will have to be efficient. On that respect I wonder what the term "functional" means.

The financial control of various departments is a heavy responsibility and all senior civil servants will have to co-operate if that office is to serve its purpose. Lastly we may wonder if the responsibilities of that position are not going to overlap those of the financial administration branch of the Treasury Board. If it is the case, why a new office?

However, I hope that Bill C-10 will eliminate the abuses made by various departments and of which we are all aware and I think particularly of the Department of National Defence and the excessive commission allegedly paid an individual whose name has not been released. I refer to the Candu reactors sold by the National Energy Board of Canada to South Korea and Chile. In fact this bill is not perfect but it deserves our attention and this is why we give it our support.

[English]

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to share a few thoughts on Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act. Prior to doing that, I wish to commend the critics in this party in this area, in particular the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). When the Auditor General suggested that we have a position of comptroller general, this party immediately came out in support of that position.

We want to ensure that this appointment is more than just a political puppet for the Liberal administration. That is why our critic, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), will propose amendments to the effect that we have terms of reference defined in legislation as to what the responsibility of this gentleman will be.

● (2122)

I wish to underscore the comments made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) on behalf of the NDP. It is obvious he was aligning himself with the position taken by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. It was clear from the comments made by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) that all the opposition parties are in agreement with regard to this legislation. We feel there is a need for it but that there should be a more precise definition of the responsibilities of the Comptroller General. It is important he should be accountable to parliament and that his report should come before committees of the House. It is important he should be more than simply another deputy minister.

When we review the career of Mr. Harry Rogers, who has been designated for this post, it becomes obvious he is a very competent individual. We would not want to see him restricted in any way. On the basis of past actions of the government it is clear that suitable terms of reference with regard to this new position are needed. We do not want to see any cover-up in the area of financial management, especially in times when expenditures are soaring.

The Auditor General stressed the need for greater accountability. In November, 1976 he tabled an annual report in which he indicated the government for losing control over its spending. He considered the situation so serious that, he said, if it continued he would be unable to approve the accounts of Canada. He found the government had overstated its financial position by more than $7 billion through a series of unacceptable accounting practices. An inquiry was instituted, and before the week was out one of the members of the four-man commission appointed by the government was forced to resign after a conflict of interest charge.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is an extremely intelligent individual with a good business background. It must break his heart at times to watch the government's financial mismanagement, to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) bowing to political expediency rather than considering the economic needs of Canada as a whole. Even the budget will be dictated by the campaign managers and by the senior organizer of the Liberal party, Senator Davey, rather than the Minister of Finance.

I hope that when this bill becomes a reality such things as the wasting of $750,000 by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on his own flying escapades will be curbed. It is all very well for members opposite to talk about restraint and claim they are good stewards of the public purse, but that is not the case. I intend to put forward many examples of ways in which the government has misused large sums of money provided by the Canadian taxpayers, but before doing so it is appropriate to review some of the so-called major accomplishments of the present administration. Just the other day they voted against a motion by the NDP, with an amendment from our own party, to offer equality of rights to women. I hope they are very proud of what they did. We intend to bring this issue up during the election.

It is obvious, when one reviews the entire four year period during which I have been in this chamber, that the government has wasted a golden opportunity to realign its economic thinking. Unemployment levels are breaking records, we are experiencing record inflation, record mortgage rates, record interest rates and record government spending, all because of the actions and omissions of the present administration. Of the last ten budgets, nine were deficit budgets and this year the deficit will amount to close to $10 billion.

Mr. Andras: His figures are jumbled up.

Mr. Elzinga: It is obvious we are dealing with a scandal within government. A bit of research I have put together shows 25 specific areas of incompetence, corruption and deceit which have been permitted by people across the aisle. There is the affair of the AECL reactor sale. We are not getting the accountability that people have a right to expect. We recall such things as the Sky Shops affair and the affair of the Statistics Canada employees. All these things bring to mind the statement made by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in its pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay), in which it stated:

> Loss of business confidence stems in large part from the contradiction between the government's stated intention of decreasing its involvement in private sector decision-making, on the one hand, and legislation creating excessive surveillance and "fine tuning" of private business decisions, on the other.

Not only the chambers of commerce but the majority of the Canadian people find they can no longer place any faith in the government. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office he stated emphatically that he intended to lead this country more to the left of the spectrum. I think it was 18 months ago that he said in a television conversation that the free enterprise system was not working and that we would have to change the system accordingly. Nowadays the government is saying exactly the opposite; it is saying we must involve the private sector to a greater degree.

To deal specifically with Bill C-10, it is my hope that abuses and shortcomings such as those to which I have referred will be remedied, to some extent at least, by its provisions and that the waste of public funds will be reduced.

I should like to refer at this point to a booklet put out by Edward Murphy of Vancouver entitled: "A Legacy of Spending". On the first page there is a clipping which states that it is the Prime Minister's intention to cut the civil service by 10 per cent. He also plans to curb government spending. The booklet is dated August 14, 1969.

If we look at what happened in reality as compared to what was stated in this article, we find that since 1969 government spending has increased by some 201 per cent. We find that the civil service has increased by some 45 per cent. Mr. Speaker, it is any wonder why the Canadian people have no faith in this administration? The government's own backbenchers are condemning it for mismanagement. A short time ago the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) stated that government spending was out of control. The story was carried in an article by the Vancouver Province dated September 29, 1975.

One can go through an entire list of waste and government mismanagement of public funds. I refer to an article in this booklet which states that CIDA's president spent some $20,000 to have a speech prepared for himself. We then come to a study which was commissioned by the International Development Research Centre which announced a grant to conduct an infertility study. They received $84,000. I find it humorous too to go through some of the Canada Council grants. Canada Council in total has spent in excess of $400 million. When one reviews, where some of this funding has gone, it makes one sick. It has gone to support filth.

Everything is illustrated in this book and I dare not put it in the record because it is such filth. We have members opposite and in this party who are debating legislation before the justice committee dealing with pornography. If members on the opposite side were sincere in the application of what they are stating, they would start to clean up their own house first. When we see the smut that is being supported by the Liberal administration, it is simply appalling.

There are a few other illustrations I wish to share with hon. members covered under Canada Council grants. In 1971 a grant of close to $40,000 was made so that a study could be made of the Alberta electorate. I am puzzled why $40,000 would be allocated to study the electorate in Alberta, because they have done a fine job over the last three years in sending representatives to this House of Commons. I do not feel Alberta needs any studying.

We find too that some $48,000 was granted to study the fertility of families in Quebec. Why would $48,000 be granted to study fertility of families in Quebec? That is the second such grant; there was another one for $50,000.

Miss Bégin: What is wrong with it?

Mr. Elzinga: Why should we spend Canadian taxpayers' money on studies like this?

Miss Bégin: We need population in this country. You are against babies?

Mr. Elzinga: No.

Miss Bégin: Explain!

Mr. Elzinga: I am curious as to why the government would want to know the fertility rate in Quebec and spend some $50,000 of the taxpayers' money.

An hon. Member: How many babies does she have?

Mr. Elzinga: Maybe I could ask the hon. minister how many babies she has.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Elzinga: I think she is a very responsible minister who is doing a great job. She is doing a much better job than those who are taking care of the Canadian taxpayers' money, and that is exemplified by the way it has been spent over the last 10 years.

In conclusion, I wish to underscore a few things that have been brought forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, who is our critic in this area. He did a great job in putting forward our position when he opened the debate after the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre) spoke. The hon. member for Calgary Centre stated that it was vital there be a Comptroller General in place in the government apparatus, to use the words of the Auditor General, "to bring this serious situation under control". It is absolutely essential that we do have legislative authority to perform that function. We intend to propose amendments along those lines to ensure this responsible position is accountable to the parliament of Canada rather than just the government itself.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the public accounts committee for a few years I am certainly pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-10, an act to establish the office of Comptroller General. The person who has been appointed, Mr. Rogers, I understand is a highly qualified and capable man and he certainly will be assuming an important position. No one will deny this, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, in light of past government mismanagement, his will be no small task and we on this side of the House would like to offer him every encouragement in his most difficult task. He will be responsible for assuring proper financial management and control procedures for the various government departments.

I am sure that when the Auditor General uttered his ominous words about the significantly low standard of the quality and effectiveness of the financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the government of Canada, he was worried about the direction the government was taking in financial management. One year later when he stated that financial conditions had deteriorated to the point of being "grossly inadequate", it was clearly time to institute another check on government accounting that would somehow improve the way the government was managing the Canadian people's money.

The idea of a Comptroller General is a good one. Indeed, it is absolutely necessary if we are ever to regain some control of government spending. But to appoint someone and then deny him responsibilities at the same time is once more the typical government response to problems and solutions. The problem exists. There are solutions to the problem. Yet the government chooses to tackle the problem only half-heartedly. They take the cosmetic approach. They give the appearance of solving the problem. They take the first step and that is all.

Obviously the government agrees to the concept of the role of the Comptroller General. But why are his duties and responsibilities not spelled out in the legislation as well? This matter has been brought to the attention of the House by three or four speakers already. It will certainly be brought up and amendments presented in committee in an attempt to correct this. It appears that the government wants someone to do the job on the one hand, and yet on the other hand it looks as if they do not. It is indeed regrettable that the government chooses not to include his responsibilities in the legislation.

It is also lamentable that parliament will have no control over the role the Comptroller General will play. This is too bad, particularly in light of what the Auditor General had to say in his 1976-77 report. He said:

> Small wonder that parliament has lost control of government spending. The MPs scarcely had a fighting chance to get adequate information on the spending they have to approve.

● (2142)

To give parliament some form of control over the role of the Comptroller General would have been an excellent opportunity to improve the position of parliament, especially when it comes to government spending which has deteriorated steadily over recent years. Why is it that the government will only go part way in following up what the Auditor General is recommending? The government first hesitated to make the appointment, and then when it did, it did not do it completely or fully.

In light of this I cannot help but wonder about the actual impact the Comptroller General will have. One would have to be very foolish to believe that suddenly the financial woes of the government will be turned around. I am afraid it will take more than one new face to achieve that. It will take a great number of new faces, and probably a whole new government.

In the last ten years we have seen a phenomenal growth in government spending and deficits. Indeed, the budget deficit for this year will be as great as our entire budget when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power. The cost of government has risen by 400 per cent over that ten-year period. I believe it was in the vicinity of $10 billion and now, as was mentioned earlier, the estimate for this year is $45 billion; and in all probability when the supplementary estimates are brought in it will be closer to $48 billion.

The whole depressing saga of government spending is a situation getting worse and worse year by year. Was it only ten years ago that the Prime Minister said that we would be on the way to financial disaster if nothing were done to bring spending under control? These are enlightening words considering the present financial circumstances of the government.

If this government has one philosophy, it is to spend, spend and spend some more. Government in the past ten years has grown too quickly and by too much. The implementation of some form of control mechanism is long overdue. The government philosophy of better late than never has prevailed once more. A better philosophy would be better never late. In other words, it should have been introduced some while back.

I suggest it is too late to implement the effective control Canadians all over the country would like to see regarding how their tax dollars are being spent and will be spent in the future. It is too late because the pattern has been established. The people of Canada have watched their taxes go up and up to support the government in its ten-year spending spree. The tax burden of the average Canadian family has increased by 239 per cent over the 1961-75 period. What has happened in the last ten years or so could rightly be called the great Canadian tax tradegy.

The phenomenal amount of waste that has been occurring in the last ten years will not be stopped overnight. It is to be hoped that the Comptroller General will be able to operate with as much responsibility and as smoothly as is humanly possible within the bureaucracy. The plain unadulterated truth is that we have been spending and spending.

I have served on several committees, and I have heard it mentioned that committees are not working as well as they should. Perhaps the members themselves could help the committees work a little better, and I say that with all due respect. I attended a committee meeting which was called for 9.30 this morning, but proceedings did not get under way until about 20 minutes to 11. That was an absolute disgrace. When members of parliament do get an opportunity to debate the estimates, two hours in many cases is not sufficient. By the time you complete the niceties at the start a great deal of time has passed. After two or three committee meetings on the estimates of one department the minister and his cohorts are home free for another year. This makes it rather difficult for members of parliament to be able to hone in on these expenditures, getting the proper answers from the ministers responsible or their officials. I have seen this happen time and time again, and I guess I will see it happen in the future.

Let us hope the Comptroller General will have a free hand and will be able to go into any department, possibly with the advice of members of the opposition, and members of the government the odd time when they are not too enthusiastic about how a department is acting or spending money. If that is the case then the Comptroller General will be doing a good job. I understand he will have the rank and salary of a deputy minister. Let me suggest to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) that it might be a good idea if he paid him on commission in reverse; the more money he saved the more he would be paid. I would like to see the day when he was receiving $10 million in salary, because he would be earning every cent of it. That may be a thought worthy of consideration.

In conclusion, I should like to say that I certainly support the appointment of a Comptroller General. I add that any measure which will put some sort of check on the government's spending habits is more than welcome. Let me say once more to the President of the Treasury Board that I commend him for finally getting this bill before the House and putting the Comptroller General to work; I understand he will be starting next Monday.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of speaking in favour of this amendment. The Financial Administration Act dates from 1951 when government programs were much more simple. Since then there have been different views at different times in the country on how best to manage public programs and to ensure accountability in public spending.

In the 1960s, following the Glassco commission, the central controls which previously existed within the Treasury Board were relaxed and the cry was, "let the managers manage". This was very much the attitude of even provincial civil servants in the 1960s when central controls from Treasury Board were certainly very much resisted.

In the expansive mood of the 60s, the emphasis not only in the federal government but in provincial governments too was on creativity. The civil servant who was considered bright, able and promotable was a person who developed exciting new programs which, in a sense, meant spending more money. In the course of all this somewhat visionary activity the fact that the Glassco commission, in addition to saying that the deputy ministers should manage their own departments, had also recommended some financial mechanisms to replace former central control by Treasury Board was somehow overlooked.

When one looks at the United States and Europe during the 1960s, one sees the same emphasis on creating exciting, progressive programs which, of course, cost money, and insufficient emphasis on accounting for this money. At the present time, the pendulum seems to be swinging the other way. We sometimes hear that government spending is bad, and that civil servants are empire builders who must be restrained and supervised. That attitude carried to extremes can be at least as expensive and unintelligent as a laissez-faire attitude toward expenditures from the public purse.

The measure before us is to create the new position of Comptroller General and is based on the recommendation of the Auditor General. The recommendations of the present Auditor General, who not only pinpoints problems but also offers solutions, naturally carry considerable weight. However, the Auditor General has also addressed himself to the question of the need for Canadians to get value for money in auditing.

At the meeting of the public accounts committee on February 2, the Auditor General estimated that at least $50 million is spent on government auditing services. The Auditor General's staff has been greatly increased. Treasury Board and the Department of Supply and Services have audit services, and then, of course, there are the various pre-audits within the departments. In this context, the appointment of another financial control office naturally raises the questions of need and effectiveness. Do we need more effective financial control or do we need more effective program audits? Canadians do not like waste in government spending, but neither do we like bureaucratic red tape, and sometimes an over-concern with auditing can strangle programs.

The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Martin) expressed surprise that a 15-line bill should occasion so much debate. I do not find it surprising because I think the underlying issue is the size and scope of government spending, an issue on which people have strong and often conflicting opinions. People talk of the need to cut down on government bureaucracy, but the same people also want stronger government action to deal with unemployment.

People talk about the need to free the private sector from control or interference by government, but business also wants government organization, spending and incentives for research and development to help in penetrating foreign markets and so on. Education, manpower planning, pensions, medical care, defence and transportation are all essential areas for government activity if there is to be equality of opportunity, social justice and economic prosperity.

A strong central government is essential for solving the country's problems, and that means big, universal programs and therefore the need for modern and effective financial controls. It is no longer enough that a program be imaginative and idealistic. It must also be carried out in the most effective and economic fashion to achieve national goals. In times of slow economic growth, government must help to take up the slack while giving private enterprise incentives and the confidence to expand.

Canadians' justified criticism of government spending, whether at the federal, provincial or municipal level, is against the multiplication of the bureaucracy without an apparent concomitant increase in productivity. The revolt is not against government programs; indeed there are continuing requests for programs. Canadians want to be assured that the programs are really efficient, effective and needed.

The appointment of a Comptroller General has been considered carefully by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) to ensure that the office will serve and meet our contemporary needs. Attitudes change in response to changing times.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) spoke of the increase in government spending of recent years as though it were a solely Canadian phenomenon. I have here an article from the Economist which traces the large growth in government spending over the past 40 years in all the rich countries of the world. It reads:

> The 40 years during which the active pressure . . . created many muddles: a tendency in domestic affairs to try to resolve every problem by throwing taxpayers' money at it, a vague pacifism in international affairs so that the peace pledge union and its successors hampered prompt resistance to Nazi and then Soviet domination of too much of the world. Those 40 years . . . also brought some great human and technical advances, which are in danger of being too much disparaged now: A Keynesianism that has helped to multiply real gross world product five times over since the 1930s in history's greatest economic expansion, the building of decent and compassionate welfare states, the end of colonialism.

In our times we do not have this kind of very rapidly growing economy. We are more cautious about our expenditures on social programs. I am convinced the idealism, the commitment to social betterment, is as strong in Canadians as it ever was; but in order to pay for the progressive programs, we want our economy handled in an extremely efficient manner. For this reason the new appointment makes sense today and receives general support in a way it would not have ten or 15 years ago.

I think the government is to be complimented on making this new appointment and on the care with which the President of the Treasury Board has attempted to see this position slotted in with the other controls. I am sure that all members of the House will join me in wishing the gentleman who has been appointed all the best as he takes on this new and important appointment in our contemporary world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have had a long day and it is now close to ten o'clock, may I call it ten o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Miss Nicholson.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

BILINGUALISM—SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT CEASE SUBSIDIZING LA FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS-QUÉBEC

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to my contribution reported in Hansard on page 3384, I have been wondering for quite some time why La Fédération des Francophones hors-Québec is using such verbal violence and confrontation with the federal government. I wonder why that non-representative and undemocratic body insists on attacking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the federal government. After all, there has been really remarkable progress among French-speaking minorities since 1968, and certainly it is not the work of the PQ government, which was elected in 1976 only, nor the FFHQ. If progress has been made, it is thanks to Prime Minister Trudeau and his government. Confusing the federal government with provincial governments under the same criticisms is dishonest, it attempts at creating the impression that since 1968 the federal government has been doing nothing more for French rights than the provinces of Alberta or British Columbia for instance. This is most dishonest.

That the first ministers conveniently fell into the trap laid by Mr. Lévesque during the provincial conference in Montreal is one thing. Rather than risking their political skins, rather than showing the necessary courage and leadership, they preferred to fall for that. But equating Prime Minister Trudeau and his government with them is another, malicious story. Certainly, the PQ government do not have the responsibility, thank God, nor the capability to protect Francophone minorities, and I would remind the FFHQ that we are not Francophones outside Quebec, but rather French Canadians at home here in Ontario and Canada. The rights we enjoy are Canadian rights rather than extended Quebec rights. I would remind them it is the government of the province of Quebec that turned down the constitutional formula, and the national government that proposed to enshrine language rights into the Constitution. And this was not vetoed by other provinces, but Quebec. Therefore, I wonder why the FFHQ is launching that malicious campaign against the Prime Minister and this government.

Mr. Speaker, we had the answer last week. The FFHQ's hidden and dishonest objectives are aimed, not at protecting French-speaking minorities, but supporting the independence-seeking views of the PQ government and, through that, to sell out French-speaking minorities they claim to protect. Because once Quebec had separated, how could we justify the rights of French-speaking minorities? That hidden, devious and subversive support has become apparent in light of the brief submitted by the FFHQ to minister Claude Morin and Premier Lévesque.

I would like to quote the following excerpts from that brief, to show the FFHQ's subversive tactics:

● (2202)

The brief says that the FFHQ considers the PQ government as a natural ally in its offensive against the federal government and the other provinces; that same organization is offering propaganda ammunition and strategic plans to help uncover scandals in return for the support of the PQ government. The FFHQ claims that it does not trust the federal government but feels sympathetic toward the PQ government. The brief spreads the myth and the lie that French-speaking minorities feel respect for the PQ government and find inspiration in its actions, which is a complete falsehood. The brief states that the federal government is trying to compel the FFHQ to oppose Quebecers and that the FFHQ does not intend to be drawn into the game of the Canadian unity. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that they are saying they refuse to get involved in theoretical discussions over national unity? It is then obvious that they actually favour Quebec's independence. They talk about traps and lack of goodwill on the part of the federal government. There is a request for help from the PQ government to unmask and denounce the bad faith of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the people from the FFHQ sent me a telegram asking me not to make any further intervention before I had met them. I agreed to meet them this morning and they handed me the document in question. Nothing has changed, Mr. Speaker, except that I am even more convinced of the dishonesty of these people. First they told me it was simply a working paper dated October 20, but the title clearly states that it has been submitted, not that it would be submitted, but that it had actually been submitted to minister Claude Morin on October 20. They may call it a draft paper if they want, the press release of November issued by the government of Quebec confirms there was a meeting with Mr. Lévesque and Mr. Morin which in a way answers the brief of October 20.

Then there is the Globe and Mail's report of March 2. Two days later, Mr. Speaker, the FFHQ hurried to produce two other documents dated March 4 and 5 to cover up what has happened, but, Mr. Speaker, it is too late to conceal the fact: they have got themselves caught in their own trap. In view of such fraud, such dishonesty, I am again asking this: that the FFHQ, if it still dares pretend that it represents French-speaking minorities, make that brief public so that the minorities may see how they are being abused by the FFHQ and its provincial affiliates; let the minister cancel all subsidies to the FFHQ till further notice so that Canadian taxpayers no longer have to financially support an organization which favours the destruction of this country; let our colleagues of goodwill, good faith and sound judgment join me to denounce this organization and its subversive activities which are undermining our Francophone minorities.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the House that on December 20 last, the Secretary of State reiterated his intention to co-operate with the representatives of French-speaking groups outside Quebec and announced that for the next five years he would substantially raise the help which will be given by the federal government to the official language minority groups.

For a few years now La Fédération des Francophones hors-Québec has been receiving help from the Secretary of State. In 1977-78 it has been given $200,000. In any application for funds which the Fédération will deem necessary to file with the Secretary of State for 1978-79, we will consider every facet of the situation of French-speaking minorities outside Quebec as well as the services that the Fédération can give to its members.

I repeat that the federal government, in any form of help it gives to the official language minority groups, intends to stick to the same principle namely to ensure the survival, the development and the well-being of these various groups. As we do with a good many national associations, we support financially La Fédération des Francophones hors-Québec, we consult it and we work openly with its members. Our attitude is one of mutual confidence. We feel it is necessary if we are to continue to co-operate with the Fédération as well as with other national associations. This confidence, this good faith, this frankness are essential to the pursuit of our common goals. If all the hearsays reported in the press were founded, this would mean that our will to co-operate honestly and openly is not shared.

TRANSPORT—INLAND TERMINAL AT YORKTON, SASK.—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS REGARDING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my participation this evening arises by virtue of an answer given to me by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to a question I raised last Monday about the development of an inland terminal in the city of Yorkton, Saskatchewan, and one of the recommendations of the Hall commission on the grain handlers. Mr. Justice Hall recommended that there be an inland terminal built at Yorkton to augment the shipment of preclean grain to the port of Churchill.

The point of my question to the minister last Monday was to ascertain why this particular firm of consultants, headed by Mr. Rod Bryden, was engaged with respect to this whole development when firstly the firm of consultants had established a well known bias against expansion of the port of Churchill. Mr. Speaker, the minister seemed to try to deny that but there is no question that Mr. Bryden had in fact acted as a consultant for the Dominion Marine Association on a previous occasion. At that time it had made a recommendation against the expansion of facilities for the port of Churchill.

The minister tried to explain on Monday by saying that a consultant was something like an advocate or a lawyer and that somehow, depending on the brief the consultant was given, he could change his opinion. Mr. Speaker, I found it rather peculiar, that the minister would suggest in this House, in apparent seriousness, that a consultant could somehow come to a different conclusion with respect to one particular fact situation. I find it an appalling demonstration by the minister of some sort of concept of flexibility on the part of consultants, when we are trying to establish the facts which determine the necessity of developing a particular facility, or the expansion of a facility, for the port of Churchill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to bring something to the attention of members of the House this evening by pointing out that, notwithstanding what the minister said on Monday, there is very clear indication that Mr. Bryden, in his report to the minister, in fact recommended against the development of this inland terminal at Yorkton because he is convinced there would be no purpose served in expanding the port of Churchill and the facilities at the port of Churchill. Mr. Bryden indicated in his report that, in the course of the study and during discussions with various sectors of the industry, it became apparent that there were serious reservations to be raised with respect to additional exports through the port of Churchill. It has been admitted by the minister that the consultant shares his views. This has been admitted in interviews with one correspondent in particular.

As I pointed out to the minister on Monday, the recommendations of the Bryden commission fly in the face of the recommendations of the Hall commission. I cannot understand the minister's attitude. Coming from the west as he does, he should understand that the development and expansion of the port of Churchill is a longstanding western dream. How he could engage a consultant whom he knew would come down with recommendations against that point of view is difficult for me to understand. This minister purports to represent western interests of the country.

Other things have happened. When Mr. Justice Hall was asked about this particular study, he pointed out that the Bryden consultants did not consult the researchers of the Hall commission. Mr. Justice Hall stated he was at a loss to understand why the Bryden consultants did not use the research done by the Hall commission to come up with a recommendation to the minister. He did not contact any of these researchers with regard to his final conclusion. There has been very substantial criticism of this report.

In this regard and with regard to other aspects important to western interests, particularly the statutory Crowsnest rates, he has indicated he is interested in abolishing the statutory Crowsnest rates and replacing them with another system. He is against the extension of the port of Churchill. This makes me wonder about his ability to speak on behalf of western interests. He takes positions diametrically opposed to the hopes and aspirations of western Canada.

An appropriate observation was made by Don Griffin, the president of the Hudson Bay Route Association, to the effect that these consultants went well beyond their terms of reference. He had asked the minister to engage a firm of consultants who would work in tune with western interests. In this case the consultants fell very short of the request of Mr. Griffin and the Hudson Bay Route Association.

The parliamentary secretary is here this evening. I hope he will indicate that the minister is interested in obtaining new information and will take a positive attitude with regard to the port of Churchill. I hope he takes a positive attitude toward the recommendations of the Hall commission and will not support any attempt to undercut the Hall commission recommendations in this and other aspects so important to western Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wondered for some time whether I should answer that question tonight because the Department of Transport gave me the required information only in one official language of Canada which is not mine. Even though I regret that, in all respect for my colleague and friend from Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and considering the importance of the issue he raised, Mr. Speaker, I will try to express myself in Shakespeare's language to answer some of the statements made by the hon. member.

[English]

The hon. member stated that the port of Churchill is a longstanding western dream and that we should have a positive attitude toward it. May I point out that in 1978 significant sums were allocated by the government of Canada to improve port facilities in Churchill. Capital expenditures of $5.5 million have been allocated to Churchill in 1978 for such work as scale automation and metrication, port lighting, winter berthing facilities, repairs and dredging. These actions in support of the development of the port of Churchill speak for themselves.

● (2217)

The consultant was engaged for the express purpose of evaluating the economic feasibility of an inland terminal elevator in the Yorkton area, or alternatively a number of strategically located high throughput elevators, originating grain for the port of Churchill. The construction of any elevators is, of course, dependent upon the prospect of a favorable return on investment. The purpose of hiring a consultant, as the opposition may be aware, is to obtain a professional opinion as to probable future costs and revenues accruing to a particular prospective investment. In order to get the best possible opinion, we hired a consultant who had had experience with Canadian grain terminal elevator construction.

Consultants, if they wish to stay in business, must of necessity guard their professional credibility. They must, therefore, attempt to maintain an unbiased approach. However, if one were intent upon finding a bias in this particular case, one would tend to believe that it would be in favour of a terminal considering that the consultant in question recommended the construction of the Weyburn terminal in the face of considerable opposition.

It is rather obvious that if the consultant's report had come out in favour of a terminal, then the opponents of a terminal could have argued that the consultant was biased, with about as much justification as the argument we are hearing tonight.

In the case of the Yorkton terminal, it was concluded that the economics were not attractive. This study took into consideration the volumes of grain normally produced in the area, the presence of other grain handling facilities as well as the special requirements of the port of Churchill. This latter factor recognizes that most of the movement of grain to Churchill must occur during the three months that the port is open. This means the Yorkton terminal would only be devoted to servicing Churchill for a quarter of the year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

AGRICULTURE—AMOUNT SPENT IN PROMOTING SKIM MILK POWDER

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my reason for entering the adjournment debate tonight stems from answers, or more accurately non-answers and excuses, given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) concerning not only the decision to cancel the $13.5 million consumer subsidy on skim milk powder but also the effects such a decision can produce.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, let me deal with the method followed. The decision demonstrates once again that the government pretends to consult but in actual fact does nothing of the kind. This decision follows immediately on the heels of the conference on national food policy at a time when the government has just renewed its commitment to co-operation and consultation with groups affected by major policy decisions. In this case, no consultations were held with producers, processors or consumers though these groups are all affected in a major and detrimental way.

There can be no difficulty in explaining why individuals and groups in our society have lost trust in the government. There is no mystery about it. The government, seemingly by design, provides the framework for this loss of faith and trust. It should be noted that the program involves a domestic consumption of some 34 million pounds of product. Present retail prices average approximately 75 cents per pound. Thus, the removal of the subsidy increases the cost of the product by 41 per cent to $1.19 a pound.

It is estimated that this price increase will reduce domestic sales by about one-third, or approximately 12 million pounds. The government presently supports skim milk powder to the level of 72 cents a pound, yet the world market price is approximately 20 cents a pound. This means that the Treasury and the dairy farmers through their export levy share losses of about 52 cents per pound. The cost, or losses, in disposing of 12 million pounds could be expected to be in the neighbourhood of $6.25 million. Consequently, the cancellation of this program will not mean a saving of $13.5 million but rather a sum closer to about half that amount.

The Minister of Agriculture has taken the position that the program was dropped because a Statistics Canada survey showed low utilization of the products by lower income families. One wonders whether regions of the country where the only available source of milk supply is skim milk powder were included in the survey.

I do not wish to leave the impression, Mr. Speaker, that I am placing into serious question the actual findings or the accuracy of that study. Obviously it does provide reason to pose the question to the minister as I did yesterday, regarding what portion, if any, of the $4 million advertising budget to be spent on the promotion and sale of dairy products was spent on the promotion of skim milk powder. The minister said he was not in the position to answer that particular question.

My suspicions were confirmed late yesterday in committee when I found out that not one dollar of that $4 million budget was spent to promote the sale and use of skim milk powder. If the government had no intention of advertising this product, I suggest some commitment should have been made with the supermarkets to perform that function. No doubt they could do a much more effective job anyway.

This decision, taken without a word of consultation, slaps the producer, the consumer and the processor square in the face. If this program has to be cancelled I suggest it should be phased out over a period of three to five years. But it must continue in areas which have no available supply of fluid milk without limitation. It should continue in areas of high unemployment and areas where the wage rates are less than the national average. The government has signalled its desire to develop an over-all food strategy or food policy; it has even taken the first step. It is only by working in concert, not in conflict, that such a policy will ever be achieved. That policy will have to be workable, acceptable and practical. Unilateral actions in the complete absence of consultation will prevent such a policy developing.

I hope when the parliamentary secretary responds to me in a moment he will shed some light on the survey which the minister spoke about yesterday. I hope he will give some indication that the department will reconsider its decision, and that he has the good sense to accept some of the suggestions that I have put forth tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) concerning the question he asked in the House of Commons. So I refer to the questions that were asked yesterday and the answers the minister gave at that time. It is evident the minister gave very good explanations for cancelling the advertising budget for skim milk powder. However, I would like to answer the hon. member when he says there was no government publicity or advertising campaign for skim milk. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Agriculture is well aware of the need to inform and promote the use and the consumption of agricultural products, particularly skim milk powder. The Department of Agriculture has already published a brochure entitled "Skim Milk Powder", of which I have a copy in hand. It is a publication of Agriculture Canada and is available at no cost. Anyone interested can obtain a copy by writing to the Division of Information, Agriculture Canada. The department has also prepared a publication, number 1106, which clearly illustrates how powder milk is produced, what categories exist, how to preserve it and how to use it in recipes. This publication was also advertised on radio and in press releases. So we have done many things to publicize and boost the use of powder milk in Canada. There is also another Agriculture Canada publication bearing number 1549 and entitled "Frugal Recipes", which contains several recipes using powder milk.

The two publications I want to mention have been recommended for use by Canadians who wish to maintain their food budget at an average level.

These publications have been recommended and distributed by several health centres. Also, the government is well aware of the need to inform the public on the use of skim milk powder.

There is also another $4 million program of the Canadian Dairy Commission for research and publicity to promote the use of non-fat milk solids, since the consumption of skim milk powder has declined over the past few years. It was decided to put the major thrust of the program on the promotion of Canadian cheese.

Recently, the hon. member noted that a study was mentioned in the House by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), and I can repeat that this study was conducted by Statistics Canada and dealt with the expenses of urban families in 1976. The study has not yet been published.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. I therefore cannot allow him to continue.

The motion to adjourn is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

SCREENING OF SOVIET OFFICIALS IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the fact that nearly two years ago I made public a list of 20 Soviet embassy staff employees in Ottawa, 17 of whom have been either expelled, asked not to return to Canada or replaced.

I now have a new list of 14 so-called diplomats, made available to me by the same obviously reliable sources, who are believed to be directly involved with KGB and GRU activities in Canada. I have made this list available to both the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). For the sake of national security, about which we are all concerned and, I believe, on behalf of members of the security forces of the RCMP, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House instruct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to review the status of all so-called Soviet diplomats who are directly connected with KGB or GRU espionage activities in Canada, enforce a comprehensive screening process on all new replacements entering Canada from the Soviet Union, and eliminate all further domestic travel permits for any Soviet personnel until all such matters have been cleared to the satisfaction of the RCMP.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RECEPTION FOR MUMMERS TROUPE OF ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Mummers Troupe of St. John's, Newfoundland, are to open their production "They Club Seals, Don't They?" at the National Arts Centre on Monday, March 13, with a reception after to be given by the management of the National Arts Centre for the troupe and guests, in view of the fact that the Mummers Troupe have arranged for three dozen flippers sent from Newfoundland to be cooked by the gracious wife of the member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) and then consumed at the reception by Newfoundlanders and other gourmets, and in view of the fact that the National Arts Centre has now advised the Mummers that they will not serve the flippers, thereby causing a crisis in that without the flippers there will be no Mummers at the reception, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That this House direct the National Arts Centre to reverse their anti-flipper decision caused by inherent effete mainland, dilettante attitudes and prejudices and to serve the flippers without any further culinary tyranny, so that they fulfil their mandate to be open to all of the people of Canada no matter what their tastes or habits, with an apology to be given by the NAC to the flipper lovers of Canada.

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT FOR ALLEGED HARASSMENT OF MEDIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the actions of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) in initiating proceedings against the Ottawa offices of CTV and Global Television, and in view of the very real risk to freedom of speech and expression in this action, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House endorses the position taken by the Ottawa Newspaper Guild in condemning the actions of this government and the RCMP in the harassing of journalists in the raiding of the Ottawa offices of CTV and Global Television to commandeer unused news material, thereby seriously interfering in the news-gathering and editing process. This cannot be tolerated in a free society.

REQUESTED MILK DISCOUNT FOR CONSUMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion relating to a very important matter.

Considering that the dairy industry is the base of agriculture, more particularly so in the province of Quebec, and considering also that the increase in the prices of dairy products is likely to reduce consumption and therefore, dairy production quotas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House recommend that a 5-cent discount on each litre of fluid milk be granted to consumers to stimulate consumption and improve the fate of producers as was done in 1972, a measure that gave excellent results.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of that motion can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION INTO ISSUANCE OF SEARCH WARRANTS RESPECTING MEDIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the alarm generated when media are subjected to police raids designed to get at confidential sources, and in view particularly of a recent case concerning Pacific Press v. The Queen (37 Canadian Criminal Cases, page 487) which indicates that unless sufficient information is made available to the justice before whom the warrant is applied for, or unless there has been a refusal or a reasonable opportunity has been denied police to get the required information, the warrant of search is illegal and will be quashed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the Attorney General of Canada immediately investigate all of the circumstances surrounding the issuance of any warrant pursuant to an alleged breach of the Official Secrets Act by the member for Leeds and report to the House as to the adequacy of the basis for the issuance of such warrants.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. It arises from a rather astonishing report that the Economic Council of Canada is going to serve as the monitoring agency after the expiry of the AIB. It is astonishing, because the chairman of the council has already said she does not want that responsibility or opportunity.

Does the government intend to introduce legislation, and when will that be, changing the role and responsibilities of the Economic Council so it can carry out that function, particularly given the fact that the statute establishing the Economic Council does not provide any power to the council other than to use published information, published statistics, giving it absolutely no right to collect information other than that which is already published and available through Statistics Canada? When may we expect to see the new legislation, and what will be its basic thrust?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to comment very substantially on that problem. An announcement will be made when all the details have been finalized. The proposal of the Economic Council of Canada playing that role was a suggestion made to the government by the premiers. We have looked at it and discussed it with the chairman of the Economic Council. When a final decision has been reached between the government and the council, an announcement will be made.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the answer of the Minister of Finance that the decision has not been reached to use the Economic Council as a monitoring agency after the AIB expires on April 15? Given the fact that the House will rise soon—which leaves very little time for the government to introduce the legislation required—can the minister enlarge on the situation, considering the fact that the provinces are very concerned about interference with their jurisdiction, and if the council is used as the monitoring agency it will have no authority over decisions reflecting the responsibilities of the provinces, particularly with regard to labour relations?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have said many times, of course, that after getting out of controls we do not want to have another AIB. It will be the role of the Economic Council, in such case, to look into prices and wages and to make comments or recommendations, with absolutely no power to roll back in any way, shape or form or to in any way go into the market place. As far as the decision is concerned, we said to the premiers at the first ministers' meeting that we would make the proposal to the Economic Council of Canada. We have made that proposal to the council, but a final decision has not been reached: that is why I am not in a position to elaborate today.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that there is no representative of labour on the Economic Council of Canada at the present time, will the government appoint the Economic Council of Canada as the monitoring agency after the expiry of the AIB, even though it does not have on it a labour representative?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we will give a definite answer on this matter after a decision has been made. Naturally, we hope that the Canadian labour representatives will return to their seats at the Economic Council of Canada. This constitutes a means of consultation between the different sectors of our society, labour, government and business, and we hope that they return to their seats. On this subject, I think Mr. Morris said that they were studying the matter, but it is up to them to decide. They decided to leave, we did not ask them to do so; that decision was taken by the Canadian Labour Congress and not by government.

• (1117)

CONSULTATION WITH CLC ON MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that without the co-operation of labour, the post-control situation obviously cannot succeed, and given the fact that labour is not represented on the Economic Council of Canada, I ask the minister whether the government consulted the Canadian Labour Congress prior to designating the Economic Council of Canada as the successor of the Anti-Inflation Board.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): On many occasions we have discussed post-control policy with the CLC. A few weeks ago, before the first ministers' meeting, we had two meetings to discuss the kind of body we should have. At that time we were talking of a monitoring agency, and following the premiers' conference we had the view of the CLC about that agency. This is a new proposition which has come from the provinces, and we are awaiting finalization of the decision by the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Is the minister telling the House that there was no consultation with the Canadian Labour Congress after the decision had been made at the first ministers' conference to appoint the ECC as the successor of the AIB? Is that the position the government has taken? If so, given the fact that there is no labour representation on the Economic Council of Canada, can the minister tell the House how we can expect anything from this agency in the area of voluntary restraints, without labour consultation or representation?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have had several opportunities to consult with labour and we try to do so as often as possible. They themselves opted for leaving the Economic Council of Canada, that was not our decision, they can return anytime, and it is our hope that they do so as soon as possible. But it is up to them to decide, as we cannot force them to sit at the Economic Council of Canada. I want to reiterate that on several occasions I and more often my colleague the Minister of Labour have consulted the Canadian Labour Congress and other labour organizations in Canada on the topic of post-control policy.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: This is quite an extraordinary situation when we consider the fact that in order for the post-control period to have any chance of success, there must be full labour input and co-operation. Given the fact that the controls will be coming off approximately one month from today, or at least in the middle of April, is it the intention of the government to call in the leadership of the CLC to get their co-operation in the post-control area, and to ask the CLC if they will now go back to the ECC? Does the government intend to do that and, if so, when?

Mr. Chrétien: Not only do we intend doing that; we have done it.

Miss MacDonald: When?

Mr. Clark: With what effect?

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY CABINET MEMBERS—OVER-ALL COST OF WESTERN TRIP

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Can my friend, the Deputy Prime Minister, confirm the press report that at least four of the government's JetStar aircraft are being used this weekend, at the expense of the taxpayers, to fly most of the members of the cabinet around the prairie provinces in what is clearly blatant election campaigning?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How can the minister justify this expenditure of public funds, in view of the fact that the government is preaching restraint and in view of the Prime Minister's insistence that there are no free lunches?

● (1122)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm the number of airplanes which will be taking ministers to the western provinces. I intend to go later today to both Alberta and Saskatchewan, and I will not be electioneering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Your duty is here.

Mr. MacEachen: I thought the hon. member would realize that we are not in an election campaign. My principal activities will be to hear the views of various groups, including people in Alberta who are interested in pipeline matters, and representatives of the Indians of Saskatchewan. My activities will all be related to my duties as a member of the government, and not as a candidate in an election, which has not yet been called.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, does my friend, the Deputy Prime Minister, regard the appearance of the Prime Minister at a $125-a-plate Liberal fund-raising dinner in Winnipeg, at which four cabinet ministers voiced high praise for the Prime Minister and heaped scorn on his chief rival, the Leader of the Opposition, a proper expenditure of government funds? Will the Deputy Prime Minister refer this matter to the Auditor General for an opinion as to whether this is a proper use of government funds?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure which matter the hon. member wishes to have referred to the Auditor General. Perhaps it is the praise that the ministers have given to the Prime Minister. It is not surprising that members of this government should praise our leader in view of the comments which have been made about him, for example, by the Vice-President of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: If that is what the hon. member wants referred to the Auditor General, I will consider it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister knows that what I want referred to the Auditor General is the matter of the money which is being paid out of the federal treasury this weekend for the expenses of this trip for 20 or more cabinet ministers in western Canada. I want to know whether the other expenses of these ministers on this election campaign trip—hotel, meals and other expenses; not just the cost of the airplanes—are being charged to the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think it is worth pointing out to the hon. member that this is not the first time the cabinet has travelled throughout the country to receive briefs and representations from various groups. I repeat to the hon. member that this is not electioneering. This is clearly in accordance with a practice which was in effect years before the prospect of any election, so I do not think the hon. member's question is very appropriate.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF HIGHER INTEREST RATES ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): We must carry on, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the rumours of an impending election campaign. I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the decision by the Bank of Canada to increase its interest rate which was announced yesterday and which the other banks are likely to imitate, could the minister explain to the House how this rise in interest rate or money costs will improve the economic circumstances of our country, encourage contractors to build more, or is it not in fact going to be a source of considerable difficulties? I should like the minister to clarify this.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will only read the press release which was issued at the time the governor of the Bank of Canada announced this decision, he will find the reasons behind this decision. We do not believe that the increase of half of one per cent in the interest rate will greatly affect economic decisions in Canada, and it is part of the monetary policy of this government which makes it possible for the Canadian dollar to float in a rational fashion. Moreover, because a gap has always existed between the Canadian and American interest rates, it will make investing in Canada more attractive to foreign capital.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

The minister just said that we have a floating dollar, and I would also add a very floating policy since not long ago he and his immediate predecessor announced with great pleasure that lower interest rates in Canada would be an essential factor for stimulating the economy. Either one thing or the other: the government is free to direct its monetary policy through the Bank of Canada or we are completely dependent on our neighbours to the south. If we really depend on them, I understand the attitude of the minister but I would like to ask him this: could we hope that some day we will have a monetary policy in Canada which will be truly geared to our economic possibilities and the vastness of our natural resources so that all Canadians might participate in the development and the prosperity of our country?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish we were completely independent, and we are to the extent that 16 or 18 months ago, I think, there was a four point difference between short term interest rates in Canada and in the United States. A few weeks ago the difference dropped to half a point, which means that our monetary policy is very independent from theirs. It remains however, Mr. Speaker, that currencies are interdependent; you only have to read the comments coming from Europe where they are complaining about the situation of the American dollar to see that pressure is made on the U.S. government and that even the German mark, the French franc and the Swiss franc themselves are completely independent of the movements of the American dollar. It is natural in the present world, because of trade between countries, and particularly for Canada, which is the country with the highest exchange rate per capita in comparison with other countries. Of course, we should be realistic and note that we have to follow world movements in this area just as in so many others.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RESPONSIBILITY FOR DISTRIBUTION OF SECRET DOCUMENTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. I hope he has had a chance to reconsider his unacceptable and indefensible position yesterday of refusing to answer questions under the thin guise that it might affect national security, whereas the question related not to the contents of a classified document but to government policy in connection with the distribution of the document.

Therefore, I ask the Solicitor General, under whose authority did IAC—the Intelligence Advisory Committee—distribute or permit to be distributed 58 copies of the document entitled "Canadian Related Activities of the Russian Intelligence Service"?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not revised my position.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question, and I preface it by saying it relates to no specific document of any kind. The Solicitor General is represented on the IAC by a senior official of his department, as are other ministers. Can the IAC, as a matter of government policy, distribute any classified material relating to national security without the personal approval of the Solicitor General?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, that is a question for which I cannot provide a reply to the hon. gentleman today. I will review the procedures and advise him accordingly.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTION LEGISLATION BE AMENDED TO LEGALIZE PROPOSED RATE INCREASES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. On February 14 I asked him a question concerning the illegality of the contemplated postal rate increases and he promised to reply. He was new on the job at that time and was not familiar with the facts. Now that he has been in office for several weeks, and before there is a further change in postmasters general, could the hon. gentleman tell the House if he is aware of the statements of his predecessors indicating that increasing postal rates by a procedure other than amending the Post Office Act is illegal, and what action is he taking on the matter?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris should know that I answered that question at the wittily-called late show, giving the reasons why the rates were increased and explaining under what legislation we proceeded to do so. It is under section 13 of the Financial Administration Act, I believe. We also had legal opinions from the Department of Justice stating that it was quite legal and everything seemed in order. At the same time, this will allow us to reduce the present deficit of the Post Office from some $600 million to some $500 million. I think that it is worthwhile for taxpayers.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of his immediate predecessor, who is now Solicitor General and is an expert on legal and illegal affairs, to the effect that it would be necessary to amend the Post Office Act in order to regularize this procedure, would the hon. gentleman inform the House why we can open the Post Office Act to legalize mail opening, and not open the Post Office Act to legalize rate increases?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, we do not have to legalize the Post Office increase. It is, as I have just said, legalized the way we are doing it. So why open the Post Office Act to legalize it?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentleman aware that some of the major users of the Post Office service are about to take the issue to court? Is he not aware, also, that this would further complicate a very confused postal situation at the present time?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this group of people who wish to contest the increase. It has not been done yet. We have our own legal advisers, and we are not too worried about this action.

Mr. Clark: Just like the uranium cartel.

Oral Questions

DISCUSSIONS WITH PUBLISHERS PRIOR TO DECISION TO INCREASE RATES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question would normally be for the Secretary of State, but he is not here today. Perhaps it should be directed to either the Postmaster General or to the minister responsible for matters concerning the Secretary of State. In view of the comment made a moment ago by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris as to possible legal action to declare invalid the proposed rate increases, and the very great concern expressed by the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association with respect to the deleterious impact of these further increases—there was the 25 per cent increase of last year, and now a 25 per cent increase as of April 1—can the minister indicate if any consultations took place with this important body, or with periodical publishers generally on whether they would be able to withstand this further increase? Since there was an order in council, there was no public discussion. If there was consultation, what was the result?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I specifically asked the question which has just been put to me by the deputy minister of the Post Office Department, Mr. Corkery, who told me that he had meetings with the Canadian Periodical Publishers Association and that apparently everything was to be done in accordance with our decision. I do not understand why that increase is now being challenged.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will consult again with his deputy minister. I hope he will also consult his colleague, the Secretary of State. I think the Secretary of State will indicate that serious problems are being created for the periodicals industry in this country. In view of the fact that the periodical publishers have stated clearly that they had no advance warning, in spite of the fact that at the time of the last increase they were promised sufficient warning, in terms of any contemplated increases, can the minister indicate why there is this contradiction? It appears that as far as the publishers are concerned, there has been no effective forewarning or consultation.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I think there must be some confusion somewhere, not only on the government side but also in the opposition because we have delayed the application of the increase for at least six months. When we met the representatives of the publishers association we told them that we were giving them a six-month delay so that they could make the necessary arrangements to cope with the increase.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there was previously a six-month delay because of the very real problems created for the publishing industry, would the minister agree to display that same spirit of assistance with a view to the April 1 increase, so there can be effective consultation with the industry and disastrous measures will not be taken which would, in effect, end the circulation of a number of important Canadian publications?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, according to the information I have from my department, consultations have already taken place. I do not think there is any necessity for further consultation on that matter.

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING SOVIET SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the majority of the cabinet, and in view of the reluctance of the Solicitor General to answer any questions, I would like to put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It relates to my motion which exposed 14 additional members of the Soviet embassy who are, in fact, involved in KGB and GRU espionage activities in Canada, activities which may be very harmful to our national security.

I would, therefore, ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would explain to this House his government's policy with respect to known KGB or GRU operatives in Canada who continue to pose, under false pretences, as representatives of the Soviet Union's embassy staff.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe the policy is fairly well understood. Action in the case of persons engaged in questionable or unacceptable practices is usually taken on the advice of the RCM Police. In some cases where such activity is suspected but evidence is not conclusive, no more action than a warning may be justified. Where the activities are clearly a threat to national security or are in violation of the Criminal Code, the evidence is based upon advice received from the RCMP. I believe each case has to be examined on its merits. The hon. member ought to be reassured by the action taken recently when 11 Soviet nationals were asked to leave the country.

SCREENING OF SOVIET OFFICIALS IN CANADA

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I keep saying that that action was just the tip of the iceberg. My supplementary question is also directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Can he tell us whether new screening procedures have been initiated in respect of Soviet embassy staff replacements, and why does the government insist on continuing to issue hundreds of special travel permits to these deceitful individuals—they are deceitful, because they are posing as diplomats—which obviously frustrates the activities of our national security forces.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the practice of issuing such travel permits is considered in light of the security requirements of the country. I am satisfied that no such permits would be issued—

An hon. Member: A thousand a year!

Mr. MacEachen: —if the travel was in any way a threat to the security of the country.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ACTUARIAL SOUNDNESS OF SUPERANNUATION PLAN

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Bearing in mind that this House had a very useful and thorough debate yesterday on proposed amendments to public service pensions, and in spite of this we find in today's press statements such as that in the Montreal Gazette, "Ottawa Out by $6 billion on Pensions", can the minister repeat his assurance to this House that such is not the case? Could he reassure public servants across Canada that indeed the public service superannuation fund will be fully actuarially sound and will not cost the taxpayers of Canada any money?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a chance to examine all those stories, but the one or two I have looked at are rather disappointing, to say the least, particularly in light of the mood expressed in the House by all parties. First of all, the suggestion that the fund is actuarially unsound is based on certain assumptions by the actuaries which I thought were thoroughly explored yesterday. There are very pessimistic assumptions about the extension of interest rates versus inflation rates, versus salary increases, versus demographic ages of retirement for 50 years in the future.

Indeed, on that assumption they came up with the view that there had to be front-end funding of $5.6 billion on the indexed portion of the account. But that is an actuarial theory, an assumption. We have said from the beginning that this was to be a pay-as-you-go plan. What we are doing is to make doubly sure, by means of a three-year review, that there is no question at all down the road of any possible change which would ultimately be very detrimental to the pensioner or to the taxpayer. So I think the headlines are probably an illustration of lack of understanding of a very complex program.

An hon. Member: You had better read them.

Mr. Andras: No, I should like opposition members, who were expressing their concern about "scare" headlines yesterday, to join me when I say this does not do the country or our pensioners any service whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STABILIZE GOLD MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement made in the House yesterday by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that there has been a great deal of co-operation among the provincial ministers of mines and the finance ministers, and now that the price of gold on the world market has reached a level which would permit the reopening of gold mines—I am thinking particularly of areas such as northern Ontario and northern Quebec where there is high unemployment—is it the intention of the minister to assist such a process by ensuring the stability of mining practices and providing a reasonable floor price to allow for an orderly marketing program?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I have not received any specific request regarding such a possibility. There was agreement at the first ministers' conference to hold a special meeting to make sure there is acceptable co-ordination between federal and provincial policies in terms of taxes imposed upon the mining industry. I do not know when such a meeting would be held. It is the goal of the two levels of government to stabilize the position so that we may know the basis upon which to plan the development of the industry.

Mr. Peters: Bearing in mind the fact that gold mining is a highly labour-intensive industry, and that it is located in areas which have traditionally been dependent upon it, does the minister intend to offer co-operation in the development of mining mill facilites, in conjunction with DREE, so that the use of DREE funds by mining companies employing existing mills would be possible? At the present time, this might not be provided for under the DREE program.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not know whether the legislation governing the DREE program permits the making of such grants to the mining industry. I look toward my colleague, the minister responsible, and he seems to be telling me the authority is not clear. We shall look into the matter. I think the hon. member is making a good point. In view of the price of gold at the present time, some of the gold mines might be reactivitated. It is a possibility.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REPRESENTATION ON PROPOSED MONITORING AGENCY

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to the questions asked a few minutes ago by my hon. friend. Given the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress has no representatives on the Economic Council at the moment, and given the fact that for two years now it has been government policy to establish a multipartite, national forum which would include labour, and that a subdivision of that forum would be a tripartite forum which would include business, government and labour, and given the fact there has been no indication of labour either agreeing with that policy or being prepared to participate in it, would the minister inform us whether it is still government policy to proceed, in line with the first point of the Minister of Labour's 14 points, with the establishment of this multipartite, national forum?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): It is very difficult to force anybody to join in a body like that, to take part in discussions. They decided they would not participate in the work of the Economic Council. We have put forward other propositions. We have met with them many times. They are reluctant to enter formally into such a body. In the course of two meetings with them, I said I was not seeking their concurrence but trying to communicate with them and explain the type of policies we were developing. Of course, they will always be welcome to come back into the Economic Council or other organizations, but they make their own decisions and we have to make ours.

Mr. Fraser: The minister talks about forcing the labour movement. That is not the question. Given the fact that there is no practical possibility of labour entering into either a multipartite or a tripartite, national forum, why does the government persist in asserting that this is government policy? It has been clear to everybody for a year or 18 months now that it will never come about.

Mr. Chrétien: It is because we feel it is desirable to get the collaboration of the labour movement to achieve our policies. But if they do not want to come in formally, we shall keep the channels open in an informal way. In the meantime, we are going back into the marketplace; we have decided we need somebody to watch the development of prices and wages, and so on, to inform the public on inflation, and we have asked the Economic Council if they are willing to undertake that role. We have not yet received a final decision from the council, but when a decision is reached we will make it known to the House of Commons.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

KITIMAT PIPELINE—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL SEEK ADVICE FROM NEB

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for the Environment. It has to do with the government's decision not to exercise the option of building a west coast tanker port in Kitimat and a pipeline to tie in with the TransMountain pipeline. In light of the fact that the National Energy Board has before it an application for such a pipeline and is still considering that option, can the minister inform the House whether the government intends to seek the advice of the board, or whether its decision as to that option is final?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): I am not entirely sure of all the legalities involved here. The hon. member might more properly direct his question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources under whose jurisdiction the National Energy Board comes.

Mr. Oberle: I would, instead, like to direct a further question to the Minister of State for the Environment. It concerns the Thompson inquiry which he has chosen not to reactivate in spite of the fact that this pipeline may still be built. Would the minister not agree that the inquiry should have been reactivated, if for no other reason than to study the even less attractive option of a tanker route down the west coast, to study the environmental and socioeconomic impact of the tankers which will carry the oil if they are not going into Kitimat?

Mr. Marchand: The hon. member and others may raise all kinds of arguments relating to the decision which was made, but if I were the Kitimat oil company, or any other oil company, I would think twice before proceeding with an application because the government of Canada made a very clear decision on the question of west coast oil ports, reflecting our view that we do not see the need for a west coast oil port in the foreseeable future.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

INTERNATIONAL YOUTH EXCHANGE PROGRAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it relates to the International Youth Exchange Program which has brought young people from various parts of Europe to Canada on a temporary basis to engage and participate in the agricultural activities of the prairie provinces. The federal government has seen fit to cut back on this particular program.

In view of the fact that the province of Alberta has decided to opt out of this program and to participate in one of its own, called the Alberta Agricultural Host Family Exchange Program, I wonder if the minister could explain to the House the status of those negotiations. Could he explain the reason for the delay, and could he estimate the number of people who will have the opportunity to come to Alberta? As there is some urgency about this matter, I hope the minister will take into consideration the fact that many host families are depending upon these individuals to come from European countries.

● (1152)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question yesterday. I might say the matter was also raised by my colleagues, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley. As a result of the hon. member's representations and those of my colleagues, I met with my deputy minister to discuss this situation. Because of the high unemployment, we decided that the movement should continue but the number should be cut back. The feeling, however, of the host associations was that this decision had been made too late and they had already made many arrangements for students. On that basis, we have decided to go back to the same quotas as we had last year.

The hon. member's figures were 320 for Alberta, 100 for Saskatchewan 100 for Manitoba and 50 for British Columbia. This program is supposed to have a certain degree of reciprocity, which we have not had in the past but which we hope to encourage next year. We will be endeavouring this year to set some quotas for next year so that we cannot be challenged for making decisions too late. But given the level of high unemployment, particularly among youth, it seemed to us that we should have a slight cutback in the number. We are going to put them back to last year's quotas, however, given the representations of the hon. member and my two colleagues.

INDUSTRY

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS AND INVESTMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is out west being booed, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Since the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce assumed his portfolio, the record of the Foreign Investment Review Board has been that 97 per cent of all appplications for new investment or for takeovers in Canada by foreign concerns have been approved. The record before that was a 90 per cent approval rate.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House why a proposal by Golden Eagle Canada Limited, of Montreal, a subsidiary of Ultramar, who have operated for many years in Canada, was refused, that is, for permission to acquire control of Metro Fuel Company Limited and other Metro companies of Moncton, New Brunswick, which are businesses engaged in the wholesale and retail distribution of gasoline, heating oils and diesel fuel? Why did that proposal, out of the many hundreds approved in recent months, fail to get the approval of the cabinet?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that in each case there is determination as to whether the action would contribute significantly to the benefit of Canada. In this particular case, it obviously did not meet the test. However, I do not have the details. I will undertake to get these details for the hon. member.

Mr. Crosbie: When the Foreign Investment Review agency approved this as meeting the test, and the minister brought it to cabinet approving it as meeting the test of significant benefit to Canada, why was it rejected by the cabinet? Was there political interference in the process? Were there representations from certain powerful groups in New Brunswick which had something to do with this? It met the test, according to the board and the minister, but the cabinet turned it down. Why was that?

Mr. MacEachen: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not have the details of this particular case. I will undertake to get them for the hon. member.

POST OFFICE

POSTAL CARRIERS—CONSIDERATION BY GOVERNMENT OF ALTERNATIVE SERVICE

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Can he indicate whether he or his department have any plans to lift the freeze presently on the postal carriers' situation, so that all Canadians in these growing areas can be treated equally?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that policy of budgetary and employment restrictions in the Post Office was adopted about two years ago. To my mind, we should try first of all to have peace among the Post Office employees to find out how best that department could function. Then, I would certainly be in favour of looking at all the sectors in which Canadians are complaining they are not getting the services given elsewhere. But for the time being, it is a matter of budgetary restrictions and the policy of the government is to avoid spending too much.

[English]

Mr. Elzinga: Can the Postmaster General tell the House whether he or his department are studying alternatives to the regular mail carrier service, and whether they plan to bring forward any alternatives in the near future?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, for the time being, I believe there is no way of delivering mail other than by mailmen, through blocks of mail boxes installed at certain points in certain areas, or again by general delivery in rural areas. I would much prefer being able to announce to all Canadians that within coming months door to door delivery will be extended but, as I have just said, because of budgetary restrictions, we cannot change the situation.

INCENTIVES FOR INSTALLATION OF RENEWABLE ENERGY SYSTEMS IN HOMES

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister considering the advisability of including incentives for renew-

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take the representation of the hon. member under consideration.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST CANADIAN EXPERTISE BE USED IN SPACE INDUSTRY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. In view of the meeting today between the minister's officials and those of Telesat to determine whether the American company, Hughes Aircraft, or the Canadian Company, Spar Aerospace, will be awarded the contract for the new Anik C satellite, will the minister assure the House that the decision will be based on the long-term interests of developing Canadian expertise in the space industry and creating Canadian jobs?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the reason the law provides for the minister to approve the contract, in order to assure himself or herself that the Canadian content and the quality of that Canadian content in the contracts let to certain companies is satisfactory to the government. "Satisfactory to the government" means precisely this, that there will be sufficient benefits within that contract to allow Canadian industrial capacity in the field of space of progress.

Mr. Symes: In view of the fact that Hughes Aircraft is arguing that its contract bid will be cheaper and will preserve existing jobs in its subsidiaries in Canada, but the Ministry of State for Science and Technology, as well as Industry, Trade and Commerce, hold the view that in the long term it is important that the Canadian company get the contract, will the minister assure the House that the well-being of the Canadian scientific and research sector will take precedence over Telesat's insistence that it continue to do business with Hughes?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, Telesat does not insist that it do business with Hughes or any other company. Telesat has called for bids on the next satellite. They have tried to determine which of those bids serves the best interests of Canadian industry. Of course, price is a consideration. I do not think the hon. member would want us to pay an excessive price for a satellite if we could get it cheaper. However, price is not the only consideration. We want to ensure that Canadian industry participates in the design and engineering of these satellites so that it will have a meaningful role to play in the space industry.

[Mr. Schellenberger.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POST-CONTROLS MONITORING—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS ON FORM OF AGENCY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which might help clear away some of the mystery he has created today about the post-controls policy. The minister said he has consulted the Economic Council of Canada to see whether they would take on that job. I have been advised by the vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress that there has been no approach by this government to them regarding their involvement in post-controls monitoring or their re-entry into the Economic Council of Canada, which seems to be an absurd situation.

I understand the minister to say they have approached the Economic Council but the Economic Council has not replied. That monitoring is to start 36 days from today. Will the minister tell the House of Commons what other options are being considered by the government in case the Economic Council says no, as its director indicated she would want to do.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to deal with this problem many times, both in committee and in the House of Commons. We were proposing a monitoring agency. After discussion with the premiers, we made a proposal to the Economic Council of Canada. We hope to be able to report a final decision within a matter of days and will be glad to advise the Leader of the Opposition and the House of that decision. I will be glad to advise the hon. Leader of the Opposition in the House. There may be a negative decision, but we have said there will be a monitoring agency, and we hope the Economic Council of Canada will accept that role.

● (1202)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, even if the Economic Council of Canada does accept that role, what will happen 36 days before this activity takes effect? The minister admits he does not know. We have to amend the Economic Council of Canada legislation in order to give it power to gather information. Can the minister tell the House of Commons what legislation is being prepared now, either to amend the statute concerning the Economic Council of Canada or legislation creating a new agency? Is legislation now being drafted by the Department of Justice and, if so, will the minister tell us today the nature of that legislation?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to be a little patient for a few days; he will then get his answer.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we cannot show too much patience with a government that is failing on the economic front to do its duty to bring in a budget and is failing in all sorts of other economic activities. The thing that concerns us so much is that the Postmaster General today indicated that the government may very well be contemplating proceeding with a postal increase which may very well be against the law. We may have a situation where the Government of Canada proposes to proceed with a monitoring agency that is against the law.

I simply want some assurance from the minister that there are plans in place recognizing that this agency has to take effect within 36 days, that we can count on the fact there will be some kind of monitoring agency operating on April 16, and that it will be an agency sanctioned by law. Will the minister tell us whether there is consideration now in the Department of Justice of an amendment to the Economic Council of Canada legislation, or any other kind of legislation, that will ensure there will be some kind of agency sanctioned by law, so that this government will not again be breaking the law in its actions after the controls period?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Leader of the Official Opposition is not aware of the many alternatives to this problem. It is quite evident that the hon. member is getting excited for nothing. I just said that next week he will have his answer.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—INACCURACY OF PRESS REPORTS ON PUBLIC SERVICE PENSION INDEXING DEBATE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which is related to a question asked a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). May I say that although I have not mentioned it to them I feel sure the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) will support me in this point of order. Perhaps I can put my point of order in the form of a question.

Is there not some way that we in this House can make a humble request to the media to report accurately what goes on in this chamber, and if they fail to do so is there not some way we can make a humble request to the media to correct the mistakes they have made?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am in the position that already the telephone calls are coming to my office, and I expect to have 100 or 200 letters within the next few days arising out of misreporting of what went on in the House here yesterday.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) made a clear statement about the indexing of pensions, which established the fact that, although bookeeping changes are being made, the retired public servants who are on pension have no need to fear that their indexing is going to be cut or discontinued. Yet the media last night and this morning reported that maybe there will be indexing some years and other years there will not. The report was that in some cases it will be cut in half. All of this, as the President of the Treasury Board said today, arises from a failure to understand the situation. I think we all understood it here yesterday. The minister's statement was clear. My friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West, even though he had some criticism to make, recognized that indexing was being confirmed.

I emphasized the point, and pleaded yesterday with the press not to indulge in scare headlines. Everyone who took part agreed. All of those who took part yesterday in statements or in questions clearly understood. Now we have this misreporting which, as I say, has already started the phone calls to my office from distressed retired public servants in Ottawa, and the letters will come during the next few days.

When a question about this matter was asked earlier there were one or two jibes from this side as to whether we are going to raid the press or control the press, and the answer is no. All I am asking, Mr. Speaker, is this: is there not some way this House can appeal to the press and radio to report proceedings here correctly and, if they fail to do so, to correct those mistakes? Perhaps by raising this point of order I am making that appeal. I hope it has the support of my friends whom I have named. They and others are putting their hands up. They all want to support it. I think I could almost make a question of privilege of it because of the time it will take in the next few days answering telephone calls and letters to correct this very serious mistake. Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board could also support me in this point of order.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that we may have lost one of the components of the audience to which we are addressing our comments. I want to go on record as totally supporting the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and hopefully this will be supported by the other parties in the House. In reading some of those headlines, and some of the front endings of those articles purporting to be news reports, I could not see any similarity between what went on in this House yesterday—not only what was stated, but what was implied by the attitudes portrayed by members of all parties in this House yesterday—and the so-called news reporting, which was not editorial reporting but was supposed to be factual.

This is an important matter. There are two constituents of this issue; the taxpayer who wants to be assured that the decisions are wise, and the pensioners who are depending for the future on certain understandings they have had. I think that many people have studied this matter for many, many weeks, and to choose out of the Tomenson-Alexander report, or anything that was said in this House yesterday, the worst possible scenario, and then even extend it beyond the possibility of practical implementation as to what is intended, is something that really should, in my view, be corrected voluntarily by the media who are dealing with these matters.

I could almost go on and say that other situations have developed of that nature, but I do hope they will listen this time, and I hope that this plea will be joined by other members of other parties.

Pensions

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have to speak very long in respect of this very important matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has expressed the sentiments I would like to express and that my party endorses. I think it is expected of us as parliamentarians to be responsible. Surely we can at least ask the press, when they are reporting, to be responsible likewise. The point was raised yesterday in respect of what amounts to be a very sensitive issue which deals with the rights of pensioners and those involved with the public purse. It was my understanding that the minister understood this particular problem and made a very frank and open statement to the effect there will be indexing, but in the future we will have to make sure that it is actuarialy sound. This is the point which was made, but for the press to go further than that and exaggerate, I can only suggest that is wrong, with the hope that they will take due note of the comments we have made regarding this as well as other matters which are continually being reported from this House.

I think the public expects honesty, and gentlemanly and womanly comment in respect of reporting. They are looking for the truth, and if we have to be responsible, and I do not plead with the press, I would ask that they take due notice of what has happened at this particular time on this point of order and be responsible as well.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the representations made by other hon. members, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

● (1212)

I was particularly shocked when a local report carried by the CBC Ottawa station CBOT last night glaringly misrepresented the facts, which had the effect of leading my constituents in Ottawa West to believe there would be no indexing of pensions in the next two or three years. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The distortion was the most glaring distortion in my period of service in parliament, and I can only say that it has brought a flood of calls to my constituency office, to my own office here, and to my home, based on a total misrepresentation of the statement of the President of the Treasury Board during the debate which took place in the House. I do not know what else I can say. I just hope that there is some means by which this serious distortion of events can be corrected.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. members who have contributed to this point have certainly expressed their views very clearly. They are on the record. Obviously if the same members of the media who were paying attention of some sort yesterday are paying attentin today, they can hardly help but get the message. There is no formal action the Chair can take, but I do not see that any would be required in order to send the message as forcibly and clearly such a short distance away.

[Mr. Andras.]

MR. LEBLANC (WESTMORLAND-KENT)—NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE—RECEPTION FOR MUMMERS TROUPE OF ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not trying to correct a story in the media but to prevent one. Earlier today, in a motion under Standing Order 43, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) indicated that the National Arts Centre had refused to serve flippers, which I am looking forward to tasting for the first time. This story came to me from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) yesterday afternoon. I checked with the National Arts Centre authorities and I understand there was some misunderstanding. They thought they were providing the food. Anyway, there is no difficulty now, and the director of the NAC will be very happy to accommodate the mummers and their guests.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-424, to amend the Official Secrets Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, this is a reincarnation, with some changes, of a bill I introduced in the last session attempting to lend respectability to the Official Secrets Act and proceedings taken under it. It provides simply for a definition of national security as being matters clearly contrary to the public interest. It restricts the operations of the act to cases of espionage, security, and subversion, and eliminates all the miscellaneous domestic matters and provides an affirmative defence in certain circumstances for actions taken bona fide and in the genuine public interest. These will be constituted as defences under the provisions of the legislation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

LABELLING OF BEEF

Question No. 942—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Did the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs investigate the misleading advertising of imported beef labelled as Canadian beef and, if so, how many charges were laid and how many convictions were gained and what sentences were imposed?

2. (a) Has imported beef flooded Canadian markets and has this created serious hardships for Canadian beef producers (b) has the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the Department of Agriculture considered strengthening the laws regarding marketing of imported beef by requiring all beef sold in Canada to be labelled as to percentage of content according to country of origin and (i) if so, on what date will new regulations be put into effect (ii) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by Agriculture Canada and Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada as follows: 1. Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada has done some limited investigation regarding the advertising of imported beef labelled as Canadian beef. No misleading advertising was found and consequently no charges were laid.

2. (a) Beef imports through 1977 have been under import quota and controlled through the Export and Import Permit Act. Canadian beef producers have had serious hardships over the past three years as have beef producers in other countries. However, this relates to excessively high levels of cattle marketings as cattlemen have taken steps to reduce their beef herds. Imports have not been a major influence in 1977. Beef imports have been under quota and concerning live cattle trade, to mid-December this year, Canada had exported about 217,000 head of slaughter cattle, and 94,000 head of feeder cattle while importing only about 9,800 head of slaughter cattle. (b) No; (i) N/A; (ii) Agriculture Canada's objective under its meat inspection program is to ensure wholesome meat products and compliance with product and labelling standards. The Meat Inspection Regulations made pursuant to the Canada Meat Inspection Act presently requires a statement "Product of (country of origin)" immediately below the product description for all imported meat products. Labelling as to the percentage of content of imported meat products is not within the scope of the Meat Inspection Act. Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada has not considered requiring beef imported and sold in Canada to be identified as to the percentage of content according to its country of origin. The reason this is not a consideration is the cost of such a requirement. Increased cost to the packer would most certainly be reflected by an increase in cost to the consumer.

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH

Question No. 1,077—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Has the Department of Agriculture studied the implications for agricultural research of the Treasury Board directive entitled "Policy and Guidelines in Contracting Out the Government's Requirements in Science and Technology" and, if so, did the Department arrive at the conclusion that the directive would result in a reduction of the funds available for agricultural research?

2. If the directive has not yet been approved as government policy, will the Department seek from Treasury Board an exemption in the case of agricultural research in view of the vital importance of such research to the competitive position of Canadian farmers on the international market?

3. If the directive is now government policy, does the Minister of Agriculture intend to take steps not only to fill the gap but also to recognize the need to increase both the level and quality of agricultural research and (a) if so, what are such steps (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes. The Department of Agriculture has studied the Policy and Guidelines on Science and Technology within the department and with other departments to assess the implications. There will be no reduction in funds available for agricultural research as a result of the policy. Pay funds would be redirected into funds available for appropriate contracts.

2. The directive is government policy. Action to seek exemption will depend on Treasury Board's reaction to the department's plan for Science and Technology.

3. The department has an intensive annual program review of its research activities at which time priorities, performance effectiveness, and gaps are identified and assessed.

FEED GRAIN STORAGE PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,155—Mr. Marshall:

Have discussions taken place with the Province of Newfoundland as to the application of the new feed grain storage programmes announced by the Department of Agriculture on October 17, 1977 and, if so, what proposals were made by the Province for an allocation of the 28 million dollar funding?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The new feed grain storage programs of the federal government were briefly explained by the chairman of the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, among other topics discussed, at a meeting with representatives of the Newfoundland government, feed industry and livestock and poultry producers in St. John's on November 7, 1977. No formal proposals have been made by the Newfoundland government, nor were there requirements for formal consultation, on the allocation of funds for storage, feed mill and elevator programs to be administered by the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and Agriculture Canada. The programs will be available to Newfoundland interests on the same terms as in other provinces where they apply.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW PUBLICATION

Question No. 1,322—Mr. Crosbie:

1. How many copies of Foreign Investment Review are printed by the Foreign Investment Review Agency for each quarterly edition of the magazine?

2. What is the budgeted cost of publishing, including editorial production, printing and distribution, of the magazine during the 1977-78 fiscal year?

3. What classifications do individuals and groups now receiving the magazine fall into?

4. What is the specific mandate given to the two present editors of the magazine in the production of editorial copy?

5. What is the nature of authorizations that must be received from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or any of his officials outside of the Foreign Investment Review Agency for editorial copy prior to its publication in the magazine?

6. What proposals have been made to expand the distribution, size, editorial scope or production quality of the magazine during the present fiscal year or in subsequent fiscal years?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Foreign Investment Review Agency is concerned: 1.

Printing run	English Copies	French Copies
Autumn 1977 (1st issue)	12,000	4,000
Winter 1977/78	15,000	4,000
Spring 1978 (planned)	15,000	4,000

2. Total budgeted cost for fiscal year 1977/78, including relevant staff cost, is $112,190.00. Of this amount, close to $5,000 represents non-recurring costs for initial design, preparation of mailing list, etc. and $2,000 represents payment to outside authors for material to be published in fiscal year 1978/79.

3. The magazine is distributed primarily to potential investors (major industrial corporations) and to their advisors (banks, investment dealers, lawyers, consultants); to chambers of commerce and trade associations; and to federal and provincial offices abroad. It is also distributed to members of parliament, the Parliamentary Press Gallery, and business publications in Canada and abroad; to libraries and universities in Canada and to private citizens on request. Approximately two-thirds of the distribution is outside Canada and one-third within Canada. A significant proportion of the copies are sent to provincial governments, at their request, for distribution by them. In the case of the province of Quebec, for example, apart from copies sent individually to government officials, 900 copies requested are sent in bulk to the provincial government for distribution. Somewhat smaller, but significant, numbers are sent to most other provincial governments.

4. Since the purpose of the magazine is to provide foreign investors with information on the legislative and investment environment and on what Canada expects from foreign investors, the mandate of the two editors is to participate, under direction, in suggesting, writing, procuring and editing articles and other material appropriate to the magazine's purpose. The editors receive considerable guidance in this role from senior officers of the agency and from an interdepartmental steering committee as noted below.

5. The planned contents of the magazine are subject to review by an interdepartmental steering committee of senior officials designated by the deputy ministers or equivalent of the Departments of Finance, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Energy, Mines and Resources, External Affairs, Environment, and the office of Federal-Provincial Relations. All articles and other material published in the magazine are, prior to publication, scrutinized and approved by the appropriate department. Articles dealing with the Foreign Investment Review Act and its administration are subject to the approval of the commissioner. General supervision of the publication of the magazine is provided by the Director, Research and Analysis Branch of the agency.

6. While a number of proposals have been made and considered—for example, to publish in additional languages or to add additional kinds of information—there are no current plans to expand the distribution, size, or editorial content of the magazine, except that it was from the beginning and still is the intention to involve provincial governments to a greater extent in the preparation of material, as its format and general content become established.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if question No. 363 could be made an order for return, that return would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Question No. 363—Mr. Howie:

What progress is being made with the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs presented to the House July 7, 1976 in its report on child abuse and neglect?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

The House resumed from, Thursday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Buchanan (for the President of the Treasury Board) that Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to rise today to participate in the debate on Bill C-10 which has been referred to as the comptroller general's bill. I was very interested in some of the statements that have been made by government speakers. In fact when the parliamentary secretary made the introductory statement in place of the minister, he mentioned that there had been considerable debate and urged us to speed up the passage of this bill because of the importance of establishing the office of comptroller general and finding someone who would take that position. We are getting used to this particular type of introduction because in so many cases, after many months of hesitation and delay, the government moves in with a bill and then tells us it wants it pushed through immediately because it is an extremely important matter.

I wish somehow ministers would be constrained to look at the situation and decide whether or not they themselves might not be responsible for the delays, because in many cases it is a matter of priorities in government business and a matter of strategy to try to get the matter through without the opposition catching on and having an opportunity to debate it to any degree. I am happy today at the opportunity to take part in this debate.

It was about three years ago, when speaking in the House on a government tax bill, that I said the government was spending money like the proverbial bunch of drunken sailors. Of course I made the appropriate apologies to the sailors at that time. As I recall, I was referring to the way in which this administration was mishandling public funds, and I gave examples of how the Trudeau administration was engaged in a mad spending spree at the expense of the taxpayers of the nation.

Last year, the Auditor General of Canada stated that this government had lost, or was close to losing, effective control of the public purse. One of his major recommendations was that the government appoint a comptroller general. In a few moments I want to deal with this specific proposal, but before getting to that I want to make a few comments on the reasons for our Auditor General's concern about the spending habits of this government.

If we were to get to the heart of the problem, we could see that the main reason for the disastrous state of our nation's economy is in the philosophy of the individuals in charge. I would submit that whatever ethics the Liberal party had had in the past, whatever standards or principles guided the conduct of members of that party previously, they have long since been abandoned by the government, and political morality and personal ethics have been sacrificed on the altar of political expediency.

The answer to every problem for this government, it seems to me, is to spend. The philosophy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is that the resources of our citizens are inexhaustible, that big government is an end in itself, that big is good, bureaucratic is better, and bungling is best.

One of the best analyses of the Prime Minister's philosophy I have come across is found in the book by Philip Bom entitled, "Trudeau's Canada—Truth and Consequences". The author of the book gives a concise cogent analysis of the Prime Minister, and I urge all government supporters to take note they cannot pass this analysis off as hate literature or the babblings of a right wing radical. It appears that this is a scholarly analysis and, what is more, I believe that basically it is the truth.

● (1222)

The author states that:

Trudeau has not blindly applied Marxist principles—

Meaning that he has applied them, but not blindly.

—or slavishly followed Maoist strategy and tactics . . .

Meaning that he has applied these, but perhaps not slavishly. The author goes on:

> . . . has integrated and applied his radical and critical theory in an original and concrete manner to the historical circumstances (the French fact) and political situation (federalism and the length of Liberal party in power in Ottawa) in Canada. If he were ever to submit himself to the iron discipline imposed by an authoritarian party he would, according to his own criteria, lack intellectual integrity.

However, says the writer, and I hope that hon. members opposite will understand this:

> . . . he has no moral right—either human or political—to hide his radicalism behind a Liberal philosophy party and parliament—empty them of their traditional meaning—destroy their direction, and in the process deceive the people . . .

So when I stated a few moments ago that the Liberal party had sacrificed its principles and ethics—at least the government has—I was not alone in making that statement.

What are some of the examples of this dangerous mix of Marxist philosophy and politics of confrontation at which this Prime Minister is so good? The first thing which must be done is to bring about inflation. Lenin pointed out that nothing disorganizes like inflation. "In order to destroy bourgeois society, you must debauch its money". The Trudeau plan to encourage inflation has succeeded admirably. The spending habits of the government have brought about a situation in which middle class small businessmen, the backbone of the so-called bourgeois society, are in danger of being destroyed completely. I must submit that that is precisely what is being accomplished under the direction of the Prime Minister.

They are taxed at every turn. They are required to fill out endless expensive government forms. They are in competition with big business in the market place, and in general they are being slowly strangled by the government and the Prime Minister, who has no use for personal initiative, the work ethic or free enterprise. In February of 1970, in the midst of the first great inflation crisis brought on by this administration, the Prime Minister stated, "We have no alternative; we must end inflation". Unfortunately, as is so often the case, that statement was merely window dressing. It was uttered in 1970 when government spending for the year was $13.6 billion. By 1974 that figure had more than doubled, to $31.3 billion.

This year we have been presented with estimated government expenditures of $48.5 billion. That works out to an almost 500 per cent increase in the ten years that the Prime Minister has been in office. What is more, the most recent memorable statement of the Prime Minister regarding inflation, the now infamous remark that "we have wrestled inflation to the ground", was uttered in the same year that government spending increased by 28 per cent. That was a real wrestling match!

The Prime Minister blames everyone but himself and the government. He has blamed external forces and said that all the nations of the free world are facing the same problems. He has stated that these are situations that cannot be combatted on the domestic front, and so there have been times when he has said that we have to await certain international changes and changes in the United States before we can effectively deal with the problem of inflation. When the Prime Minister got tired of using that excuse he said that Canadians were to blame and that they were spending too much money. He said that they would have to tighten their belts, exercise restraint, and realize that they cannot have as much as they had in the past. So the Prime Minister went from external forces to the Canadian people, but in no case did he say that the government was responsible because of its free spending philosophy and because of its uncontrolled expenditures. That was beside the point.

I would say that all the talk about restraint and what the government is doing to exercise restraint and control its expenditures is just that, talk. There has been nothing realistic or concrete taking place because, no matter what figures we look at, we find that the spending continues and, of course, the government and particularly the Prime Minister are basically responsible for this situation.

What has happened to the Canadian dollar? We have heard quite a lot recently about how our dollar has been exploited on international money markets, and I think it is disgraceful for the government to sit back and blame Canadians for being too soft or too fat and unproductive. The fact is that the government has destroyed the confidence of the international community in Canada's economy. It has destroyed the confidence of Canadians. Its unfair tax system has discouraged Canadians from investing in their own country and has forced both Canadian and American risk capital to other, more reliable economies in the world market place.

So now we have "Trudough", a peculiar 88-cents dollar which makes the so-called "Diefendollar" of the 1960's, which the Liberals used to talk about, look like a bargain by comparison. In terms of purchasing power our dollar at the last tabulation was worth less than 60 cents in terms of 1970 purchasing power. When Lenin talked about debauching money, he did not know what a willing servant he would have as head of the Canadian government throughout most of the 1970's.

I should like now to turn to some of the more specific areas of government spending to which the Canadian people are raising strenuous objections. During this last decade of free wheeling spending, a decade which can be likened to the biblical parable about the prodigal son spending his money on riotous living, Canadians have not seen even one major social program put in place. What they have seen is another matter. They have seen the unemployment insurance fund bulge from $700 million to $4.5 billion. They have seen the federal Public Service grow from 246,000 people to over 325,000. In spite of the fact that the Prime Minister and spokesmen for the government said there would be a freeze on Public Service hiring, we see an increase of this kind.

The bilingualism program which cost some $70 million in 1970 has mushroomed to a whopping $503 million for 1978-79. In addition, in order to pay bonuses to public servants who have been trained at public expense to become bilingual—and they have not become bilingual—it will cost Canadian taxpayers $35.7 million in 1978-79.

Fourth, the CBC, an institution which at times has been one of the foremost purveyors of anti-social, anti-family, amoral philosophy, has, since 1970, been subsidized to the tune of $2.4 billion. Its subsidy from the Canadian public purse has risen from the 1969-70 level of $166 million to the 1977-78 level of $467 million. While acknowledging the fine quality of some of its programs, this institution has been contributing to the undermining of the moral fibre of this nation by its insensitivity to the ethical values and personal integrity that have made our nation great.

Protests have been raised, letters have been written, speeches have been made, but we find little action has been taken to correct the inadequacies and failings of this organization. Canadians ask why they should support this organization to such an extent when it seems at times it is undermining the very values and principles that have been the mainstay of our society.

Fifth, Canadians have seen the cost of operation of the Prime Minister's office skyrocket from about $500,000 when he took office to $2.5 million in 1977-78. In ten years the increase is over 250 per cent. I do not think the Prime Minister can claim that his office is functioning better than in the past. They have been moving into a lot of areas where they have no business, and there has been a duplication of services or agencies. I do not believe this exorbitant increase has produced any improvement in governing the nation.

Sixth, Canadians have been outraged to see the huge deficits incurred by this administration, the deficit in 1978-79 being in the area of $10 billion. That is about $2 billion more than the total expenditures of the Pearson government, and about the same as the total expenditures of this government when the Prime Minister took office. Canada is now in the position of borrowing money to pay interest on money borrowed earlier. These interest charges cost Canadians about 14 cents out of every tax dollar spent by the federal government. With this kind of operation it is no wonder that the international money markets do not want to hold on to our dollars, but want more stable money. Small wonder, as a result, that our dollar has fallen to 88 cents in terms of U.S. currency.

Seventh, the Prime Minister now has a cabinet fully nine members larger than when he took over as Prime Minister. Again, the Prime Minister believes that big is good and that he can make up in size what he lacks in quality in his cabinet. That is just not true. Instead of having an incompetent cabinet of 24 members when he took over as Prime Minister, he now has an incompetent cabinet of 33 members. President Jimmy Carter of the United States, who has to run a country with a federal budgetary expenditure of about $432 billion, gets by with a cabinet of 14. The Prime Minister, by comparison, needs 33 cabinet ministers to handle a budgetary expenditure which we all agree is outrageous at $48 billion.

Earlier I referred to the Auditor General's statement to the effect that the government had lost or was close to losing effective control of the public purse. The Auditor General, J. J. Macdonell, also referred to the fact that, based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies, and Crown corporations audited by himself, financial management and control in the government of Canada are, to use his words, "grossly inadequate." Mr. Macdonell went on to say in his report to parliament that this is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate, and effective measures to rectify what he termed a "critically serious" situation.

A part of the Auditor General's solution was to propose the establishment of a position that would be the chief financial office of the government, that of comptroller general of Canada. The Auditor General put quite a heavy emphasis on this position as a means by which Canadians could reclaim some measure of control of the public purse. I may say that this is absolutely necessary because control of the public purse by this parliament has been eroded by the government. The system of bringing estimates before a committee of the whole to be dealt with carefully and perused diligently, has gone. Now we just allocate a certain amount of days to discuss problems and issues, and then everything has to go through; billions of dollars of expenditure are approved in a few moments. I say that the Auditor General is right. We have to reclaim some measure of control in some way, and we hope it can be accomplished by the establishment of this office.

The rules do not permit me to get too specific at this point on the office of comptroller general, but I do want to reiterate a couple of important items that were referred to by the Auditor General in his report to parliament this year.

In many cases the particular office to which a person is appointed is only as good as that person, so needless to say it is extremely important that the right man be chosen as Canada's new comptroller general. I am not in a position to say whether the government's choice of Mr. Harry Rogers is adequate, but his credentials are impressive.

The following are the guidelines that were laid down by the Auditor General in his suggestion for the office of comptroller general: first, the person ought to have appropriate professional qualifications; second, he should have a proven record of outstanding competence and achievement at senior levels of responsibility; and, third, he should have extensive experience as a senior financial executive in a large organization in either the public or private sector. It appears, as we look at this, that the gentleman chosen by the government has the right background according to the Auditor General's criteria.

My understanding of the post being created by this bill is that it is one which will, in all likelihood, have no authority to control spending. I listened to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) when he was questioned on a television program about this particular matter. He made it abundantly clear that there was not to be any change in the allocation of funds. As reported at page 3588 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Lefebvre) made it abundantly clear as well that this officer would not have any real authority over the expenditure of funds when he said:

In light of the close functional relationship between the proposed position of comptroller general and the existing position of secretary of the Treasury Board,

I want to reiterate that the introduction of this new office will not in any way change the responsibility of the secretary of the Treasury Board in the field of resource allocation.

As explained in detail to the Public Accounts Committee last April 26, the secretary will retain responsibility for the direction of the resource allocation and the control processes of funds; and ensure that they will not be reallocated without due authority.

That does not leave very much authority for this man who was supposed to reclaim some control over the expenditures of the government, and for this reason I think Mr. Rogers will have a very difficult job indeed.

● (1242)

I listened with a great deal of interest to the address given by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin). He criticized the opposition for dealing in such detail with what he referred to as a very short bill. He suggested that Mr. Rogers needs the full support of this House in assuming such a difficult assignment. I agree 150 per cent with that statement. It is a difficult task because the finances of the government are in a horrible mess. It is a difficult task because, while preaching restraint, this government has embarked on a spending spree unparalleled in our history. It is a difficult task because of the waste and extravagance that are abounding on every hand. Information concerning this extravagance is being published from day to day in the various periodicals and newspapers across the country. It is a difficult task because of the uncertainty and the frustration that are strangling our economy at the present time. I agree that this is a difficult task and it will require the full support and co-operation of everyone in order that Mr. Rogers will be able to do the job assigned to him.

While we have confidence in Mr. Rogers and we believe that the comptroller general designate has the necessary qualifications, we do not trust this government to allow him to do the job which the Auditor General envisaged when he recommended the creation of this office. This action of the chairman of the Treasury Board is long overdue. It is too bad this post was not created earlier, and that the man appointed was not given certain prerogatives and responsibilities. Perhaps then we would not be in the mess in which we now find ourselves. In any event I wish Mr. Rogers well in his new job. I hope that he will be able to discourage this mad spending spree upon which this administration embarked when this Prime Minister took office ten years ago and which still continues.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House listened with interest to the most thought provoking and profound remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East—

Mr. Patterson: West.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am sorry. But to be sure I checked last Wednesday's Hansard and either there is a misprint in Hansard or the member has made an error, but I thought it was Fraser Valley East.

The hon. member outlined in very precise chronological form some of the trends which have occurred under the Trudeau administration. There is no question that some of the points he raised provide some nourishing thought to Canadians. In his remarks he pointed out some of the root causes of the problems we face, the devaluation of the dollar; excessive spending; the continual deficit budgeting and poor management of our affairs. Over the last ten years only one balanced budget has been presented by this administration. The accumulation of these errors in judgment and incompetence in mismanaging the economic and financial affairs of this country has helped to put Canada in a very difficult situation in the international world. Our performance amongst the OECD countries has been less than satisfactory, and we certainly have a lot of improving to do.

I could not help thinking while the hon. member was speaking that it will not matter how many comptrollers general we appoint or how much more we give the Auditor General in terms of financial resources to do his job properly. The responsibility for resource allocation in this country is the responsibility of this government. I am convinced that this government will continue to waste, it will continue to practice its habits of extravagance, and it will continue to attempt to buy off the Canadian voter. It will continue to use the the office of the Prime Minister and the offices of respective cabinet ministers, indeed the government as a whole, to cling to power. We have an example of that today with the absence of so many members of the cabinet who are on an electioneering tour of western Canada. There is no question that this can be termed as electioneering at public expense.

When the public witnesses these kinds of things happening it adds to the growing lack of confidence which the public is placing in governments as a whole and in institutions of parliament. The fact that parliament has lost control and cannot effectively take action to curb these abuses which have occurred with increasing frequency is probably because we have had a government in power far too long. There is a growing cynicism in the minds of Canadians. They are not getting fair value for their dollar, those dollars which are being spent on their behalf by the government of the day. This cynicism and lack of confidence are not receding. I say to you, sir, they are growing.

We are dealing with a bill which will establish another level of bureaucracy. I support the principle. It is not, as I said earlier, an effective check for ensuring that our financial resources are allocated for the right purposes. This will be a check to ensure that the money which parliament has appropriated for the department in question will be spent in that area, and that area only. There should not be waste and extravagance after the allocation has taken place. We have seen an increase in the amount of financial resources going to the Auditor General's office, which I support and which is necessary. We will witness another large expenditure of money committed to the office of the comptroller general.

As I sat and listened to the hon. member I thought about some of the issues and the extravagance and lack of concern for any effective control mechanism. In the most non-political and non-partisan sense I feel that what we need in this country more than anything else is a change in government. That would flush out the system and probably put the country back on the right course.

I support the concept of the establishment of the post of comptroller general of Canada. In my remarks today I want to echo the concerns which have been placed on the record by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), and my good friend, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). I am worried that this bill does not enshrine in legislative form the powers and duties of the new comptroller general.

The Auditor General, as has been pointed out by previous speakers, put on record in his 1976 report the terms of reference which he thought should apply to this office, and in April of 1977 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) gave the government's approval in principle for the establishment of the post. So we may ask ourselves just why the government appears to be so worried when we ask that these powers be enshrined in legislative form?

When we look at the history of the idea we find that in November, 1976, the Auditor General submitted his annual report to parliament and, as other hon. members have pointed out, it was one of the most damning indictments of the government ever produced. On the same day, the President of the Treasury Board announced the establishment of a royal commission to look into various aspects of the report, particularly the question of accountability, and to bring forth recommendations. On November 24 the minister was quoted in the Ottawa Citizen as saying the establishment of a comptroller general meant that constraints of a constitutional, political, and technical nature must be resolved. He expressed the view that the best means of achieving such a clarification was through a royal commission. He was saying, in effect, that the establishment of the office of comptroller general would be incompatible with the tradition of ministerial responsibility.

The Auditor General was taken aback by all this, and on November 29 he was quoted in the Financial Times as saying:

> This really shook me up. The minister was misinformed. I have been fair and open. I gave them advance copies of sections of my report. Those people knew damn well that I did not recommend that the comptroller general report directly to parliament.

What Mr. Macdonell recommended was that a comptroller general be appointed at the deputy minister level, reporting to the President of the Treasury Board, who in turn would report to parliament. We have to ask ourselves just who was misinformed in this process. Who are these people of whom Mr. Macdonell spoke? This speculation, of course, gives rise in turn to a number of other questions.

In the days that followed November, 1976, we found out that there was an echelon of people—I would refer to them as the bureaucratic elite—who were quite concerned about the possible establishment of this post of comptroller general.

Perhaps I could quote from a Canadian press story which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on November 24. It reads as follows:

> Senior public servants have mounted a major campaign to defend themselves from charges by Auditor General J. J. Macdonell that they have lost control over public spending.
>
> The top bureaucrats, led by Privy Council Clerk Michael Pitfield, convinced Prime Minister Trudeau to set up a royal commission to a delay action on reforms recommended by the Auditor General, highly placed sources said Tuesday.
>
> Some cabinet ministers fought the idea of a royal commission, arguing that it would be interpreted as a stalling tactic designed to block establishment of a powerful new financial overseer called the comptroller general.
>
> But Mr. Pitfield, supported by Treasury Board secretary G. F. Osbaldeston, won out . . .
> Mr. Macdonell confirmed privately that Mr. Pitfield led opposition to the appointment of a comptroller general.

The article goes on to describe how the bureaucratic elite orchestrated the government's response to the Auditor General's report in the days before it was presented. Last April, the government performed one of its famous flip-flops and announced that it had approved in principle the establishment of the post of comptroller general, apparently abandoning its earlier view that to do so would be a contradiction of the principle of ministerial responsibility. Looking at this bill, however, it seems that the government did not change its mind as completely as we had thought, because the precise duties of the comptroller general are not defined in the legislation. It appears to me the cabinet did not really have the fortitude to stand up to the bureaucrats after all.

The bill says the comptroller general should be deputy minister and, really, nothing else. After that, we have to use our imagination. In the absence of precise duties and responsibilities enshrined in legislative form the work of the comptroller general could very well be stymied by actions of the bureaucrats and of the vested interests to whom I have referred as the bureaucratic elite. He could very well be strangled by the likes of Mr. Pitfield and his colleagues, and since he reports to the House only through the government he would be powerless to let anyone know what is happening should these bureaucrats attempt to harass him or burden him.

I do not believe the attitudes which were taken after the Auditor General made his recommendation are any less strong today than they were then. I am not sure whether the comptroller general, now that the post has been created, will get the kind of co-operation which the job deserves. Of course, when I say this, I am assuming we shall continue to have a Liberal government in power after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I suppose my statement contains a presumption for which I stand to be corrected, because the way things are going the Liberals are losing their support in central Canada and are now being forced to fan out to the extremities of the country for reasons of a political nature.

An hon. Member: The national interest.

Mr. Mazankowski: Someone says "the national interest". I well remember back in 1972 when the Liberal party had a majority of seats in only one province of this country. That, to my mind, does not indicate the kind of support from coast to coast which the party should have if it wants to govern effectively.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

● (1412)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When the House recessed at one o'clock the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) had the floor. He still has 24 minutes remaining of his allotted time.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The man who has been selected to assume the role of Canada's first comptroller general, Harry Rogers, brings with him a very excellent reputation. I do not know the man personally, but on studying his background and his credentials it is quite obvious that the minister and the government have undertaken to select the most capable person available, with the appropriate professional qualifications and a proven record of outstanding competence and achievement. As other hon. members of the House have indicated, I too certainly want to wish him well in the undertaking of his deliberations because, as we have pointed out on this side of the House, he will need all the help he can get in trying to restore some order to the financial mismanagement of this government. This is particularly true when you consider this rather innocuous bill.

It has to be made clear once again that the appointment of a comptroller general will not in any way improve the resource allocation process, which is largely a political process. The government will continue to do what it has been doing, but the comptroller general will have the responsibility to ensure that the funds which have been allocated to the respective departments and programs are spent in an appropriate fashion, and that there is not any misappropriation or misspending of those funds after the allocation process has taken place.

I presume it will also be his responsibility to ensure that appropriate checks, balances and procedures are followed in this process. In many respects that process will complement the work of the Auditor General. If there is any misappropriation or questionable misappropriation of funds by the government, that will remain an issue to be debated in this chamber or in committee.

This is another area in which exists a very major deficiency and weakness of the parliamentary process. There can be absolutely no question whatsoever about the suggestion that we do have a very serious problem of financial mismanagement and lack of financial control within the Government of Canada. It is important to reiterate that this did not happen overnight. It has been a continuing cancer that has developed over the years. The fact is that the government was reminded of this. The former Auditor General, Mr. Maxwell Henderson, pointed out in his reports to the House of Commons time and time again the abuses of this government, its contraventions of the Financial Administration Act, its misappropriation of funds, and the fact that value was not being received for the dollars spent.

The government did not heed that advice and looked upon Mr. Henderson as an enemy of the government. Because the government refused to heed his warnings we now find ourselves in a situation, referred to by the Auditor General in his 1976 report in very categorical terms, where the government and, indeed, parliament, have lost effective control of the public purse in Canada. This bullheadedness on the part of this government, and its easy-come easy-go philosophy, can best be indicated by the fact it is absolutely and inherently incompetent, looking upon the expenditures of funds in a manner that will enhance its own political opportunities rather than having regard for the over-all interests of Canada.

There can be no doubt in anybody's mind that spending has gotten out of control and that parliament has lost control. This government has lost control. Neither parliament nor the government has the desired wherewithall to check on the extravagances and wastes of many of those spending programs funded by the government. This is even worse when you have a government that, because of the change in our rules and our current mechanism, is not held accountable to parliament and thereby accountable to the taxpayers of Canada.

With this situation we will continue to have this kind of waste, misallocation of funds, and extravagance of which we have seen too much in the past. We will continue to have a government that is more determined to save itself politically than to impose sound financial management control measures on the public purse; a government whose primary objective is to remain in power at any or all expense to the taxpayer. Surely that kind of government is not in the best interests of the country or its taxpayers.

We have such a situation at this time going into an election year. We noticed the same situation in 1972 and during the period preceding the 1974 election. This is a government committed and dedicated to spending its way into power. It is buying your support and mine, Mr. Speaker, with our tax dollars.

All hon. members of this House are concerned that parliament is no longer an effective check or watchdog on the expenditure of public funds in this country. We have talked often about revising the form of estimates; we have talked often about ways and means of improving the way estimates are dealt with in committee; and we have talked about reform of the committee system so there can be a more effective examination and analysis of the spending programs of government. We have seen an increase in the frequency of the use of one dollar vote items, a use that I think is a definite abuse of the parliamentary system. Surely if we are to bring control of the expenditures back where it rightfully belongs, we must seriously come to grips with this situation.

I was taking part in an agricultural committee meeting the other day examining supplementary estimates. Incidentally, those estimates are deemed to have been passed sometime today whether or not we have considered them. If we have a day or two to consider the estimates that is fine, but if not they are deemed to have been passed. During that committee meeting of about an hour and a half I had the opportunity of questioning the minister for five minutes. I asked two questions, which probably consumed a minute or less of the time, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) probably used ten minutes to respond. I suggest this is a farce.

First of all, we do not have the kind of background information necessary to an explanation of the objective of the expenditure. More important, hon. members do not have an opportunity to ask for and obtain such an explanation. Unless that changes, parliament will continue to deteriorate.

● (1422)

The rules being what they are today, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) indicated, the opportunity for bringing the estimates to the House of Commons where a minister is put on the carpet, is held accountable, and must defend his spending program, while it exists in some sense, it is not sufficient to do the job effectively. So we as members of parliament are having the finger pointed at us because we are responsible for ensuring that the interests of the taxpayer are being protected, but we do not have the opportunity to protect them because of the mechanisms.

Unless there is a more effective way of policing the government's spending habits, we will continue to experience a decline in confidence in this institution, we will continue to see a growing proliferation of Crown corporations and agencies which do not have to come back to this institution for approval, we will see the government of the day become increasingly less responsible and therefore less accountable to the taxpayers of Canada, the electorate of Canada. Without those checks and balances in place, the door is open for this kind of waste, extravagance, and misappropriation of funds.

On the question of Crown corporations, just recently we have been asked to write off a debt for the CNR amounting to $808 million. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) suggested it was merely a little technical bill, a housekeeping matter which should not be the subject of much debate. We intend to debate that issue, we intend to call witnesses before the committee and to call the Auditor General to see what he thinks about writing off $808 million of taxpayers' money. Also every time we misuse the dollar items, we circumvent parliamentary authority, and this is wrong in terms of the responsibilities and traditions of parliament to provide for the collection and distribution of funds and the responsibility of passing laws.

When I came to the House some ten years ago, total government expenditure was something in the order of $9 billion. Today it approaches some $49 billion, and by the time all the supplementary estimates are passed, it will be probably $50 billion.

Two things concern me very much, as I am sure they concern other hon. members and the people of Canada in particular. First, I am concerned about the magnitude, the massive amount of money that we are talking about, and second, I am concerned about the appropriation of these funds, the priorities and purposes for which the government has seen fit to allocate these sums of money. It seems to me that over the past ten years we have been on a spending spree. Perhaps I could describe it this way. We have been on a cultural, sociological, and linguistic binge, engaging in many political programs. We have engaged in the dramatic growth of government, but the priorities of strengthening the economic base of this country and creating an environment where the individual can become more enterprising and innovative have been cast aside.

A recent article in the Financial Times of June 27, 1977, indicates that 40 per cent of Canadian voters are now on the government payroll. That includes people who are working for the various Crown corporations, for the government, retired public servants, war pensioners, those who receive unemployment insurance benefits, old age pensioners, and so on. It has become a very significant issue.

We have failed in our ability to strengthen the economic infrastructure of this country and, as a result, have not inspired individual incentive. This has not served the best interest of national unity as well. I look at some of the programs on which we have spent money, for example, on Canada Council grants. This is why I am sure the government of the day has lost control, and I am sure it is not very proud of some of the programs funded under the Canada Council. One example is of $170,000 to study air breathing fish of the Amazon river, or $4,280 spent on a study to determine what people do with themselves when they have nothing to do, or $15,000 spent on an evaluation of interview techniques and data in the 1971 census of the Kingdom of Morocco. Many taxpayers are getting tired of that kind of foolishness.

As I said, in 1968 government expenditures amounted to $9 billion; today they are $50 billion. In 1968 we had a 4-cent postage stamp and the mail was delivered; today we are paying 14 cents for postage stamps and mail is not being delivered. It is those kinds of things that are irritating and bothersome to the Canadian people. As I said before, this has not served the best economic interests of this country, nor has it served the individual interests in society or the best interests of national unity. Remember it was in 1968 as well that the theme of the election campaign was national unity and the redressing of regional economic disparities. What have we today? Look at the money we have spent. The money has been misspent, and that is why many Canadians are irate and outright angry.

Look at what has happened to some of the basic industries like agriculture and the fishing industry. We all know the experiences of the livestock industry in the last few years. What has happened to the agricultural industry? In the last five years the net farm debt has increased from $4.3 billion to $8.5 billion. The Minister of Agriculture has said that farmers have never had it so good. If they have it good today, it is only because they have borrowed themselves into that position. What have we done to improve our capability in the area of processing agricultural and fishery products? We have done little or nothing, certainly not enough, and what we have appropriated for these important basic industries in Canada has been nothing more than promises.

The other day we had a debate in the House on the question of science and technology, research and development. There is no question in anybody's mind that the stability and strength of any economy are based upon the ability to research and develop new methods of technology. We have failed miserably in that regard. We all remember the election campaign of 1974 and the lofty promises made at that time. We remember those particularly with respect to transportation. We were told we would have a complete restructuring of the ports and harbours in this country; we were going to do away with all the freight rate inequities and anomalies, and we were going to engage in a very aggressive urban transportation program, which has since been scrapped.

The promise was that the total grain handling system from the granary to the ships and harbours would be revamped and new systems introduced. What do we have today? We have two dozen ships waiting in the port of Vancouver. We cannot move our grain. The cost of that failure is coming out of the pockets of producers, the farmers of Canada. It is costing millions of dollars, and the government is spending money on stupid trash like a study of air breathing fish in the Amazon River. There must be some dramatic changes in this country. The government has failed miserably to direct attention to the basic, gut issues of this country. The philosophical approach which it has used has certainly not augured well for the average Canadian citizen.

I could go on about transportation and economic development, particularly as it relates to western Canada, because there is much to be done. We do not need any more studies or hearings. The issues have all been very well thrashed out. The recommendations are very clear. The government says it agrees, but it does nothing. Of the 92 recommendations in the Hall report only six have been acted upon. It is no wonder that the Science Council of Canada had this to say about Canadian industrial prospects, and I quote from a document entitled "Uncertain Prospects" published by the Science Council of Canada, with regard to the Canadian manufacturing industry from 1971 to 1977:

> Canadian industry is chronically and gravely ill. Indeed, the country, industrially, is rapidly falling behind other nations, and, by default, placing its hopes for the future on a resource sector, which, in its present form, is inadequate to the task of raising or even maintaining the standard of living which most Canadians take for granted.

Is it any wonder that we are given that damning indictment? The Canadian dollar is at its lowest value in 45 years. We have the highest rate of unemployment since the depression. Inflation is running at 9.5 per cent to 10 per cent. One can only conclude that this has to be the worst government we have had since Confederation. The excessive growth of government and the attitude of this particular government have affected the lives and welfare of all Canadians. They have stymied our attempts to occupy our rightful place in the industrialized world.

Mr. Speaker, I know you have allowed me latitude to talk about these matters, but we are dealing here with government expenditures and the manner in which money is being spent or misspent. Having recognized the fact that it is in serious trouble in terms of its ability to control and manage the financial affairs of this country, the government has finally heeded the advice of the Auditor General and introduced a bill which will create the position of comptroller general. However, there is much more to be done, and we should not be falsely led into the belief that this will be a cure-all.

We must look for example at means of establishing appropriate incentives for those engaged in the Public Service to operate efficiently. We have to look seriously at the senior echelon of the bureaucracy and make it more accountable for its actions. When we are talking about $48 billion to $50 billion of government expenditures in a year, that boils down to a little less than $200 million per constituency, and we must ask ourselves what our constituencies are getting for that amount of money. I think we have an excellent public service, but there must be instilled within the minds of public servants the importance of discharging their responsibilities with pride, excellence, and efficiency. I hope the comptroller general will address himself to that because efficiency is of paramount importance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the House, and I shall not abuse it. Perhaps the most important role of government is the allocation of human and financial resources in the most effective and equitable manner possible, having due regard to the national goals and the economic and regional realities of the time. This requires not only a competent public service but also a competent government and a competent mechanism in parliament wherein checks and balances can be firmly in place and effectively utilized.

We cannot expect our public servants to behave responsibly if the government of the day does not behave responsibly. If the government is not held accountable to parliament and thereby to the people of Canada, it is quite logical that public servants will not be held accountable either. That is precisely the dilemma we are in now. I hope that in the days and months ahead this matter will be taken more seriously. Like the Auditor General, I feel profoundly that public funds are in effect trust funds and must be treated accordingly. Financial controls and safeguards for trust funds in the public sector should be at least as effective, reliable, and strong as they are in the private sector. If we who share the responsibility for the control of the public purse do not take this seriously, we are somewhat derelict in our duty.

The appointment of a comptroller general is but one step toward achieving our goal. Far from being the total answer, it is a step in the right direction, but there must be a major shift in attitude, and that shift must begin with the government. We have much to do in this very important area, and unless we address ourselves to this problem and take remedial action soon, our system of government and public confidence in it will continue to wane and will continue to be in jeopardy. If we should continue that downhill slide, we would soon find that freedom and democracy as we know them would be increasingly undermined and perhaps destroyed.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I will not take too much of the time of the House on this matter, but as a former chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and, as a matter of fact, as the chairman of the committee at the time when the first draft of this bill saw the light of day, I feel I should bore the House for a few moments by attempting to give my interpretation of the bill.

My attitude toward the bill has been forcefully and succinctly expressed by others—approval for it and disappointment with it. There is approval because obviously there has been waste and extravagance by this government. With the growth of government in the western world, and especially the growth in Canada at the municipal and provincial government levels, there is state involvement in many things that used to be considered the exclusive jurisdiction of the private individual or the private sector. This has led expenditures by the state to multiply alarmingly over the last few years.

When the Prime Minister took office the total expenditure of the federal government was about $9.5 billion. It is more than coincidental that for the fiscal year now ending, the federal government's deficit is also approximately $9.5 billion. I do not make that comment in a partisan way, but merely to indicate the swollen financial transactions of government in general.

I do not believe that provincial governments have increased their revenues and expenditures at the same rate as the federal government nor do I believe that municipal governments have done so. Members on both sides of the House have been worried that our accounting and control of government spending have not kept pace with the increase. For years the public accounts committee, a non-partisan all-party body, has spent thousands of man-hours trying to rectify spending abuses of the government of the day. It has issued voluminous reports and there has been a general attempt to rectify some of the glaring omissions that exist in the supervision and control of the financial accounts of the federal government. In some cases our voice has been heard, but in many cases it has not. Sometimes we have had the ear of the public because of the financial scandals uncovered. These are not always uncovered by the committee but often by that watchdog of the public purse, the Auditor General.

It is the job of the Auditor General to ferret out and expose extravagance in the financial wasteland. It is the job of the public accounts committee to investigate the charges and report to the House on the veracity or otherwise of those charges. Since I came here in 1972 there have been very few occasions when serious charges made by the Auditor General have been investigated by the all-party, impartial public accounts committee and not found to be true. Sometimes they have been under emphasized and perhaps even underestimated, according to the work of successive public accounts committees.

The general theme running through the reports of the public accounts committee until two years ago was that some office, some body, some institution, agency or individual, should be inserted into the system to check expenditures before they are made. The Auditor General and the public accounts committee can only criticize and publicize after the event. What was required was not another watchdog but someone who could pre-audit, not post-audit—somebody with power to put the lid on proposed extravagances. Members of the public accounts committee came to the conclusion over the years that there should be a comptroller general, as there is in other parliaments and legislatures in the Commonwealth and in countries in the western world. There should be someone—an impartial but all powerful figure—to examine proposals before expenditures were made in order to avoid gross errors.

The matter came to a head in the report of the Auditor General to the House two years ago. As a result of valid criticisms, made both in the report of the public accounts committee and the report of the Auditor General, things started to stir on the government benches. Certain proposals were presented by the Auditor General to the then President of the Treasury Board and the present minister which resulted in the bill now before the House. If the bill goes through, we will have a comptroller general.

I know of no reason why the bill should not go through. From that point of view I am quite elated about the bill and its provisions but I am disappointed because it is a compromise. In a way it is a rather weak-kneed compromise. I do not want to use the word cowardly because the final negotiations resulted in a compromise by those of us who believed that we should have an individual to perform that type of pre-audit function. We are not so sure that we will get it, which is the problem at the moment.

As an ex-chairman of the public accounts committee my view is that the appointment of a comptroller general which is envisaged by this bill is better than no comptroller general at all. I make no secret of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that some of us are disappointed in that we do not know what the functions of this person and agency will be. We do not know what staff he will have; we do not know what his powers will be. We do not know whether we are being conned by a government, which has a great facility for public relations measures. Sometimes that is all it is, a public relations facade which is imposed upon the Canadian public. We are not skeptical by any means. I am glad that we will have a comptroller general. However, I wish this bill had some meat to it. We have the bones,—the skeleton is there.

We have a person who will be called a comptroller general. I hope he will have the power, authority and the function of a comptroller general as that office is understood throughout the western world and in some of the other Commonwealth democracies. In other countries that person is an independent person. In some cases that person reports, as does the Auditor General, directly to the legislature or to the parliament—directly to the House of Commons. The comptroller general in Canada will not do that.

In some of the other jurisdictions the comptroller general is an all-powerful individual. If he knows that something is clearly going wrong he has the power to stop it. As far as we know the Canadian comptroller general will not have that power. In other jurisdictions the comptroller general has a skilled and extensive staff of investigators and auditors. As far as we know this comptroller general will not have that type of staff or facility available to him. But certainly half a loaf is better than none.

I would have suspected that this government has had enough of financial scandals. For their political survival it is about time that our political masters on the other side of the House realize the growing awareness Canadians have that this government is unwise in many of its spending practices and that the control and supervision of these expenditures have reached an almost scandalous stage.

I am sure every member of this House receives at least two calls per day from constituents and sometimes three or more, not per week, not per month but per day. They may complain about something else which involves large expenditures of taxpayers' money by this government or that an expenditure has not been properly explained or is being improperly carried out. Just this morning I had complaints concerning two brand new offices which have been set up without my knowledge in my riding. I had to read about them in the newspaper. These offices are under the aegis of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, a CCC office, which is a conservation control office of some type or another. One office was set up in the town of Bowmanville and another office was set up in Cobourg, both in my constituency.

Both of these are new offices and new functions under the FLIP program. Each office has a budget for the next couple of months of $49,000. The genuine concern of my constituents when they phoned me was stated in terms such as, "What in heaven's name is this that is now coming along and is spending this money?" I will be frank that until I read about this matter in the newspaper I had never even heard of it. I had to get busy and do some research.

The FLIP program, and I am not trying to be flippant about it but that is what it is called, the FLIP program is supposed to be another one of these ad hoc make-work programs over the next few months. The Government of Canada is spending $150 million of your dollars and my dollars on this type of program. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources alone is spending about $50 million of that. A letter which I received from the minister obviously indicates neither he nor his department know the extent of the offices or the amount of money being spent in the riding. Maybe the program will be a good one. But I am skeptical and I have my doubts. We should have someone other than empire builders that exist in the bureaucracy in this country to take a good hard look at this matter, not necessarily from the point of view of the merits or demerits of the program, but to plan ahead how money should be spent.

Once the government has made a decision to go ahead with a plan, the actual method and procedure of hiring people and the spending of the money should be explained first. Canadians would then know whether their money was being genuinely spent on their behalf. We have no such guarantee. I am continually skeptical about what is happening here and I believe my constituents are too. It has been proven time and time again that there is too much waste, too much extravagance, and too much expense. Their money is being thrown around.

For the political survival of the government it seems to me that it would want an independent, powerful individual or institution interposed into the spending procedures of this government who could report to this House. In the long run it would make for better government. It would provide an assurance to the people that plans to spend their money are more wisely devised. It would help members of parliament to be re-elected. I do not think Canadians are that cynical that they do not reward good government. But they will throw their representatives out when there is bad government. A measure of that type would be a good move toward good government, but we simply do not have it.

● (1502)

I welcome the bill. I welcome the office. I welcome the individual. He will certainly have the full support of members on this side of the House in his efforts. No matter what those efforts are, and no matter what the results of those efforts are, it has got to be better than we have now. So we just have to support the concept. I only wish there were some teeth in the bill. I only wish there was some authority to it. I only wish there had been some meaning to it. Perhaps some day soon we shall form a government which will put those powers and that authority into statutory form.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to speak here on Friday afternoon. The members who do stay may be few in number but their calibre is very high indeed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: As far as numbers are concerned, it is very like speaking to a group of Liberal supporters in the Crowfoot riding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I was very surprised to hear my good friend from Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) struggle desperately to find some good features about this bill. Only an hon. gentleman with a character like that of my hon. friend who manages to think kind and considerate thoughts, even sometimes about the government, would be able to find some good in a piece of legislation of this kind for the purposes to which it was being assigned in the discussions held in the public accounts committee and the comments made by the previous and the present Auditors General. Mr. Speaker, it is junk. It is nothing.

I understand that the gentleman who is being appointed to this position is a man of a very high calibre. I am glad in many ways but in some ways I am sorry because of the heartaches and frustrations he will have to undergo in trying to fulfil his high responsibilities in the way the public apparently expects of him. Just the other day we had a further example of the government's attitude toward spending. You know, Mr. Speaker, as you watch the leaves drift along the creek, you see which way the current is flowing. Anyway, it now seems that a rag, tag and bobtail bunch from the Treasury benches opposite have gone out to western Canada to engage in what is very obviously a political campaign.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has certainly laid down the foundation for this opinion, and he is known as the conscience of parliament. It is certain that western Canada, along with Canada as a whole, is in desperate need of leadership. I do not need to recite a litany of the problems which face us; we read about them in every paper, we hear about them in every radio broadcast and on each telecast. Here we find ministers and others going out to western Canada on an obvious political mission, though the campaign has not yet commenced, using government aircraft. I think it is a shocking thing. If that is an indication of the government's attitude toward public spending then Heaven help the poor comptroller general.

Recently I was given one or two hints about the way in which the government, and not only the government but principal civil servants, think. I was at a forum the other day dealing with an issue in which I am greatly interested with a distinguished member of the other place, and when the speeches had been made, one of those present rose to ask a question. He was distinguished in appearance and no doubt he was quite sincere. I suppose what he said was in the nature of a statement rather than a question. He said: "Mr. Baldwin, on this question of information and what the government spends and what it does and how it operates, the trouble with this country is that people like members of parliament and those who work in the media persist in challenging and questioning decisions made by the government and by the very distinguished and very wise and very efficient professional people who run the country. That is why we are in trouble today."

We are in trouble today, Mr. Speaker, precisely because decisions of the government are not effectively challenged. We should have had a comptroller general for years with the power and authority which we believe should be assigned to him. For years the Auditor General sought desperately to secure the authority he needed while ministers opposite went on spending and taxing, spending and taxing, until they drove the poor people of this country into a state of near desperation. That is an attitude which comes right from the top—it comes right from numero uno and goes all the way down.

I put that statement back to back against another statement made in the same place a few months ago when another gentleman, unknown to me but obviously from the public service, said: "Mr. Baldwin, I am very much in sympathy with your views, with your insistence that the government should try to curb expenditures and let the country know what it is doing and why. I want to tell you that in many cases spending programs of one kind or another are in force even before ministers know about them and most of the highly placed members of the public service think parliament is simply an impediment to the operation of this country."

Mrs. Sauvé: So long as we don't, that's okay.

Mr. Baldwin: Don't be too sure of that. The principle of ministerial responsibility to which the hon. lady is possibly referring is dying. I doubt whether it exists for us any more. Today, ministers do not know one per cent of what goes on in their departments. They only know what their senior advisers think it is safe to tell them. They only act as advocates. They only present a departmental brief. They are allowed to appear before committees once in a while. They are allowed to go across the country and they are propped up with information and sent into the House of Commons occasionally to make a speech. This is the principle of ministerial irresponsibility upon which the government functions.

Mrs. Sauvé: I am shocked to hear you say that.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. lady says she is shocked but the smile she gives me indicates she is not really shocked. She probably believes me. I am going to give her credit because I have a great deal of respect for her. I think she wishes things were otherwise. I think she wishes she belonged to a government—it would have to be a Conservative government—which believes in the principle of ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I might enlighten the hon. member. In the case of the hon. minister to whom he has just been directing his remarks, I can assure him that what he says is not the case. She does know, and makes a point of knowing, exactly what is going on in her department and reports are made to her regularly and faithfully by the public servants the hon. member talks about.

Mr. Baldwin: I will simply say that the hon. member's comment establishes the fact that those who are victims of the principle of ministerial irresponsibility have gone up in number by 100 per cent in the last two minutes.

I should like now to give the House some background with respect to the measure before us—it is all related to the reason for my believing this is not good legislation. Political parties, in particular the government party, have engaged in the last few years in a form of competition for votes which has caused the expectations of the public to escalate to a stage which has overloaded our economy.

● (1512)

No better proof of that—and this directly relates to this bill and what powers could and should exist—is all the great programs, spending and otherwise, of the last 20 or 25 years. In each and every case those programs were brought in accompanied by statements as to their estimated cost and their public benefit which was either outright deception, gross exaggeration or negligence.

Examine today the cost of those programs. They have been exceeded to such an extent that, like a power plant, our economy has become overloaded. I do not say anything of the value of the programs, but it may be that if their true cost had been indicated at the time, this House and the public of Canada might well have said that they were good programs and, despite the cost, we would accept them.

These programs have been augmented one after another. The result is that today, with the electorate having been persuaded they will benefit to a point the economy is incapable of attaining, they have never been told there are limits on the capacity of the government to control economic forces. Now it has become crystal clear that the aggregate of all the good things promised cannot be delivered without penalties: inflation, unemployment, deficit balance of payments and the sagging dollar. This explains the outrage, anger and cynicism which exists all over this country.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted this at a very interesting event, known as the great Liberal party, which was held here. I attach the "great" to the party. The Prime Minister admitted there was a lack of confidence and attempted to talk it down. This government cannot talk it down. They are not the solution, they are the problem; there is no question about it.

I do not care what wise decisions are made, whether it be to bring in a comptroller general with proper powers or to bring in programs to deal with inflation and unemployment, the public will not accept them because they do not believe what this government has to say. That is the problem. If you do not trust the doctor, you will not take the medicine.

When you look at the tens of millions of individual decisions and thousands of corporate decisions which have to be made, you see they have to be made by people who will take steps to restore the economy. The economy will never be stimulated by a government of this kind with its record stretching behind it. It will be stimulated and we will make progress when the public once more believes in the processes of democratic government and in the reforms and proposals the government will make. Thank heavens we are coming close to an interesting period in our history following which that will be the case.

One problem area has been the issue of over-spending. I was chairman of the public accounts committee 15 years ago and we went through the same difficulty then. However, it has now been compounded because we are into the $50 billion bracket. Therefore, the mistakes, tragic errors and misjudgment of spending are exaggerated to the point where they create crises of confidence and crises of expenditure. This government does not have either the credit or the funds to do the job that needs to be done because of the facts I have stated.

After looking at reports of the Auditor General over the past 15 or 16 years, and even earlier if necessary, how can the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) expect us to believe that a statute of this kind will be effective to bring this under some form of control? There is just one way to control it, and that is to restore to this place the power and the authority it needs to challenge and scrutinize government expenditures. That means there ought to be backbenchers with intestinal fortitude and backbenchers with backbone on the other side who will stand up for the same things in which we believe.

I hope that when they go back and seek to persuade their electors that they should be returned to this House they will be prepared to answer the very pertinent and central question which goes to the core of our difficulties, namely: Why did you sit idly by and allow this government to get away with what it did? I am not talking about incompetence and matters on the periphery but about the basic issue of this government believing that it can spend and tax as though saving had gone out of fashion. That is the problem we face. This legislation will not cure it. It could be an ancillary or auxiliary aid for something else.

I have said this, members on this side have said it, our leader has said it and our previous leader has said it, and it has been part of our platform: Restore to this House the realistic right to challenge government. Make it come before us and our committees with full opportunity to challenge, scrutinize and examine, thus making them justify what they are doing. The right to govern is a trust. Like every trust there must be an accounting. There is no longer any accounting by government to this House for the expenditure of its funds.

Therefore, I am unhappy. I do not like this bill. I certainly will not vote for it. It could be all right if we knew what the powers would be and if it were accompanied by a real desire by the public of Canada to have restored to them, through this House, the right to make any government justify their expenditures, making them show what it has spent in the past and what it will spend in the future. That has been the purpose of parliament since the time of Simon de Montfort—the right of the public not to grant supply until all wrongs have been rectified. That has been taken away. The granting of money now has become a charade and a farce. Give us that power and we will then look at this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Before recognizing the parliamentary secretary, I must advise hon. members that when he speaks he will close the debate on second reading.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few minutes as I have already spoken in this debate. I listened to the speeches made on Bill C-10. By the number and the quality of the interventions by members of all parties, it is apparent there is agreement that we need the office of comptroller general of Canada. We may not agree on how this office should be set up or the methods and procedures that the person filling this office should follow. However, if this bill is adopted and sent to committee this afternoon, there will be further opportunity to debate these points. Hon. members will again be invited to state their points.

I trust the bill will receive speedy passage in committee and be returned to the House for third reading. The underlying principle is accepted by all members. This office has been needed for some time. We must now do everything possible to ensure that the person already appointed to the position is given the opportunity to get to work as soon as possible on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada.

Members of all parties have shown through their speeches that they are concerned about public spending. The government is showing its concern by the recent announcements of many changes being made in an attempt to bring under control more and more the spending of the Canadian government, especially so in bringing forward this bill.

● (1522)

I should like to thank hon. members who have participated in this debate, and do so on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and myself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next item of business and because, I believe, a change has been made in respect of the order of business for Monday, I wonder if the appropriate announcement could be made. In asking for that I hope my hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister, will not mind if I put the question to the Acting Prime Minister. I do that quite frankly, sir, so I can establish the fact that the reason things are so peaceful and orderly here this afternoon is that the Minister of Communications is the Acting Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If we are obliged to have the Liberals in power it would be a lot better if she continued to be number one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good words and his good wishes for my future, but I must remind him that I am not yet ready to assume such responsibilties; I am barely able to do so on an interim basis.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not!

Mrs. Sauvé: In reply to his question, we will consider Bill C-21 during the time left this afternoon. On Monday, if hon. members agree with me, we will proceed to Bill C-4 and Tuesday to Bill C-6, unless changes are made on Monday and that would be announced in the House.

TRANSFER OF OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING TREATIES ON TRANSFER OF PERSONS FOUND GUILTY OF CRIMINAL OFFENCES

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (for the Solicitor General) moved:

That Bill C-21, to implement treaties on the transfer of persons found guilty of criminal offences, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, for a moment I thought perhaps you were overcome by the friendliness being exhibited between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), and that we would get Bill C-21 into committee without so much as a single speech. That would be marvellous and I would be agreeable.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We wouldn't want to miss your speech.

An hon. Member: That left him speechless.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It's all right, it's Friday afternoon.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, for five years I have been sitting in this House on Friday afternoons and for the first time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has paid me a compliment. I do not know what to say to him.

On behalf of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) may I present the second reading of Bill C-21, which I hope will commend itself to the members of all parties in this House.

Essentially it consists of the legislation that is necessary in order to implement treaties allowing persons under sentence to be returned to the country of which they are citizens. Such treaties have been entered into with the United States and with Mexico, and we hope that similar treaties can be concluded with other countries. The treaties with the United States and Mexico are not yet effective and are awaiting ratification. This ratification cannot take place until this legislation has been enacted, enabling effect to be given to the terms of the treaties.

[Translation]

To understand the nature of this bill, I think it is necessary to keep in mind the general tenor of a number of treaties which Canada has signed, as well as some of their provisions. First of all, this bill is not in any way concerned with the extradition or expulsion of foreign nationals. On the contrary, a person could not be sent back to his country of origin unless he requested his own transfer. Under this bill, no one could be transferred against his will. The purpose of these treaties is to make it possible for prisoners who so desire to return to their country of origin to serve their time or obtain parole in a cultural surrounding which is familiar to them and which may favour their social readaptation. Those who have been found guilty of a criminal offence should have the opportunity, whenever possible, to serve their sentence or be paroled in a country where they have relatives and friends and where they can seek assistance. Humanitarianism and good sense favour this option.

[English]

The treaties do not, however, provide for the automatic transfer of any offender merely because he has expressed his wish to be returned to his own country. The application is first considered by the country in which he has been convicted, and unless that country approves of his transfer the matter is at an end. If that country agrees that the transfer is appropriate, then the country that would receive the offender is approached and its views are sought. It is only with the concurrence of all three parties, namely, the offender, the state in which he was convicted, and the country of his destination, that any transfer will take place. Additionally, so far as Canada is concerned, we will not return a prisoner convicted abroad to a provincial institution, nor will we send a person from a Canadian provincial institution to another country, unless we first have the consent of the provincial authorities.

[Translation]

I used words which might give the impression that the bill deals exclusively with people serving a jail term. Let me specify that the treaties and the bill also relate to individuals benefiting from parole in the country where they have been convicted and who wish to go back to their home country. It might be interesting to stress that the treaty on the international exchange of parolees is at the origin of the bill. During the Fifth United Nations Conference on Crime Prevention and the Treatment of Young Offenders held in Geneva in 1975, Canada raised the possibility of an international exchange of parolees. Other countries have welcomed our initiative and proposed that this arrangement be extended to persons under detention.

[English]

Turning now to the provisions of the bill being considered by the House, I should like to examine first the way in which it will apply to Canadians convicted abroad and being returned to Canada. The bill has been drafted on the basis that so far as possible the offender who comes back to this country should be treated in the same fashion as if his conviction and sentence had been those of a Canadian court.

Certain specific provisions have obviously been necessary in addition to this general concept. For example, the bill provides that there shall be no appeal against, or other review of, the conviction and sentence imposed by the foreign state. Such a provision is in conformity with Canada's undertaking to this effect as set out in the treaties.

In reality, this provision in the treaties and in the bill is based upon the practicalities of the situation as well as upon the desire of sovereign states that their judicial proceedings shall not be challenged in another country. Certainly it will not be practical for a Canadian transferred, for example, from Mexico, to have our courts adjudicate upon a contention by him that evidence was admitted that would not have been admissible in Canada. The complications inherent in this or any similar proceeding will at once be apparent.

[Translation]

One of the legislation's provisions deals with the place of imprisonment for a patriated Canadian offender. In that case, the regular rule prevails: when the initial sentence is for two years or more, and there is no parole involved, the offender will be detained in a penitentiary. When the sentence is for less than two years, he will be detained in a provincial prison subject as I said, to the province's consent before the transfer. Upon the arrival of the offender in the establishment, the authorities will have to decide on the time to be served. There are three considerations involved, each one being provided for in the legislation. First, how much time will he be credited with toward the completion of his sentence? Second, will he also be eligible to earn remission? And finally, when will he be eligible for parole?

[English]

The first of these considerations has been dealt with fairly simply by providing that, upon reception at the institution, the inmate is to be credited toward completion of his sentence with all time that stood to his credit in the foreign state at the time of his transfer. The documents supplied by the foreign state will set this out. This is believed to be the only equitable way of proceeding, since the sentences imposed by the foreign court are presumably determined in part by the credits which accrue to the offender.

For example, in the United States legislation to implement these treaties, the offender returned to that country is to be given credit for all time in custody, including time in custody before conviction. This apparently reflects the practice obtaining in most of the individual states of the union. Accordingly, when a person has been sentenced in the United States, it is reasonable to assume that the length of sentence has been set by the judge on the grounds that such credit will be extended. It would not be proper to delete any portion of that credit if the person is transferred to Canada to serve the remainder of his sentence.

The second factor, namely, the right to earned remission, has been provided for by making the offender eligible to earn remission at the same rate as a Canadian offender newly committed upon a sentence of imprisonment. In order to preserve a proper sanction against institutional misconduct, and to avoid any question as to the legality of forfeiting certain time credited by the foreign state, the bill makes remission and its equivalent credited on transfer subject to forfeiture as if the credits had been granted under Canadian law.

That brings me to the third factor, namely, eligibility for parole. This has posed some difficult problems. It has not been possible to prescribe exactly the date of eligibility for parole, but a general rule has been formulated which will take care of the vast majority of cases. This is to require the National Parole Board to determine, as nearly as it can, when the person would have been eligible for parole had the sentence been imposed in Canada. That will then be his eligibility date.

This does not, however, enable a date to be fixed for those Canadians who—in very rare instances—have been convicted abroad of murder and who wish to return to Canada. Had such an offence been committed here, the minimum period to be served before parole could even be considered would vary. For murderers governed by the latest legislation, eligibility for parole consideration would occur, if the murder were second degree murder, at from ten to 25 years, depending on the view the judge took on the case. If the murder were categorized as first degree, the period of initial ineligibility for parole would be 25 years. In either case, whether first or second degree murder, any inmate with more than 15 years of parole in eligibility would be able, after 15 years, to apply to a court to shorten such period.

[Translation]

Obviously, it is impossible to draw a perfect parallel. For example, a Canadian court could not examine thoroughly the case of an inmate whose offense is described in the files of a foreign court; it would also be impossible to know what decision a foreign court would have rendered had it studied the question of eligibility for parole. By way of compromise, the bill refuses to grant parole to murderers until they have served ten years of their sentence. However, it provides for an exception when the documentation submitted by the foreign court establishes that if the crime had been committed in Canada, it would have rated as first degree murder. In such case, the duration of the ineligibility period for parole is extended to fifteen years. The inmate will be eligible for day parole and temporary leave without escort only when he is only three years away from eligibility to full parole, as is the case with Canadian convicted murderers.

In the case of persons convicted of murder abroad who are later transferred to Canada, there is one aspect of eligibility for parole that is a source of difficulty. It is the categorization of murders committed abroad between first or second degree murders. The legislation charges the Solicitor General with this function. An examination of the various possibilities has not yet allowed us to find a better solution. It does not appear that a Canadian court could properly solve the issue. Further, under that clause a minister may, through an administrative measure, require that an inmate spend five more years in prison before he may be granted parole. At the time of the transfer an inmate may receive early examination, but possibly a better way of resolving the issue might be put forward when the legislation is scrutinized in committee.

[English]

Before leaving the provisions that govern the treatment of offenders under sentence who are returned to Canada, I should say a few words about juvenile offenders. Any young person returned to Canada and sent to a provincial institution may be transferred to a suitable facility for juvenile delinquents, if he is within the juvenile age range at which young persons are considered to be juveniles in that province. He could not, however, be held in that juvenile institution beyond the date the foreign sentence would expire, unless of course further legal measures were taken, for example, under the provincial act for the protection of children.

Let me now turn briefly to the provisions of the bill that relate to persons returning to Canada on parole or probation. They will be equated, so far as possible, to Canadians paroled or put on probation in Canada. If paroled, they will be subject to supervision and to sanctions for breach of parole conditions. Those on probation will, when necessary, be dealt with for a breach of the terms of the probation order, except that they will not be liable to a sentence for the original offence for which they were put on probation.

There must also be provision, of course, for foreign nationals who are to be transferred from Canadian institutions to their own country. The bill does not contain many clauses dealing with them, since all that is really necessary is to provide the authority for their release from incarceration and transfer, or their transfer while on parole or probation. After transfer has been effected, they will be dealt with in accordance with the law of the state to which they go.

[Translation]

I hope the bill goes through as fast as possible. The United States and Mexico, in addition to the treaty with Canada, have signed a treaty between themselves, and they already exchange prisoners. They can do the same with Canada when treaties are ratified. Most recent statistics show that 90 Canadians are doing prison terms in the United States and nine Canadians are doing time in Mexico. There are 102 Americans in provincial prisons in Canada and 172 in federal penitentiaries. One Mexican is doing time in Canada. The more the passing of the bill is delayed, the longer prisoners abroad will have to wait for repatriation. A number of them, together with their parents and friends here in Canada, no doubt are awaiting the outcome with the utmost interest. This is just the more understandable because, as has been recognized for a long time, penal sanctions are particularly brutal when suffered in a foreign land, and the effect is heavier than expected by the court.

[English]

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 deals with the implementation of international treaties signed with the United States and Mexico wherein U.S. and Mexican nationals who have been charged, convicted and sentenced in Canada may, under certain circumstances, serve their sentence in their home country; and similarly, Canadians who have gone through the same unhappy experience in either the U.S. or Mexico may, presuming they comply with the provisions of the legislation and the treaty, serve their sentence in Canada.

May I assure the House, first of all, that we in the official opposition want to give speedy passage to this bill, not only at the second reading stage but, more important, at the committee stage. We are in the rather awkward situation that the spending estimates have been referred to the committee and generally one does not interfere with the examination of those estimates to permit the examination of legislation such as this. May I suggest to the parliamentary secretary—I have not discussed this with my colleagues in the NDP or with any other member—that provision be made for special meetings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that we can come to grips with the legislation at the earliest possible date in order that it might come back to the House and be given eventual passage before the expected election.

I do not want to appear to be critical about this, but the treaty with the United States was signed over a year ago and the treaty with Mexico some three and a half months ago, although the agreement in principle with Mexico was arrived at last April. So I am not terribly impressed with the haste with which the government has dealt with this important piece of legislation.

Quite obviously, the reason for the legislation is our acceptance of the principle that a person who has been convicted might be better rehabilitated close to friends and relatives and in their natural home land. The other side of the situation is that we will be accepting foreign sentences.

Most members of parliament have had the experience from time to time of being contacted by constituents whose relatives, often sons or daughters, have been incarcerated in foreign jurisdictions or, at least, arrested before trial. We have all shared the agony of those particular families while their children might have been awaiting sentences or trials in situations which were not humane according to our views and traditions. I understand that this legislation cannot come to grips with that particular situation. I am not suggesting that it should or could; I merely point out that this legislation will not be the answer to all situations with which we as members of parliament are from time to time faced when we get frantic phone calls—and justifiably so—from parents or other relatives who have found that members of their families have been seized and imprisoned before their trials in foreign jurisdictions.

What we will become with this legislation is a penal agent for foreign jurisdictions and, as I see it, we have a conflict between our role as that penal agent for Mexico or the United States and certain rights which we enjoy here, many of which are embodied in our Bill of Rights. We will enforce under this legislation judgments arrived at by means which may be repugnant to us. It may be that a Canadian in Mexico or the United States has been deprived of counsel. He may have been convicted and sentenced without due process. He may be sentenced to serve a term which goes far beyond anything we would find acceptable, according to our traditions. That individual may have been deprived of one of our basic rights embodied in section 1 of the Bill of Rights; that is, the right of the individual to liberty. In Canada that right may not be deprived except under due process of law. A Canadian may very well be deprived of exactly that due process, and we will accept persons in Canada who have been subjected, possibly, to what we would consider an arbitrary judicial process which would be unacceptable to us. Under this bill we have no real choice.

I want to emphasize this because inevitably there will be a situation where a Canadian imprisoned in Mexico will make application, Mexico and Canada will agree and that national will be returned to his homeland, at which point we will hear that he has been deprived of counsel, that he has been convicted without what we consider due process and that he has been sentenced to a term which flies in the face of what we consider to be justice. There will be a great deal of pressure, in the political sense, upon us to try to mitigate those very unhappy circumstances.

I have no answer except to say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blaker) that we are going to have to be very diligent in explaining to that national and perhaps to his family exactly the situation in which we find ourselves under this legislation. There are those of my colleagues in the House who have had very good and happy experiences with consular representatives and with representatives of our foreign service who have assisted in these serious situations where our constituents' relatives may have been incarcerated. There are those who have found that some of those representatives have not met the level of expertise and compassion we have expected. I suggest to the House that under this legislation we are going to have to be particularly diligent in ensuring that Canadian nationals incarcerated in foreign jurisdictions to whom this law may be applicable are told without equivocation what the situation is and that the Bill of Rights may have to be offended. However, we have no choice.

I think it is terribly important that Canadian nationals who are convicted and sentenced elsewhere and who apply for the provisions of this bill to apply to them be assisted so that we do not reap the undeserved benefits of headlines and television spectaculars about people who have been subjected to all kinds of things which are completely repugnant to us but which nevertheless under this legislation we must accept.

In fairness to the parliamentary secretary, I think I should say that there may be amendments, most of them of a technical nature, at the committee stage. The Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), his parliamentary secretary and his department would do the committee a great favour—because I think they know of a number of these technical amendments—if they would draft some amendments at the earliest possible date and make them available for study at the very first meeting of the committee considering this legislation. The parliamentary secretary is making a gesture which I think means "I agree" or "Je suis d'accord".

One point I would like to make on behalf of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is that the worst and most desperate offenders wind up at Millhaven. Those who have nothing more to lose are put into the special handling unit. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is naturally concerned because Millhaven is continually in a state of a certain amount of unrest. There are those who may have some reservations about our ability to handle people in this special handling unit. I file this one caveat which the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands has put to me with sincere concern. She wonders how much more pressure will be put on that particular institution.

I hope that at the committee stage departmental officials will be able to provide us with some statistical information, not just with respect to United States and Mexican nationals incarcerated here who may choose to avail themselves of the provisions of this legislation, but also Canadians in those two jurisdictions. In addition, I would like to have some information which is as detailed as is reasonably possible on Canadians who have been imprisoned in other jurisdictions. I think immediately of Italy, and I think also of Italian nationals who may be incarcerated here in Canada. I think also of the United Kingdom.

In terms of numbers I am not sure which country has the greatest number of visitors here in Canada who have gone afoul of the law and vice versa, but I hope a certain amount of that kind of information can be made available to the committee so that the committee can urge upon the Solicitor General, if it is deemed wise, that a certain amount of urgency be connected with coming to grips with treaties with certain other jurisdictions in addition to Mexico and the United States.

I would have liked to have taken a few more minutes on this legislation, but I am extremely anxious that we conclude it today. I am equally anxious that it gets into the committee, is studied diligently but expeditiously, and gets back into this House for passage. I look forward to hearing the remarks of the spokesman for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). I know he wants to address himself to the provisions of this bill before the time runs out.

In conclusion, we in the official opposition support this legislation. We have certain pertinent questions to put, and we will seek information in the committee. However, we urge that the matter be treated as a matter of some urgency by that committee, that the bill come back to the House and become law, so that it will not be lost in the ashes of the next election.

• (1552)

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself generally with the remarks of the two previous speakers. It is very unfortunate that when a piece of good legislation—as I think this is—is introduced by the government, the press will likely take no notice of it just because there does not happen to be any great conflict.

I might go further than the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) and say that, in order to expedite its passage, we might give consideration to putting the bill through in committee of the whole rather than submitting it to the standing committee. I have examined the bill, as I know the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot has, and I have not come up with any amendments that would assist in effecting what the bill seeks to accomplish.

I am as nervous as the hon. member that we might have an election any day and that this useful piece of legislation might die on the order paper. If that should happen, there are people in prisons all over the world who will be severely affected.

An hon. Member: Pass it now, then.

Mr. Leggatt: The House will have my co-operation if you want to move it into committee of the whole.

I want to deal, Mr. Speaker, with a couple of aspects of the bill. First, there is an assumption inherent in the remarks made today that Canadians abroad are generally mistreated if they violate the laws of the country they are in. I am tired of the tear-jerking stories in my local newspapers about British Columbians who go to Mexico and get into the drug trade and then complain about their mistreatment in Mexican jails.

I think most members will agree that members of parliament have a reasonably good record in protecting the rights of citizens, but when people visit a foreign country, surely they should obey the laws of that country. I am a little disturbed about the Canadian chauvinism that is constantly played up in the newspapers to the effect that a Canadian in a Mexican jail will be abused, but that in a Canadian jail everything is roses.

My friends on the parliamentary sub-committee who looked at pretty well every prison in Canada could warn those people who are living in Mexico that if they think they are coming back to a sort of heaven on earth in a Canadian maximum security prison, they have a surprise in store. We do not have anything to write home about in regard to our prison system and the way offenders are treated in our maximum security prisons.

In any event, we will receive applications from Canadian offenders abroad. I would like to see a more aggressive approach by the Department of External Affairs to expand the number of countries involved in the treaties. The schedule lists the United States and Mexico, and I am sure more countries are involved. It seems to me that the Department of External Affairs should take a message from the speed with which we are willing to pass this legislation and adopt it into the law and make sure that they have treaties with countries all over the world so that the exchanges can be effected.

I do not want to take a lot of the time of the House on this, Mr. Speaker. This party has no amendments to submit at this point and will co-operate in every way to achieve speedy passage of the bill so that offenders have a chance to have their families visit them in Canada. It seems to me that the major asset of the bill is that the chance of rehabilitation is perhaps a little better in Canada because of the family situation. If the bill goes to committee I hope we can expedite it there. I am sure the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot and I could agree on moving it through committee expeditiously.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, since it is almost four o'clock, I presume there is unanimous consent to proceed now with private members' business, and I would therefore request unanimous consent so we may move to notice of motion No. 5, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). I also call for unanimous consent to stand notice No. 4.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council recommend that we move to motion No. 5. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

FOOD

ADVISABILITY OF PROVIDING INTERNATIONAL AID

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing (a) international food aid at the annual level at least equal in nutritional value to the amount by which Canadians consume more than the world's average per capita protein diet (b) international agricultural development assistance at an annual level at least equal to the gross revenues accruing to Canada from the world arms trade and the vigorous advancement of these initiatives for adoption and implementation by the United Nations.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, much as I would appreciate seconding the hon. member's motion, I think the seconder is the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There will be a correction. The seconder of the motion is Mr. Roche.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak to this motion, which I assume is one of the more unique motions on the order paper for this session. It brings together the issue of food needs, domestic and global, as well as the growing concern of the world toward the problem of disarmament and the international arms trade.

I do not want to speak at great length this afternoon. First of all, I would not be permitted to under the rules; second, I think it is important that as many members as possible express their view on what I think is a linking of two of the critical issues that face us in the late 1970s. Members from all sides have heard a good deal about global famine and world food needs in the past few years. Our memories do not have to be very long to recall the important world food conference that took place in 1974, at a time of world preoccupation with famine and massive international food shortages.

The fact that we are raising this issue again seems more consistent with the long term concern for the world food issue than the present situation. I think it is best summed up in the September 1977 issue of The Economist in an article entitled "While the Wheat is High". If some hon. members have read that story or others like it over the past few months, they will realize that the food cycle has come around to the point where we now have overproduction, at least in terms of endangerment of the domestic markets of countries like our own that engage in fairly large sales of wheat abroad.

Obviously between 1972 and 1974 we were in the midst of a food crisis. Uprecedented declines in production reduced food stocks to perilously low levels and drew attention to underlying factors such as the removal of land from production in some developed countries and the growing food dependence of those countries least developed.

I recall this, Mr. Speaker, because it is important to realize that there has been a cyclical phenomenon here. For the past 20 or more years we have seen a kind of boom and bust psychology. From time to time the alarm signals would go up about the dangers of massive international food shortages. Undoubtedly in the early 1970s there were crop failures. There was a particular failure with respect to adequate feed grain requirements for the Soviet Union. The fact that the U.S.S.R. moved into the American market in 1972 in a major way, removing something like 12 million to 15 million tons of grain from the American market at such short notice caused the price to increase by some 300 per cent. Of course, it had a major impact both on the domestic consumer in developed countries as well as the developing countries themselves and their own purchasing power with respect to food aid requirements. That has often been referred to as "the great grain robbery" by the Soviet Union.

The long term situation, in spite of the major increases in production in the last year or so, does remain bleak. Current projections by the International Food Research Institute show that the food deficit in the least developed countries, as well as many developed countries, will continue to grow. By the last quarter of this century the deficit of the least developed countries will have reached proportions that neither food aid nor affordable imports will be able to satisfy, resulting in vastly increased starvation possibilities.

To avoid that particular situation it is important that we turn our attention to the possibility of action now. One of the most impressive things about this particular issue of The Economist is that while recognizing the rumours of famine and the fears of famine in the 1972 to 1974 period, now, some 34 months later, world food supply is in glut. While there is still a famine for those who are unable to get food, elsewhere there is a surplus supply. The danger they point to is the one best represented by the action of the United States President, Mr. Carter, who has already indicated that he wants a 20 per cent cut in acreage for 1978, and will probably ask for a 10 per cent cut in acreage under animal feed grains. As The Economist said, this policy is a pity. I agree with that. The article goes on to say:

> One of the policies recommended at Rome could now be becoming a good one. It was for the building of a large international reserve of grain. During a supposed famine this planned withholding of supplies from the starving would have been crazy, but during a period of temporary world food surpluses it becomes plausible. The best decision would be not to cut American wheat acreage in 1978 but to distribute food stamps (which have worked surprisingly well in the United States) to the poor of the world. These food stamps should not be usable only for buying American (or other foreign) grain, but should also be reimbursable when they come into the hands of local farmers when they have sold grain, including rice, locally.

I will not go further into the details suggested by The Economist, except to mention that obviously the time is ripe for us to take some concrete action toward an effective international food bank and grain reserve system. Members will know that there has been intense and increased interest in this possibility over the past few months, but to date no satisfactory progress has in fact been achieved. I suppose the problem is really politics. The dangers to producing countries are so great that the political will has not been sufficient yet to mount an effective reserve program.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

Without that political will there exists the temptation for processors to press for a cartel. Fears of this arose in January of last year when the new U.S. secretary of agriculture, Robert Bergland, initiated talks with our own officials. Since then these discussions have extended to other producers and have begun to include importing nations through the International Wheat Council. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, it is not just a question of establishing a food reserve system. We have to look at our own situation in Canada and see whether in the spirit of economy and conservation we are making satisfactory arrangements for our own food needs.

The reason that this particular motion has been phrased in the way it has is to emphasize the growing imbalance in terms of the consumption of both the renewable and non-renewable resources of this planet. It is quite shocking that 20 per cent of the world's population should consume and exploit 75 per cent of the world's resources. As Madam Gandhi at one point remarked, the developed countries produce 90 per cent of the world's garbage. Worse than that is the statistics for those who are in the poorest group. Some 60 per cent of the world's population are using only 10 to 12 per cent of the earth's resources. This imbalance continues to grow.

We know in our own country that food is wasted every day and is being consumed in the most expensive way possible. If this motion does nothing else, hopefully it will remind us that our number one problem is being responsible with respect to the tremendous resources that are produced and are available in this country, while two-thirds of the world's population goes to bed hungry every night. Our problems are best described by a sign which I saw in a medical clinic in Regina a few months ago. I believe this was a public health clinic which offered a variety of services to the people of Regina. At the top of the list the most prominent health service provided at this particular clinic was a weight reducing program. That is the problem we face today in Canada. It is not the problem of having sufficient or adequate food on a day to day basis, but of having it in such an amount that it is counterproductive to our own good health.

Another issue I wish to raise is the problem of disarmament. In going from the problem of food supply to arms expenditures one has the sensation of living in a mad world. I mean mad quite literally. The technical term used to describe the defence standoff relationship today between the Soviet Union and the United States is known as "mutual assured destruction". The three initials of the word spell MAD. Mutual assured destruction means that there is the nuclear capability in both countries to destroy the globe many times over.

A couple of years ago the international development subcommittee of this House, in looking at recommendations for the upcoming conference on trade aid development, said this:

> We are struck by the immensity of having to raise $5 billion for agricultural investment over the next several years until we recall that each year the world now spends about $300 billion in the purchase of weapons.

Actually that was understating it. Even at that time, according to the Peace Research Institute, in 1976 $334 billion was spent on military expenditures by the world community. This amounted to about two-fifths of the gross domestic product of all developing countries and some 25 times the amount spent by all the member countries of the OECD on official development assistance. It is estimated that some 400,000 scientists and engineers are engaged in weapons related research and that this accounts for two-fifths of total world research and development expenditures. In short, it is reasonable to conclude that we devote more intellectual effort and money to the problem of how to kill each other than to any other subject. Presumably this is why we are called homo sapiens, or "sap" for short. It seems we live in a world that is rational in small things and absolutely mad in major issues.

The lion's share of this expenditure is still spent by the wealthier countries, in particular the two super powers. Between 1957 and 1976, 80 per cent of the $5.5 trillion spent on military expenditure came out of NATO and Warsaw countries; and two-thirds of that was spent by the United States and the Soviet Union. By comparison, during that period the developing countries spent only 7 per cent of the total. One of the more depressing aspects of increasing military expenditures is that whereas in 1957 their share was only 4 per cent in global terms, by 1977 military expenditures in developing countries had risen to 18 per cent. The rate of increase of military expenditures by developing countries over the past decade was 10 per cent annually compared to the world average of a 3 per cent increase. Some types of development have obviously caught fire and development spending has increasingly meant defence spending.

This militarization of our global community has been accomplished in no small part through the international arms trade. In 1976, 95 countries imported major weapons systems. The development countries, in another manifestation of dependency, accounted for 75 per cent of total imports. The major suppliers were the United States, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and France, with the two superpowers again away out in front.

Canada is not just a minor player in this game and we should resist the temptation to heap scorn on other countries which engage in it. Since 1961 we have sold over $3 billion worth of arms internationally. On an annual basis, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce we sell $300 million worth of arms, not to mention nuclear sales which are increasingly questionable in terms of their totally peaceful utilization. Canada ranks about eighth or ninth among all countries of the world in terms of continuing arms sales.

Given the absurdity of this situation and the terror it spawns, one might have anticipated a more lively debate in most western countries. In fact, the silence has been deafening. Except for certain small groups, disarmament has been, to use Alva Myrdal's description, a dead issue. It seems to me there are two main reasons for this. Until recently the public has pretty much accepted the official line that massive strategic and conventional armaments are essential to peace. At the same time, the fact that no great war has directly threatened us seemed to render the system useful in providing us with a certain amount of protection. In the third world, the increasing arms expenditures express the tensions and instability of the countries concerned.

When we look at the situation in the developing countries we realize that in far too many of them the over-all degree of militarization is disturbing. Beset by difficulties and attracted by the apparent simplicity of militarism, one third world country after another has been taken over by the generals. Not surprisingly, one of the priorities of such governments is the expenditure of increasing sums of arms. I shall not put the figures on record this afternoon but I would recommend to hon. members the annual report "World Military and Social Expenditures" published each year by Ruth Leger Sivard which documents the case I have been making.

I have raised this motion because I hope the issue is coming to a crunch. Later this spring there is to be a special assembly of the United Nations to deal with the issue of disarmament. For the first time in the history of the United Nations a special assembly is to focus specifically on this issue. There have been a series of special UN sessions, for instance, on food, on water, on the law of the sea, on habitation, on the environment and so on. There have been two special sessions dealing with the international economic order.

It is interesting that dislocation of social priorities brought about by national arms expenditures has not so far been dealt with even though this has been seen as an increasingly urgent problem by the developing nations. Hon. members may recall that when the fifth conference of the heads of state of non-aligned countries met in Colombo in 1976 the communiqué stated:

> The conference believes the arms race is inconsistent with the efforts aimed at achieving a new international economic order in view of the urgent need to divert the resources utilized for the acceleration of the arms race toward socio-economic development, particularly in the developing countries.

Undoubtedly both developed and developing countries alike realize, to quote the words of Alva Myrdal from an excellent book called The Game of Disarmament, that all countries are now "buying greater and greater insecurity at higher and higher cost".

Steps must be taken now to deal with the number one issue which is distracting us from the opportunity to feed ourselves and provide ourselves with real security and a peaceful relationship both internally and between nations. There is growing concern in the world about the trend of rising military expenditures, about the vast human and technological resources which are now desperately needed for economic and social development but which are being spent on arms. Hopefully at this upcoming session of the UN the international community will attempt to halt this trend and agree on approaches and measures designed to initiate a real process of disarmament, not a counterproductive one such as has been discussed from time to time over the last 20 years.

One of the more interesting motions to be discussed will be put forward by the Scandinavian countries; it relates to disarmament and development. It is my hope that our own government, which is vitally concerned with these subjects, will, in addition to supporting the Scandinavian initiatives, make specific proposals of its own.

In conclusion, I wish to refer to the words of new volunteer groups in this country which are concerned with these issues, groups such as Project Ploughshare, an initiative of major Canadian churches, and the United Nations Association. They, too, in a recent pamphlet entitled A Time to Disarm recommend—and I whole-heartedly support this initiative—that the Canadian government in its statement should advocate a five-year program which would include financial support for public research into the problem of converting defence industries into civilian ones, the linking of development assistance policies with Canadian policies on disarmament, and collaboration with other countries embarking on studies linking disarmament with development. If we were to advocate a position of that kind we would contribute more substantially to the real needs of the world than is the case at present.

May I end by quoting Philip Noel-Baker, the 1959 Nobel Peace Laureate:

> There is really only one major problem for mankind and that is to demilitarize the governments and societies of the world. We must release the resources wasted on what is now called defence, when there is no defence, in order to solve our other problems.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, projections of world food supply and demand into 1985 indicate that food distribution between developed and developing countries will not correspond to needs. Food gaps, existing when domestic production and food imports are less than a country's total demand, will be most severe in the lowest-income developing countries. By 1985 the gap could be as wide as 100 million tonnes, yet total food aid pledges on a world basis are, at present, limited to ten million tonnes. The gap will disappear only when there are large increases in food production in the developing countries, for which there is potential, as well as better population control. Even so, the developing countries would still require substantial input for many years, a situation which might present an intolerable strain on the balance of payments of many nations.

There will be a continuing need for concessional transfers of food from developed countries complementary to other multilateral or bilateral assistance to help the developing nations to grow most, if not all, of the food they require. In the 1960s a major food aid objective was the directing of grain surpluses into channels which would not affect commercial markets. Gradually the emphasis switched to the delivery of food aid to multilateral organizations such as the World Food Program. By the 1970s the objectives of food aid policy were humanitarian and developmental in nature. Indeed, since 1974 all Canadian food grains directed to food aid, both multilateral and bilateral, could have been disposed of through commercial channels.

Food aid is an important part of Canadian development assistance. In times of drought, flood, famine, civil strike and general food shortages, food aid is indispensible to the livelihood and survival of millions in developing countries.

● (1622)

In 1975, some 462 million people, half of these children under five, were starving, according to United Nations Food and Agriculture organizations estimates. Since 1970, Canadian food aid to the third world has risen by over 19 per cent every year, to approximately $240 million, or about one quarter of all Canadian International Development Agency disbursements for fiscal year 1976-77.

In 1976-77, bilateral country-to-country food aid accounted for about 63 per cent of the total food aid program. Most of this was in the form of grain or grain equivalent, but substantial amounts of milk powder, beans, rapeseed oil, fish, egg powder and beef are also provided. Almost 80 per cent of that went to four Asiatic countries, namely India, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Sri Lanka.

During the same year, CIDA also provided $2 million in bilateral funds for international emergency relief assistance to 16 developing countries. The funds are given to the League of Red Cross Societies who offer medical and protective services, including food. When food is delivered to a developing country, Canada pays for the shipping costs. Most of the bilateral food aid is sold by the recipient government to its nationals. This is because the free distribution of food would disrupt internal production, creating a situation where food imports may be necessary indefinitely. The sale of food helps the recipient government generate funds for needed development projects.

Nearly 38 per cent or $89.1 million in food aid was offered multilaterally in 1976-77. Most of this went to the World Food Program. The remainder went to the UN Refugee and Works Agency and the United Nations Children's Fund. The World Food Program is the main focus of the UN's food aid activities, and it uses contributions from many national sources to organize projects that fall into three main categories: food for work projects, intended to help the recipient country improve its food production by offering food as a partial wage for workers engaged in development projects; vulnerable group feeding project, for children, nursing mothers, and the elderly; emergency relief projects, for victims of natural and civil disasters. For 1977-78, Canada pledged $150 million in food aid to the World Food Program, with an additional $50 million for 1978 should the need arise.

The food allocation, policy, and decision-making body of the World Food Program is the 30-member Committee of Food Aid Policies and Programs. Canada has been regularly elected as a member since the program's inception, and the newly elected Director General of the program is a Canadian.

In 1976-77, CIDA contributed over $35 million in matching grants to various Canadian and international non-governmental organizations. During that year, milk programs for the needy in third world countries were supported by six non-governmental organizations, including the Unitarian Service Committee, World Vision, Mennonite Central Committee, Canadian Lutheran World Relief, Cansave, and Food for the Hungry. CIDA contributed $500,000 in skim milk powder to these non-governmental organizations.

Following the 1974 World Food Conference that called for increased commitments to agricultural assistance and food aid by the donor nations, a federal-provincial program was set up to augment Canada's existing international efforts in this field. Under this program, donations may be made by provincial governments, Canadian non-governmental organizations, joint federal-provincial funding, private companies or individuals. The program is administered at CIDA. For example, during its first year of operation 600 tons of white beans were donated by a province for the relief of victims in the Sahel region of Africa, and 10,500 cases of baby food were donated to a children's hospital in Haiti by a major food processing firm.

The International Grains Arrangement was reached in 1967 and includes the Food Aid Convention. The Food Aid Convention aims to share more equitably the food aid burden among the developed International Grains Arrangement countries and to prevent food aid from interfering with normal commercial transactions. It is renewed annually and has a commitment of 4.2 million tonnes, of which Canada's share is 12 per cent.

The "Rome Pledge" covers the three fiscal years from 1975-76, and was undertaken at a time when Canada could sell all its food grains at top prices. It commits us to provide one million tonnes of food grains and $45 million worth of non-grain food, 20 per cent through multilateral channels. The ten million tonne international target has been reached, but there is less progress on the proposed forward planning of food aid. CIDA has been successful in placing its multilateral allocation, but since the Rome Pledge there has been a growing demand for non-grain foods due to unforeseen increases in the grain production of least developing countries, and CIDA has thus encountered difficulty in placing its bilateral cereal allocation. The Emergency Food Reserve has been established, to which Canada is committed to supply 10 per cent of a total 500,000 tonne food grain target. Money has been set aside in this year's budget to this end and, although no rules have been agreed upon, it is foreseen that there will be financial obligations in the future for replenishment.

With regard to the World Food Program, Canada has made a pledge for calendar year 1977 and 1978; the 1978 pledge is $50 million in grains, non-grain foods and cash. To the United Nations Refugees and Works Agency Canada has made a commitment of $2.5 million in food and $1.65 million in cash in 1978. Finally, there is Canada's statement to the June 1977 meeting of the World Food Council, committing itself to forward planning of food aid. Canada was also part of a consensus advising increased concessional aid, enlarging the proportion of grant basis food aid to least developing countries in serious economic difficulties, and the attainment of a minimum annual international food aid level of ten million tonnes of cereal in 1977-78.

One of the criticisms respecting CIDA and food aid programs is with regard to the benefit to Canadians in overall food production. During times of high unemployment, there are many people who say to members of parliament that we should take care of our own house before going abroad to assist others. I am afraid we have not done a very good job of salesmanship. We must point out to average Canadians that in many cases we are assisting countries which have a per capita income of less that $300 per year. There are very few people in this country with such a low standard of living. However, that is the case in many least developing countries.

Those who criticize the government of Canada for assisting countries in perilous economic straits would do well to look at the earnings of people there. They will find they are much lower than those of Canadians. The people of Canada must with good conscience determine that it is of the ultimate benefit to Canada to provide a stability throughout the world, raising the standard of living of those who have deplorably low standards of living. There are economic benefits for Canada. If we cannot sell this with moral persuasion, perhaps we can discuss some of the benefits that can accrue to Canada.

Food aid is not large in relation to over-all Canadian food production, but the impact of moving grain and non-grain commodities can be significant to producers. Food aid also complements Canadian agricultural and fisheries stabilization programs. The two most direct benefits are reductions in excess commodities inventories, and value-added benefits which result from the use of excess capacity in food-processing industries. The indirect effects on employment, regional development, trade development, marketing and pricing, technology, energy use, foreign exchange and transport utilization are indeed difficult to measure, but nevertheless they have to be taken into account.

With the increasing emphasis on food aid and the interest shown by the public in the subject, CIDA has decided to concentrate its various activities in food aid on one Food Aid Responsibility Centre, which will be located in the multilateral branch.

At the national food strategy consultation which took place in February 1978, the Working Group on marketing and food aid came up with five recommendations relative to food aid. First, food aid should be an integral part of our national food strategy. Canada should place more emphasis on developing the indigenous food development capability of developing countries. Canada should play a greater role in emergency relief. Canada should also play a major role in food aid given to a country, taking into account its nutritional requirements; and finally, a domestic food aid program should be introduced into the strategy.

● (1632)

I commend the hon. member who brought this motion before the House. We have worked over a period of several years both in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence as well as at the seventh special session of the United Nations. I think he and I and many other members of this House would agree that if we are to play a significant role in the world dealing with food for the less developed countries of this globe, we must somehow make the urgency known to those people who elect us to this House of Commons. I think it would be fair to say that many people across this country have no comprehension of the hunger, starvation and depravity that exists throughout the world.

I was talking about self-interest earlier. Surely it is in the self-interest of Canada to have a stable world populated by stable people who have a decent chance of living and a decent amount of food to satisfy their hunger.

The opposite, of course, is equally true. If we have a globe populated by people who do not have the basic necessities of life—food, clothing and shelter—are they not ripe for revolution, and are they not ripe to be taken over by groups of people who may not have their interests at heart but may use them as ploys in international world politics? If we as Canadians look at the global situation, we must come to the conclusion that if at least we are not humanitarians we should look after our own self-interest. That self-interest is to assist by means of increasing the agricultural expectations of other countries; that is, to grow their own grain and raise their own food and, in the meantime, provide a bridge until they are self-sufficient. I refer to a bridge by way of CIDA through food plans.

I trust that Canada does have that role to play. If we have nothing else but self-interest at heart, we should think of the tremendous good will Canada as a nation is able to achieve as a bridging agent, without asking that we have any concessions in these countries. We do not want to station troops in these various countries. We have no self-interest as far as territorial ambition is concerned. We have a role to play as a neutral party interested in the development of these countries. I cannot give the exact quotation, but if we throw bread upon the water, I wonder what will come back. I wonder if in the self-interest of Canada we should perhaps look at this more seriously. We should sell this message across Canada so that public opinion, instead of being, "My God, what is the government doing again, giving grain to Bangladesh or somebody else?" will be: "Yes, it is in our self-interest", regardless whether we are humanitarians.

If we cannot sell this concept on a humanitarian basis, perhaps we should sell it on a self-interest basis. But we have to sell it because, as someone once said, it is about one minute to midnight and we do not have much time left. We do not have the luxury of debating whether this is a good or a bad program. That time has passed. The time for action is certainly here, and that is why I commend the hon. member for bringing this subject forward in the House.

Coming from British Columbia I know it is not an easy subject to broach. Unfortunately, a member of the media in Vancouver—and since I have freedom of speech in the House of Commons I will mention the name of Mr. Murphy of CJOR—has done everything in his power to hinder everything that has been done by CIDA. To go to Vancouver at this particular time and discuss CIDA is almost to have a lynch mob after you, because there are groups of people in Canada, such a CJOR's Mr. Ed Murphy, who have done everything possible to foment hatred—and I use the word "hatred" against Canadian aid programs, using the most least plausible reason. If anything ever goes wrong, they tell you about that wrong in respect of these programs. Mr. Murphy has brought these wrongs to the attention of the people in that area.

That does not represent a balanced view because he is not giving the other side of the coin—the good these programs have done. All of us know it is difficult to operate these programs in areas where there is very little development. If things are going to go wrong, obviously they are going to go wrong in countries without transportation, where the communication is weak and where the infrastructure is not established. But that should not be a cause to decry these programs; rather it should be a plea to improve the situation in those countries, and it should be looked at in that context. We should not be emphasizing that something was late in being delivered and therefore something is wrong. If these countries had these systems in place I expect we would not be providing the aid to them in the first place.

I hope hon. members here will speak against the bigotry that does exist in certain parts of Canada. I suspect that only one argument is being heard. We are not hearing the good side of the story. It is important to the people of Canada that there be a balance and that the good side of these programs be brought out rather than negatived. I suspect, as a result of what has happened in the west, there are many people who do not appreciate the efforts made by CIDA and other non-governmental organizations. In the west we are now referred to as the bleeding hearts. If that is the case, so be it. It is my hope that there are more people in this country who will listen to their consciences rather than to the bigots of this country who will tell you that every dollar we spend to assist developing countries is being wasted and, therefore, must be stopped.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, even though this is a serious debate I hope I might be pardoned if I utter just a few words in a light vein. I should like to assure the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) that I am not one of those who ever frequents a weight reducing clinic.

Seriously, I want to commend the hon. member for Egmont for introducing this motion this afternoon. I want also to congratulate him on the excellent statement he made in opening the debate. Bearing in mind the profession that the hon. member and I share in common, I think I might say that he could well have made that statement as a sermon from any pulpit in any church in this country. If he had done that it would be expected of him to attach a text to the sermon. The text is a very obvious one, the words of which come ringing to us from across many centuries:

—they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks:
nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

As I say, the challenge of those words comes across the centuries, and I doubt if any generation was ever confronted with that challenge more seriously than we are today. It is in that sense that I offer my warm congratulations to the hon.

member for combining these two serious problems; that of playing our part in meeting the food needs and the agricultural development needs of the world, and also playing our part in seeking effective disarmament. The statistics the hon. member gave this afternoon as to the amount we spend on research into how to kill each other as compared with what we spend on how to provide good health and a good life for all are shocking indeed.

I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). Like him, I am impressed with what Canada is doing in the field, but I am also impressed with the great need to do a lot more; and I am sure that my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), if he gets the floor, will have something to say about how much more we should be doing. I also realize, especially since the hon. member comes from a constituency near Vancouver where strange things happen over radio stations, that he feels the need to emphasize the self-interest aspect of aid programs, and I suppose there are some who can be sold the program only on that basis. But I hope that our motive in trying to do something about the needs of the world and the rights of people around the world is more altruistic.

I support the appeal in this motion because it is right and I hope we shall proceed further with it. As I have already said, I think the hon. member combines in this motion two very important subjects which face our generation. If I may quote again the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, it could be one minute to midnight. If we are going to survive as a race, as a society, as a world, we have to solve the problem that faces us, with two-thirds of the world's people going to bed hungry every night while the healthy and developed nations spend their resources on ways and means to blow the world to bits.

So I think this is a good motion and we are having a good discussion this afternoon. I hope that the government will pay attention to the views that are being expressed during this debate on both sides of the House.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as usual, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) brought to the House a big concept and an important idea and has demonstrated that, as a politician and a public figure, he is consistent with the very fine traditions of Canadians who are concerned with what is happening to the less strong and sometimes less prepared members of the family of man on the planet on which we live. He has painted a rather vivid picture of what is happening throughout the world.

In terms of the madness in the arms race—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order, with the permission of the hon. member. Since the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) were both seeking Mr. Speaker's eye a moment ago, and since only 15 minutes are left, I wonder whether it would be fair to suggest to the hon. member for Davenport that the remaining time should be split so that both hon. members would have the opportunity to take part in the debate. I offer this by way of a suggestion because I know that they both have something useful to contribute to the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is up to the hon. member for Davenport to decide if he wants to share his time.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the sharing of the time would affect the proceedings at five o'clock, and therefore I will put forward whatever thoughts I have without committing myself on the question of the sharing of the time, which evidently has a built in feature over which I would have no control on this side of the House. However, I appreciate the desire of the hon. member opposite to participate in this debate and I wish there were an easy answer to his request.

The motion before us today is an important one. It is good that the time of this parliament is taken up by the thought provoking opening statement of the hon. member for Egmont, and that we should devote time to this question, perhaps more frequently than we have so far. As I understand the motion, it raises two questions: First, how does the government provide food aid; and second, how does the government provide international agricultural development assistance? These are the two main components of the motion before us this afternoon.

The hon. member for Egmont in his motion provides a link between food help and the proteins consumed by Canadians. It is a rather intriguing connection and I have not come across such a concept before. I wonder whether such a link would provide the stimulus to increase food help which is being sought. Suppose that the consumption of protein by Canadians were to drop in years to come. We would achieve then, as a result of this guideline if it were to be adopted, an opposite effect.

Similarly, under part (b) of the motion, a link is established between international agricultural development assistance and the gross revenue accruing to Canada from the world's arms trade. If, as we all hope, the world's arms trade were to decline in the years to come, and therefore the gross revenue to Canada were to fall, then evidently such a guideline, if it were to be adopted, would result in less rather than more international agricultural development assistance, which I suspect is not the aim of this parliament nor of the government.

Therefore, I have some doubt whether these are the most effective guidelines that the government should adopt. In approaching this question of food aid and agricultural assistance, the following picture is painted, namely, that by the year 1985 a shortfall in world cereal production has been forecast to be as large as about 80 million to 100 million tons a year. In addition, this shortfall would seriously affect the developing countries which are short of foreign exchange and which would therefore find it difficult to acquire cereals on the world markets.

With a shortfall of this magnitude, food aid from surplus countries can only help the most seriously affected, and therefore it could be concluded that the solution lies in increasing indigenous production; that is, production within each nation.

In the case of grains, of course, Canada meets this challenge by looking to the future and assisting various nations in local cereal production programs with the supply of potash and know-how.

Looking, first of all, at the supply of potash by Canada, we know that we have around half of the world's reserves of potash. Therefore Canada is in the fortunate position of being an international supplier of first rank. Canada makes potash available either on the basis of a grant to the poorest country, such as Bangladesh, or through the concession of loans, as in the case of India. In addition to potash, Canada makes small amounts of other fertilizers available. They are small in quantity but crucial in the component required for agricultural development.

● (1652)

India is the largest of the food deficit countries, and it receives a substantial share of our fertilizer assistance. As we all know, Canada has an agency which specializes in foreign assistance of this kind, the Canadian International Development Agency or L'Agence Canadienne de Dévelopement International. As a nation we can take some credit for the enormous increases in cereal production India has been able to achieve in recent years. Last year India succeeded in producing an excess over consumption in cereals and is now in a position to stockpile. The contribution of Canadian potash to that success is recognized by India and its leaders.

In countries such as St. Vincent, CIDA has supplied fertilizers which have been sold to local producers, and the proceeds have been used to finance an agricultural credit project to permit still further agricultural improvement by the farmers and so to increase their productivity and their annual incomes.

Let us look for a moment at the other side of our efforts, namely, the provision of know-how to developing countries in need of assistance with regard to food. Here again, Canada can point with pride to a number of successes. For example, Tanzania asked for Canadian assistance in increasing wheat production some ten years ago, and there has been a team of Canadians working on this project ever since. Canadians have been simultaneously developing the technology required for an experimental station and assisting with its application on large wheat farms. With carefully selected varieties resistant to local rusts, with adequate weed control and moisture conservation in the dry season and with careful timing of seeding in relation to available moisture, the team has been successful in changing from a crop failure situation in the early years to bountiful harvests in the past two. Last year, 1977, the new farms using Canadian dry farming techniques and equipment supplied by Canada, with the assistance of a number of Canadian farmers, produced $2 million worth of additional wheat in Tanzania on land previously used simply for grazing.

By such efforts in Tanzania and fitting Canadian know-how to new situations we hope to be able to reduce slowly food aid shipments to Tanzania as local production makes them unnecessary, so that when the world's cereal shortage which is foreseen after 1985 occurs, Tanzania will be at least partially protected by a vigorous local wheat production program. President Nyerere of Tanzania was so impressed with the achievements of the wheat team last year that he presented each of the farm staff with a bonus of 1,000 shillings. The Canadian advisers contributed theirs to the purchase of recreational equipment for the children on that 10,000 acre state farm.

Let us take, for example, sugar-cane, a crop regarding which we have little know-how. However, a Canadian invention to separate the rind from the inner pith, which contains most of the sugar, led us to finance studies in the Caribbean in which Canadians determined that sugar-cane could be the base for cattle feed. The result is that in Barbados a dairy herd has been fed sugar-cane, urea and rapeseed meal for more than three years, and milk production has actually increased over what it was when the cattle were fed grass.

Under the auspices of CIDA a demonstration of a feedlot for commercial beef production is under way in Trinidad, again using Canadian know-how to introduce a new industry, the beef feedlot, to the Caribbean. With this new use for sugar-cane a new industry which takes advantage of the tremendous tonnage of sugar-cane which can be produced in tropical climates is foreseen. This development, which is peculiarly Canadian, is being watched with interest in other parts of the world. It is now being applied in central America and in Mexico, and CIDA hopes it will find application in many other countries where sugar-cane can be grown. Fortunately, rapeseed meal has been found to be a very satisfactory part of the sugar-cane based ration and makes still another Canadian input for additional food production in developing countries.

In India, most of the success of the so-called green revolution, about which we have read and which is based upon new dwarf wheat and rice varieties, was located in irrigated areas or where rainfall was plentiful. India was concerned that there were not similar technologies and benefits available to the farmers who had no irrigation in the semi-arid and dry areas of that country. So India asked CIDA for assistance, and Canada had a team there which was knowledgeable about western Canadian dry farming techniques. That was helpful in the production of sorghum, millet, beans and other Indian crops. The dry farming techniques are very successful and can double production at the experimental station.

The present CIDA team in India is now working with Indian agronomists on how to adapt the new techniques, which require good weed control for moisture conservation and seeds placed in the soil at precise depths. Neither of these is easy to achieve with the primitive ox-drawn implements which are used in these dry areas. New equipment which suits India's needs and economic conditions needs to be developed in future years, and hopefully Canada will participate in that as well.

We have heard today about Canadian inputs, about fertilizers and about Canadian know-how. However, we realize that the problem of fitting Canadian know-how into developing countries' situations is not easily solved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for sharing his time with other members of this House, which he said he would do. It is unbelievable what this man would do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, but in a different vein, I wonder if there could be unanimous agreement that Your Honour not see the clock for about ten minutes. There have been two speakers from the Liberal side but only one Conservative in this debate on a Conservative motion, and I think we would all like to give the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona about ten minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may be valid in principle, since this debate can be pursued later this session, I do not see why we could not wait until then if other hon. members want to take part in the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Hon. members have heard the suggestion that we not see the clock until ten after five. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, as I understood the remarks made by the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance), he mentioned that hon. members would have the opportunity to deal with this subject later. So, if we draw the logical conclusion from his remarks, he refuses to give his consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Since there is apparently not unanimous consent, the private members' hour is now over. It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. Monday, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

AIR CANADA URGED TO INCLUDE NEWFOUNDLAND AND SASKATCHEWAN IN PROMOTION OF TOURISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The latest promotional program of Air Canada, called "Share Canada", under Maritime Explorer Tours, Atlantic Freedom, Canaplan, Canadapass, Canada Fly Drive, Summertime Spectaculars, Motorhome Camping Vacations, and others, extols the virtues of holidaying in every province but Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House directs the Minister of Transport to correct this discriminatory oversight by Air Canada and that immediate appointments be made to the board of directors to include those provinces to ensure recognition of Newfoundland and Saskatchewan as important sectors of our nation in all phases of economic activity and to allow all Canadians to enjoy the beauty and attraction of those provinces, as well as the others.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTION FÉDÉRATION DES FRANCOPHONES HORS QUÉBEC NEGOTIATE FOR FRANCOPHONE MINORITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity. Considering that it is important to grant to Francophone minorities a status at least similar to that granted to the English minority in Quebec; considering that an unbiased, conscientious and dynamic organization represents the entire Francophone community outside Quebec; and considering that the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec has taken in charge the fate of such minorities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the government recognize the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec as the valid party for any negotiation or agreement concerning Francophone minorities in each Canadian province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMMONWEALTH DAY—PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF HIGH COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps hon. members will join with me, before beginning question period, in calling attention to the significance of this day, Commonwealth Day. I have had the good fortune and honour, on behalf of parliament, of inviting some members of the House of Commons to a reception-luncheon to receive the High Commissioners of Commonwealth countries.

Perhaps we might pause for a moment before the question period to call attention to their presence in the gallery and to recognize the significance and value of our connection with the Commonwealth of Countries which all of us support and regard as an association of countries long past the historical sense and now having reached a voluntary association of peace-loving countries who espouse the best of all ideals between the developed and developing nations. It is an association between those who endeavour to reach out and help each other, which in that connection has some basis in history but, more importantly, in modern times it is a voluntary arrangement of friendship and association of the best ideas espoused by all of us in public life.

I hope that all members of the House will join me in signalling the presence of these Commonwealth High Commissioners, to call once more into attention and prominence the importance of our birthright and our connection with the Commonwealth of Nations.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—PROSPECTUS FILED WITH U.S. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. We have now had an opportunity to review the preliminary prospectus filed by Canada with the SEC in Washington, covering the issue of $750 million in foreign bonds to be sold in that country, and the prospectus indicates:

—the bonds will be free of all present and future taxes imposed by Canada or any province thereof or by any taxing authority thereof or therein—

In view of this, would the Minister of Finance indicate why it was felt advisable—indeed, even necessary—to propose such a luscious deal to those who might be buying these bonds?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at this moment I do not have any comment. I will look into the matter. I do not have the text that has been used by the hon. member, and I would like to review it before I answer.

Mr. Stevens: I would have assumed that the Minister of Finance would have reviewed this prospectus thoroughly, and I am rather surprised he is using the "out" that he does not know the wording. Let me ask a further question. The prospectus also states that the underwriting agreement which presumably will be signed by the government and various underwriters will be conditional upon there being——no material adverse change or any development involving a prospective material adverse change in the financial, economic or political conditions of Canada from those set forth in the registration statement.

My question to the minister is whether officials in the Department of Finance have received an unqualified legal opinion that the deficit, which is estimated to be $14 billion in the current year, is not a material change which would break this contract, bearing in mind that such a deficit might be 50 per cent larger than the deficit disclosed in this prospectus.

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad that the market does not take the hon. member too seriously, because he is always throwing about some big figures and starting rumours that have no basis in reality. That is why I know those people do not pay too much attention to the hon. member.

Mr. Stevens: If the minister wishes to end the rumours to which he is referring, would he indicate in the House today the budgetary deficit for the fiscal year 1979?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Chrétien: I will be delighted to give that information to the House when I introduce my next budget.

REGISTRATION OF BONDS STATEMENT FILED WITH UNITED STATES SEC

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): My question is to the Minister of Finance: it relates to the prospectus issued by the government which states, on page 36, that a registration statement relating to the bonds on file with the Securities and Exchange Commission contains further information. Given the fact that last Wednesday the minister gave the unconditional guarantee that no information would be made available to the SEC which was not made available to the House of Commons—as reported at page 3562 of Hansard—will the minister now table in the House the registration statement relating to bonds so that we may have all the information available to the SEC?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when the time comes I will be delighted to give that information to the House.

● (1417)

Mr. Gillies: May I point out, with respect, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come. That statement has been made available to an agency of the U.S. government, the SEC; it is there now. The minister gave the unconditional guarantee that he would give no information to the SEC that he would not at the same time make available to the House. In keeping with the agreement the minister made in this House last Wednesday, I am asking him to table that statement in the House today.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said in the House last week that any information provided to the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States would already have been made public in Canada. I have not altered my opinion and in due time I will table that paper in the House.

[English]

Mr. Gillies: When will the minister make those documents available? They will be no good to us five weeks from now. I want them made available today because the minister guaranteed last Wednesday that he would. Last Wednesday the minister said that when information went to the SEC, nothing would go to the SEC that was not made available to the people of Canada through the House of Commons. That statement is in the hands of the SEC today and I want it tabled in the House of Commons this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has no problem with humility; he wants to order me to table those things.

Mr. Gillies: You said you would.

Mr. Chrétien: I said that no information would be put into that document which would not be made public in this country. I will table that document in the House of Commons when it is appropriate to do so. I do not think it would be appropriate to do so today.

Mr. Gillies: You said you would.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT GUIDELINES TO NEB ON GAS RESERVES FOR CANADIAN NEEDS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the announcement that Northwest Energy Corporation, a partner of Foothills in the construction of the northern pipeline, has just signed contracts for Alberta gas which will increase Canadian exports to the United States by 37 per cent. In view of the fact that Canada's long-term prospects for gas are not reassuring, what guidelines has the government given the National Energy Board regarding the amount of gas reserves which must be held to meet future Canadian needs, and what percentage will be declared surplus to our national requirements and allowed to be exported?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is somewhat premature. The application has yet to be presented to the National Energy Board for a decision and, as I am sure the hon. member is also aware, it will depend a good deal on the Alberta government and the Alberta Energy Resources Conservation Board assessment of the reserves position in that province as to whether gas would be available for export on a swap basis.

I have noted the interest with respect to the application to move, as the hon. member has indicated, close to a billion cubic feet of gas to the United States. I understand that that particular proposal is on the basis of a swap arrangement whereby Canadians would have a call on future gas reserves from Alaska, and to that extent this proposal is consistent with the position the government has already made public.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, as the minister has said, this could mean the export of a billion cubic feet of gas per day to the United States under some type of swap arrangement. I therefore ask the minister if what we have been told, that the Alcan gas pipeline was to take Arctic gas to the United States, is now being put in second place, and the primary purpose of this pipeline now will be to take cheap Alberta gas to the United States in order to give Canadians the "privilege" of buying expensive Arctic gas in the future.

I ask the minister if that is the understanding which has been reached between the government, Foothills and Northwest Energy Corporation. Also, will he tell the House the terms upon which such as a swap arrangement will be made? Are we to buy dear gas and sell cheap gas: is that the swap arrangement the government has in mind?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, on the first point, quite clearly the government's interest in the Foothills (Yukon) pipeline in energy terms is to gain access to Canadian supplies at low cost. The option for Canada is that we will be able to move Canadian supplies to Canadian customers for less money than the United States will be able to move their gas to United States' customers. As to the details of the swap arrangement, I have to say that I do not believe they have got them worked out. The kind of guarantees the hon. member is seeking are very much present in our minds as well.

● (1422)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the final arrangement would have to be approved by the cabinet, and in view of the fact that originally in the National Energy Board there was a stipulation that the government had to hold 21 years of gas in reserve, and that provision was taken out, I ask the minister if he will tell the House, in all fairness, the quantity of gas the National Energy Board will be asked to keep in Canada before declaring that any other gas is surplus to national requirements.

Surely that ought to be known. It is not a matter for the Alberta Energy Resources Conservation Board or any other agency. The Canadian government will have to approve any export of gas recommended by the National Energy Board, and this parliament has a right to know how much gas is to be held for the future requirements of the Canadian people.

Mr. Gillespie: As the hon. member knows, the National Energy Board is charged by parliament with this responsibility. We will be looking to the National Energy Board for advice on whether the gas that is proposed might be moved on some kind of accelerated or swap basis will in any way change the situation as far as that gas being surplus to Canadian needs is concerned. If it is on a swap basis—which I understand it is intended that gas would be—I cannot see that that would change in any way the whole question of surplus, or not surplus, to Canadian needs.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The price will change.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WHETHER RRAP WILL BE INSTITUTED THROUGHOUT CANADA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Some time ago, the minister implied that RRAP would be extended throughout Canada without consideration for obstacles that could occur at provincial level. Could he say now to the House if he is going to institute that program? Will he also announce it soon?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Negotiations are currently going on with each province to extend designations under RRAP, more likely in all rural Canada and in a greater number of Canadian cities. RRAP already applies to almost all rural Canadian territory and, of course, that means we will have to increase considerably the funds available for such a program. That is what we will do and at the same time we will urge those who are responsible for the implementation of that program to serve first families which have lower incomes, second those who live in the oldest houses of the country, and third, they will be asked to give priority to people inhabiting regions already designated under this program.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, does that mean that it will no longer be necessary for a rural area to get the approval of the provincial government, and here I am thinking specially of the province of Quebec, because now the area must be designated by the provincial government? Will that provision disappear, and will that cover the whole area, as the minister just said, without having to get provincial authorization to determine an area?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the approval of the provincial authorities will always be needed for designating purposes. Still, in the case which surely interests the hon. member, I can say that our negotiations with the provincial authorities have enabled us to extend designations widely to all rural areas of the province of Quebec.

REQUEST FOR FURTHER FUNDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as this matter is extremely important, and in view of the numerous requests we get in this regard, will the funds be increased considerably to allow approval of a rather large number of requests so that more people can benefit from this program I consider absolutely marvellous? An hon. member of the opposition does not often say things like that!

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally we will increase considerably the funds allotted to each province of Canada for the application of this program. But as we suspect that those funds will not be sufficient to meet the demand, we are therefore recommending that applications from low-income earners be dealt with first, and secondly those of people who live in the oldest houses in the country, and thirdly, those from areas that were first designated. Nothwithstanding those three basic recommendations, obviously we will have to increase, probably double, or even triple, the funds allotted to each province: we hope to be in a position to do so.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MONITORING AGENCY FOR POST-CONTROLS PERIOD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister, in a press conference over the weekend, confirmed that the Economic Council of Canada will be acting as a monitoring agency in the post-control strategy of the government after the Anti-Inflation Board finishes its mandate. He also confirmed that the agency will not have any authority to inquire into or act upon specific wage and price increases.

I would like to ask the minister, in light of the paradox that this proposes for an agency which will be acting post facto—in other words, before it can report to the government, it will have to identify wage and price increases in a specific sector or company—what agency does the government intend to use to act on such wage or price increases that have been so identified by the ECC, in view of the fact there will be no legislative authority after the AIB mandate finishes on April 15?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have said that after April 14 we are going back to the market-place and we do not intend to have legislation that will give power to the government to roll back either wages or price increases.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, could the minister explain to the House why the Economic Council of Canada has not been given the legislative authority to examine or investigate areas of potential wage and price increases that would go beyond the guidelines? In other words, the only role they will have will be to analyse statistics which are already in the public domain, the statistics from Statistics Canada, a role which the cabinet itself could carry out. I ask the minister why the Economic Council has not been given the legislative authority that the Food and Prices Review Board had, to inquire into and open up the books in areas where the guidelines have been exceeded.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have decided that after April 14 we will not have controls. The hon. member is trying to find a way to keep controls. Members of the opposition should make up their minds. They have been asking us to remove controls for the past two years.

Mr. McGrath: What the minister is telling the House and the country is that the government, in fact, has no post-control strategy. That is the situation facing us today. I ask the minister to tell the House what authority or what method of operation the government has in mind once a problem area has been identified by the ECC as going beyond the guidelines.

How would the government act, faced with such a report by the ECC?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are not planning to have a roll-back provision in any legislation. We are hoping people will understand the consequences of being under controls. We are removing controls. The Economic Council of Canada will look at price and wage developments and make comments. If it sees a difficult situation, perhaps we can have a specific inquiry. We are going to back in the market-place. We hope the public will react as we have some indication they will; they are very responsible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REASON DEPARTMENT DOES NOT EMPLOY WOMEN PILOTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. As Your Honour mentioned, today is the anniversary of the Commonwealth. Today is also the sixty-fifth anniversary of the first woman obtaining a pilot's licence in Canada. Eileen Vollick received her pilot's licence on this date in 1913, flying a Curtis Jenny biplane. In view of the fact that women have been licensed as pilots for the past 65 years in Canada, can the minister explain why it is still the policy of the Department of National Defence not to have any women pilots in National Defence, in view of their obvious acceptance by the Ministry of Transport for over 50 years?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is a subject that is constantly under review.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: The difficulty really resolves itself in relation to women serving in combat, which is something, quite frankly, we have not come to grips with: no western nation really has. Our pilots are versatile and must perform many roles. It does create a problem—one which we are examining—in so far as women serving in combat is concerned. We have not yet made a decision as to what is an appropriate role, after the experience of other nations which have tried that and found it quite demoralizing, not because women cannot stand it but because men in combat with them emotionally are not able to accept it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this must establish a new record of constant review, having gone on for 65 years. Combat is only one of the areas where women pilots in other countries have performed with remarkable effectiveness and skill. What steps is the department actually taking to resolve this very serious anomaly in its structures? In view of the constant review that has been going on for over half a century, can the minister indicate when the review will be brought to a satisfactory conclusion?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the constant review has resulted in concrete results in the armed forces, where women are increasingly effective in the roles in which they are serving. Just this past week I announced the addition of women to the advisory council to the Canadian military colleges. This matter has received active consideration. I have spent a great deal of time with my officials and senior commanders in all areas, and women are increasing their role in the Canadian armed forces. We have not made the decision to put them in roles where they either have to be in combat or rotate with those in combat, due to the manning ratios we have to live with.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the concern expressed by a number of young women who in recent years have applied for admission to the armed forces in a variety of skills and tasks, is the minister prepared to table in this House within the next few weeks a statement as to the number of trades and skills that are still prohibited from the interests of women? Will he also give some indication, in terms of the career and officer training program with respect to military colleges, in view of the comment he just made, of how soon there may be a satisfactory resolution of the very real discrimination that exists with respect to complete training facilities for women in Canada's armed forces?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there certainly is no secret in this respect and there is no difficulty in tabling a document. However, it would be much more fruitful for the hon. member to come to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence tomorrow evening, where I will be delighted to answer those questions.

POST OFFICE

TESTING OF LEGALITY OF RATE INCREASES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. The Canadian Periodical Publishers Association will ask the Supreme Court of Ontario this week to declare current postal rates for letters and magazines invalid. Is the Postmaster General aware of this, and the fact that it will throw considerable doubt on the federal government's right to collect the increase on first- and second-class postage rates scheduled for April 1?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I suggest I replied last Friday to this question about the legality of the postal rate increases. I am aware that Mr. Rosenberg and his corporation is contesting their legality, and that there is a lot of conflicting opinion among counsels involved, even his own. The purpose is also to better balance the costs of the Post Office operation between Canadian taxpayers and users. I know that these increases will yield some $125 million in additional revenues to the Post Office, which will result in Canadian taxpayers paying less and users paying more. In my opinion, this is only fair.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Will the Postmaster General table the opinion of the law officers of the Crown to which he referred in his reply to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris last Friday, in order to avoid continuing confusion?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I indicated last Friday that we had obtained a legal opinion from the Department of Justice which is fully in our favour, and I suggest we are under no obligation to make it public at this time, and that we need to protect it, should a contestation arise, in order to defend our point of view better.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESEARCH CENTRE AT WINNIPEG, MAN.—INTENTIONS RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In last Saturday's Free Press, the Minister of National Revenue was quoted as saying that the federal government would be scrapping its plans to build a new Defence research centre in Winnipeg. Can the Minister of National Defence confirm whether that statement is true and, if so, can he explain why the government has dropped its plans, which will cost at least 200 jobs locally?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the need for that establishment was not sufficiently well established. There was a proposed use for it some time ago. On review, that use is no longer valid; it meant closing down other establishments in the west. There was also some difficulty in obtaining land to the satisfaction of the city. I spoke personally to the mayor who agreed that this was not an appropriate establishment for the location proposed. The hon. member will know that we announced the permanent establishment of a new Air Command headquarters in Winnipeg. This will be a very major establishment on a permanent basis. With other facilities, it will bring some $105 million a year into Winnipeg. That is a very significant benefit from the military to the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, with regard to buying land in the city of Winnipeg, that is just an excuse; the federal government has many acres of land throughout Manitoba. The predecessor of the Minister of National Defence stated that there was an absolute need for this research centre. He said it was not a political promise and that the need still exists. This statement was made by him last Friday. In light of the federal government having land there, and the former minister saying there is a need, will the minister explain why there is this confusion?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there was a need perceived a couple of years ago when that announcement was made. On the best advice I had, and after examining the situation rather thoroughly for somewhat over a year since I have been in this portfolio, it is not my view, as the current minister, that it is required. It is my view that a new Air Command headquarters is required in Winnipeg.

EXPENSES IN CONNECTION WITH SEARCH FOR SOVIET COSMOS SATELLITE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a two-part question for the Minister of National Defence with regard to the Cosmos satellite. First, has the minister read outer space treaties Nos. 6 and 7, and is he satisfied that we have complied with both treaties? Second, the minister assured the House on January 30 that he was keeping a careful record of expenses. Can he inform the House what the expenses of the search have been so far?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not read those treaties recently. The first time I read them, I thought it was quite enough. My advice is that we are complying with them. With regard to the second part of the question, we are keeping track of the expenses. The total recovery cost, from the point of view of the Department of National Defence, is in excess of $4.7 million at this time. That does not include other departments of the federal government.

Mr. McKinnon: I asked the minister if he had read the treaties, because they clearly differentiate between the cost of the search and the expenses and costs of damages. It seems the government has never been able to learn this clear differentiation. We seem to have convinced the Russians that they are to pay for the damages, which are nil, and they have convinced us we are to pay for the expenses, which will be nearly $5 million. This kind of a deal we can do without. Does the minister plan to point out to his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the expenses are no part of the damages and it says so in the treaty?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, that is clearly understood. There are two different parts. Certainly, the actual physical damage is somewhat limited, but the cost of determining the ecological damage, the danger to the environment and people, and recovering the parts is rather substantial. We consider that to be very much part of the damage, and it is related to the recovery of the satellite or parts thereof. That is very significant and we are making claims with regard to it, in addition to whatever the amount may be in relation to damage.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SLAYING OF ISRAELI CIVILIANS—GOVERNMENT STATEMENT

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Has the Government of Canada made any statement following the brutal slaughter of Israeli civilians, including children, on a holiday bus over the weekend, for which the Palestine Liberation Organization has apparently claimed full credit?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): The question asked by the hon. gentleman gives me the opportunity to express the view of the government. We feel a sense of shock at this tragic and senseless act of violence involving the loss of innocent human lives. In addition to expressing this sense of shock, I should like to add the hope that the occurrence will not imperil current efforts to achieve a just and lasting peace which is the paramount objective of all parties concerned in the Middle East.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

PROCEDURE IN DEALING WITH SUPPLY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT MADE BY FORMER OFFICIAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In light of the fact that there is presently on the order paper, in the hon. gentleman's name, a motion asking the House to short-circuit some of the rules so as to pass supplementary estimates and grant interim supply, will the Deputy Prime Minister try to obtain for members of the House, or table before next Wednesday when this motion becomes due, a copy of the remarks of Mr. Douglas Hartle, a former official of Treasury Board, who speaking in Toronto over the weekend to members of the Liberal party gave examples of mismanagement and expenditure on the part of the government which shocked even some case-hardened Liberals?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): There is no effort to short-circuit the rules of the House. There is an effort to provide an additional day not provided for under the rules, so that hon. members may be able to debate interim supply. That proposal has already been cleared and has received the sanction of representatives of all parties in the House. So we are operating in an open and democratic manner, which ought to appeal to even a case-hardened Tory like the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Now that the hon. gentleman has had a chance to collect his thoughts, perhaps he could give some attention to attempting to answer the question I put to him. Would he try to answer that question, for my sake and for the sake of hon. members generally, and at the same time deal with the other statement made by Mr. Hartle when he said ministers were successfully evading Treasury Board, and what I characterize as the pack rat mentality of the government in hiding examples of their mismanagement and extravagance?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member wants me to do. Maybe it is to provide him with a copy of Mr. Hartle's speech given, as I gather, to the Liberal Association. Perhaps he would like to be put on the mailing list for all Liberal publications, which would be a very useful contribution to rectifying the hon. member's deficient education.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT VIEW OF LEGALITY OF RATE INCREASES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Postmaster General and is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. Why is the hon. gentleman ignoring the unanimous report of the committee on statutory instruments and regulations, an all-party committee chaired by the distinguished constitutional and legal authority, Senator Forsey, and the former hon. member for Halifax, Mr. McCleave, which indicated that to increase postal rates other than by amending the Post Office Act is strictly illegal?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I could give several answers to the numerous questions contained in the statement of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. I can tell him that I have never rejected the possibility of forming at a given moment an inter-parliamentary committee to study the question of the Post Office. But, at the present time, I think it would be perhaps premature to make public the decisions of the ongoing conciliation. It would be wiser to wait for the conciliation report to be tabled, for its results to be known; then we will see how we must act.

As for the illegality of raising the fees from 12 cents to 14 cents, I think the members of the opposition would show a much greater sense of co-operation if they tried to help us make the public understand that the increase is to relieve the taxpayers from a deficit of $125 million in the Post Office by charging it partly to the very users of postal services.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: That was an interesting statement by the Postmaster General, but it did not answer the question I posed. There were Liberals on the committee on statutory instruments and regulations, and while there might be a need for increasing postal rates to deal with the rising deficit brought about by maladministration and the other problems which are all too evident in the Post Office, why does the hon. gentleman not proceed by the legal route rather than by the illegal route?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, we will comply with the law and avail ourselves of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SUBSIDIES FOR SKIM MILK POWDER

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. It has to do with subsidies on skim milk. In view of the fact that a litre of 2 per cent milk in Yellowknife costs $1.58, $2.90 in Norman Wells, and at Tuktoyaktuk a litre of milk, when it is available, costs $1.86—three pounds of powdered milk costs more than $5—does the parliamentary secretary have anything to report to the House regarding government policy as it concerns northerners, in relation to skim milk subsidies?

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, funds for the skim milk subvention program were cut off the 1978 budget mainly because it failed to meet its objectives; in fact, low income families did not avail themselves of the program.

I want to say to the hon. member that approximately $589 million are still available for low income families, through various support programs.

[English]

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring a couple of facts to the attention of the parliamentary secretary, in the hope he might be able to advise the House what he plans to do. The subsidization of skim milk powder is extremely important to the Northwest Territories. Many of the people who live there are poor, and the cost of living generally is very high. Could the hon. gentleman tell us whether the government has any plans to meet the particular needs of the north in these circumstances?

[Translation]

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I take note of the hon. member's question about remote areas and I will submit it to the minister.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

COST OF CABINET MEMBERS' VISIT TO WESTERN CANADA—POSSIBLE VISIT TO EASTERN PROVINCES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Over the weekend the Prime Minister explained that his western junket was taking government to the people. Also, the Deputy Prime Minister told us on Friday that he would be doing government business in the west. So that the people might have a better chance to judge the value of this type of excursion, does the government agree that the taxpayers have a right to know what this excursion is costing them?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): We have never sought to conceal information with regard to the cost of travel once a question was put on the order paper.

Mr. Nowlan: I can assure the hon. gentleman there will be several questions on the order paper. Hopefully, we shall get answers before parliament dissolves.

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is of particular interest to the Deputy Prime Minister. After ten years, like Rip Van Winkle, the cabinet and the Prime Minister eloped and went west. Does the Deputy Prime Minister know whether there are plans to take this political road show into Atlantic Canada, where there is very real economic disparity and a real need for the government to communicate with the people?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, that proposal is under consideration, but I am not sure the hon. member would survive the impact.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ASSIST AREAS OF DISPARITY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the serious and rising unemployment conditions as reported, for example, in today's Globe and Mail—with particular reference to Glasgow, Nova Scotia—what new initiative does the minister have in mind to focus more specifically his department's resources in the critical areas of disparity in this country, particularly bearing in mind the decline in real terms of his departmental budget?

● (1452)

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As always, Mr. Speaker, there is intensive work done in analyzing and examining with industrialists and the governments of the four Atlantic provinces every project likely to yield valid economic results. Those are constant analyses, and we have recently signed agreements with these governments. I believe that in the few weeks to come, and indeed within a few days I hope, we will have the opportunity to go to New Brunswick where we will indicate the federal government's commitments through DREE with the New Brunswick government, which will allow for the creation of jobs and the economic development of a particular Atlantic province.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have every desire to see New Brunswick helped as much as possible, but my question was directed toward Nova Scotia specifically. I ask the minister whether he will take under serious advisement the setting out of funds to supply low interest, or non-interest bearing loans to create the promotion of permanent jobs to supplement the necessary temporary approach to creating jobs which we find in LIP and Canada Works?

Would the minister consider that as a policy option, and would he also consider checking to see whether the advertising campaign which seems to be run—for example, in the city of Montreal—to encourage people to take advantage of department opportunities, could also be extended to areas of just as great need, that is, in the Atlantic area?

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR SUBMITTING OF REPORT BY DIGBY HUNT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the indictment of federal government practices in respect of northern development as documented in a report of the Science Council of Canada released last week, a report which questions a statement made by one Digby Hunt, then in charge of Northern Affairs programs, to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and in view of the fact that Mr. Hunt has now denied the statement that he attempted to mislead the committee, is the minister prepared to submit this report to that standing committee for consideration and, if necessary, have Mr. Hunt appear before it?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this matter has not been brought to my attention, but I will look into it and report to the hon. member.

REPORT ON INDIAN SCHOOLS IN SASKATCHEWAN—GOVERNMENT IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the report by the Saskatchewan Cultural College on a survey of Indian schools in that province which showed that of 60 schools, 41 have inadequate sewage systems and 18 used a jet pump which spewed raw sewage over the playgrounds. Will the minister, whose department has copies of this report, tell the House why it has taken no action to bring to an end a situation which can only be described as shameful?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not disagree at all with the hon. member's assessment of the conditions. In fact, at our meetings in Saskatchewan on Friday and Saturday, we had an opportunity to meet with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians and the Métis non-status people. We had some two hours of very good sessions, and these were the issues raised. I think we all resolved to go back and try to improve this situation.

There has been some improvement in recent years: I think the hon. member would agree with that. No one could be satisfied with the conditions, not only in respect of schools but in respect of health delivery services and a whole range of things on Saskatchewan reserves. Unfortunately, the problem is not confined to Saskatchewan reserves. I will be going over this problem with members of the committee when we discuss my estimates.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the minister was probably involved in a farewell tour of western Canada with members of this administration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Last year, an Indian boy died in a sewage lagoon, a direct result of these appalling practices. The survey also indicated that fire safety systems were well below standard in all but 10 of the 60 schools. Will the minister tell this House how his department allowed this sort of disgraceful situation to arise, and whether he will now, aside from discussing it internally, embark upon a nationwide study of the problems we are facing with regard to young Indian children which is, as I termed before, a disgraceful situation that should be given immediate priority?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, our assessment of our visit to Saskatchewan is quite different from that of the hon. member. I can understand that he is slightly chagrined by the warmth of the reception we received in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: I am not sure I can associate this side of the House with the suggestion that, given a compelling human problem of this kind, the Tory response would be to conduct a nationwide study. I think what we should try to do is deal with the problem, and not conduct another study.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

STORM DAMAGE TO FACILITIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY TO ASSIST FISHERMEN

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries, after a 900-mile trip to the seal hunt which was aborted. I wonder whether the minister has had a discussion with the provincial government regarding the increasing and recurring storm damage to gear and small craft harbour facilities along the western coast and, indeed, in all the Atlantic regions, which is stultifying the ability of fishermen to get back into the fishery, particularly with the high cost of gear which they cannot afford to replace. Are there any plans to formulate a program with the provinces?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member back. I am sorry that the direction of ice-floes did not allow him to be present and show his support for the seal hunters—one of whom, by the way, died recently on an ice-floe.

Having regard to the second point, Mr. Speaker, the problem of damage to wharves and harbours is being dealt with by the department. In fact, we have identified funds to undertake the work as soon as conditions allow us to do so. In the matter of gear and damage to fishermen's equipment, this has to be the subject of co-operation between the two levels of government: the disaster formula, as the hon. member knows very well, has to be triggered by provincial authorities. We are assessing the damage, but I have had no contact yet from the provincial government indicating that it wishes to trigger the disaster formula.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the report of that survey shows extensive damage to gear, and in view of the fact the minister of fisheries for the province has indicated an approach to the federal government in order to prevent this recurring stultification to fishermen getting back into the fishery, I wonder whether the minister would deem this as an emergency situation and initiate discussions with the provinces in an attempt to resolve this very serious problem.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly undertake to do what I can to accelerate progress.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST HOUSE BE ADVISED OF ALL DETAILS FILED WITH U.S. SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance is similar to questions asked by the hon. member for Don Valley and the minister's clear implication then, and again on March 8, 1978, that the Parliament of Canada would be as fully informed as the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States on this venture into the American market.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

In view of the fact that there appears, on the face of the agreement, to be a private file in the SEC, and in view of the undertaking the minister has given to the House about full disclosure, will he indicate whether there is an impediment to full disclosure placed upon him by the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States and, if so, what is that impediment? If there is no impediment, as the minister seemed to imply, especially on March 8 and in his answer today, can he undertake to the House—it is important that we know as much as the Americans—when he will be making the information available he has made available to the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States?

● (1502)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr.Speaker, first I should like to repeat that all information we gave in that prospectus which has found its way into the hands of members of the opposition is preliminary: it is a preliminary, not a final document, and is subject to some changes. So I would not like to move on the document at this moment. We will have to file the complete document. When everything is completed, I will be very happy to give that information.

I would like to inform the House also that, as usual, when the hon. member for York-Simcoe read from parts of the prospectus, he judged it useful to himself to quote only two lines and not to give the full explanation, thus creating an impression that has no basis in reality. In all legal documents there are some conditions which apply to the people who will be holding the bonds in the U.S. Taxes and all those elements have been verified by government lawyers. I think the hon. member again tried to mislead the House in quoting only parts of a long and complicated document.

Mr. Stevens: Explain.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I want to assure the Minister of Finance that the questions are not to mislead; they are to elicit information and we would appreciate some reciprocity from the minister. The minister has indicated that this is a preliminary prospectus which indicates the government's intentions at the moment. One of those intentions is that future legislatures are bound, for a period of up to 20 years, by the commitment that these bonds will be free from all taxes, present and future, imposed by Canada or any province. This must involve some form of undertaking, either existing or contemplated, by the Government of Canada. Because there is $720 million worth of interest involved, is the government contemplating indemnity provisions to make these interest-free bonds, and is there something else the minister intends to disclose when he makes the full disclosure to which he has referred?

Mr. Chrétien: I repeat what I have said, that this is an extract from a long paragraph explaining the situation in terms of taxes for people who will be holding bonds outside the borders of Canada, and there is a provision there because there are some tax agreements between nations, and so on. This is a very complex legal document which the opposition is trying to drag out in parts and pieces. It has been examined very thoroughly by government advisers in terms of legislation. There is absolutely nothing unusual about it. When the final prospectus is agreed upon and tabled, I will be making this document available to the House. I want to say, again, that there is nothing in the document, in terms of information, that is not known to knowledgeable people in Canada. Obviously, there are none on the other side.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Now that the government has indicated by this scheme, whatever it turns out to be when we see the final information, that it is engaging in the practice of tax-free bonds—

Mr. Chrétien: No.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Until I see otherwise, I am subject to being convinced that it is otherwise. But that is the position, or at least so it appears. Is the government considering giving a similar right to municipalities in Canada to issue tax-free bonds so that Canadian municipalities will have the advantages which at least appear on the face of this document to be given to investors and donors in other areas?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member is trying to create a very false impression. It is not that at all. If he would read this document carefully—he is supposed to be a lawyer—he would understand that there are some tax laws in the United States and in Canada that do not apply in the same way. If you receive interest in the U.S., you pay your taxes there, and if you receive interest in Canada, you pay your taxes in Canada. Perhaps it is too complicated for the hon. member to understand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In the course of answering the first question of the three put by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, the Minister of Finance said that the hon. member for York-Simcoe had tried to mislead the House. I am sure, from the text of the question and from the context, that he did not intend to say that; that he intended to say he may have misled the House, or something less odious. The fact that he used the word "tried" makes it appear to be a deliberate attempt, and I think perhaps it might be better if that word were removed from the record.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say that the hon. member would have given better information to the House if he had read out more than 2½ lines of a paragraph about 30 lines long, but he judged not to do so. This creates an impression that is not very close to the truth. But he had the truth in front of him, which he did not want to use.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, before you made your comments, I intended to rise on a question of privilege, in that I would like the Minister of Finance to indicate in what way he feels I tried to mislead the House. I referred to a paragraph that is in the preliminary prospectus filed by the government in Washington. The paragraph reads:

Solar Energy

The bonds . . . will be free of all present and future taxes imposed by Canada or any province thereof or by any taxing authority thereof or therein—

Then it goes on to state that it is not applicable to Canadians. In other words, Canadians will be taxable, yet they will be tax-free as far as foreigners are concerned. The other two paragraphs deal with entirely different subjects. They deal with the effect of succession duties in Canada and with the effect of taxation in the U.S. My point, as you have said in your remarks, is that in no way have I tried to mislead the House. I asked a very simple question: why was it necessary for the government to offer this rather luscious tax treatment with respect to these bonds?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a difference of opinion between the hon. member and myself about the meaning of that clause; that is all. I said it would have been advisable to read more of it. I do not want to imply some devilish intention in the words of the hon. member. Perhaps I did not use the right word. The facts speak for themselves. I think my explanation clarifies the situation.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has put an explanation on the record. He indicated, as I hoped he would, that he was saying that perhaps the full text might have a different interpretation than that put by the hon. member. I think he has endeavoured to indicate to the House that he did not attempt to accuse the hon. member of any ill will or anything else.

CANADIAN SOLAR ENERGY INSTITUTE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-425, to establish the Canadian Solar Energy Institute.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, this bill calls for the creation of a Canadian solar energy institute. It was introduced in the knowledge that conventional fuel supplies on this planet are diminishing. The proposed Canadian solar energy institute would play a key role in the establishment of a Canadian solar equipment industry, leading to the creation of new jobs. It would encourage and promote the use of renewable energy resources and help to reduce our dependence and that of future generations of Canadians on non-renewable sources of energy.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CHARGES FOR USE OF AIRPORTS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-4, to amend the Aeronautics Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That Bill C-4, on Act to amend the Aeronautics Act, be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 9 at page 2 the following:

"(2) (a) All regulations made pursuant to this section are subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons.

(b) Notwithstanding paragraph (a), where a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less that twenty Members of the House, is filed with the Speaker to the effect that regulations made pursuant to this section be referred to a Standing Committee of the House so that witnesses may be heard and a report may be made to the House, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House such regulations shall be so referred to the Committee.

(c) Where regulations are referred to a Committee pursuant to paragraph (b) and the Committee makes a report thereon, such report shall be tabled in the House of Commons and following a debate of no longer than four hours, there shall immediately be a vote on the motion to approve the regulations with or without amendments."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to move this amendment at this time because Bill C-4, numbered Bill C-40 in the last session of this parliament, is a classic illustration of how a paternalistic government, tainted with arrogance, will use a sledgehammer approach to correct a technical deficiency in a piece of legislation and, in the process, impose some very repressive terms and conditions upon innocent victims who are very seriously implicated and affected by such changes. This piece of legislation is clearly an example of an overpowering government flexing its bureaucratic muscle without having any regard for the people it will affect.

Just to review the history of this bill briefly, it was introduced into the House of Commons for second reading last June. At that time the minister stated that the bill was of a highly technical nature and that it was needed to deal more effectively with the safety and licensing administration as it relates to aircraft, operators of aircraft, and facilities which are licensed pursuant to the terms and conditions which are spelled out by the Ministry of Transport.

The minister went on to say that the bill was needed for the purpose of improving the method of collection of fees for services rendered by the Ministry of Transport, that the bill would provide for the imposition of interest charges on past due accounts arising therefrom, and also would provide a mechanism for the provision of a security bond, a contract or a letter of credit reference for anyone using the services and facilities of the Ministry of Transport. Quite frankly, some clauses of the bill are aimed at tightening up the collection process. Further, the bill provides for mechanisms with respect to dealing with zoning and development of land in and around airport facilities.

Because this bill is of a rather highly technical nature, ostensibly termed as a housekeeping measure, the minister sought concurrence from the House to proceed through all stages of this legislation, which would have meant that it would have passed second reading, committee stage, and third reading all within the walls of the chamber of the House of Commons. This party denied that concurrence and pointed out that the bill should be referred to the committee and witnesses called in order that there be a better understanding and thorough explanation of the legislation.

It became obvious very quickly at committee that the bill contained some very undesirable features relating to general aviation, particularly in the small aircraft sector. It soon became apparent to members of his party that major amendments would be required. In all, some eight witnesses appeared before the committee. All struck the same theme—that this bill delivered far too much monopolistic authority into the hands of the minister and the Department of Transport and that there was no provision for adequate consultation with the aviation industry. Even more important, there was no provision for appealing the imposition of any regulation that might be detrimental to the industry.

As a result of the hearings and consultation with the members of the government, it was agreed that seven amendments would be advanced, and these were accepted. The amendment we are dealing with now is one that was not accepted at committee stage but it is one about which this party feels very strongly. That is why I have taken this opportunity to introduce it to the House.

I should like now to recap some of the proceedings and review some of the deliberations on the points to which we took exception. One problem was with respect to the provision to tighten up the collection procedure for services rendered to owners and operators of aircraft. It was discovered immediately that the major problem was collection of fees for inflight services—and landing fees and other related services—which was challenged by three foreign carriers which, for many years, have protested the principle that Canada has the right to charge for such services. These inflight service fees are known as the north Atlantic route fee, the Polar route fee, and the telecommunications fee, which are charged by Canada.

The issue is not late payment of accounts, but rather whether Canada has the right to impose such charges in the first place. What has happened is that in this bill the minister has conveniently gathered together the whole aviation industry—the giants, the commercial operators, and the small operators—and with the old sledgehammer approach has taken it upon himself to correct the problem once and for all. The question, as it relates to the three foreign air carriers and non-payment of their accounts, is currently before the Federal Court of Canada. As a matter of fact, a statement of claim was filed on August 1, 1975. The case has not been heard. What is strange is that it is not the Government of Canada that has taken the foreign air carriers to court over non-payment of fees, but the Pan American Airways Incorporated has taken the Government of Canada to court claiming the sum of $4.5 million it has paid under protest, representing charges made for en route facilities and services fees over the Atlantic, and the telecommunications fee.

Pan American, supported by other foreign carriers, contends that these charges were imposed in violation of the International Civil Aviation Association Chicago Convention; it contends that the charges are in violation of our National Transportation Act, and it contends that the charges contravene the principle of equity. The United States does not impose similar charges on Canadian air carriers while in transit over the United States and its territorial seas.

This is the scenario, Mr. Speaker. Since April, 1975, the three U.S. air carriers, namely, Pan American Airways, Trans World and Seaboard have discontinued payment of the en route facilities and services fees and telecommunication fees, and have run up a bill of $5.8 million to January 31, 1978. It is this account that has prompted the government to move with this legislation and, in so doing, to bring in the whole area of aviation rather than simply dealing with the question of the foreign air carriers. The $5.8 million which has accrued since April of 1975 is separate and apart from the $4.5 million that Pan American claims from the Government of Canada and which has been paid under protest since 1968.

In the midst of the turmoil the Department of Transport resorted to this heavy handed tactic, decreeing that all aircraft owners and operators be required to provide a security bond or satisfactory letter of credit to the minister before being allowed to use the facilities and services of the department.

The bill would provide that the Department of Transport could place a lien on such aircraft for non-payment of charges and the aircraft would be subject to seizure. Also, any account due over 60 days would be subject to interest charges.

This was all done because of the confusion on the question of law and the non-payment and refusal to pay huge amounts of money by these three foreign air carriers. It can be classified as nothing less than gross incompetence and bungling of the highest order. The minister and his department have undertaken to lay the blame on the whole industry. It is fair to say general aviation, and particularly those who are owners and operators of light aircraft, have been subjected to this heavy handed tactic of the Ministry of Transport all too often. Even to impose this heavy handed approach on commercial air carriers is fundamentally wrong. That really is not the source of the problem.

I am not sure why the Ministry of Transport wants to take it out on the small operators. This remains a mystery to me because the small aircraft operator in general aviation is usually not the culprit. That point is clearly substantiated by information we received during consideration of this bill in committee.

● (1532)

A review of the accounts receivable for services and facilities which have been provided by the Ministry of Transport, as at March 31, 1977, show the total outstanding amount past due over 60 days at $6.3 million. At that time the total amount which was outstanding with the three U.S. foreign air carriers amounted to $3.6 million, leaving a balance of $2.6 million past due. Of that, Mr. Speaker, there were only 11 private aircraft operators' accounts beyond the 60-day limit. That should hardly necessitate the Ministry of Transport moving in with the sledgehammer tactic and compelling the private operators to provide satisfactory security bonds or letters of credit. I am sure that is not an alarming amount. The bureaucratic red tape which would be involved in trying to administer and police that sort of an undertaking is certainly not worth dealing with the 11 past due accounts. It is really no wonder that legislation of this nature has caused the owners and operators of small aircraft to become rather disturbed and bounce back with some relatively harsh criticism of the government of the day, the minister and the ministry in particular.

I am prompted to read into the record an editorial which appeared in the January-February edition of Canadian Flight. This article was signed by Margaret Carson, who describes herself as a former Liberal supporter. Concerning the trend in the aviation industry as administered by the current Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the current Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), she had this to say:

> Our free enterprise system is going down the drain and anyone who is not in one level of government or another, or in organized labour, appears to be considered a "capitalist". General aviation and private aircraft ownership ("capitalist toys") are being discouraged by every means possible, including restrictive legislation, higher taxes, user fees, landing fees and general harassment. Recent statements attributed to government officials on private aircraft ownership include: "What gives you the right to own an airplane?", "Let's legislate hell out of them"; and "We're out to stop the business jet as long as our government-owned airline is flying over the same route with empty seats".
> What happened to the "Just Society" and "Participatory Democracy" we were promised by Trudeau during his election campaign? Canada has become a socialist bureaucracy and, as an indication of Trudeau's ideals and objectives, we should not forget his widely publicised statements on a visit to Cuba:

I will not read the next few lines as some hon. members across the way will think I am becoming partisan. These are not my words, but the words of a former Liberal supporter. I will skip a few lines and you can accuse me, Mr. Speaker, of quoting out of context, but I find it almost embarrassing to quote the two or three lines which are missing. Perhaps those who want to read it for themselves can find it in this particular issue of Canadian Flight dated January-February, 1978. It goes on:

> When new legislation affecting aviation is proposed, the various associations are sometimes asked for comments but this now appears to be only a formality and the final result is, in most cases we suspect, predetermined. Commissions are being appointed left and right, at great expense to the taxpayer, to investigate various matters but the results of these also appear to be the same.
> Dealing with the present government and its bureaucratic "civil servants" is becoming increasingly difficult and all aviation associations are experiencing the same reaction to their representations. Business and industry generally are also getting similar reactions to their representations.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. Quite frankly, that guest editorial summarizes the opinions and views of many who are involved in the aviation industry.

Through the efforts of the committee we have been able to make improvements to this bill. Some provisions were modified with respect to the question of providing for a security deposit, the ability to place a lien on an aircraft, and the imposition of interest. Concerning aircraft which are classified under the 12,500 pound class range these provisions were removed and their removal was naturally welcomed by the aviation industry, particularly the light aircraft owners and operators. The Air Transport Association of Canada quoted in its winter 1978 Air News that the provision still goes far beyond that which is really necessary. I quote a passage from that particular periodical:

> The proposed Clause 2 amendments to the Aeronautics Act would strengthen the power of the Minister of Transport in the area of user charges. The amendments to provide for a security deposit, for liens on aircraft and to require interest on overdue charges (something the government itself doesn't pay) would enhance the monopolistic power of the Minister of Transport and prevent or inhibit sincere negotiations toward the imposition of charges that are reasonable and in the public interest.

The latter remark is a phrase which this government continues to overlook—the question of being reasonable, the imposition of charges which are reasonable and in the public interest. The article continues:

> The decision in the Committee to modify the proposed requirement for a bond or letter of credit by deleting reference to aircraft under 12,500 pounds is welcomed. However, the provisions in this clause still go far beyond what is necessary for other Canadian carriers, and because the main concern voiced by the government was to strengthen the Act in order to collect transAtlantic en route charges from three U.S. carriers, it is hoped that this clause will be eliminated or further modified when it is dealt with by the House and Senate.

That summarizes the collective opinion of the Air Transport Association of Canada which is an organization of small commercial as well as the major commercial air carriers of the nation. I can describe this exercise in no other way but to call it "autocratic" and I spell the word "Ottocratic". This symbolizes the attitude of the minister, and with regret I have to say it also reflects the attitude of the Department of Transport. Therefore I believe this amendment which is before the House at this time is important. What I have outlined here is not a new revelation, it confirms the imperious attitude of the minister and his subordinates.

• (1542)

We should not forget that the minister and the Ministry of Transport tried to impose, by regulation, a 530 per cent increase in user charges in 1976 without prior consultation with the industry. This was eventually altered because of the tremendous amount of opposition that was levelled by members of parliament and members of the aviation community.

We must not forget the mess the minister created when he was trying to set up the airport car rental program. Finally, it is going to be resolved in the courts. This is again as a result of a lack of effective consultation with the parties involved.

Mr. MacKay: How many times was he sued?

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) asks how many times the minister has been sued. Perhaps when he speaks, he will elaborate on that. I think it has been quite often. As minister in charge of transport, he handles himself in the same way in setting an example with his user pay policy. He expects everyone to pay except himself.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Mr. Mazankowski: The effect of this inadequate consultation results in regulation and legislation by edict. We also cannot forget or overlook the bureaucratic bungling that occurred in the recent past in the stipulation of the requirement of a certain type of ELT to be installed in all aircraft at a cost well in excess of $3 million. The removal of these ELT's has now been ordered because of certain defects. Is the Ministry of Transport going to come to the aid of these owners and operators who were compelled to install these ELT's? No. Who is going to pay for the mistake? The owners and operators will have to pay for this mistake, in spite of the warnings of the industry.

Here again is a classic example of lack of consultation. It is the edict from on high, the "we know best" paternalistic attitude. When dealing with the subject of user charges, we must not forget the very heavy charges placed upon the users of the air terminal facilities, these very exotic air terminal facilities such as Mirabel which will operate at a $50 million deficit this year.

An hon. Member: What about Calgary?

Mr. Mazankowski: Calgary is another one. It is certainly the kind of facility that does not serve the interest of the users. It serves the users of the political fortunes of the Liberal party. Here again is a lack of adequate consultation with the industry with regard to their recommendation in so far as it relates to the function and design of the facilities.

There is unilateral decree. No wonder the Air Transport Association of Canada, when it appeared before the committee with its testimony, stated that the carriers view themselves as captive customers of a monopolistic landlord, as they have little alternative but to use the facilities designed and constructed by Transport Canada, along with services provided at prices imposed. The relations between most sections of the aviation industry and the Ministry of Transport have become so strained that the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, known as COPA, is considering suing the government, with some justification. On November 24, that organization sent a letter to the Minister of Transport. I quote from that letter:

> We strenuously object to the proposal that private aircraft be subject to a fee representing a 450 per cent increase in the levy on aviation gasoline sold at DOT airports and what is especially upsetting is Transport Canada's suggestion that such an increase be even considered before making a thorough study of the heavy contribution which general aviation is already making to government revenues. This is akin to saying: "We don't know how much you're paying now but we're going to make sure that you pay much more."

It goes on to point out the impact and the effect of the bungling with regard to the regulation requiring the installation of ELT's which now have to be taken out. In the February 8 edition of Canadian Eastern Aviation News, there is an article headed "COPA May Sue Government". I understand they are well on their way to appointing legal counsel. In fact I believe this has been done. The March edition of Canadian Eastern Aviation News indicates that the COPA board has obtained a firm of lawyers and is very seriously considering taking the government to court over its bungling and the fact that, through its mistakes, it has placed very severe financial impositions upon the aviation industry.

Having said that, it becomes increasingly clear that there is a need for an effective mechanism and adequate appeal provision with regard to the imposition of regulations as it relates to the utilization of terminal facilities and airport user charges for owners and operators of aircraft. The Air Transport Association of Canada said that a very serious defect is now in place in the present review procedures regarding user charges. An adequate appeal provision is not available.

We have come part way in this bill by inserting an amendment which would call for a 90 day consultative period. As I said in committee, this in no way provides for an effective appeal or for the industry to be heard in a formal way. That was a very consistent theme throughout the proceedings. It was raised by every witness who appeared before that committee.

There are various kinds of consultation. If there is not a formal mechanism or structured consultation format established, the Ministry of Transport or the government simply has to ride out the objections of the industry. In the final analysis, after a period of 90 days, the regulation is imposed and becomes law. What I am saying is that there should be a further appeal provision.

Bill C-4 is, in effect, legislation by regulation. To balance the overwhelming powers and to provide a safety valve, this amendment would provide the opportunity for a specific number of members of parliament, 20 to be exact, to refer those regulations which may be seriously objectionable back to the House for a vote. I am not suggesting that all regulations would automatically go before a committee for a review and back to the House. I refer only to those regulations that may be found highly objectionable.

It is interesting to note that in the committee Mr. McLeish, the head of air transportation, indicated that the best forum for the aviation industry is in fact the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. If that is the best place for them to get their point across, surely it is almost imperative that, with any regulation that may be objectionable, the industry should have the right to have its say or have the opportunity to be heard before that committee. Witnesses could be called and heard, and a report submitted back to the House at which time there would be a limited debate and a vote taken.

This provision is a very fundamental part of our democratic process. We rely far too much on legislation by regulation, government orders in council, and one dollar votes. We have reached the point where we are being governed largely by government edict without ample opportunity for appeal.

We have had a proliferation of government orders in council. In 1976, 3,326 were introduced, and 653 appeared in the Canada Gazette. We have had a proliferation of commissions, task forces, boards and study groups, all making decisions. We have decision making bodies all over the place. However, the decision making body is supposed to be this institution. I am trying, through this amendment, to get some of that decision making power back into the House where it rightfully belongs, in the hands of the elected representatives. In that way it gets the power back to the people, and that is where it belongs.

I have introduced this amendment because I believe it constitutes a necessary check over the excessive unilateral authority which has been exerted all too often by a government which is overly domineering, a government which has penetrated deeper and deeper into our lives every day, in a repressive fashion such as we have not experienced in the last 110 years. This, to my mind, is not democracy; it is government by bureaucratic rule, and it must be brought into line. It must be checked.

As for the aviation community, it will be a long time, given the experience it has had with this administration, before its members forget the high-handed approach the government has taken against them in dealing with their affairs. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the government has waged an out and out war against general aviation over the last five years. I really hope hon. members on the other side are listening keenly to this. I know the parliamentary secretary is doing so. I have a great deal of admiration for him. He has worked very hard to make this a better bill, and I respect him for that. He certainly has the ear of the industry to a much more positive extent than has the minister. But it seems to me that if the government does not want to accept my amendment we must expect a continuance of the war against general aviation, as in the past.

Acceptance of the amendment would at least constitute a gesture on the part of the government that it intends to sicken off somewhat its campaign against aviation. I ask the government to consider my proposal seriously in the name of the democratic process and of providing the checks and balances needed to govern effectively in the interest of general aviation.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to speak after the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), and in particular to urge the House to consider carefully the excellent speech he has made in support of his amendment. It is one which I myself support very enthusiastically. It seems to me that parliamentarians ought to be more concerned about some of the initiatives we can take in this chamber to keep a tether, as it were, on some of the departmental officials who, in some cases, I think it is clear, would like to carry a sceptre and wear a crown if only the House of Commons were to give them sufficient latitude to enable them to do so.

I believe it became obvious throughout the committee hearings, both this session and last session after hearing the witnesses who appeared, that there was not sufficient consultation with those who are most directly concerned with the effects of this bill and that there was insufficient realization of the practical problems it would create for the industry. The Canadian Owners and Pilots Association representing approximately 11,000 operators in Canada complained three times in the committee about the lack of consultation. Furthermore, once the bureaucrats have drafted a bill, they are not disposed to change their minds about it. This opinion was stated on July 11 last year.

It has become an article of faith among high civil servants that if they can implement regulations to frustrate the obvious intent of parliament, they will do so. In this connection, I recall a memorable speech by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) in which he set out some of the very unjust things which had been done to orphan children who had been denied, by bureaucratic regulation, the benefits which this chamber intended they should enjoy. There are many other examples which could be brought to light with a little research.

A spokesman for COPA stated on July 11, 1977:

> We had no advance notice of this bill and certainly no consultation on it. We do not understand why, and we think we should have been advised well ahead of time so that we might have been able to be helpful in the construction of it, because once the bill is drafted and read then it is case-hardened. Somebody, whether it is the minister or the guy who wrote it, or maybe a lot of people, including the government, feels called upon to defend it. And even though they might hear evidence at meetings such as this, which point up discrepancies in it, or problems with it, and so on they find themselves impelled to defend it because they were the ones who wrote it in the first place and they do not want to admit that they goofed.

Unfortunately, that is the truth. It is becoming increasingly evident that this chamber is losing authority every day relative to the ministers and the attempts of some of the bureaucrats, who mean well but who, like the government at times, are seized with an "edifice" complex—and we have seen some of the edifices they are pushing on the Canadian people.

For instance, for some time now the ministry has been occupied with the concept of cabin safety inspection, and no doubt in future we shall see the installation of yet another layer of inspectors in our aircraft in the absence of consultation with, or support from, the industry itself. In addition to the flight attendants telling us to place our briefcases in the precise spot designated by the ministry, we shall see some other official, full of self importance, giving the benefit of his superior knowledge on the question of precisely how a briefcase should be secured, and all at the expense of the taxpayer. And, no doubt, the air industry will be still further harassed and compelled to fix up the resulting public relations problems with the travelling public simply because somebody or other thought they should foist their grandiose ideas of what should be done, upon the travelling public.

As things are, members of parliament have little or nothing to say about these things and that is why it seems to me the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville is so deserving of support. As I say, it allows the House of Commons to keep a tether on the bureaucrats. In somewhat the same way as under the AIB legislation, action can be taken if members feel that regulations are unnecessarily regressive or impractical in their effect upon aviation. This is surely something which hon. members, regardless of political affiliation, ought to welcome. I am sure they would welcome some way for this chamber to keep, in a general way, the power to oversee and check, if necessary, a particularly inappropriate piece of regulatory work by some civil servant.

• (1602)

To indicate further the lack of respect the government, through this minister, traditionally has for that kind of consultation with industry, it is a matter of record that on June 13 last year the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) tried, with unanimous consent, to make this whole series of committee hearings superfluous. He asked at that time:

> —if hon. members would be willing to change the second reading motion, to provide for the bill to be referred to committee of the whole, so that it may proceed through all stages.

What did a former deputy minister of transport and later president of Air Canada think about this? It is very interesting that Mr. John R. Baldwin, who presented a paper to a senior staff seminar of the Canadian Transport Commission, said as follows:

> Most important, a difficult psychological change in the attitude of government officials responsible for providing facilities must take place. If it is future government intent to recover all or a major portion of facility costs, then the user who pays requires a larger voice in the decision as to what is provided.

He went on to state there has always been consultation with users, but government has taken a paternalistic attitude, retaining the right of final decisions as to what it will provide and at what costs, and often enough deciding against the views of users. Mirabel is a good example. Certainly there was consultation and some user views were accepted. However, the Mirabel terminal concept was what federal planners wanted, not the users. Similar problems obviously exist in Calgary.

My point is that even though in the course of time the government planners may prove to have been wise, if the user is to pay all or the major part of the costs, his views should be paramount, and he has the prime right to decide, even if he is wrong. A major change in attitude is necessary to achieve this result.

It is pretty obvious this amendment that has been advanced by my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville, will do quite a bit in practical and psychological terms to restrain some of these people, like Mr. McLeish, who no doubt feel they in their wisdom are the ones to pronounce in absolute terms what is best for the Canadian aviation industry. There is no doubt in the world that these people are well qualified, and in some instances no doubt they are right. However, in a democracy such as ours it is very alarming to see the trend being established more and more so that this place legislates, but the real muscle and the real practical effects of what is done do not emanate from the legislation itself but from the regulations the Public Service decides to bring in from time to time.

If there is no opportunity for the industry of the people affected and, indeed, for members of parliament, to have some sort of check or balance on these regulations which are becoming more and more repressive and numerous, then it becomes almost anti-climactic for us to worry too much about the principles involved in aviation or anything else.

I was interested in what the hon. member for Vegreville said about the opportunity to obtain information, and he quoted Mr. McLeish at the committee. I am very pleased that Mr. McLeish, the administrator of the Canadian air transport administration, feels that way toward the committee. I asked him two questions. The first question was about the results of his department's decision to test the DC-10 in California last September which, according to reliable reports, damaged this aircraft which belonged to Air New Zealand to the extent of $500,000, causing all sorts of complications and expenditures. I do not know how many lawsuits might originate from this experiment or who ultimately will have to pay the cost. When I attempted to get some information from him about this I was unable to do so.

I also asked him one other simple question about his attitude toward constant pilot monitoring and whether there had been any meaningful consultation with the Canadian Airlines Pilots' Association, and what sort of concept he had in mind. I was not able to get any information. The first question occupied Mr. McLeish's attention to the point that he seemed to get very upset that the matter was brought up at all, and he never did get around to answering the second one about constant pilot monitoring.

It seems to me, without belabouring the point and without repeating some of the things that were so ably put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville, this amendment will allow us to have the best of all possible worlds in so far as parliament is concerned. It will remove the absolute authority, the crown and sceptre complex, if I may use that phrase, which tends to permeate some of the upper echelons, particularly of the department involved. It will enable this place, by the participation of 20 members, to give vent to the wishes, the fears or whatever of the industry or the public, by giving us a tether or a rein on some of these regulations which otherwise would be passed with absolute impunity.

Through you, sir, I would urge all members of the House to give careful consideration to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Vegreville on behalf of our party. It is the type of measure that, in a real way, can further the spirit of co-operation among members of parliament of all parties in a way which existed, for example, in respect of the subcommittee of that special joint committee on penitentiary services. It will allow us, as members of parliament, irrespective of our political party feelings, to join together and advance the position and the authority of the House of Commons, which ultimately is the only forum and institution that ought to be responsible for measures affecting large numbers of the travelling public, or key sectors of our industry.

Mr. J. Larry Condon (Middlesex-London-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief regarding this amendment moved by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). On many occasions when bills are put before this House they are dragged out by the opposition, and I do not want to follow that example.

I assume that the thought behind this amendment was that it would obviously involve something that would be good for the industry. One of my main concerns is with the fact that any bills the government brings forward are all or partially wrong in so far as the opposition is concerned. The opposition goes on year after year complaining, never putting up anything constructive, just trying to tear down legislation that is good not only for the individual but for the whole country. I do not suggest that every bill this government puts before the House is perfect, but I am certain that the criticism of the opposition is also less than perfect.

One thing opposition members should remember is that when bills are presented to this House there is an opportunity available to all hon. members to contact the people who are concerned. One thing I have learned on this side from some of the more senior members, and I was taught this when I first came down in 1974, is that when bills are presented you should make sure you get a copy to the people involved and get their comments. It is quite obvious to me that it is in this respect members of the opposition are lacking. I know for a fact that when this bill was originally presented I contacted people in Ontario, including the Ontario Flying Farmers and other groups. I gave them an opportunity to speak and react before the bill went to the committee.

During my last three and a half years I have tried to make sure that all people, if they are to be affected by a bill, have an opportunity to speak. I found it to be very successful. In the last three and a half years, whenever I have voiced opposition to a bill, it has been long before members of the opposition have brought their points to the attention not only of the minister concerned but of my colleagues on the back benches and my colleagues in the cabinet. I have been able to present to them some of the problems and sometimes the lack of knowledge about the legislation of the people whom the bills propose to help. Obviously this is a problem that crops up from time to time.

I am not too critical of the media, but sometimes you read in the local newspaper, or even a national newspaper, a headline condemning some bill that has been presented in the House. When you read the article and then you look at the bill, you find there is quite a difference between what is said in the newspaper and what the government proposes to do in the bill. I am sure hon. members opposite realize that, when bills are presented, they are not picked out of the hat for somebody's convenience. Bills are presented to help people who are affected in certain areas, such as transport, health and welfare, or any other area under federal government jurisdiction, and to make sure these people know exactly what the problems are so that the government can help them. If this is not what the government is supposed to be doing, then I am afraid both sides of the House are redundant. For the last three and a half years the government has endeavoured to ensure that the people have been heard and that they are helped through legislation.

I was quite surprised when one of the opposition members—I think it was the hon. member for Vegreville—mentioned something about the AIB and said that people have nobody to whom to protest. I can assure him that members on this side whose constituents have had problems with AIB have been helped by this side, although people in the outside world might think that backbenchers are just fellows who stand up at the end of a string at vote time. Some people think that, but I think my colleagues around me realize that the work we do for our constituents and the people of Canada consists sometimes in needling the cabinet by bringing to their attention problems in different constituencies when these bills are presented.

I have marked down something that was said by the hon. member for Vegreville and, if I am incorrect, I hope he will correct me. He said that landing fees seem to be imposed on people with smaller aircraft. If he checked the record of the committee meetings, the hon. member would see that when the minister proposed the legislation, landing fees were proposed, not imposed. What is the minister doing? He is laying down a bill before the House for comment, not only from members on this side or in the opposition but from people all over Canada who would be affected by the bill. Is this not what democracy is all about? We lay down a bill before the House, we give an opportunity to debate it and for amendments to be proposed to improve the bill so as to help the people better in areas where such help is needed.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member invited me to correct him if he was wrong, and certainly I want to take that opportunity because it is pointed out very clearly in the bill that the charges are imposed rather than proposed.

Mr. Condon: I think the hon. member for Vegreville misunderstood me. The connotation he put on it was that the government was imposing this bill upon the people. I think hon. members will recognize that when a bill is put before the House, it is proposed rather than imposed.

Mr. Alexander: That was shifty. It is called reversing gears.

Mr. Condon: Mr. Speaker, I am affected when I hear criticism from the other side and I appreciate it.

In closing I should like to say, as one hon. member said, that this bill is not a sexy bill which will get headlines, a bill which will receive much media coverage. The bill has been proposed to help the industry, to help it regulate itself through participation with the people who will be affected.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this might seem like a very minor bill for the prestigious House of Commons to be considering, but the amendment proposed to it has changed that. The amendment has put before the House the salient question: does this House have any guts left? The amendment simply asks that in matters concerning the safety of aircraft, as proposed in the amendments to the Aeronautics Act, the House have the power to check the regulations. To make absolutely certain that no member of the House and, I hope, no person who travels on an aircraft or on any helicopter in Canada misunderstands the situation, I will put it in terms that everyone can understand.

I suggest that hon. members look at the amendment to clause 3 on page 2, which I will read slowly, following which I will deliver my remarks on it loud and clear. The clause reads:

> 3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 5.1 thereof, the following section:
> "5.2 For the protection of passengers, property and persons on the ground the Governor in Council may make regulations requiring the owners and operators of privately registered aircraft to subscribe for and carry liability insurance, and fixing the minimum amount of such insurance".

On reading that clause probably everyone feels reassured that parliament is giving to cabinet the power to make regulations, if it wishes, to protect passengers—is it not wonderful because we might be flying in an aircraft some day—property and persons on the ground. That is what it sounds like, but what is the reality? Throwing away the rights of parliament in that type of hypocritical amendment is nothing else but hypocrisy of the highest order, window dressing. Let me give you an example in plain terms.

Everyone of us flies on Air Canada, CPA, Transair, Okanagan Helicopters or any type of aircraft which carry more than the number of pounds mentioned in the legislation. We should read the small print in the bills. If we did, we would find that whenever we travel by Air Canada or CPA, we are insured, whether we know it or not, for $75,000. That has been there in similar type of legislation for years and those airlines are not exempt, but name me one person in all these years that the legislation has been there, put on by so called responsible parliamentarians, that a single person has ever received that insurance. That is what I mean by hypocrisy. Surely after all these years of tragic air crashes across this country, all these years of mothers and children waiting for something that never comes—insurance is supposed to be guaranteed as implied in the legislation—some money should have been paid out.

Because we are parliamentarians, we think we are doing a job when we sit here and let government backbenchers, like the hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon), say that the government consults everybody. With whom is the government consulting—morons? Anyone who knows what is going on in this field in this country should be ashamed of himself to see legislation like this going through the House. All this amendment asks is that parliament have some of the power it used to have with regard to air safety, that the regulations put through by the governor in council which are drafted by civil servants are examined by us and that they be put into plain language which even lawyers could not muck up.

● (1622)

What is being done here? Parliament thinks it is passing, in the example I am using, power to the cabinet to make regulations to see to it that people who fly in aircraft are protected, but in fact they are not protected. A passenger is happy when he realizes that there will be insurance in the event of his death and that his family will be independent for life. However, when his estate goes to the insurance company to collect $75,000 or $40,000—whatever the minimum regulations call for—the insurance company says, as insurance companies do year after year, that it will be glad to pay if the estate can prove who caused the accident. How in God's name, when there were 300 passengers on an aircraft and you were sitting in the last seat—and when you are dead—can you prove how the accident happened? Even if you are a survivor, you cannot prove that.

When insurance companies ask for that proof, they are just grinning because they realize that there are a bunch of stupid people in the civil service and in parliament who allow this type of legislation to pass unchanged. This is the type of crap that destroys the credibility of parliament. This is the type of hypocrisy which make us all ashamed when we know about it. All we are asking is that this parliament be allowed to look at the facts. I challenge anyone to name me one person who has ever received this insurance. The insurance companies are ripping off the owners of aircraft who are compelled by this legislation to buy insurance. The insurance companies look at the regulations put through by civil servants, and never pay.

I want to be very specific. Everyone remembers the crash at Toronto several years ago. I challenge anyone to name one family of any of those 100 passengers who died that night which has received any insurance. Yet under the regulations passed by the governor in council with the authority of parliament, there had to be insurance.

This is not a matter of an academic discussion of a fine point of law. What we are discussing here is the stupidity of parliamentarians who sit back and say that because they are on the government side they will surrender their souls to the civil service mandarins and put through whatever they ask.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is proposing that since the civil service has failed to write regulations which are clear enough to demand what parliament wants to be done and since the governor in council is so busy and tired that there is not enough time to do this properly, we should bring it to parliament, and parliament should do the extra work to make sure that if we are going to be held responsible for the legislation, we should see the regulations which are being put out under this legislation. This deals with the safety of those who travel by air. Let us remember where the fault lies. It lies right here in parliament where we have said that we are so busy we have no time to deal with regulations or orders in council. Here we have an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville which says that we will take time when the safety of the travelling public is concerned. I think we should pass this amendment so that we can have some of our credibility restored.

Let us get rid of some of the awful shame which hangs over us all by saying that in this field we will take time and see to it that the regulations are examined by the representatives of the people and not by the paid incompetents who write these regulations and who, I confess, are mostly lawyers who should not be in the job.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is this a party vote?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The solution is very simple. Let us put this amendment through. This amendment would give us the power to overrule regulations. Then the civil servant who drafts the regulations and takes them to the governor in council to have them approved will notice what has been said here and will make certain that the regulations are put into clear English which does not allow insurance companies to continue this rip-off.

The insurance companies rip off the owners of Air Canada, Canadian Pacific, Okanagan Helicopters and anyone else who rents out an aircraft which weighs more than the prescribed weight. However, the families of those who die are the real victims of the rip-off. If we want solutions, let us put this through. I suggest that the regulations be put into plain terms such as "It is the desire of parliament that passengers shall be protected" and none of this "may" stuff.

The regulations should require that insurance be paid the minute there is proof of death or injury, and let the insurance companies use the dollars they collect in premiums to find out who is responsible. Let them try to collect their money from the negligent party.

Let us go back to that Toronto Air Canada crash. Obviously the facts show that either the Ministry of Transport, the employees of Air Canada, or both, were responsible for that awful crash. It was not the fault of any passenger. Why, then, should the families of over 100 passengers, innocent of any fault, have to wait all these years for the long and dragged out procedure in two courts? They have to go after Air Canada in one court and the Ministry of Transport in another. One is a Crown department; the other is just an agency of the Crown. This means that the poor fellow who is taking action to find out who is to blame in order to collect his legitimate liability insurance has to have enough money to get actions started in two courts simultaneously. The minimum fee to get started in either of those courts is about $50,000. Over four years it mounts up and mounts up, even if "Rockefeller" is his name.

I speak with obvious feeling when I say that we condemn ourselves by letting this type of slipshod clause get through. Knowing the facts as they have been for the last ten or 20 years, why should we repeat it all over again? I suggest that none of us would be hurt very much by amending this legislation in order to let us examine the regulations to see if we understand them. I am very sure that parliamentarians of all parties would make sure that if we say that insurance protection should be provided to passengers who fly on our aircraft, somebody will pay if there is an accident. However, the present situation in which families of deceased are asked to prove negligence, should not be allowed to continue.

I was talking about an accident which occurred right in the middle of a crowded area, Toronto. What about other accidents all over the country, and accidents in remote places where no one even knows they happen? There is hardly ever any chance of proving which party is negligent. In the case of the recent crash at Cranbrook, they are rushing to find out who was negligent. Before that is resolved there will be a lengthy legal case. The families of the people who died will wait for their insurance for years, and it may never come because the case will never be completely resolved. Indeed, most of the families will not know there was insurance because that fact is not advertised. There is plenty of advertising if the company is supporting the Hamilton Tiger Cats or something like that, but we do not advertise to tell people that insurance is available through order-in-council. It is kept a deep secret. In the event that someone should find out about it, however, it is not likely they will receive anything.

● (1632)

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we should accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville, which reads in part as follows:

All regulations made pursuant to this section are subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons.

That is very simple, Mr. Speaker. I do not want, any more than anyone else, to overload this House with details of management and administration, but on no subject have we greater reason to ask to take back some of the power turned over to the governor in council, than on this one. They have failed to do their duty through ignorance and maybe through fatigue.

It is not only in the field of air safety that troubles arise, Mr. Speaker. Many members here have heard me speak on the subject I am about to touch upon. I have felt very sorry for ministers of finance in this parliament. Since the days of Walter Harris I have seen them destroyed, one after the other, because they did not know enough about what was wrong with the economic theories that civil servants were following, to change them. And even if they did know, they were not able to change them.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

We saw good men knocked down—colleagues of ours, people who were liked—because rightly or wrongly the mandarins in the Department of Finance told them, "This is the way, and this is what you will do." The way has been proven, quantitatively, to be wrong. I have seen these ministers destroyed as human beings through not knowing enough to cope with the charm and persuasion of mandarins who want to cling to power even though they are following the wrong economic road.

Perhaps that is understandable with the involved subject of finance. Safety of air passengers is a subject we all understand, however. People who do not want to think about safety should not fly. On this simple matter that we do understand, we as parliamentarians should make it clear to Canadians that we intend to take this power back and take full responsibility for seeing that regulations are drafted to ensure that what we want will be accomplished. The present regulations regarding the liability insurance that I have used as an example, are not being applied as parliament must have wished when the legislation was passed.

It is not just the question of safety that concerns me, Mr. Speaker. Just a few moments ago a minister of the Crown left the chamber. When he was minister of national health and welfare he was very proud of the fact that he introduced legislation which was passed by all parties in this House calling for a family allowance of $20 per month for every child, regardless of the means of the parent. But when the regulations were published, they did not carry out this promise of parliament. The regulations provided that all children, regardless of the wealth of their parents, should receive $20 per month—except if a child had lost both parents. Apparently, according to the mandarins in the Department of National Health and Welfare, an orphan is no longer a child but is an adult. Under the regulations passed by governor in council this parliament must sit quietly by whilst every orphaned child in this country is barred from receiving the family allowance that we voted.

I took this matter up with the then minister, and I think he was just as shocked as I was. The senior civil servant concerned with this told us, however, that the regulations could not be changed and that if an orphan, whether three years of age, or seven years of age, was paid $20 per month, it would destroy the tax balance of the budget. He maintained it would hurt the country financially by disturbing the balance of ways and means. In parliament we thought we were voting $20 per month for every child under 16 years of age without regard to wealth, but the civil servants decided that orphans were to be excluded. A child who loses one parent would still receive $20 per month, but a child who loses both parents would lose everything, by regulation. And parliament had nothing to say in the matter. When the minister had this brought to his attention—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I have just a sentence or two left. I raised the matter of the family allowance because it is understandable. We all know what an orphan is. In parliament we thought we had done something worth while to help families have children by paying an allowance of $20 per month. We find, however, that by regulations passed without the knowledge of parliament—not brought back to parliament but passed by the governor in council—this is not the case. When we protest, as parliamentarians, we are simply told that the civil service knows what is right and what is wrong.

The question of public safety on aircraft is not that much more difficult to understand. We know that we are not likely to survive the crash of one of these fast aircraft. The chances of any crash being fatal are very high. I think we owe it to everyone who flies in an aircraft in Canada to ensure that if we say, as parliamentarians, that they should be insured, then the family that is supposed to be protected by that insurance receives that protection. I think parliamentarians are smart enough to do that. We may not be able to come up with the latest theories in finance, but in matters such as I have referred to with practical examples, we should be able to ensure protection for our citizens.

I think I have made a solid case for supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Vegreville that on the question of air safety we should give parliament the right to approve or disapprove regulations, and not leave it to the governor in council alone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, you will notice that I hesitated for a moment before commencing the few words I am going to deliver. After that powerful and moving speech by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) I thought the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lapointe) would have gone outside to communicate with his minister and then come back to indicate his willingness to accept this reasonable and sensible amendment.

I am looking hard at the parliamentary secretary, and I do not see him nod, so I have to assume he has not been able to get consent. If he had, it would have saved this House a lot of time and we could have dealt with more pressing matters, such as the economy. Unfortunately, no matter where the heart of the parliamentary secretary may be, he is in the position of having to do what he is told. I am sorry hon. members are in a position where they are compelled to occupy positions of parliamentary secretaries. I am sure they would be much happier over on this side conducting the kind of spirited defence for the rights of the public which the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, and the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) have carried out. If the hon. parliamentary secretary is fortunate enough to come back to the House after the next election, he will have the useful experience of sitting on this side and trying to repair some of the damage he has helped cause.

● (1642)

The hon. member for Middlesex-London-Lambton (Mr. Condon) spoke about whether situations are proposed or imposed. It is an issue which concerns us all. For example, are estimates and spending proposals imposed or proposed? What about orders in council or regulations of this kind? Are they proposed or imposed? I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and ask, what about penal institutions? Are they imposed or proposed? I am sure the hon. member will be able to answer that question. Who will know whether penal institutions are proposed or imposed upon hon. members and upon their constituencies?

We now come to the question of regulations. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and I fought this battle many times. I believe we started off with the Aeronautics Act and the original transportation act which included references to aeronautics. At that time the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), who had not that time been elevated to his present position, was sitting on this side of the House in a greater degree of respectability than he now has. He joined with us at that time in opposing with vigor the legislative proposals of the government, of which he has since become a member. He objected to regulations in the transportation act, to regulations in the act dealing with farm legislation and marketing. He was a tiger when it came to opposing proposals which gave to the government, to the ministers, to the governor in council acting on the advice of their advisers and officials, the power to act, just as this particular legislation will give to the officials of the Department of Transport. The hon. member for Crowfoot is now actively engaged in enforcing regulations of a kind which he once opposed. That will be very interesting reading at some time.

On this side of the House we are concerned. Personally I have been concerned for a long time. We have passed bill after bill in this House, vesting in the government, in the governor in council, in a minister, in an agency, the power act by regulation and order in council. My hon. friend from Vegreville referred to the fact that there were well over 3,000 passed during the past year. It is true that there is some opportunity to examine those through the medium of the statutory instruments committee. Our examinations are only conducted as to form. We do not go into the merits, or into the policy which lies behind the promulgation, the enactment of these orders in council. We have examined a great many of them and we have put in some reports.

In the second report of that committee dealing with orders in council we placed a very reasoned argument, buttressed by facts and by law. I am glad to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) here. The Post Office was in breach of law in trying to secure increases in postal rates by order in council. We supported that argument by references to decisions of the courts, by references to people who were supposed to be experts in connection with the business of enacting orders in council. This was the second report of the Joint Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments which was unanimously approved, supported by members from the other House.

That report was brought in, left in this House and never objected to by the government. Here we find the government now in complete disregard for a report of a very powerful and effective committee of this House saying that it intends to pay no attention to it. The government is going to keep on increasing postal rates by regulation and order in council despite the fact that the law, the facts, common sense and equity all say no. This is why my hon. friend from Vegreville and other members from this side of the House and I hope that some members on the other side will rise to the occasion with a display of intestinal fortitude which may be alien to their political faith to say, "So far as we are concerned we agree with the hon. member for Vegreville and we will not stand idly by and see vested in the government this sort of power."

I have looked at most of the statutes on the order paper. As I sat here listening to the speeches made I went through the order paper which contains, in the Orders of the Day, a list of the government bills. I would venture to say that two out of every three bills contain vast enabling powers which the government is asking this House to give to a minister, to the governor in council or to an agency. All members and all practical people know that in the kind of world we live in it is not possible for this House to deal in detail with every possible contingency which might arise by which it is necessary for the government and/or its officials to deal with areas covered or encompassed by legislation. We all understand and accept that it is necessary to deal with some of those difficult situations by the media of orders in council and regulations. All we ask, and I think it is a very reasonable request, is that it be vested in this House and when we give this power away we retain some form of liaison, in order that we can call the matter back if we have to do that.

I have spoken to the hon. member for Vegreville on this matter. We have no intention of engaging in, and no sensible or responsible opposition party or member would for one moment contemplate, a wholesale practice of calling back for discussion in this House, through the means of the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Vegreville, every issue and item covered by an order in council. There must be some protection. As my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has said, we are in a better position than all the highly paid civil servants in this country. I am not disparaging them when I say that.

Through the daily and weekly contacts we have with our constituents and the public of Canada we are in a better position to realize what may be the impact of an order in council drafted somewhere in one of the ivory tower complexes with which this city is infested. These public servants do not have the slightest idea. They may be only 2,000 miles away from St. John's or 3,000 miles away from Peace River. In terms of knowledge of what goes on they are thousands of light years away.

Mr. McGrath: Another galaxy.

● (1652)

Mr. Baldwin: Canada has many nostrums for the settlement of its problems. They have been put in place. God knows we are saddled with them for some time. I have great respect for most public servants, but many of them who will rise to the top positions have an affinity with ministers who sit in cabinet. They understand them because, unfortunately for the country, they have the same kind of mentality.

It is not good enough just to give this power to the government. I would like ministers here to answer honestly in how much detail they study the list of orders in council which come before them. To what extent are those orders in council supported by documents and papers which will show their effect? I believe it is very little. This situation will be remedied when we switch sides after the election.

That is the problem we face. It is what the hon. member for Vegreville is asking. Surely it is not too much to ask for support from the government people so that when an order in council is relevant and important and may have an unexpected or unusual practice, it will come before this House of Commons for discussion. The very fact that the power exists will, in my judgment, impose upon public servants a greater measure of care, caution, and scrutiny of the proposals they make. When regulations finally are enacted, they will be of a higher quality, having been drafted with one eye to the possibility of them being brought into this House.

I practised law for many years. I say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, who has now left the Chamber, that my 20 years' experience in the House of Commons will probably purge me of all my sins as a lawyer. I say that as a result of a comment he made.

Throughout that period of practising law, I only had occasion three times to use the application for a writ of habeas corpus. However, the fact that that right exists, brought down to us over hundreds of years' experience under the parliamentary system of government, is a most salutary and useful restraint on government improperly taking custody of people in an illegal way without going through the law. I know the War Measures Act is a variation of that. It took a special kind of government and a special kind of Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to invoke the War Measures Act.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): With the opposition supporting it.

Mr. Baldwin: That is a different story. When it is written, we will have more to say about that.

Some members opposite say that with our political process, why worry about bringing into the House of Commons for debate and discussion orders in council, as suggested by the hon. member for Vegreville? With an election every four years, the people can decide through the political process what will happen. I will suggest to hon. members what happens.

We are now going into an election. This party will be making very strong representations, as will my friends to my left, in a different vein, on the questions of the economy, inflation, unemployment and the sagging dollar. On the other hand, the government, in an unfortunate predicament because of these same issues, will have only one political argument. They are going to send out their rather shop-worn figure of a leader. They sent him to the cleaners to be de-spotted. They will run him up the masthead and say, "This is our policy". They may get in that way. If they do, it will be the greatest con job since Barnum and Bailey introduced the bearded lady into show business. In an election of that kind, there is no opportunity for intelligent and rational debate on the issues.

The hon. member for Vegreville has given illustrations where the government has acted most improperly and abruptly with regard to some regulations dealing with aircraft, the costs to be paid in connection with those aircraft, and the impact that will make in an election if the events occurred two or three years previously. It simply is not good enough. We must have a day-to-day, month-to-month, year-to-year analysis and study of what goes on under the guise of these regulations in order to protect the people of this land.

I close on another high note. I have before me a copy of today's Ottawa Citizen which contains an article entitled "Bureaucracy, Waste 'Sickened' Former PS". I quote from the article:

> A former official of the federal Treasury Board said Saturday he was "heartsick" at the government waste he witnessed during his years in the job.
> Douglas Hartle, a former deputy-secretary of Treasury Board, told a workshop at the Ontario Liberal party's annual meeting that he saw "too many public servants chasing not enough work, some of them grossly over-paid." . . . When times were good in the early 1970's, Hartle said the government always had more money at its disposal than it knew what to do with.

I am sure the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) will be most interested in that comment bearing in mind the situation which prevails in his constituency, a situation which developed because there were not adequate funds, when there should have been, to deal with those issues. The article continues:

> "Treasury Board deals mainly with Mickey Mouse matters," he said. "When all is said and done, the bureaucrat is eventually told to shut up. I'd had my say and the minister would decide."

That is the situation which prevails. We all know it exists. We have been here long enough. All the hon. member for Vegreville is asking in his very simple and reasonable amendment is that there be left in this House the ultimate right to have considered, when justified, an order in council which goes to the root of the problem dealt with in this act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. McKenzie: May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—The Canadian economy—Value of Canadian dollar—International investment in Canada; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Transport—Government action to reduce airline disasters; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco)—Environmental Affairs—Akamina-Kishinena, B.C.—Protection of wildlife.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills. I understand there is unanimous consent to stand motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) and motion No. 11 in the name of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is so ordered. We will now proceed to motion No. 19.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SEPARATE DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of bringing in legislation to amend the Government Organization Act providing for a separate Department of Fisheries.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the third time this resolution has been brought before the House. It is and has been as a result of the government re-organization of 1971 when the Department of Fisheries, as it then was, was merged with a number of government agencies. The Environmental Protection agency, the Canadian Wildlife agency and the Meteorological agency are three that come to mind. They were merged to form the new Department of the Environment.

● (1702)

As a result of our opposition to the bill and as a result of some reasonable heads prevailing, there was agreement at the time and the minister became known as the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. This was at a crucial time in our negotiations with other countries in connection with the Law of the Sea and it ensured that one of the major fishing nations of the world would continue to have a minister of fisheries. However, the department became the Department of the Environment, and the Department of Fisheries became merely the fisheries service of the Department of the Environment. In my opinion that has never been a very satisfactory arrangement, and events have shown that this view is well founded.

All we need do is examine, for example, the budget of the Department of the Environment to find that 50 per cent or more of the department in terms of personnel and budget is made up of fisheries services. This is not to suggest for a moment that environmental questions are not important. Indeed they are, and they should receive the priority they deserve. Today, of course, we have a minister responsible for the environment, a minister of state, who answers to the Minister of the Environment who is now the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc). That is the way we get around the legality of the arrangement because, until the government brings in an amendment to the Government Organization Act, we shall continue this very unsatisfactory arrangement.

To put the matter in historical perspective, this all started back in 1971. Even the Liberal party was never very happy about what was done. The Liberal convention of 1973 passed a resolution as follows:

> In view of the immense importance of the fishing industry to Canada, particularly to the coastal provinces, that there be established immediately a department to take charge of this area to be known as the Department of Fisheries and Marine Resources.

That resolution was adopted by the Liberal convention of 1973. It followed a similar resolution adopted by Conservative candidates from the Atlantic provinces in 1972 and again in 1974. I might add that Liberal candidates in the Atlantic provinces at a meeting in 1974 adopted a similar resolution.

The only action to flow from all this was a move by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1974 to give us half of what he had promised by appointing a Minister of State for Fisheries. That office was filled by the present Minister of the Environment. The Minister of State for Fisheries had to operate within and under the authority of the Minister of the Environment. All this was happening, unfortunately, at a most critical time in the history of Canada, at a time when the Law of the Sea situation was coming to a head; a consensus was developing that ocean states had the right and the responsibility to manage their offshore resources. As a result of this emerging consensus the 200-mile limit was unilaterally imposed by the government and took effect in January, 1977.

Again, in the fall of last year, the Prime Minister promised, and I quote, "We shall separate the two departments as soon as we have the legislation passed." That was in September of 1977. Now we are at the end of the present session and of this present parliament. It is obvious to me that, notwithstanding the promise made by the Prime Minister in 1977 and during the election campaign of 1974, and the resolution of the Liberal party in 1973 and again in 1974, repeated at the last convention a few months ago, the government has not seen fit, because it does not consider this to be a matter of priority, to bring legislation before the House amending the Government Organization Act, to redress this serious anomaly by once again creating a fully-fledged Department of Fisheries.

Thus, we shall have to continue during this parliament and beyond the next election and well into the next parliament before obtaining legislative sanction for what is the de facto situation—in my opinion a most unsatisfactory one. It is unsatisfactory because, on the verge of the most exciting time in the history of the fishing industry in Canada, we are beginning to realize, as a result of the action we took a year ago, the tremendous potential for expansion there is in the industry for the benefit of the nation as a whole and particularly of the Atlantic provinces. In the past year, for the first time in our history, the market value of the product exceeded $1 billion—it is now $1.2 billion. This makes the industry a very important one, one which merits a fully-fledged department with the undivided attention of a fully-fledged minister.

There is an even more important point which should be made. The Department of Fisheries, unlike any other department in the government, is directly responsible for the lives of thousands of people engaged in the industry. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is in the nearest comparable situation but he has nothing like the responsibility for the lives of human beings as is found within the Department of Fisheries in respect of our fishermen and the ancient industry which they so bravely and energetically pursue. Yet the government does not consider this to be a matter of priority. I say this to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment: my province considers this to be a matter of first priority. It is the number one priority in Newfoundland, it has a very high priority in Nova Scotia and, I suspect, in the minister's own province of New Brunswick.

It is number one priority in my province because we see in the fishing industry an opportunity for self-sufficiency for the first time. The industry presently employs about 20,000 people in the province. There is a tremendous potential for expansion if we manage the resource properly, if we develop new markets and operate under an umbrella of federal-provincial co-operation. The minister must not forget for a single moment that this is an area of shared jurisdiction. The minister may nod his head, and Hansard may not record that nod.

● (1712)

The fact of the matter is, there is a shared jurisdiction here. The fish that swim over the banks of Newfoundland within the 200-mile limit are just as much a resource of the province of Newfoundland as the oil that seeps from the tar sands of Alberta is a resource of the province of Alberta. The minister all too often forgets that very important fact. That is why we are concerned over the propensity of this minister, who is competent and whose heart is in the right place, but whose competence and charity are only exceeded by his arrogance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I say that regretfully because I have great personal respect for the minister. When it comes to dealing with the provinces and his provincial counterparts in Newfoundland, where this industry is our principal primary industry, or with his Liberal counterpart in the province of Nova Scotia, the minister demonstrates an arrogance that regretfully exemplifies the attitude of this tired government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: I say that in great sadness, sorrow, and in great anger. What has this meant? It has meant confrontation with the province of Newfoundland and confrontation with the province of Nova Scotia, the two principal provinces involved, at a time when the provinces and the federal government should be working together to maximize the tremendous potential and expanded opportunities that are ours in the 200-mile limit.

We know about the development program put together by the minister of fisheries for Nova Scotia and the Newfoundland minister of fisheries, and the attitude of this minister toward that program. We know of the attitude of the minister with regard to bilateral agreements to give away our exploitable surplus catches without so much as a by-your-leave to the provinces concerned; without any consultation whatsoever. I say that with great sadness because the minister has within his department a great team, competent in every respect. They are able to deal with the situation and anxious to get on with the job of working with the provinces. I only hope the minister has learned something from the experience of the past year.

It strikes me as passing strange, for example, that the Americans on the eastern seaboard, with nothing close to the potential we have, are not entering into bilateral agreements to give away surplus stocks as we are doing. On the contrary, they are planning on phasing out all foreign fishing off the eastern seaboard. They are building trawlers in preparation for that day when they will have the total situation in terms of the exploitation of the resource. What are we doing in Canada? How many foreign trawlers have we licensed; 500, 550? We have issued over 500 licences for foreigners to come and fish within our 200-mile limit. Just two weeks ago we entered into an agreement with the Spaniards, bowing to international blackmail. The Spaniards said they would co-operate in ICNAF areas if we would give them the right to catch 20,000 metric tons within our 200-mile limit.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): No way.

Mr. McGrath: Of course, we gave them 5,000 tons. We should not have given them anything. The figures certainly bear me out because I quote the total allowable catches for cod in two areas, 2GH and 2J+3KL. Those are the two areas with regard to cod.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Within the 200-mile limit?

Mr. McGrath: Within the 200-mile limit. I give the figures for the total allowable catch of cod of 155,000 metric tons, and we have in 1978 given away 52,000 metric tons to foreigners. Every time we give away surplus quotas we give away the potential for creating more jobs. This is at a time when we should now be taking steps to place orders in our idle shipyards in Halifax, Saint John and Pictou, to renew the fleet, and our fleet needs renewal. Most of our trawlers are 20 years old.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Nine.

Mr. McGrath: O.K. Our side trawlers are on an average of 20 years old and our stern trawlers are on an average of nine or ten years old. So we have to talk about fleet replacement. What are we doing about that? I suggest we are doing absolutely nothing.

I just address these problems to indicate to you that we are at a time when we should in fact have the total, complete and undivided attention of the minister and a department that deals exclusively with this very serious problem regarding the fishing industry.

I know the minister will deny this but I happen to believe that the evidence suggests we have been using our surplus quotas within our 200-mile limit in exchange for commodity agreements for other Canadian commodities on the European market.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): I deny that; I flatly deny it.

Mr. McGrath: It is not without coincidence that in respect of five countries where we have bilateral agreements for surplus quotas we have a total of $2.5 million in commodity agreements. That may be a coincidence, but I suspect we are using our unexploited surplus quotas to barter for commodity agreements, and that, in my estimation, is scandalous, especially when you consider that this is being done without any consultation whatsoever with the province that is to be directly affected. Of course, the province that is directly affected in most of these bilateral agreements is the province of Newfoundland.

I say there should be no bilateral agreements, apart from those bilaterals we entered into, because we had to honour them in terms of phasing out historical treaty rights. That was an obvious and necessary prelude to taking the unilateral action we took in imposing the 200-mile economic zone. Apart from that, there should be absolutely no bilateral agreements whatsoever. This is our resource and we question and challenge the right of the federal government to give away one single metric ton of that resource without consulting us first.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): We do.

Mr. McGrath: You do not, sir. The minister does not and there has not been consultation on these bilateral agreements. So much for what is the regrettable minister's arrogant approach.

The minister has a competence which augurs well for the future, and he has around him very competent people. I suppose the minister's future is limited in the extreme, certainly to the next election, but, for God's sake, I say to him, in the few months he has left he has an opportunity to enshrine his name in the marine and fisheries annals of this nation by putting in place the new plans that are necessary if we are to maximize the returns that are there for us in the fishing industry.

We require fleet replacement, and the department should do something about these small craft harbours, a budget which has been cut year after year, to the point where we are sadly deficient in terms of wharves, breakwaters, and on-shore facilities. The department should do something about the development of new markets. That may not be the minister's direct responsibility, but obviously he does have some responsibility in this regard. We must do something about market development so we will not have the situation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to talk out my own motion, though I could continue until six o'clock. I will very quickly bring my remarks to a close by saying to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Newfoundland, of Nova Scotia and the Atlantic provinces generally, including eastern Quebec and the Gaspé, are looking to the government for leadership. The first manifestation of this leadership will be a move by the minister's colleague, the hon. government House leader, to bring in an amendment to the Government Organization Act, setting up in law a separate department of fisheries which would provide the minister with the opportunity of making a major statement in this House. That is something we have not had since the imposition of the 200-mile limit on just exactly where we are and where we are going, and what is the potential for this tremendous industry.

● (1722)

Coming from a province where the unemployment rate is twice the national average, where there are pockets of unemployment in excess of 25 per cent, we see, and especially our young people in the fishing industry see, opportunities which we have never had before. The world is starving for the protein that is off our shores in abundance and which we now control by virtue of the 200-mile zone. We must ensure that the returns from that industry are maximized for our people. I would say to the minister that time is running out and I hope the government will give us some indication of exactly where we are going.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to participate in this debate. My esteem for the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) makes me regret that he does not participate in debates more often. Of course, no blame is attached to him in what I say because I know how busy he is in committees other than the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, where I think he would agree we are responding to what he described at the beginning of his remarks as exciting times.

The hon. member has accused me of arrogance. This is not the first time, and I regret it, because I hope he does not confuse arrogance and firmness. There are areas of responsibilities which I cannot delegate, and in fact, fishermen, through their organizations and their spokesmen, have asked me to be firm in the development of this new opportunity which is presented to us in the 200-mile zone.

I might say to the hon. member that bilateral agreements with other countries have absolutely nothing to do with commodity agreements, and I state this flatly. I might also add that members of the industry and members of provincial governments, either through their deputy ministers or otherwise, were apprised of the bilateral negotiations.

The hon. member gives short shrift to a very important Canadian interest, that is, fish outside the 200-miles which move in and out of the zone and which are so important to the hon. member's province. Obviously international co-operation requires us not to take a dog in the manger attitude with regard to anything in our own zone that is surplus to our needs. It is for that reason that we are willing to look at the allocation of our surplus to those countries that co-operate with us.

Also, the hon. member forgets very quickly that there are stocks which are of interest to countries which have had traditional fishing rights and which, because of the existence of St. Pierre and Miquelon, for example, are obviously of great interest to metropolitan France.

However, I meant to give quite a different tone to my remarks. I agree with the hon. member that a fisheries debate would be very useful because, owing to pressure of other business and at times owing to the overloading of the parliamentary calendar, we have not had a full fisheries discussion in the House for some time.

I am happy to speak to the motion of the hon. member because it suggests the establishment of a separate department of fisheries. Indeed, the hon. member is echoing an earlier announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of the intention of the government to do just that. The suggestion that a separate fisheries department should be established is not a new one. It entails a reorganization which now makes sense in view of the extension of our jurisdiction to 200 miles which became effective on January 1, 1977. This, and coupled with it a series of bilateral fishery agreements with foreign countries, were important elements in the recovery of the Atlantic fisheries. Of course, other actions taken by the government in the area of fisheries make this step desirable.

[Translation]

It is true that ground fisheries have experienced serious difficulties from 1974 to 1977. Those difficulties have shown that it was necessary to alter the policy, the operations and the attitudes to save Canadian fisheries and promote their long term productivity. In 1975, the government set forth comprehensive directions to develop Canadian fisheries. Those directions concerned the development of resources, the conditioning of fish, the marketing of products and social growth. As a result, various recovery programs directly connected with the policy were organized.

[English]

Through a substantial subsidy program amounting to some $130 million over four years, the federal government has successfully assisted the Atlantic fishing industry to survive through a very difficult period. In fact the picture at the present time—and I agree with the hon. member that these are exciting times—does inspire real optimism. So far as the Atlantic fisheries are concerned, particularly the groundfish species, the first priority is to build up stocks to something like their former levels of abundance, and it is for that reason that I have resisted a large and too quick expansion. I am confident that, with proper management and conservation, we will see the total allowable catch of Atlantic groundfish available to Canadian fishermen doubled by 1985, compared with the catch in 1976.

At the same time that the government was responding to the crisis in the Atlantic fisheries, it was directing significant attention to the Pacific fisheries. We are looking to a doubling of the production of the Pacific salmon by the 1990's as a result of our salmon enhancement program which is now, as hon. members know, in the first year of the five year phase.

New hatcheries, spawning channels, fishways, lake fertilization and stream improvement facilities will be put in place on the British Columbia mainland and Vancouver Island.

Another bright spot on the Pacific coast is the fast growing and highly lucrative herring roe fishery which will probably bring in $100 million this year.

It is significant that the total market value of Canada's fisheries, as the hon. member has pointed out, has now gone over the $1 billion mark. This means that for the first time in history we have attained and passed this $1 billion figure. This means also increased employment, higher returns to fishermen, and expanding export trade, all of which represent one of the brightest spots in Canada's economic scene, and this was recognized at the recent meeting of first ministers. This change in emphasis from recovery to development will be possible because of new management approaches, including such matters as entry control, stock management units, more efficient use of processing plants, and new marketing emphasis.

Fisheries management is, however, directly dependent on the sound scientific capability that Canada has established. The ocean and aquatic sciences component of our department has been conducting extensive scientific activity associated with the chemical, physical, and biological aspects of the aquatic ecosystem. This strong link between science and fisheries management has been central in past management practices and will be a key in the future.

It is essential to recognize that fisheries has not been neglected under the arrangement that has existed over the past few years. But our thinking here must be dynamic, and the Prime Minister indicated last September that the time has come to adjust our organizational posture respecting fisheries and to create a separate department. The resolution of this issue is, however, not as simple as one might suspect.

Having decided that the concept of establishing a separate department would now be timely, it was important to look at the respective mandates which should emerge for the fisheries and environment departments and to ensure that the division of responsibilities is consistent with the job to be done. I am glad to say that this task is almost complete and, we hope, with the support that seems so evident from the other side, the necessary amendments to the Government Organization Act can soon be introduced.

The shaping of the new department provides us with the opportunity to review the fisheries needs which exist throughout Canada. Fisheries management is evidently the basic concern of any fisheries department. In its narrowest sense, however, fisheries management is not just a matter of setting quotas and licensing fishermen. It requires science and research, a knowledge of what, where and when to fish and an understanding of the factors which affect stock health and abundance. It involves the preservation of the aquatic entourage, the prevention and control of pollution and a positive enhancement to increase nature's stocks.

In my view, the management and conservation of the living resources of the sea are inseparable from the management of the ocean as the habitat for these resources. We have looked at the responsibilities of other departments and have found that my department has the prime responsibility for the aquatic and ecosystem aspects of the oceans. With the approval of parliament the new department would be known as the department of fisheries and oceans. This title is clear and brings the basic responsibilities sharply into focus for the public. This is important because the public of the Atlantic and Pacific coastal provinces understands the relationship between fisheries and the oceans and expects a strong and clear government response to problems and opportunities in this sector. The discussion by first ministers about fisheries serves as a good indication that provincial governments share the views of the federal government about the importance of this sector.

Perhaps I might indicate more specifically the responsibilities that a new department of fisheries and oceans would have. These are: first, management of all Canada's ocean fisheries and some inland fisheries; second, fisheries, oceanographic and freshwater research contributing to the understanding, management and optimum utilization of renewable aquatic resources; third, hydrographic surveying and charting; fourth, administration of small craft harbours; fifth, conduct of environmental impact studies on activities affecting aquatic renewable resources; and sixth, administration of international treaties and agreements covering management of fisheries and other aquatic renewable resources and the quality of the marine environment.

The proposed department of fisheries and oceans would provide the focal point in the Government of Canada for the management of Canada's oceans and marine resources. The creation of a separate department demonstrates the priority the government attaches to enhancing the Canadian fishery, to our growing ocean management responsibilities and to the need for a comprehensive approach to fisheries and ocean issues.

I would like to make it very clear that many other departments, such as the Department of National Defence, the Department of Transport, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of the Environment, will retain strong, legitimate concerns and authority with respect to marine matters.

The proposed department of fisheries and oceans would be responsible for providing leadership in the development of our marine policies, posture and capabilities and for acting as the focal point for the exercise of Canada's marine responsibilities, but in a manner that would seek to concert and to co-ordinate rather than to replace the roles and authorities of other departments in marine affairs.

I should like to speak briefly about ocean sciences to reassure those who may not be aware of the commitment of the Canadian government to ocean sciences. Contrary to perceptions held by some people, ocean sciences programs in Canada have been characterized by a very healthy growth in recent years. In the short span of 18 years we now have in Canada six major centres of outstanding excellence in ocean and aquatic sciences, encompassing physical, chemical and biological sciences, whose replacement cost would easily exceed half a billion dollars. Since 1973, despite a period of fiscal restraint, the ocean and aquatic science division of the fisheries and marine service has seen its annual budget grow from $33.7 million to $57 million. Canada's ratio of ocean science expenditure as a percentage of gross national product shows the following comparisons with other advanced maritime nations: in 1974 Canada spent 1.7 times as much as the U.S.A., five times as much as each of the U.K., France and Japan and 5.5 times as much as Australia.

I would be remiss, however, if I did not speak more specifically of some ocean science activities in order to illustrate their importance in the past and their potential for the future. It is noteworthy that the majority of ocean science and survey activities are closely related to the fisheries. Examples of these are relatively large-scale projects on both coasts to study the physical, chemical and biological aspects of the water masses over the continental shelves.

The hydrographic service of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment is now working closely with the Ministry of Transport in developing and providing more precise aids to navigation and positioning systems which contribute to the more effective management of the 200-mile fishing zone and the prevention of destruction of the fisheries resource by transportation accidents. These responsibilities would continue within the new department of fisheries and oceans.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

I have spoken at some length on this issue because I believe it is of great interest and importance to Canadians, especially those who rely on the fisheries and oceans for their livelihood. I have restricted my comments to the fisheries and marine side of things, as that is my area of responsibility. I might say, however, that while I have spoken of the establishment of a strong department of fisheries and oceans, I support the need for the Department of the Environment and the contribution that it will be required to make to assist in the management of renewable resources and in the protection of the Canadian environment. Additionally, the strong links which have grown up between the various components of the present department must continue to thrive under any new organizational arrangement.

In summary, I am convinced that the time which has been taken to work out a clear mandate for each of the new departments has been time well spent. I hope that we will be able to move quickly and to put in place the legislative and administrative arrangements associated with this major government initiative.

The potential of our fisheries—a clear federal jurisdiction since Confederation—and the potential of our three oceans are quite inseparable. The challenge of the new department of fisheries and oceans and the Government of Canada would be to take full advantage of the opportunities which are open to us.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for the persistence with which he has pressed for the establishing of a separate department of fisheries. I suspect that he enjoyed those days when he was able to debate with great oratory and demand that something be done even more than he has enjoyed his speech today, but this is his big day. His plea has at last been met by the statement which has been made by the present Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc).

I am sure that the excellent announcement which has just been made by the minister will be welcomed by all members of all parties from the Atlantic provinces and the Pacific coast and wherever there is interest in Canada's fisheries. All of us realize that things have been a bit awkward for a number of years. For a while we had a minister of the environment. That was his full title, except that under certain conditions he was also Canada's minister of fisheries. Then we had a minister of the environment with a minister of state for fisheries. For a while now we have had the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment with a Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand). I suspect that that confusion has carried over into the department as well.

However, just as soon as what the minister has announced today can be put into legislative form, that will be sorted out, and I think we all welcome very warmly what the minister has said. I believe his idea of a department of fisheries and oceans does cover the broader responsibilities of that department, and we welcome most heartily what he has said.

I am sorry that the hon. member for St. John's East has had to step out for a moment because I want to say something about one remark he made. I always enjoy his speeches, and many a time I find myself getting up as soon as I can afterwards to endorse and support what he has said. However, he said one thing today which really made me smile. He accused the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment of being arrogant. Sir, if the level of arrogance of all the cabinet ministers was no higher than that of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, they would be a human bunch over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1742)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this minister has displayed not only decency and fair play in his dealings with members of the House, but has shown extreme competence in his department. I suppose it is particularly easy to give him this bit of commendation now that he has come through with his excellent statement.

This is an occasion when it does not matter whether the motion is talked out. The purpose in moving it has been achieved. I am sure the implementation of what the minister announced today will be good for the people engaged in the fishing industry and good for the people of Canada. We all welcome it most warmly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in putting forward the idea of a separate department I am sure the hon. member realizes that he has been preaching to the converted, or the about to be converted as soon as the machinery can be set in motion for the actual change. I think hon. members will agree that, having taken over the 63,000 square miles with the 200-mile fisheries zone, we will have plenty of water for the baptism of the new department.

All this goes to show that the fishery is big in area. It is also big in economic importance. The people of Canada need a fisheries department equipped to handle the job and identified specifically for the job. Without the separate identification of a fisheries department, the fishermen feel, in a way, cheated. The sea fishermen know that theirs is probably the one occupation in Canada that is, at almost every level, under the direct control of the federal government. I believe fishermen feel the government should dedicate a department to the care of fishermen who are so important to the economy.
