THE BAPTISM

[It is now, we believe, many years since these beautiful lines by Mrs. Snowdon, appeared. Having been requested to insert them for the benefit and pleasure of many who may not have seen them, we readily comply.]

'Twas near the close of that blest day, when with melodious swell,
The day passed on and it was growing late,
When the stranger, who had not noticed the flight of time, Rose to bid farewell to Mrs. O'Hara.
She wept at parting with him, and assured him That the Lord had sent him. And you were sad, For he had loved this kind and pleasant visitor.
'Andy,' said he, 'do you think you will ever emigrate to America?'

'Emigrate to America!' exclaimed Andy, least in the magnitude of the idea. 'Sure—sure—' he stammered, 'I don't know.'
'Because if you do I want you to come to me.'
'To you, sir? that I will,' cried Andy joyously.
'I'll leave you my name, and the place where I live.'

So the stranger took from his pocket a card and pencilled on it his name, 'Frank Trueman,' and his place of residence, which was at the town of F., in one of the British American provinces.
'Now, Andy,' said he, 'keep that. Learn it, so that if you lose the card you'll remember the name; then if you ever come out come straight to me.'

'I will,' said Andy earnestly.
No more was said. The stranger departed, and mother and son watched him till he was out of sight.
Three years had passed away since the events above related, when a large ship from London docked along side the wharf at an American seaport to land her passengers. There they turned out, the motley crowd, made up of wild Irish peasantry, fresh from the green turf of the Emerald Isle; all of one race, but of widely different characteristics. And if you accompany me in thought to this wharf, kind reader, you will see among them our friend Andy O'Hara.

He is fifteen years old now instead of twelve; but if we except his slightly increased size, he differs very little from the boy we saw at Ballylian. You would know that bright eye and that beaming smile among a thousand, you could recognize that hearty and musical laugh though you should hear it at the antipodes. Andy is evidently a great favorite with all, and a great help to all in their hour of need. There is no farther to his clear brain than puzzled amid the crowd surrounding novelties. He gathers together the movements of his many friends with the calmness and skill of a veteran father of a family. Now an aged widow seizes him to implore him to find her child; now a middle aged man in corduroy asks anxiously after his tea-table; now a little boy comes bawling to him to take him to his mammy; but with widow, with middle aged man, and with boy Andy is equally successful.

When Andy entered Mr. Trueman's place of business he found him engaged with some of his accounts. As soon as he saw the boy he came forward to meet him, and shook hands with him very kindly.
'Well, Andy, how was your mother when you left her?'

'Pretty well, thank yer honor,' said Andy, whose lip quivered at the remembrance of his mother.
'She still holds on to the good book then?'

'O yes, yer honor. Father O'Donoghue never find out that same. She'd get up in her wool, and nobody would know what she'd be after but me, not even the other children.'

'The other children? I didn't see any when I was there.'
'No, sir. They was all at Cromarty, yer honor.'

'Well, Andy, you're in America at last. I'll get some work for you. Can you drive oxen?'

'Yes, yer honor, or horses either, whichever you like.'
'I've got some teams hauling just now, and if you're good at it, I should like you to go to work at them.'
'Heh! whatever ye like sir,' said Andy.
'Well, then, to-morrow I'll tell you what is to be done. I'll take you to my house just now—I'll have you for my man about the house, and you can drive teams through the day. I'll see in about a month what you can do.'

After writing a little more Mr. Trueman walked to his house and ushered Andy into his own home.

their conversation was of the things of heaven.
The stranger was a man of piety, learning, and kindliness. There could not have been found one who could have more perfectly cleared away the darkness from Mrs. O'Hara's soul.

The day passed on and it was growing late, when the stranger, who had not noticed the flight

'No, sir. They was all at Cromarty, yer honor.'

'Well, Andy, you're in America at last. I'll get some work for you. Can you drive oxen?'

'Why, they have a regular system of plantation; the unfort'ble emigrant,' said the skilful. 'As soon as the ship is in sight, the boarding-house send their runners down to her. These are the fellows that praise up the houses, and try to get the passengers to go to them.'

'Wor them fellows that kind?' asked Andy.
'I saw a dozen or more come to the ship.'
'Yes, and they've made a nice hall of it time.'

'But the men I saw were all Irishmen.'
'Certainly my fine feller, that's just precisely what they are.'

'An' do Irish hate the emigrants that way?' Och, no, I won't believe it.'
'Wal, you'd a felt it if you'd a got into their clutches, I tell you.'

'How do they treat them?'

'Why, they get them at their houses, and keep them there till all their money is gone, an' then walk 'em off. I don't tak' long to get all the money the poor fellows have, for they grog 'em an' likker 'em till they're blind. I tell you it would make your heart bleed if you knew what I've seen.'

'The black plunderers!' cried Andy in a rage; 'the black plunderers.' An' do they live out of this poor this way? I'at there a way to shop them?'

'Wal, no. Government tries, but it can't do nothing. One thing I know—now no offense, young man—we would go down to such a business. I'm too low for any body but a Caribbee.'

There was a time when this sneer at his religion would have excited Andy to madness; but now he took little pride in it. He therefore said nothing, but sadly turned away to look at the spires of F., which now were visible in the distance.

They arrived there about sunset, having sailed a little over twenty-four hours. When Andy landed, he found very little difficulty in getting to Mr. Trueman's place of business.

F. is a town whose chief and only business, in fact, is the lumber trade. Saw-mills abound all around it, and the river, which here empties into the sea, is constantly floating down rafts of logs for the ever-working mills. It is a very busy little place, and its harbor is always full of vessels waiting for their cargoes. The wharves are piled up high with boards and planks, and the banks of the river are white with saw dust. Still it is a pretty little place. Nature has done much for it, and at the upper end of the harbor, some distance away from the river, the ground is well cultivated, and there are very many pretty cottages.

Mr. Trueman was one of the principal business men of F. He owned two extensive mills and several moderate sized vessels. Ever industrious, frugal, enterprising, kind in his business, and honorable in all his dealings, he had not only amassed a fortune, but had also gained an enviable reputation.

When Andy entered Mr. Trueman's place of business he found him engaged with some of his accounts. As soon as he saw the boy he came forward to meet him, and shook hands with him very kindly.

'Well, Andy, how was your mother when you
