CHAPTER XII, GATHERING CLOUDS. The house which had been engaged for Sic Frederick and Lady Randall was was an odd mixture, which was not, induced in Park Lane overlooking Hyde Park, and was a very splendid mansion. Of the quantity and quality of the furniture, it is sufficient to say that it had been ordered by Mrs. Adams herself, who had astonished the respectable British upholsterer by instructing him to "fix" as much gilt moulding, and blue velvet, and looking-glass as the rooms would possibly bear, to lay down carpets so thick and soft that you could not hear on them the foot-tread of any one, "no more than if he had got his Arctics on," and generally to complete would occasionally take a hand; but he were crowded.

The English nobility was very sparsely represented; but there were French counts, and German baronets and Spanish marquises in scores, and they were most of them very distinguished-looking men, particularly about their hair and beard, and they were little scraps of ribbon at their button-holes, and their necks.

He hears and strives to pause, but the hag clings to him, and floating by his side, urges him towards the cavern. On a sudden flashes into his mind a chance for liberating himself. As they near the edge of the pit, he seizes his companion by the throat, and hurls her into the abyss. As she falls, and ere she disappears from his sight, her face changes, and in place of the hideous features comes Kitty's pallid beauty and agonizing eyes.

on with his hostess, and made himself as though, in his guilty conscience

For Hiram P., though ordinarily easy going and affectionate, was a stern and implacable man, when, as he imagined, anything like a breach of morals was involved.

In his own domestic life, as in the case with most American citizens of his class, he had been pure and loyal, and though, as his wife has said, he was frequently in the old days, in the habit of sitting about the hall of the Critten den House, Titusville, he was a 'strict temperance man, and never touched a card in his life.

He idolized his daughter, too, from

Sir Frederick was out a great deal in the daytime, it is true—at his clubs, he said, and at various places of busiess—but in the evening he either took her to the theater or remained at home to help her entertain her company.

For they had a great many visitors, and already knew quite a large number of people; and when they threw their house open in the evening, as they did two or three times a week the rooms were crowded.

fire storm had recently swept across its surface. What is that in its midst? A gaping chasm, black and cavernous as the mouth of hell! It looks dark and dangerous, but he has an indefinable longing to approach it. This strange shape, too, bent and crooked, yet with something of a woman's outline, beckons him luringly onward! "What is this." the hag says, as she points with her skinny forefinger: "To thy fate, Frederick Randall! To thy fate!"

He hears and strives to pause, but the hag clings to him, and floating by the last of the fire deal and friendless. Nevertheless, she strove to bear up and fine dies. Nevertheless, she strove to bear up and fine dies. Nevertheless, she strove to bear up and fine dies.

Some of them too, but not many, brought ladies with them, whose style of dress alarmed Minnie very much indeed, and caused Mrs. Adams to utter sundry strong ejaculations, smacking more of her early life in the outspoken oil regions, rather than of her more recent experiences in polite society.

And Minnie noticed with surprise, somewhat touched with regret, that very few of her own countrymen and country-women visited her, and that such of them as did come never returned.

The Secretary to the American Legation, who is known as the most courteous and kindest man in London, came to one of Lady Randall's receptions. He was observed to start as he entered the room and look round. But it was only for a moment; he recovered himself directly, entered into conversa-remarkably popular generally; but, though constantly invited he never went again to Lady Randall's house, and has always endeavored to blot that evening from his merency.

The later than in the gunty considered, fearing that the influence of his dream had extended to her, but her breathing was soft and regular, and her sleep calm and untroubled as that of a child.

Then he stole from his bed and crept evening from his memory.

Did Lady Randall heed all this? She was an odd mixture, which was not, however, very uncommon, being both sensitive and high-spirited at the same time and she would undoubtedly have

He idolized his daughter, too, from the bottom of his heart; and if he had found that she was in any way neglected by her husband, who at the same tirself felt.

But Minnie began to think that she had been anticipating evil unnecessarily, for the first few weeks after they returned to London, and took possession of their new home, were as happy as possible.
