It does seem to me this is another matter that could be disposed of very easily. This is not the first time I have spoken in this house about old debts. The other evening I mentioned the subject in connection with another matter, but I know I would be out of order if I referred to it. Just because certain of these people are able to pay their debts does not mean everyone is able to do that. It depends entirely upon the circumstances, not only in the west but in the east as well. I think it is about time this matter was given serious consideration and these old debts were cancelled.

Terminable services—

555. Post discharge rehabilitation benefits, including the training of merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners, $3,677,500.

Mr. McLure: In this item what is meant by the training of merchant seamen—I know what that means—and salt water fishermen pensioners? What training and educational benefits have been given to salt water fishermen, and what fishermen in Prince Edward Island have had any benefit from that item?

Mr. Lapointe: I could not tell the hon. member how many Prince Edward Island men are affected by this vote, but it covers vocational training for these people. I am informed that at the present time we only have 190 veterans left in vocational training.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are any veterans in Newfoundland receiving benefits from this vote?

Mr. Lapointe: I am not sure if I have the information broken down by provinces. I shall look it up.

Mr. Dinsdale: Under this section I should like to refer to a matter that has come to my attention on several occasions recently. It concerns the administration of the army benevolent fund. I trust I am in order in mentioning it here, because it is not mentioned elsewhere specifically.

Mr. Mutch: It is not administered by the department, so you will not find it in the estimates.

Mr. Lapointe: The army benevolent fund operates under an act which was amended the other day. It is administered by a voluntary board which reports through the Minister of Veterans Affairs to parliament. The annual report is tabled in this house, but the department has nothing to do with the administration of the fund.

Mr. Dinsdale: Under what item or circumstances could one refer to the army benevolent fund?

Mr. Lapointe: You mean in the house?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Lapointe: Well, there was a bill that came up the other day, and upon which there was a short debate.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

Mr. Lapointe: I would suggest that it might come under the item of administration, since the board must report to the minister. However, I have no objection if the hon. member wants to put a question.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member could ask a question and the minister will see if he can reply.

Mr. Dinsdale: Briefly, the problem is this. Under the present set-up of the act only veterans of world war II are covered by the army benevolent fund. I understand that this is due to the fact the fund was created from amounts of money that were accumulated during world war II. The problem arises, however, with the increasing number of Korean veterans who are applying for benefits under this act. Those responsible for administering the fund must inform these Korean veterans that they are not eligible.

Upon making inquiries I find that the air force benevolent fund and the navy benevolent fund, which I understand are privately operated, have overcome the difficulty and apply the same treatment to Korean veterans as to veterans of world war II. They do it by a simple formula, in that they receive one per cent of all canteen funds. The information I have is that the only way the present anomalies in the army benevolent fund can be remedied is by government action. I am assured that the officers administering the fund are willing to take on this added responsibility, if there were a means whereby they could do so.

Mr. Lapointe: The hon. member is quite right in saying that only world war II veterans can benefit from the army benevolent fund. This fund was made up, as the hon. member knows, from regimental and canteen funds during world war II. He is also quite right in saying that the only manner in which the Korean veterans could be permitted to benefit from the fund would be through an act of parliament, because the board must necessarily administer the fund according to the act and the benefits are extended only to world war II veterans.

Each year the board makes recommendations to the minister, and as a result of those recommendations this year we had certain amendments to the act. I shall be pleased to discuss with the members of the board any further extensions which they might think appropriate.

While I am on my feet I might also answer the question asked by the hon. member for St. John's West with regard to the number of Newfoundland veterans who might have received vocational training. I am informed that at the time of union we took over sixty-two veteran trainees of Newfoundland who had not yet completed their rehabilitation training. Of these, seventeen were being trained in Newfoundland, forty in other provinces, three in the United States, and the remaining two in the United Kingdom. Of these, sixty were being trained in universities and two in vocational courses.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are they all finished now?

Mr. Lapointe: It is exceedingly difficult to say. I would not have that information. I would venture to say that most of the university trainees would be finished by now.

Mr. Green: This item covers post-discharge rehabilitation benefits. For some time there has been a considerable amount of veteran opinion in favour of some action being taken to extend benefits of this type to the children of those men who lost their lives in the service of the country. For example, at the recent dominion convention of the Canadian Legion two resolutions dealing with this subject were passed. The first one read:

> Whereas knowledge of resulting hardships encountered by widows and children of veterans of world war II who made the supreme sacrifice, when the age limit is reached and no further allowances are paid on behalf of the dependent children; and
> Whereas it is desirable that the children be given an opportunity to continue their education and where the widow may desire to build a home or purchase new furniture, etc., for the benefit of her children:
> Therefore be it resolved that all such entitlement and credits, etc., which the veteran would have received had he been spared to return be made available to his family.

There was a further resolution which read this way:

> Whereas the widows of servicemen who were killed or who died during service will be unable to educate their children to the same standard which might have been attained had the father returned; and
> Whereas it is in the best interests of the nation to have the rising generation well educated, particularly the children of men who died for their country:
> Therefore be it resolved that the federal government be requested to instigate a policy for such dependents similar to that in force for single student veterans attending university or vocational training schools and receiving a monthly allowance under the Rehabilitation Act.

Following that convention the new president of the Legion presented a supplementary brief to the special committee on veterans affairs, as the minister knows. At page 5 of that brief we find this statement with regard to these rehabilitation credits. He quotes part of these resolutions I have read, and in addition says this:

> The convention further indicated that it felt that the country, in memory of its war dead, could do something more for the family of one who died in service, and recommended that the rehabilitation credits which would have accrued had the husband or father lived or some equivalent provisions be made available for his family.

Then after quoting the resolutions the Legion end their submission in this way:

These two resolutions are similar in purpose, and we are sure will commend themselves, both to the members of this committee and to the government. The people of Canada through their government would want to assume the obligation indicated in these resolutions, and see that these young people be assured of an opportunity for training and education which we may reasonably assume the father would have provided had he not laid down his life for his country.

In connection with this suggestion there are two features which I think merit consideration by the department. The first is that there was, of course, no liability to the country for the rehabilitation of these men who lost their lives. The second is that these children whose fathers were killed or who died in the service of the country are unlikely to have the same chance to obtain an education or to obtain a thorough training that they would have had if the father had returned to Canada. I believe that veterans generally are in favour of some proposal such as that suggested by the Legion. I would ask the minister to let us know the views of the department on this question.

Mr. Lapointe: The resolution was passed on to me by the executive council of the Legion and along with other resolutions it is now being studied by the department and will be considered by the cabinet. That is all I can say at this stage.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

561. To provide for protection of security—soldier settlement, and refunds of surplus to veterans, $25,000.

Mr. Brooks: May we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. Lapointe: That is the usual vote for the settlement of veterans under the Veterans Land Act, to purchase property and so on. My hon. friend will see that there is also a supplementary estimate.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Might I point out that the purchase of property at Montney in the Peace river country for some 32 veterans has turned out successfully. This land was acquired from the Indian affairs branch, or at least from the Indians. It was reserve land. I think you have there an example that might be copied all over British Columbia and in many other parts of the country. Arable land owned by the Indians or reserve land not being cultivated could profitably be taken over, as was done at Montney, and good prosperous homes could be provided for many of our veterans.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: There are four supplementary estimates to be found at pages 21 and 22 of the white book.

Pensions and other benefits—

816. War veterans allowances—further amount required, $5,850,000.

Mr. Brooks: May we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. Lapointe: This is to meet the increases which were provided by the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Item agreed to.

817. Gallantry awards—world war 2 and special force—further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. Brooks: May we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. Lapointe: This is to provide for the payment of money for gallantry awards for the Korean force, the same as were given to veterans of world war II.

Mr. Brooks: Has the government ever considered giving money awards to veterans of world war I for these military awards? I do not think they received the same consideration as that received by veterans of world war II or that which is being received by the veterans in the Korean war.

Mr. Lapointe: This matter was brought up before in the discussion on the estimates. During the first world war we were not paying; the British government was paying the monetary awards attached to these decorations. During the second world war we took over the payment of the awards that had been paid by the United Kingdom government in respect of world war I. Then during the second world war there were pecuniary awards given in connection with other decorations, which were not given during the first world war. We now assume payment for all. But we follow a uniform policy with the rest of the countries of the commonwealth as regards world war I decorations.

Mr. Cardiff: Has any consideration been given to Canadians who were imperial veterans of world war I and were paid in pounds sterling? Has there been any consideration of the fact that the pound sterling is so low in value?

Mr. Lapointe: I would not think that question would come under this item. These veterans are receiving disability pensions from the British government.

Mr. Cardiff: But due to the fact that the pound is so low in value they would not be receiving very much.

Mr. McLure: How many South African war veterans do we still have in Canada? I notice that we have a pension fund for them.

Mr. Lapointe: I shall endeavour to get those figures. We would have the number of recipients of war veterans allowances, but I do not think I have the figure the hon. member seeks.

While I am on my feet I should like to correct an answer I gave to the hon. member for Royal this afternoon in connection with veterans insurance. He asked me the number of policies in force at the present time and I replied that there were 32,142. The figure should have been 26,985.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

821. To provide for purchase of land and permanent improvements; cost of permanent improvements to be effected; removal of encumbrances; stock and equipment; refund of surplus to veterans (section 19); and for protection of security under the Veterans Land Act—further amount required, $2,500,000.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister explain this item.

Mr. Lapointe: This deals with the same subject matter as the vote in the main estimates in respect of settlement under the Veterans Land Act. It was found that the number of veterans qualified would be such that we would require this supplementary amount of $2,500,000.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

330. Departmental administration, $584,997.

Mr. Green: Is the Minister of Public Works making any statement concerning the work of his department?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, I could make a real statement by reading what is in the estimate book. The Department of Public Works is not a policy-making department; we service departments, and we try to help every department of government as well as hon. members and people throughout the country who require public works. If it would please the hon. member I would be prepared to read the list of works we are undertaking, but I believe this would be an expenditure of time that would not be justified because hon. members have had this book of estimates for the last three or four months, and I know they are familiar with nearly every item. However, if they have any questions in respect of any project I shall be ready to do my best to answer them.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, there is one feature about the department which gives me some concern, and which I think could be dealt with by the minister. I refer to the extent to which other departments of government are doing construction work.

I have had this matter in mind for some time, and I see by the morning press that the special committee of the Senate has made a recommendation on this same point. The dispatch I hold in my hand is headed "Ottawa is hit for by-passing Public Works". That makes it look as though the minister is being by-passed and we do not like to see that happen.

The report of the Senate committee has not yet reached us, but I have here the proceedings of the meeting of the committee where they cross-examined the deputy minister of this department. According to this press dispatch several definite recommendations were made concerning the Department of Public Works. The article sets out these recommendations:

(1) That federal government departments stop by-passing the public works department to build their own works. The report said this should be handled by the public works department, as the law intended.

Then the second recommendation deals with postage. The article then goes on to say:

Regarding public works the report said that departments other than the public works department plan to spend more this year than the $80 million budget of the public works department for this purpose.

Then follows this quotation from the report of the Senate committee:

It certainly appears this can have no other effect than duplication and overlapping and the inevitable general increase in costs that is bound to result from this practice.

Then the dispatch goes on to say:

Although provision was made in legislation for other departments to build their own works—

And again the article quotes from the report of the Senate committee:

—surely this was only intended to meet special circumstances, and was never meant to be used in the broad sense in which it is used today.

The hon. senators brought out during the course of their cross-examination the fact that public works were being constructed by the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. They refer also to canals being constructed by the Department of Transport, to the Canso causeway and to the airports also under the jurisdiction of that department. Then they make reference to armouries being built by the Department of National Defence, though I think they meant the Department of Defence Production. There is reference to the new building on the Montreal road for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is being constructed by that corporation. There is further reference to buildings being constructed by the Department of National Revenue, to buildings by national parks branch, by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and to construction being done by the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Fisheries and by the commissioner of penitentiaries. I have only had time to glance through the report of this Senate committee rather quickly. I think other departments or branches of government are mentioned there, and it would look as though something of a raid is being made by other departments on the functions of the Department of Public Works. They seem to be wolfing the Department of Public Works.

This is really a serious matter because the Department of Public Works was set up, I think at the time of confederation, for the purpose of constructing public works in Canada. The department was entrusted with the construction of public works. I should like to know why that situation is being changed. It appears that under part II of the Public Works Act there is provision for another department to take away from the Department of Public Works the building of projects, and we have had many examples of this.

I raised this matter yesterday with the Minister of Defence Production. That department does all the building for the Department of National Defence, but that was not so before the second world war. Hon. members will remember that at that time defence building was done by the Department of Public Works. Certain forts were built in Vancouver, and if my memory serves me correctly they were built by the Department of Public Works.

Some weeks ago the Minister of Defence Production explained that his department was temporary, and it was hoped that eventually the work would be handed over to other departments. I would have thought that when that time came defence projects would go back to the Department of Public Works. When I asked the Minister of Defence Production about that yesterday he replied, as reported on page 3631 of Hansard:

Mr. Green: The minister said a few days ago that he did not expect the Department of Defence Production to be carried on indefinitely. I presume that in due course this work of building projects for the Department of National Defence will revert to the Department of Public Works? Is that the intention?

Mr. Howe: That is a matter that cannot be predicted at this time. When the work handled by the Department of Defence Production becomes so small that it does not warrant the overhead of a separate department, the work will be placed elsewhere; but I cannot predict at this time where the work will be placed.

Apparently it is quite indefinite as to just which department will take on this work when the Department of Defence Production folds up. I am afraid that if this trend continues of having construction work done by different departments it will be more expensive than having the work done by the Department of Public Works. After all, the minister has trained men in his department and it has been their job for many years to build public works. I do not see why other departments should step in and take away that construction work. If it goes on the Department of Public Works will soon be in a position where it is not qualified to handle many of these projects. None of us would want that to happen. I do not believe the department is being given a proper chance at the present time, and I hope that the minister will put his foot down with his colleagues and see that these projects become the responsibility of his department.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I am sure the praise and the encouragement of the hon. member in connection with the work of the officials of my department will be greatly appreciated. I was really flattered when I saw this Senate report where they indicated that all construction should come under the Department of Public Works. I would be the last to object to that. They indicate that more construction is going on outside the Department of Public Works than is done by that department, so I can visualize the department with a staff two and a half times as large as we have at the present time. I ask myself whether that increase would be justified when we know that most of the construction being done by other departments is of a temporary nature and may disappear within one, two or three years.

The hon. gentleman mentioned that the Department of Public Works was an old department of government. It was created at the time of confederation and has existed ever since. It has under its control all buildings and the housing of government services, and I am referring particularly to office space. Other departments have handled construction work. The Department of National Defence has always had an engineering staff in charge of the construction of barracks and other works which were never under the Department of Public Works.

In former years practically all works along rivers and harbours were under the Department of Public Works, but then the national harbours board and other harbour commissions came into being and they undertook these works themselves. Then as to Indian schools, the Indian affairs branch has architects with special knowledge in these matters, and they are handling this construction. In the past this was handled by the Department of Public Works. In the matter of hospitals we do act for the Department of National Health and Welfare, as we do for many other departments.

My hon. friend should not fear that the Department of Public Works will disappear or that the officials in the department will not be able to handle any construction that is approved by hon. members in the way of estimates. Our present staff is not sufficiently large to handle all the construction work mentioned in the estimates. There is a shortage of this type of technical men and we cannot always undertake all the public works that are approved. They may drag on for a year or two, but eventually we are able to construct the authorized wharves, piers and breakwaters and do the dredging that is called for.

I think this department should avoid haste in the development of projects. I cannot change the mentality of the staff of my department. These men come in at an early age and are trained under a certain procedure and technique. It is often said that the Department of Public Works has the most red tape, and after ten years at the head of that department I think it is true. Hon. members may not realize how many reports must be made before a recommendation can be made to the treasury board and cabinet for authorization to present an estimate to parliament. For the sake of protecting the public I think it is good that we follow this procedure. Quite often hasty work is wasted work, and we pride ourselves upon having the most economical department in the government. This means that we have many revotes every session, but that in turn indicates that we have given a lot of thought and are ever aware of the responsibility which devolves upon us under the statute governing this department. I am always pleased to hear it said that certain works should come under the public works department. Nothing would please me more than to handle a good many projects, but I do not believe I could give satisfaction without increasing the staff. I think other temporary departments could do the work more expeditiously than it could be done by the public works department. The hon. member spoke of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I would not contest their right to put up their building. They must have experts. That is their line of business; but that organization did not exist when the public works department was created. It is another creation of government which has come about in modern times.

As to canal work, I think in the transport department they have people with special training who are capable of doing that work. I would not want to undertake to handle all construction work. Being a servant of the other departments and the public is quite difficult enough with the task we have now, because you would be surprised how many people are not satisfied with what we are doing. We are not doing it very quickly, so I think I would leave well enough alone as Minister of Public Works and do the best I can with the works we have to handle.

Mr. Green: I am afraid the minister is a real Tory.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I beg your pardon; oh, no. That is the only word I object to in what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. Green: I am afraid we have a real reactionary here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is not what they say on my side.

Mr. Green: After all, this department is meant to be the building department of the government. That is its job. The minister himself has pointed out that he believes the taxpayers get better protection from his department than they do from the other departments.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did not say that.

Mr. Green: That is what it meant.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no; I did not say it and I did not mean it, so do not put a meaning on my words that I did not intend to give. Other departments are doing a wonderful job under the circumstances. I am trying to give the traditions of the Department of Public Works. We have certain traditions. It is not only the Tories who have traditions. They exist in other parties too.

Mr. Green: The minister put it in this way. He said that his department gave great protection to the public. He explained what great trouble they went to in preparing their estimates. He told us all about the red tape and all the precautions to protect the public. Surely the public is entitled to just as much protection in the other departments.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Ask the other departments. Don't ask me.

Mr. Green: I will be glad to help the minister.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I don't need that help.

Mr. Green: I am afraid the minister is getting an inferiority complex.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That may happen.

Mr. Green: He seems quite prepared to sit back and let other departments kick him around. I suggest in all seriousness—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only man who has kicked me around is you.

Mr. Green: The minister does not mind that. He kicks back, and well, too. I suggest in all seriousness that the present trend means the building up in other departments of staffs to carry on these building projects, adding an engineer here and an architect there, whereas that work should be done by the staff of the Department of Public Works which has facilities for doing these jobs. I believe no one would quarrel with the minister making additions to his staff so they could handle most of these public works projects. I do not believe there can be any question that there is bound to be duplication and waste of public money where you have a dozen or more different government departments doing their own building.

Mr. McIvor: The minister was kind enough to say that if there is any project about which we wish to inquire now is the time to do so. I should like to tell the minister that we have an outstanding need in Fort William. I have been after the project for over twelve years and we are still keeping at it. I refer to a breakwater in front of island No. 2 for the storage of pulpwood and logs for our two large paper mills, our sawmills and the use of industry generally on that island. Two large delegations came here last March, and I expect their number will be doubled next year. All I want the minister to do is consider this as an important project, because we hope to get it next year.

Mr. Hees: I have spoken to the minister on several occasions during the past few months in an endeavour to ascertain from him what the government is going to do to prevent further deterioration of the Toronto islands. I have not yet had an answer from him, and I hope I shall be able to get one tonight. I have emphasized to the minister the essential part these islands play in the formation of Toronto harbour. I pointed out that without these islands, there would not be any Toronto harbour at all. I have also pointed out to him that the Toronto harbour is a very important part of the projected St. Lawrence seaway and that if the situation with respect to the islands is allowed to deteriorate further, the cost of repair in the years ahead will be many times more than it would be at the present time.

Eventually that cost will have to be borne by the federal government, because harbours are a federal responsibility. I have talked recently with Mayor Lamport of Toronto, and he tells me that he is getting nowhere with the Department of Public Works. Frankly, he thinks he is getting the run-around from the minister. I should like to make a suggestion to the minister, who is a very practical politician. It is well known that the Liberal party would like to have Allan Lamport as its leader in Ontario, and he is pretty reluctant about taking on that rather thankless task at the present time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would not come under any item of public works, Mr. Chairman. I am sure of that.

Mr. Hees: I am just making a helpful suggestion. A very good way to persuade Mayor Lamport to take on that rather unattractive task at the present time would be for the federal government to assist the city of Toronto with regard to the Toronto islands. I am trying to help the minister, who is a practical politician.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are not going to get me to choose the leader in Ontario. I have enough troubles in Quebec.

Mr. Hees: All I can do is make all the suggestions possible. I am simply trying to help the minister.

Mr. Fraser: One mistake was enough.

Mr. Hees: As the hon. member for Peterborough West says, one mistake was enough. I would appreciate it very much if the minister would tell me, at long last, what the department intends to do with regard to assisting the city of Toronto in building protective works to help stop any further deterioration of the Toronto islands which, as I pointed out, are a vitally important and necessary part of the Toronto harbour.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand that the damage to the islands is caused by high water and floods—

Mr. Hees: Storms.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Storms—and that high water in a harbour does not do any harm. It may damage the islands, but the islands do not come under our jurisdiction at all. If we were to undertake to repair damages every time there was a flood or high water in the district I do not know if we could cope with the situation. I have said many times in the house that no district has suffered more from floods and high water than my own home city right across the river here. You see the Gatineau flowing into the Ottawa river, and every spring one-third of a town of about 4,000 people is flooded. When I was a member, before I became a minister in the government, I did make requests and pleas to get help for those poor people in Gatineau Point who were flooded. I never succeeded. When I became minister I had the dual capacity of member and Minister of Public Works, and I have had many discussions with myself as to what should be done for those people. If you are speaking about politics, and I know a little about that subject, I do not know why the member for Hull should not have had the best of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Hees: I am surprised that he didn't.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To date I have not convinced myself that it is any responsibility of the federal government; and if that principle is good in my own riding I think it should be equally good in Toronto. We have no jurisdiction unless it becomes a matter of a national disaster. When the municipality asks the province of Ontario for help in this direction, and when the province of Ontario will say: we cannot cope, the expenditure is too large, they can always come to the federal government and I am sure the federal government would consider any request from the province of Ontario under those circumstances.

Mr. Hees: I quite realize that every time there is flooding or erosion the federal government cannot be expected to right the situation. That would not be reasonable, and I have not appealed to the minister to do anything about the great losses and damage done to the shores of Toronto itself by erosion and flooding, nor have I appealed on a humanitarian basis for those who live on the islands, for property damage and so on. I am simply appealing on the basis that harbours, as I understand, are federal responsibilities. If this deterioration continues, then you are going to have no Toronto harbour. If you want to have a Toronto harbour as a vital part of the St. Lawrence seaway, it will have to be built up in the future, which will cost many, many times more than it would cost at the present time.

If the federal government has no intention of assisting Toronto in preserving its harbour, I would like the minister to say that now. If they do intend to help Toronto preserve the harbour I would like to know what steps they intend to take. I would like to know how we stand. Does the dominion government intend to help or not?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would like to know the answer the hon. gentleman received from the province of Ontario.

Mr. Hees: As I understand it, harbours such as this are a federal responsibility.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I told you that high water helps us.

Mr. Hees: There is deterioration of the harbour.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): My officials tell me there is no deterioration of the harbour.

Mr. Ferguson: I do not intend to advise the Liberal government how to select a leader for the province of Ontario; if they continue as they have in the past it will be very satisfactory, in my opinion. However, I would like to mention to the minister the drydock contemplated for Collingwood.

This is a coldblooded business proposition, because I believe it is most essential to the shipping facilities on the great lakes. It is the logical location for it, and considerable progress has been made on the project. Owing to the fact that nowadays they are building large tankers and large iron ore carriers it has become more essential than ever that a big drydock capable of handling this type of boat be constructed at Collingwood. Can the minister inform me how rapidly that work might be expected to proceed?

Recently, within the last few months, one of the newer tankers was damaged by fire at Sarnia, and I believe the repairs alone amount to approximately $1½ million. They found it necessary to take that boat to the United States for repairs because we have no drydock on the great lakes capable of handling the large tonnage boats that are now being constructed.

I am sure the minister would be glad to give me information on when the work may be started on the new drydock at Collingwood which is so essential to all great lakes shipping.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand there is a company called the Collingwood Drydock Company that wishes to undertake these works. They are associated with Canada Steamship Lines and they are actually negotiating with the officials of my department to see whether they can come under the Dry Docks Subsidies Act. They are preparing plans, and if they meet the conditions set out in the Dry Docks Subsidies Act they will benefit from the act and get a contribution or a grant spread over so many years. They have not finalized their plans or the negotiations for this grant.

Mr. Ferguson: Thank you very much.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Referring to the point raised by the hon. member for Broadview, my recollection is that when this subject was up in March the minister did say he was getting a report on the situation from one of his engineers. Am I right in that? And if I am right, has that report been received? Because, as the member for Broadview said, it seems to me it is very desirable that we should know whether any responsibility is assumed here. Somebody certainly should be assuming responsibility, and if the minister's engineer has reported then can we not know; and if he has not, should we not know what is going on?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is right; and the engineer reports that it is not our responsibility, that the harbour did not suffer any damages. I just explained before the hon. gentleman came in that for flood situations, high water and damage by storms we have no jurisdiction or responsibility unless the damage is to our own works. As the high water in the harbour of Toronto does not stop the traffic or harm the harbour we have no responsibility for the damage on the island. As I explained, if we were to cover all damage occasioned by storms and floods I would be the first to try to benefit from that responsibility because in my own district, two miles from here, every spring you will see the most terrible flood conditions.

Mr. Hees: But there is no harbour there.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There is no harbour but people are living right alongside that river.

Mr. Hees: We are talking about a harbour.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If you are speaking on humanitarian grounds, and as you said a moment ago you were speaking for the people on the island—

Mr. Hees: As I explained to the minister I am not speaking on humanitarian grounds, because I realize that is not a federal responsibility. I am speaking because I believe this is a harbour which is a federal responsibility.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is your opinion, that it is our responsibility. Not being my deputy minister nor my adviser, do you think I should take your opinion on this or take the opinion of those who have spent their lives on these works? Perhaps I am all wrong; perhaps I should tell my officers: Don't tell me these stories; the member for Broadview knows best.

Mr. Hees: We are beginning to get somewhere.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Up to now I am not convinced I would be right in doing that.

Mr. Hees: I am most amazed that the minister took the trouble to send his engineer to investigate the matter if all along it was not a federal responsibility. It seemed to me that by sending his engineer, the minister agreed that it was a federal responsibility, but I take it that the federal government refuses to do anything in that regard.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You will not make me say what I do not want to say. The gentleman asks: why did you send your engineer? What would you have said if I had not sent an engineer to look at the damage?

Mr. Hees: I would expect you to have said that it was not a federal responsibility and that there was no reason for sending an engineer.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have told you twice what the report was.

Mr. Hees: The report of your engineer is different from the report by the city of Toronto.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am neither the mayor nor a councillor of the city of Toronto. I happen to be the minister of the federal public works department. I have listened to the praise given by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and if you and he agree that we have the best of officials and do the best of jobs, then we will make some progress with these estimates.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask a question, but unfortunately I lost my voice down on the Saguenay. Well, I enjoyed the Quebec hospitality down there. I think the minister can hear me. Tonight I am not speaking just about the Fraser valley. One of the Quebec members had a resolution on the order paper concerning river bank erosion on the St. Lawrence. In my own district river bank erosion is the most important thing facing us. I am not talking about harbours now. In the old days the municipality or local authority could care for this, but surely the minister realizes the problem has gone far beyond the ability of the local authority to cope with. He must realize that from his experience in his own district across the river. I thought the minister said, and I should like to be corrected on it, that the request must come from the provincial authority if assistance is required in connection with river bank erosion?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Our department undertakes certain works when they affect our own federal works or if the damage is caused by our own work or by navigation. That is a clear principle. People suffer from floods or high water or storms, and we believe it is the responsibility of the municipality to cope with the situation. They generally address themselves to the parent who created the municipality, and that is the provincial government. If it is a disaster of national character and of such importance that the province just cannot cope with it, then the province asks the federal government for help. That is what happened in the Fraser valley flood, in the Winnipeg flood and the Rimouski and Cabano fires. I do not know of any other incidents. We have no direct relationship with the municipalities. They are not our creatures at all. When they have complaints to make they address themselves to the provincial government.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am afraid the minister did not quite understand me. I am not complaining about the generous treatment we received in so far as the floods were concerned, from both the federal and provincial governments. Unlike the member for Broadview, I am not trying to promote anybody at all. Unfortunately we have no government in British Columbia, so I am promoting nobody out there. However, the Canadian National Railways is one of the most valuable assets of the people of Canada. Am I to understand that in this modern day and age the local municipality—I am not talking about floods or diking now but the natural erosion which occurs every year—is expected to pay the cost of preventing future river bank erosion such as that which occurred within the last ten months within one hundred yards of the great Canadian National right of way? Is the municipality expected to protect the farmers of the Fraser valley, to protect the Canadian National Railways as well as the investment of the Minister of National Defence of over a million and a half dollars in this area? Am I to understand that is the responsibility of the local municipality, with a revenue of perhaps $60,000 a year?

From a selfish point of view, I shall tell you the first thing I would have done if I had been Minister of Public Works and the member for that little district across the river, a very enjoyable district. I would have built a dam around that new $2,500,000 building we have been putting up over there, and which has been flooded. I cannot understand why, in this day and age, the Minister of Public Works should tell me it is the responsibility of the local authorities to protect the Canadian National Railways and the investment of the Department of National Defence in a secret naval station. I could tell you what it is. The hon. member for Vancouver South can talk about canoes, but the interceptor station for the whole Pacific coast, in case of a Russian invasion, was endangered within the last ten months by the falling away of a bank. Am I to believe it is the responsibility of a little municipality with a revenue of $50,000 or $60,000 a year to protect the Canadian National Railways? One hundred feet of erosion would tie up the whole Pacific coast. It does not make sense to me. I have asked the minister a direct question. Is it the responsibility of the provincial government to make application? Obviously the municipalities cannot apply to the federal government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have stated the general principle, Mr. Chairman, and that policy was announced in the house by the Prime Minister himself. In answer to the hon. member I may say that the Department of Public Works was not set up to protect national defence or the Canadian National Railways. They have their budgets, and they have their obligations. They should protect themselves, and I think they do. Why ask the public works department to do everything that can be done in the country, when it is only one of the departments of government acting under a special statute setting out its jurisdiction? I could be the protector of orphans, the Canadian National Railways and all these works, but they do not come under my department.

I think the member for Vancouver-Quadra was right—

Mr. Green: Do not drag me into this fight.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —when he said I was too soft, and that members asked me for all kinds of things. They do not come under my department. To be polite, I am ready to help. If you want me to see someone from the Canadian National to ascertain if they will protect their own property, I can do that. But do not ask the Department of Public Works to take a responsibility which does not come under the department at all.

Mr. McLure: Before making my few remarks I should like to make a suggestion to the minister once again. I made one last year, in fact I have made several of them. Whenever the Department of Public Works has men whom they are proud to bring on the floor of the house, I think those men should be introduced to the house. We permit them to come in here to assist the minister, and every time he has new assistants he should introduce them to the house. I know some people near me have asked who these gentlemen are. I happen to know one of them fairly well, perhaps better than he wants to know me. Apart from that, I believe this should be done for the benefit of members who might not have had the opportunity to know these gentlemen.

I want to say that I was rather amazed when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that he was greatly concerned over the public works department. I wonder how many headaches he would have had if he had had as much to do with the public works department as I have in the last five years, in requesting the construction of a building in Charlottetown known as a post office. Imagine the headaches the member for Vancouver-Quadra would have had if he had had to follow that scheme as I have tried to follow it. Still, I am getting good promises.

I believe those promises will be fulfilled. The minister has been praised tonight as the builder for all the departments, or as the public works man for all the departments. In our case I am afraid he is not even a demolisher of property, because he and his department have bought a new site for a building they have promised to erect there. They have bought a great deal of property. I understand they have paid for nearly all of it; perhaps they have paid for it all. Now they have become land owners, or property owners, and are renting the property. I suppose they are making quite a good revenue out of it. I know that some of the tenants are paying fairly high rents. The department have a man down there collecting the rents. They are really in the rental business down there.

There is an election coming on next year or probably the year after. What I have been urging them to do is demolish these old buildings and have the site all ready for the new federal building they are going to build there. Time after time we have men down there approaching members and asking them for work. The work they could be doing right now would be demolishing these buildings. The department could get that work done now for a good deal less than it will cost later on when they start to build in a rush. Moreover, by doing it now it would give employment to men who need it today.

So much for the post office. I have been told that we are going to get it. I believe the minister will make good on that promise, because he must make good fairly soon. I know it is going to arrive just in the nick of time, just before the next election.

There was another matter that was mentioned here tonight. I am not going to speak on it now but I just want to say to the Minister of Public Works and to the aides he has with him that I am going to speak on harbour improvements at the appropriate time and also on the building of a marine railway slip, which is another matter to which I have directed attention time and again. There is no disputing that it is a matter that is under this department, because it is for the benefit of the harbour. However, there is an item for that project, and I shall speak on it later. I just want to remind the minister that we still have his promise about the post office. I feel certain that he will build it. When he will do it is something which it will be up to him to tell us, probably tonight.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There are three items of a general nature that I should like to speak about at this time. One is in connection with the wharf at Portugal Cove. That is a matter which has been raised on several occasions, and on each occasion the minister has said he has no responsibility. I understand that lately there have been conferences between representatives of the provincial government and the federal Department of Public Works on this subject. Portugal Cove is a vital link between the city of St. John's and Bell island. Bell island is the site of the iron ore mines from which between 2 and 3 million tons of iron ore are shipped to the United Kingdom, Germany and Sydney annually. It is an extremely prosperous community. Portugal Cove on the mainland is the place where people have to take a boat and where goods have to be put on board ship to be brought to Bell island.

It seems to me the Department of Public Works should take responsibility for that wharf. There is a tremendous amount of traffic going over it. The great earning power of Bell island is a source of revenue that comes to the federal government through customs and excise duties, sales tax and income tax. There is a big trade between St. John's and Bell island. I should think all of this would be sufficient justification for the minister to say "We will go ahead and we will fix that wharf" and not only fix it but make a decent harbour there. When the princess was there last year, those who have seen the picture "Royal Journey" will remember how rough it was when they were taking the tug to board the liner to take them across the ocean. It is a dangerous harbour in rough weather. There is a big rock right out in front of the wharf. Notwithstanding all the revenue that is pouring into the federal government from Bell island they have not spent any money in connection with it up to the present time. I urge the Minister of Public Works to reconsider his attitude in that respect.

The second matter about which I wish to speak is another hardy annual that has been brought up for consideration each year. I refer to the public building for St. John's. The minister and his officials have been looking around for three years for a site for a public building for St. John's and each year there has been a vote or a revote for that purpose. When the minister is good enough to reply, I should like to know what progress he has made with regard to selecting a site for the public building at St. John's. It is certainly necessary there. The various departmental offices are all over the place. If he carries out the policy he has adopted elsewhere, he will have a public building erected.

The third point I wish to bring to his attention is in connection with the dredging of the smaller harbours in Newfoundland. Dredging has been going on to a considerable extent in the constituency represented by the Secretary of State, particularly at Bonavista where hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent not only on dredging but on other matters as well. The same thing applies with respect to Grand Bank and Fortune. At these three large settlements dredging has been done. But none has been done in the smaller places, where the fishermen are practically obliged to pole their way in at high water only, such as Renews of which I have spoken half a dozen times here when the estimates have been before the committee. Can the minister not say that something is going to be done for Renews this year? The vote is provided. So will he see that the work is done? It is still a question whether it is going to be done or not, because a dredge may not be sent there.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. gentleman has mentioned three subjects. The first was Portugal Cove. Our difficulties started there because it would be a wharf for the ferry crossing over to the island. This department does not build wharves for ferries, but it builds wharves for the general public use. I am told that my officials down there are negotiating with the province in order to see whether we can come to an understanding with regard to putting up the real facilities that are necessary. If we come to an agreement and have a joint project down there, I think we would go right ahead with it. We have not yet reached that agreement.

As to sites, may I say that I have heard a great deal about a site for that public building at St. John's. I am having trouble in getting a meeting of minds with regard to a site. Personally I favour the Paddock site on government property, which has been recommended to me even by a delegation sent down to St. John's some years ago, on which was Mr. Norman Robertson, clerk of the privy council. I personally spoke with the premier of Newfoundland and he was all ready to sell us that site; but to date, though I have written to the premier to ask what price he wants for it, I have not received an answer. I could hardly conclude that deal without having an answer from the premier of Newfoundland. With my usual patience, I am awaiting an answer from the premier with regard to the price he wants for that site.

As to dredging, may I say that we had a new dredge built for the use of the island and for doing dredging in these smaller harbours; but there was a great deal to be done in Newfoundland when it came into union. We have done a considerable amount of work on that island and in the harbours since Newfoundland joined with us. But we cannot do the whole works in one, two or three years. There are 6,000 miles of coast line around that island, and people are living along that coast line. A great many of them are fishermen who expect facilities such as wharves, breakwaters, harbours and dredging. Each year we do a certain amount of that work.

We are still young enough, both the hon. member who put the question and I, that we will see the day when all those harbours will be perfect, and probably the population will be up.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to reply to the first point raised by the minister in connection with this wharf. He speaks of it as a ferry wharf, and because it has so much traffic it is not a place in which the Minister of Public Works considers he should take any interest. Yet he knows that he is spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on other wharves where the traffic will not be one per cent of what it is at Portugal Cove. That is not only in Newfoundland, but in other parts of the maritime provinces.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Name me one place.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will name two of them, where the total population is not 300, and where you are spending half a million dollars.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Where is that?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): At Chance Harbour and at Lorneville in New Brunswick. He is spending $280,000 in one place and $200,000 in the other. I took the trouble to look up the population of those places. I could not find it myself. I searched in the library, and they did not have the population. The dominion bureau of statistics spent a week trying to find out what the population was.

But there are 10,000 people living on Bell island, and they are doing a tremendous trade as I said before. Yet the minister says this is a ferry wharf. What is the wharf at Digby? Is that not a ferry wharf? Why are you spending money on the wharf at Digby? There is not half as much trade over the wharf at Digby as there is at Portugal Cove.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Now that you have given your story, I will tell you this. I have explained that this is a wharf for ferry purposes. If you can tell me that at Chance Harbour in New Brunswick we are spending that amount of money for ferry wharf purposes, then I will have to admit that I was wrong.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not say it was for ferry purposes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am telling you that Portugal Cove is a ferry proposition, and you know what the premier said against my engineers down there.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes, it has. They have their obligations and we have ours.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is a personal matter.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, it is not; it is a public matter.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the ferries in a province are under my jurisdiction, I will build wharves. If they are not, the provinces will undertake it, and it will not be for the federal government. Sometimes I get tired of being blamed for everything that is going on in the country, when all the time I am doing my best to help satisfy everybody. If you are speaking about Chance Harbour, just let me tell you what the story is about Chance Harbour. I do not know all the places in this country, but it appears that Chance Harbour is in the riding of Saint John-Albert. The cost is stated at $280,000. This item provides for the construction of a breakwater to replace the existing structure which can no longer provide adequate shelter and landing facilities for fishermen at this port. Now, I suppose you want me to help the fishermen, do you not?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How many fishermen are there?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, let me finish. Let me give my story; you have given yours. The sheltered area behind the existing breakwater is dry at low water and is exposed to the easterly winds, affording little if any protection to fishing boats in storms. The lack of proper landing and mooring facilities at all stages of the tide has retarded the development of the fishing industry and has seriously hampered the activities of the winter seining fleet of the herring fishery.

It is proposed to construct a creosoted timber breakwater 330 feet long by 25 to 40 feet wide, with a timber trestle approach 210 feet long by 60 feet wide. The estimated cost is $280,000, and the work is to be done by contract. This was requested by Hon. R. W. Mayhew, Minister of Fisheries, in a letter dated January 11, 1949.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What has all this to do with it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am going to give you the story. You wanted to know, and I want to tell you my story. Mr. Stewart Bates, deputy minister of fisheries, in a letter dated May 3, 1950, states as follows:

Referring to your letter of April 4 asking for an expression of opinion on the justification for an expenditure at Chance Harbour—

And it will be noted that before we act we get the opinions of experts in these matters.

—to improve landing facilities and sheltered mooring for fishermen at that port, I would advise you that a report from the chief supervisor furnishes the following information:

Number of fishermen operating out of this port—33.

24 motor boats valued at	$ 9,072
35 rowboats valued at	1,225
5 herring scale boats valued at	1,000
64	$11,297

It will be noted that there are 64 boats going in and out of that harbour. We are advised that the existing breakwater is inadequate. During low water, for about two hours, boats are unable to get through the breakwater. The harbour is exposed to easterly winds and gets exceptionally rough during a storm, the present breakwater affording little if any protection.

I have three or four pages of this report, in which are set out the opinions of people who know something about the fishing industry, in which they ask the Department of Public Works to do this work. What would you answer to these poor fishermen at Chance Harbour?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do you want an answer?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes; I am sure you would give the same answer I would.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister has given us the information in connection with building a breakwater at a village where there are 33 fishermen. Remember, 33 is the number.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Fishing boats.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But there are more than 33 fishermen at Portugal Cove who use this wharf.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I never told you that you did not have a case; but I have told you the difficulties we have. State your difficulties, and we will see what we can do about it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is the federal government which takes the responsibility for the wharves.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not all the wharves.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Let us suppose there were a catastrophe, which I trust will never occur. If Bell island were to sink beneath the waves, there would still be the boats of fishermen at that wharf at Portugal Cove. The federal government would then have to take an interest in it. But because there is some difficulty with the province the minister says his department should not take an interest in it. I repeat that the minister should take an interest in it, and a complete interest.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to ask a very simple question that I think will make the minister feel good. On September 7, I believe it was, I received a letter from his department granting a dock on the Gull river at Minden, Ontario. I was wondering how soon the department would begin work on the building of that dock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If it is a project under $5,000 it comes out of the general vote which the hon. member will see in the estimates. Items under $5,000 are not specified. If the hon. member has made a good case, then as always the Department of Public Works will do the work. But make a good case, and have the right approach to it.

Mr. Hodgson: I was wondering if the work could be started before too long. It is about a year since it was granted.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I said that sometimes we do not act very quickly, but when we do something it is well done.

Mr. Hodgson: That is fine, thank you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is seldom I am able to assist the minister, but when I get a chance I like to do so. I do not like to let it slip. It happens that I have gone a good many times from the wharf at Portugal Cove, on Bell island, and I am able to underline everything my colleague has said about the big rock just off the wharf. I do hope the minister will be able to make a careful review of the serious representations which have been made.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You may be sure I will. However, I do not like a member making comparisons with works at some other place which were justified, when he is pleading for his own town. I do not think it is the right approach to the question at all.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is not my town, at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He is just enthusiastic.

Mr. Balcer: I might tell the minister that I nearly ran a ship on the same rock during the war.

Item agreed to.

331. Branch administration, $506,848.

Mr. Green: Now, speaking about rocks—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, don't speak about Ripple rock.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us whether his department has taken any steps recently with regard to the removal of Ripple rock?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We became discouraged with the project and have dropped it for the time being. I do not know what my successor may do, but for the time being we are not undertaking the removal of that rock.

Item agreed to.

Architectural branch—

331. Branch administration, $506,848.

Mr. Green: Does the Department of Public Works do any building research work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We get advice from the national research council, and when any research is to be done they handle it.

Mr. Green: That is research work in connection with types of buildings.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is correct.

Item agreed to.

332. Ottawa—maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds, including repairs, and upkeep, rents, furnishings, heating, etc., and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $500,000, $12,112,418.

Mr. Fraser: On a number of occasions I have asked the minister what progress is being made in regard to the abatement of the smoke nuisance in Ottawa.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A firm in Toronto has developed a system which apparently is successful in that city, and in the near future we may give this system a trial.

Mr. Fraser: I am glad the minister is going to do that. Smoke from the heating plant the other side of the supreme court building is not only spoiling the face of that building, it even comes into this building and dirties things up quite a lot. It is a shame that a beautiful city like Ottawa should be faced with such a smoke nuisance. Is anything being done with regard to parking facilities back of the supreme court building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not long ago a bill was passed in the house to control traffic and parking on government property, and regulations will be passed under that bill by the governor in council.

Mr. Fraser: I was referring to the improvement of the parking space at the back of the supreme court building. The number of cars is increasing every day, and I am wondering if some improvement could not be made.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall ask my officials to look into that.

Mr. Low: I do not want to cause the minister any trouble, because he has plenty, but I should like to know what progress is being made with the public building at Grande Prairie. Is it expected to have the building completed this year?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A contract was let on September 12, 1951, to the Poole Construction Company Limited of Edmonton, who were the lowest tenderer at $207,283. There were three tenders, the highest being at $249,000. I do not know the present state of the construction, but the contract was let some time ago.

Mr. Low: I understand that they are making good progress with the building. I notice it was necessary to revote $25,000 of last year's appropriation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They have not reached the stage where progress payments are justified for that amount and we have to carry it over as a revote.

Mr. Low: I was merely wondering if there was any hope that it would be completed this year. I want to thank the minister for having made that appropriation. The building was certainly justified. Has the minister received any recommendation with respect to a post office building at Fairview?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We get requests from the Post Office Department graded A, B, C and D according to urgency, and we generally follow their advice.

Mr. Green: This vote covers a rather substantial amount, over $12 million for the maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds in Ottawa, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $500,000. Why is that provision included?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If we undertake works and order goods which cannot be delivered during the fiscal year we must commit the government, but those commitments are limited to $500,000. The comptroller of the treasury checks every commitment we make and when we reach a certain amount we are not permitted to go any further.

Mr. Green: Is that over and above the amount of the vote?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is right.

Mr. Green: The details on page 392 indicate an increase in repairs and upkeep of buildings, including materials required therefor, from $1,537,050 to $2,561,005. Why is there such a large increase?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are making some repairs to buildings that have been neglected. In fact there have been accidents because buildings were not in good repair. This year there is an unusually heavy program of repairs and upkeep of buildings in Ottawa and this allotment has been increased by $1,023,955. Included in this increase is an amount of $345,000 for repairs of stonework, cornices and pointing of various buildings. There is also a good deal of work to be done in the parliament buildings, including extensive repairs to plumbing, pointing, stonework, the roof and electrical work. A considerable number of alterations and repairs to buildings will be necessary when new buildings are completed and vacated space is reassigned. We are making some expenditures this year and this increase is due to the fact that many buildings were far from being in a good state of repair. We have even had some serious accidents on account of the condition of the buildings, and it was thought this was an appropriate time to make repairs.

Mr. Green: Then there is an increase in rentals in Ottawa from $1,175,000 to $1,560,000. That is an increase of about $400,000 in rents for one year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): An increase of $385,000.

Mr. Green: Why was that increase necessary?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Provision for rents has been increased by $385,000 to cover twelve new leases and increases in eighteen existing leases. The allotment for acquisition of equipment and repairs to equipment has been increased by $68,300. The allotment for light, power and water has been increased by $133,215 to provide for new buildings now nearing completion. The allotment for taxes on diplomatic properties has been increased by $10,000. The allotment for freight, express and cartage has been increased by $3,000 and the allotment for rental of sound reinforcing equipment for the House of Commons for the next six months is an amount of $3,750. The total amount is $603,265.

Mr. Green: Increase?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Increase.

Mr. Green: With respect to the sound reinforcing equipment for the House of Commons, does that mean the loudspeaker system for the house? When is that to be installed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The moment we can get out of the house. I am told they are making the castings for the loudspeaking and receiving microphones which will be on each desk. I understood they will start work a week or ten days after prorogation. On Tuesday at one o'clock we even had a meeting of Mr. Speaker's committee at which the chief architect of my department gave explanations.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention to have the system installed for next session?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is in the contract, and they have assured us everything will be ready for the next session, whenever that will be.

Mr. Green: What will be the cost of that installation? I do not see it anywhere in the estimates.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The installation cost is $35,000. I have not the contract here, but I recall that I tabled and read a part of the contract that was entered into with Tannoy of London, England, and Cossor of Halifax, their agent. When we negotiated the deal for the installation, maintenance and operation of this system they undertook to have it ready for the next session.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us the approximate cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The cost of installation is $35,000 or $37,000. We are paying a rental of $7,500 a year and we pay for the operators, but they have the whole responsibility of maintaining the system in a good state of repair and operating it to the satisfaction, we hope, of the majority of the members.

Mr. Green: What is meant by this item for taxes on diplomatic properties?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Ever since we have had an external affairs service we have paid the city taxes on their properties and they reciprocate in the countries where we have ambassadors or ministers.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the minister a question I have been wanting to ask ever since I came here. Why is it necessary to cover up the windows of this chamber with canvas so that even on a bright day the inside of the chamber resembles the inside of a tomb? Why can we not take the canvas off and have a little sunshine?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It was recommended years and years ago to help the acoustics of the chamber. I am told when the canvas is not there the acoustics are far worse than they are now.

Item agreed to.

333. Maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds, other than at Ottawa, including repairs and upkeep, rents, furnishings, heating, etc., and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $800,000, $18,273,243.

Mr. Green: This is another large item of over $18 million with an increase of almost $2,500,000. Will the minister give some explanation of the increase?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is the maintenance item. There is an increase of $2,432,228. Statutory increases in salaries amount to $60,789; reclassifications, $9,520; increases in prevailing rates, $101,674; positions not provided for in 1951-52, $59,401; salary revisions (underestimated 1951-52), $139,354; positions omitted in 1951-52, $11,399; increases in rates of pay effective December 1, 1951, $303,000. There is an increase in the allotment for the purchase of office furniture including desks, chairs, tables, filing cabinets for all government departments. The allotment of $850,000 requested for 1952-53 is an estimate based on expenditures for the fiscal year 1951-52. Then there is an amount of $20,000 for telephones and telegrams, $13,000 for postage, $40,000 for freight, express and cartage and $85,000 for moving government departments and services.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Under this item I see that expenditures in Prince Edward Island have decreased from $624,799 in 1951-52 to $171,000 for the coming year. Would the minister explain the reason for that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Probably we had more repair work last year. We have made those repairs and this year we need less repairs. I have only one thing in mind in that province now, the public building in Charlottetown. Whenever we can erect it we will also have to increase the amount to maintain it.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—

334. Newfoundland, $700,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister tell me the estimated total cost of the public building at Bonavista? It must be nearly finished now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The contract was awarded on the 1st February, 1951, by public tender. The lowest tender was made by the North Shore Construction Company in the amount of $257,232. The highest tender was $387,450. It goes without saying that we gave the contract to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is $257,000 the amount that will be spent?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is a firm price contract. That is the price of the contract.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have there been any extras in connection with that building since the contract was awarded?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have nothing in my book for extras.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is $272,000 provided now. That is $15,000 over the amount the minister mentioned.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that outside of the contract, which did not cover the grading and the fixing of the grounds, this amount is to be used.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The other question I have to ask is: What is the position with regard to the customs building? There was $100,000 voted last year and that sum is revoted now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is in St. John's?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In St. John's.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Proposed work and estimated cost; pending final selection of site, plans and specifications for the proposed building have not yet been delivered and full cost for the entire building is not yet available. However it is estimated that $100,000 will be sufficient to meet the requirements for 1952-53 for site and plans. This is requested by customs, and I am told that we have not bought the site as yet.

Item agreed to.

335. Nova Scotia, $1,250,000.

Mr. Gillis: I would like to ask the minister a question on this item. In the details on page 396 there is a revote of $15,000 and also an item of $100,000. I would like to ask the minister if that is an appropriation for the beginning of a public building at Sydney, Nova Scotia. Whether or not I will pursue the subject further depends on his answer.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This amount is to provide toward the erection of a proposed new public building to accommodate post office, customs, and mounted police. The existing building, which was erected in 1889, is in poor condition throughout and does not provide sufficient space for post office and customs. Total estimated cost is divided as follows: site $28,000; building, $430,000; supervision and contingencies, $42,000—these are estimates, amounting to nearly a half a million dollars.

Mr. Gillis: I want to thank the minister for that information; but I would suggest that while he states it is to house the post office and the customs, in addition there are about four other federal department offices in that city for which you pay rental of $50,000 a year. You might as well make the building big enough to house all those federal offices under one roof.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will consider that.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am interested in these appropriations for Nova Scotia. I have two main complaints, one of which is that some of the localities have been looking for public buildings and no provision appears to have been made for them. I refer to such places as Pugwash, River Hebert, and Wallace. I also take some objection to the delay in getting these buildings constructed. They have been in the estimates in previous years and appear in the estimates being passed by the committee, at the present time, yet no headway is apparently being made. There is the item just referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and there are other appropriations here; but it does not seem to me that the department is considering the erection of those public buildings.

I would like to ask the minister how many of those projects are actually under construction or under contract at the present time. Fourteen of them were apparently lifted, and the total vote is $1,610,000. I would ask the minister how many of those projects are actually under construction at the present time or on how many is it expected that work will be started in the summer of 1952.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The first one is the Antigonish public building. That one is not under contract yet. Next is the Bridgewater public building. That one is under contract to Rodney Contractors Limited, $83,095.

Next is Halifax—addition and alterations to customs building. Sketch plans were prepared and those were approved by the customs division. When these estimates were being prepared contract plans and specifications were nearly complete, and an early call for tenders was anticipated.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand tenders are being called for the Halifax customs building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, plans are being prepared.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): My complaint is that $100,000 was provided last year but no progress has been made, and that amount is now being revoted by this committee. The request is being made that it be revoted. I would ask the minister why when that sum of $100,000 was provided last year no headway was made.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not say no headway has been made. Plans and specifications are being prepared.

Mr. Dickey: As I have some personal knowledge of this matter perhaps I might say a word. This vote which is for $250,000—$100,000 being a revote—is for addition and alterations to the customs annex building at Halifax. This is a building that is used in connection with the reception of very large numbers of immigrants coming into this country through the port of Halifax. The building is located on national harbours board property and is in the vicinity of the sea wall—piers 20, 21, and 22—and in the vicinity also of the Canadian National Railway station at Halifax and the freight yards in the area of the station.

The delays which have been occasioned are regretted I know by this department, by the department of customs and also by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. However, having been in constant communication with the three departments mentioned, I know the reason for the delay has been the difficulty in getting agreement with respect to the location and actual addition to the customs annex building, the relocation of the railway tracks in the area, and provision of the necessary facilities without unduly hindering the other activities of the national harbours board and the Canadian National Railways. They have been difficult problems and I know that certainly the Department of Public Works has not been solely responsible for the delay.

I am glad to say that I think all of these difficulties have been ironed out and work is going ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Black (Cumberland): No. Does the minister have some further information to give us respecting these other projects in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The postal station at Armdale—

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That has now been before the house for several years.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have a note here that tenders were supposed to be called for that in June, but as we are nearly through June I expect he will be calling for them in July. There is the Rockhead immigration hospital, alterations and repairs, $150,000, to complete the contract of T. P. Lusby and Company Limited, at $152,085. The next one is the workshop and storage building, $50,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will the minister state what kind of repairs and improvements were made to the Rockhead immigration hospital?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Here is what I have. Strong representations were received from the Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to the urgent need for extensive alterations and additions to the plumbing, heating and ventilation systems at the Rockhead hospital. Plans and specifications were prepared and a contract was awarded in October, 1951, the expenditure in 1951-52 being chargeable to the vote for maintenance and operation. An order in council dated October 3, 1951, granted authority to enter into a contract with the lower tenderer, T. P. Lusby Company at Halifax. There were two tenders. One was $152,085, and the other was $162,260. I understand this work is proceeding.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister state the names of the two tenderers?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes. One was T. P. Lusby and Company Limited, which had the lower tender of $152,085. The second was Barrett and O'Regan, who had a tender of $162,260.72.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What about this other proposal for the public building in Liverpool, $100,000? Is it proposed to proceed with that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A site for the proposed building, known as the Elmwood hotel property, on Main street, was acquired in 1948 through War Assets Corporation. The existing building was erected in 1898-99. It is proposed to erect a two-storey structure, 70 feet wide by 80 feet long, with basement, concrete foundations, masonry walls, brick facing, stone trim and felt and gravel roofing. The total construction cost is estimated at $190,000 for the building, $12,000 for boxes and fittings, $5,000 for grading and sidewalks, $3,000 for supervision and $15,000 for contingencies, the total estimated cost being $225,000. This year we have asked for $100,000. This building is for the customs and excise division and the Post Office Department; and we have not asked for tenders as yet.

Item agreed to.

336. Prince Edward Island, $175,000.

Mr. McLure: The hon. member for Queens has mentioned it before, but I just want to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that out of nearly $35 million for new buildings, Prince Edward Island receives only $175,000. It seems to be a very small amount, but when the minister builds the new public works building down there, it might be all right. We may have a bigger item next year.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In connection with item 336, I presume the plans have already been drawn for the proposed public building in Charlottetown?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have not taken on a firm of architects. We shall have to have an outside firm, and I am consulting on that. This $50,000 goes for that.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Could consideration be given to the advisability of providing a separate building for the offices of the Department of Agriculture, which I believe were supposed to be housed in this building? If a separate building could be provided adjacent to the new science services building somewhere near the experimental farm, it might provide for greater efficiency in the department.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We can consider that.

Item agreed to.

338. Quebec, $9,741,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: I understand this includes an expenditure for the construction of a post office: Youville station in Montreal. Could the minister tell me whether the site chosen is still the same and if the work is to be undertaken soon?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is a property situated at the corner of Cremazie boulevard and Drolet street, consisting of six subdivisions of lot No. 2643, comprising subdivisions Nos. 2368 and 2369 belonging to Mr. H. Campeau and purchased at a cost of $6,462, subdivision No. 2367, belonging to Mrs. Bernadette Laframboise and purchased at a cost of $4,374, and subdivisions Nos. 2370, 2371 and 2372, belonging to Mr. Gerard Bouthillier and purchased for $38,585.

The post office will be erected on these lots.

Mr. Denis: Thank you.

(Text):

Mr. Balcer: There is an item for a public building in Joliette, for which there is a vote of $155,000. Is that the same building for which a contract was awarded without tender?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, no. That is what you are saying in the province, but we did ask for tenders.

Mr. Balcer: That is not what the auditor general said.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The auditor general said we did ask for tenders, and then we extended the building at the request of the Post Office Department. I know what is being said about that building in my province. It was mentioned at a meeting in Joliette not long ago. I know the whole story about it. This amount is required to complete the contract with Alphonse Gratton Incorporated for the construction of an addition and for alterations to the public building at Joliette. The work under contract was requested by the deputy postmaster general who reports that the provision of additional space for postal purposes at Joliette is most urgent, as the post office is now overcrowded and congested. The addition to the building will provide additional space for the postal and customs services, and accommodation for the unemployment insurance commission, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of Agriculture.

The work under contract consists of the construction of a basement and two-storey addition approximately 87 feet by 78 feet and extensive alterations to the existing building. The original amount of the contract was $179,182. The mounted police and the unemployment insurance commission, when we started that building, asked for an addition, the authorization for which was given at the same unit prices to the same contractor for $186,049. The addition to the site was purchased by expropriation at a cost of $41,000. Supervision and contingencies amounted to $18,381. The plans were prepared for post office use, and the mounted police and unemployment insurance had their offices there. Here we have complied with the principle of centralizing our offices which was mentioned tonight by the member for Cape Breton South. The same contractor, at the same unit prices, extended the building to house the mounted police and unemployment insurance offices. There has been more noise about that building than any other in the country.

Mr. Balcer: I wonder if the minister has read the report of the auditor general about this?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The auditor general took it as an extra. If I had been a witness before the auditor general I would have explained that the same unit prices were extended by the same contract. We could not ask for tenders, because the first portion of the wall that was there would not exist with this extension and we got about the best conditions a man could get. This tender was the lowest when we called for public tenders.

(Translation):

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Moreover, the building did not fall, as did the Three Rivers bridge.

(Text):

Mr. Balcer: The fact remains that the auditor general criticized the department for giving a contract without calling for tenders.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The auditor general is a friend of mine, and he is a high official. I receive his opinion and I even ask his advice. He has his officials in my own department under the comptroller of the treasury. We do not move without seeing these people. The law forbids us to do so. My practical advisers have told me, in this instance, that in the public interest we could not ask for tenders for this extension whilst the first contract was under way. Sometimes I should like to take everybody's advice except that of my own advisers; but I cannot see how I would run the department if I did not follow their advice in technical matters at least.

Item agreed to.

339. Ottawa, $7,945,000.

Mr. Fleming: There are several features of this item concerning which I should like to ask the minister certain questions. I think I might as well deal with them all together while I am on my feet.

The item proposes works within the city of Ottawa totalling approximately $8 million. This will mean more buildings owned by the crown in the right of the dominion within the city of Ottawa, thus creating a greater burden on the municipality in the way of providing services. In view of this increase in federal buildings in Ottawa I should like to ask the minister whether any increase is contemplated in the present federal grant to the city of Ottawa. That is the first question.

The second matter has to do with an item on page 399, "Sound reinforcement system for the House of Commons, $35,000" of which $15,000 is a revote. Can the minister tell the committee what progress is being made with that interesting project which has been on foot for so long?

Mr. Green: He gave that information.

Mr. Fleming: I am told that the minister made a statement on that matter earlier.

[Mr. Balcer.]

The third matter arises out of the fact that a good many of the items here are works to be undertaken for other departments. I take it that in no case is any of this property to be taken under lease. It raises a point which was before the public accounts committee at a meeting last week, when the deputy minister of public works appeared in connection with several items in the report of the auditor general. In the course of his testimony he expressed the opinion that in this respect the present system, which has been in vogue for a long time, is not sound, and that it would be much better if all the departments were charged rent on the property they occupy. He expressed the opinion that by such procedure there would be a much truer accounting as between different departments, in the first place, and in the second place there would be more of a check against departments asking for or retaining space beyond their strict requirements.

The fourth matter I should like to mention under this item relates to work of the department in connection with research. I am aware that earlier this evening the minister stated that all research work for the department was done by the national research council and that none is done within his own department. My information—and I have no doubt as to its accuracy—is that there is research work carried on over here in the west block; my information is that there is a branch there which carries on research work in connection with concrete, for instance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is a testing laboratory.

Mr. Fleming: I do not believe it is confined to concrete, either.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is not a research branch. It is a testing laboratory for public works. It is not for research.

Mr. Fleming: All right. It is your testing laboratory.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That's right.

Mr. Fleming: If my information is correct, that testing work could be carried on just as well and more economically by the national research council.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Don't take anything away from me.

Mr. Fleming: That particular branch in the department is increasing in size; it is increasing in the number of persons employed. If he will, I should like the minister to tell the committee just why it should be necessary to have a testing laboratory in his own department when the national research council has facilities and extremely capable people who are fully equipped and thoroughly skilled to carry on that work without this unnecessary duplication.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Let us speak like two experts. I am told that in the national research council they have no testing laboratories. We have one. Tonight the plea was made that I should not divest myself of the activities that come under my department. Now an hon. member wants me to throw out this testing laboratory.

Mr. Fleming: I want the minister to eliminate duplication.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is what I am told; and may I say that I did not visit the national research council. As I am telling the hon. member, I follow advice. I am told by my deputy that they have not the testing facilities at the national research council for these classes of materials. If those facilities do not exist there, there cannot be duplication. We need some testing place with our own engineers and officials. But if the hon. member is right—and I will get further information—I am still ready to hand that laboratory over, if the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra agrees that I should continue to give out work.

Then as to grants with regard to the increase of buildings in Ottawa, that is a special statute which comes under the Minister of Finance. It is a formula devised by some financial experts. I know about it because I happen to live in this district and my town probably would fall under that formula or under that grant; but I think the question would be better directed to the Minister of Finance. I really would not want to take it upon myself to give an answer, because I do not know enough about it.

As to the loud speakers, we had quite a full explanation given. A contract was signed with Tannoy of London, England, to instal here a system similar to that in Westminster. That was in accordance with a report made by a committee under Mr. Speaker. Their agents in Canada are Cossor (Canada) Limited. They are actually casting microphones and loudspeakers. I am told that some days after prorogation of this session they will get to work doing the wiring and installing the system which will be ready for the opening of the next session. The installation of the system will cost the government $35,000. They will put in the system, maintain it and operate it. We will pay the operators and rental fee; we are not purchasing the installation. We are paying a rental of $7,500 a year. The contract was tabled some days after it was signed, at the beginning of this session.

Mr. Fleming: When is it expected that the work will be completed and the system will be in operation?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They have assured us that it will be ready for the next session.

Mr. Fleming: When is that going to be? This is extremely interesting. We might kill two birds with one stone here, Mr. Chairman. I hope the minister is not going to call a fall session. I am not asking for that much speed in connection with the installation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I do not fix the date of the opening or of prorogation. I am trying to fix the date of prorogation but I am having a great deal of trouble right now.

Mr. Hansell: In connection with the amplifying system here I want to make only one suggestion, although perhaps it is too late now. I hope those who are installing the system do not clutter up this chamber with a number of wires hanging from the ceiling. I happen to have been in the British House of Commons during the past year. While they have an amplifying system there, I believe they have largely spoiled their chamber.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I may tell the hon. member that this matter really does not come under my jurisdiction. Mr. Speaker went over to Britain and visited the House of Commons there. He had a committee. They made a report to the House of Commons here, and it was concurred in. All I am doing is following out what was concurred in by the House of Commons.

Mr. Hees: We rely on the minister, though.

Mr. Hansell: The minister has no need to hold up his own estimates. I am simply suggesting something that I do not want to happen here. While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister if his department has considered modernizing the elevator system in the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told an investigation was made concerning elevators, and I am told further that there is an amount in the supplementary estimates. When it was discussed last I thought we would begin by making one or two changes. We cannot replace them all at one time. The changes will be made in the electrical equipment and controls. I am told that the moment the vote in the supplementary estimates is passed work will begin on the changes in connection with the electrical equipment and controls.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): All hon. members are interested in national buildings. What national buildings are under construction or are proposed at the present time? I would point out to the minister the advisability of deciding on the stone to be used. The province of Nova Scotia has been interested in this matter for many years. The trim of these parliament buildings—the tower, the windows, the doors, and the like—is of Wallace stone. The same applies in the museum building, Confederation building, and several other government buildings. There is no question whatever as to the high quality of that stone. I would ask the minister as to the material being used in the larger buildings in this capital city.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Offhand I could not make a statement with respect to the stone going into those buildings. I would have to ask for a report from my officials, and I would be prepared to communicate that report to the hon. member. But when he asks me for a statement as to the different kinds of stone which will be employed in the buildings, I cannot answer him. Although I have some capabilities, I do not think I could go that far.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The matter is so important I would expect the minister to be familiar with it. I would be pleased to have him give us the assurance that due consideration will be given to continuing the use of Wallace stone as it has been used in previous years by architects in his department, in connection with other buildings in Ottawa.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will keep my hon. friend informed. Architects generally advise us as to the stone to be used in certain buildings. I do not have very much to say about it because, though the hon. member thinks I should know a good deal about stone, I admit that I do not. If after looking at specifications I think the architect is right in his plans, I rarely raise a question as to the kind of stone to be used, either as to its source or quality. I must say that I throw up the sponge; I do not know enough about stone to discuss it, really.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would ask the minister to look into the question of the quality of stone to be used in buildings of this kind.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall do that.

Mr. Fleming: The minister dealt with several of the matters I mentioned briefly a moment ago, but he did not deal with the evidence given recently by his deputy minister before the public accounts committee concerning the matter of charging the different departments rent for the space occupied by them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That question has been discussed many times in the last ten years. To date the government policy has been to follow the statute which places all public buildings under the control of the Department of Public Works. We meet the requests of the different departments for their needs.

To establish another branch of the department in which we would charge each department for rental would require an extension of activities. Perhaps it would be a good thing, so far as the other departments are concerned, if they could come to the House of Commons and ask for rent when they present their estimates, but we would have to have some organization to control that. It would simply be a matter of taking money from one pocket and putting it into another. Thus far, and since confederation, the Department of Public Works has provided space for the offices and facilities of other departments. This involves a question of policy which, up to now, has not been changed.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister will read the evidence tendered by his deputy minister before the committee on public accounts a week or so ago he will find in it a very strong condemnation of the present policy, and a strong advocacy of a change in that policy with a view to accomplishing two results: first, truer accounting among different departments of government as to their cost to the public treasury and, second, providing some check upon the demands of departments either for new space or for the retention of space beyond their requirements.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): My deputy tells me that he never interferes with government policy. He advises me as to what he thinks best, but policy is decided by the government. As a respectful civil servant he has not tried to dictate policy to the government; at least he has not done so during the ten years he has been with me.

However, there is some good in what he said before that committee, as to the matter of accounting, knowing exactly about expenditures, and how these departments are run. But until the government changes its policy the Department of Public Works must conform to the statute and administer the act the way it is now written.

Item agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF ACT

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the first reading of Bill No. 391 (from the Senate), to amend the Eastern Rocky Mountain Forest Conservation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

PRINTING OF GOVERNMENT CHEQUES

Mr. LaCroix:

1. Who is responsible for printing cheques of the Canadian government, such as those for family allowances, old age pensions, etc.?
2. Why are not these cheques printed and distributed all over the country in the two official languages, as is the paper money issued by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. McCusker:

1. All cheques issued on behalf of the government of Canada including those for family allowances and old age security are produced and issued by the office of the comptroller of the treasury, Department of Finance.

2. The practice followed from the inception of the family allowances program (July 1945) and the old age security program (January 1952) has been the same as that followed by the provincial governments in each of the provinces of Canada.

HEALTH GRANTS—TUBERCULOSIS MORBIDITY AND MORTALITY IN PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Arsenault:

1. What has been done under the national health grants program to reduce tuberculosis morbidity and mortality in the province of Quebec?
2. What reduction has there been in the tuberculosis mortality rate in the province of Quebec, since the inauguration of the national health grants program?

Mr. McCusker:

1. Since 1948, approximately $7,034,000 has been expended under the federal health grants program for the control of tuberculosis in Quebec. Included is federal assistance amounting to $2,234,000 toward the construction of 2,021 additional beds in nine provincial sanatoria. Preventive, diagnostic and treatment services were provided. Staff and equipment were provided for diagnostic clinics, mobile clinics and sanatoria. Drugs such as streptomycin, para-amino salicyclic acid and tibione were purchased for free distribution to tuberculous patients. A B.C.G. vaccination program among children has been established and various investigations into B.C.G. vaccine were carried out.

2. The death rate from tuberculosis in Quebec has fallen markedly—in 1950, the rate was 39·3 per 100,000 as compared with 72·4 per 100,000 in 1946.

In this category are the expenses of the central legislative body at Ottawa, and the administrative departments at Ottawa and the research activities of the national research council.

(b) Payments to the majority of suppliers of goods and services as the payments are in many cases made to the head office of the company and therefore do not lend themselves to an accurate segregation by provinces.

SHIPPING

COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER NEW TYPE OF CARGO VESSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has a committee now been set up to work out specifications for a new type of ocean cargo ship for Canada? If so, will the minister explain the kind of committee that has been set up and the work they are to do?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I thought I had dealt with this subject in a general way on my estimates but perhaps I did not make it sufficiently clear. A committee has been established composed of the maritime commission and representatives of shipping and shipbuilding interests whose object it is to study the possibility of establishing a standard cargo vessel which would meet the requirements of the shipping interests and which would be adaptable to national defence in case of an emergency. That committee is now working with the object of studying the specifications and plans for such a ship.

Mr. Green: What is to be the speed of these ships?

Mr. Chevrier: That is a matter to be determined by the committee but it should be a modern fast vessel.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

COMPASSIONATE LEAVE TO ARMED FORCES SERVING ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence of which I have sent notice. With reference to a news dispatch appearing in the press last night and this morning, will the department give consideration to granting compassionate leave to men serving outside of the country if a parent is dying?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): This question is a very difficult one to deal with. The most serious consideration is given to all requests for compassionate leave. Generally speaking the practice is followed to return a soldier from the front line in Korea when a parent is ill only in cases where the return of the soldier is likely to contribute to the recovery of the parent. Otherwise men would be coming and going, often too late and often to no avail whatever. However, the most serious consideration is given to each case on its merits.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence based on my earlier question.

As the soldier concerned is due to return to Canada on rotation leave in August, and as his mother is only given three weeks to live, would it not be more reasonable to have him return now instead of waiting until August?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to look into the matter further.

KOREA

BOMBING OF YALU POWER PLANTS—INQUIRY AS TO CONSULTATION WITH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was Canada consulted prior to the decision to bomb power plants on the Yalu? If not, what is Canada's position in the matter?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We were not consulted before this action took place. It was felt that the action, which I should point out took place in Korea, was within existing military directives, and we have been assured that it was ordered by the unified command with military considerations solely in mind.

Mr. Ferguson: It is pretty near time the government stopped trying to meddle in matters they know nothing about. Let these people get on with their job and do not try to run it from here.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

TRADE AND RESOURCES—REFERENCE TO SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister of Australia, the Right Hon. Robert Menzies, has been in Ottawa for the last few days. During his visit was any consideration given by the Prime Minister and the members of the government to the suggestion of Mr. Menzies with respect to the convening of a British commonwealth trade and resources conference? Would the government consider giving a lead in the direction of convening such a conference?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter of an economic conference, covering the wide field that the Prime Minister of Australia referred to in his speech before the Canadian Club yesterday, was discussed. The government of Canada will not take the initiative in calling such a conference. It might possibly be that if the government were to attempt to do so at this time it would be embarrassing to others who are considering and discussing the matter with which the Prime Minister of Australia was so much concerned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GRANTING OF VISAS TO CERTAIN ALIENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister although perhaps I should have sent notice of it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the statement, published in the Toronto Telegram of June 23, 1952, and attributed to one Dobroslav Jevjdevic, that he had been responsible for the death of 30,000 Red partisans opposing the nazi and fascist invaders of Yugoslavia and that he wished to kill more of them, been drawn to the attention of the government? If so, does the government consider it in the public interest to permit the issue of visas to aliens who are disposed to stir up trouble in Canada against what has become, and we hope will remain, a friendly Yugoslav administration?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I must confess that I have not seen the dispatch to which the question refers. The notice of the question sent to my office was referred to the Department of External Affairs and I was informed they had taken cognizance of the report. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs has some information that he might communicate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I cannot add very much except to say that a visa was granted to this Yugoslav citizen by one of our offices abroad. The circumstances of that action are being looked into. I might add that it is of course undesirable that any visitor should cause embarrassment to the government in its relations with friendly governments.

INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF VISAS TO VITALIS PANTENBURG AND WIFE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs: Have the German scientist, Vitalis Pantenburg, and his Russian-born wife been granted a visa to enter Canada and to travel through Labrador, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not know but I will look into the matter.

REGISTRATION OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS IN CANADA WTH AMERICAN AUTHORITIES—QUESTION AS TO EXTRATERRITORIAL ENFORCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question regarding the report that United States citizens in Canada were being instructed to register at United States consular offices in this country and he inquired whether any arrangements had been made with Canada to cover the enforcement of those reported regulations.

I would like to confirm what I said yesterday that there are no such arrangements, and to add that the position of the government had been made clear in this matter by a circular note dated May 6, 1947, which was sent to all foreign missions and consular offices in Canada. The pertinent portions of this circular note, which was based on section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, read as follows:

> As indicated in section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act there is no objection in principle to a foreign representative sending a call-up notice to a person who is a national of that country and who is not a Canadian citizen. However, the view of the Canadian government, with which foreign representatives will naturally wish to comply, is that such call-up notices should not give the impression that failure to obey will expose the person to penalties on Canadian soil.

AIRPORTS

GANDER, NFLD.—CONDITION AND CAPACITY OF AIRSTRIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport a question of which I have already given him notice. I should like to know if the statement appearing in an editorial in a recent issue of the Daily News of St. John's, Newfoundland, is correct, namely, that two of the runways at Gander airport necessary for landing and take-off in cross winds cannot be used by the large aircraft now in use on the international routes. Further, I should like to ask if he has any comment to make on the suggestion contained in the editorial that Mr. Chevrier's department would be quite happy to see Gander by-passed and thus be relieved of the obligation for its maintenance.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes before I came into the house the hon. member sent me the clipping to which he has referred. The article is not only inaccurate but it is untrue. In the first place there is nothing abnormal about not being able to operate aircraft in cross winds on certain strips. There is a main strip at Gander on which the government has spent a substantial sum of money and which is capable of taking any loads and any aircraft which may be used on any occasion. There is absolutely nothing the matter with that airstrip.

It is a fact that the two airstrips referred to have been affected by the frost and we have definite plans for the development of the Gander airport. That is indicated by the fact that we have already spent several millions of dollars there. We have in hand now a proposal with reference to the town site which we are discussing with the provincial authorities. This is not indicative of our by-passing Gander. Not only are the contents of the article untrue, but quite the converse is the fact.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY REGARDING INSURANCE BOOKS FOR STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). Is it compulsory for students to have unemployment insurance books and if not, what is the procedure?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to get the information and provide an answer for the hon. member tomorrow.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

PROVISION FOR RETIRING ALLOWANCES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 392, to provide retiring allowances, on a contributory basis, for persons who have served as members of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate once more that I am not opposed to a scheme to provide pensions for members of parliament but I am opposed to the present plan.

My reasons are that I am convinced, as a result of the discussions and the evidence presented in the banking and commerce committee, that the present scheme can and should be modified by way of an age floor and some restrictions on the rights to withdrawal so as still to permit a substantial pension benefit to members while at the same time reducing if not eliminating the proposed level of treasury contributions and thus removing from the scheme those features which, as I see them at present, must subject parliament itself to damaging criticism.

I have pressed these views as vigorously as possible both here and in the banking and commerce committee and from what has followed I can only conclude that my views are not generally shared.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: Having pressed them already to the best of my ability I do not propose to cause further delay by repeating them again in detail here, but I ask you, sir, and my colleagues, simply to accept this as an expression of my continued opposition to the present proposal for the reasons already given.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Green: On division.

Mr. St. Laurent: If there is to be a division I think we should see where the dividing line falls.

After the taking of the vote:

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. If anyone does not want to receive this pension, he does not need to receive it, and his contribution will be given back to him?

Mr. St. Laurent: As I understand it, under the provisions of the bill, those who do not receive a pension get their contributions back without interest.

WAR RISKS INSURANCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF MARINE AND AVIATION ACCOUNT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 336, respecting marine and aviation war risks insurance and reinsurance agreements.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should point out that this bill has been carefully considered by the banking and commerce committee and was reported as amended.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When this bill was up for consideration before, while we entirely approved the purposes of it, it seemed that it was not really legislation; it was more like a licence to the government to legislate in any way it wanted to. In other words, it seemed that it was much too widely expressed. Some concession has been made to that view. There is an amendment which will be made, I believe, when we come to section 3. When we come to that section, I will add a word or two.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Insurance and reinsurance agreements.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. Sinclair: Since hon. members for the most part have the bill as printed on first reading, they have not the one amendment which was made in the banking and commerce committee. We discussed this bill in three of our meetings. The hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Greenwood asked that section 3 be made more specific by the inclusion after the words "the minister" of the following words:

for the purpose of securing that ships and aircraft are not laid up and that commerce is not interrupted by reason of lack of insurance facilities.

The rest of the section is as it is in the bill which hon. members have.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The objection which we raised and which was further discussed in committee was, as I said, to the wide-open wording of the bill. We drew to the attention of the committee that the corresponding English legislation seemed to be more specific. We should like to have had more by way of addition, but nevertheless this is a concession to the view which we put forward. We may, so to speak, take it on account. At some later time this legislation may be subject to further amendment but that is not a matter for discussion now.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 4 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to raise one question on clause 8. There was an amendment proposed there by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming)—who is not at present in the house—which I have not got. I wonder whether the parliamentary assistant would give it to us and also the reasons for it. I do not know whether this is quite in order, but I should like it on the record.

Mr. Sinclair: As I recall it, the amendment which was put forward and which was defeated in the committee was to the effect that these agreements or reinsurance contracts between the Minister of Finance and the mutual insurance club of ship owners should contain a provision that there should be a period of 14 days after tabling in the house, within which the agreements could be annulled by joint vote of the House of Commons and the Senate. The Minister of Finance came to the committee and said that such a provision would be quite contrary to the general conception of responsible government; that the government must take responsibility for whatever contracts they may enter into under this legislation, and he pointed out further that should the actual ship owners who were insuring through their mutual insurance company—a bill for which will be back before this house on Friday night—find later that the contract could be broken unilaterally by action of the house they would probably be a little reluctant to enter into such contracts, and for that reason the Minister of Finance said that the suggested amendment was not acceptable to him, and it was voted down.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Supplementing what the parliamentary assistant has said, I just want to put on record the fact that our view was that this amendment, which was taken from the Emergency Powers Act, was a good one. I want to put on the record that while the Minister of Finance did say that this was unusual—I think the only one instance that he knew of, and that he said was not properly applicable in this case, was the emergency powers provision—while that view prevailed, I just want to state that in our view it was sufficiently important to be adopted. I am not pursuing the matter now but I should like to put on record that we were defeated but not convinced.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to reinforce what was said by the hon. member for Greenwood and to press one point which was raised in the committee when we asked for a further amendment to the bill.

It is true that the principal section of the bill has been amended with a view to setting forth the purposes for which powers are vested by parliament in the governor in council in respect to insurance for war risks. That goes some distance in meeting the fundamental objection that some of us had to this open type of legislation. When I say "open" I mean that as submitted to the house in the first place it empowered the governor in council without limitation, and without any attempt at setting limits or bounds, to enter into contracts for this type of insurance.

There was one further provision which it seemed to me might well be inserted in the bill with a view to maintaining direct control by parliament over the exercise by the governor in council of the powers vested in him by this legislation. I refer to the precedent provided in this connection by the Emergency Powers Act, chapter 5 of the first session of 1951. There you recall, Mr. Chairman, that following the vesting of certain powers of parliament in the governor in council, parliament saw fit to attach this provision to be found in section 2 subsection 5 of that act:

(5) If the Senate and House of Commons within a period of forty days, beginning with the day on which any regulation is laid before parliament in accordance with subsection four, and excluding any time during which parliament is dissolved or prorogued or during which both the Senate and House of Commons are adjourned for more than four days, resolve that it be annulled, it shall cease to have effect.

It would not go the whole way, but at least it would be one additional means of maintaining parliamentary control over the exercise by the governor in council of the powers vested in him by this bill if such a provision were written into it. There is a counterpart of such a provision also in the act of the United Kingdom to which frequent reference was made in the committee on banking and commerce, and from which the words were borrowed which have now been written into section 3 of the bill by way of amendment thereto. The mere provision for annulment in terms like these is not of very much effect, Mr. Chairman, unless there is some undertaking and willingness on the part of the government, as there was, you will recall, in connection with the Emergency Powers Act, to make it possible for a private member of the house to introduce one of those motions to annul.

On that occasion the Prime Minister gave an undertaking that even in spite of the difficulties that normally attend the introduction of motions by a private member, every effective opportunity would be given for this purpose if any private member indicated that he wished to bring such a motion under the provisions of section 2, subsection 5, of the Emergency Powers Act. In the case of the present bill, I urge that such an amendment should be written into it and that such an undertaking should be given on the part of the government.

I might point out in that connection also that under the British bill it is sufficient if the House of Commons alone passes a resolution to annul these contracts of insurance. It is not necessary that the resolution be passed by both houses of parliament.

In conclusion, I know I do not need to repeat what I said in the committee in speaking on both these proposed amendments, that there is no quarrel in this house, so far as I know, with providing a means of writing insurance of this kind. The risks are extraordinary and the occasion can descend upon us without warning. We must be prepared; we must take steps in advance to prepare should such unhappy emergency arise. The principle that some of us have seen in this matter, which seems to be directly raised by the wide terms in which the legislation was submitted to the house, is the issue as to how far parliament can go in vesting legislative power in the governor in council. The one amendment to this bill does help somewhat in that respect. I urge on the government again that they agree to a further amendment to the bill which, while in itself it is not completely effective, nevertheless has much to be said for it by way of maintaining parliamentary control over the exercise by the governor in council of these powers which the bill will vest in the governor in council.

Mr. McLure: May I be permitted to ask just one question? Will boats such as the ferry steamers Abegweit, Prince Edward Island and the Nova Scotia, and other boats running to Prince Edward Island, be insured, or are they already insured?

Mr. Sinclair: Unfortunately I am not familiar with the ownership of these ships. Are they publicly owned or privately owned?

Mr. McLure: Two of them are privately owned and two are government-owned.

Mr. Sinclair: As far as the privately-owned ships are concerned, the owners of the ships would decide whether they wanted to come into this Canadian Shipowners Mutual Assurance Company to cover their ships with war risk insurance in the case of hostilities or apprehended hostilities. The experience of the last war shows that private ship owners whose ships were likely to encounter war risks immediately took part in this arrangement.

As far as the government-owned ships are concerned, while they are covered by marine insurance in time of peace they too might be exposed in time of war. It would then be a government decision as to whether those government-owned ships would be placed in the pool or whether they would take the chance directly as the government does with most of its other properties.

As far as the privately-owned ships are concerned, that is a decision for their owners. The experience of the last war shows that if the owners think that there is any war risk involved they would immediately enter the pool.

Mr. McLure: Is the Abegweit insured? The Charlottetown, which was a government-owned ship, was lost in 1941 but it was insured. I was wondering whether the new ship was insured.

Mr. Sinclair: I am not qualified to answer that because marine insurance on government-owned ships would come under the Minister of Transport. My recollection is that he said last week that the government does carry marine insurance on their shipping. Of course the government does not carry insurance generally on public property throughout Canada because they can spread the risk. I shall find out from the Minister of Transport and see that an answer is given later. Of course that matter would not come within the scope of this bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last night I announced that I would take up Bill No. 390, respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund. I now find that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, is speaking at the Royal Military College, Kingston, but will be back some time during the day. I would suggest that we go into committee of supply and continue with the estimates of public works.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Trying to take us by surprise.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

344. British Columbia, $2,820,000.

Mr. Green: The details on page 404 indicate a vote of $175,000 for a post office building at Vancouver. Can the minister indicate the situation at the present time with regard to the construction of this post office building?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): This amount is required to complete the purchase of the site, for architects' fees and other preliminary work toward the erection of a new post office building in Vancouver, B.C. The site for this building, the city block bounded by Georgia, Homer, Dunsmuir and Hamilton streets, was expropriated in 1948. The proposed building will be a four-storey structure approximately 445 feet by 257 feet with basement and sub-basement. It will be of brick construction with stone trim. The preliminary estimate of cost is $6 million and the estimated requirement for 1952-53 is $175,000. The appropriation in 1951-52 was $300,000, including funds transferred, and we spent $291,790. This vote was authorized on February 14, 1950.

Mr. Green: I am not quite clear about how the money voted last year was spent and how the money to be voted this year is to be used.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There were three valuations made of the site which ranged from $338,650 to $582,500. Based on settlements already made, the total cost of this property is now estimated at $640,000, of which amount approximately 95 per cent has been spent. Now that we have the site we are preparing plans.

Mr. Green: Am I to understand that there has been paid for the site something like $640,000, but nothing yet has been paid for plans?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The architects are Messrs. McCarter and Nairne, and I am told that they have not yet received payment for it.

Mr. Green: Will this vote of $175,000 all be required for the payments of architects' fees? It looks as though no money is being voted for actual construction work during the present fiscal year.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that the preparation of plans and specifications for a $6 million building takes from a year to a year and a half, so this amount would be applied on the payment of architects' fees. When the plans and specifications are completed they are approved by the Post Office Department and by the architects of the Department of Public Works. When there has been the necessary approval of the plans we will ask for an estimate to be included in the next main estimates and will then call for tenders and let the contract. My deputy says that it is expected to have an item for this in the estimates for the next fiscal year.

Mr. Green: No tenders will be called until the next fiscal year, which would be after March 31, 1953?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is right.

Mr. Green: When does the minister expect construction to begin?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not want to tie myself to a date.

Mr. Green: Approximately.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not want to give a definite date. I will let my friend know as soon as I am convinced that we can start on a certain date but I would have to know the progress made on the plans and specifications before tying myself down.

Mr. Green: Obviously it is a matter of some years. Would it be about 1955?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): My officials tell me at the end of next year we will probably be in a position to ask for tenders.

Mr. Laing: I should like to say a word on this matter not so much from the point of view of when construction is going to start as from the point of view of making some arrangement with the city of Vancouver with respect to parking and general traffic in that area. At the present time that is one of our most congested areas. The Vancouver city council is of the opinion that something should be done to see that the pony expresses, or whoever picks up the mail in the city, should be able to get down there. About eighteen months ago we had an unsatisfactory state of affairs. The city police were haling the mail rigs into court for double parking. At the present time there is a general situation of conflict of traffic arrangements owing to the fact that west Vancouver is growing very rapidly. There is through traffic across west Vancouver that cuts clean across traffic going north and south. I hope the minister will give some consideration to that matter because in our growing city traffic and all that it means is one of our primary considerations today, and that is the most complicated area of the entire city of Vancouver.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. gentleman may be assured that we will do our best to co-operate with the city authorities with respect to traffic and parking close to that building. I have not any definite knowledge of the situation but my officials will take it under consideration.

Mr. Green: I believe there was an attempt made in that connection to get the government to participate in a plan for the setting up of parking areas by means of the payment of a local improvement tax. Private property owners were agreeable to that, but the last time I made inquiries, which I admit was some months ago, the government would have nothing to do with the plan. Here you have a department occupying a large area right in the centre of the busiest part of the city, and I believe it should co-operate in any plan of that kind. I ask the minister to look into the situation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are always ready to co-operate, but I have not heard about the plan that the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. Green: I think it was investigated by the Department of Finance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will call the attention of my colleague to the remarks made by the hon. member.

Mr. Green: The matter came up in connection with the payment of taxes by the dominion to various cities. The problem was whether or not payment for this purpose could be considered under the act authorizing the government to make payments in lieu of taxes.

Item agreed to.

346. Unforeseen improvements, $1,200,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is this another way of saying "sundries"? I notice that last year the amount budgeted for was not wholly spent. Last year the amount in the estimates was $2,200,000 and the amount spent was $1,300,000. Could we have some explanation?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is the second year we have had this estimate, and it is based on past experience in the department. I will read what notes my officials have given me about this vote. This vote is required to cover works of a structural nature for which there is no specific appropriation but which cannot be charged to the maintenance vote under the allotment "repairs and upkeep", such as the installation of new elevators or air conditioning systems, construction of small additions, fire escapes, fences, major repairs such as strengthening foundations, supporting walls or floors, reconstruction of roofs and major ground improvements.

In setting up the new objects of expenditure treasury board took the stand that such works are more controllable and therefore should be distinguished from the ordinary repairs and maintenance and interior alterations required for accommodation of employees. The estimate of $1,200,000 for 1952-53 is based roughly on estimated expenditures for 1951-52. As this vote includes "unforeseen" improvements the actual expenditures will of course vary from year to year depending upon the number of projects that come to light from month to month. The estimated requirements for 1952-53 are divided, as shown in the details on page 405, as follows: At Ottawa, $300,000; other than Ottawa, $900,000.

The appropriation last year was $2,200,000 of which $1,180,703.14 was spent. That is why we have decreased the amount this year now that we have experience to guide us in the preparation of the estimate. This vote was provided for the first time in 1951-52 when the estimates were submitted in the new set-up by "objects". The amount of $2,200,000 was a tentative figure as expenditures for works of this nature for previous years had not been listed separately by the treasury office. The amount of $2,200,000 provided for 1951-52 proved to be considerably greater than the actual requirement. Using 1951-52 expenditures as a guide the estimated requirement for 1952-53 has been placed at $1,200,000 which is a reduction of $1 million compared with the preceding year. This way of presenting the estimates was adopted on the recommendation of the comptroller of the treasury and treasury board. We made these expenditures before but they came out of a general vote. Treasury board wanted to have this special item so they could exercise a better audit and control over it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not offering any opinion for the moment whether it enables treasury board to maintain better control, but if I have understood the minister's explanation it seems to me on the face of it that it is rather open to some question. The minister said, for example, that it would enable elevators and fire escapes to be provided as well as the strengthening of foundations and so forth. Would it be fair to say that this amounts to—what shall I say—being able to fix up an estimate which is not working out according to plan? In other words, you have an estimate for a building and you find you need some more money. As I understand it, instead of going back and correcting that, which might present some difficulties, we now begin all over again with a little separate contract. I assume of course it will all be done by tender after our discussions of last autumn, but will the minister say why, from the point of view of the efficient carrying out of an original contract, it is not carried through, and not supplemented by money brought in from a special fund for an elevator, a fire escape or for strengthening a foundation? It may be more convenient from the point of view of treasury board but if I have understood the situation correctly it seems to present certain questions from the business point of view.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps I was not clear enough for my hon. friend. This amount is expended as we go along. When we get reports from our architects and other officials in their districts that buildings are in a condition which they could not foresee when the estimates were prepared, we have to give out a contract for instance to reinforce a foundation.

We follow the same procedure with this vote as with others. We have plans and specifications prepared, tenders called for, and the lowest tender gets the contract. These additional works are not foreseen in the preparation of the estimates. When you have assets in construction as considerable as public works have you cannot think of everything or foresee everything that is going to happen to a building. This was experimented with last year and we had to follow the decision of treasury board. They wanted to have this special vote and follow each project as it goes along. The matter is submitted to treasury board before we can get an allotment to cover these works.

Perhaps I am still not explaining it as clearly as I should but you will recall that under the old procedure the vote was indefinite. Here, you know exactly what the vote is for. You will see that last year we had a vote of $2·2 million and spent $1·1 million. This year we brought it down to that level. In these matters we are guided by the officials of the Department of Finance and by the treasury board. Hon. gentlemen know we cannot touch these amounts even when voted by parliament without the specific approval of the comptroller of the treasury and the treasury officers who are stationed in each department.

This change resulted from their recommendation. Not being expert in these matters, once more I relied on their advice in the preparation of these estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is so persuasive. Nevertheless, when he says this is for unforeseen contingencies, it cannot be unforeseen that they will need an elevator or fire escape or strong foundations. Would the minister give us an example of where this fund was used?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Here is a better explanation and I see it more clearly myself. The treasury board and the comptroller of the treasury have taken the words out of the vote we had for maintenance and repairs —that is our general vote for these buildings. They said: This vote is required to cover works of a structural nature for which there is no specific appropriation but which cannot be charged to the maintenance votes under the allotment for repairs and upkeep, such as: installation of new elevators or air conditioning systems, construction of small additions, fire escapes, fences, etc., major repairs such as strengthening foundations, support walls or floors, reconstruction of roofs and major ground improvements.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister give us one illustration?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I can try to get from my officials a list of what was done but I have not got the list this morning.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let the item stand until we get that information.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There is one matter about which I would like to ask under this heading of unforeseen expenditure.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the item is to stand I would rather try to get on with something else.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to hold this up and I think the minister can probably give us an illustration very easily.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am supposed to do everything very easily, but if you want a list I will have to put my officials to work and make out a list for one year. I will send it to you by mail—registered mail.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not ask for a list; I asked for one illustration. I am ready to let this go through if the minister will say that he will give me this illustration later.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would like to bring the attention of the minister to the condition of the lawns surrounding the parliament buildings.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The lawns?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Yes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They come under the federal district commission. In 1933 parliament took this vote away from me and handed it over to the federal district commission with an appropriation of I think $100,000. I have nothing to do with the grounds around the parliament buildings.

Mr. Green: You don't cut the grass out in front.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have stopped that.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I can well understand why the minister does not want to assume any responsibility here because I consider the lawns disgraceful.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You should say that to the proper department.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): You can see dandelions, plantain and other weeds growing in the lawns.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is another case where they are putting on public works all the odium of what takes place, but we have nothing to do with dandelions and grass on parliament hill.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. McLure: I would like to ask the minister a question. I may say at the beginning that I am all in favour of any vote for Ottawa—for the beautification of the capital city of Canada—but I do not understand this vote when it says $300,000 for Ottawa and then $900,000 for other than Ottawa. What does it mean by "other than Ottawa"?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That covers our properties and buildings in different parts of Canada. Three hundred thousand dollars or part thereof is to be spent on our buildings in the city of Ottawa.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Coldwell: I wonder if I might ask a favour of the minister. I was called out but I wanted to inquire about the status of the public building at Biggar, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The site was purchased in 1938 from Mr. McLaren for the sum of $6,500. The estimated cost of the building would be $60,000; grading and sidewalks, $1,500; supervision, $2,000; contingencies, $11,500. The contract has not been let and I am not sure but I believe that plans for this building are being prepared in the department although I cannot say at what stage they are.

Mr. Coldwell: Since 1938, you see, it has been more or less—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On the rails.

Mr. Coldwell: —on the way. I hope the minister will see to it that plans are completed and the contract let at an early date.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister says he has no responsibility for the burned up lawns, the dandelions, plantain and other weeds, but would he tell members what minister is responsible for the condition of the grounds surrounding the building?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Certainly.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to compliment whoever is responsible for the beautiful flowers there were and which will be there later this year, but the lawn is disgraceful.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The federal district commission comes under the jurisdiction of the president of the privy council.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Who is he?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, I know I am Minister of Public Works and I know who the president of the privy council is. He is the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. In so far as these grounds are concerned, I was in the house in 1933 when Mr. Bennett's government thought the federal district commission had the expert people to maintain these grounds. It was thought that we did not have the right people to look after these flowers, lawns, shrubs and all of that. These activities were taken away from our department and handed over to the federal district commission. I think it was a wise move, but ever since the Minister of Public Works seems to bear the load, even though the grounds do not come under his department.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—

350. Maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works, $3,077,989.

Mr. Green: This item has to do with dredging, and I would ask the minister to explain whether anything is being done about dredging Vancouver harbour during the present fiscal year. There was some discussion on this question when the estimates of the Department of Transport were under consideration, and the minister of that department indicated that, while his department and particularly the national harbours board were very interested in that harbour, any actual dredging would have to be done by the Department of Public Works. I do not need to point out to the minister the great importance of Vancouver harbour. I do not think there is a finer harbour in Canada, possibly on this continent. There is a great deal of traffic going into and out of the harbour.

The situation has now developed that the first narrows, which is the entrance to the harbour, has to be dredged approximately five feet deeper. The necessity for this work has arisen because there are such large oil tankers being built now, which apparently run up to 40,000 tons and over. Some of the tankers are now waiting outside the harbour in order to get the tide at the right stage, although I think that is primarily because of the currents in the second narrows and not the depth of the first narrows. It is agreed on all sides that the first narrows will have to be dredged a further five feet. I am told there has been no dredging there since 1947, which is some five years ago.

This matter is urgent. The dredging will take some time. I hope the Department of Public Works is planning to commence that work during this fiscal year. Unfortunately I cannot find any vote to cover it, either in the regular estimates or in the supplementaries, but I believe it is one of the most important works that can be undertaken by the department. I hope the minister will see to it that the work is at least commenced.

Eventually, the first narrows will also have to be widened. There has been a suggestion made by responsible people in Vancouver who are interested in the harbour that a scale model of the harbour should be set up by the dominion government, and the whole question of the future development studied in that way. As the minister knows, there is a model now at the University of British Columbia for studying the currents in the Fraser river. I believe that a similar model for Vancouver harbour, including the first and second narrows, would be very beneficial. It seems this is the modern way of dealing with these harbour improvements. I believe there is such a model, for example, for the development of Niagara falls. I hope the minister will discuss with his colleagues the possibility of having a model set up and a study undertaken of the whole harbour situation.

But in the meantime this dredging is urgent. I believe the cost of dredging out a further five feet would not be very high. I have an article here from the Vancouver Sun of June 2, by Roy W. Brown, one of our leading journalists in British Columbia, in which he says that this dredging could be done within a year or fifteen months.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Who said that?

Mr. Green: Roy W. Brown of the Vancouver Sun. He is one of the senior and outstanding journalists of British Columbia, and has a wide knowledge of harbour conditions. He says he believes the job could be done within a year or fifteen months at a cost of about a million and a half. Can the minister tell us the situation with regard to that work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Three bodies are interested in this project, the national harbours board, the Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works. They are actually studying the situation, but I am told the problem is more complicated and the costs would be far more extensive than those mentioned by the hon. member. The idea of having a model, such as the one prepared by national research for the currents in the Fraser river and the former one they had for Niagara falls, seems to be a good one. However, that could not be done in a short time.

Mr. Green: That suggestion would be for studying the long term plan. I should like to keep that suggestion distinct from the need for dredging right away.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before you can undertake the dredging of the first narrows or the enlargement of it, I am told there is need for a whole scheme and specifications to be prepared. These engineers—I am told they are good men in their line of business—are afraid that the effect of doing the work without having a complete plan and specifications or by the piecemeal method of dredging in the first narrows, would be contrary to the effect the hon. member expects from this dredging. This is one of the projects in which the department is most interested, and you may be sure that with the co-operation of national harbours board and the Department of Transport we will keep this in mind and do our best to hasten the execution of the project.

Mr. Green: What progress can be made if there is no money in the estimates?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The study of this problem by the engineers of the three departments does not need a special estimate. When we have these plans and specifications we certainly will, but the work will not start this year. That is the information I have. We cannot start dredging without the hydraulic studies that have to be made. I am trying to speak as an expert in this matter, but I am not. When we have a report from these people, and the model they can study, we will certainly make a decision. We will have time to have an estimate submitted to the house before starting the work.

Mr. Dickey: On this question of dredging, in view of the obviously difficult and embarrassing situation with respect to Vancouver harbour, I am sure that the minister is delighted with the fact that we do not have any dredging problems in Halifax harbour. We have, however, some important requirements for dredging in fishing harbours along the coast in Halifax county. I hope that the minister will not permit the necessity of finding a solution to the difficult and expensive problem in Vancouver to delay the important projects that we require on the east coast.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to point out that the amount of traffic handled in Halifax could be easily handled in Vancouver with the present entry to the harbour. What the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I are thinking about is the great expansion of harbour traffic which will occur when the deep-sea tankers come in to feed off the Trans Mountain oil lines. I hope that this dredging, most of which will be in my riding, will be accomplished within the next year. We expect to see in the estimates of next year a substantial item so that this work can be undertaken in the spring of next year.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister has had a year in which to study the dredging requirements in the port of Pugwash in my constituency. He has shown great interest in the requirements there when I have drawn the matter to his attention on various occasions. I see there is an appropriation here of $4,166,989. That is a general appropriation. Then there are several appropriations running into hundreds of thousands of dollars, also for the St. Lawrence river $13 million, $15 million and so on.

At the port of Pugwash we have perhaps as fine a natural small harbour as there is anywhere in Canada, but there is some dredging required there. In recent weeks some of these ships carrying pulpwood, pit props and lumber have touched on the bends of the channel, which again emphasizes the necessity for some dredging. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra says that no dredging has been done in his harbour for five years. No dredging has been done in Pugwash since the beginning of time; but it is needed in order to improve the channel where there are bends and shallow places. I would ask the minister whether, in the last year, he has been able to give further effective study to the requirements and whether he will hold out any promise of dredging to improve conditions in Pugwash.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only thing that I recall is this. I believe that two years ago we had some dredging done at Pugwash to the amount of $300,000 or $400,000. Ever since then I had been under the impression that the work was completed to our satisfaction.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That was building a wharf.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then we will have to have some dredging done.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): In order to justify the building of a wharf, you will have to improve the conditions in the channel.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is right. I will ask my officials to look into this matter.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Last night I made passing reference to the harbour of Renews. At the harbour of Renews the wharf is not reached easily. It will be necessary to have the place dredged. A firm there is expecting to have a big fish plant, and it will need steamers to go in to the wharf. The whole operation will be held up if the dredging is not carried out. That is the situation as to the wharf. The harbour has been surveyed for dredging and the engineer down there is completely familiar with the situation. The only question is a physical one of getting the dredge to go there. Will there be a dredge available this summer to go to Renews harbour?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot give the exact date on which dredge No. 400 will be in Renews, but I have here a program of dredging with respect to these small harbours in Newfoundland; it will take two or three weeks, using that dredge No. 400, to do the work at Renews.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It will be this year?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that we have the list of these different places, and that we divide them up into so many days or weeks.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes; but will Renews be done?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am trying to extract that promise from my own officials.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Thank you.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope my hon. friend will not press me too much.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would remind the minister that I have been at this matter since 1949. I have been three years asking for it.

An hon. Member: That is a short time.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that this is the tenth place on our dredging list in Newfoundland where dredge No. 400 will go and do that work. When it will reach Renews, I do not know; I cannot give an exact date.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That does not seem to me to be fair because it was the first one that was mentioned here. I brought this matter to the minister's attention here on the first estimates.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot say to my officials that it is not fair. The hon. member may say that to me and I will take it; but I do not like to say it to my officials.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I hate to say it, Mr. Chairman, but each year the matter has been brought to the minister's attention and the dredging has not been done. This year there is an annual vote there and it is just a question of getting the dredge.

Locks and dams—

353. Maintenance and operation, $355,562.

Mr. Green: Can the minister explain what type of locks and dams come under the control of his department as distinguished from those which are under the Department of Transport?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This appropriation is required to provide for maintenance and operation of various locks and dams which were built or taken over by this department to raise or maintain water levels of the various lakes and rivers in Canada in the interests of navigation. These locks and dams are in operation during the navigation season. The list of them is as follows: Riviere du Lievre lock and dam, French river dams; Latchford dam; St. Andrews lock and dam; Cowan dam, Okanagan dam; Quinze dam; Timiskaming dam; Fryer's island dam; Lewes river dam. That is the list of the locks and dams that come under my department.

Mr. Green: The question I asked is this. Where is the line drawn between the dams and locks which are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport and those which come under the minister?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): One is under the canal system in the country and this is on the rivers and lakes where we are responsible for navigation. We administer the Navigable Waters Protection Act and these dams are built not on the canal system which comes under transport but on these rivers and lakes where we are responsible for navigation.

Mr. Green: There is quite a substantial increase in the repair and upkeep item which is to be found at page 413. It has gone up by nearly $200,000. Why is that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is explained in this way. On the northern part of the Ottawa river, north of Timiskaming there is what they call the Quinze dam which is badly in need of repair. This year we expect to spend $198,886 on that dam. Last year it was only $33,666. That would determine where the increase in work will be done on these dams.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to renew my plea to the minister on behalf of the workmen at St. Andrews lock. I do not think many alterations have been made in conditions there since 1910. Minor regulations may have been changed, but in general they are pretty much the same. As the minister knows, the lock is operated by three lock men and an assistant superintendent. The lock is operated 24 hours a day. Each man works 12 hours. He also works seven days a week. When the men want to change from the day shift to the night shift, they have the swing shift and they work 24 hours a day. I think that situation should be changed. In this day and age we do not ask men to work 12 hours a day. These men, compared with other employees in the government service, are working a day and a half every day. The unfortunate thing about it is that, although they work only seven months a year, during that seven months they put in more hours than the average worker. Then they are laid off, and they find it difficult to get a job in the wintertime. If you take the salaries that they earn per month and divide it up on an hourly rate you will find that it amounts to about 42 cents or 43 cents an hour. That is not a very high wage in these times. The members of the civil service exchange higher salaries for security, but when these fellows are laid off after seven months' work there is no security in the job. Then, they do not have unemployment insurance, and that kind of thing.

On different occasions I have brought this before the minister and he has promised to look into it. I make an appeal now that he do something about it. If you pick up the Canada Year Book and study it you will see that the St. Andrews locks, while small, do a tremendous amount of business. I do not think I am saying anything unreasonable when I say that some of the conditions regarding employment and hours of work in respect to the locks in the eastern part of Canada should be put into effect in the St. Andrews locks. I hope that the minister will do what he can for these men.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am most sympathetic to the representations made by the hon. member and I will discuss it with my officials.

Item agreed to.

Snagboats—

354. Maintenance and operation, $113,178.

Mr. Laing: I should like to say a word on this item and bring to the attention of the minister the work of the snagboats on the Fraser river. At the present time, as I recall it, a snagboat, I think it is Samson V, located at Westminster, is used to remove deadheads and logs from the north arm of the Fraser river particularly. I would draw to the minister's attention the situation that exists in the middle arm of the Fraser river, where apparently sedimentation has now been permitted, and there is no boat traffic through there, but it provides a basin for the airport in respect to seaplanes leaving and arriving at that point. A bad situation exists at that basin at the present time. It is practically loaded with deadheads and presents a dangerous condition for the seaplanes. I rather doubt whether the present Samson can enter the middle channel except at high tide, because of the very low water.

I have already spoken in the house of the very good work being done by private airplane companies. A number of them are running seaplanes out of that basin. They have moved as many as 600 men per day out of there by seaplane. A situation exists there with respect to snags which I think should be remedied. I would ask the minister whether he would pay some attention to the important seaplane base there as well as the general traffic within the north arm of the Fraser and the main arm of the New Westminster to the sea.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Queens.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have no snagboats in Prince Edward Island. The only snagboats we have are in the Fraser river. The Samson is employed in the removal of snags and obstructions from the channel of the Fraser river between Chilliwack and the gulf of Georgia, 75 miles. It is also employed in assistance in surveys and inspections and on minor repairs to floats and wharves on the Fraser river and in nearby waters.

The other snagboat, the Essington, keeps the Skeena and Naas rivers, and fishing grounds, clear of snags, floating logs and so forth, which foul and destroy the fishing nets and gear. I will tell my officials to look into the matter referred to by the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Roads and bridges—

355. Maintenance and operation, $321,230.

Mr. Green: What roads and bridges come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Burlington channel bridge, that is the one that was struck by a ship not long ago. The Kingston-LaSalle causeway; the New Westminster bridge, and other small bridges; the Great Bear river portage road. I have the list here: The Chapeau bridge on the Ottawa river between Allumette island and the mainland; Calumet-Bryson bridge, the Clair bridge in New Brunswick, which is an international bridge; the Des Joachims bridge, on the Ottawa river; the Edmonton-Alberta bridge; I think we have a certain interest in that bridge with the city of Edmonton. That is not a large amount. The city of Edmonton has charge of maintenance and repairs to this bridge. This department, the city and the Canadian National Railways company each bear one-third of the cost of repairs, and that amount of $300 would be our share in the repairs. Then, there is the bridge at Edmundston, New Brunswick, and Madawaska, Maine, an international bridge. There is also the Great Bear river, Northwest Territories, Portage road. Then there is the Notre Dame du Nord bridge, that is north of Timiskaming where the Quinze dam is; and the Chaudiere bridge in Ottawa; also the Perley bridge at Hawkesbury, Ontario; Portage du Fort, Quebec; St. Leonard, New Brunswick; Shellmouth, Manitoba; Matapedia, Quebec, and Missaguash, New Brunswick.

Mr. Green: On what basis is jurisdiction given to the minister over bridges? Is it interprovincial and international bridges? What is the basis for providing the jurisdiction?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the hon. gentlemen has a moment we will look at the British North America Act and we shall try to find the section under which we have the authority. I think it is section 92.

Mr. Blackmore: One o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Let me clear this British North America Act with the hon. gentleman. I do not want to come back to it.

It is subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act which reads as follows:

Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:

a. Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province;

It is under that section that all the provinces want to make me responsible—

Mr. Brooks: I had one in mind.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member knows about this, because he has been trying to make me responsible for this work. Since confederation these works have been undertaken by the provinces or by the department itself, or the government itself, and then we maintain them.

Mr. Green: How does the Edmonton bridge come into that category?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That was at the time when Alberta was a part of the Northwest Territories, years ago before the province was carved out. I suppose that the central government, having jurisdiction over the territories, put up a certain amount of money on that bridge, and now we are paying for the upkeep with the Canadian National Railways and the city of Edmonton.

Mr. Green: Is the minister responsible for all bridges in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. Do not give me any more bridges than I need. I understand that the Department of Resources and Development have jurisdiction over those things.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

356. Towards international bridge over the St. Croix river between St. Stephen, N.B., and Calais, Me., the state of Maine to pay a like amount (revote), $10,000.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): This is a revote toward the survey of the international bridge between St. Stephen, New Brunswick, and Calais, Maine. This bridge is known as the gateway to the maritime provinces. A short time ago the deputy minister visited the particular area and was able to obtain first-hand knowledge of conditions so far as the international bridge is concerned. There is an enormous amount of traffic over the international bridge and it is increasing year by year. Although there is a very efficient staff there, the lack of proper facilities greatly slows up the examination of freight. In addition all the bus traffic passing through to the west goes through Calais, Maine, and St. Stephen as well as the bus traffic going through to Montreal.

The big problem so far as freight is concerned is the trailer trucks which bring in fruit in particular from the United States to all parts of the maritime provinces. The bridge, which was built in the horse and buggy days, is too small to take care of the traffic that has developed over the years. Although we realize there is a shortage of steel which is responsible for the delay in bringing about this improvement, we are looking forward to the day when the steel supply may be more plentiful so that the department, together with the appropriate United States department, can go ahead with the construction of what is considered to be a very necessary improvement to speed up the handling of tourist and freight traffic entering the maritime provinces. I know the minister is aware of the condition and when the steel situation improves will do what he can to look after it.

Item agreed to.

357. Towards interprovincial bridge over the Ottawa river between Pembroke, Ontario, and Allumette island, Quebec, the provinces of Ontario and Quebec each to pay one-third of the cost and maintenance thereof (revote), $50,000.

Mr. Brooks: This bridge is similar to one which we have asked the minister to consider between Campbellton and Cross Point. I should like to ask the minister what the situation is with reference to the request of the residents of the Campbellton and Cross Point districts with respect to the construction of this bridge. Has there been any agreement between the federal government and the two local governments concerned, and has responsibility for the building of the bridge been definitely settled? The minister will remember that last year the matter came up and the premier of New Brunswick was of the opinion that it was the responsibility of the federal government to construct the bridge. I believe the premier of Quebec was also of the same opinion. I noted that just before the recess the minister read a section of the British North America Act. I think it was under that section that the premier of New Brunswick believed it was the responsibility of the federal government. Has anything more been done, and has any agreement been made with the provinces concerned as to the construction of the bridge?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The difference between the two projects is that the one mentioned in this item of the estimates is a bridge to Morrison island on the Ottawa river between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario has agreed verbally at least to build one-third of the bridge. There will be three bridges joining these islands. The province of Quebec has written that they will co-operate but no definite answer has been received. In the case of the proposed bridge between Campbellton and Cross Point, the two provinces say that it is not their responsibility and they will not make any contribution.

Mr. Brooks: Has the federal government definitely decided that it is not the responsibility of the federal government?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not go that far and have to have the justice department give any legal advice. So far as the Campbellton and Cross Point districts are concerned, however, in order that they will not suffer I believe a ferry service is to be established under the maritime commission between the two places, and I understand that the boat is being constructed at the present time.

Mr. Brooks: Is that to be a temporary measure?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It may be temporary, but how temporary I would not know.

Item agreed to.

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended upon individual listed projects—

359. Nova Scotia, $3,401,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is quite an important vote so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned. Some of these appropriations appear to be just token ones giving hope to the communities concerned. I have a quarrel with the minister and his department respecting the item of $150,000 for repairs and improvements to the Brooklyn breakwater in Queens county. Tenders were called for this work earlier in the season and three tenders were received. The lowest tender was that of MacDonald and McIsaac in the amount of $165,000. The next lowest was that of the Tidewater Construction Company in the amount of $178,000. These are both Nova Scotia firms. The highest tender was from T. C. Gorman and Company in the amount of $192,000. I am particularly interested in this breakwater even though it is not in my constituency. The tender of MacDonald and McIsaac called for the use of Wallace stone at a price of $27,000 below the highest tenderer. Wallace stone has been used for breakwaters, bridges and seawalls for one hundred years and more. It has been used in the biggest works in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

There is no question as to the quality of the stone produced at the Wallace stone quarries in Cumberland county. The fact that the lowest tender envisaged the use of Wallace stone at a very much lower figure warranted the contract being given to MacDonald and McIsaac. Instead of that being done new tenders were called for from those who had submitted tenders, and instead of the contract being given to the lowest tenderer in the first instance it was given to the highest tenderer, Gorman and Company, a concern owned by interests in central Canada. Their second price was $57,000 below their original tender.

The only change called for in the new specifications was that, instead of using heavy Wallace stone or local granite, concrete blocks were specified. There were only 3,500 yards of these blocks for the outer face called for, but the contractors were allowed to tender and reduce their prices on the whole structure by $57,000 for only 3,500 yards. This means they had the advantage of the prices quoted by both the other Nova Scotia contractors and were able to reduce the price by that amount, using concrete blocks as against native stone.

Anyone in the construction business or any engineer will be able to substantiate the statement that concrete blocks will not stand the erosion of sea water the same as granite or Wallace stone. Wallace stone, as I have said, has been used for this purpose for hundreds of years and the work has always stood up. Cement is in short supply. When I left Nova Scotia a few weeks ago there was a scarcity of cement with a warning that it would be even scarcer as the season advanced.

The Canadian National Railways need the revenue. I think their rate on transporting Wallace stone from Cumberland county to the Brooklyn breakwater would be $2.25 per ton. Instead of paying the Canadian National Railways $15 million or more on deficit, or refinancing their capital structure, they should be given an opportunity to earn money such as for transporting Nova Scotia stone, rather than use cement to make the composite material for these protective blocks required on the outside of the breakwater.

There is little employment at the present time at Wallace. The workmen have no war industry there and they have no major construction work at the present time and they need employment. It is my opinion, it is their opinion, and it would be the opinion of engineers generally that artificial concrete blocks cannot be justified in place of natural stone—Wallace stone or local granite.

Contractors from outside Nova Scotia were given advantage over local contractors. They were given the advantage of knowing the prices quoted by these local contractors. The workmen in Nova Scotia, the workmen at Wallace, are denied the opportunity to quarry this stone in a community where there is no defence construction employment whatever. There is a real grievance, Mr. Chairman, and I think if the minister would examine into the whole situation he would agree with me that a mistake was made by the department in giving this contract to central Canadian contractors, and giving them the privilege of using artificial blocks made out of cement when cement is in short supply.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for bringing up this case. For years he has been one of my best advisers on works in Nova Scotia and I consider his opinion very highly but this is one of those cases where my department and I thought we could make some economies.

In 1950 in the department we had an estimate prepared for this breakwater. The estimate was $150,000. We called for tenders on June 28, 1950, and I think stone was to be used in the breakwater—Wallace stone or perhaps granite. Two tenders were received —the lowest was $284,459.36; the highest was $305,589.20. My engineers were astounded at the high cost of using Wallace stone or granite for this breakwater but they held off for another year. We did not close at that price as we thought they were exorbitant tenders. On September 5, 1951, we called for new tenders. Only one bid was received— $273,484. That was still a very high price. The third time we called for tenders seriously was on November 21, 1951. We received bids ranging from $165,000 to $192,531. Well, that was still over and above our estimate and the engineers looking into the necessity of the breakwater and the quality of the materials going into it advised having the breakwater built of cement blocks so we changed the specifications and called for new tenders. We received three tenders, the lowest being $135,555.55 and the highest $152,200.

I realize that the breakwater will not be made out of Wallace stone but out of cement. My officials say that the life of this cement will compare favourably with stone if you consider the price which is paid—and we thought we would save quite a bit of money by building it that way. I think we were right there. I like stone—Wallace stone—myself, but when it became a luxury to use it on a breakwater I thought we should use other means.

With respect to those who did tender I am told that the lowest tenderer has his office in Halifax and that would be in the province of Nova Scotia. The first one was T. C. Gorman and Company. The second one was Tidewater Construction, another Halifax firm tendering at a figure of $148,408; and R. K. MacDonald and Ronald McIsaac are also in Halifax. So, the three bidders have their offices in Halifax in the province of Nova Scotia.

Now I know these Nova Scotians extend their activities outside the province and we meet them all over the country. They are very aggressive contractors and although they may have offices elsewhere I am told these are three good firms in the province of Nova Scotia.

You can compare this contract for $135,000 with the $305,000 which was the highest tender we received on the first demand for tenders. Perhaps I should have stuck to Wallace stone; I do not know; but my officials would not meet my views. The hon. gentleman knows we have spoken about this matter before. I understood the situation and that this stone was to come from the province of Nova Scotia. It should be put on certain things and they get certain preference for their works, but this amount was too large and I could not comply. I hope the next time we do put up a breakwater we will get tenders with Wallace stone at lower prices.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I appreciate what the minister has said but I cannot agree that there is justification for using concrete blocks. I cannot agree with him that there is justification for giving the successful contractor, who may have an office in Halifax but the firm is not controlled in Nova Scotia, the advantage of the knowledge of the tenders of the other Nova Scotia firms. The lowest tender for the Wallace stone was $165,000, which showed a saving of $27,000 over the tender first submitted by this firm who was finally given the contract at $135,000.

Under those circumstances, it is my opinion it would have been only fair to allow the two Nova Scotia firms who tendered, the Tidewater Construction Company, who tendered for $148,000, and the MacDonald and McIsaac Company, who tendered for $152,000, to meet the final figure. Neither of these firms recommended concrete blocks for this work. Perhaps they would have accepted the contract at the low figure of $135,000. There was no justification for that reduction because of the change made in the specifications by the minister or his department. I think everyone will agree with me on that. This outside firm may have had inside information—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think you are fair in that.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): —which the other two firms in Nova Scotia did not have.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I wish to deny that. No information was given. We changed the specifications from Wallace stone to concrete blocks. Those specifications were in the requests for tenders. We gave out no information. That is another charge against the officials of my department. You name the man who gave out the information, and I shall attend to him.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not want to get any man into trouble. He is in enough trouble now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is a further innuendo; I do not think that is fair to the official. If you know him, give me the name. If you do not want to give it publicly, give it to me afterwards and I shall have an investigation made.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not intend to give any name. I think the minister has a lot of good officials, but I think they made an error, perhaps under pressure and perhaps not. I think they made an error in changing the specifications. I am making this statement, that twenty years from now the concrete blocks will not have stood up as the natural stone would have against the washing of the sea.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps you are right that the stone would have a longer life than the cement. I have seen stone in Nova Scotia deteriorate in certain of my buildings. I have to rebuild one right now, and it is of Wallace stone. This company with which we are signing the contract is the T. C. Gorman (Nova Scotia) Limited.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Who are the shareholders?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know. If I had to go into who holds the shares of all the companies with whom we do business, we would have to extend our staff because the public works department does business with nearly every large firm in the country. You may be right about the life of the stone and the cement, but on the other hand I think I am right about the price. Any other information you can give me I should like to have, because if I have an official in the branch of engineers who gives out information, I want to know it.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There is some other additional information I should like to have. There is the work at Diligent river, which is necessary. Perhaps the minister would give me some information with respect to the revote. There was $21,000 last year and $15,000 is provided this year. How much work was done on the Diligent river wharf repairs last year, and is the vote now being requested to complete that work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What was the name of that place?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Diligent river, the wharf repairs, $15,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This revote is required to complete the contract with Walker and Hall Limited, at $17,008.66 for repairs to the older portion of the wharf which is badly deteriorated and unsafe for public use. These repairs are necessary to ensure sufficient space for the shipment of pulpwood and lumber, which have an annual value of $120,000.

The work will consist of reconstructing the older portion of this wharf by building two native timber pilework sections 20 feet wide by 71 feet long and 20 feet wide by 85 feet long. These two sections are to be at right angles to each other and the area behind them filled and the surface gravelled. By order in council dated November 12, 1951, authority was granted to enter into a contract with the lowest tenderer, Walker and Hall Limited, of Box 1152, Halifax, Nova Scotia, for wharf repairs at Diligent river, amounting to about $17,008.66. The lowest tender was that of Walker and Hall at $17,008.66, and other tenders were received from R. A. Douglas, K. J. Cochrane, Urquhart Construction Limited, B. A. Allaby and R. P. McLeod.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I raise no objection to the letting of this contract. I am simply inquiring as to whether the amount provided would finish the work as it should be finished. There is no question about the desirability of this work being completed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told it is to complete the job.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There is one other item about which I should like to inquire, and that is the repairs to the wharf at Wallace, $55,000. This is an important community, and there has been a wharf there for many years. I am doubtful as to whether this appropriation will be sufficient to give this place the facility that is warranted by the importance of the community and the amount of shipping using the facilities. I should like to find out from the minister when the work is expected to be completed, and whether tenders have yet been called. If not, when will they be called?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This work is to consist of widening the wharf to 40 feet from end to end, including the stone-filled approach, and it includes repair of the existing 311 foot outer timber section by construction of creosoted pile trestle work driven through the old cribwork. The estimated cost in this case is $55,000. Tenders will be called in the near future and the lowest tenderer will get the contract. I understand this work is necessary for the fishermen loading and landing their fishing gear and landing and shipping live lobsters for delivery by large refrigerator trucks. The work requested by the fishermen consists of widening the existing public wharf, construction of an ell, 250 feet long at its channel end, and dredging the berths on either side of the wharf to 6 and 8 feet respectively. I think tenders will be called in the near future.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I thank the minister. There is no question about this work being justified and warranted. My only doubt is whether the amount provided is sufficient to build the wharf and to make the repairs that are warranted by the freight traffic that uses that wharf.

Item agreed to.

360. Prince Edward Island, $1,950,000.

Mr. McLure: This item is for harbour improvements, wharves, et cetera for the whole province of Prince Edward Island. A number of votes for new construction work—and they have been generous ones—have gone to Souris and Summerside. Of this fact I have no complaint whatsoever to make. Once again I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of Public Works the fact that in Charlottetown we were promised a thorough survey of the harbour and its requirements under the Duncan commission. Their recommendation of 1926 has never yet been carried out with regard to Charlottetown harbour improvements. As they promised this survey, I should like the minister to see that we get a survey of Charlottetown harbour this year.

A partial survey was made a few years ago and they commenced making improvements at the east end of the harbour. There is a fair vote for that purpose this year. They are doing an excellent job of it. The whole harbour should have this survey and we should know what we are going to get.

There is one vital thing which we must get there, namely the marine railway slip. This is another unfulfilled promise of two different governments. We have the best location for it, and it would be the means of giving employment to our labour who have to go abroad looking for employment in the railway slip business and so on. For instance, at the present time we have there machine shops capable of doing the very best work in connection with repairs on steamers, but they cannot go below the water line. We are therefore handicapped in getting contracts even at the present time. We have, however, a couple of contracts from the defence department; that work is all for repairs above the water line. I wish the Minister of Public Works would be serious about this matter and give our harbour a survey this summer. Then we can realize whether or not we are going to have the fulfilment of these promises.

As to the marine railway slip, we would not have large ships any more than our own; but if we just had our own boats to repair and to overhaul, we would have sufficient work for our labourers and mechanics. We have the mechanics to do the work. For instance, in 1940 when the Charlottetown was lost, if we had had a marine railway slip we would not have lost that steamer. She was on her way to another yard to be overhauled. All of our local boats could be repaired there. At the present time they must go to Pictou, Saint John, Halifax, or Sorel, entailing greater costs. We could have a certain amount of repairs done during the summer season and also during the winter season on the boats that are in the service such as the Brant, the Sorel and others. In addition to that, we would be holding our own people and giving employment to at least 250 men per year.

I want the minister to be serious about this matter and to give it consideration. I am quite grateful for the harbour improvements that have already been started at the eastern end of the harbour, but we must have a survey here; we must have the recommendation of the Duncan commission carried out because it was their commission and they promised to fulfil the recommendations of that commission. This is one that I have been harping on here for six or seven years. Nothing much has been done about it, except that it comes up at every election. I suppose it will come up at this next one and will be promised all over again.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): While I am always ready to try to fulfil promises made 26 years ago, when I was a young man, I am nevertheless surprised that the hon. member raises this matter today; because from 1930 to 1935, when we both were sitting in the House of Commons, I do not know why he did not get these promises fulfilled. That was the time when he could have had these promises fulfilled. I would not be ready right today to make that promise. I certainly admire the patience and tenacity of my hon. friend. For some years past he has been asking me for various works. If we look at the details we find there is an amount shown for Rustico harbour, breakwater repairs, Rustico harbour landing, a revote; that is in his riding. This year I see we have nearly $100,000 in the estimates for that harbour. It took my hon. friend a few years to convince us that we should do these works. Now we are doing them. I thought we would have a respite of at least this year before he would bring me into a survey of the whole Charlottetown harbour. I see that for Charlottetown we have $375,000 in the estimates.

Mr. McLure: I recognize that fact.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is for wharf reconstruction and improvements. I like to listen to my hon. friend but I cannot do everything at the same time. I cannot put up his building, his wharf and attend to his Rustico harbour all at the same time. He and I will be here for a long time yet; and as time goes on he will probably succeed in getting far more than he has obtained up until now.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the minister about one or two items in the Prince Edward Island estimates. The first is with regard to the Souris breakwater repairs. I happen to have been working in the Wallace quarry quite a few years ago getting $50 a month as foreman. In that period we supplied the stone for the Souris breakwater, and for that at Summerside and other places. There is here an appropriation of $101,000, following an appropriation of $86,000 for breakwater repairs at Souris. Can the minister give us some information with regard to what is expected to be accomplished by that expenditure?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This vote is to reconstruct the 406 foot section, 40 feet wide, adjoining the outer block of the breakwater, on the existing creosoted substructure. Work will consist of closed face timber crib, stringers, plank deck, and ballast fill. All timber except the plank deck is to be creosoted. The estimated cost is $101,000. We did work in 1951-52 up to $86,000 on this breakwater. We will be asking for tenders for this new work during the summer or the fall.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I did not understand the minister to say how much rock is required for facing this breakwater.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have not the specifications, but it will be rock fill.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It is to be rock fill?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They say they have plenty of rock on the island.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): They have plenty of rock on the island, but any rock that I have seen on Prince Edward Island did not have a very long life. However, I am not going to say anything against it. There are two works here, Wood Island, breakwater extension; that is where the ferry is working under subsidy, and then Tignish, repairs to breakwaters. What is proposed at Wood Island? A great many tourists cross over at Wood Island. So far as the ferry steamers are concerned, they are reasonably good. They are not up to the requirements of the traffic, and the facilities, the wharf and the breakwater are certainly not adequate. I should like a statement from the minister as to what is proposed to improve the facilities.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Construction of 200-foot extension at inner end of the east breakwater, extension to be a tied-back wall of close piles, wales, triangular fillers and galvanized wire rope ties. All timber to be creosoted. The estimated cost of the work is $18,500.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister give me some information with respect to Tignish, repairs to breakwater on Prince Edward Island? Have tenders been called? If so, who are the successful tenderers? What is the amount?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Proposed work and estimated cost to rebuild a 573-foot section of the south breakwater with creosoted piles, wales and sheeting, $40,000. That will be by contract. Tenders will be called. By day labour, to repair 115 feet of north breakwater at $8,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the contract been called for that work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think the contract is let. Perhaps the tenders have been called for it, but I cannot recall having signed any.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister give me information later as to whether tenders have been called and whether a contract has been let? Can he give me information as to who the tenderers are and who put in the lowest tender?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that tenders have been called, but the date for having them in has not expired yet—and I cannot recall the date.

Item agreed to.

361. New Brunswick, $2,755,000.

Mr. Brooks: I want to ask the minister a general question on this item. It is gratifying to know that great improvements are to be made in the different breakwaters in the province of New Brunswick. I notice that that is also true of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Is it the general policy of the government to give special attention to these breakwaters?

Yesterday I heard the minister say, in reply to the hon. member for St. John's West, that one at Chance Harbour had been recommended by the Minister of Fisheries. With respect to the repairs to breakwaters throughout the maritime provinces, are the repairs being made as the result of recommendations from the Minister of Fisheries? If so, we feel grateful to the Minister of Fisheries because for many years we had a minister of fisheries in Canada who came from New Brunswick and we never received so much attention with respect to breakwaters as we are having at the present time. Is there a general policy now of improving all breakwaters in the maritime provinces? Are contracts being let for all these different improvements at the present time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When requests come in for new work or for large repairs to these breakwaters and piers we consult the Department of Fisheries. They have their officials travelling around the coast, and they know the needs of the fishermen. We do not always base our decisions on what they say, but they serve as advisers to public works. When we have to repair these breakwaters our own engineer makes that survey and he makes his report and we act on his report.

Mr. Brooks: The original recommendation comes from the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would not say that. We consult them. They are our consultants, but requests come from everybody with regard to these works, from members of parliament, from the mayors, from the fishermen, from the co-operatives and so on, and then we get a report from our own engineer, and to complete the file we do consult the Department of Fisheries, and when the works are not needed, well, we hesitate before undertaking them, but usually these works are needed.

Mr. Brooks: I understood the minister to tell the hon. member for St. John's West yesterday that recommendations with respect to Chance Harbour, for instance, came from the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, the request came from the local people, and then we submitted it to the Department of Fisheries. They inquired and they made a recommendation for it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister a recommendation from the inspector of fisheries and the Minister of Fisheries with respect to the petition in Pugwash, Wallace and Malagash for wharves and breakwaters to give protection to the lobster fisheries in that section exposed to the storms of the Northumberland strait? I am sure the inspector of fisheries would be in accord with requests for sea protection and wharves to serve lobster fishermen in those areas. Has the minister any recollection of that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I cannot recall having received it, but I will look it up and if there are recommendations from fisheries they will certainly be considered, as the recommendation made by my hon. friend will.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): It has been suggested that the recommendations come from the Department of Fisheries with respect to breakwaters and so on. In my experience in the short time I have been here the Department of Public Works gets information that would be available from the Department of Fisheries as to the number of boats that fish out of the many ports that we have in the maritime provinces. That is information which is helpful, and it is information which I know the department makes available to the Department of Public Works. It has to do with the number engaged in fisheries in a particular port where a breakwater is erected and where improvements are asked for, the value of the fishing carried on and the protection that is required to take care of the fleet.

Item agreed to.

362. Quebec, $5,165,600.

Mr. Boisvert: I should like to say a few words on this item, and I shall speak French on the subject matter.

(Translation):

In the details of this item I see at page 423 of this book of estimates that an amount has been provided for the restoration of the wharf at Ste. Angele, which happens to be located within the constituency I am privileged to represent in this house.

I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to express my appreciation to the government, to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) who have agreed to accept my representations regarding this wharf. This new wharf will be of immense value to the people of Nicolet-Yamaska and Lotbiniere counties and also to several neighbouring constituencies. Moreover, on the other side of the river, the city of Three Rivers, which is located opposite Ste. Angele, will also derive great advantage from this wharf. In this respect I wish to associate the present mayor of the city of Three Rivers with the steps I have taken and which will result in the reconstruction of such an important wharf for the Three Rivers and Nicolet districts.

363. Ontario, $5,609,000.

Mr. Cardiff: With respect to this item for Ontario, I see by the details on page 424 that there is an item of $32,000, which is a revote for Goderich harbour and an estimate of $118,000. There is an estimated $118,000 to be spent there. Will the minister tell me what is contemplated in that vote?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This amount of $118,000 is to provide for the following: to complete urgent repairs to a portion of the mooring wharf and east harbour wall, $11,000; to reconstruct a 500-foot section of the south pier in steel sheet piling and reinforced concrete, $107,000; making a total of $118,000. The appropriation in 1951-52 was $153,000. Estimated expenditure on Canadian Dredge and Dock Company contract for reconstruction of sections of north and south piers, $113,000; day labour, $8,000, making a total of $124,484.93 including inspection, etc.

Mr. Cardiff: Has any consideration been given to moving one of the piers toward the mouth of the river in order to provide more protection?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told by my deputy that he does not recall any request being made to move piers. I would not want to be definite, but that is the information given to me.

Item agreed to.

365. Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories, $148,500.

Mr. Thomas: Would the minister check the possibility of having a wharf built at Pigeon Lake in Alberta. This wharf was originally constructed in 1935 or 1936 by piling up some rocks and placing a wooden walk on top. Whenever the ice broke up it came up under the platform and then there was nothing left but a pile of rocks. This creates a hazard, not only to those having boats there but to people using the wharf. A number of boats have been broken up on the rocks during the last few years and I cannot understand why some child has not been either seriously injured or killed by falling on the rocks. I am not asking the minister for an opinion right now, but I urge him to look into the matter and see if something cannot be done.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall certainly do that.

Item agreed to.

366. British Columbia and Yukon, $6,992,000.

Mr. Gibson: Does the minister consider the dredging equipment now in British Columbia adequate for the needs?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told that we have three dredges working on the coast in British Columbia, and probably if we had a fourth we could find work for it.

Mr. Gibson: You are considering the construction of another one?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to refer to repairs to wharf and breakwater and improvements at Sidney, British Columbia. As the minister knows, I am always extremely conservative in my requests to the department. I thoroughly investigate each one before I make a recommendation and therefore I approach this matter with a great deal of confidence. What improvements are envisaged in connection with this important wharf, and when may we expect to have tenders called for the work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This amount is required to effect repairs to the wharf and breakwater, to extend the wharf and to construct a float. The proposed work and estimated cost is as follows:

Renewal of superstructure of existing wharfhead	$ 40,000
Repairs to gantry slip and two guide dolphins	25,000
Replacement of 50-foot timber breakwater	10,000
Construction of 12-ft. x 50-ft. float	3,000
Renewal of three 19-pile outer guide dolphins	15,000
Extension of wharfhead including movable slip and dolphin	55,000
Renewal of 175-foot timber breakwater	25,000
Advertising, inspection and contingencies	7,000
Total estimated cost	$180,000

We expect to call tenders some time during the fall, but the officials of the department are overworked. However, I shall see personally that they are called for as soon as possible.

Mr. Green: There are four Vancouver items on page 427, the first being False creek fishing harbour, $100,000, which apparently is a revote. Could the minister state whether anything has been done on this project? Then there is an item of $32,000 for Marpole wharf; another item for $55,000 for the seaplane landing at Sea Island, which is also a revote, and then finally an item of $35,000 for continuation of sea wall, Stanley park. I presume that that is the yearly contribution that is made. I know this work has been under way for some years. Could the minister give us some information concerning these four votes?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In the case of False creek, this project has been delayed owing to the difficulty in acquiring the necessary site, and opposition from interests presently operating there. Steps have been taken to acquire the land from the Squamish Indians through the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Before the land is purchased it must be appraised and this is being done by the Vancouver real estate board who have been held up by the presence of snow over the area in question. That was the condition when the report was made. The difficulty there is that we must have the land before we can proceed.

Mr. Green: Do I understand the minister to say that the Indian affairs branch is going to pay the Squamish tribe for this land?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If we buy the land, probably public works will have to pay.

Mr. Green: What amount is involved?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Vancouver real estate board are handling this for us.

Mr. Green: Will construction be started during the present fiscal year?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not give an answer as to the date, when we have not acquired the site.

Mr. Green: Have any plans been drawn?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No plans have been prepared as yet. We must have the site and the location before we can deal with the plans.

The next vote the hon. member asked about was that in reference to Marpole wharf. Contract plans were prepared but as they embraced a larger area than the original wharf and overran the boundaries of foreshore property allocated to the department, it has been necessary to negotiate with persons having rights on the adjoining foreshore areas before reconstruction of the wharf can proceed. It is anticipated that these legal matters will be settled in the near future and than we will be able to proceed.

The next item has to do with Sea Island. An order in council dated April 10, 1952, granted authority to enter into a contract with the lowest tenderer, the Vancouver Pile Driving and Contracting Company Limited, of 910 Dominion Bank building, Vancouver, for the construction of a seaplane landing at Vancouver, Sea island, amounting to $58,275. The highest tender was that of the Todd Construction Company Limited in the amount of $71,337.36. That work is proceeding or will proceed because the tender has been let.

Mr. Green: There is enough money in the vote to complete that work?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are asking for $55,000. I see the lowest tender was $58,000, so we will have to find that money somewhere.

Mr. Green: On the preceding page there is an item, "North Vancouver, Burrard inlet, to take over and enlarge harbour, $89,000". What is that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To take over North Shore Marine Basin Limited there is an amount of $46,750; to improve and repair existing structures, $9,250, and to enlarge boat mooring facilities, $33,000. As I understand it, we are taking over North Shore Marine Basin Limited and we are doing this work on it amounting to some $42,250.

Mr. Green: Is that the naval property which is being taken over, or is it property owned by a private firm?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): North Shore Marine Basin Limited is the only place on the north shore of Burrard inlet available to the fishing fleet for wharfage. It is a private enterprise that has provided mooring facilities for the fishing fleet at this place. Because of their limited facilities their revenue is not sufficient to pay taxes and upkeep and maintain the enterprise. They cannot carry it on. They are forced to close down, and we are taking it over so the fishing fleet will have moorage at that place.

Mr. Jones: There is an item of $1 million for Okanagan flood control. This project has been held over for a year or two now and nothing has been done. I understand the plans have been ready for some time. I should like the minister to say whether or not the work is going to start this year. We understood it was to start early in the spring, but so far nothing has been done.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have a vote of $1 million as our share of this work. Preliminary work, including surveys, plans, specifications and acquisition of right of way, was carried out between 1948 and 1951. The actual work has been somewhat delayed because of negotiations involving right of way, and discussion with the government of the United States of America covering the protection of spawning of the blue back salmon in the Okanagan river. This question has been referred to the international joint commission. That probably would be one difficulty, and we cannot proceed before we have a decision or report from that commission. The $1 million is supposed to be our share in these works. The other 50 per cent will be paid by the government of British Columbia.

Mr. Jones: Is it reasonable to expect that the work will be started this year?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I hope it will be. This estimate was prepared last December, and we had a request for our share of $1 million.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to ask a question regarding an item that has been revoted for a number of years with respect to a seaplane base at Prince George on the Fraser river. There is a great growth in aviation in that part of the country. Seaplanes land at great peril in the middle of the stream and no facilities are provided for them. I hope this project may be carried out in the near future.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Work on this project has been delayed pending acquisition of a foreshore reservation and obtaining agreement from the provincial government for the construction of a roadway. We are taking this matter very seriously. We are trying to hasten the procedure so all difficulties will be cleared out of the way and we may proceed. We are anxious to proceed.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I understand the amount of property involved is very small.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Those are the difficult ones to settle.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): It is more or less a matter of a ribbon of red tape.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know whether it is red tape, but in my experience we have more trouble settling the little cases than the big ones.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Central B.C. Airways, Canadian Pacific Air Lines and others land there and the lives of pilots and passengers are at hazard as the result of there being no facilities.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers generally—

367. Repairs and upkeep for the maintenance of services, including reconstruction and replacements, and to authorize commitments against future years in the total amount of $660,000, no new works to be undertaken, $2,975,000.

Mr. Green: What is the relationship between this item and the group of items we have just passed? They all seem to be for repairs and upkeep of harbours and rivers. What is the distinction?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is a similar vote to the one in the architectural branch for maintenance and repairs of existing works. This is our maintenance and repair vote for engineering. Last night or this morning we passed a maintenance vote for buildings. This is a similar vote.

Item agreed to.

368. Fraser river—fifty per cent of the cost of investigations to be carried out by the "dominion provincial board Fraser river basin", $137,500.

Mr. Green: This item has to do with investigations being carried out by the dominion-provincial board on the Fraser river basin. Will the minister tell us what progress has been made with these investigations and when the last report was filed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told the last report came into the office yesterday, but some days ago the hon. member for Kamloops asked us what progress and what reports had been made, and I believe about ten days ago I tabled in the house the answer to the inquiry of the hon. member. I do not have it in my memory but I think the hon. member can easily get that document and see what has been done by this board.

Item agreed to.

369. Protection works generally, $300,000.

Mr. Green: Is this item to give the minister a sum from which to draw for these works, or what is the purpose of this vote?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When the engineer reports that damage has been caused by our own works or by navigation, the repair or protection is done under this vote. We get from the engineer a report on the different places where damage has occurred from these two causes.

Item agreed to.

General—

370. Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, not more than $10,000 to be expended upon any one work, $440,000.

Mr. Green: What is this item for? It seems to be another type of reserve vote from which the minister can draw for general purposes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This vote is to cover unforeseen construction and miscellaneous works that cannot be provided for from the general vote, which is the maintenance vote I mentioned a moment ago, and which have not otherwise been provided for. The amount to be expended for any one work is not to exceed $10,000. The sum of $150,000 is to be set aside for the use of the architectural branch. Every year there are a great number of small works urgently pressed for such as engines and hoists to assist fishermen, floats, small buildings and docks costing up to $10,000 which in former years were charged to the general votes, but owing to the restricted wording of that vote, "no new works to be undertaken", that cannot be done now. The amounts are too small to merit a special vote for such items. The increase of $90,000 is necessary because of the rising cost of labour and materials and the increase of the amount which may be spent on any one project from $7,000 to $10,000.

They are all limited to works under $10,000.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Will the hon. member wait until we pass my supplementary estimates and then we will have the discussion which he is going to bring up.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We now pass to the supplementary estimates for the Department of Public Works. For the convenience of hon. members the votes will be found commencing on page 12 of the supplementary estimates and the details will be found on page 38.

742. Nova Scotia, $1.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is the purpose of that one dollar?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In the main estimates we expect to have a saving of more than $200,000. We are contemplating a building for customs but we are not authorized by law to take this $200,000 from the main estimates because the Halifax customs building has not been named in those estimates. So that I may get the $200,000 out of the main estimates for Nova Scotia I have to have this $1 vote approved by parliament. It is an approval to get from the treasury board a transfer from one item in the general vote to this particular project.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is the proposed new customs building for Nova Scotia going to be built with the best sandstone in the world, Wallace sandstone?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Take my word for it, I am going to be very careful about the stone which will go into that building.

Mr. McLure: There is something here which I wish to draw to the attention of the committee. There is a certain amount for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ottawa, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, but there is not a five-cent piece for Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not going to go into it, but if you will take the population of the island and the estimate for the island you will see that your share is quite substantial.

Item agreed to.

743. New Brunswick, $1.

Mr. Brooks: I see that New Brunswick gets its usual share here, $1. I would like to ask the minister what this item is for.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is to take out of the main estimate the sum of $183,000 which will not be expended, but I am not authorized by law to do that unless parliament gives me a special authority. It comes under the Financial Administration Act, I think. I have to come here and ask for a vote of $1 in order to take money out of the general vote for the Rothesay, Saint John and Sussex public buildings.

Item agreed to.

747. Manitoba, $260,000.

Mr. Knowles: What is the status of the new post office building in Winnipeg?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Winnipeg public building—amount required $150,000. We think we can have the excavation given by contract and start the foundations of that building during the fall. We have cleared the site and now we are ready to proceed with the excavation and the foundation.

Mr. Brooks: With reference to the Rothesay post office, I would like to ask the minister if that is a new building he is putting up. It is the one we have been asking for over a number of years.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is my impression. I believe the building there is an old building.

Mr. Brooks: It is rented.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This would be a new building.

Mr. Brooks: It is the one we have been asking for.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They tell me it is a small one-storey building; and I am going to put up a nice little building in that place.

Item agreed to.

Roads and bridges—

754. Maintenance and operation—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Lennard: I notice this deals with the maintenance and operation of the Burlington channel bridge. Is that an amount to cover the removal of the wreckage and putting up something new?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is for the removal of the wreckage and the installation of a temporary bridge replacing the one that fell down. It is a temporary structure.

Mr. Lennard: It will not be similar to the other half of the bridge at all?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It will not be permanent.

Mr. Lennard: What progress, if any, has been made on plans for a new structure to cross that channel?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The acting minister of highways of Ontario, Mr. Dunbar, with his engineer, came to my office to discuss the future bridge. They are actually preparing plans which will be submitted to us and we will share the cost. Their object is traffic on the highway and ours is navigation. I would not dare say right now what final agreement will be arrived at, but the federal government and the province have agreed that they will share in the costs, if we can agree on the exact location and the exact plans and specifications for this high level bridge.

Mr. Lennard: I know from past conversations with the minister that he is all for this project, and I hope nothing will interfere with the early construction of a new bridge of the type that will remove the bottleneck that has existed at the channel for several years. Every time the old bridge was lifted it meant a tie-up of traffic for miles on either side. I know that in requesting this new type of bridge there is no extravagance at all. It will be an eventual economy, because the upkeep will be largely taken care of provincially. That will eventually relieve the federal government of what is now a burden.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I recall the conversation with the acting minister of highways for Ontario there was agreement that probably a high level bridge would meet the situation for navigation and for road traffic. On the other hand I understand it is an expensive project. We are ready to put in our share but not more than our share. We will have to come to an agreement with the province, but I think we can do it.

756. Nova Scotia, $814,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am interested in this item, which is a supplementary estimate for breakwaters and wharves in Nova Scotia. I do not say these are not warranted, but this estimate gives proof to me that there is no lack of funds available to the minister to carry out work of this kind. I am not able to put that excuse before the poor lobster fishermen and others in the various parts of my county who have petitioned for breakwater and wharf facilities to give them protection in their dangerous calling. I want to be able to justify the stand taken by the minister, if I can, and one of the main bases for the excuse he previously gave me was that he was short of funds.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): For what project was that?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Well, in Pugwash, Wallace and Malagash the lobster fishermen require breakwaters to protect their lives when they are carrying on their hazardous occupation. The reason I have been able to give them up to now is that the minister did not have sufficient funds to undertake the work. These individual fishermen signed petitions, and these were submitted to the minister. I am just pointing out that these special appropriations in the supplementary estimates prove to me that the minister has been provided with funds to carry on works of this kind, so I am not able to give these people any explanation to justify the delay in carrying out their wishes.

Item agreed to.

758. New Brunswick, $190,000.

Mr. Brooks: I notice that on page 41 of the particulars in connection with this item mention is made of the ferry accommodation at Campbellton.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the wharf for the new ferry.

Mr. Brooks: That is in place of the bridge?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A bridge would take too long to build. This wharf will not take very long, and people will cross the river on the ferry. It is an interprovincial ferry.

Mr. Brooks: Is the federal government paying any part of the cost of construction of the ferry?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would not come under my department. If the hon. member will address himself to the Minister of Transport, under whom the maritime commission comes, he will get the information.

Mr. Green: I thought you did not touch ferry wharves.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Interprovincial, but not within the province.

Item agreed to.

759. Quebec, $750,000.

Mr. McLure: I want to thank the minister for the additional amount of $12,000 for the harbour at Rustico.

Item agreed to.

761. Manitoba, $1,163,600.

Mr. Knowles: I note that item 761 includes an amount for extending a wharf in Winnipeg

North Centre. Hon. members will be surprised to find that there is a wharf in my constituency, but there is, and it is a busy one too. I note that an amount of $61,000 which is included in this item is for the extension of the Alexander avenue wharf on the Red river, Winnipeg, as has been requested by the harbour commissioners of Winnipeg and St. Boniface. I may tell the minister that we are glad to see it there. One of the things we like about the Minister of Public Works is that he says "No" three or four times, and then after a while the item appears in the estimates.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not strong-willed.

Item agreed to.

763. British Columbia and Yukon, $1,028,500.

Mr. Green: In the particulars of this item at page 42, there is the sum of $400,000 for dredging at Inverness passage. Can the minister give us some details on that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This amount is required for dredging in Inverness passage which has silted up to such an extent that vessels can reach the wharves and docks at high tide only. Numerous requests have been received from the cannery operators and other shipping interests to alleviate the condition caused by silt brought down by the Skeena river. It is proposed to dredge a channel in Inverness passage so that shipping may have access to the cannery wharves at all tides. A preliminary estimate indicates the removal of one million cubic yards of class B material. The estimated cost is $400,000.

Mr. Green: Will that be done by contract or the government's own dredge?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Contract.

Item agreed to.

767. To provide for balances required to complete any projects undertaken in previous fiscal years and for which no specific provision is made in the fiscal year 1952-53—further amount required, $165,000.

Mr. Blackmore: Before the minister's estimates are finally completed, I should like to express the appreciation which my constituents feel towards the minister for the construction of the new federal building. We have needed that for a long time. Now that we have it we are very glad, and we appreciate that we have not been neglected in our area by the minister.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do really appreciate those kind words. I believe that every time a member speaks in the house, if it is not in praise it is to give me new instructions on how the department should be run. I appreciate those kind words. I am sending over to the hon. member the details of this Coutts building for customs and immigration for his province.

This morning the hon. member for Greenwood asked me on what type of work we were spending this million dollar special vote. I have some of the cases, and a strong one which I find is in Saint John, New Brunswick. A new passenger elevator costing $46,280 was installed in the old post office building there. That is one example of the way in which we are spending wisely the money in that vote.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day.

Progress reported.

FINANCE

ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES RESPECTING CURRENCY, THE MINT AND THE EXCHANGE FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 390, respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint, and the exchange fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Blackmore: Does the minister intend to make a statement?

Mr. Abbott: No. I have nothing to add to the statement I made on second reading, which was quite comprehensive. Of course the bill has been considered with some care in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, it gives me a great deal of satisfaction to be able, for the first time, to commend the minister's financial policy. In this bill the Department of Finance quite clearly indicates that it is taking definite steps toward a realistic financial system. A realistic financial system may be described or defined as one which is capable of making, in a community, what is physically possible financially possible.

Anyone who has given any serious thought to the present financial system must have realized time and again that the present system is utterly unable to make what is physically possible financially possible. As a matter of fact, when we get enough goods to make it positively certain that we ought to get on wonderfully well and have plenty of prosperity, then we are in danger of pitching into a depression in which everybody suffers. This fact indicates quite clearly that the financial system we now operate under is utterly deficient when it comes to rendering financially possible what is physically possible.

This bill is extremely hopeful in that it indicates quite clearly that the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance definitely recognize that the thing which gives money value is not gold. For generations people have been taught in school, from the hustings, by the bankers and by every other means of instruction that it is gold behind money that gives money value. Not until 1933 was our country courageous enough to suspend the gold redemption clause and in effect announce that from that time forward the value of Canada's money did not depend upon the capacity of anyone to redeem our money in gold.

This present act aims at suspending the parts of the Bank of Canada Act which indicate that there is virtue in gold as a means of giving value to money. In doing this, by implication our finance department is acknowledging that what give money value are goods and services in a community.

That has been the case all along. Money made of pure gold, studded with diamonds, would soon lose its value in a community where there were not sufficient goods to spend the money on and in which there were not resources enough to produce more goods as fast as those goods were consumed. Thus it has been true all along that the real value of money depended upon the things in the community upon which to spend the money.

This amendment, which we are going to be considering before long, quite definitely confesses that the value of Canada's money from this time forward is going to be recognized as dependent upon goods and services. After all, money is only a medium of exchange. It is only a claim to goods. It is only a title to goods. It can be created readily by any agent with authority to create it whenever there is need for further mediums of exchange or claims to goods.

I am thankful that the minister is able to come before the House of Commons, before I leave it, with a measure which acknowledges this first great fundamental truth about money. Just as soon as we all recognize that the value of money depends on the goods and services in a community and that therefore the amount of money which a community can have and use in active circulation in the community depends upon the amount of goods and services the community has to exchange, then we are in a position to make what is physically possible in terms of goods and services and productive capacity financially possible in terms of the money counter we use whether it be dollar bills, bank credit or whatever other medium we choose to employ.

There are three more fundamental financial principles which sooner or later a minister of finance in this House of Commons will come forward and concur in or endorse. The first of these three, that is the second great principle of a realistic financial system, is this: Money is just as sound when it is created and spent into circulation as it is when it is created and lent into circulation as practically all our money now is. Unfortunately in this act—probably not by design but because of the nature of it—that important principle is not even implied. Notwithstanding the fact that we are no longer to be relying upon gold as a backing, all our money still is to be borrowed into circulation, the assumption being that the only kind of money that is really sound is money that someone borrows from a bank. While the Bank of Canada will create the money without it necessarily having gold backing, it will not spend the money. If the government wants to use the money, it will have to borrow from the Bank of Canada or from some other bank. This principle is a trammel; it is a handicap; it stands in the way of a realistic financial system. Until a government, a parliament and a people recognize that when there is need for more purchasing power by reason of the amount of goods and services in the community to be exchanged, the government under suitable circumstances can create money debt-free and spend it into circulation to the extent to which it can balance consumption with production we shall and can never have a realistic financial system, that is a financial system capable of rendering what is physically possible financially possible. I do not propose to ask the minister to tell whether or not he agrees with this second principle of government-created debt-free money to be spent, not lent, into circulation. It is one step beyond the distance he is prepared to go; but I am glad that he is acknowledging the first principle.

The third principle of a genuinely realistic financial system is this: It is possible to take the money which is created, debt-free, and use that money to establish a stable price structure both for consumption and production, thereby stabilizing an economy. If a government does not employ that concept it is impossible for it to take adequate care of its price structure within a country; and adequate care in respect of a price structure must be taken, as everybody recognizes. If for instance, just as soon as we begin to get too many hogs in the country, the price of hogs goes down, then obviously we are disrupting the economy and injuring it. We must be in a position to maintain a stable price for hogs or for any other commodity without subsidizing overmuch. That can be done. We want a stable price at the desired level, whatever that may be found to be; we must not have a considerable fluctuation in price, a rising and falling, which wrecks people who enter into production, as it is doing now in the Canadian economy, with most deplorable results not only for the present but for the future.

Having established the principle that money depends on goods and services for its value, that the amount of money therefore which you can have in a community depends upon the amount of goods and services you have in the country; having agreed that it is sound for a government under suitable circumstances to create money debt-free and spend it into circulation; and then having learned that a government can use that debt-free money to establish a stable price structure, you must recognize and accept the fourth principle of realistic finance, which is this: A government can use this debt-free money and put it in the hands of the people in such a way that they can buy the products your producers can produce, thereby providing them with a market. I do not propose to go any further into detail in respect of this matter. I do not think it would be quite in order, especially at the present time; but I rejoice that the minister has made the first great step, and I am telling him, the House of Commons and the country today that unless they take the other three steps, and do it soon, they will continue unable to make what is physically possible in this glorious country of ours actually financially possible for the people who live in the country. They will thus be constantly in danger of deflation or depression and of dangerous rises in price.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say a word or two about this. As the minister said when he introduced the bill it is mainly a tidying up and rather mechanical operation. The only matter which seems to be important is a matter of principle, which I will refer to later in the bill. I take it there will be no objection, when we come to section 25, which has to do with the question of the reserves of the Bank of Canada, to speak in a general way about it then. That is all I want to say at this point, Mr. Chairman.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Gold coins.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it that clause 4 is saying that the time may come when we do not leave our dollar, so to speak, at large, but when we give it fixed value, and we are taking the power to give it also a gold content.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): For example, suppose at the time we decide to set our dollar's value at 100 cents vis-à-vis the United States dollar. Then I take it that we would ipso facto be bound to make the gold content of our dollar the same as that of the United States dollar. I mention that merely because it makes the situation clear. Perhaps the minister might comment on that.

Mr. Abbott: That is quite correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Subsidiary coins.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say a word about subsection 3, having to do with temporary alteration of composition? That is an interesting point.

Mr. Abbott: That is an order to provide for some metals other than those which are generally used in the subsidiary coins. The committee will recall that quite recently it was found that because of war demands for nickel we were unable to continue to make our five-cent piece from that metal, but were obliged to switch to steel. We were required to do that, in fact, under the emergency legislation, because the Currency Act as it then stood prescribed nickel for our five-cent coin. In view of possible future necessities of that kind it seemed desirable to provide a little more elasticity under what are really token coins, and that is the reason for the latitude which is given in this section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Melting down gold coins.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Under this clause some anxiety was expressed lest innocent people who carry around on their watch chains gold pieces that have holes bored in them might find they were coming under the provisions of the criminal law. I think the committee felt that the danger was not very great, but I do not know whether the minister can give us any assurance on that point.

Mr. Abbott: The committee's feelings will be shared by the minister. I am sure there are a number of things which are made offences under the Criminal Code, but one of the great factors of any criminal offence is intent; and the Criminal Code, like other statutes, is enforced with common sense. I do not know of any case in which any man who has a gold piece on his watch chain has been prosecuted under the Criminal Code for defacing a coin of the realm.

Section agreed to.

Sections 11 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—All coins to be made at mint.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it on myself to congratulate the minister on the fact that it is still called the Royal Canadian Mint.

Mr. Abbott: It has never been called anything else.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Here is where I should like to say a word or two. This I think is the most important part of the bill. What it does is consolidate in the hands of the minister the reserves which have been available for the protection of the Canadian dollar. Briefly, as I understand it, we passed an Exchange Fund Act in 1935, the chief asset of which was the profit made by the Bank of Canada at the time gold was taken over from the banks at what the hon. member for York West thought was not a fair figure. But that Exchange Fund Act was not really availed of until the war came on, when the foreign exchange control board was set up. The purpose of this section really is to vest now in the hands of the minister, under the terms of this act, the funds which have been held by the foreign exchange control board which, by the terms of this act, is being terminated.

Mr. Abbott: The foreign exchange control board was an agency of the minister, my hon. friend will recall, under the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister points out, the foreign exchange control board was his agent, and so the situation is in no sense substantially changed. I do not think there is anything further I wish to say on that section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 23 and 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Bank of Canada not required to maintain certain reserves.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to make one or two observations on this section. This after all raises the question which has been raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge as to whether or not there should be any attempt to impose a check of any kind on the credit-issuing power of the financial authority.

Under the Bank of Canada Act it was provided that the bank should have a 25 per cent reserve against its notes and deposit liabilities. That was changed early in the war because it was felt at that time that it would be desirable to mobilize all our resources of gold and United States dollars in the hands of the foreign exchange control board for the purpose of protecting the position of the Canadian dollar, which at that time had been given a fixed ratio to the United States dollar of 90 cents. When we had our dollar at a fixed ratio obviously it had to be supported, and sometimes it cost money to do it.

Those of us in this house will remember that in 1947 there was quite a loss to the fund. At that time it cost the foreign exchange control board over a billion dollars of its gold and United States funds to protect our dollar. There were differences of opinion at that time as to just what course should have been followed with regard to the Canadian dollar, but there is no need to take any of the time of the committee to consider that now.

In the discussion in the banking and commerce committee yesterday this point of a fixed reserve was raised, and I should like to put this discussion briefly on the record. There is of course the view which has been expressed in this house this afternoon that money should be entirely a managed thing, that there should be no attempt to impose a check of any kind. That was discussed in the committee yesterday, and I think it would be fair to say the view of the experts was that while at the present time they felt that it was wise to leave in abeyance clause 26 of the Bank of Canada Act—in other words they did not think it was wise to reimpose the requirement of 25 per cent gold backing of the currency—nevertheless they did not go the length of saying that a reserve check of some kind was an outmoded superstition.

I was very glad to hear that, because after all there is a view very strongly held that if the regulation of the currency has no check of any kind and is left merely to the government of the day, even governments, as good as they think they are, are composed of human beings, and it may possibly be that when a difficulty comes the desire to ease the situation by inflating the currency may prevail. I am not going to pursue this at length, but I do want to have it on the record that I think the question of a reserve of some kind, a check on the purely managed currency, should not be regarded as an outworn superstition. I think it should be seriously considered. I am not going to ask the committee to spend time considering it this afternoon. I am anxious just to put it on the record.

The danger I am pointing out is that when money is left entirely to be managed, it may have the effect of our slipping into inflation. That is a real danger. On the other hand, of course it is difficult. The question of the fixed reserve is difficult. You can travesty it. You may say: are you going to set up some kind of fixed reserve requirement and then are you going to obey it? And is the fixed requirement which has been set up to have a higher power than those who set it up and who may feel at the moment that it would be well to cast it aside? That is an argument which is made against a fixed reserve. It is easy to make it. All I wish to do at the moment is say that I was glad to observe in the committee that the view, as far as I could ascertain, in the department was that for the moment in this troubled situation they felt it was wise, as they said, to mobilize all our resources of gold and United States dollars for the purpose of having it all available as a sort of reserve to prevent any violent fluctuations in the currency which at the present time, as you know, finds its own level in the open market.

While that was their present feeling there is the possibility that in more normal times, they would revert to the thinking which was prevalent at the time the Bank of Canada was set up, namely that it was wise to set up a requirement for a fixed reserve—a reserve which would be the result of the best thinking you could give to it in normal times, when you are able to study the matter out in the most well considered manner, so as to have that as a protection to the public against the time when perhaps under stress and strain and with all kinds of abnormal situations arising, the managers of the currency, if it was under no restriction of any kind, might be tempted to take actions which in their better moments they would not take. I think that is all I want to say.

Mr. Blackmore: Will my hon. friend permit a question? I agree entirely with what the hon. member says. What disturbs me is the fact that he said, or at least I thought he said or implied, that someone suggested this afternoon that there should be no restrictions upon the issue of money. I thought as a matter of fact he was referring to me. May I point out to him that I had not said that at all. I pointed out, as I think the hon. member will recall—I know he is anxious to be completely fair—that debt-free money could be created and spent into circulation only sufficient to balance consumption with production. In other words the limiting factor would be the need of money to consume the products that were produced in the economy. If the hon. member interpreted what I said as meaning that there should be no limiting factor on the issue of money he has misunderstood, and I failed to make myself clear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I must confess that I have not argued this, because I have always thought the hon. gentleman's limiting factor was purely what I call management; and management according to some views which I would not share. But if in fact I have been wrong and if the hon. member does believe there should be these checks, well then I am very glad.

Mr. Blackmore: May I make another comment? I appreciate that very much. This is just the kind of thing we need in order to see eye to eye. It is absolutely true that the amount of money in circulation must not at any time be in excess of the goods which are to be bought; otherwise you will have a condition which my hon. friend described just a year ago as inflation, "too many dollars chasing too few goods." The ideal is to have the right amount of dollars chasing the right amount of goods. Social Crediters maintain that the only way in which a government can do that is by means of the technique of debt-free money. Does that answer my hon. friend?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not know whether I have been living all these years as a Social Crediter without knowing it, but perhaps I had better now reiterate quite definitely that I am certain that it should be part of our economic thinking that it is desirable there should be an automatic check on the amount of credit available. If I did not make that clear I am trying to make it clear now. The other point I want to make is—

Mr. Blackmore: Before the hon. member goes on may I ask one more question? That is an excellent reply. I agree with it completely; so do all Social Crediters. Would the hon. member also believe that there ought to be an automatic check which would prevent banks and other lending institutions from taking money out of the economy when it is seriously needed? To illustrate my point may I give this example. On November 13, 1933, Hon. C. H. Cahan told an audience in Toronto that from the time of the beginning of the depression down to the time he was speaking, $932 million had been taken out of the Canadian economy, which of course accentuated the depression. A similar thing happened in the United States. The hon. member will learn that if he reads Professor Irving Fisher's book, "100 percent Money."

Can the hon. member tell me how such withdrawal of money could be prevented in case another depression came along? How it could be done under the present financial system?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All I can say in answer to that is that although I have great respect for the late Mr. Cahan, who was a very great lawyer, and certainly I think was an example of the species that hardly exists any longer, an old-fashioned Tory, I am not sure that I ever had any reason to think he was a great financial authority, and I am not able to give any meaning whatever to the disappearance of the $932 million. I am sorry I cannot help in that, and it would be very foolish of me to pretend that I could. I just beg leave to doubt that figure.

The other point I want to make is this. I do not know whether I should commend this or protest it. I will mention it. Section 25 gives statutory imprimatur, so to speak, to what has been the fact for ten years now; that the Bank of Canada has not been required to maintain a 25 per cent gold reserve. The section says:

> Notwithstanding section 26 of the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada is not, unless the governor in council otherwise prescribes, required to maintain a minimum or fixed reserve ratio of gold or foreign exchange to its liabilities.

There again we have legislation with the reservation that the governor in council can change it. I do not think it is wise; nevertheless, I am not going to press the matter now. I hope that this legislation will not be put away on the shelf and left too long, because my own hope is—I refer now to the meeting of the committee yesterday—that what was felt to be the sanction for this type of legislation was that we are living in disturbed times. No one thinks that we are likely to get out of those very quickly, but nevertheless I was not thoroughly convinced by that argument, and I hope that this legislation may in one form or another, on that point at any rate, or in one way or another, come before this house before too long.

Mr. Blackmore: May I say a further word in connection with this matter? One of the disconcerting facts about our whole financial set-up in Canada, a fact which is not provided against in this legislation, is that if a depression begins to come on us we have no device whatsoever whereby we can arrest the rapid withdrawal of loans by the banks and the consequent withdrawal from circulation of a large percentage of the money which the nation simply has to have to carry on its business. That is the kind of thing that occurred during the great depression in Canada and the United States. The United States could not see how in the world to get back into circulation the $8 billion—one-third of their purchasing medium—which went out of circulation just as a result of the withdrawal of loans by banks and the neglect to advance further loans.

So far as the minister's financial set-up at the present time is concerned, I think he will agree with me, being a man of much experience in this respect, that if a depression began to come on us in Canada he would be at his wits' end to know how to stop the banks withdrawing loans and thereby aggravating the very condition which was beginning to come upon us. On occasions like that, Social Crediters maintain that the government can stop that withdrawing of loans if it wisely uses the technique of debt-free money created by the state and spent into circulation where necessary. This criticism of course applies right through this bill but, in my judgment, is particularly appropriate right at this very point.

I wish to make one further suggestion to the minister. I should like to refer him, as an illustration of the soundness of the policy that Social Crediters advocate and that I am advocating here, to the Finance Act of 1914, at the commencement of world war I, and the Finance Act of 1923 which was a sort of consolidation of the Finance Act of 1914 in the light of the experience our fathers had during the first great war. The Finance Act of 1914 gave the Minister of Finance authority to create dollar bills, two dollar bills, and spend them into circulation if he saw fit. That is to be found very definitely in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency published in 1933. All members can read about the whole matter and its effect on our financial life in paragraph 47 on page 22 of that report.

I should also like to recall to the minister the important fact that under the Finance Act of 1914 the treasury of Canada issued $50 million, bought $50 million worth of wheat in Canada and lent the wheat to Great Britain. There was no financial cost whatsoever. That transaction is also recorded in paragraph 47 on page 22 of the document to which I have referred. If the minister were clothed with that power today, which, by the way, was technically taken away when the Bank of Canada was established and the Finance Act of 1923 was repealed, he would be able to do remarkable things of value in respect of the Canadian economy which at the present time he would not be free to do. The technique of debt-free money worked admirably on that occasion and it would work admirably today.

I suggest to the minister in all seriousness that he should have his department take steps to re-enact the Finance Act of 1923 with suitable changes or modifications that would naturally result from the experience we have had in finance since 1923. If he would do that this year he would prepare himself for dealing with several serious financial problems which are likely to present themselves to us. As an illustration, when the Minister of Agriculture was faced with the problem of supporting the prices of beef, mutton and pork in Canada just before and just after the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, if the Minister of Finance had been armed with the Finance Act of 1923 he could have created debt-free money and purchased enough beef, pork and mutton from a sufficient number of packing plants to enable them to buy the surpluses going on the market in respect of these meats, and could have maintained the price level of meat in Canada without a ripple. He could have given that meat to Great Britain or lent it to her for ten or twenty years. He would have got it out of the Canadian economy and saved this nation hundreds of millions of dollars and a good many nights of headache for himself.

That is just how simple this thing is. It is exactly the same device that was used in world war I. If it could be used in world war I, when so many of the producers were fighting overseas and there was a natural tendency to scarcity of production, how much more successfully could it be used in 1952 when all over our economy we have a surplus of supply which is threatening a descent into a depression. I suggest that the Minister of Finance take under advisement immediately the feasibility of causing a revised version of the Finance Act of 1923 to be passed by the house. It would not displace the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada would go on financing consumption through loans as it now does. This other mechanism would enable the minister to create debt-free money and spend it into circulation financing consumption as the supply position in the nation justified such creation and expenditure.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $344,433.

Mr. Blackmore: Before we leave item 1 I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture something about the progress of the South Saskatchewan dam. It seems to me this matter is being held up altogether too long.

I would like, as preparation for the questions I wish to ask about the dam, to recall to the minister something I am sure he knows—the general set-up in which this dam should be placed.

I am not sure that all members of the house today understand as they should, and as they would if they came from the west, the situation in which Saskatchewan and Alberta find themselves. In order to appreciate the situation and the urgent need for this dam it is important to know that in the three prairie provinces there is a wide area which normally has far too little rain. The result is that sometimes we have good crops and that most times we do not have good crops. Most times the climate is too dry to produce good crops. This great area, as the minister will recall, is named the Palliser triangle. For the sake of those in the house who have not had an opportunity to hear about the Palliser triangle may I tell them just how they can find how big an area it is on the map.

The Palliser triangle in Alberta starts roughly at Banff according to some authorities and runs to a point some 30 or 40 miles north of Calgary. Then it runs northeast in a jagged line to the North Saskatchewan river where it crosses the Saskatchewan-Alberta boundary. Then it runs northeast to the junction of the North and South Saskatchewan rivers, then south to about Humboldt, then east in a jagged line to the Manitoba border near Swan River, Manitoba. It runs south on the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border to near Roblin, Manitoba, then east to lake Manitoba; then from the southern tip of lake Manitoba east to Beausejour, Manitoba, and then south to the United States boundary.

May I say to the members of the house, for the minister's sake, that all those who wish to understand the problem that is Canada's in the west must familiarize themselves with the facts about that vast uncertain area. Those who would be fair to the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba when estimating their financial capacity must be aware of the effect that vast area has had on their public lives in every aspect, and consequently upon their financial condition.

As I have been able to gather, this great Palliser triangle was recognized to be a dangerous area for settlement long, long ago. Captain Palliser between 1857 and 1860 took a trip across this area and reported that it was not suitable for settlement, except for ranches. Hind in 1860 submitted a similar report. Professor John Macoun in 1879 similarly reported, as did Commissioner French of the R.C.M.P. in 1874. A. P. Patrick in 1879, Montague Aldous in 1881 and William Ogilvie in 1881 submitted similar reports.

I have mentioned only a few of many men. The reason I do so is to enable the members of the house to comprehend how serious a blunder the federal government committed in the years from 1900 to 1911 when they permitted wholesale settlement of that area by people who came in all through the south because certain areas in certain years made the country look prosperous and very promising.

Just in a word or two further to indicate how well men should have known how dangerous it was to let a large population go into that area may I give you some figures covering rainfall. In Medicine Hat between 1883 and 1901 the average rainfall was 8·061 inches. It is recognized everywhere that it is just next to impossible to grow crops with less than 12 inches of rainfall a year. The average rainfall in Calgary between 1885 and 1901 was 8·271 inches and for Macleod between 1896 and 1901 it was 7·735 inches.

In connection with this South Saskatchewan dam we need to go back to the year 1934. Although the federal government had permitted a great many people to come in and settle all through that Palliser triangle they did not recognize that thereby they were creating an almost impossible problem for the people who were going to administer those areas in a local way in times to come. The federal government failed to realize the tremendous responsibility it unquestionably incurred in permitting that settlement. They did not do a thing to help rehabilitate that country, to reimburse the provinces for the damage done them, until 1934 when Right Hon. R. B. Bennett's government passed the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. The present minister, in my judgment, will go down in Canadian history as a man of understanding vision and great courage because he has taken the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and expanded its activities in every way.

As I understand it, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, the proposed South Saskatchewan dam is one part of a general program which the minister has designed as a means of combating this problem which has arisen in the Palliser triangle and of making up in some small measure for the losses inflicted upon Alberta and Saskatchewan through unwise federal policies of the past.

I would be glad if the minister would take enough time to lay out before the house and the country the general picture; and would he set the South Saskatchewan dam into that picture?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a reference to the South Saskatchewan dam?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not interrupt the hon. member because I rather expected he wanted to make the remarks he has made and that probably he would have made them at some time; and perhaps it gives me a little time to think about the answer I can give. The proper place, of course, to discuss the matter is under item 45, major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces.

Mr. Blackmore: If the minister cares to have the discussion then I will be perfectly happy.

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is better to do that, because after all we have been accustomed to having a sort of general discussion on the first item in the estimates. To start a particular discussion on a particular subject, such as is suggested here, would perhaps depart from that idea.

I should like, therefore, to make some general remarks concerning the discussion of the agriculture estimates. In the first place, I may say it is a rather new experience to have the agriculture estimates coming in on the last day or two of the session. In the twenty sessions I have been here it has been customary to introduce the agriculture estimates at the first or almost the first of the session, I suppose because the word "agriculture" begins with the first letter of the alphabet. The discussion on these estimates usually takes place during the session and is completed on the last day or two of the session. But on this occasion we are introducing the estimates for the first time today.

I think that is largely due to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that on the first day of this session we found it necessary to introduce a special bill which made it possible for us to discuss almost everything that had to do with the handling of farm products. We were talking about the marketing of livestock products of all kinds. From that time until now we have been discussing, either in the house or in committee, those matters which we usually discuss at the beginning of the session. I hope it will not be necessary, therefore, to give as full consideration to some matters at this time as it might otherwise have been.

I wish to point out at this stage that the total estimates for this year, as indicated in the main estimates, amount to $60,168,475, which is just $7,373,438 less than the total estimates for last year. We are now in a position to do what we have not usually been in a position to do when we introduce the agriculture estimates, in that we have the supplementaries before us. Those supplementaries amount to $14,379,042. When that amount is added to the main estimates, the total amount is considerably more than the estimates for last year. In going through the estimates from end to end, I think it will be found that a considerable part of that increase is due to the increases in salaries which have been made. Some of the increase is associated with the fact that we have undertaken to pay the freight on feed grain again this year, and the amount in the estimates this year for that purpose is more than a million dollars higher than it was last year.

There are other items which we will come to as we go through the estimates which will account for any increases which have been made, but generally speaking it was our intention this year to hold the estimates at about the same level as a year ago. The difficulties which have arisen as a result of certain diseases afflicting our livestock have made it necessary for us to change the items somewhat to provide more money in certain directions. Nevertheless the general objective was to have the estimates this year about the same as a year ago.

Some of the discussion which has taken place up to the present time in connection with agriculture has led me to give some thought, in the early stages of the discussion of these estimates, to the surpluses we have had in Canada during the past year. Those surpluses are pretty well limited to our exports. I have before me a table of the value of agricultural exports. It does not exactly indicate the volume of the different commodities, whether they have increased or decreased, but generally speaking the fact that there have been increases does indicate that there has been an increase in the quantity as well as an increase in the price.

In order to place the picture before the house with regard to surpluses, I should like to point out that the total exports of farm products in 1951 amounted to $1,018,644,000. Out of that total, $950 million is accounted for through the export of grains and fodder and the export of animals and animal products. The first accounts for $735 million, that is grain and fodder, which only leaves $215 million to be accounted for by all the livestock and livestock products exported. This only leaves $68 million to cover all other exports. It is correct to say, therefore, that in so far as exports are concerned they are related largely to our cereals, our grains and our livestock products. I suppose I could even go further and say that by far the greater part of the production on our farms is related to the same commodities.

I wanted to say that in the beginning in order to emphasize this fact, that the federal department has not had any troublesome surpluses during 1951 or 1952 down to the present. The main trouble we had with our wheat had to do in the first place with the wheat that we were carrying over from 1950, which was largely a frozen commodity and therefore had to be sold as feed whereas we are accustomed to selling it as human food. Last year our main difficulty was the season during which we had to harvest our grain crops in the western part of Canada. It was a wet season, and we found it most difficult to have our commodity harvested and stored in the usual manner and at the usual time but we did not experience any real difficulty in finding a place to market it, that is other than the difficulty that arose through the fact that it was frozen and was feed instead of being a commodity which human beings could consume. My information is that in due course we will succeed in having all that commodity marketed. I think we are having exactly the same experience we had in 1928 when we had a frozen crop. It is taking us about two years to market the crop as feed, whereas we would have counted on marketing it in one year as a commodity to be consumed by human beings.

Apart from that difficulty, we have not had any serious difficulty in finding markets. So far as the other farm products are concerned, the big one is cattle. We had a very ready market throughout all 1951 for our cattle. Fortunately we were marketing them at the highest price at which we have ever marketed cattle. That market was to be found in the United States. We marketed some 404,000 head of cattle either as live animals or as processed meat in some form or other. Therefore no difficulty was experienced in connection with the marketing of our cattle. Again, no difficulty was experienced in connection with the marketing of our hogs. A moment ago I stated that we marketed our cattle and beef at a comparatively high price, as compared with other years, in the United States. However, we marketed practically all our hogs in Canada. Throughout the whole of 1951 we marketed our hogs in Canada at a higher price than that which United States farmers were obtaining for hogs in that country. Throughout the whole of 1951 we marketed our hogs at a price which was at least 2 or 3 cents higher than the United States price. That would also be a statement of fact with regard to the early weeks of 1952.

We are now passing through a period in which the United States price is about the same as our own, and I think would take care of the cost of getting our pork commodity down to the United States. In other words, if we were able to sell the hogs in the United States at all, we could do just about as well in the United States as we are doing in Canada. The point I wish to make is that we have not been in the position in which we have had to make any complaint about the fact that we were not able to market our staple commodities other than wheat in Great Britain.

During last year and during the early part of this season we have heard comments to the effect that we were suffering because of the fact that we have not a market in the United Kingdom at present, or did not have such a market throughout 1951. I just wish to repeat that, with regard to cattle and hogs, we had a market for all those we produced throughout the year, and that we had a market at the highest price we have ever experienced for our livestock in any year in our history. The fact of the matter is that we were not experiencing any difficulty until the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic came upon us. For some little time after that occurrence we experienced some difficulties. Those difficulties were altogether associated with the fact that an embargo had been placed on livestock which prevented them from going across the United States boundary line. Our livestock and livestock products were therefore not permitted to cross the boundary. For a time we also had great difficulty in finding storage for the meat that was created by the number of animals which were coming on to the market.

We had about 33 per cent more hogs in 1952 than in the same period in 1951. Even if we had not had the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic, it is obvious that we would have had to seek markets other than those we had a year ago for hogs. The Canadian market would not have taken all of the hogs that came to market during the first three months of 1952.

The market we had counted upon was in the United States. We figured that we would be able to market about 50 million pounds of our pork products in that country. This quantity would not have gone to the United States in the form of live hogs because of the higher prices in Canada; at least not much of it would have done so, if any. It would probably have gone in the form of cuts of pork. In the early part of the year the price for live hogs in Canada was higher than it was in the United States; but there were certain cuts of pork which could be sold in the United States at a higher level than that at which they could be sold in Canada. The reason for that is obvious. Their market is much greater than ours, and there is the possibility of selling foods of certain qualities at prices which are higher than those for which the same qualities of foods can be sold here. Whereas the whole hog would not bring as much money in the United States, there were parts of it which would bring more. We had a possible market in the United States for some 50 million pounds of those pork cuts. That market was, of course, shut off when the foot-and-mouth epidemic came upon us. That amount was all thrown back into our own market.

We have experienced more difficulty with that part of our surplus meat than with any other; and the dealing with it has been rather costly in the sense that we have had to put it in cans at costs which brought the price of the product to a figure which we cannot obtain in any part of the world that we know of. While we can sell some of it in the United States, we cannot sell it at a price representing the cost to us.

Time after time the statement has been made that this pork which has gone into cans has cost us about 64 cents a pound. I think the exact cost was 63·8 cents; and recently that figure has been reduced to 61·8 cents, which is about 2 cents lower. The costs are still going down slightly. But there is no place we know of where we can sell the commodity at that price. I am quite sure none of it can be sold in Canada at that price. I am also quite sure it cannot be sold at a price even approaching that figure in the United States. Nevertheless we have made up our minds that the commodity must be sold, and that the government will take some loss in connection with its sale. It is our intention and our hope to be able to put that commodity on the market either here or in the United States at a fairly early date; and we will be putting forth an effort to put as much of it on that market as possible.

As to beef, in the beginning our difficulty was in getting rid of it at all. We had something in the neighbourhood of 400,000 head of cattle which might have come on the market in the twelve months of this year, to be sold somewhere outside Canada. Some of it had gone before the foot-and-mouth disease came upon us, but there would be at least 250,000 head of beef cattle to be sold outside Canada during the remainder of this year after the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. We at once put forth an effort to find a place to put that meat. As has already been announced to the house, we finally found a market for it in Great Britain, through arrangements which we made with New Zealand and the United States. That meat is now going forward to that market. My information is that up to the present we have taken delivery of about 30 million pounds to be delivered under that arrangement, and that about half of it or a little better has already gone forward. The remainder is in position to be shipped from day to day to the British market.

This has resulted in the market pretty well adjusting itself to I think as favourable a position as any of us had any right to hope for, say a month or two months ago. During the last few days the market has been from a cent to two cents lower than it was when the foot-and-mouth epidemic came upon us. I repeat that that is a more fortunate position from the point of view of the producer than most of us anticipated at the time that situation developed.

The meat is moving out and the amount left on the market is not giving any serious trouble. I want to express the appreciation of those who have been attempting to meet a rather difficult situation to those who have been holding their cattle off the market. During the early stages at least 25 per cent of the cattle which usually come on the market were held off. That made it easier for those who were handling the problem while negotiating the contract which was eventually entered into with the British through contacts made with New Zealand and the United States.

We were asked at the beginning of the experience to place a floor price under cattle, and we did place a floor price of 25 cents under good steers basis Montreal and Toronto. It was suggested at the time that we should have set a price of 28½ cents for choice steers, but we chose to set a floor price of 25 cents for good steers. I think I am correct in saying that a check of the market today will indicate that the price for choice steers is almost if not quite at the level that was asked for a month or a month and a half ago as a floor price.

I submit that it is better for everyone concerned that the difference between 25 cents for good steers and 28 or 29 cents which has been offered on the market in the last few years for choice steers should have resulted from activities on the market rather than from the government having said, "Well, that is the price that is going to be assured; that is the price everyone is going to obtain." In any case we considered it better to have the price set, as we have set all floor prices that have been arranged, as a saviour against loss rather than as an incentive price which might bring about greater production of the commodity. So in setting it at 25 cents we put it on a basis for the time being which we considered would safeguard those who required to market their animals and make it possible at the same time to bring about a better price level if the marketing conditions warranted. I am pleased to note that the marketing conditions have warranted it, and the situation is going along much better than we anticipated it would at the time.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more at this time. As we go through the estimates and consider the different items I shall attempt to answer any questions which may be asked and give fuller information, both with regard to the matters I have been discussing and any others that may be brought up. In the meantime I ask the committee to consider these different items.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister when he says it is rather unusual to have the estimates of the Department of Agriculture presented at this time in the session. Ever since I have been here these estimates have been the first introduced in the committee, or nearly the first. It does seem strange to have them introduced in what we hope are the dying days of this session.

The minister pointed out that the total vote this year for his department was $60,156,475 as compared with $67,541,913 in 1951, but he pointed out also that there were supplementary estimates of some $14 million, which would bring up the total.

The minister dealt at considerable length with surpluses and gave figures as to what had been exported from this country in the way of agricultural products. Then he referred to the sale of meat in this country as the result of the foot-and-mouth disease. I notice in this afternoon's press a report of a speech made by the minister to the agricultural institute at their annual meeting, where he stated that the western cattle plague had cost Canada $20 million so far. I do not know just how the minister arrives at that figure. There was a press release some weeks ago by the dominion bureau of statistics which stated that the cattle producers of Canada had lost $39 million in the three months following the United States embargo. There seems to be quite a difference in the two figures.

I presume it would be in order to make some reference to the report of the standing committee on agriculture which dealt with the foot-and-mouth disease, because reference was made to it by the Minister of Agriculture. The report has been tabled in the house, although it does not appear in print. We held many meetings and I think it would be in order for me to refer to the report adopted by that committee. The third report reads as follows:

On April 29 your committee was instructed to inquire into and report on the subject of the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in the province of Saskatchewan and its attendant ramifications. Since that date, your committee has held 17 meetings and has heard the testimony of the deputy minister of agriculture, the veterinary director general and other senior officers of the department, stationed both in Ottawa and in Regina, regarding the circumstances surrounding the outbreak and spread of the disease and the measures now being employed to bring it under control.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not sure that it is in order to discuss the activities of the committee, and I should like to have a ruling from the chair on that.

The Chairman: Has the report been tabled in the house?

Mr. Ross (Souris): It was tabled.

The Chairman: If the report has been tabled and it deals with agricultural matters, I think it would be in order to discuss it. I understood the minister made passing reference to it.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not make reference to the report, I made reference to the fact that we had foot-and-mouth disease in Canada. I did not discuss the report at all.

The Chairman: If the report has been tabled it would be in order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The report has been tabled and it deals with the administration of the Department of Agriculture. It continues:

Having considered the correspondence and records submitted together with the evidence adduced, your committee is of the opinion that the officials of the health of animals division, Department of Agriculture, followed the well defined plans laid down through long experience gained working in co-operation with their counterparts in the United States bureau of animal industry to diagnose and combat stomatitis and foot-and-mouth disease. As a result of this action, foot-and-mouth disease in Canada is definitely under control and appears to have been eradicated.

Your committee recognizes that it was and is most important that practices in Canada be similar to those in the United States so that Canadian livestock and other agricultural products may be permitted to re-enter the United States market at the earliest possible date, and commends the officials of the livestock branch, Department of Agriculture, for having adhered to those practices both with regard to diagnosing and combating the disease.

Your committee recommends continued and extensive research into all methods of diagnosis and control of animal contagious diseases in Canada.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence in relation thereto is appended.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

During the discussion an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Brant as follows:

Your committee is of the opinion that the evidence available to it discloses that there has been laxity and gross negligence with respect to the carrying out of the responsibilities of the office of the veterinary director general of Canada.

That the failure of the Minister of Agriculture to assure competent performance of duty by those responsible to him has cost the Canadian farmer a serious loss in export and domestic markets.

Your committee regrets the fact that the taking of evidence was restricted to federal government employees only and feels that the scope of the inquiry should have included independent witnesses from the area of foot-and-mouth infection.

Your committee strongly recommends the urgent need in the Department of Agriculture for greater co-operation between, and utilization of, facilities at its disposal for the diagnosis of animal diseases, and as evidence of the benefits to be derived by such co-operation would cite the excellent work accomplished since February 16, 1952, to eradicate this serious threat to the Canadian livestock industry.

I would point out that there was very little difference among members of the committee as to the manner in which this problem had been handled by the officials of the health of animals branch after February 18, but there was considerable difference of opinion as to how it had been handled from the first outbreak at the end of November and early December. Then many members of the committee were dissatisfied over the fact that we were not allowed to call independent witnesses who had first dealt with this outbreak, more particularly private veterinarians and certain R.C.M.P. officials.

Dr. Christie was before the committee on the last day, and although he had been in town several days we were allowed to question him for only two hours. The result was that many members did not have any opportunity to question Dr. Christie. It had also been agreed that certain other witnesses would be recalled, but that was not done. In my opinion there was considerable confusion as a result of the evidence we heard. A difference of opinion was expressed by certain veterinarians of the department, and in my opinion the investigation carried on by this committee was most unsatisfactory.

It was not a thorough investigation. As I say, several of the members desired to ask further questions of Dr. Christie but were not allowed to do so. It was my desire and the desire of other members that other witnesses should be recalled for further examination. Much of the evidence up to our last meeting could not be proved or disproved. There was a difference of opinion about there being gross negligence on the part of the Department of Agriculture and the department of immigration.

It is only speculation, but it is thought that this disease was brought in from infected areas in Europe by an immigrant coming to this country. True enough this immigrant was brought to Hull once the disease was diagnosed and his clothing was tested, but that investigation did not prove or disprove anything at that date. This chap had been working on a farm in Germany where the entire herd was infected with foot-and-mouth disease. He then came to the Waas farm near Regina where the outbreak first occurred. There is a certain amount of circumstantial evidence as to where the disease came from. But as I say the investigation by the committee was such that many facts could not be proved or disproved.

No regulations were enforced to check immigrants from Mexico or other countries where this disease is so prevalent. I learned from questioning one of the veterinaries that since that date regulations have been put into force whereby immigrants coming to this country are now thoroughly checked, disinfected and so on to prevent the carriage of this dreaded virus into this country.

Much evidence was given as to what happened during December, January and past the middle of February. In my opinion there was carelessness on the part of the field supervisor in not issuing instructions and having them carried out during the months of December, January and the early part of February when new outbreaks of this dreaded disease occurred. Probably there is not much use crying over spilt milk, and no doubt it is only speculation to attempt to estimate what that carelessness during those three months has cost the cattle producers of this country.

True enough it is said that probably we were better off by the embargo not being imposed earlier, but in my opinion the quicker this situation is cleared up the earlier the embargo will be lifted. Not even the minister can tell us when this embargo will be lifted. Under United States regulations a period of 60 days must elapse after the infestation is cleared up. Following our experience with the United States in past years, I believe there will be some trouble in having this embargo lifted before the 60 day period has elapsed.

It is certainly most important to the people of this country. Not only does it affect the western livestock producer; the cattle producers of the maritimes and eastern Canada have lost a wonderful market for their dairy cattle.

Probably there should have been a motion to debate this report, but I repeat that a discussion of the report is in order under this administration item. There are many people in this country who are desirous of getting information on this foot-and-mouth disease and as to how the virus might have got into the country. That is why I have made these remarks at this time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Before the dinner recess I had been dealing with the report tabled in the house with respect to the investigation of foot-and-mouth disease in Saskatchewan. While I have read the report tabled and have also read the proposed amendment, to make the situation clear I think I should state that the amendment was defeated in the standing committee on agriculture by a vote of 21 to 12, if my memory is correct as to the figures. The report tabled did not mention the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth at all. In my opinion the report simply whitewashed the whole inquiry into the foot-and-mouth disease.

I should like the minister to clarify certain details with regard to the floor prices on beef and pork of which he spoke. In particular he referred to pork costing approximately 64 cents a pound in the can. The top price paid at Toronto this morning for grade A hogs was 26 cents, and I think the floor price is somewhere in that neighbourhood. I understood it was announced that the floor price would apply to A and B hogs. We had some discussion with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in which he assured us the floor price applied on all hogs, dressed sows, heavy hogs and all those grades. If that is right I should like the minister to tell us what those prices are.

With respect to the floor prices on cattle, I realize that they apply to choice steers and all cows including fat cows and heifers, but I should also like to know whether that policy is carried through with regard to other grades of cattle. Is there a floor price on veal calves and lighter cattle? I think it would be beneficial to the producers at large if the minister would put on record the entire scale of floor prices as they apply to both hogs and live cattle at the present time, and explain how it is handled.

Mr. Gardiner: I might answer those points. The floor price has been on A and B hogs until this week. I am not certain whether or not it is applicable on the others yet, but instructions have been issued to have similar control exercised with respect to other hogs.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Would the minister say what grades are required for the canning of pork? Does that include hogs of any grade or only the top grades; because the quoted price today for dressed sows at Toronto was 16 cents while the price for A hogs was 26 cents.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not expected sow meat will be put in cans.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Or heavy hogs?

Mr. Gardiner: Or heavy hogs, either; that is, not what is usually graded a heavy hog, that brings a lower price. There will be some hogs that are heavier than the usual A's such as were delivered during the period when we were encouraging the production of heavier hogs.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Is there any guarantee on other grades of cattle such as choice steers, fat cows and fat heifers?

Mr. Gardiner: The floor price of 25 cents is on good steers but there are comparable prices set for the different grades of beef that we buy which are related to the price of the cattle.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Does that apply to veal calves?

Mr. Gardiner: Not to veal calves, but to other cattle.

Mr. Ross (Souris): They must be of a certain weight.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Wright: The minister gave us what I thought was a rather optimistic report of marketing conditions in Canada during 1951. He indicated we had been able to market all our major products at what he considered to be satisfactory prices, and that we only got into difficulties this year because of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. I cannot agree with the minister, and I know there are many producers in the area I represent who found they were in considerable difficulty last year when the price of hogs dropped by approximately 30 to 33⅓ per cent between July and September, leaving many producers in a rather serious position.

I have in my hands the Statistical Review of April, 1952. It indicates that between the months of January and July of 1951 the price of animal products in Canada dropped by 61·6 points. That was before the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, and that drop created a serious position so far as the producers of animal products were concerned. Pork was the major product that dropped during that period, but other products also dropped. If the costs of the farmer had fallen in anything like the same manner it would not be so bad, but on page 22 of the Statistical Review there is a reference to living costs in Canada and it indicates that the index of farm living costs, which stood at 99·5 in 1939, had risen to 198·6 by January of 1951 and in January of 1952 stood at 215·8, an increase of 18·7 points.

Mr. Ross (Souris): An all-time high.

Mr. Wright: That is an all-time high as far as farm costs are concerned. In my opinion many farm costs are entirely too high, and I think the government has to assume some responsibility for that situation. In 1947, for instance, when the government was disposing of certain war assets, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made representations to the government that they should retain one of the fertilizer plants built by the government during the war. We had some assurance from the then minister of reconstruction that one of those plants would be retained. However, they were both sold. At that time the figure we were given in the house as to the cost of production of fertilizer in the Calgary plant was $19 a ton. Today that same fertilizer is selling in western Canada at $106 a ton. I think that is entirely beyond reason, and if the minister wants to do a service to agriculture he should confer with the Minister of Justice and have the combines investigation people make some inquiry into why the farmers of this country have to pay the price they are paying for fertilizer today. I think it is entirely too high. I do not believe there is any reason for it being sold at that price, and I think it is essential that we have cheaper fertilizers in Canada, cheaper than we have had them up to the present time.

The minister has indicated that while we have large grain production our production of dairy products and of livestock in some cases has dropped seriously. I am sure that is not good as far as the agricultural industry in this country is concerned. If we are to have prosperous agriculture there has to be some greater production of the products which return something to the soil. One has only to look in eastern Canada at Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes, and see the number of abandoned farms, that fifty years ago supported families, raised families and educated families. Today they are abandoned and the same thing is occurring on a lesser scale in western Canada.

There again we find the policies followed by the government leading to the restriction of the products which would eventually build up soil fertility and make for a more prosperous agriculture. I do not think it is good and I believe it is largely the result of the policy followed by the Minister of Agriculture over the last few years in failing to place reasonable floor prices under agricultural products. Not only has he failed to place these floor prices under agricultural products, decent prices from year to year; he has also failed to lay out any long term agricultural program as far as Canada is concerned. He has indicated that our market has been satisfactory. Well, I am saying to him that our market is not satisfactory at the present time.

If we are to have our maximum production of dairy products, of pork, of apples and of cheese, we must have a market for those products other than just our own Canadian market. The only other market I know of is the market in Great Britain. We have had no indication from the minister as to the permanent steps he or the government propose to take to get this market back and to keep it for us. We had a market there during the war. It was not expected by any of us that we could retain the complete market in Great Britain, but I do not think there was a farmer or anyone else in agriculture in this country who felt in 1945 that in two or three years we would have completely lost our market in Great Britain for dairy products, cheese, and apples. I would suggest to the minister that he give some indication to the house and the country of the permanent policy the government is going to follow to win back that market.

I had not intended to say anything regarding the matter of foot-and-mouth disease, but it has been raised and I think I should put on the record something I said at the last meeting of the standing committee, because no record was kept of that meeting. It has to do with the reputation of one of the veterinarians in western Canada who I suggested should be called before that committee. I feel that the Minister of Agriculture in his evidence or in questions and answers before the committee certainly did no good to the reputation of that particular veterinarian. I believe that man should have been given an opportunity to appear before the committee to answer some of the insinuations, if not charges, that were made against him. Dr. Hewitt has been a member of the veterinarian association in the province of Saskatchewan for a great many years. For ten years, since 1940, he has acted on the executive of that association. For two years he was secretary and for two years he was president; and certainly a man does not attain that position while his reputation is such that he should not be called as a witness before any inquiry we may have here. If the minister will—

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Wright: If the minister will wait he can answer all the questions he likes.

The Chairman: The Minister of Agriculture is raising a question of privilege.

Mr. Gardiner: At no time during the sittings of the committee did I say anything that was at all detrimental to Dr. Hewitt. Appearing in the Regina Leader-Post which came to hand this evening there is a full statement of what I did say. I think Dr. Hewitt fully understands what I said. Any misrepresentations which were put in the press by my hon. friend and some others is not getting anywhere in relation to Dr. Hewitt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, I would ask for the withdrawal of the statement regarding misrepresentations—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Wright: I want the minister to prove that I put any misrepresentations in the press.

Mr. Gardiner: You are just proceeding to do so now.

Mr. Wright: I placed no comment in the press whatsoever except a letter written by Dr. Hewitt to myself and, Mr. Chairman, I ask for the withdrawal—

Mr. Gardiner: I am not withdrawing. My hon. friend is just proceeding now to give the press some more of it.

Mr. Wright: Just a moment.

The Chairman: Order. I have listened to the remarks by the hon. member for Melfort and to the question of privilege as stated by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. I do not think the Minister of Agriculture should say that the member for Melfort has communicated to the press certain misrepresentations which were published about whatever transpired in the committee on agriculture and colonization. Even if in the opinion of the minister the member for Melfort is proceeding to do that, I do not think the member for Melfort should be accused of something which he has now on his honour declared that he has not done. I would ask the minister to reconsider his stand on the matter.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, of course I will stand by your ruling whatever it is and if you rule that I should withdraw anything I have said, I withdraw it; but I would like to know what it is you are asking me to withdraw. I have stated that the hon. member for Melfort is responsible for some of the reports going into the press in western Canada which might give the impression to Dr. Hewitt that I had taken a certain attitude with regard to him in the committee. All I am stating is that at no time I took any attitude against Dr. Hewitt in the committee, and the records of the committee will demonstrate that.

Mr. Wright: I am quite prepared to stand by the committee proceedings. I think any unprejudiced person reading those reports will come to the same conclusion that I came to. Now that the minister has raised the matter I want to say, with regard to the proceedings in the committee, that in my opinion a very fine whitewash job was done or attempted by that committee in the investigation of what took place in the first two and a half months of the outbreak in western Canada. I think any fair-minded person reading the proceedings of the committee will agree with me.

Mr. Gardiner: I would suggest that the hon. member read the editorial which appears in tonight's edition of the opposition press.

Mr. Wright: We read many editorials in the papers, and I refer the minister to an editorial from the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix which bears out what I am now saying—if he wants editorials. I do not happen to have it with me but if he will just look over the editorial in the Star-Phœnix, which is by no means a C.C.F. paper, he will see they advised the minister that he should call before the committee Dr. Hunter, a young veterinarian from the province of Saskatchewan, so he could express his opinion on what took place in Regina during December. I do not think the minister has anything to be proud of in what he himself contributed to the committee or in what the government members on the committee contributed to the committee's investigation.

I do not intend to take up much more time of the committee. There were some questions I wanted to ask the minister, but I think part of them are covered by the questions which were asked by the hon. member for Souris. I should like to know how much pork and pork products are presently in the possession of the agricultural prices support board and what other farm products are presently in their possession, which they have bought under the floor price legislation or under any other legislation or orders in council. I should like also to ask the minister if he will give some further consideration to lowering the weight that applies to the floor price for beef. I believe it is presently set at 500 pounds. I had several people come to me while I was in the west recently, showing me the returns they had received from baby beef. One man in particular had been approached by one of the shippers who was going to send a carload of beef to the Edmonton market. It was just after the floor price legislation had come into effect, and he was assured that the Edmonton market would absorb the shipment at a fair price.

This man shipped four baby beef to that market, and his net return was something in the neighbourhood of $337 after the freight and other expenses had been paid. He assured me that the year before he had shipped four animals of the same weight and quality and had received a return of something better than $1,000. That certainly does not represent a satisfactory marketing situation. I am told, and I believe from the reading of press reports, that the spreads between the various grades of beef and pork under the floor price legislation presently in effect are not working out to the advantage of many producers in this country. There is too great a spread between the grades under which the government has floor prices and some of the lower grades.

It is all right for the minister to say that no farmer should ship an animal until it reaches a certain weight, or that he should raise an animal which will make a certain grade. Unfortunately many of our farmers have not the right type of stock. While these spreads may be an incentive towards obtaining better stock, nevertheless there are some farmers in serious economic difficulties because of the failure of the government to establish reasonable spreads in the floor price legislation, and to see that the packers and others who are buying these products pay the farmers reasonable prices for the lower grades.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to the first question concerning pork holdings, I may say that surplus pork in various forms, arising out of increased hog runs this year and the United States embargo, may be summarized as follows: storage stocks, 30,339,000 pounds; Wiltshire sides, 15,255,000 pounds; canned pork, 35,714,000 pounds. Of that quantity, the Wiltshire sides and the canned pork are held by the government, that is about 50 million pounds or about the quantity which I stated this afternoon would otherwise have been sold in the United States.

Mr. Quelch: I was very interested in the speech the minister made before the recess, especially his reference to the fact that in 1951 we had been able to market our farm products at fairly satisfactory prices. I am wondering what the prospect is for the immediate future, because I recall that when the minister spoke before the food and agriculture organization he stressed the fact that we had quite large supplies of feed grain on hand and we were, therefore, in a position to expand our production of livestock. On the other hand the minister did not think the farmers would be likely to expand the production of livestock unless they had greater assurance with regard to markets for that increased production.

Then when the minister spoke before the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in reply to certain questions he pointed out that Britain lacked the dollars to buy our pork, cheese and eggs, and therefore he was not going to ask any farmer to expand his production of those products. There is no doubt that we could expand our production of livestock, cheese and various other commodities. There is no doubt that there is a very real need for that increased production in the world today. We have been told time and again by the officials of the FAO and other bodies about the urgent need for food. We have been told by the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the need for food. It is not very satisfactory, therefore, for us to have to say to our farmers that we are not going to ask them to expand production of food because if they do there may not be a market for it.

It is not good enough to say that we can market the food we are producing. The question is, can we expand our production so as to produce all the food we can, and if we do will there be a market for it? I saw an article in the Albertan which stated that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture had asked for a food plan which would make it possible to get the surplus to the needy nations. Reference was made to the fact that the international commodity clearing house idea had collapsed as a result of many nations not being prepared to support it. The federation also requested that some kind of board be set up to assure that if we expand production in this country there will be a market for our products.

What I should like to ask the minister is whether or not anything is now being done to set up the mechanism by which increased production of livestock could be marketed. I realize, of course, that the foot-and-mouth disease, for the time being, has made the problem more difficult, but the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, to which I referred, was made before the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. Evidently, therefore, at that time—that is at the end of last year—he foresaw difficulty in marketing our farm produce. I can believe that this is not really a problem for the Minister of Agriculture. His main problem is to get production. The problem of marketing surpluses, I presume, rests with the Department of Trade and Commerce and more especially with the Minister of Finance, because the whole question of marketing our surpluses of farm produce is largely a monetary problem.

I do not doubt for one minute that if the Minister of Finance were to find ways and means of financing the sale of farm products to other countries, the Minister of Agriculture would be very pleased to see that that expanded production took place. I am wondering whether or not the Minister of Agriculture has received any assurance from his colleagues that if he tries to step up production of agricultural products in this country there will be a market for them.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to what has just been said, I might say that the hon. member has not gone back far enough in order to find the beginning of the suggestion that we should not produce in Canada all that we could produce of certain commodities. I think I might say that does not apply to agricultural products alone but to some other things as well. It will be recalled that in this country we were producing at our peak in 1943 and 1944. I do not need to go over the quantities; they have been mentioned in this house so often one does not need to repeat them. Production was at the peak at that time.

The British took the trouble to send a man over here to tell us what was in store for us in the future. He went right across this country and appeared at every farm organization meeting that was held. I appeared with him in Regina and listened to what he had to say. He told us definitely that we would not be able to sell the quantity of bacon that we were then selling in Britain once the war was over. He told us the reasons for that. He said that when the war was over Britain was going back to trading bicycles, for example, for certain products in Denmark. He used that as one illustration, and went on to point out that they had made definite agreements following the 1932 conference here in Ottawa concerning what they were to buy from other countries, not only before the war but afterward. We are going along as best we can under that arrangement now. These agreements have been re-established with all the countries in the world, from which Britain gets food. She has not established any position with us in relation to food.

What I said this afternoon was that we had no great complaint to make because during part of the time we had been able to sell in the United States all the beef we did produce, and for twice as much as we could get for it in Britain, and we have been able to sell in Canada all of the hogs we have produced. I do not say "all we could have produced". What I say is that we have sold all that we have produced in Canada at a higher price than we could in the United States. It was suggested a moment ago that the problem of marketing farm products is the responsibility of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That statement is not true at all times. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has nothing whatever to do with the marketing of farm products in Canada. That is not trade and commerce.

Mr. Quelch: I am talking about marketing externally.

Mr. Gardiner: All our hogs were marketed in Canada last year.

Mr. Quelch: We have a few million pounds in cans right now, have we not?

Mr. Gardiner: That has all come along within the last two or three months; but up until February this year we were having no difficulty in marketing our hog products. We would not have had any this year had we not had the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak. We had in the United States a market for the 50 million pounds that is now either in cans or in Wiltshire sides had we not had the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease; and I am not too sure that we have not a market for it in the United States in spite of the fact that we have had that outbreak.

Mr. Quelch: The minister told the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that he would not ask the farmers to increase the production of hogs, cheese or eggs because Britain lacked the dollars with which to buy them. That is the thing I was referring to.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not put it quite in that way. What I stated was this; I have stated it over and over again and I will repeat it now. I have said that I would not ask the farmers to produce more of certain products because Britain has said that she has not the dollars with which to buy them.

An hon. Member: That was good advice.

Mr. Gardiner: That is a little bit different from saying I am convinced that Britain did not have the dollars.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Quelch: Well, the minister took their word for it.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact Britain spent in this country last year $200 million more than she spent the year before. I should like to know why she did not spend some of it on some of these food products we have been talking about, but that is not my affair. In answer to the question that was just asked me as to why we did not do something about it, I should like to know what we can do about it in this country.

Mr. Brooks: Buy more from Britain.

Mr. Gardiner: We can take care of the situation which exists in Canada, and we do that. We provided conditions under which hogs were marketed in Canada at a better price than could have been obtained for them elsewhere. If we had produced 50 per cent more hogs and had sent them over to Britain and taken the price that we could get for them our farmers would not have obtained as much for the increased number of hogs as they obtained last year for what they did produce. After all, farmers as well as other people have a little bit of common sense. Usually they make up their own minds as to what they are going to do. I do not need to tell them what to do.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, as this is my first opportunity to address this honourable chamber, and as it is my privilege to speak in my native tongue, I propose to speak in the French language.

(Translation):

Agriculture being the most important industry in the constituency I have the privilege to represent in this house, I wish, Mr. Chairman, to make a few remarks in connection with the debate which is now taking place on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, whose responsibility it is to find markets for our farm products, and if need be, to grant subsidies in order to fill the existing gap between the present sale price of these products and the processing or production costs.

We are now faced, in certain districts of the province of Quebec, particularly in my own district, with a rather awkward situation. While the civil and religious authorities encourage my compatriots to settle on farms; while the provincial authorities spend large amounts of money in order to facilitate their establishment in new areas; while those same authorities make considerable efforts to open new districts to colonization and agriculture, it so happens that those who are already settled on farms, those who derive their livelihood from the soil, have in the past six months been going through a period of very alarming difficulties. There seems to be no solution in sight without prompt and efficient action on the part of the Department of Agriculture.

I have no intention, Mr. Chairman, of turning this speech into a plea for agriculture. I would nevertheless like to say that this branch of our economic life has always been and always will be our society's basic industry. When agriculture is prosperous, the workers' position in the towns is improved. Other classes are equally better off for it. A large number of industries are dependent upon agriculture. These are processing industries, manufacturing industries for equipment used in agriculture, transport companies and a great many others.

The agricultural industry deserves our particular attention for another reason.

Let us not forget that the agricultural worker is among those whose professions are exceedingly hard and risky. We all know that the agricultural profession does not lead to a quick fortune. It requires solitude, long working hours from the crack of dawn to sunset. It does not afford the pleasures and comfort of the big city; even holidays are denied to the farmer and on Sundays he still has work to do.

In order to succeed, the farmer must call upon the help of his entire family, regardless of age or even sex. The mother herself must do her bit on the farm, besides her household chores. Many a farmer has told me that he would never have mustered enough courage to remain on his farm had it not been for the heroic help of his wife; and yet, in spite of the concerted efforts of the whole family, the farmer's income is uncertain, for he is at the mercy of the weather, rain, drought, frost, hail, as well as of economic conditions.

Mr. Chairman, when members of a social class as important as our farming class willingly accept such sacrifices in order to achieve success the leaders are duty bound, I think, to grant them very special consideration.

I want to point out that during the last war, when the forces of evil represented by the fascist dictatorship were struggling against the forces of light for which we stood, our farmers and dairymen were called upon to sell their products such as cheese, butter, eggs and bacon at prices they considered inadequate. They willingly made the sacrifices known to the hon. members of the house. They readily agreed to them not only because they understood that they were sacrificing themselves to a noble cause but because they were confident that the countries which they had helped to save from starvation would, once victory had been won, recognize their indebtedness and continue to buy our agricultural products even if, owing to somewhat different economic conditions, our producers were compelled to sell these products at a slightly higher price.

As a result of production costs today and the closing of foreign markets, our farmers are suffering serious losses in the marketing of their products, ranging from 10 to 25 per cent.

In support of this statement, I would like to read, if I may, a letter I have received recently from a farmers' co-operative of my county. I shall dispense with the congratulations the letter has for me since I presume they would be of no interest to the majority of this house. I quote:

Chambord,
May 31, 1952

Mr. Paul Spence,
Member of Parliament for Roberval,
Mistassini, P.Q.

During your electoral campaign, you probably came to realize how very precarious is the marketing situation for our products, and for cheese especially, which is not selling at all. However, la Fédérée is reported to have succeeded in making a sale this week at 27 cents. This price is still much below production costs in view of the price of farm machinery, feed and labour.

Computations have been made, and at $4 a hundredweight for milk, a farm must be well run if is going to yield its owner 50 cents an hour. Moreover, in our district, where almost the entire production is converted into butter and cheese, the producer gets about $2.25 a hundredweight for milk; which is a starvation wage.

If the government fails to do something to raise the prices of agricultural products, the farmers will not be able to produce at a loss indefinitely; the result will be a shortage of foodstuffs which may produce many other shortages.

I am forwarding you a copy of a letter I sent this very day to the Minister of Agriculture; please read it and intercede on our behalf with the minister.

Yours truly,

Marie Brassard, secretary
Co-operative Agricultural Society
(S.C.A.) of Chambord-West

I now read the letter to which Miss Brassard has just referred:

Chambord, May 31, 1952.

The Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

I have been requested by the board of directors of the Chambord West Agricultural Co-operative Society, to inform you that the directors strongly support the representations of the Catholic Farmers' Union (UCC) in connection with the decrease in the price of dairy products.

The situation greatly affects farmers of our district, since dairy farming is the basis of the agricultural industry.

The farmers' task is to produce and they are doing their duty, but they will be unable to keep on if they have to produce at a loss. There might be a shortage of foodstuffs then. It is your duty to prevent and avoid such a situation.

Respectfully yours,

Marie Brassard, secretary
Chambord West Agricultural Co-operative Society.

Now, at Chambord, in the constituency of Roberval, dairy farmers, who must sell their milk at $4 per cwt. in order to earn a salary of 50 cents an hour, are receiving only $2.25. That means that not only do they not earn any salary at all, but that they are producing at a loss. Other important agricultural organizations have made representations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Thus, on the 1st of June of this year, a Montreal newspaper, La Patrie, published an account of a meeting held at Sherbrooke, from which I want to quote a few excerpts which show clearly the deep feeling of apprehension and dissatisfaction which prevails among our agricultural class in the province of Quebec. I quote:

La Patrie

Sunday, June 1, 1952.

Sherbrooke—Thirteen hundred farmers from the eastern townships gathered in the parochial hall of the Immaculate Conception, have approved the following recommendations which have been forwarded to the federal Minister of Agriculture.

Whereas, out of sixteen billion pounds of milk produced in this country, six and a half billion, or 40 per cent, are made into butter; whereas in the province of Quebec alone butter production is the main source of income for 80,000 farmers out of 125,000, it is therefore resolved that a protest be registered against the Honourable J. G. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture, who, on January 23, 1952, stated that "strictly speaking butter producers are not dairymen".

Whereas imported butter competes against our product and tends to reduce its price; whereas Canadian butter would be in a better position to meet this competition were not imported butter, whose flavour is different, "reprocessed" and mixed in with our own, it is therefore resolved that the government be requested to legislate so that any imported butter be sold unchanged in its original condition, and be so designated.

Whereas the price of cheese and butter affects the price of other dairy products; whereas we have imported 11,800,000 pounds of cheese at a time when it was to be expected that Great Britain would not renew her agreement with Canada; resolved that the federal government be asked to fix a support price of 30 cents per pound.

Whereas the western farmers are granted, under various forms, financial assistance of not less than $100 million by the dominion government, resolved: first, that federal members from eastern Canada be asked to defend our interests with an energy comparable to the energy shown by the western members in defence of their wheat producers: second, that the Hon. Mr. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture, be asked to show eastern farmers the same consideration as is given western farmers.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers in my province are under the impression that the Minister of Agriculture denies them the same measure of protection he extends to farmers in other parts of the country. They are not opposed, it is to be noted, to the assistance provided to the wheat producers of the western provinces. They only wish to receive the same consideration from government authorities. I support them in their view that part of the taxes they pay in order to cover the cost of administration of this country be returned to them under the form of financial assistance or subsidies when lack of foresight on the part of the leaders of the country is the cause of a crisis in the field of marketing such as the one the farmers are now undergoing.

The farmers in my riding are so dissatisfied that they chose to express their dissatisfaction in no uncertain terms, a few weeks ago. That is why they have sent me here to protest against the neglectful manner in which they are treated by the government. I wish to point out, by way of digression, that I would have obtained a larger majority if I had been faced only with the official candidate because nearly three quarters of the supporters of the independent candidate profess the same feelings as my own supporters.

(Text):

Mr. Casselman: I would ask the hon. members to keep quiet for a moment.

Mr. Lennard: It is getting awfully noisy.

Mr. Abbott: I am just translating as he goes along. You fellows don't understand.

(Translation):

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Spence: The reason for the situation which prevails in the farming industry is quite evident when we compare our export statistics for the past few years. Thus, our exports of pork reached, in 1944, a total of 717,700,000 pounds but decreased year after year to a mere 31,300,000 pounds last year.

In 1945, we shipped 135,400,000 pounds of cheese. This item of our agricultural production has also decreased considerably. Last year, we sold on foreign markets less than a quarter of what we sold six years ago, namely 30,700,000 pounds.

The dairy farmers fail to understand why the government, under the circumstances, still allows the importation into our country of foreign cheese. Thus, according to a report produced in this house on the 5th of May last, our imports of cheese for the first three months of this year amounted to more than 5,300,000 pounds.

Dairy farmers and hog breeders of Quebec are clearly under the impression that the government does not take any interest in their problems.

Therefore I believe it is my duty to let the Minister of Agriculture know and to beg him to give as much consideration to their requests as to the representations of wheat producers of the province represented in the house by the minister.

(Text):

Mr. Sinnott: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words to say and suggestions to make to the Minister of Agriculture. We have heard rumours that there is a possibility of losing the great experimental farm here in Ottawa. I would be absolutely opposed to that farm being given up to any housing project. Not only are the people of Ottawa and those who live in the immediate vicinity proud of this farm; it is worthy of the pride of all Canadians. I am sure if the farm were advertised more it would be a great attraction to United States visitors.

Recently we were invited by the Halifax board of trade to visit that city and on that trip I saw the damage that has been caused by the tides. If this condition is allowed to continue over the years many acres of land will be lost. They are trying to protect this land now, but if other means are not adopted it will all be washed into the sea. Cement walls should be erected near the mouths of these washes which have been caused by tidal action so this land may be saved. If a little country like Holland can keep out the sea in order to protect its farmland, we in Canada can do the same thing.

A great deal has been said about the high prices of farm machinery. I submit that a full-scale investigation should be held to see whether these prices are out of line with the prices of farm products. They are certainly out of line with the prices of some farm products. If such an investigation were held and it was found that there was no reason to reduce the prices of farm machinery, our farmers would be satisfied. Certainly at the present time when you go in to have a small repair done on a piece of machinery you find that it runs into many dollars. Many types of farm machinery are being sold in the United States at much lower prices than they can be obtained for in Canada.

Reference has been made to the cost of fertilizer. I shall not elaborate on that because we all know how high it is. But I think something should be done about the prices of commercial feeds, such as hog starter, chicken starter, turkey starter, laying mash and calf meal. All these feeds are very high in price. Farmers are getting as low as 18 cents per dozen for eggs, and many of them are wondering whether they should stay in business. I was talking to some folks a week or two ago, and they told me they had sold all their chickens because they were not making money.

There should be a proper floor price under eggs. I was talking to a poultry inspector, and he told me the producers are not getting sufficient benefit from the floor prices. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will dig into this a little more and develop something which will enable these chicken raisers to stay in business.

I am told that our farmers would like to see the floor prices on cattle applied to the lower weights. I understand that with an animal weighing 500 pounds the floor prices do not apply, and that some have been selling calves for as low as 10 or 12 cents a pound. If the floor prices were applied to the lower grades it would help the farming community.

I think the revolving fund should be used to a greater extent. The drain on agricultural labour has been considerable because of recruitment into the armed forces and the young people who are leaving the farm to work in defence industry. The farmers are finding the cost of labour so high they cannot meet it with the prices they are receiving for what they produce. If this revolving fund were used to a greater extent it would help to keep the boys and girls on the farm and thus make possible a greater agricultural production.

Anyone who has not lived on a farm cannot realize how parents are worrying today. I know one farmer with a son about 17 or 18 years of age. That boy does not want to stay on the farm at any price. He claims he can go to the city and get good wages in an industrial plant, along with three weeks' holidays with pay, sick leave, other holidays and no work on Saturdays or Sundays. That is why 20 per cent of the population of Canada are drifting into the cities. This situation must be rectified even though it costs $200 million or $500 million.

This trend is noticeable all through Canada. If the government will take the necessary steps to correct this situation, not only will the people on the farm be benefited; it will benefit those who live in the cities, because these farm boys and girls are coming to the cities to steal their jobs. Every possible means should be adopted to keep the boys and girls on the farm.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, I am going to take only a few minutes because, as the Minister of Agriculture has said, this department has been discussed on many occasions since the present session started. Certain elections have also provided an opportunity to discuss these matters, even though that discussion did not take place here. Therefore I am not going to take much time tonight. I was glad to hear the minister state at the beginning of his address that A stands for agriculture and that his department is usually discussed first when estimates are under consideration. He should perhaps have gone further and stated that agriculture is our first and basic industry. I think it is now recognized by people all over Canada that without a prosperous agriculture we cannot have a prosperous Canada. It is in the interests of labour, organized and unorganized, to see that agriculture is kept in a prosperous condition. Otherwise they will have difficulty finding markets for the things they produce and without the production of which they cannot have employment.

We have heard many statements over the radio, have seen them in the press and have also heard politicians say that agriculture is in a very prosperous condition at the present time. I am not ready to agree entirely. Figures given us by the bureau of statistics a few months ago show that a little over 20 per cent of the population of Canada live on farms and receive only 9·95 per cent of the national income. In my opinion that is not sufficient compensation for those who work on the land. If farmers go ahead and produce a lot, as they are at all times willing to do, then they find they are cutting each other's throat because of a lack of markets, and the prices of their products go down.

So far as secondary industries are concerned, all they have to do is close their factories for a while, let their stocks go down and create a shortage. If the farmers were to do that by going on strike we would immediately have an outcry against them. A few weeks ago I had a letter from one of my constituents at Dewberry, Alberta. It is dated May 17, 1952, and is addressed to myself at the House of Commons. It is written by a storekeeper for one of the farmers in the district. The letter reads:

> Mr. Ernest Garnier, farmer, Dewberry, has asked the writer to mail you the attached cheque amount 21 cents with his compliments. It is his wish that you use this cheque in any manner you wish, going even as far as buying the Hon. Mr. Gardiner a cigar or a couple of chocolate bars.

The cheque is endorsed to me, and I have endorsed it and am going to send it to the minister with my compliments as well as those of the farmer at Dewberry who sent it. The letter continues:

> This cheque is in payment for a hide shipped to the Honourable Company of Adventurers in Edmonton (HBC here before). The hide brought $1.71 for 38 pounds.

I might say the gross weight of the hide was 43 pounds and there was a dockage of 5 pounds, so the fellow who processed it would not be out anything. The letter goes on to say:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway Company (who have also been in the country and know their way around) got $1.50 out of the deal and the cheque which you hold for 21 cents is the net return less we should say the price of the gunny sack in which it was shipped, plus two or three hours of work skinning and the trip into the railway station to ship the hide. We trust and hope—we will leave this matter to yourself.

In case there should be any doubt about the matter I have the invoice here.

Mr. Wood: May I ask the hon. member a question? Was that hide a glue?

Mr. Fair: It was a green cow hide.

Mr. Wood: Was it a glue? Was it becoming ripe?

Mr. Fair: It was not graded. It was simply one green hide, 43 less 5, 38 pounds at 4½ cents per pound, $1.71.

Mr. Wood: It must have been a glue.

Mr. Fair: That amount was less freight of $1.50 leaving a balance of 21 cents that the farmer received, and the word "thanks" is at the bottom of the invoice. I am simply reading this letter tonight so hon. members may have some idea of the return the farmer receives and the returns paid to some other people. The farmers of Canada are prepared at all times to produce immense quantities of various kinds of farm produce, and the world today is in need of all that can be produced. I think it is the government's business to provide markets for those goods. I am not going to say any more now. I may have a little more to say on some of the items, but since I have a date with the redistribution committee I must leave and look after my business there.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, it is not very often that I agree with what the hon. member for Springfield says in the house, but tonight I can agree with everything he had to say. I should like to elaborate a little on what he said about eggs. It is true that the price of the feed you have to give hens to make them lay is far too high, and also the price of mash of different kinds; but grade A eggs that were selling a week or two ago for 30 cents a dozen at the farm were retailing to the consumer in the cities at 55 cents. That is almost double the price the farmer got for his eggs. Everybody knows the farmer is entitled to more for producing eggs than the dealer gets for handling them. There is certainly something radically wrong when you look at the difference in price, to say nothing about the cost of feed. I heard the minister say this afternoon—and I wrote it down so I would not forget it—that the beef market was only about 2 cents lower now than before the foot-and-mouth disease appeared in Canada. I do not know how far you would have to stretch your imagination to think that statement was correct.

Mr. Gardiner: I will put the figures on the record.

Mr. Cardiff: Anyone who had beef lost at least 10 cents a pound. I think the price now is perhaps 2 cents higher than it was at the time foot-and-mouth disease appeared in Canada, but I am sure it is at least 8 cents a pound lower than it was then. In addition the floor price that the government put under beef varies by anywhere from one to three cents a pound depending on who suggests what the grade is. There was no definite grade set except "good steers". What I would call a good steer, what the minister would call a good steer and what somebody else would call a good steer could easily result in a variation of two or three cents a pound. I think the floor should have been set in such a way that people would know what the grade meant. If the floor was 25 cents, or no matter what the price was, it should have been stated definitely what the grade was. A good steer is no particular grade. There is a variation having regard to different people's opinions of what a quality steer is.

I hope that when Hansard comes out what the minister had to say will appear as it was heard in the committee. I am not suggesting that the speeches are not reported correctly, but I know that I once went to Hansard to find out some of the things the minister had said that did not appear at all. I know we have the privilege of correcting our grammar and so on, but I do not think we should have the privilege of deleting full sentences from Hansard.

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege, a little while ago you were after me, Mr. Chairman, for a statement I made. I should like to ask you what you think of this statement.

An hon. Member: He is right. I have seen it myself.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member suggests, there are times when words are changed in Hansard, not because they change the meaning at all but simply because they express the meaning more effectively than the words used. That is done by members all over the house and that is as much as I ever do, as Hansard will indicate to you.

Mr. Cardiff: True. I agree with that; but that is not deleting whole sentences out of Hansard which detract from the meaning.

Mr. Gardiner: Hansard would not delete whole sentences even if I tried.

Mr. Cardiff: I am not accusing Hansard of doing that; but I know the minister has been correctly reported by the reporters in the newspapers although in Hansard there were omissions. I hope when this committee report comes through we will have the Hansard as we heard it in the committee.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no way I can guarantee that my hon. friend hears what I have said. I notice him over there carrying on a conversation while I am speaking, and I doubt very much if he knows what I am saying half the time. I am not going to guarantee that my remarks are going to appear in Hansard as he thinks he hears them, but I will guarantee that they appear in Hansard as they were said.

Mr. Cardiff: I hope so, and that is all I am asking for.

I do not want to repeat what others have said, but I agree with what the member for Souris said this afternoon. I agree with everything he said and I do not intend to repeat it because I think that is a waste of time. I will, however, direct the committee to something that happened during the investigation which I think should be repeated in this house. It is that when Dr. Hall was on the stand most of the questions that were asked of him and the answers that he gave were framed before coming into the committee. I want the minister to deny that if he can.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is asking me to deny it I just want to say to him that I had not any knowledge of either the wording of the questions before they were asked or the answers that were to be given, none whatsoever. All the questions were asked in the committee by a member of the committee and answered by the doctor himself; and I think the insulting remarks made just now were made in the committee at that time. They were properly dealt with there and I think they ought to be deleted from Hansard. That one sentence should certainly be stricken from Hansard.

Mr. Cardiff: It was not an insulting remark and I was not insulting anybody. I was only stating a fact; and the answer the minister gave me in the committee was not an answer at all. I asked whether the questions had been framed beforehand. I asked the minister if he had had a caucus meeting with the Liberal members before they came in.

Mr. Gardiner: That was about an entirely different matter. It had nothing to do with this.

Mr. Cardiff: No, it wasn't.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it was quite different.

Mr. Cardiff: He said he often had a caucus meeting with the Liberals and he would be glad to have one with the Conservatives, but he did not answer the question at all.

Mr. Mutch: Did you ask him?

Mr. Cardiff: I just wanted that to be on Hansard.

Mr. Gardiner: It is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Cardiff: With regard to something that was said a while ago about British markets, I can tell the minister there is one way to sell more to Britain and that is by buying more from her. There is no reason in the world why we could not have sold more foodstuffs to Britain if she had had the dollars to buy them. We bought a great deal from other places that could have been bought from Britain, but that was entirely government policy and I think the government will have to take responsibility for it.

I do not think there is much more I want to say at this time.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I listened quite attentively to what the minister said in his statement this afternoon. He said there had been no troublesome surplus in 1951 or so far in 1952, and that we had no difficulty whatever until the foot-and-mouth disease was diagnosed in this country. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister what he considers the difficulty the cheese producers are having in this country, and which started sometime last fall.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: I would just like to make this correction to what my friend has just said. He is going to be checking Hansard, and he states that I said there was no troublesome surplus so far this year. I made no such statement at any time.

Mr. Charlton: The words used were "so far in '52"—"in '51 and so far in '52", and if that is not so far this year I don't know what it means.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that we had no troublesome surplus in 1952. I outlined the troubles we had with foot-and-mouth disease and the resulting surplus.

Mr. Charlton: Cheese was not one of them, and I am asking the minister what he considers the trouble they are having in the cheese industry at the present time. It so happens that last year the minister told the cheese producers that he could only get from Great Britain 28 cents a pound for cheese. Rightly or wrongly the cheese producers themselves consulted with Great Britain and procured a better price than 28 cents. In view of that fact I would take it the minister was a little put out at not being consulted regarding the matter.

Mr. Gardiner: I was consulted.

Mr. Charlton: The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in this house that a price of 36 cents was charged Great Britain for cheese, but that was absolutely false. It was not 36 cents.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: The Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement in the house that we had charged Great Britain 36 cents for cheese. That was absolutely wrong; the fact is that we did charge Great Britain 32 cents for some cheese. But what does the government do? It permits one large importing company to import cheese from New Zealand and have it laid down in Montreal for 31½ cents a pound. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that promotes good relations between Great Britain and ourselves. We charge Great Britain 32 cents for cheese and we allow importation of cheese into this country for less than we charge Great Britain. Is it any wonder Great Britain does not want to buy our cheese today, after such a thing happening?

It is of course a fact that the cheese producers were practically told to get out of the market or else they would not get a floor price. They have accepted a floor price of 24 cents, which is not even near a cost of production price for cheese. The minister knows that. If he wants to destroy the cheese business in this country—to destroy an industry that has maintained the only good market for our surplus milk products—that is the best way in the world to destroy it, because you will certainly not get much cheese production at 24 cents a pound. I would also like to ask the minister if he has any cheese on hand at the present moment in government stores.

The hon. member for Souris this afternoon brought up the question of foot-and-mouth disease. I hope I do not repeat too much of what the member stated but I think I should say something. I want to make it quite clear that none of us in this party has ever, at any time, criticized anything that has taken place since the diagnosis of foot-and-mouth disease was made public; never at any time. As a matter of fact I have nothing but commendation for those men in the field who have made a marvellous job after a very bad start, because they did do a good job of getting the disease cleared up. I want that made quite clear; that commendation of those men should be made at this time for that very good job. We have been accused in the committee, by the minister and others on the opposite side of the house, of playing politics with this very important matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Charlton: I just want to say this, Mr. Chairman. If putting the facts before the taxpayers of this country is playing politics, I am going to be playing politics as long as I sit in this House of Commons. Certainly that is all this party has ever tried to do, to place the facts before the public and let them know just what did happen.

This afternoon the hon. member for Souris read the report of this committee. I intend to repeat only that part of it which is so important. It is the second paragraph, and reads as follows:

> Having considered the correspondence and records submitted together with the evidence adduced, your committee is of the opinion that the officials of the health of animals division, Department of Agriculture, followed the well defined plans laid down through long experience gained working in co-operation with their counterparts in the United States bureau of animal industry to diagnose and combat stomatitis and foot-and-mouth disease.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, it has never been proven that stomatitis did exist. Of course, on the other hand, it has never been proven that it did not exist; I must be fair. But why did stomatitis have to appear in that report? It was to cover up. It is stated in the report that the department followed the well-defined plans laid down through long experience gained working in co-operation with their counterparts in the United States bureau of animal industry. I have here the 1942 year book on agriculture, "Keeping livestock healthy" put out by the United States department of agriculture. Speaking of foot-and-mouth disease at page 270, it says this; and I want to quote this complete paragraph:

> In making a diagnosis the facts just discussed are used to determine which of the three diseases an infected animal has. The procedure is to inoculate swine, cattle, guinea pigs, and horses with material obtained from the sick animal. The diagnosis of foot-and-mouth disease is clear and can be made unhesitatingly if the typical vesicles, preceded by a rise in temperature, developed in all these animals except the horses. When all the injected animals including the horses develop vesicular lesions, the disease would be diagnosed as vesicular stomatitis. When lesions are produced in swine, less frequently and to a milder degree in horses, and not at all in cattle or guinea pigs, the condition is typical of vesicular exanthema of swine.

In view of the statement in the report that they had followed the well-defined plans as set out by the United States bureau of animal industry, and in view of the completely contradictory statement in this book which is sent out by the United States department of agriculture, I believe the report contains a misstatement of fact. In view of that, I certainly cannot agree with it.

As I mentioned before, I do not know why stomatitis was written into that report, other than to cover up, because some of the top officials insisted—I say "insisted" advisedly—that it was stomatitis. We had considerable evidence and a number of statements in the committee that it was important to follow the United States method of diagnosis. I am a good Canadian, Mr. Chairman, and I have so many times heard statements made about how much better the United States is than Canada. In many cases it may be true, but I do say that we have something in Canada that we are very proud of and should brag about. I hate to see it belittled all the time by the Department of Agriculture, and especially by the minister under whose department it comes. I am referring to the animal diseases laboratory in Hull. We have a lab there for the purpose of diagnosing animal diseases as well as human diseases. Why should we not use it? Why should we not be proud of the fact that we have it? On the last page of the last committee report the minister attempted, with one of the committee witnesses, to belittle the Hull laboratory.

Now, the disease was diagnosed in Hull, though the minister says not. It was diagnosed there probably more or less by accident. As I said before it has been the policy of the department, and especially of the minister, to try to maintain that the procedure followed was the correct one, regardless of the accuracy of that statement. Later in the committee we found that the officials from Saskatchewan were told at the start by a private veterinarian that this disease could be foot-and-mouth disease. We realize, Mr. Chairman, as much as anyone that it is important not to throw around the term foot-and-mouth disease as if it were nothing at all. We realize the necessity for being a little bit discreet about the use of the term. The minister said something in the committee the other day—fortunately it is not in the record because I would hate to see it there—intimating that it was probably a good thing this disease had not been diagnosed for two and a half months, that we would have lost a great deal more had it been diagnosed at the proper time.

The men working in the field for the health of animals branch have taken a great deal of criticism. The veterinary profession as a whole has taken a great deal of criticism as a result of this foot-and-mouth episode. It is unfortunate that just because of the stubborn attitude of some of the top officials of the department—

Mr. Ferrie: Is that all you've got?

Mr. Charlton: I shall let the hon. member make a speech any time he desires to do so. He made a lot of speeches in the committee, but I never heard him say very much.

Mr. Ferrie: You never did either.

Mr. Charlton: In view of the very serious outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Europe early in the fall and the subsequent outbreak in Great Britain, it is my theory that the Department of Agriculture and the department of immigration should have taken cognizance of the fact and been guarding against the transportation of the disease here by way of immigrants or any other means by which it could be carried. Some people may have the mistaken idea that the disease can only be carried by livestock. Mr. Chairman, that is very wrong. It is not a proven fact, and could not be proven at the time the immigrant Willi Bruntjen was brought to Ottawa, but it is my personal opinion, whatever it may be worth, that there can be no doubt that is how the disease arrived in this country. Seventeen days from the time he was on a farm in Germany infected with that disease, he was on the Waas farm in the Regina area. Strangely enough, he had left the employ of Mr. Waas before the disease was recognized. In the committee reports at page 53 Dr. Childs, the veterinary director general, made a statement that in my estimation is rather peculiar.

I do not want to repeat too much, Mr. Chairman, but I want to bring this one paragraph before you:

> We know right well how it would affect international trade and affect the whole national economy.

He is referring to foot-and-mouth disease. To continue:

> We know that well. However we did not suspect there would be foot-and-mouth disease up there. It was absolutely preposterous—2,000 miles from anywhere that you would expect it. You would expect it at some of our coasts or at our quarantine stations, but not out there.

I think it is rather too bad the veterinary director general should make that statement, because in this day and age it is not preposterous to find any disease any place to which it can be carried by human beings.

As I have said before, we have not criticized anything that has taken place since the diagnosis was made. What we have criticized—and we feel that the criticism has later proved to be justified—is the lag in diagnosis of the disease. At page 92 of the reports of the committee we find that Mr. Wright apparently made a statement, and then the Minister of Agriculture made a statement of which I want to read just a part:

> In this case, if there is anything at all about it that one can criticize, it is that they did not make a proper diagnosis, a correct diagnosis, earlier. Now, that happens right along, both in the practice of medicine and in veterinary practice; but there might be some reason for criticism there, but if there is any reason for criticism it is just as much the business of the provincial department as it is of the federal.

The minister has admitted that there might be some criticism for lateness or delay in diagnosis. We are therefore together on that point. With regard to the statement that it is just as much the business of the provincial department as it is of the federal department, may I say it is absolutely incorrect. As the minister later admitted, the responsibility with respect to any contagious disease in Canada rests with the federal Department of Agriculture.

Another thing I should like to bring out is the fact that one or two of the witnesses before the committee were so sure it was vesicular stomatitis that they could not see the forest for the trees. At page 205 of the reports of the committee we have Dr. Childs giving evidence in reply to questions by Mr. Cardiff, and we find the following:

> Q. Is that not similar to foot-and-mouth disease, very closely related to it? A. It has some similarity.
> Q. Well, if you were not absolutely sure, would it not prompt you to take a test and be absolutely sure that you were dealing with a very contagious disease?

Here is Dr. Childs' answer.

A. I was satisfied that we were dealing with simple vesicular stomatitis or we certainly would have gone further, and quicker, with the tests.

Later on at page 267, in giving replies to questions asked by myself, as a matter of fact, Dr. James said this:

Q. And you injected the horses? A. Yes.

Q. So that you would have preferred to have been able to get young horses from premises away from those on which the infection was suspected? A. Yes. Dr. Christie mentioned that at one time; but the unfortunate fact was that we just thought it was stomatitis and not so very important and that was not done.

Then at page 273, in answer to questions by Mr. Wright, Dr. James said:

Q. It would not indicate anything more dangerous, that was not the reason why you inoculated the horses—to determine whether there was anything more dangerous than stomatitis? It was simply to determine whether there was stomatitis or not? A. It is a quite common thing.

Q. In other words, there was no discussion between yourself and Dr. Carlson and Dr. Christie as to the possibility of this being anything dangerous? This was the first field test that would be made? A. No, the idea was we agreed that to satisfy ourselves we would inoculate horses.

Q. To satisfy yourselves? A. That they had stomatitis. We could prove stomatitis by producing a reaction in the horses.

Then again at page 277 we find this in answer to questions by Mr. Harkness:

Q. The thing you wanted to establish by injecting these horses was that it was stomatitis but, if it were not stomatitis it must have been in your mind that it was foot-and-mouth disease? A. No, it was not.

Q. Why inject the horses at all if you were certain it was stomatitis? A. Well, when you are sending an official document down to the head of government you do not want to play around with it. You want to have something to show you know what you are doing—to back up your judgment. To back up my judgment I inoculated the horses with the advice and instructions of my superior officers—not to satisfy myself about foot-and-mouth disease.

Earlier, in answer to a question by Mr. Harkness we find this:

Q. If you were not suspicious why did you inject these horses on December 3? A. To satisfy myself as to the type of virus we had.

Q. Is it true that the only thing an injection on the horses will do is to satisfy you that it is stomatitis or foot-and-mouth disease? A. I was not bothered about foot-and-mouth disease. I wanted to satisfy myself that we had stomatitis.

That is the evidence given by one of the veterinarians who appeared before the committee. Again at page 335 we have this evidence given by the assistant veterinary director general, Dr. Hall, in reply to questions by myself?

Q. And when you speak of a vesicular disease the first thing that comes to your mind is that it might be foot-and-mouth disease, is it not? A. Yes.

Q. Dr. Childs went out there on the 14th and he assured you; how could he be so sure that it was nothing else but stomatitis although he did not say it was—of course, you cannot answer that—after he had been out did he state to you any reason for saying he was so sure it was stomatitis? A. I believe that was due to the fact that he had been in the stomatitis outbreak in 1938 and 1939; he had dealt with stomatitis.

Q. He had dealt with stomatitis? A. With stomatitis, more than I ever had.

Q. But he had not been out and seen this? A. He went there.

Q. But he did assure you that it was stomatitis and there was nothing to worry about? A. Nothing to worry about, that is correct.

The next thing I should like to discuss is the sending of samples. There was a great deal of discussion in committee regarding the sending of samples. It has been said on various occasions that it is very dangerous to send these samples from one part of the country to the other. Much more dangerous material is being sent every day from Chalk River. There are diseases that cannot possibly be diagnosed in any other way than by sending samples to Hull. Therefore I cannot see any justification for that statement. On page 224 of the report Dr. Carlson was being questioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and he made answer as follows:

By Mr. Diefenbaker:

Q. Just a few questions in regard to what the doctor says about laboratory tests being the only way in which the matter can be determined.

A. That is the definite way—the only proper way.

Q. The only proper way?

A. Field tests are used but they can kick back on you—at least that is my professional opinion; but I may be wrong.

On page 292 Dr. Mitchell gave evidence before the committee, and at the beginning of his evidence he made this statement in part:

Vesicular diseases are treacherous and the only sensible thing was to get specimens in as soon as possible and because we have a virus unit all the necessary work can be done perfectly safely. Therefore the logical step was to send those specimens in. Dr. Hall agreed with that and four days later the specimens arrived.

On page 414 Dr. Christie, in giving evidence in answer to a question by myself, replied as follows:

Q. Now, Dr. Christie, you said that the department policy with regard to the sending of samples in to the lab at Hull has been against sending any samples since you have been in the department. That is a true statement of what you said, was it not?

A. More particularly since 1945.

Q. More particularly since 1945?

A. Yes.

That in effect meant that since Dr. Childs, who is now the incumbent of the office of veterinary director general, took over a ruling was put into effect that it was dangerous to send the samples in. In giving evidence at page 153 Dr. Childs himself—

Mr. Gardiner: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that Dr. Christie had said something which indicated that this decision had been reached since Dr. Childs became the director general?

Mr. Charlton: Since 1945.

Mr. Gardiner: The decision not to send in samples?

Mr. Charlton: Apparently. Does the minister want me to go over that again?

Mr. Gardiner: Will you let me read what he actually did say—

Mr. Charlton: It is to be found on page 414. If you will look at that page you will find it is in the report, and that is all I can say.

Mr. Gardiner: Read what he said at the top of page 409.

Mr. Charlton: I know that Dr. Christie was not in favour of sending samples. I agree with the view that at that point Dr. Christie was not in favour of sending samples, but the fact is that he said—

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says Dr. Christie gave the reason that the order was made in 1945 for the first time. Here is what Dr. Christie said:

> I would like to say here that this rather amazed me, certainly surprised me, for after years of schooling in the danger of forwarding specimens of a virus nature, I did not look very kindly on forwarding specimens but they were the instructions.

He says that years of schooling in the danger of it had brought him to believe that it was not the proper thing to do, and if left to his own volition he would not have done it.

Mr. Charlton: I was simply quoting what was on page 414, and the answer was: "more particularly since 1945". I repeated the question to him and his answer was "yes". Those were Dr. Christie's own words. They were not mine.

Mr. Gardiner: This is Dr. Christie's own opinion.

Mr. Charlton: Some statements were made in the committee during the hearings which absolutely astounded a past veterinary director general, because he had been veterinary director general previous to that time, and he himself wrote a bulletin to the effect that that was the way to diagnose the disease. Does the minister think that after writing the bulletin that man would go against his own ruling and have the ruling in the department that it was dangerous to send samples, particularly after instructing officials in the field to do it? I think it is rather unreasonable even to think so, because that past veterinary director general always stuck to the fact that it was important that any vesicular disease should be diagnosed in that way to be sure of the diagnosis.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The minister can say it is dangerous to send samples; he can say anything, as a matter of fact. Unless it is contradicted, nothing else is going to be said, but when he makes statements that are not facts then I consider it my duty to correct them.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not the minister's statement; it is the statement of Dr. Christie who is in charge of the district surrounding Regina.

Mr. Charlton: Yes, I know; but the minister has maintained that right through. Of course he would be expected to do so, in view of the fact that his top official had maintained it and had done it in that way; therefore you would expect the minister naturally to protect that official.

Here is the astounding thing. Since the disease has been diagnosed nothing different has happened in the east, nothing at all, as far as the disease is concerned. There have been no outbreaks here, thank goodness. Here is a very strange thing. The hon. member for Acadia on page 153 put a question to Dr. Childs as follows:

> Q. Well, it is in the light of that that I cannot understand the order you gave, carried on page 4 (session paper 169-F), dated February 29, which I will read:
> Memorandum to district veterinarians:
> Supplies and equipment for collecting material for laboratory examination obtained from cattle or other animals suspected of being infected with foot-and-mouth disease are going forward to your office from the animal diseases research institute, Hull, P.Q.
> When there is the least suspicion that foot-and-mouth disease may be present samples from the affected animal or animals should be immediately collected and sent forward to the A.D.R.I., Hull, P.Q., by air express or the most rapid method of transport available for laboratory examination.

Why was that change in policy put into effect after the disease was diagnosed? That is the peculiar point. It is all right to try to keep the thing quiet. That is perfectly true; but why is sending a sample across the country in a sealed package in an unbreakable container going to let out the idea that there is foot-and-mouth disease in the country?

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is asking why this, why that, and then repeating over and over again what was said in the committee many times, and what was corrected. He says, "Why worry over the suggestion that there is some danger with it when you can put it in an unbreakable parcel and send it?" That is not the point at all. After you have taken it out of the unbreakable parcel and put it into the animal the animal can spread the disease. That is what is done with the virus after it is brought down here. It is not kept in an unbreakable bottle; it is injected into an animal.

Mr. Charlton: Has the minister ever visited the institute at Hull?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: To see how this is done?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Are you sure?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: I have heard otherwise.

Mr. Gardiner: I am often at places when some people do not know I am there.

Mr. Charlton: There is not much good going at night when nobody can see you. I have visited that laboratory and in my opinion, if it is worth anything at all to this committee—the minister does not think it is, but somebody else might—there is absolutely no danger through handling animals in the laboratory in Hull. There is a double fence right around the area that no animal could possibly get through or contact another animal at least half a mile distant. How could the disease be carried under those conditions? The animals are kept in an absolutely closed place and every bit of refuse, and the animal itself after the disease is diagnosed, is burned right on the spot. There is absolutely no danger. I would suggest that the minister go there again and have it explained to him. He would not be so fearful. Then to continue the question by the hon. member for Acadia as reported on page 153:

> Well, I should have thought by then that you knew for certain that it was foot-and-mouth disease that it would be even more dangerous to send the samples by air, because you had already countermanded the order as it might spread the disease had the samples been broken. Yet when you ascertained it was the foot-and-mouth disease you then gave the order to send samples by air.
> A. Yes, once we knew the disease was established we had another problem on hand, in connection with animal inoculation in the field. To do this we would have to go well away from the affected area, secure suitable animals, bring them to some place where we could certainly isolate them and carry on the test. This takes considerable time. In the meantime, a serum has become available for making tests on this material, and we have better equipment.

I do not know whether better equipment was purchased between the time the disease was diagnosed and February 29. The answer continues:

> Then we had unbreakable tubes and so on, so in the interest of making, verifying, diagnosis as rapidly as possible and getting infected animals into the ground, we had to give way on that point.

That is the evidence as set out. The hon. member for Regina City seems quite intrigued with all this; he seems to think it funny. If he wants to make a speech following mine I shall be glad to listen to him. He made some rather personal statements in the house on previous occasions and I would like—

Mr. McCusker: I shall renew them at the first opportunity.

Mr. Charlton: That is your privilege.

Mr. McCusker: I think I am right.

Mr. Charlton: You may think you are; somebody else may think otherwise.

Mr. McCusker: That is what is worrying you.

Mr. Charlton: That is not worrying me one particle.

Mr. McCusker: The uncharted sea.

Mr. Charlton: As I said before, the field tests as carried out were not, as is stated in the committee report, in accordance with the procedure in the United States. Three tests were made previous to February 18; two horses were injected on December 2, one horse was injected on December 12 and one on February 12. Of those four horses, one alone reacted to the test. That in itself should have been sufficient evidence to prove the existence of foot-and-mouth disease. In the case of the one horse which did react, it did not react until five days after the injection was made. I contend that it may not have been the injection that caused the vesicles, it may have been the toothbrush which they used to transfer the material. Almost anything could have happened.

One veterinarian was given the complete responsibility of making the injections and reading the results. I contend that is a dangerous procedure. No matter how good the veterinarian is I do not think he would want to have that responsibility. He would want somebody else along to consult with and to see that the work was done in accordance with the principle that two heads are better than one. However, that was not done. Dr. Childs, in answer to the hon. member for St. John's West, made this answer as reported on page 212:

> Q. And if your message to Dr. Carlson had got through in time these specimens would not have come?
> A. They would not have come, no. I would have been out there making field tests.

On February 18 the veterinary director general did go to Regina and make field tests according to the United States department of agriculture standards, except that they did not use guinea pigs. That actually was not necessary, he did use young animals from outside the area. Injections were made into two each of young cattle, pigs, and horses in the presence of the veterinary director general.

The fact is that those tests did not prove anything. The inoculations on February 18 proved to be a flop. That is further evidence to show how difficult it is to get a complete and accurate diagnosis in the field. The field tests made in the presence of the veterinary director general and according to the United States department of agriculture standards proved absolutely nothing.

There is a wire on the record from Dr. Wells asking for permission to run another test in view of the fact that that one was not satisfactory. The minister took up almost one complete page of the record in questioning Dr. Christie in an attempt to prove to us there in the committee and to the country at large that this had been diagnosed before the complete and final diagnosis had been issued from Hull. He spent considerable time directing questions to Dr. Christie in an effort to bring out the evidence he desired. It is quite justifiable in committee to try to bring out the answers that you want. Here are one or two questions by the Minister of Agriculture that I should like to quote. The passage reads as follows:

Q. In other words, you were convinced that the foot-and-mouth disease was there before either the Americans arrived or before this test was made down in Ottawa?

Dr. Christie's answer was, "yes, sir." Then there is the following:

Mr. Argue: That was after the samples were sent?

Right Hon. Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but before they were tested. And as a matter of fact, the whole diagnosis of the disease was made apart from what the tests tell us.

Is the minister now going to say that the whole method of testing is unnecessary, that they diagnosed the disease without tests, that the disease was diagnosed on the 17th of February when the veterinary director general went out there, before he had heard from the laboratory in Hull and before the inoculations were made on the 18th of February? Is the minister saying that?

Mr. Gardiner: All I have ever said at any time is that the method of diagnosis followed in connection with this case is the same method that is followed in the United States. I do not say that every veterinarian who took part in any of the activities in connection with it did everything that happens to be in a book, but I say the method that was followed in diagnosing the case was the same method that is followed in the United States in connection with all such epidemics. It was eventually shown to be foot-and-mouth disease, but that does not indicate that anyone made any mistakes. Naturally there are mistakes made by persons in dealing with a situation of that kind; but to say that the mistakes were a matter of negligence on the part of the veterinarians is, I think, a wrong interpretation to put on it. You have asked me what I think about it, and the fact is that the method used is the method which the Americans think is the right method. After all, even if it took a month or a month and a half or two months in order to carry it right through to a conclusion—

Mr. Charlton: Three months.

Mr. Gardiner: —the important thing is it has taken that long in the United States on occasion. In fact it has taken longer on some occasions than it took here. The other important fact is that they now say that everything that was done was the proper thing to do, was done in the proper way, and achieved the results they would have got themselves had they been doing it.

Mr. Charlton: Of course the minister can say they say this and they say that or something else, but we have never heard any of the profession from the United States make these statements. The minister tried to stop one of the members of the committee from reading a letter from a veterinarian, and I want to say something about that before I sit down. That was an actual signed letter. The minister would not let it appear on the record, but now he tells us that they say this and they say that.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend objected to a document published by the department in the United States being put in as evidence, which said that very thing.

Mr. Charlton: Was that a document or a letter?

Mr. Gardiner: It was not a letter. It was published by the department in the United States.

Mr. Charlton: No one objected. As a matter of fact we asked that it be put on the record, but the minister did not produce it. We asked that the original be produced, but the minister never produced it. We would have liked to have the original. I have quoted from the United States department of agriculture year book.

Mr. Gardiner: It was lying on the table and was produced, but it was not admitted as evidence. It was objected to as evidence. It was said it was hearsay.

Mr. Charlton: That is an absolute falsehood, because no one would object to an official document.

Mr. Gardiner: If you are going to talk like that you should be more careful.

Mr. Charlton: It was a copy of that document which the minister wanted to place on the record of the committee. As I said, I have read from the United States department of agriculture year book.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not want to place anything on the record. One of the witnesses was reading it and he was stopped because it was hearsay evidence. I had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Rowe: You are putting hearsay on the record now.

Mr. Charlton: I think I will let the people who are really interested be the judges of the whole matter. I do not think the judgment of those on the other side of the house is so important. We will let the people who count judge whether or not this thing has been carried on properly. I pointed out the evidence placed before the committee and the minister now states that these methods are followed in the United States. If the minister wants to stick to that in the light of the paragraph I read from the United States department of agriculture year book it is perfectly all right with me. It is not necessary for me to say anything more if the minister sticks to that. As a matter of fact the minister is stuck with the argument that the disease was diagnosed by his officials in the field on February 17 or 18 without further examination and without further clinical inoculations. The inoculation that was done on the 18th proved nothing. That admission is in the committee report, but the minister wants us to believe now that the diagnosis was made in the field and that the diagnosis made in Hull had nothing whatever to do with it.

Dr. Mitchell had advised the officials of his department on February 18, two days after he received the sample, that he was very suspicious that the disease was not vesicular stomatitis. The minister knows that. A wire could have gone to Regina and somebody else could have taken advantage of it; but to say that the disease was diagnosed in the field at Regina on February 18 without any word at all from Hull is utter nonsense. What was the difference between February 12 and February 18?

I want to say something about the private veterinarian whose name has been mentioned on various occasions. It is very unfortunate that the name of a private veterinarian should have been brought into the committee hearings and the reports of its proceedings if he was not to be given a chance to come to Ottawa and clear his own reputation. I want to make that very plain. It is unfortunate. This matter was brought up by the hon. member for Melfort, and the minister said he had not said anything in the committee detrimental to this veterinarian's reputation. I have the committee report here. I expect the minister also has it, and if he wants to follow me he can turn to page 437 of the committee proceedings where he will find the following:

> Right Hon. Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on both a point of order and a question of privilege: the hon. member is putting evidence on the record from a witness whom this committee refused to call. I do not think that is proper . . . As far as I am concerned, I have no knowledge of it. Respecting the other matter, as to whether he should be called or not, the committee decided not to call him, and I submit that we should not now have a written statement from him put on the record.

It need not have been said in the committee that this witness was not to be called. Why should it be brought up at all if he was not going to be called? That is my attitude. The minister went on to say:

> Reasons were given as to why he should not be called.

That very statement implies that there were reasons why he should not be called. I think it is only fair to that practitioner that the reasons should be given and that he be given a chance to clear his own reputation. It was stated later that he had a disagreement with the association. It is in the committee report. It is not private now. It is open to the public so there is nothing wrong in repeating it again. The minister says he did not say anything detrimental to this man's reputation but here the minister states: "He had a disagreement with the association out there, and I understand he was up before the board of the association and they gave him a talking to as they do in most cases." When the minister says he said nothing in the committee that would be detrimental to his reputation, that is not true, Mr. Chairman. I think this man has been done a great injustice, a very great injustice, and I think it should be corrected in some way.

It was also said in the committee that the chairman was supposed to have contacted the veterinary association with which this veterinarian had had this difference of opinion. I asked the chairman on various occasions whether he had done so or not. I asked him at the first meeting between eleven and one o'clock and finally between four and six o'clock, I believe it was, I did get an answer after a considerable amount of probing.

> The Chairman: No, I did not.
> Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, that is a question that can be answered yes or no. Did you consult the veterinary association, and which association did you consult?
> The Chairman: No, I did not consult them directly.
> Mr. Charlton: You did not consult them directly?
> The Chairman: No.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee did not consult the veterinary association at all; yet it went on the record of that committee that he was supposed to have done so, and it was intimated that he had received some information from that association that would make Dr. Hewitt an unreliable witness before the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another matter I would like to mention. It is that we have had a considerable amount of discussion recently regarding one particular man's accusations against the United States government in relation to germ warfare. It is a subject we do not want to talk about and I realize it is a subject we do not want to think about. We have to face the facts; we have to face realities that concern everyone in this country. I hope there is not, but if there ever is bacteriological warfare in this country, this is the very thing we can expect any day of the week in any part of the country regardless of whether or not it is in a coastal area. Now, for goodness' sake let us make use of those facilities we have. Thank goodness we have them, let us make use of them and not belittle them any more.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is right or proper to let this pass. We have in this country a billion dollar industry, a livestock industry that is one of the greatest in the world. It is an industry that has taken a lot of time, hard work and trouble to get to the position it is in today. In Canada we have 8 million cattle. When you come to consider it, 8 million cattle in this country have to suffer because of the things that have happened in this house during the last three or four months. Three or four members of that committee—one of them more especially, though I do not blame him so much as he is a lawyer and I cannot say he should understand the cattle business—made definite statements, and they knew what harm they were doing to the cattle industry.

Let us take this episode tonight. What has happened? Tomorrow morning or tomorrow at noon the United States press will come out with this story of what has happened here tonight. If a man there is interested in cattle, what will he immediately do? His fears will be aroused at once. He will say: They've still got that disease up in Canada; they are still fighting over it.

Mr. Chairman, I think it has gone beyond all common sense and all reason to think that a member would get up in this house here and discuss this after it has all been talked over in the committee. I am sure if the hon. member has any cattlemen in his district—and by the way he talks he should have lots of them—those cattlemen will surely show him some time in the near future just what they think about his speech here tonight.

An hon. Member: He will not be elected again.

Mr. Ferrie: If there is anything that has done harm to the cattle business it has been this long weary talk about what is going on in the Regina district. In thinking about the diagnosis of these cases out in Regina I want to commend the veterinary department. They gathered seven veterinaries together. Those seven veterinaries went out to the Waas farm and looked it all over. Not one said there was foot-and-mouth disease. Those seven men kept track all the way through.

I will agree that hindsight is always better than foresight, and of course the hon member for Brant-Wentworth has had lots of hindsight. But he did not have much foresight, because if he had the foresight and the ability he says he had he would have flown out there and told them it was foot-and-mouth disease. He did not do that, but he started on a political proposition. He started it in the house, and then he started it in the committee. That is what we have had to put up with. The cattle industry in Canada, a real industry and the second largest in Canada, has had to put up with this kind of nonsense.

If you want to look the situation over what do you find? You find that they have had to kill thousands and thousands of cattle in the old country. They slaughter thousands of them, and you do not see one word about it in the press. All you see is that they have slaughtered cattle. They do not have it in committees, they never have arguments in the house, but we have had one or two men in this house trying to condemn our veterinarians who are doing their best. They have done their best; they say they are satisfied that they have cleaned it up; and they have done what they should have done since the 18th of February. Why can't these hon. members say they did a good job before that and help the industry out?

I say to this house and to the people of Canada that I know quite a lot about livestock; and I say the veterinarians did a thorough job all the way through, a thorough job. In the first place they did not let us down by crying "foot-and-mouth disease!" before they were absolutely sure. In the second place they carried on and they left the disease in such a way that they could handle it. They quarantined all around. They handled it, and they proved that they have handled it. They also proved that they knew their job. I want to say to the member who has just spoken that whether he thinks so or not, and whether he likes it or not, we were very, very fortunate that the disease was in a very weakened condition and that those men did not find it as quickly as they might have found it if it had been stronger. If it had been as strong in the early part of November and December as it was in February they would have found it at first; but let me tell him that we would have still had the cattle we exported at that time. We would have lost the millions and millions of dollars that came from the United States for those cattle. I want to say we should be thankful that it was in that condition. After all, I am sure a lot of the hon. members know that in that part of the country it is the middle of May before the frost goes out of the ground, and quite often it will be June before all the ice goes. It was easy enough to say it was impossible to get that cleaned up. It is only now that they can say they are going at it in order to be sure that it is cleaned right up. They have put stock in there, and they are looking after it. I say in all sincerity and in all seriousness, for the betterment of the livestock industry of Canada, let us forget this thing. Let us leave it to those who know something about it. Let us carry on and help the trade, not hinder it.

Mr. Charlton: Will the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Ferrie: Certainly, go ahead.

Mr. Charlton: What did you mean by the remark that you were very thankful that the disease was not diagnosed at the start?

Mr. Ferrie: I did not say that. I said we should be thankful that it was in such a weak condition that they could not diagnose it.

Mr. Charlton: That statement, Mr. Chairman, should never appear in this record. It will do more harm to the lifting of the embargo than any other statement that was ever made.

Mr. McCusker: I did not intend to speak tonight, but having heard the drivel that has been put forward by the hon. member, the pseudo-veterinarian, I could not keep quiet in my seat.

Mr. Ross (Souris): We should have some medical drivel now.

Mr. McCusker: I know you cannot take it.

Mr. Ross (Souris): We shall sit right here and take it.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has a perfect right to carry forward such brief as he sees fit, but he has no right to refer to the remarks of another member of this house as drivel.

Mr. McCusker: I withdraw the remark and say the most serious remarks coming from the Tory party.

Mr. Drew: Does the hon. member withdraw that remark?

Mr. McCusker: I withdraw the remark and exchange therefor, "the most serious observations coming from the Tory party". I shall say instead, having listened to the most serious observations coming from the Tory party, from the most skilled of veterinarians.

In the early days of this session there was an agreement that in order that they could remunerate the men whose cattle had suffered from this disease, a bill would be put through in short order. The first one who reneged on that agreement was the hon. member for Lake Centre, and he was followed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—

Mr. Casselman: Order.

Mr. McCusker: I am sorry; the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are not in the house. If there are any doubts as to what parties they belong to, I shall correct those. In this election in Saskatchewan, we could not tell which was which. There was an agreement on March 3 that a bill should go through quickly to provide for the remuneration of those farmers whose cattle were suffering from this disease and had to be slaughtered. You will remember that the debate lasted three days, and every effort was made to show how negligent the veterinarians were.

You will remember that at that time—I hate to repeat myself—I told you how difficult it was to diagnose the disease. I think you will all agree today that there are attenuated viruses that cause disease, and it is only after they have passed through a series of animals that they become virulent enough to demonstrate the characteristics of the specific disease so it can be easily diagnosed. It was in that state that we found ourselves in the autumn. My friend the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth at that time read, as he did tonight, from the veterinary books and probably the encyclopedia. I do not know which he was reading from.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I have never quoted from the encyclopedia in this house at any time. Tonight I said—

Mr. McCusker: The hon. member stood up, and he read—

Mr. Charlton: I told the hon. member what I was quoting from tonight. Certainly if he had been listening he would have known it was not the encyclopedia but the United States department of agriculture year book. That is the only book I had here.

Mr. McCusker: Had the hon. member been listening, I said he quoted from the encyclopedia or from a veterinary magazine. I mentioned the two. I gave him his choice.

Mr. Charlton: It was neither one.

Mr. McCusker: He quoted that night and read to us at length about the symptoms of the disease. You will remember that I told him it was dangerous to travel uncharted seas; that he was an armchair veterinarian. Those men who were in Saskatchewan were working with the real problem, and on account of the atypical disease they had to study it carefully before they committed themselves.

Some years ago in Saskatchewan we had vesicular stomatitis, and we were cleared of the disease without denying ourselves outside markets and without any embargo. These men thought that this was the disease we had last year in Saskatchewan, and they pursued the same cautious steps to diagnose it. I know my friend is getting advice from the hon. member from St. John's West who knows all about every disease.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why the hon. member should make a reference to me.

Mr. McCusker: You are advising my friend, are you not? Are you not acting in your judicial capacity?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I can have something to say when you are finished.

Mr. McCusker: We shall let that go by, but my friend at that time got up and he read from—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCusker: Sure, you can ask me any question as long as it is an intelligent one.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think the hon. member for St. John's West raised a proper point of order. If he wishes to ask the member who has the floor a question, he can only do so with the consent of the member.

Some hon. Members: He gave consent.

Mr. McCusker: Certainly he has it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Did you read the report that the Minister of Agriculture had the veterinary department issue in 1937 dealing with vesicular stomatitis, and which was referred to in the committee?

Mr. McCusker: I have only been in this house a short time, but I have lived in western Canada a long time and I know what has taken place there. I know the difference between a disease affecting humans and one affecting cattle, and I know how difficult it is at times to diagnose them. I do not want to reproach you, as I am so sorry for you, but tonight I am going after this scientific man, the veterinarian.

You will remember that the last time you quoted from a learned report—as to how easily you could diagnose this disease according to learned veterinarians, but the practical ones were out in Saskatchewan at that time, assisted by the veterinarians from the United States, attempting to diagnose and control that disease.

I am going to leave you for a minute, and refer to an hon. member who is not here, the member for Lake Centre, the father of the bill of rights who states that no man should be accused or condemned until he has the right to be heard. He condemned and hanged them in this house without ever giving them a fair trial. One of them was so distraught with that treatment that he committed suicide, harassed as he was by the members of parliament who should have been defending him. All that time you have carried on, knowing that you know nothing practical about the disease. All you know is what you have read. You will remember that I told you: "He who studies patients without books travels an uncharted sea; and he who studies books without patients does not go to sea at all." I told you that. You have never been to sea. I called you a jetty admiral. You never denied it.

An hon. Member: Address the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member to address the chair.

Mr. McCusker: Certainly I will address the chair. The chair is much more handsome than anyone I have seen over there across the floor. You will remember when I spoke I said our veterinarians had done everything within their power to diagnose that disease as early as they could. I said that our Department of Agriculture did everything in its power to reimburse these people who had suffered losses from that disease. They have done that well. You will remember the hon. member bringing up the danger about the deer spreading the disease. We discussed that matter. I pointed out at that time that the cattle were in winter feeding lots, that they were not on the pastures and that there was no danger of the deer becoming infected and spreading the disease. I think my observations have been proven correct.

I made another observation then, and I think the hon. member from Ontario should take heed of it. I made an observation then, and I am not claiming any great credit for what happened in Saskatchewan at the last election. But I made an observation then that those who were pursuing this foot-and-mouth disease scandal would be wiped out in Saskatchewan. Here is the great Tory party, with the whole of Saskatchewan to draw from for support, and they obtained less than 9,000 votes.

Mr. Hees: How did you do in Ontario? Let us have an answer to that question. How did Walter Thomson do in Ontario?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCusker: I may tell you right here tonight, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Call Thomson from Ontario.

Mr. McCusker: I know you do not like to hear about this.

Mr. Hees: You do not like to hear about Walter Thomson.

Mr. McCusker: —and you can inform those not-so-handsome gentlemen as yourself that the Liberal party obtained 30,000 more votes in Saskatchewan than they did in the last election. The percentage of improvement was much greater than for the C.C.F.

An hon. Member: What about the picture with regard to yourself?

Mr. McCusker: I was not running.

An hon. Member: Wait until next time.

Mr. McCusker: I am just telling facts. I wish to say that the people of Saskatchewan are fed up with talk of foot-and-mouth disease. The reason I feel free to speak of this matter tonight is that my constituency is surrounded with this foot-and-mouth disease. The Tory members who ran in Saskatchewan lost their deposits and Hamilton saved his by a few hundred votes. That is how popular an issue it is there. We are fed up with this foot-and-mouth disease issue in Saskatchewan, because it affects my constituency and is postponing the day we can ask for the opening of the United States market. I do not know what they are building up here. I do not know what they are trying to do in this house in trying to show where the fault lies. Surely it is difficult to diagnose the disease. I have told you why. You get an attenuated virus that takes months to build up to the point where it gives you the full characteristics of a disease, and you will admit that.

Mr. Charlton: No, I do not.

Mr. McCusker: Then if you do not, you are not a veterinarian.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, Mr Chairman, may I say that I never admitted—

Mr. McCusker: The hon. member may ask all the questions he wishes to ask.

Mr. Charlton: I am not asking questions.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege, as I understand it.

Mr. Charlton: I am rising on a question of privilege. I never made the statement that an attenuated virus could not be diagnosed and the hon. member knows very well that is not true. Maybe he thinks I do not know what I am talking about.

Mr. McCusker: So that the matter will be clear, I made the statement that an attenuated virus may be introduced into an animal and it will not produce typical symptoms of the disease. You get an atypical disease that is difficult to diagnose. It is only after the virus has passed through one, two or three animals that it gains sufficient virulence to produce typical disease symptoms easily diagnosed. I say that was the situation in Saskatchewan, and I blame no veterinarians.

Mr. Charlton: Did you read the reports?

Mr. McCusker: Listen! I have done more than read. I have practised. Mr. Chairman, there were two salient features that surrounded the origination of the disease. Those were the facts that surrounded the introduction of the disease into Saskatchewan. Surely Willi Bruntjen came in from Germany or somewhere. But how can you tell whether Willi Bruntjen brought that disease with him or not?

Mr. Casselman: Why try?

Mr. McCusker: You try. You blame the government for this. We have not had foot-and-mouth disease in this country for a hundred years. We would not suspect it. We had the great big protective belt of the United States on one side. On the other side we had the Atlantic ocean. Can you blame our immigration authorities because they were not inspecting every man's clothes for foot-and-mouth disease? There are a great many diseases that you can inspect them for. However, Willi Bruntjen came into Regina and he went out to the Waas farm. After he left they found this attenuated disease which they diagnosed as vesicular stomatitis. Had they immediately said, "this is foot-and-mouth disease" and had they quarantined the whole country, and then had it turned out later that it was not foot-and-mouth disease, just consider the economic harm that would have been done to our country.

Mr. Hees: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCusker: No. Sit down.

An hon. Member: He is afraid to answer a question.

Mr. Hees: He is just like Walter Thomson.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. McCusker: I do not mind when I am interrupted by an agriculturist, but the hon. member knows no more about agriculture than he does about military matters.

Mr. Hees: Stand up and answer the question if you have any guts.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hees: He is just like Walter Thomson.

Mr. McCusker: These men went about their work in Saskatchewan and diagnosed the disease; and when they finally learned that it was foot-and-mouth disease they went about their work and did the most marvellous job that has ever been done in any country in clearing it up. That disease has been eradicated. What we want to eradicate today is—

An hon. Member: The Tories.

Mr. McCusker: —or what we want to get rid of today is the embargo on our livestock which prevents their going to the United States market. I am asking my hon. friends over on the other side of the chamber how they are helping us—

Mr. Hees: Sit down and you will help the whole thing.

Mr. McCusker: —in removing the embargo when they are getting up here and saying that our veterinarians, our most skilled people in Canada, have bungled. They know in their hearts that they have not bungled. The only men I have heard raise a voice in opposition to what our veterinarians have done is the armchair veterinarian over there on the other side of the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. McCusker.]

Mr. McCusker: Are we to listen to that sort of thing? Are we to allow our markets to be closed? Are our papers to be full of suggestions with regard to bungling when we have done the best job any country has ever done in eradicating a disease like this?

I had not intended to speak tonight, but this matter affects my constituency. I live in Regina. My constituency was surrounded with this foot-and-mouth disease. I told the critics what would happen to them there, and I am going to tell them that if they pursue this course it will happen to them elsewhere.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Riley: Are you a judicial veterinarian?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for St. John's West has the floor.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not a farmer, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —and the majority of the members in this chamber are not farmers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And the hon. member who has just sat down is not a farmer.

An hon. Member: Yes, he is.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I understood he was a doctor.

Mr. Ross (Souris): A farmer of the farmers.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, I should like—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I only just started—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, in this house—

Mr. McCusker: On a question of privilege—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. McCusker: I want to inform the hon. gentleman that I went to Regina in—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McCusker: The hon. gentleman said I was not a farmer. I went west in 1903 to live on a farm, and I still own and run a farm.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have been eating meat, eggs and poultry all my life. That is what we are talking about.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether hon. members of the committee would allow the hon. member for St. John's West to proceed with his speech on agriculture.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Now, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: He has pin feathers.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I presume that remark is helpful. I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, in the first place that we are here in this house as legislators; and every hon. member, whether he is a fisherman, a farmer, a doctor or a lawyer, has an equal right here in passing legislation. If a lawyer sits on a committee dealing with agriculture, fisheries or finance he has as much right there as any expert.

Mr. McCusker: He has not as much knowledge.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should think he should be judged by the intelligence he displays in dealing with the subject under discussion. The hon. gentleman who has preceded me is a doctor. I believe he is a distinguished doctor. He happens to be a distinguished parliamentary assistant to the lawyer who is head of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I should like to have the hon. member's opinion of his chief, who is a lawyer in charge of the health and welfare of this country. But, sir—

Mr. McCusker: The best minister of health I ever worked under.

Mr. Casselman: And the only one, too.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman is a medical man, and I take it that it is his duty to keep up with modern research in medicine. I am quite sure he is aware of all that has happened since the time of Jenner and Pasteur.

Mr. MacKenzie: Oh, dear!

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes; these gentlemen discovered—

Mr. McCusker: Gone far beyond that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —what bacteria and germs do. I am sure that if he was treating a patient in Regina, one of his constituent's children, and he noticed something yellow or whitish in the mouth, he would suspect diphtheria or typhoid and would say: "I will take a swab and send it to the laboratory and have it tested immediately".

Mr. McCusker: May I inform the hon. gentleman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. McCusker: On a question of privilege, when the hon. member is classifying me, his classification is much too low. I am an eye specialist.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Although the hon. gentleman is an eye specialist, I am sure that he has had sufficient scientific training to know that today doctors take advantage of all the discoveries of science, and veterinarians should do the same. It is idle for the members on the other side of the house to pretend that we can go to the expense of keeping a laboratory over in Hull for the special purpose of analysing and diagnosing diseases of cattle and not use it, as happened between the 1st of December and February 16 when, contrary to the wishes of the veterinary director general and without his knowledge, the specimens were sent to that laboratory, and only in that way was the disease detected to be foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: No; sit down.

Mr. Riley: He lets you ask questions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The right hon. Minister of Agriculture told us in the committee of his experience in 1937. He said: In 1937 I was new to the department. They came to me and said: Look, we have got a disease out there, a contagious disease. It is better not to say anything about it. Keep it quiet. No one will ever know until we publish the report in about a year's time.

An hon. Member: Open the book.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have the book here. And that was done. Nothing was said about it. Nobody knew anything about it. It was kept a secret between the head of the department and his officials.

Mr. Riley: Let us see how well you can read.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): But at the end of the year when the report was made here is what we find:

Vesicular stomatitis of horses and cattle—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): At page 67.

Mr. McCusker: British encyclopedia.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. gentleman is not fair to himself tonight. He is not displaying the intelligence for which I gave him credit previously.

Mr. Ferrie: You are not, either.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am sure that I have not that credit with the hon. member who has interrupted. This is the annual departmental report of the Department of Agriculture for 1937. At page 67 this is what we find:

Vesicular stomatitis of horses and cattle appeared in epizootic form coincidentally with equine encephalomyelitis. The occurrence of this disease causes alarm as its clinical symptoms closely resemble those of foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. Riley: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCusker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the members of the committee to co-operate in allowing the hon. member for St. John's West to complete his speech.

Mr. McCusker: I asked his permission to ask a question.

An hon. Member: Sit down, you jumping bean, you.

Mr. McCusker: What is an epizootic form?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not suppose you want me to read it all over again.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Go ahead.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I continue: "The virus"—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Start right at the beginning.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to point out to the members on the other side of the house that this is not a laughing matter; it is a very serious matter, as an hon. gentleman to my right points out, involving a billion dollar industry. I do not think it should be treated with ridicule. I am not treating it with ridicule.

Mr. Riley: It is not the subject that is being treated with ridicule.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member for Saint John-Albert can speak after I have finished, if he wishes to.

Mr. Riley: Thank you.

Mr. Mutch: Why don't you pick up your marbles and go home?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I know hon. members do not want to hear this.

Mr. McCusker: Tell us what it means.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I wish I could have silence while I read this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCusker: The hon. member wants to read it in silence. Pray allow him to.

The Deputy Chairman: I must again ask hon. members of the committee to co-operate with me in maintaining the decorum of the committee.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It continues:

The virus was obtained in specimens taken from affected animals by the chief pathologist and brought to the institute, where the disease was experimentally reproduced and the properties of the virus studied.

What I am pointing out is that the veterinary director general, with the approval of his chief, said that you could not bring in specimens of this disease and should not send them in because it was too dangerous; and here in 1937 the minister is saying that the very procedure was followed. I wish hon. members would listen to me seriously. This is a subject that should be above party politics. I suggest that in the future there should be an immediate departmental inquiry into a disease of this kind, and advantage should be taken of all the facilities in the institute to determine as quickly as possible just what is the disease.

There is one other thing I should like to say before I sit down. If the Minister of Agriculture is not going to carry out the law he should have it amended, because the law says that when a contagious or infectious disease is discovered in cattle it must be reported immediately to the minister. There is a penalty on everyone; there is a penalty on the owner of the cattle and everyone else in the country who knows of the disease and does not report it. The minister said, "We do not speak of foot-and-mouth disease." He seemed to put the seal of his approval upon the conduct of everyone who had broken the law. If he does not think it wise that—

Mr. McCusker: On a question of privilege. The hon. member for St. John's West has suggested that the people of my constituency consciously broke the law. I wish that remark withdrawn.

An hon. Member: He never said that.

The Deputy Chairman: As I understand it, the remark made by the hon. member for St. John's West was not about any member of parliament and therefore I do not think I can ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. McCusker: It was a remark against my constituents whom I have the privilege to represent. A member of parliament has no right to accuse the citizens of this country of wilfully breaking the law. If he wishes to get up and say that the citizens of Regina wilfully broke the law—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As I apprehend it, questions of privilege that may be raised are questions affecting members of this house. I do not think the hon. member for St. John's West has violated any privilege.

Mr. McCusker: I want to be corrected on this. Have I not the right to defend my constituents when a member from Newfoundland says they are breaking the law?

The Deputy Chairman: I think the question of privilege has been disposed of.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member knows I am not reflecting upon the character of his constituents. His constituents whose cattle were affected by this disease reported it to the federal officials or to the doctors in the neighbourhood. It was their duty to report it, and they did report it.

I should like to point out that in answer to a question put by me at one of the earlier meetings of the committee the deputy minister admitted that he had not informed the minister until February 18, I think it was. The minister can correct me if I am wrong. The veterinary director general did not do anything about reporting it to the minister. A contagious and dangerous disease was in existence without the knowledge of the minister during the months of November, December, January and up until February 15 or February 18. It seems fantastic to me that when a disease of this sort was detected it should not be reported immediately to the minister.

I confess that I am no farmer, as I said in the beginning, but I did do some research on the law relating to this subject. I looked up the original act, and it was the intention of the legislature that the minister should be informed right away. It was a matter of high policy as to how the disease should be dealt with. It should not be left to any minor official in the Department of Agriculture.

It was brought out in evidence that the veterinary director general maintained that he did the right thing in not reporting this and not having a diagnosis made in Hull. And the minister says, "We do not talk of foot-and-mouth disease; we do not mention it." Yet the fact is that in every report of the veterinary director general, and I looked at them for several years back, he is always reminding the veterinary doctors in the country to be on the watch for foot-and-mouth disease because there is nothing so dangerous for cattle.

In the face of that evidence it seems to me there is something to be said against the officials of the department. They did not take advantage of the facilities that were at their disposal; and indeed they may be considered to be negligent, as the opposition contended in the minority report.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

SECOND AND FINAL REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I have permission to revert to routine proceedings so I may table the second and final report of the standing committee on public accounts?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Picard: I table the second and final report of the standing committee on public accounts.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): If I may be permitted to revert to motions, I should like to table the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the year 1951-52, in English and in French.

Mr. Fleming: Will copies be available to hon. members before the estimates of the minister's department will be up for consideration?

Mr. McCann: They are all ready in the distribution office.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up Bill No. 391, to amend the Eastern Rocky Mountain Forest Conservation Act. I think we can finish with that bill as it is not very long. Then we will give first reading to the bill to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. If the house is in the mood later in the day probably with unanimous consent we could give that bill second reading. We would then consider the estimates of agriculture with the hope of concluding them at an early hour.

An hon. Member: What day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then we shall take up the estimates of post office, national revenue, legislation, citizenship and immigration, finance and a few other items remaining. If we finish those we will get through tomorrow night.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 27, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house will permit me to present the first report of the committee which was appointed to consider the procedure of the house. I might say that the committee has come to an agreement on a recommendation to be made to the house with respect to the hours of sitting. The recommendation is that the hours of sitting should be from 2.30 to six o'clock in the afternoon and from eight to ten at night, from Monday to Friday inclusive, with the usual recess on Wednesday nights.

It is also recommended that the hour for private and public bills should be from five to six o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays. In making these two recommendations it is suggested that the standing orders be changed to that effect. There is a further recommendation, and in this case it is not suggested that the standing order should be changed, that if the debate on the speech from the throne is not concluded after approximately the end of the first week of the session, the house should consider having morning sittings until the debate on the speech from the throne is finished.

I should also say that the committee has not given up hope entirely of reaching agreement on other matters which it has considered, and accordingly the committee recommends that it be reappointed at the next session. Under the circumstances probably it will not be necessary for me to read the report.

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

PRIVILEGE, MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): In my absence last night the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) made the following statement at page 3815 of Hansard. After a few general references that indicate his vested interest in his own insignificance, he went on to say this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCusker: Question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He went on to say this—

Mr. McCusker: Question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member state his question of privilege?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the early days of this—

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Speaker, these remarks are insulting and unparliamentary—

Mr. Speaker: The statement made by the hon. member for Lake Centre with regard to the insignificance of the hon. member is objectionable to him.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I submit that there is nothing—

Some hon. Members: Boo.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I submit there is nothing to withdraw in that connection.

Mr. Gardiner: He can at least get elected in his home constituency.

Mr. Drew: Foot-and-mouth disease is spreading, apparently.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I put it this way: I think the remark was not complimentary and I think the hon. member should withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should not have prefaced my statement with that remark.

Mr. Speaker: Then the hon. member should go further and withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I always uphold your rulings—

Some hon. Members: Just withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the hon. member has withdrawn?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should substitute—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I could not hear but I take it that the hon. member has withdrawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many times do I have to say so?—I would like to know. If my hon. friends make so much noise that Your Honour cannot hear—

An hon. Member: You did not withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am in agreement with the hon. member for Lake Centre in that I could not hear. Whether the remark was withdrawn I do not know because there was so much noise in the chamber, but I understand him to say that he has withdrawn the remark.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am going to be asking for withdrawal in a moment, Mr. Speaker. In my absence—and I trust that my hon. friend for Regina City will not think that is unparliamentary—he made this statement:

> In the early days of this session there was an agreement that in order that they could remunerate the men whose cattle had suffered from this disease, a bill would be put through in short order. The first one who reneged on that agreement was the hon. Mr. Diefenbaker, and he was followed by the hon. Mr. Coldwell—

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the withdrawal of that statement. There was never any agreement directly or indirectly brought to my knowledge, known by me at any time, and I am asking for a withdrawal of that statement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina City must accept the statement.

Mr. Green: And withdraw.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the statement I made last night is that had I had Hansard I would have read it. It is in effect what was said on page 32 of the proceedings on Monday, March 3. I would ask my friend to get that and read it, and if he still feels—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina City must accept the statement of the hon. member for Lake Centre in connection with a matter which is peculiarly within his own knowledge.

Mr. McCusker: I will accept your ruling.

Mr. Gardiner: Might I say a word?

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Gardiner: There is part of it that should be withdrawn and I intend to point that out.

Mr. Fleming: Let it be withdrawn.

Mr. Gardiner: The actual arrangement which was entered into is contained in Hansard of Monday, the 3rd of March, and the only part incorrectly stated by the member for Regina City is that he included the member for Rosetown-Biggar. The member for Rosetown-Biggar did carry out—

An hon. Member: That was not the only mistake.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Gardiner: The member for Rosetown-Biggar did carry out the undertaking.

Mr. Drew: Now that we have entered a new field I want to say most emphatically that no undertaking that was given on behalf of this party was broken. The only undertakings that have been broken have been broken by the minister himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: If he proposes to introduce this subject now I ask him to state emphatically what the undertaking was that he claims was made and what breach occurred—because I say most emphatically that there was no breach.

An hon. Member: What about family allowances in Quebec?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I tell the Minister of Agriculture that on no occasion did I ever seek to delay or to do any other thing—

Mr. Gardiner: That is what I said.

Mr. Coldwell: The member for Regina City is going on his imagination and putting his interpretation on what was done. That is quite unwarranted and quite unfair. I did not intend to say anything further about the foot-and-mouth disease business but if the minister wants me to give my opinion of it I will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: Apparently the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not understand what I said a few minutes ago. I stated that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Regina City last night, to the effect that the member for Rosetown-Biggar had not lived up to the undertaking that he had given, was incorrect.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister had his face turned the other way, and amid the noise I am sorry I did not just catch what he said.

Mr. Gardiner: I said it was incorrect. I think in fairness to everybody, I should read again what was said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Gardiner: I am speaking on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I can hardly hear two questions of privilege at the same time. I do not know how far the house desires to proceed with this matter at the present time. If the house wishes to go further in consideration of this matter, I shall hear it.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not necessary to give further consideration now. We can deal with it in the appropriate place when we get back into committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am asking for withdrawal. I had no knowledge of any agreement, and I make the statement that there was no agreement that directly or indirectly concerned me. I am asking that you apply the rules and have the member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) withdraw now.

Mr. Abbott: He withdrew five minutes ago.

Mr. Gardiner: Now, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be a difference of opinion in the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: —as to whether there was or was not an agreement. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) states that there was an agreement. The member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the opposition state that there was no such agreement. Last night the member for Regina City did make a statement. I shall not repeat what was said, but he applied his remarks particularly to the hon. member for Lake Centre. The hon. member for Lake Centre says that no such agreement was brought to his attention. Whether or not there was an agreement I am at a loss to determine. There must always be two parties to an agreement. I think under the circumstances the hon. member for Regina City should at this time accept the word of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Abbott: He did.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Speaker, I have already said that I accepted that. While I am on my feet, I want to apologize to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), if I wrongly included him in my remarks.

Mr. Coldwell: I regret that, owing to the noise in the house, I did not hear the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It will be just as well if this matter is disposed of correctly. The hon. member for Regina City was insistent that the member for Lake Centre withdraw in formal terms. When I was sitting next to him, I heard him say that he did, but there was so much noise that Your Honour probably could not hear that. The hon. member for Lake Centre is asking for withdrawal in regard to a statement you have said should be withdrawn, and the hon. member for Regina City has simply said he accepts the statement of the member for Lake Centre. I submit that he must say "I withdraw", and that the matter should be disposed of in that way.

Mr. Speaker: I think that it is entirely a question of accepting the statement. I do not think it is customary to ask the member to withdraw as that follows automatically. However, there seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether or not there was an agreement. It may turn out, according to some hon. members, that there was an agreement. The hon. member for Regina City has stated that if he has said what was incorrect, at least I understood him to say so, he apologized.

Mr. McCusker: If what I said was incorrect, but I do not admit it was.

Mr. Speaker: Am I correct in saying that the hon. member for Regina City accepts the statement of the hon. member for Lake Centre?

Mr. McCusker: I said that.

Mr. Speaker: Is there anything more needed?

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Last night before adjournment of the house I did suggest that, if the house were in the proper mood, today we would ask leave to have unanimous consent to have the second reading of this bill. Since the house opened this morning, I have not been able to judge if it is in the proper mood. I would suggest that later today we take it up.

Mr. Drew: In view of the noise, I was not able to hear exactly what was said at the beginning of the minister's remarks. Did he suggest taking up the first reading later this day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have had that.

Mr. Drew: What did he suggest?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We would need unanimous consent to move the second reading of this bill. I do not think this is the right time to come to an agreement so I would suggest we pass the two other bills on the order paper which were announced last night. After that, I would ask the members of the house to see if they could give us unanimous consent to the second reading of this bill because it will be sent back to the committee immediately. The bill does not contain the schedules, and I think we have all agreed on what is contained in this bill—at least, that is my impression.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I must dispose of this bill entitled "An act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons." Is it agreed that the bill might be read a second time later this day?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. Since the proposal has been made I think perhaps this would be a good time to make a suggestion which I hope will greatly facilitate the business of this house which, perhaps, has not proceeded with its customary speed so far this morning. Since this suggestion is now before the house and since there is another resolution which indicates the possibility that it is not intended that this session end by way of prorogation, I am suggesting that the government consider introducing another bill which would set up a commission to carry out redistribution which then could be dealt with when this house reconvenes. I put that suggestion forward in all seriousness because I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it would not be possible to consider second reading today of a bill dealing with boundaries that are not even yet before members of this house at this time in today's proceedings.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, may I just point out, in answer to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), that the bill that we are now discussing has nothing to do with boundaries. This was explained in detail to the committee on this matter the day before yesterday. Without wanting in any way to ruffle the good temper of the house at the moment, I should say that I understood that I had the authority or the consent of all members of that committee to introduce the bill at that time. The bill will go from this house to the special committee, there to be amended in accordance with whatever decisions are reached by the special committee. With respect, may I say that I do not think there is anything contentious in the bill as it stands at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the bill may be read a second time later this day?

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Drew: I do not understand the wording "may be read a second time",—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May be called for second reading.

Mr. Drew: —because that could be interpreted as acceptance of second reading of the bill,—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: —which I assure you is not the case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: May I say a word on this matter? In doing so I confess that I will repeat what I said the other day when this question was under consideration, but perhaps it should be said again now. It was understood in the special committee on redistribution a few days ago that this bill would be introduced so that, after second reading, it could be referred to the committee which is considering a schedule. That consent for the introduction of the bill had two conditions attached to it. One was that the schedule would not be part of the bill. The other was that consent to the introduction of the bill would not prejudice our right to debate the bill on second reading.

As I understand it, all that is being asked for now is that it be agreed that later this day a motion for second reading would be made, on the distinct understanding that we are within our rights to debate that motion, if we so choose at that time. I think that was the unanimous understanding in the special committee on redistribution.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed then that the bill be read a second time later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: May be called for second reading later this day.

Mr. Knowles: That is right.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to extend consent at this time with regard to the question of second reading. I think the minister who raised this subject perhaps made a wise suggestion, namely that we give appropriate consideration to the subject at some later time this day because it must be by consent in any event.

Mr. Mutch: That is all we are asking for.

Mr. Abbott: That is all that is being asked for here.

Mr. Speaker: If the motion is that the bill should be read the second time at the next sitting of the house, I suppose it could be read a second time, by unanimous consent, at the present sitting.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: I think all hon. members would like to leave the matter so that if it is agreeable to have the bill read a second time this day, it could be done.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think I should explain what I have in mind. The committees are still meeting in connection with certain details associated with this bill. What is done on second reading will, of necessity, perhaps be governed to some extent by the discussions in that committee. I do not think that this is an appropriate time to ask the house to decide whether, by unanimous consent, this bill should or should not be proceeded with for second reading. I do not intend further to press the other suggestion I have made, but I put it forward in all seriousness in the hope that we might expedite the proceedings generally.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances the order will be for second reading at the next sitting.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The right procedure should be "at the next sitting". I suggest that later this day we might meet members of the opposition and see whether we can come to some understanding. I would not want this decision to be absolutely final, because we are always open to conviction when good reasons are brought forward.

Mr. Murphy: Except on redistribution.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no other suggestions from hon. members I will have to say that the order is for second reading at the—

Mr. Abbott: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

MOTION FOR WITHDRAWAL OF BILL NO. 8

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In view of the fact that the house has before it this bill which has now been introduced, and which has been ordered for second reading, I would ask leave to revert to motions and move that Bill No. 8 which is on the order paper, be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL NOVEMBER 20, 1952, ON COMPLETION OF CURRENT BUSINESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on completion of its current business after returning from attending on the giving of Royal Assent in the Senate to the bills which will have been passed, this house stand adjourned until 20th November, 1952, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reasons for this motion I think will be obvious to all hon. members. The international situation has not worsened but it has reached a stage where it is possible that momentous decisions might have to be taken at an early date or when there might be important developments with regard to which it would be convenient to have parliament available. I do not foresee that such a situation is apt to arise but it is a possibility at this time, and I think it would be prudent to have parliament in being so that it could be called by Your Honour if it should happen that there are important developments which require immediate consideration by parliament.

I should not like the public to get the impression, from the fact that there is to be an adjournment, that members of parliament consider the situation to be graver than it really is. I think the public will understand that there have been some important developments in quite recent days and that there might be other important developments of such a character as to warrant their early consideration by parliament. In that event it would be convenient to have the situation such that Your Honour could give the proper notice and have parliament assembled.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must confess some measure of surprise at the explanation which has been given. I had not previously heard any explanation for this motion that is now before us. It has not been discussed with me nor has there been any intimation of any reason for an adjournment of parliament rather than the customary prorogation. The Prime Minister places the reason for an adjournment of this kind entirely upon the international situation. I am not aware of any events that have occurred within recent days or weeks which suggest any change in the international situation which would indicate any reason for this house to be continuing its session. I have indicated, as have other members of this party, our objection to these adjourned sessions and second sessions in the same year instead of prorogation in the ordinary way.

I would add another reason why I do not see any necessity for this motion. The house can be brought together no more quickly when it is adjourned under a motion of this kind than it could be brought together if it were prorogued and then called together in a special session. If there is in fact no definite purpose in adjourning this house until November 20, then we should prorogue in the ordinary way. If there is some reason other than that indicated, then that reason should be given to us. There may be other reasons which would suggest the desirability of an adjournment instead of prorogation. I submit, however, that at any time when the world situation suggested the desirability of bringing this house together, the time within which the house could be called together would be precisely the same, whether we adjourn or prorogue.

If we have prorogued, then it is only a question of ascertaining the length of time within which hon. members, with the means of communication available to them, can come here to Ottawa. I had expected that some other explanation would be given than that which has been placed before us. The Prime Minister has been careful to say that he would not wish the public to take any alarm from the fact that he is making the suggestion that the world situation calls for an adjournment rather than a prorogation. But, Mr. Speaker, when that is the only explanation before us it is difficult to escape the suggestion that there is an intention to keep alive a sense of continuing emergency which would support the government's very clearly expressed desire to act in a great many cases under emergency legislation when they could do it very much better through legislation adopted by this house.

Either some more positive reason not yet disclosed to us should be given to us, or I submit we should prorogue in the ordinary way. The practice that has developed of adjournments for indefinite periods to indefinite dates is not a practice which we should continue at this time without something more definite than has been placed before us.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I am going to support the motion of the Prime Minister, because I believe that it is a wise provision for the house to make at this time. During the war years, and in times of emergency it has been customary to adjourn rather than prorogue. And while I agree with the Prime Minister that the public should not take any undue alarm at this time regarding the international situation, the recent unilateral decision of the United States to bomb the power plants on the Yalu river has I think in the minds of everyone made it obvious that there is a grave possibility in regard to it. And then of course we have the difficulties in Europe and particularly what has happened in connection with the Swedish planes quite recently. I think under the circumstances it is a wise provision.

Moreover, it meets the objection that has been raised from time to time by hon. members of this house, the leader of the opposition, and indeed myself last year, that the calling of special sessions twice in a year means the payment of an additional indemnity. This avoids that completely. If it is necessary to call the house together, we are called together as an adjourned house. The other reason that I have in mind for supporting this is that after all in an emergency we want to meet and do business quickly. If we prorogue, then a new session is called. There are certain formalities, the official opening of the house, the debate on the speech from the throne, and so on. In my opinion, in the present circumstances, the motion to adjourn rather than to prorogue is the proper one to make at this time, and I am supporting it.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I personally would much have preferred to see prorogation, but enough has been said in the debate to convince me that I should support the Prime Minister's resolution. I think the Prime Minister must have had in his mind just the things that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has mentioned and in the circumstances I cannot feel that it is wise to do anything else than what is provided for in the resolution.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): The leader of the opposition, in my submission, has effectively answered the point raised by the Prime Minister. But it seems to me there is one further point which calls for a clear expression on the part of the Prime Minister.

This motion proposes that the house stand adjourned until November 20 next, unless called to meet earlier under the circumstances indicated. How did this date in November come to be chosen? Is it not very much preferable, even if there has to be an adjournment instead of prorogation, that adjournment should be to a date in January reasonably approaching the normal meeting time of parliament?

I think the Prime Minister must be aware, after the experience that the present parliament has had with fall sessions in 1949, 1950 and 1951, of the effect that these additional sessions, or being summoned to Ottawa in the fall, have had on a great many members. It means a very disturbing effect on most, both in their callings and in their family life, and it means additional expense for the country. I can understand the Prime Minister having said what he did say with reference to a motion that would propose that the house stand adjourned until some day in January, but why should the date to be selected be in November, which means bringing members down here presumably and then sending them home for the Christmas recess, only to bring them back in January? I am sure the Prime Minister is not unmindful of the effect that this has on all members of the house in all parties, and in fairness to the private members I would urge that this matter should have more consideration than is possible at the moment, and that the Prime Minister be asked to give very serious consideration to advancing this date from November till January. That will not subtract anything from the right of the Speaker, in consultation with the government, to call the house together at any time if emergent conditions warrant it, but I think it would be a useful contribution towards some attempt at restoration of normalcy in connection with the commencement of sessions of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. St. Laurent: I wish to assure the leader of the opposition that if it had been possible for me to see him when this question arose I would have been very happy to do so and to discuss it with him; but it so happened that the hon. gentleman had engagements elsewhere, which made it impossible for me to see him during the last two or three days.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. St. Laurent: There was no discourtesy intended.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I know perfectly well that the Prime Minister has no thought of misinterpreting the situation, but I would explain to him that I was in the house here yesterday very shortly after three, and I was in the building during that time. I was away for the previous day, that was all. I only want to place that on record.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sorry. I did not know the hon. member was here yesterday afternoon. I wish to assure him that no discourtesy was intended when the question arose. I can also assure the hon. member for Eglinton that the considerations he has mentioned were carefully gone over, and the reason this date was selected was that it was felt it would be proper to open a new session on November 20, and have the address on the speech from the throne and the preliminaries completed so that immediately after the New Year the regular course of the normal business of the house could be proceeded with in an attempt to have parliament prorogue by the end of April or early in May because of the fact that many members of parliament will be making plans to attend the coronation of our sovereign on June 2. It was felt that it would be of some value to have an experiment made of that kind of arrangement; because I am sure that if it were possible to handle efficiently the business of parliament in such a way as to adjourn early in the summer season, that would be a great convenience to most members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not have ventured to make that suggestion under ordinary normal conditions. But I did feel that in view of the fact that the coronation is set for June 2, 1953, it would be understood that that was a special reason for having this schedule in mind, and that the experience of hon. members with that schedule might bring about something of the order of what His Honour the Speaker was able to announce to us with respect to the hours of sitting, and would make for greater convenience for a greater number of members of parliament.

I hope that in future it will not be necessary to have two sessions of parliament in any one year, but that the public business might be so arranged and so dealt with as to make it not inconvenient to allow those hon. members who are agriculturists to give some attention in the spring to work which is of interest not only to them but also to the nation—the work of getting the agricultural industry into proper operating condition. I know that they are disposed to sacrifice their own personal interests to serve those of the Canadian people, by whom they have been elected to the house. But if the business of the house can be arranged in such a way as to coincide with the prosecution of their professional occupation of producing for the rest of us what we require for our subsistence, then I think that would be a desirable solution.

Then, the hon. member has inquired if there are other reasons. There are no other reasons; but there have been indications of the possibility of important developments which may not take place, but which are possible. The Korean war has been going on for two years, and negotiations for an armistice have been going on for one year. Recently there have been quite substantial changes in the attitude of those who are engaged in the negotiations. If they are brought to a successful conclusion and result in an armistice, then I think all of us will be very happy at that result. But if they do not—and they do not look as though they are going to go on much longer with no tangible results—that might bring about an activation in other forms, and might require to be dealt with by parliament.

I trust everything can be arranged in such a manner that it will not be improper for the government to take whatever responsibility may have to be taken. But the government is considerate of the rights of parliament, and recognizes that to have the support of the public generally there must be a feeling in the public that it is not only a few men here in Ottawa who are making these important decisions. For that reason we felt that it would be desirable, as it was felt desirable during the war and at times since the war, to keep parliament in existence, and not to have to resort to special, additional sessions.

It is for that reason the motion was suggested. It was so suggested because of the feeling that it might then be possible satisfactorily to dispose of public business and have parliament adjourn or prorogue in May, so that those members of parliament who will be attending the coronation need not feel that they are neglecting the work which should be done here at home.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has given another explanation when he makes reference to the coronation. I think I ought to place on record, in view of what I have already said, that I have objected strenuously to second sessions. What the Prime Minister has now said is that it would be the expectation of the government to begin a new session immediately after the period of adjournment, and then to proceed with that session, except over the Christmas and New Year season, for the purpose of earlier prorogation next year.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fleming: On division.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GRANTING OF VISAS TO VITALIS PANTENBURG AND WIFE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) yesterday asked the following question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson):

I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have the German scientist, Vitalis Pantenburg, and his Russian-born wife been granted a visa to enter Canada and to travel through Labrador, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has asked me to answer by stating that Vitalis Pantenburg and his wife were granted courtesy visas for entry to Canada by the Canadian embassy in Bonn, Germany, following their recommendation by the German foreign office.

These visas facilitate entry into Canada but do not, of course, in themselves authorize travel to areas which may be restricted.

Canadian representatives abroad are anxious where possible to facilitate the admission to this country of foreign publicists of recognized standing in their own country who will interpret Canada to their fellow countrymen and help spread knowledge and understanding of this country among them.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INSURANCE BOOKS FOR STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson) asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) whether it is compulsory for students to have unemployment insurance books, and if not, what is the procedure?

The answer is that a full-time enrolled student of a day school, college or university is not insurable while he is employed (a) in temporary employment during the period from December 13 to December 31, both dates inclusive, in any year; (b) part-time employment not exceeding 24 hours a week in the aggregate.

A student, therefore, who works after school hours or on Saturdays, so that the total number of hours worked does not exceed 24 in a week, as a general rule is not insurable. Such student is insurable if he takes full-time employment—for example during summer vacation. However if his only employment then is in a seasonal industry, for example a summer hotel, he may apply for a voluntary exemption.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

QUESTION AS TO REPEAL—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF PUBLIC WELFARE OF ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I directed a question to him on Tuesday to which he responded that the government had made proposals to the provinces with regard to the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act in view of the adoption of the new act. In his reply he stated that the government had made certain proposals with regard to the repeal of that act but that only two provinces had indicated their support of the proposals. Since that time there has been a statement by the minister of public welfare of Ontario as to the desire of that province to have the act repealed because of its effect on collection from the estates of pensioners. I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he has any supplementary statement to make because the statement of the minister of public welfare of Ontario is one which not only affects Ontario but affects the general statement made by the minister as to the proposals put before the provincial governments.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I can very well understand my hon. friend's desire to ask a second question in view of the statement made by the minister of public welfare for the province of Ontario which appears in the Globe and Mail of the day before yesterday. I can only say that what I said the other day does represent the situation as it is. On June 12 as a matter of fact our department communicated with the department of public welfare for the province of Ontario. In that letter it was pointed out that section 13 of the Old Age Security Act provides that the Old Age Pensions Act is repealed on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

The letter went on to say—and I am now giving its substance—that the Department of National Health and Welfare would appreciate it if the department of public welfare for the province of Ontario would let us know as soon as possible whether or not they have dealt with all outstanding cases under the Old Age Pensions Act. The letter concludes by saying that we would appreciate being advised whether or not the province of Ontario would be in favour of having the Old Age Pensions Act repealed within the next several weeks. No reply has been received in answer to that communication.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin: May I say one thing further in fairness to the minister of public welfare for the province of Ontario? He is quoted as having said that he told me in a conversation some time ago that he would like to have the act repealed. It is true that he did telephone me. I think that was in March. Since that time, as this is an act that depends for its operation on the provinces, who have to pay 25 per cent of the cost, we had no alternative under the law but to communicate with the provinces. We did communicate with the province of Ontario on June 12 and we have had no reply to date.

Mr. Drew: I was interested in the wording employed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He said "I asked" and then corrected it. Did the minister himself write the letter to the minister in Ontario? If not, from whom was the comunication directed and to whom?

Mr. Martin: The letter was written by the director of old age assistance for the Department of National Health and Welfare to his opposite number in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Drew: I take it this subject has not been opened between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the minister of public welfare of Ontario.

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend knows, the old age pensions board is made up of the senior officials who have to do with the administration of this matter, and it is the custom for communications of this kind to go between these persons. All I can say is that we have had no reply. It may be that my hon. friend's question and my reply will have the effect of bringing about what the federal government would like to see brought about.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to extend this discussion but there is an important consideration in connection with this matter that I think should be made clear. If it is intended to have the acceptance of provincial governments to proposals made by the dominion government, then it would seem to me that communications should go from the minister to the ministers of the governments in the provinces concerned.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: I simply close with this question. Do I take it from what the minister has said that no communication has gone from the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the governments of the provinces with regard to this subject?

Mr. Martin: I would not want to say that no communication has gone from me in the matter. I generally try to cover everything myself, and I would not want to say that in this instance I had not written to the provincial ministers concerned at some date earlier in the present year. I do not know, but I will check.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 392, to provide retiring allowances, on a contributory basis, for persons who have served as members of the House of Commons of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the resolution adopted by the house that when the current business is completed the house shall stand adjourned to the 20th of November, it is evident that this bill, if passed here and in the other place, will receive the royal assent before prorogation of this session. That being so, I have considered the terms of the section which provides for compulsory contributions, and it might be quite embarrassing to determine in a broken period just how the terms providing for compulsory contribution would apply. Would they apply only to the portion of the indemnity proportionate to the period that elapsed after assent to the bill or would they apply to the indemnity for the whole session, although portions of that indemnity have been so far paid in full at a per diem amount according to the statute?

The bill also provides that present members of parliament can elect to include any session during which they were in parliament before the coming into force of the act as the subject of their contribution to their special part of this fund. Therefore I felt it might be desirable at this time to have a clause added to the bill to the effect that it will come into force on the first day of the next ensuing session of parliament. I should like to have the house consider whether they would not want that done instead of having uncertainty as to what the contribution would be for the broken part of this session. Anyone who wanted to have the whole of his indemnity for this session included could exercise his option to do so, and I would therefore ask my colleague who usually leads the house to move:

That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto the following section:

"19. This act shall come into force on the date of the opening of the session of parliament next ensuing after the date of the royal assent thereto."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Amendment agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: The amendment which has been referred to the committee is to add a section 19 to the bill reading as follows:

19. This act shall come into force on the date of the opening of the session of parliament next ensuing after the date of the royal assent thereto.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Before the amendment carries, may I be permitted to ask the Prime Minister if any consideration has been given to the point raised by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay about the participation of former members of parliament in Newfoundland, former members of the commission of government of Newfoundland, in this scheme? As this is a new scheme the finances for which will come from present current taxation to which Newfoundland contributes as much as any other part of Canada, it seems to me only fair and just that some consideration should be given.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, consideration was given to the suggestion; and there have been other suggestions as well that have come from other interests that would be affected. It was felt that in view of the procedure that had been followed the government would have the bill as reported by the banking and commerce committee placed before the house for adoption. The bill provides that every year the Minister of Finance must make a report on its operations and I think it will probably be the practice to have that report referred to the committee on banking and commerce. It was felt at this time that the government would not recommend going beyond what had been recommended by the committee and that all these matters, including the suggestion about members of the former parliament of Newfoundland, are matters that can come before the banking and commerce committee and about which subsequent reports may be made.

Bill reported.

Mr. St. Laurent moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Before the bill passes I would like to say a word of appreciation to the committee of men, perhaps more or less self-appointed, who went into a good deal of study in respect of this measure over the past year or perhaps two years. The impression abroad may be that this measure has been hurriedly passed by this house.

I recall that about a year ago, perhaps a little more than a year ago now, I received a letter. I am trusting to my memory but I believe it was from the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay). It stated that some members of parliament who had been interested in a pension scheme were desirous of studying the actuarial soundness of any possible proposals, together with the historical situation as it might apply to past members. The letter called for some information as to the whereabouts and the status of my predecessors who had represented Macleod riding in years past. I mention this because that letter came to me over a year ago. I do not know that I know all these men, and I cannot mention them all by name, but I do wish to say that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) seems to have been very active in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: He can pass these words along to his colleagues. Some of us have sat down and thought: Well, this measure is being proceeded with; somebody else is looking after it—but we reap the benefits of a lot of hard work well done.

I do wish to express at this moment what I believe is the sentiment of all members of this house—thanks to those men who have been interested enough to put a lot of work and time into this measure in laying the foundation for it so that government officials, actuaries and so forth, could build upon that foundation and bring forward a measure which is apparently acceptable.

I wanted to say those few words of appreciation.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Sinnott: Don't duck this time, Lake Centre.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. St. Laurent) which was agreed to on the following division:

EASTERN ROCKY MOUNTAIN FOREST CONSERVATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF ACT

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 391, to amend the Eastern Rocky Mountain Forest Conservation Act.

Forest Conservation

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, many hon. members will recall that parliament in 1947 passed the Eastern Rocky Mountain Forest Conservation Act. This act approved and ratified an agreement entered into between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Alberta for the conservation of the forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains. The area covers the head waters of the North and South Saskatchewan rivers and comprises 5½ million acres, or 8,618·74 square miles. For purposes of comparison, the area of Prince Edward Island is 2,184 square miles and the area of Nova Scotia is 21,068 square miles.

The federal government's interest stemmed largely from the fact that the rivers rising in this area flow across all three western provinces and contribute in important measure to the life of western Canada and thus of the nation before they empty into Hudson bay.

This is the largest single forest conservation project in Canada and one of the largest on this continent. By protecting and conserving the forest cover in this area the two governments are providing a measure of automatic control over the flow of the rivers and streams. They are achieving soil conservation, fish and game conservation, and are ensuring sustained yield from valuable forests which are returning increasing revenues with each succeeding year.

The agreement commenced on April 1, 1948, and will continue for a term of 25 years from that date. It provides for the setting up of a board of three members, two being appointed by the federal government and one by the provincial government. The present members of the board are: Major General Howard Kennedy, chairman; G. Tunstell, Department of Resources and Development; and H. G. Jensen, province of Alberta.

The purpose and function of the board are to plan, advise, direct, and supervise the construction, operation, and maintenance of all projects and other facilities necessary for the proper protection of the forests in the area. The agreement provides for a six-year program of capital expenditures by the federal government, amounting to $6,300,000, and a maintenance program shared by the two governments, to cost not less than $250,000 and not more than $300,000 annually.

The provincial government, under the terms of the agreement, shares in the cost of the yearly maintenance program, and pays the salary and expenses of its member of the board.

[Mr. Winters.]

The government of Canada pays the whole cost of the capital program as formulated by the board and is obliged to pay up to $175,000 yearly toward the annual maintenance costs. In addition, it of course pays the salary and expenses of its members of the board. The formula with respect to maintenance costs provides that revenues from the surface rights be available to the provincial government and that the federal government contribution for this purpose be reduced by the amount by which these revenues exceed $125,000 per annum. During the past four years, ending March 31, 1952, the total expenditures for maintenance were $1,118,196. Of this amount, Canada contributed $276,086; the balance of $842,110 was paid by the province. This amount accrued to the province in the form of revenues.

As I indicated before, the board commenced to operate on April 1, 1948, and the fourth year under the agreement ended on March 31, 1952. Approximately two-thirds, $3,849,269, of the capital program has been completed. The capital program consists of the construction of roads and trails, fire towers, buildings such as wardens' cabins and storehouses, the installation of a radio communication network and the carrying out of forest inventory surveys and other necessary investigations. As a matter of interest, I might mention that to date 147 miles of trunk roads, 140 miles of secondary roads and 257 miles of truck fire trails have been built.

There still remains to be spent on the capital program $2,450,731 and under the present agreement this must be spent by April 1, 1954. The board has requested, and the two governments have agreed, subject to the approval of parliament and the Alberta legislature, to an extension for one year of the time for completing this work. It is considered that the money could be spent to better advantage if the period were thus extended. The federal government's commitment, however, remains at $6,300,000.

On the basis of experience gained during the first four years of the agreement, and in the light of increased costs, the board considers it necessary to increase the amount to be spent annually on the maintenance program in order to ensure the carrying out of proper protection and conservation services. The agreement now limits the yearly maintenance program to a maximum of $300,000. It has been agreed to increase this maximum to $450,000 and the provincial government has undertaken to pay all the costs of the yearly maintenance program, commencing April 1, 1952.

Whereas the board now consists of two federal appointees and one provincial appointee, the Alberta government has recommended that upon completion of the capital expenditure program, that is, the date of April 1, 1955, as provided for in the agreement, which is before hon. members at the present time for approval, the composition of the board should be one federal and two provincial government appointees for the balance of the 25-year period of the original agreement. As by that time the federal government will have discharged its responsibilities for the capital program and the provincial government will have assumed the responsibility for the cost of the annual maintenance program, the recommendation seemed to me to be reasonable and it has been incorporated into the agreement before hon. members now.

I should point out, however, that there will be no change with respect to the obligation of the board to formulate programs for the yearly maintenance of a complete protective forest management service nor with respect to the obligation of the provincial government to carry out any such program for the remaining eighteen years of the agreement.

The agreement embodying the above changes has been signed by the two governments but is subject to approval by parliament and by the legislature of Alberta. The purpose of this bill is to seek parliament's approval of the agreement and to amend certain sections of the act in order that it may conform to the amended agreement.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I do not propose to speak at any length on this bill which I think the house can agree is a desirable measure for the preservation of the economy of the eastern slopes of the Rockies. There are, however, one or two matters concerning it which to my mind should be explained. Does this project form a prototype of other projects to be undertaken by the federal authority in other provinces of Canada? Under this project such matters as fire protection, forest management, pest control and all the other things which are looked after purely by the provinces elsewhere, are undertaken by the federal government. If this is to represent a pattern of other developments, I think it would be interesting to know it at this time.

I see the agreement runs for eighteen years, which would seem to be a reasonable time.

Mr. Winters: It is a 25-year agreement.

Mr. Adamson: That is better. There are still eighteen years to run. When the minister replies I should like to find out the situation with respect to two or three matters. For instance, in the province of Ontario fire protection and these other matters are carried out by the province, frequently in conjunction with private companies that are operating in the area. I should think the house would like to know whether there is any intention of extending this.

The minister did not make any reference to the expenses and the salaries of the board. I suppose that can be discussed when the bill is in committee. It is information that the house should have. As I have said, I do not propose in any way to oppose this legislation, but we should have the facts as to whether this represents a departure, and as to whether it is to be duplicated elsewhere, or whether it is the intention solely to have this project as one of a kind and not proceed to enter into agreements with other provinces. In other words, does this open the way for other provinces to enter into agreement for forest management with the federal authorities?

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): As one very keenly interested in the preservation of the eastern slopes of the Rockies and in conservation of the forest there I should like to say a word in connection with this bill. I was gratified when the bill was brought in. I understand it was first passed by the Senate, and it is now placed before us for second reading. I was also gratified with the report of the progress of the board set up under the act that was given to us just a short while ago by the minister. I think most commendable progress has been made not only in the field of capital construction but also in extending a network of roads and trails, the building of lookouts and preparation for the fighting of fire in almost every section now of that great reserve.

I was interested in this project, Mr. Speaker, from the first experience that I had in the provincial government of Alberta. It took us something like seven or eight years of rather intensive work finally to be able to get the federal government to join in an agreement such as is now embodied in the act, and I was exceedingly well pleased when we finally did get the federal government to realize that there was some federal responsibility there.

I was interested in what the hon. member for York West had to say a moment ago and the questions he asked. He asked whether this bill would be considered a prototype or pattern of future arrangements as between the provinces and the dominion in this field of forest management.

It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that the east slope of the Rockies is the watershed that feeds several very important rivers that flow across a number of provinces. The North Saskatchewan is perhaps the most important of them, although the South Saskatchewan also has its headwaters in this area. These waters are of tremendous importance not only to the province of Alberta but to Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We in Alberta have been conscious for a good many years of the importance of utilizing the waters for irrigation purposes to reclaim many areas of dry land in our province and to bring them back into something like good production. In the course of utilizing these waters we came face to face with the necessity, however, of making some arrangement so that the sister provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba could also have part of these waters. The fact that they rose in Alberta and flowed across our territory did not give us the right to all of the water in the rivers. We realized that if Saskatchewan, for example, much of which is in the Palliser triangle, were ever to become stabilized in its agriculture, it would have to utilize this water, and there would have to be a fair division worked out.

Something the minister did not say this morning, when making his short introductory report, was that when the final agreement which was embodied in the act to set up the eastern Rocky mountains forest conservation board was made, and when the agreement was signed between the provinces, it embodied also an agreement for the division of the waters. This board has the right to allocate certain of the waters of the North Saskatchewan river and its tributaries to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I understand that allocation has been made, and that is where the federal government enters the picture—that is, chiefly as a federal party concerned with a matter which does touch the interests of more than one province.

And so the federal government did make an agreement which, I suppose, will be the prototype or pattern for years ahead, if similar situations do arise. I know of none at the moment, but there may be others in other parts of Canada. I would like to impress upon the house that the federal government, and very wisely in my opinion, did assume its part of the responsibility for preserving the watershed on the east slope of the Rockies. Otherwise perhaps there would not be waters for Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and perhaps not even for Alberta.

The area known as the east slope of the Rockies is a large one. For many years, in certain parts it has been almost inaccessible. For a province with the resources Alberta had, in the past at any rate, successfully to preserve that watershed was just more than could be expected of it. The costs were terrific. Even during the early years of my experience in the government of Alberta, fires were frequent, and at times it would cost us as much as a million dollars in a year to fight fires. That was a terrific drain on our limited resources, and was one of the things which urged us to try to get federal help. I think all hon. members realize the federal government does have some responsibility to help a province, especially in a case of this kind in which are involved waters that flow through more than one province, and touch the interests of all those provinces very closely.

I was never quite satisfied that the federal government took its full responsibility. I do not believe the amount of money agreed to, either for capital consumption costs or for yearly maintenance, was equitably divided. I believe that right from the start Alberta has borne a bigger share of that responsibility than it should have borne, with the limited resources it had.

However, we are grateful that the agreement was made and that the federal government realized its responsibilities. I wish the minister to know that I am not criticizing anything that has been done when I say, as I do say, that the province has carried a disproportionate share of the cost of the preservation of the watershed, in view of the importance of that watershed to other parts of Canada.

Mr. Winters: Would the hon. member tell the house what, in his understanding, the Alberta government is doing on this project.

Mr. Low: The Alberta government is managing the forests and, as the minister has already pointed out, on a limited scale they are taking into their treasury the amount of earnings that can be taken out of a forest as a result of lumbering, and things of that kind. This does make up in some respects to them for their out-of-pocket costs. But let us not forget that those lands are provincial lands. Ordinarily those forests would be managed under a provincial forestry scheme, with the full amount of the returns from the lumbering industry in that area going to the province. Now it is being spent to a large extent on the projects under the agreement.

As I say, I do not wish to be unduly critical in any respect, but I have said that, as in the costs of irrigation, in my view the province has been asked to share a disproportionate amount of the costs in this connection. But they are not kicking about it; they are grateful that the federal government has realized its responsibility and has come into the scheme.

We do not want to be critical at all. Let me say at once to the minister that I think the board has done a remarkably fine job. I commend the minister for the interest he has taken, and also for having brought in this bill to amend the act and to extend its provisions for a further period of time. My observation would be that it would have been impossible for the board to spend efficiently within the time specified the capital moneys provided under the act in 1948. The minister is certainly justified in extending that time; because we want to have spent well and efficiently whatever capital moneys are spent. Therefore I believe he is wise in making provision for that extension.

I support second reading of the bill, and offer my thanks to the minister for the good job he has done.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I believe I shall be able to say before one o'clock everything I wish to say. I wish to express approval, and I believe also the approval of all of us from British Columbia, of the principle behind the bill and the act it amends.

I have been interested in the suggestion of hon. members opposite that this bill might serve as a prototype for legislation affecting other areas, provided of course that adjustments were made for differences in circumstances.

I do not believe that at this stage of the session one should make a long speech as to the advisability or essentiality of greater co-operation between the dominion and the provinces in respect of the preservation of many of our exhaustible resources. At this stage of the session we will have to take that for granted. Neither is there time for me to deal in detail with the geography and the other problems in connection with the forests which lie to the west of the summit of the Rockies. I would merely remind the minister that the headwaters of many of the large and important rivers are to be found there, and that the forest resources to the west of the Rockies are of great importance not only to British Columbia but to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. We look forward to the day when he and the government of British Columbia will have worked out a somewhat similar arrangement for the preservation of the forests of that province.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house for any considerable length of time, but I would not be able to complete my remarks before one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock we were discussing the statement made by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters). I listened carefully to his remarks and I do not intend to detain the house at any length at this time. It is a rather unfortunate tradition that during the last dying hours of a session many important matters are passed over rather lightly. I want to compliment the minister on some of the developments with reference to the policy concerning eastern Rocky mountain forest conservation. I well recall that a few years ago I urged the government to co-operate with the provinces with respect to forestry developments. I think it has been commonly accepted in the house and perhaps in the country that the great natural resources of our forests have not received the same attention from the dominion government, and indeed sometimes from the provincial governments, in proportion to the attention received by the great industry of agriculture.

Therefore I am glad that a policy suggested on this side of the house some years ago has been adopted to some extent and that the government has made some headway. However, as the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) suggested this morning, I think when the minister replies before this short debate closes he might give us some indication whether this measure is the prototype of a policy that might be extended to other provinces. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) pointed out that the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia could not be expected to carry on the extensive program envisaged by this policy. I wish however to remind the government again that the dominion treasury probably receives more from the forest industries of the dominion than from almost any other industry in Canada. In these days when the dominion government is collecting 72 per cent of all taxes paid in Canada I think it is only natural for these great enterprises that contribute so much to the dominion treasury, which now takes far more percentagewise of the taxpayers' money than ever before in history, leaving the provinces with only about 16 per cent of the taxation revenue of the country, to expect a keen and growing interest in conservation, forest protection and all the activities that the minister neatly described this morning.

I do not want to delay the house at this time. This is a big subject and we have discussed it on other occasions, but I want to point out to the minister that I hope his department will give serious consideration to extending the plan to other provinces that have contributed so much to the development of the great forest wealth of the dominion, and accordingly so much to the dominion treasury. On the other hand, I might also suggest that I think consideration should be given to putting the matter in a little different classification. I know there is always a danger of duplication. However, we have had a dominion Department of Agriculture working in co-operation with provincial departments of agriculture down through the years, and while we have heard on many occasions that there is a great duplication of services, and accordingly extravagance in costs, nevertheless I believe it is generally accepted by the great agricultural industry that excellent service has been rendered in many ways by the dominion and provincial departments of agriculture. In this case it seems to me there is a danger of this enterprise and service being divorced somewhat from government responsibility. I hope the government will give consideration to enlarging the policy, and in enlarging it will consider it as more of a definite government responsibility rather than placing the responsibility on boards outside of parliament.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do the only riding in British Columbia which takes in a part of the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains, I think it is only fitting that I should make some reference to the measure before the house and express regret that the government of British Columbia has not also joined with the government of Canada in legislation of this kind. It is remarkable that the work to be carried out under this proposed measure stops at the 120th meridian which is an imaginary line dividing for some hundreds of miles the forest and other lands on the east side of the Rocky mountains from similar areas within the province of Alberta.

I think this bill is the culmination of good work started many years ago by Sir Clifford Sifton, one of our great Canadians, who at one time had charge of the department which is so ably represented in the house at the present time. In his day Sir Clifford urged conservation measures along this line. He had great vision and saw the need of controlling the water and power resources of that part of the country. Following him there was the Hon. Charles Stewart, another empire builder, who was premier of Alberta and who, like the present premier of that province, showed an interest in conservation and legislation of this kind. I would like to pay tribute also to a predecessor from the riding of Cariboo who headed the Turgeon committee on reconstruction and development in 1944. On page 6 of the report of that committee I find:

> We recommend that serious thought be given to the preservation of forests on the eastern slope of the Rocky mountains. The destruction of these mountain forest reserves in the province of Alberta is causing a serious depletion of the water resources of the prairie provinces.
> We recommend also that reforestation and aforestation be given serious study with the view to co-operation between various governments for the proper conservation of our forest resources.

Now I could read further but it is well to say that this is a true issue as a result of many years of effort on the part of leaders who had in their hearts the welfare of that part of western Canada.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, anxious as I am not to delay the work of this house I feel I should say a few words on this matter.

First I wish to congratulate the minister on having presented this bill and I also wish to congratulate the government of the province of Alberta, which has come to an agreement with the Canadian government, on the work which is to be carried on in the line of what we can see in this legislation. I am a little surprised that there is no mention of the forestry act in this bill but I presume that in order to put this in force the government had to pass a special bill. The Canada Forestry Act was enacted in 1949 and it is with much regret that I learn that the province of Quebec is the only province which has not taken advantage of that legislation to date. I hope that in the very near future our province will go ahead and co-operate with the government of Canada in taking inventory in the province, in doing some reforestation work, and in that way co-operate with what is being done all through the country.

In reading some of the articles of this bill and in the schedule to the bill I see that much capital expenditure will be made, most likely in reforestation because I understand that is required for this part of the eastern Rockies. It will be very important to have conservation of the land and of the water, and that there be regulation of the water. It is very nice to know that the provincial government is co-operating with the Canadian government in this work. I would like the minister to tell us the total area of land involved in this legislation and I would also like to learn from the minister if other work will be done, for instance exploitation of the forests in that section in conjunction with the province.

I say again that I hope, like the member for York West (Mr. Adamson), that this legislation may be a pattern for other provinces. I hope that comes true because a lot can be done to have conservation, reforestation, and regulation of water courses.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say.

I cannot speak on the different agreements which might be made between the federal government and the provinces but I can say that I wish for agreements between the federal government and all the provinces for the protection and preservation of our forests.

A few years ago, speaking on a subject of this kind, I asked that a campaign of education be opened by the federal government and by the provinces toward the acquisition by our population of more knowledge concerning preservation and conservation and especially the promotion of reforestation in all of Canada. I think it is a point on which we should centre our attention and bring all provinces, Quebec included, into the same field of knowledge.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this bill even at the hazard of extending the time for argument thereon; because I think the principle established in this bill is one of the most important that we have seen in this house for some time.

I congratulate the minister wholeheartedly on entering into agreements with the provinces on such a basis as this. I am not unmindful that in this particular case participation by the federal authority is more justified because this concerns I think three provinces in all and it concerns the headwaters of a number of rivers—probably three or four. There are the two Saskatchewans, the Macleod river, probably the headwaters of the Athabaska, although I am not sure, and the Red Deer river.

I agree with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) and would like to have seen participation in this bill by the province of British Columbia and the province of Alberta.

Mr. Blackmore: We in Alberta wanted that too.

Mr. Laing: I think the chief interest in this particular bill is the preservation of water rather than forestation. My memory goes back to 1935 when I spent a few days in Japan and I remember looking up at the Japanese hills and seeing trees planted in rows to the very top of those hills. They did that to preserve water for irrigation and to collect water for waterpower. We have not reached, and in this country we will not reach for many generations, a time when that is either economically necessary or practically feasible, but I think we have reached a time when we should take every opportunity to preserve every bit of cover in this country and to save every tree we can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Laing: To my mind this is the most vital and the finest piece of legislation along that line I have seen for some time. I want to speak to the minister particularly and to ask him to please see that his test tube men, and I think he has some, begin to pay some attention in this country to the quality of water. I am dealing now with irrigation farming which is the most hazardous type of farming on the face of the earth. That can be borne out by a study of the irrigation projects on the Nile, two or three in California and one or two in the state of Montana which started out as fine projects but today are completely abandoned.

I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that in irrigation farming the water must be something more than wet, and if we have too high a concentration of alkalinity you simply cannot successfully practise irrigation farming for very many years. Less than ten years ago I had occasion to make some inquiries from the departments here concerning the alkali content of some of the lakes in the Okanagan valley in the province of British Columbia. To my utter dismay I found they had never been tested with the single exception that some slight sampling had been done by the Department of Fisheries in 1912.

I think the more we study our irrigation methods in Canada, those operating at the present time and those which we may operate in the future, the more we shall find that we are going to have to call upon technical men to make a thorough chemical survey of the waters that we propose to use in all parts of Canada. I hope the minister takes this action in respect of those waters, because those waters are a great resource about which, in so far as their potentiality for irrigation purposes is concerned, we can and should know more than we do at the present time.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I propose to say very little on the general problem in connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker, because that has been adequately covered. Support for the general principle of this bill has been fully stated. There is, however, one feature of this measure which I suggest to the consideration of the government. As the government recognizes the general support throughout this house for a program of conservation, I hope that it will consider the inconsistency of its position when it is so strong in its support of conservation of forest resources and so determined in resisting any plans for conservation of our other resources which will not replace themselves as our forests will. If the conservation of forest resources is important, the conservation of other resources is still more so.

May I strongly urge the government, as it receives the support which it has received and will receive for this measure, that it extend those ideas of conservation in the future instead of resisting the proposals from the opposition for planned conservation.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): In closing this brief debate, I wish to thank all hon. members who have, in such a constructive way, taken part in it and shown that they endorse the principle of the act which has been on the statute books since 1947. The bill before the house now embodies amendments which are relatively minor when considered in the light of the over-all project. It would be interesting indeed, Mr. Speaker, if at this time we could develop a debate on conservation, because there is much to be said for the government's program in the various conservation fields.

At the outset, I wish to say that I disagree quite strongly with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said when he intimated that the government is resisting attempts to conserve Canada's natural resources in any field at all. In fact I think if he will review the government's program carefully, as I am sure he tries to review everything this government does, he will come to the conclusion that the performance in the field of conservation, in co-operation with other governments at all levels and private industry, adds up to quite a fine record of accomplishment. He need not go beyond the Canada Forestry Act to see the government's policies and intentions in the field of forestry which is so important to the Canadian economy.

In a more limited way, the government has participated in projects which are of merit in the local economy as well as in the economy of Canada. There are several good examples in the province of Ontario with which, until relatively recently, the leader of the opposition was more directly concerned. I need only mention the conservation projects on the Grand river and now on the Thames river, where the provincial government, conservation authorities and the federal government are coupling dams for the conservation and regulation of waters with more comprehensive programs of reforestation of the drainage areas, which I am sure will not only stimulate forestry development but will help to conserve the water. Then, too, there is our great program of national parks for which the federal government is entirely responsible, and which cover many thousands of square miles.

There is now, under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which has shown itself to be so valuable in this country. There is the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, as well as others. I cite those only as examples, because if I did more than that I would be out of order on this bill.

Mr. Drew: You could mention the Saskatchewan irrigation project.

Mr. Winters: In reply to specific questions, I might say that the federal government is responsible, in so far as this Rocky mountain project is concerned, for the capital expenditure and for a share in the cost of maintenance. Those are the two expensive phases of the operation. With respect to capital expenditure, there is no obligation on the provincial government of Alberta whatever. With respect to maintenance, the government of Alberta is responsible for paying up to $125,000 a year if the revenues accruing from the surface rights do not exceed that amount. It so happens that the revenues have exceeded that amount ever since the agreement has been in effect, so the government of Alberta has not been required to pay either towards the cost of capital development or towards the cost of maintenance.

The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) asked what the area was. I covered that in my opening remarks, but I shall be glad to repeat that the area is of the order of 8,600 square miles. Again I wish to thank all hon. members for their endorsation of this bill which is so important to the waters of western Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Winters moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $344,433.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): As a farmer coming from a province which depends for its income almost entirely on agriculture and fishing, I feel obligated to make a few remarks on this item. There are a few general observations I should like to make, and then I have one or two questions to which I should like answers if the minister would be kind enough to keep them in mind. It was not my intention to refer at all to the question of foot-and-mouth disease, although I did have the interesting experience of serving on the committee investigating the outbreak of that disease in Canada. It was not my intention to mention it in these remarks, but because of some of the arguments which were advanced yesterday I feel compelled to make a few observations in that regard.

I feel that, in the report of this committee, an attempt has been made to leave the impression that everything that could be done was done in an effort to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease in this country. I think that it is admitted by everyone that, once the disease was diagnosed and identified, an excellent job has been done by those concerned in stamping it out after the middle of February; and I think they deserve the congratulations and the thanks of the Canadian people for the fine effort they have made.

When it comes to the question of the time required to identify the disease, however, I think there is a great deal of room for improvement. If the impression is left that a time lapse of two and a half months is sort of normal, or at least is acceptable, or that it even can be tolerated as a reasonable time lapse in the diagnosis of foot-and-mouth disease, I think we are doing our future cattle industry a great injustice. After all, if we hope to re-establish the confidence of the people of the United States and of the United States government—and after all, that is what we are primarily concerned with in our policy to control the foot-and-mouth disease—we must convince them that we will not leave any stone unturned in our efforts to diagnose, in as short a time as possible, any future outbreak of the disease; that we will make every effort to stamp it out; and that we will press forward towards the objective of stamping it out completely, letting the chips fall where they may, if there is any indication that there has been inefficiency on the part of anyone concerned.

Further, I think the suggestion that almost a quarter of a year is a normal time for the Canadian veterinary profession as such to require to identify foot-and-mouth disease is an unjustifiable reflection upon the profession in this country. I feel that the vast majority of men in the veterinary profession in this country, if another outbreak should occur, would be capable of having it identified in an extremely short time. In the United Kingdom the experience has been that fresh outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease are not identified in a matter of months, weeks or even days but quite frequently within hours of the outbreak being recorded. The matter of time and the urgency of identifying the disease are recognized to be so highly important in the United Kingdom that, according to my information, the department of agriculture in the United Kingdom keeps a man on duty twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, for the express purpose of receiving reports of outbreaks in the United Kingdom of diseases that could possibly be foot-and-mouth disease, so that the proper authorities can be immediately alerted and the proper action can be taken at once to identify the disease and to determine whether or not it is foot-and-mouth disease.

I am convinced that the best method for us to adopt in our endeavours to regain the confidence of the United States government or the United States department of agriculture is to show a willingness to do everything possible to identify, to diagnose, and to publicize the fact of any outbreak of any disease that may occur in this country. After all, if we are to suppose that it is normal, or if we are even to suggest or to imply that it is normal to take ten weeks or so to identify foot-and-mouth disease, it is not fair to expect any country to buy cattle from us at any time if the disease may be going on in this country for ten weeks before we even know whether it is there or not. I do not think any reasonable person would expect us as a country to import cattle, sheep, or any other animal from a country which was as inefficient as that in its diagnosis of foot-and-mouth disease.

That is the only observation I have to make in that regard, except that I should like to ask the minister if he would be kind enough to let me know what method was adopted in arriving at a figure for the payment of farmers who had fowl or poultry destroyed owing to the foot-and-mouth disease. What was the amount of compensation paid and on what basis was it paid? Also, on what basis was compensation paid in the case of poultry which had to be destroyed on account of Newcastle disease?

With regard to Newcastle disease, it has been reported to me—I do not know whether the report is accurate; and I should like the minister, if he would be kind enough to do so, to inquire as to whether or not it is accurate—that in certain cases where poultry which had Newcastle disease in the province of Nova Scotia were destroyed, the bodies of the poultry were not properly disposed of, so that sea birds acquired access to those bodies, with the result that sea gulls and various other sea birds acquired Newcastle disease and died in large numbers. I do not know whether or not that report is correct, but I think it should be officially denied if it is not. That is the rumour that is going around, namely that large numbers of sea birds in the Northumberland strait are dying of Newcastle disease. I do not know whether that is even possible, but I should like it to be officially denied if it is not.

I have been disturbed by the fact that it would appear that over the last number of years the agricultural industry has been taking a less important place in our economy than it has in the past. I am disturbed by a report dated Ottawa, June 24, which points out that the farm population of this country has declined over the last ten years from 3,100,000 persons to 2,900,000 persons. That is a drop of 200,000 farm people in a ten-year period. I know, and I think it is generally recognized, that part of that drop is owing to the fact that—because of mechanization and other means which make agriculture more efficient from a labour point of view—a smaller number of people can cultivate a larger amount of land than was the case in the past. I am disturbed to notice that, in eastern Canada, not only has the farm population gone down over the last ten years but also the acreage under cultivation. That statement applies to nearly all of the eastern provinces of Canada. I think that is an extremely unfortunate state of affairs. Our agricultural industry has not only been decreasing in importance in relation to our general economy but it has been factually decreasing in importance over the last number of years. In that regard, I happened to notice that the net farm income for 1949—that is the latest figure I have—was something like $1·5 billion. The budget for last year is over $4 billion. That means that the total farm income for 1949 is only slightly more than one-third of the federal taxes which must be paid in this coming year. In other words, the federal government has become a business which is almost three times as important as one of our leading industries, namely the agricultural industry. I think that everything possible should be done to stimulate our agriculture and our industry generally, and to find markets for any products which we may have over and above those required for the consumption of the Canadian people. After all, the world population is increasing at a very rapid rate. Taking the world as a whole, our food supply, relative to our population, is becoming less and less and I believe that both from a general economic point of view, and from the point of view of defence, everything possible should be done to bring our agricultural industry as near its potential as possible.

People will say that that is being done and that we have an excellent record as an agricultural country. We look upon ourselves perhaps with regard to the production of wheat as leading the world. I should like to quote just a figure or two with regard to that. If we look at the way in which we have exploited our possibilities with regard to wheat production we find that Canada produces only about one-third as much wheat as the United States, and only about one-third as much wheat as the U.S.S.R. Our wheat production is only slightly greater than that of France, a small European country. Italy produces almost as much as the whole of Canada. It does seem to me therefore that there is a great opportunity for us to stimulate and develop our agricultural industry as much as possible.

I feel that some of the causes of the decline in our agricultural production relative to the economy of the country as a whole in the last number of years are due to the fact that many of our farmers are not as efficient as they should be. I am very strongly in support of everything that is done by the Department of Agriculture in a scientific way to try to improve agricultural methods, but I still feel there is considerable room for research in that regard. One thing I can think of at once is the fact that in this country agricultural power as applied to farm tractors and as produced in eastern Canada is almost entirely by gasoline. In Europe it is very unusual to see a gasoline tractor on the farm. Nearly all the tractors used in Europe are diesel tractors. A diesel tractor will produce twice the amount of power on a gallon of fuel as a gasoline tractor will, and in addition to that diesel fuel costs about half as much as gasoline. Therefore from the fuel cost point of view diesel power is about one-fourth as costly as gasoline power.

I know that research is done by the Department of Agriculture into the suitability of farm machinery, but I feel that that is a phase of the scientific effort of the Department of Agriculture which should be pressed forward in every possible way. I feel, too, that much of the excellent research that has been done by the officials and the scientists of the Department of Agriculture to improve the methods of agriculture in this country is not getting through sufficiently to the people who need it most. If a farmer is a good one he tends to acquire this information for himself. He goes out and gets it. It is the poor farmer who is not so apt to seek this information himself. I welcome every possible method which may be used or expanded to bring the information and the knowledge which is available to the people who need it most.

I am very pleased to see that the year before last some films were produced by the national film board, sponsored by the Department of Agriculture. I have not the figures for the last year. I hope that policy has been continued, and I would be interested to have a brief comment from the minister telling us the program in that regard, because I feel that the importance of getting the information at hand, the knowledge which the experts have, if you like, to the average farmer is something that cannot be emphasized too much, because in this day and age farming has become a very complicated and difficult job. If the farmers are to be efficient they must have a wide knowledge of quite a varied field with regard to the chemistry of soils, the breeding of livestock and of an infinite number of things. This requires a very good general technical education, if you like, in the vocation which they are following. I believe that any effort that can be made to improve the efficiency of the average farmer in Canada and thereby make rural life more attractive and more remunerative to the average farmer will strengthen the general fabric of our country and will be highly justified.

Mr. Gardiner: Before replying to some of the statements made I should like to make a correction in Hansard of last evening at the top of page 3811 where the hon. member for Brant was asking me a question. The first question is:

> Has the minister ever visited the institute at Hull?

I take it from what followed that I broke in, in the middle of the question, and I said: "Yes." Then the hon. member went on to say:

> To see how this is done?

Well, I see that in the noise that was going on I said "yes", again. I was not there to see how this was carried on. As a matter of fact, at the time it was being carried on I was not in Ottawa at all. I just want to correct that and make it plain that last night I did not intend to say that I was at Hull at the institute for the purpose of seeing how tests were made in connection with this disease.

Mr. Rowe: You do not wish to become a "yes, yes man" to that investigation.

Mr. Gardiner: Probably at the same time, and particularly in view of what my hon. friend has just said, I had better complete the record in connection with the same matter. I made inquiries this morning in order to get full information with regard to the use that was made of the Hull lab. The full record is this: On February 13 and 14 material was collected in Saskatchewan. On February 16 the material arrived at Hull. On February 16 material was injected into cattle, horses and sheep at the Hull laboratory. On February 18 technicians reported gravely suspicious symptoms. Then, portions of this material were later sent to Grosse Ile for further tests, which confirmed tests at Hull. All samples following this were sent to Hull and relayed unopened to Grosse Ile. That is the complete record with regard to it, and anyone who is discussing this matter should have that record before them, and I therefore wish to put it on Hansard.

I wish to express my own appreciation of the type of speech which the hon. member who just took his seat delivered in connection with these estimates. The criticisms made were legitimate ones, and the suggestions made were helpful. I am sure that is what every hon. member has in mind to do, in the first place, to criticize what ought to be criticized and to try to be helpful in any suggestion made.

I should like to say, with regard to the criticism that agricultural population has been dropping in Canada during the last ten years, that there is an explanation for the figures which appear in the census of 1951 as compared with 1941, which is not apparent unless one goes into the details. The definition of "farmer" has been changed in 1951 as compared with 1941. The provision in the census of 1951 is that we do not list anyone as a farmer who is operating less than three acres, whereas in the census of 1941 we went down to one acre for farmers. Then higher incomes are required in order to say in 1951 that a man is really a farmer, as compared with 1941. That accounted for about half the difference between the farm population as listed in 1951 as compared with that of 1941.

Then I think it should be kept in mind that there was quite a change brought about by the fact that the war came in 1939, and that it developed to greater intensity in 1940 and 1941. It was widely stated during the period of the war—and I think it was generally correct—that there were about 400,000 young people on the farms across Canada in the later thirties and the early forties who under ordinary circumstances would not have been there at all. We had been passing through a very difficult economic period. Young people who had intended to go to universities were not able to go. Other young people who intended to go into other employment were not able to find that employment, and they were on the farms.

Shortly after war began—at least, within two years after it began—there were 400,000 less young people on the farms, and we were producing more without that 400,000 than we had produced with them. This simply meant that following the ten years of depression there was a considerable proportion of our population who were on the farms but who did not wish to be there and were awaiting an opportunity to leave. A family of a certain size has one, two or three who must leave that particular farm and go somewhere else. That population to the extent of some 400,000 did go away, and not all of them came back, naturally.

So the farm population, as compared with 1941, is down somewhat on that account. But at the same time there is the other reason given by the hon. member for the decrease in farm population, namely that farms are more mechanized now than they were before. I think in that connection one should keep in mind the fact that while a very considerable part of the population of Canada is not now listed as farm or, in some instances, even as rural population, and while it is correct to say that, in a sense, there are between two and three million people listed as farmers, about six and a half million of the Canadian population, or almost half of it, is listed as rural. There is not a great deal of difference between a farmer and a rural person who lives in a hamlet or small town. These people live very close to the farms, and usually they are doing those things which at one time in our development were actually done on the farms. I am sure every member in the committee can remember far enough back to recall the days when a very large percentage of our hogs were actually killed on the farms and then peddled in the towns and cities. One can remember, too, back in the earlier period, when a very considerable portion of the blacksmithing and all that sort of thing was done by the farmers themselves. Eventually we had blacksmiths in our towns and villages who did that work. These people were doing work which previously had been done on the farms.

Then, as we have mechanized our farms, a great many with a mechanical turn of mind have gone to the cities and towns to produce the machinery that is needed, to repair it, and all that kind of thing. If we make allowance for that development over the years, including the development in transportation facilities and everything else that takes people away from the farms but still keeps them in touch with the actual production and marketing of food, and making it available to people who will consume it, we can quite easily show that a very considerable part of the six million people who are listed as rural people, together with a very considerable number of those who are even in some of our cities and towns that have been incorporated, and have therefore become urban, could compare favourably with those who had been listed previously as farmers.

In other words I think it is correct for those of us who live on farms to maintain that about half the population of Canada is really very closely associated with what we believe to be Canada's most important industry. Indeed they are so closely associated that we had 750 representatives of that group of people appear as guests of the Department of Agriculture at the Chateau Laurier the other evening. The whole 750 were representative of what might be called the secondary group of agriculturists, those who do not live on the farms but whose work is connected with that of the farms.

At the time the census was being compiled this last time I put forth a little effort to try to convince those who were making it that we should find some way of bringing those people into closer touch with our farm population in that census, in order to emphasize the fact that this country still is largely an agricultural country. I hope that by the time we get around to making another census, whatever government is here at that time will give some attention to this matter and try to indicate in the census that relationship which, I think, will give a better understanding outside this country of our position as agriculturists.

Then on the matter of increased production of farm products: I quite agree that, so far as we can find markets for farm products, we should encourage an increase in their production. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, the most completely agricultural province in Canada; and I appreciate them as one who comes from the province which stands second to Prince Edward Island as being the most completely agricultural.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the value in our Canadian economy of the experimental farm service. As the minister indicated a moment ago, agriculture is our most important industry; and I feel that if we are to compete in world markets farming operations must be carried on on a scientific basis, and the best available farming methods ought to be used. This is especially true in western Canada, from which I come.

The three prairie provinces are essentially agricultural in nature, and because of their distance from markets and the fact that we must depend upon export trade it is essential that the costs of production be cut down as much as possible. For this reason one cannot overestimate the value of experimental farms. Therefore the expenditures the government make are, I believe, a great investment for the benefit of agriculture in this country.

Apart from the value of these experimental farms from the standpoint of making experiments, I believe the greatest value must be placed upon the educational facilities these farms offer to people in and around the communities in which they are located. Farmers have the opportunity of seeing for themselves the type of work being done. The experimental farm will serve a surrounding area of about a hundred miles.

For some time now I have been making representations to the minister and some of his officials, urging the necessity of establishing an experimental farm in that part of northern Alberta, east of Edmonton, from which I come. Let us take the constituency of Vegreville which I have the honour to represent. It is the most densely populated rural area in western Canada. Nearly all the people there depend on agriculture, and the farmers are interested to such a degree that some of the stock breeders have received national recognition for their stock at various livestock shows. There are a number of farmers in my constituency around Spedden, Two Hills, Vilna, Andrew and Hairy Hill who have received world recognition for coarse grains at the Toronto royal fair and the Chicago world show. According to surveys made by the National Trust Company that area contains some of the most productive grain farms in western Canada.

In spite of that I have before me a report which has recently been prepared by Mr. G. E. DeLong, superintendent of the Lacombe experimental farm, on a survey he made of that area in which he has this to say in part:

> Soil erosion was considered a major problem, particularly on the sandy loam soils. No trouble was experienced in 1951 but prior to that in dry years the area was considered one of the worst dust bowls in central Alberta. Weeds were considered another serious problem. Tartarian buckwheat was serious on about 75 per cent of the land; wild oats on 50 per cent; quack grass on 5 per cent and other weeds such as stinkweed, blueburr, sow thistle, Canada thistle and mustards were prevalent in certain areas.

Further on he says:

> A serious soil fertility problem has developed over a period of years. The continual practice of grain growing has depleted the soil with the result that yields have dropped off rapidly in recent years.

The closest dominion experimental farm to the area about which I am talking is at Lacombe, which is nearly 200 miles away. The farm at Lacombe is doing excellent work for the benefit of agriculture, but the farmers in the part of Alberta to which I am referring do not have the opportunity of visiting that farm and deriving the beneficial values which they should be able to get. As I have pointed out, I have made numerous representations to the minister and his officials concerning the need of such an experimental farm in that area. I believe the minister is sympathetic and realizes the necessity of such an establishment; but I also think some of his officials, although realizing the problem which exists, feel that it can be remedied by means of an illustration station.

I have endeavoured to make numerous inquiries regarding the value of such illustration stations and have received opinions from many people. These opinions are expressed in the words of one, William Pidruchney, district agriculturist of Vegreville, who is recognized as very highly qualified in the field of agriculture. This is what he says:

> The idea of the illustration station is not a new one and we could have had one of these established many years ago if a progressive type of a farmer had been willing to undertake the proposition. In addition, I have been observing the operation of illustration stations at other centres and feel that this type of a set-up has very little to offer for the district. The majority of the farmers who enter into an agreement with the federal Department of Agriculture do not get very much financial assistance to warrant undertaking the type of program that is required by the Department of Agriculture. The illustration station set-up may have some value in certain areas of the province—

I believe it has great value.

> —but in this area I feel that there is a need of an experimental station which could be operated on the same basis as those at Lethbridge, Lacombe and Beaverlodge. It does not need to be elaborate to start out with but at least have it established on the same basis and enlarge upon it in the future.

I am drawing this matter to the attention of the minister. I feel that an experimental farm is something that is necessary. It is a vital need in the area to which I have referred, and I hope the minister will give the matter the most careful consideration.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I can assure you I am not going to talk about the foot-and-mouth disease. My main reason for rising at this time is to inform the Minister of Agriculture that there is some farming carried on in the province of Nova Scotia. Last February the Nova Scotia federation of agriculture came to the conclusion that their problems were being completely neglected in so far as the House of Commons is concerned, so much so that on the 5th of February they called a conference of the members of parliament from that province. I was not at the meeting, but I received a copy of their brief.

The reason for the meeting was to acquaint members of the House of Commons with the problems of agriculture in Nova Scotia. In my opinion the logical thing for them to do is send a few farmers here to represent the industry; but until they get around to doing that the coal miners and lawyers will have to do the best they can to tell their story.

In the brief I received from the secretary of their organization they made a lot of observations with respect to imports, exports, differentials in tariffs and so on about which I am not going to speak because a lot has been said on these points, and in my opinion they have been completely covered. They refer to freight rate assistance. The minister has already reported on that. One thing that stands out in their brief is the necessity for the modernization of the railway lines in that part of the country in order to speed up traffic. The Minister of Transport has to do with that, and we will talk to Mr. Donald Gordon the next time we get him before the railways and shipping committee.

My impression of the problem in that part of the country is a little closer to home. I have in my hand a synopsis of a story that appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 25 and which is based on the last census. It shows that while there has been an upswing in agricultural production to the extent of about 6 per cent in the last ten years, during that same period there has been a decline of 17 per cent in land under cultivation in the province of Nova Scotia. Apparently we are in reverse compared with the national picture.

I do not know whether the decline in acreage is occasioned by migration to urban centres or whether it is because of uneconomic factors in the industry itself. The minister would know that better than I; but the story one gets from the last census very definitely indicates a trend away from the land in that province. There are hundreds of vacant farms on which families were raised in years gone by. They were educated, moved away, and after the old people died the land was left to stand in an unproductive state. That is one story; but in ten years, while the agricultural production and the acreage under cultivation has increased by 6 per cent on a national scale, there has been a decline in land under production in the province of Nova Scotia to the extent of 17 per cent, and it looks like a continuing decline.

No doubt the minister has seen this clipping. It is very revealing according to the last census, and it gives all the figures. I am not going to waste time reading them to the minister because he has already seen them; but that is why I say the problem is closer to home than imports, exports, tariffs and so forth. I think something has to be done in that province with regard to the utilization of land that would be productive if properly taken care of.

I would just like to leave this thought with the minister. At the present time in that part of the country there is considerable industrial development. I have in my hand a story of the development that has taken place in Newfoundland in the last four or five years. It is contained in the June 20 supplement issue of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which carried a complete story of the industrialization of Newfoundland during the last four or five years and the trend that is expected to continue for the next four or five years. Additional production in that part of the country means there are going to be a lot more people there, and that will mean increased markets for dairy products, meats, and that kind of thing. If we do not follow up and increase our farm production to keep it in balance with industrial production it will be a bad development, in my opinion.

I think the base for any successful economy in this country, whether in a province or nationality, is an agricultural base. As I see the development in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland now, in that area the swing is toward increased industrial production with a rapid decline in agricultural production. I think I am safe in saying that at the present time 50 per cent of what is consumed in that province by way of agricultural production comes from outside. There is a steady decline in our own production, with hundreds of vacant farms throughout the province.

I would like to ask the minister whether there is a possible chance of having the P.F.R.A. legislation extended on a national basis for use wherever the opportunity presents itself in the opinion of the department. I think the P.F.R.A. legislation has done an excellent job on the prairies, but why should that legislation continue to be applicable only to the prairies? I have figures here on the administration of the two acts and they are not very large. However, the thing that impresses me in looking through the departmental administration is the large number of engineers and trained agriculturists the minister has at his disposal. I am reasonably sure it does not occupy all of the time of that highly trained technical staff to look after P.F.R.A. legislation in the prairie provinces. Is there a chance of the government extending that legislation to the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick? I can see a potential agricultural production in Nova Scotia if it is planned according to need and to match the industrial development that has taken place.

I do not think the provincial department of agriculture, though it is a good department and has excellent field workers, has the kind of men the minister has in his department administering the P.F.R.A. legislation.

In the light of the circumstances as they exist now, with plenty of land and many farms with buildings on them, I am wondering if the minister could not prevail upon his colleagues in the cabinet to extend that legislation to augment the work being done by the provincial department of agriculture, by getting some of his personnel in there with some of the technical advice and experience they have gained on the prairies, with a view to rehabilitating the agricultural industry in the province of Nova Scotia. When the minister gets around to it I would like to have his opinion on this to see if there is a possible chance. I think the answer lies there. The figures speak for themselves. What has been done in the past is all a matter of record, but I think for the future there is a good possibility in that part of the country for greater agricultural production although I can only see it achieved if we get some national assistance such as there is in the P.F.R.A. legislation.

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I represent a riding that is in the main agricultural, and I feel I should make a few observations at this time. I quite appreciate that long drawn out remarks at this time of the session are not very popular, so I will be as brief as possible.

After all, it has been said here on several occasions, even this afternoon, that agriculture is our basic industry. It is our most important industry, and last year the agricultural income in Canada was an all-time high. According to the dominion bureau of statistics Canadian farm income for 1951 reached the all-time high total of $2,825 million. That was approximately 27 per cent higher than the farm income for 1950. It is true that 1952 prospects are not so bright, I would say mainly due to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease that we had here in Canada.

I am not going to be quite so charitable as the gentleman who just spoke; I am going to mention the matter quite briefly. No one suggests that the health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture, or the officials, had anything to do with the introduction of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada. That is sure. I do not think anybody suggests for a moment that the officials have been at all lax in enforcing the regulations to exterminate and clean up the disease once it was properly diagnosed. I think it is generally accepted and admitted that the officials were a little slow in detecting the disease. I think that is quite true; but I would gather now that the disease is pretty well exterminated, the premises are cleaned up, and the embargo on livestock going to the United States will be lifted in the very near future, or at least at some time in the not too distant future. It has often been said that if the foot-and-mouth disease had been diagnosed earlier we would not have had nearly the economic loss that we had straight across Canada. That is a hypothetical situation and nobody can say, because the disease was probably there in a mild form two months before the embargo was imposed, or probably a little more. For those two months cattle were moving quite freely, and shipments of cattle to the United States were fairly heavy. I would say that under the law of general averages, if the embargo had been placed on two months earlier it would have been lifted two months earlier. The same thing is true the other way around; if it was placed on two months later it will be lifted two months later. By and large I think it will be just about an even break.

I was amazed last night, as a matter of fact, at the exhibition we had here regarding foot-and-mouth disease, with charges and counter-charges being hurled across the house. I have often wondered if committees play as important a part as we think. It is true they have a useful function, but very often members use committees to practise up for speeches they want to make in the house, and here on many occasions we have repetitions of speeches made in committee. This happened quite frequently in the committee studying foot-and-mouth disease, and also in other committees I have attended. I have often wondered why it is regarded as so important to put all the evidence on Hansard. I have often suggested, and I am going to suggest it in the next session too, that if we could stop the franking of political speeches that are made in the house we would shorten the sessions by at least two or three months.

Suggestions have been made by different people that we suffered a loss due to this foot-and-mouth disease. It has been said that my province lost so much because of it. The main loss was the loss of the cattle market, that is true. As a matter of record I should like to put on Hansard approximately the number of cattle we have in Canada, by provinces:

Province	No. of cattle
Prince Edward Island	97,924
Nova Scotia	166,202
New Brunswick	161,897
Quebec	1,160,840
Ontario	2,465,875
Manitoba	671,183
Saskatchewan	1,274,849
Alberta	1,563,019

This adds up to approximately 8,371,000 head of cattle in Canada. By and large I think our economic loss was about the same per capita in so far as the number of cattle we had was concerned. The cattle slaughtered because of foot-and-mouth disease numbered 1,343. All those cattle did not have the disease; many had been associated with cattle who had it, or had been exposed to the disease in some way. Out of 8,371,000 head of cattle in Canada we only slaughtered 1,343. I believe that was a small percentage. I must confess, and I am quite sure most people would agree, we made a lot of fuss and created a lot of advertising about the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in this country. We hope the outbreak is over, and we think it is; and we have only lost 1,343 head. Really, we advertised it not only in this country but around the world. I think it was advertised far too much.

As I said before, the livestock producers and the people handling livestock products have had the greatest loss as a result of the foot-and-mouth disease. For instance, I am interested in egg production. The production of eggs has been quite high and the price has been comparatively low. Just as a matter of record last week a friend of mine showed me an egg grading slip which was dated April 20, 1935. It was for a small shipment of 13 dozen eggs. According to this slip the extras brought 13 cents and the first grade 11 cents, or a total of $1.52 for the 13 dozen. Taking the same quantity of eggs and the same date this year, April 20, they would have brought $4.26, so we have come a long way in that period of time. I am not saying for a minute that the price of eggs is high enough. I think it was fortunate for the egg producers that there was a floor price under eggs. March and April is the period of the highest production, and if the floor had not been established the price of eggs would have gone even lower. I would suggest to the minister and his officials that, because of the high cost of production of eggs, they revise the floor price to give the producer a fairer margin of profit. I think that is something that should be undertaken all along the line.

In the main, grain production has been fairly good and the price has been fair. Cash field crops have maintained fairly good prices throughout the year. The brightest spot we have in our southwestern Ontario crops is probably the sugar beets. I want to mention them because not many people are interested in the production of sugar beets. In this country we produce sugar beets in four provinces, Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta. In 1951 Canada produced 241 million pounds of sugar in these beet factories. Ontario led the field, because last year we had an exceptionally good crop. The two factories that are situated at Chatham and Wallaceburg produced 94 million pounds of sugar and processed 341,991 tons of sugar beets. The sugar content for the entire crop averaged a little over 17 per cent, which is rather exceptional. The two plants in western Ontario processed approximately 5,700 tons of beets a day. During the season they employ over 1,000 people. Last year the growers received something over $5,250,000, and a further payment is still to be made.

This year in the western Ontario district the growers have planted over 30,000 acres of sugar beets. The factories have a capacity for processing approximately 400,000 tons of beets, and it is hoped this year to attain that approximate figure, although the season has been dry and germination is very spotty. At the moment the prospects do not look very good. However, in this country we produce only about one-quarter of the sugar we consume. I often think of the tremendous progress this industry has made since the thirties, when we received only $4 or $5 a ton for sugar beets. In those times it was most difficult to keep the sugar beet industry going. At this time I want to pay tribute to my good friend the hon. member for Lethbridge, who contributed so much to the industry at that time, as well as my good friend the hon. member for Essex South. They have done a great deal to sponsor and maintain the sugar beet industry through these difficult times.

At this time when we are spending so much money on research and expansion, I should like to suggest to the minister that more money be spent on experimentation and the development of greater food crops. This is particularly true with respect to the sugar beet industry, because the sugar content of the beets has steadily increased over the years. In our district 10 per cent used to be a good average, but it has now gone up to close to 17 per cent. Great progress has been made in research at the experimental farm. I think that is the solution to our farm problems. We should grow better crops and improve our understanding how to grow them. The government can contribute a great deal—although it is contributing some, I think a great deal more could be done—in this reseach and experimental work in order to increase production in this country.

Mr. Gardiner: There is a special reason for dealing with one or two of these questions at this time, Mr. Chairman, as some members are going away.

Mr. Brooks: I just want to raise one question, and it will only take a minute or two.

As the minister probably knows, I come from an agricultural constituency, to a great extent mixed farming; but they are chiefly interested in dairying. The producers in my constituency, like those in other parts of Canada, are greatly concerned over the dairy situation. The point I wish to bring before the minister today has to do with feed grain assistance. I understand he made some remarks with regard to that matter last night, but I was not here; I was in committee.

The point the dairy farmers in my constituency raise is the fact that there is not any permanency to this feed grain assistance. They say it is hard for them to make their plans for the future when, from year to year, they never know whether or not this assistance is to be continued. I was wondering whether the government could have some sort of permanent policy so the dairy producers in the maritime provinces would know, from season to season or from year to year, whether this assistance would be on a permanent basis. That is the point that I wish to bring before the minister.

While I am on my feet I might say that I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South in many of the remarks he has made. It is not production that is the chief problem for the farmers in the maritime provinces. As the hon. member said, we have a great many abandoned farms. Those farms are not abandoned because we cannot produce; the fact is that we could produce far more in my constituency, and the same is true with regard to most of the other constituencies in the maritime provinces. Our big problem is the question of markets.

Mr. Blackmore: Hear, hear. That is everybody's problem.

Mr. Brooks: Until we get stable markets in this country; until we get stable markets for the farmers of the maritime provinces —and I think this is true with respect to farmers all across Canada—we shall have vacant farms and more vacant farms. I often hear it said that in my own province of New Brunswick we could have a population two or three times as large as we have, both in our towns and in our rural areas, if the products we raise on our farms could be sold at prices which would make it profitable for the farmers to raise them, and make it possible to keep the young people on the farms.

That is the only point I wish to raise at the present time. I should like to ask the minister whether it is at all possible to assure the dairy farmers of the maritime provinces of some permanency in this feed grain assistance.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, what I was going to say was that I have been agreeing to have members rise in their places and speak on individual matters which will come under votes we shall be coming to later on. I do not raise the usual objection to that kind of thing on the general discussion because I take it for granted that hon. members, as we are coming to the end of the session, are desirous of expressing themselves from time to time, and that they will probably be prepared to pass the individual items more readily when we come to them—more readily than has been the case at some other times. I am therefore not insisting that we get done discussing them generally, and get by item No. 1, and wait discussion until we reach the items.

I will review one or two matters that have been raised, with a view to mentioning some other things hon. members probably will want to give thought to, inasmuch as we are drawing toward the close of the session.

First I should like to say a word or two with regard to the suggestions made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. Since 1943 we have been considering the possibility of bringing down legislation to apply the principle of P.F.R.A. right across Canada. At that time we had a committee of the house which gave careful study to the whole question and recommended that course. On three or four different occasions since that time I have had ready bills to make that procedure a possibility. I also think that hon. members can have as much influence upon the government as I can in connection with a matter of that kind. The subjects that have come up for consideration here from session to session, and to which great importance is attached, are naturally the subjects to which hon. members of the government are giving the most attention. While we have had bills prepared from session to session, we have had little discussion of the question. Little has been said about it. The result has been that the legislation having to do with this subject is passed over to another session. That is one suggestion I should like to make. On a practical problem of that kind, discussion would probably get us a little bit farther than the discussions we have on some other things.

I should say this with regard to the matter. There seems to be a misunderstanding with regard to what happens in the west. P.F.R.A. covers only a small part of western Canada. It covers less than one-third of the three prairies provinces. It does not cover any of British Columbia. It does not cover the northern part of any of the three prairie provinces. As a matter of fact it covers a small proportion of the province of Manitoba. Those who are living in other parts of Canada should not conclude that P.F.R.A. applies to all of the western provinces. It does not. It applies only to the Palliser triangle to which reference was made last night by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

The other point I should like to make at the moment is that in the maritime provinces we have legislation covering the marshlands, and that legislation was patterned after the legislation we have in the west in connection with P.F.R.A. To the extent that we are spending money on marshlands in the eastern part of Canada, we are doing the same thing there that we are doing in a comparatively small section of western Canada. The officials who have been trained in one area are transferred to the other, back and forth, in order to assist in that work.

So far as most of the farmers in Canada are concerned—and this is true so far as I am concerned personally—I think they would like to see legislation which covers all of Canada. The legislation in the east would require to be different from that in the west. The provisions made for British Columbia would be somewhat different from those made for the prairie provinces. On the prairies our problem is entirely, or almost entirely, a drought problem, a problem of lack of moisture. In British Columbia it is both; on one side of the mountains it is a drought problem; on the other side it is one of too much water. The problem down in the eastern part of Canada is that of salt water coming in on the land. That is not helpful. The objective is to keep it out. Those are all great problems. In this department we have always had the feeling that the whole matter could be dealt with right across Canada, with one staff of engineers, to better advantage than it can be dealt with in ten provinces. Nevertheless up to the present time, under our constitution the responsibility is fundamentally provincial; and it is only in dealing with certain phases of it that the federal government has come into the picture.

With regard to the suggestion that there are vacant lands in the maritime provinces, I may say I am not so familiar with the vacant lands in those provinces as I am with Ontario, although my deputy who is sitting here was born and raised in Nova Scotia. I have visited the area where he was born and raised. I have visited most of the areas in Nova Scotia. I just asked my deputy about the lands where he was born, and he says that they are grassed.

Mr. Quelch: They must be productive lands.

Mr. Gardiner: That is true of lands in western Ontario; they are grassed. That does not mean that they are not producing. As a matter of fact, grassed land upon which you are pasturing cattle, having regard to the present price of cattle, may be bringing the farmer more money than they would if he were living there and producing crops by hard labour. In other words it requires a little more labour to produce turnips, and all that kind of thing, and feed them to cattle than to grow grass and pasture the land with cattle. To the extent that is being done both in Ontario and in the maritimes the owner of the land may be taking in more money than can be acquired in any other way. I quite agree there are some arguments in favour of having other kinds of production, and I like to see an agricultural area being cultivated and producing as intensively as it possibly can produce. Whether you can have that or not depends somewhat on the further question as to how dense your population is. That density of population, of course, depends upon the development of industry and other matters, and to the extent that the population is there to consume the type of thing, vegetables and small fruits, which would grow on that intensively cultivated piece of land a market can be found. These things all go together and have something to do with the matter.

The other question which was raised had to do with experimental farms, and particularly experimental plots, illustration stations, or experimental stations in different parts of Canada, and particularly in the province of Alberta. There is an area which has been referred to by the hon. member for Vegreville, who comes from that section, which I think personally, along with the hon. member, requires some special attention. There are areas in other parts of Canada that are similarly situated. The soil is of a little different character from the soils in places where we have stations now, and the people are all pretty much of one nationality, having come here from a section of Europe which is very highly agricultural. The conditions being different from those they were accustomed to there is further reason why we should have a station of some kind there. As the hon. member has suggested, we are quite willing at any time to put in what is called an illustration station. One of the reasons for our willingness in that regard is naturally that the cost is not so high.

The suggestion is made that the illustration station is not so useful. I must say that in going across the country I have wondered sometimes whether that is true or not. In travelling across Alberta and Saskatchewan, and even some of the eastern provinces, I have found our cereals men holding meetings at these little illustration farms, and I have been surprised at the number of people who gathered around listening to the story they were telling. Then I have gone to our experimental farms and I have been surprised at the few times I found anybody there. We have these rather large experimental stations and farms right across the country, and one just wonders sometimes why there are not more people there taking advantage of what can be learned by visiting these places.

On the other hand, when you advertise a class for a certain date at a certain illustration station and have a few of the officials from the department there to give lectures on what this means and what that means, it is surprising the number of people who turn out and examine the rows of grain and walk up and down the rows, and examine the different varieties of cereals that are being produced in those little plots. Then they go home and try to do the same thing themselves, or try to produce in the same way. I would suggest to the hon. member that there is a great deal to be said for the illustration station as a starter at least, even if you are not able to get the experimental farm that is thought to be advisable. At the same time I want to emphasize my own sympathy with the contention that he has made here this afternoon that in that particular area there should be something more than that.

There is no special vote for it in our estimates of this year. There is a general vote for illustration plots which can be enlarged upon somewhat from the small plot, and something along that line could be started this year with the idea that it could be developed into something better. But that is the general position right across the country. Take Beaverlodge, which was mentioned a few moments ago by the hon. member. The first time I went to Beaverlodge, which is up northwest of Edmonton toward the British Columbia boundary, it was just a little better than an illustration station. People were gathered there in a considerable group to listen to the lectures by officials of the department. I happened to be in that section of the country at that time, and I went there. That was probably 15 or 16 years ago now. I was back there two years ago, and I was agreeably surprised—and I emphasize the word "surprised"—to find just how much I had been able to persuade this house to pass by way of votes in order to improve and enlarge upon the plant which is there. It is now quite an important experimental farm, with very much more equipment than I expected to find when I went to visit it, and very much more in the way of buildings. But I would suggest to hon. members that they not be too anxious about getting started at the top. If you cannot get started in any other way than at the bottom, then start at the bottom. Get started, and no doubt as we go along and have experience with it we will be able to do even more than is expected by some.

With respect to the production of sugar beets and other products of that kind on our farm lands, we have specialties of course right across the country, and we do co-operate in every possible way with the provinces in connection with their development. But I have followed the practice while I have been in the department—and I think it is the proper practice to follow—of relying considerably upon the provincial departments of agriculture to give the lead in the agitation for a certain use of land as compared with the use that has been made of it previously. The obvious reason for that is that after all it is the provinces that deal with these people as individual farmers. They have to do with building the roads for them; they have to do with putting in schools for them; they have to do with all the developments that are to take place there. Therefore I hesitate, as Minister of Agriculture for the dominion, to say that people ought to be growing more sugar beets some place, or they ought to be growing tobacco here and corn somewhere else. I think that lead should be given by the provinces; then we can come along and help not only in the further production but in finding markets for the products. We think that we ought to do that to the greatest extent possible.

I was very pleased to hear what has been said with regard to all these products in order that we might be in a better position to assist with them as we go along.

I have been waiting until the leader of the opposition came back to say this to him, and I want to say it now. We had a little discussion this morning about an agreement that was entered into in the early part of the session. I want to say to him that he carried out his agreement with me in every particular. There was no way in which he broke his agreement. The same is true of the leader of the C.C.F. party. The only agreement I got from the leader of the Social Credit party when I made the suggestion was that he waved his hand to me. Well, unfortunately, that does not appear in Hansard and there is no reference in Hansard to anything he said. The leader of the official opposition said that he was within reason prepared to go along and get this legislation through and, as a matter of fact, if you look in Hansard you will find that we jumped all the different two days' notices that we give from one step to another, and we went completely over into committee. It was in committee that we took up considerable time, but the leaders all agreed to facilitate passage. I knew the leaders did not have an opportunity between the time I was talking to them and the time we came into the house to talk to all their members, or to hold a caucus of their groups or anything of that kind and to tell them. I can understand that some individual members did not know, and that they may have taken up more time than otherwise they would have taken up. But I am simply saying now that I agree with what the leader of the opposition said this morning, that he did carry out any undertaking he gave; and that is true of the leaders of the other groups as well.

Mr. Brooks: The minister did not answer the question I asked him.

Mr. Gardiner: On the question of feed grain freight, I have wondered sometimes why farmers do not take it for granted that, since we have been paying the freight since 1941, we are likely to go on paying it. We are always in the position, no matter how we go about it, that we can change at any time, even if we had legislation which stated that it was continuous until further notice. That is all the legislation does say, as a matter of fact; it can be withdrawn at any time. In the manner in which we are operating now, we go on from year to year. Under the provisions we now have, the government simply say they will continue it until next year, and we pass our estimate for that purpose.

I did announce yesterday when I brought down the estimates that there was in them an amount of $11,125,000 to cover feed grains freight assistance for this year. I am not at all satisfied that I would be able to have any more than that done. The government rather feels that this is something which may require changing from time to time. I have not heard any suggestion that it ought to be cut out, but there has been a suggestion made that perhaps it should be changed.

It has not been changed materially except when freight rates have been changed; we have made some changes in order to bring it into line with changes in freight rates. However, it has gone on now for quite a few years on much the same basis, and I would imagine some special condition would have to arise to bring about a discontinuance of the payments.

Mr. Drew: There is just one matter I wish to make clear in relation to what the Minister of Agriculture said about the agreement that was referred to on an earlier occasion. I think it is necessary to leave no uncertainty as to what the agreement was and as to what was under discussion, in view of certain earlier debate in relation to which the minister and I had some comments to make this morning.

I am very pleased that the minister has without reservation stated that I carried out any undertaking I gave. I do however think there should be more on the record than has already been told. The discussion arose because of a charge that the hon. member for Lake Centre had failed to carry out an agreement. I want to make it clear as to what the agreement was. That agreement was to permit a measure to provide for compensation to those who had lost animals as a result of foot-and-mouth disease to have priority over any other legislation.

The session was just beginning, and ordinarily we would have proceeded with other government business. I was approached and asked what my position would be in regard to the introduction of a measure which would make it possible to deal immediately with compensation. It was pointed out that the passing of such a measure would help to restore confidence among the farmers who were losing animals in this way, and also that it would encourage other farmers to report the disease as quickly as possible, if it appeared, because they would know that there was going to be some provision made for them.

Naturally I agreed immediately to that proposal. There was no undertaking as to length of debate or otherwise. Most certainly there was no suggestion that there would not be adequate discussion of the measure which came before us. Hansard will show that this important legislation was dealt with expeditiously. I do wish to say in relation to this that not only was my undertaking as leader of the Progressive Conservative party carried out, but that there was no single member of this party who in any way opposed the adoption of the legislation or who failed to carry out the spirit as well as the letter of that undertaking.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not going to read what took place, because it would take some time to do it; but it bears out pretty much the statement that has been made by the leader of the opposition. Hon. members will find the arrangement that was entered into clearly stated to the House of Commons at page 32 of Hansard for this session.

I am simply going to leave it there, and say that anyone who wishes to read what the understanding was may do so. I spoke, stating what the understanding was. Then the leader of the official opposition spoke very much along the lines he has spoken today. The leader of the C.C.F. followed and stated his position. Then, as I say, my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party agreed by a wave of his hand, as much as to say, "Go ahead". And we proceeded from that point to do whatever was required.

I just wish to make it understood that there was some understanding; and my suggestion is that, so far as the groups as such were concerned, they carried it out.

Mr. Drew: Just to tie it in—because it has been the subject of discussion in as well as outside the house, apparently with the purpose of creating the impression that the hon. member for Lake Centre had failed to carry out an undertaking—I wish to make it abundantly clear that when we agree at any time to permit the introduction of legislation in this manner, we certainly do not agree to abandon any opportunity for debate or such discussion of a measure which is introduced as is regarded as appropriate under the circumstances.

I wish to leave no doubt as to the suggestion that the hon. member for Lake Centre in any way impeded the proceedings of the house or failed to carry out any undertaking. I repeat that the hon. member for Lake Centre and all other members of this party fully carried out any undertaking or understanding to which I had been a party.

Mr. Fair: When the legislation dealing with compensation in respect of animals was before the house, I was one of the first members to speak for this group. On that occasion, while I spoke for only a moment or two, I stated that I did not feel any good could be accomplished by prolonging the debate. I believe our actions during the sittings of the committee and since that time have indicated that we have carried out entirely the sign made by our leader, the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Gardiner: Before we leave that, and before the leader of the opposition leaves the chamber, I wish to say that I agree with what the leader of the opposition has said, and what others have said. But I am sure the leader of any of the groups would be the first to say that whatever arrangement had been made did not bind individuals. I think those of us who are also individuals in the house will have to be allowed to hold our own opinions with regard to the actions of any individual in relation to the matter. That is the right of other members of the house, as well as the right of those who occupy opposition benches.

Mr. Fair: I agree with the hon. member who has said that if we did not have the opportunity to express our opinions, there would be no use in our coming here. When the day comes that I cannot express my opinion, I shall stay at home.

I understand the hon. member for Vegreville has requested the establishment of an experimental station in his constituency. While I was not in the chamber to hear what he said—I was busy attending to other matters elsewhere—I believe he has made a good suggestion. When the minister is considering it, I would ask him to consider at the same time the request made by the farmers of Derwent district, located 25 miles north of Vermilion. This request was made about two years ago to have not an experimental station but an illustration station established at that point. Quite a number of farmers have asked for it, and they are very interested. Personally, while not farming at the present time, I believe a very good service is being rendered by the department. I should like to see the practice extended. With respect to the P.F.R.A. about which the minister has spoken, I have been one of those who have requested on many occasions that the northerly limit be extended farther north than the present limit of Lloydminster. I should like to know whether the minister can give us some information with respect to that matter.

Mr. Charlton: In all fairness to the hon. member for Lake Centre; even in spite of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture says that what was right and what was wrong has been clearly understood; also in view of the fact that I took some part in that debate, I should like to make it very clear—and it is to be found on page 32 of Hansard for March 3 if anybody wants to read it—that the leader of the opposition did not at any time consent to the passage of that bill without discussion. At no time did he do that. He only agreed that the bill be brought in without the necessary notice and that it be proceeded with before proceeding with other orders of business. That was the only consent he gave. The Minister of Agriculture is leaving the impression—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not leaving any impression. I have said what I wish to say.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It seems to me we have had a fairly complete discussion of this question. We are now considering item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. The hon. member is now discussing a procedural matter which occurred several months ago. That discussion has been allowed to go on for a certain length of time, but surely it has been fully covered by now and discussion should cease.

Mr. Charlton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the minister is still leaving the impression that the leader of the opposition gave consent that this thing should go on and that the hon. member for Lake Centre went against that and took some considerable time to discuss it. I myself took some time to discuss it, but I still contend that none of those who took time to discuss that question in the house went against any remarks the leader of the opposition made. I want to read the remarks he made at that time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Charlton: This is what the leader of the opposition said:

> Mr. Speaker, this is somewhat unusual procedure, but the request relates to a very unusual situation, and I am happy to agree that we proceed in the manner that has been suggested. My remarks, of course, do not cover the contents of the bill, but simply the request that this matter be dealt with now. In saying that my remarks do not cover the contents of the bill, naturally I am not attempting in any way to limit the discussion of its contents, which actually are not yet before hon. members. I welcome the fact that a measure which is designed to meet a very serious situation, and to restore confidence in the area affected, does come before the house so soon.

That should be quite plain.

Mr. Fulton: I want to say a few words, first of all on the subject of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the question of its extension to other parts of Canada besides the three prairie provinces. I shall be brief and very general at this stage because I want to ask one or two specific questions when we come to the particular item in the estimates. However, with respect to the general aspect of the matter I think the minister will agree with me when I say that I have on a number of occasions, urged—and indeed supported the suggestion of the minister—that there be an extension of the act so that it might have general application to the whole of Canada, as he has himself suggested this afternoon.

I recall an occasion in 1947 when it was understood, or at any rate, certainly it was very strongly hoped, that legislation extending the act would be introduced. My recollection is that the proposal at that time was to have two separate bills, one extending it westward to British Columbia and another making it of application in the eastern part of Canada. I have never ceased to hold the view that the general provisions of the act should be extended so that instead of prairie farm rehabilitation engineers being called upon to go into our province, as at present, only when certain specific local projects arise, or only when specific requests are received from provincial authorities, they might take part, in co-operation with the provincial authorities it is true, in a general study of all problems of water conservation and land reclamation as well as irrigation which the minister has said vary so widely from area to area in our province.

I have been particularly interested in the question of a general study of the joint problems of irrigation, flood control and power development in the Fraser river system where all these three problems exist, and in the lower reaches of the Fraser where the problems of reclamation and diking exist. I have urged and still urge that, although a study is now going forward on that matter, there should be a clearer definition of the federal authority under which that study is going forward. While I have the highest admiration and respect for both the dominion and provincial officials who are taking part in the study, and while I know they are making all the progress they can with the resources at their disposal, my feeling is there could be a greater drive and sense of urgency from the top. It is my feeling that at the present time there is not that sense of urgency and push behind the thing from this level that perhaps there might be. That drive from above is one of the things which I think would result if an act were passed making the principles of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration of general application to the whole of Canada.

While I do not necessarily say I will wait until he himself brings it forward, I want to assure the minister that if at any time he does bring forward such a proposal he can count on my immediate and full support. I hope indeed that he and the government as a whole will take these remarks as an indication from me that I think this matter should be proceeded with now. My recollection is that the last time we discussed the matter on the minister's estimates he told me that it had been his intention, as I think he said today, every year since 1947 to bring in bills along the lines of those which he discussed, but I think it was in 1950 or 1951 when he told me that because of the sudden way in which defence requirements had taken priority it had been decided that, temporarily, it would not be possible to proceed with that policy. My recollection again is that he assured me in reply to a question that I was correct in assuming this was only a temporary postponement.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: I am sure we can give those words their literal interpretation. While I realize that defence requirements and the priority of defence expenditure still exist, nevertheless I hope we will not be compelled to defer too long our hope that the project can be proceeded with. If the minister is in a position at this time to give us any general outline of what the position is with respect to the relationship between defence priority and this type of project, I think it would be very helpful.

Then, Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to ask the minister a question or two with relation to the support price policy for beef which he announced recently as a result of the closing of the United States market to our cattle. I ask these questions at this time because I have to say that my correspondence and conversations with the minister and some of his officials have not yet produced an answer to these questions satisfactory to myself or to the B.C. beef cattle growers association who have their head office in my constituency. The questions relate to the specific application of the price support program to cattle originating in British Columbia.

It has been drawn to my attention that as a result of personal interviews by the manager of one of our largest cattle ranches—as a matter of fact the largest in Canada—as a result of his personal views with the officials of the packing plants operating in the city of Vancouver he was advised they had no instructions from the department as to any support price policy for beef originating in and marketed in British Columbia. They had instructions with respect to the handling of beef marketed in British Columbia but originating in provinces other than British Columbia, but they had no instructions with regard to British Columbia beef. Indeed they indicated to this gentleman that as far as they were concerned the lack of such instructions from the department indicated that there was no support price program for beef originating in British Columbia, and so the association asked me to take this matter up and find out why that should be the case.

When I discussed it with the deputy minister and later with the minister it was indicated to me that one reason is that British Columbia is a deficiency province; that is, it does not produce all the beef which we ourselves consume, and further, that Vancouver market prices are well over the floor price which would apply under the support program and therefore there did not seem to be any practical reason why instructions should be issued at this time as to how to apply price support to British Columbia beef.

Well, Mr. Chairman, it has been indicated to me quite clearly by the B.C. beef cattle growers association that they do not regard that as a satisfactory answer. One of the reasons they are not satisfied, as pointed out by the secretary of the association in a letter to the deputy minister, a copy of which I have received, is that it has been their experience that—

> . . . unless the machinery is set up beforehand there are always delays in putting a scheme like price support into effect when it is needed.

That answer relates to the statements which have been made by the departmental officials that there is no need for such instructions to be issued at this time because British Columbia prices are well above the floor. The concern of our cattlemen is that although that is true at the present time, nevertheless our cattle will be moving on to the market from the grass in increasing numbers toward the end of this month, and from then on in increasing numbers through the rest of the year. Should any surplus on the market occur as a result of the American embargo, or as a result of some difficulty developing in the four-way meat deal between Canada, the United States, New Zealand and Great Britain, then a support price would be an immediate necessity in British Columbia.

It was relating to that statement by the department and from a practical point of view that they say:

> . . . we have always found that, unless the machinery is set up beforehand there are always delays in putting a scheme like price support into effect when it is needed.

Other reasons they advance as to why there should be instructions issued now to packers in British Columbia may be found in this passage of the letter from the secretary to the deputy minister:

> Although marketing on the Vancouver yards has increased lately such marketing is still confined to smaller shipments and does not reflect the bulk of sales of the better cattle. These are bought at country shipping points by the packer buyers. In most cases the B.C. livestock producers' co-operative association has a salesman there to act for producers. In many ways the average of prices at these shipping points is a truer reflection of cattle prices in British Columbia than the Vancouver yards, operated by the same co-operative.

The point there, which I am sure the minister and his officials will appreciate, is that the department has been relying, in their answers to the association, on the prices quoted at the Vancouver yards. The fact is that, from now on particularly, the bulk of the buying in British Columbia, as our own cattle come on the market, will be done at the interior points of origin of the cattle and not on the Vancouver market. The prices there may not necessarily be the same as Vancouver prices. Therefore unless support price instructions are issued to the packers so that their buyers will know how it operates and will clearly understand that support prices do apply in British Columbia, these packer buyers may feel free to try to buy cattle at the interior points at less than the floor price.

Then the letter goes on to say:

. . . you say that you are asking the board . . .

That is the agricultural prices support board.

. . . to review the question of purchase of cattle originating in B.C. This association is in full accord with the sense of that paragraph, and it is in fact the nub of our contention that when British Columbia cattle of the specified grades and weights are available they should be eligible for support board purchase; otherwise, the packers will not be interested in them. Within the next thirty days...

This letter is dated June 20.

. . . we shall be moving dry cows and heifers, many of which will come within the specifications. Most of these will be offered at country points. For this reason I trust that the board will soon accept carcasses of cattle originating in B.C. on the same basis as from other provinces.

The letter goes on to pay a compliment and I think I should read this as well:

Your department is to be congratulated on arranging the exchange plan between Canada, New Zealand, United States and Great Britain. I believe that favourable comment on this would have been made at our annual meeting had it not been that producers in this province appeared to be specifically excluded from participation.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the minister will now say that, although it may have been the situation perhaps up to the present that prices in B.C. generally have been above the floor, nevertheless because this matter is of such great concern to our producers, and in the light of the arguments advanced by them, there is no reason why he should not issue instructions to the packers in British Columbia making it clear that beef support prices apply to beef originating in our province just as they apply to beef originating in other provinces. That should be made clear to the packers.

Before I take my seat I want to refer to one other thing mentioned this afternoon. It is the matter of experimental farms. I want to express the appreciation of the cattle growers of British Columbia, particularly in my district, for the re-establishment in the last five or six years of a range experimental station and the establishment of the experimental farm at Kamloops. What the minister said with respect to finding that a relatively small number of people go to those experimental stations for instruction on what is going on, may apply elsewhere but it has not been my impression with respect to the establishment in Kamloops. Certainly it has been my impression that the cattle growers of our district are interested in this problem generally and are very appreciative of the good work being done by the staff of that range station and farm. If the situation which the minister outlines is of general application then I shall be very glad indeed to discuss it with the association and see if there cannot be found ways to make them aware, and to make all their members aware of what goes on there and of the value to them of actually going for consultation and visits to that farm.

I want to assure the minister that the cattle growers in my area appreciate what is done there and would not want him or any of his officials to have the impression that they regard it only as of passing interest. I know they appreciate it and I shall certainly try to see, if it is the case that there have not been many who visit and take advantage of the services available, that the situation is rectified in the future.

Mr. Gardiner: In view of the fact that the hon. member has raised this question, which I am sure is in the minds of a number of members, and has stated it in relation to an area which has been the last to benefit by what has developed in connection with the arrangements with Britain and New Zealand, perhaps I should deal with the matter at this time. In introducing the estimates yesterday I said that our main problem in connection with the marketing of products this year has developed from the fact that we had foot-and-mouth disease, and the adjustments that had to be made as a result of that. I believe it is quite proper to say that there would not have been any floor price under cattle or beef if it had not been for that epidemic.

The question that was being discussed all across Canada prior to that was whether we should not have a ceiling price. The consumers were very much worked up over the fact that prices were so high during 1951 and were continuing at that level in 1952. If there was any agitation for anything, it was for the control of that situation. But as soon as we had foot-and-mouth disease the price dropped. If the governments had not done anything—I take into account both provincial governments and the federal government —there is very little doubt in my mind that the price of cattle would have gone down to 15 cents or perhaps 10 cents a pound. When you throw on the market a quarter of the product which had been sold outside the country, and say there is no place it can be sold except in this country, that can have only one result and that is to push the price down.

I have noticed some criticism, which I am sure none of the members of this house would agree with, in some articles that have been written across the country to the effect that we should have allowed that to happen. The producer had benefited so long from higher prices, the consumer should have been permitted to get the advantage of lower prices for a while. I do not believe there has been much support for that idea, either amongst the consumers or any other body of people.

Mr. Fulton: The farmer was just beginning to enjoy prices which enabled him to live at a standard comparable to the rest of the country.

Mr. Gardiner: It was quite strongly expressed for a short time. We took the position that we should put a floor under cattle and we should offer to buy. We set the price at 25 cents a pound for good steers, but we did not expect the price would remain at that level for any great length of time, although we did expect we might buy some at that price. We not only established the price at 25 cents; we established at different points prices we would pay for beef based upon that 25 cents. In other words there was a floor set at Winnipeg, at Regina, at Saskatoon, at Calgary, at Edmonton and at Vancouver, as well as at eastern points.

The provinces took certain actions which, for a time, made it impossible for the floor price to operate freely. When we made arrangements with Britain, New Zealand and the United States to make possible the marketing of the surplus from this country, we did make the provision that we were prepared to buy anywhere at a price for meat which would bear the proper relationship to the 25 cents for good steers. There was a period—it might have been a week or two weeks, I have not looked up the records —when we were only buying meat from Alberta and Ontario. The fundamental reason for that was that the storages in those two places were filled to the roof. Farmers could not get their animals in at all, or when they did get them into the yard they got a much lower price than they should have received because the packers had no room in the storage plants. We took action just as fast as possible, and it was in those two markets that most of the heavy cattle were to be found. They had been prepared for the United States market. There was no considerable market in this country for that heavy beef, so we went into Alberta and Ontario and bought those heavy steers first. This accounts for the fact that we set a certain weight level below which we would not buy for a time. We advised holding other weights at home.

Then when we got rid of that we expressed our willingness to buy in other places. We did not buy in Manitoba until that province removed its controls. We did not buy very much in British Columbia until British Columbia took off its controls. In the press today I noted the suggestion that Quebec is now removing its controls. Well, that causes me to say that we have not forced anybody to take off controls. We took the position we were able to accomplish what we had in mind without using that legal right, which we may have had, to force people to do certain things. We went along, and eventually they have found it to advantage to come along with us, so they came along.

Now, in so far as British Columbia is concerned, I think about the time this letter was written, to which reference has been made, instructions were given to the packers in Vancouver to buy meat for delivery under the British arrangement. My understanding is that a considerable part of the product which is being killed in Vancouver now is going out through the Panama canal to Britain under that arrangement. This, of course, was expected from the beginning, and did come into operation in due course.

With regard to the buying of live animals, I may say that we have bought very few live animals. In Alberta they have a system under which they have operated for a good number of years. Under this system they have auctions throughout the province, and the farmers bring their cattle in to the auctions. Other farmers come there to buy cattle. Farmers who have too many cattle for their grass supply, sell; farmers who have more grass than they have cattle, buy. This system was utilized in Alberta this year. To make cattle available we were prepared to buy them at those sales. We did not have to buy very many. There was only one other province in which it became advisable to encourage the same kind of thing, and that was due largely to the difficulties we had in getting meat out of that province. That was the province in which the disease was found.

We put on some auction sales there, and we did buy a few cattle. Our intention was to put those cattle on pastures, if necessary. I do not think we got any on the pastures. I have heard of one bull that we got on the pasture, but I do not think we got any other cattle on the pasture. We bought some cattle at these sales, but before we got them away from the yards some farmer came along and took them to his pasture at a little higher price, or some packer came along and bought them if they were fit for killing. We got rid of them in that way, so we did not actually get any on these pastures, so far as I know. I say that here to give some publicity to it because of the criticism I heard the other day. Some Ontario farmer who was purchasing livestock made the remark, "What kind of market are we going to have this fall when the government has put 10,000 cattle on pasture out west, and will bring them on the market?"

That could have happened, but it did not happen. We agreed to buy the cattle. We did not get them. We have not been getting cattle largely because of the fact that we had the British agreement, and the meat has been moving. Instead of getting cattle, we are getting meat. That meat is going out of the country from day to day and is being disposed of. It is therefore quite proper to say that the offer is made to buy meat at floor prices at the Vancouver plant, the same as it is at other plants. I think now that probably is true at all plants right across the country; the offer is there to buy.

The fact is that we are not getting much right now. We cleared the markets in the few weeks down to the point where we are not getting much right now. This is the time of the year when we hope we do not get much. After all there is a certain amount of stored meat that still has to be sold on this market, in addition to the meat that is being sold over in the old land. We hope to get our storages cleared down to as low a level as possible before the rush of cattle starts to come in toward the end of September, on into October and for the remaining months of the year. We are therefore not overly anxious to have cattle brought into the plants or to the government at present. The farmers also are not overly anxious to bring them in, and they do not do so.

To come to our friends at Kamloops, may I say there is nothing in the world to prevent the farmers at Kamloops from doing the same thing the farmers in Alberta did. Probably there is nothing in the world to prevent this government from doing the same thing there as they did at a number of points in Saskatchewan. If they feel inclined to do so, the farmers themselves can put on an auction. If they do so, I am quite sure the government would not hesitate to put in a buyer at that auction, as I think they have done in the last week, under some pressure, at Lloydminster, where they would buy, I presume, from either side of the provincial boundary line. But that plant at Lloydminster is privately owned and operated. They have asked to have a government buyer sent there in order to offer to buy live animals at that market, the same as is done at other auctions.

I think that could be arranged at Kamloops. I do not know of any reason why it could not be arranged. It could be arranged either with government support or without it. The fact that we are prepared to buy meat at a floor price down at Vancouver means that they have established for them the floor price at which the animals can be sold in Kamloops, shipped down to Vancouver and slaughtered. We will take the meat there at the floor price. There is nothing to prevent people in any part of British Columbia from organizing themselves and getting that done, just as they have organized in other provinces to have it done in their own way and under the system they are accustomed to.

I do not think I need to say anything more in order to indicate that we are attempting at least to have the same set-up right across the country and to co-operate with those who have animals to sell in order to see to it that the prices are about the same. I think the best indication that we are successful is to be found in the newspaper reports of the markets. I consult the papers every morning when I come to my office. I find that the markets are a little bit above the floor right from one end of Canada to the other, and considerably above the floor for the higher qualities of beef. I think that means that the Canadian public is prepared to bid a higher price for the choice beef than they are prepared to bid for some of the lower grades of beef that are being shipped to other markets. It seems to indicate that we in this country prefer the choicer cuts. We are probably paying 28 to 29 cents now for choice steers whereas a short time ago we could not get better than 24 or 25 cents.

Mr. Fulton: From the minister's answer do I understand that instructions have now been issued to the packers operating in British Columbia as to how they should apply the support price to cattle originating in the province and offered to them for sale, whether it be for domestic marketing or for shipment under the four-way meat deal?

Mr. Gardiner: What actually happens is this. The only thing we buy is for the four-way meat deal. But the fact that we pay the floor price for that meat makes it impossible for anybody to get anything there at any lower price than the one we pay. We buy all the surplus that is there at that price.

That order has gone to those packing plants just the same as it has gone to every other packing plant in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to cattle originating in British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; with respect to cattle originating in British Columbia or no matter where they originate. As long as the cattle are slaughtered in that plant we are prepared to buy the surplus beef at the floor price. If somebody else comes along and offers more, of course we do not get them, and that meat either stays on the British Columbia market or it could be shipped back further into Canada; but I venture to say that most of it stays on that market.

Mr. Fulton: Just in conclusion may I say the point I was concerned about was my information that with respect to cattle originating in Alberta and Ontario and marketed in British Columbia, the instructions were clear as to how the support price was to be applied; but with respect to cattle originating in British Columbia and marketed in British Columbia the packers had no instructions and were under the impression, according to their advice to the gentleman I have spoken about already, that the lack of instructions must mean they did not have any floor price to apply in British Columbia. If the minister's answer to me is that instructions have now been issued to packers operating in British Columbia in such form that it is clear to them that the support price does apply in British Columbia with respect to cattle originating there and marketed locally as well as to those marketed or bought for the United Kingdom-New Zealand agreement, then I think that will deal with the situation. But I wanted to have it clear from the minister's answer that those instructions have now been issued.

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that there were never any other instructions issued. But I cannot be responsible for the stories that some buyers of cattle may circulate in British Columbia or anywhere else.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, that is not what I said. I said that this gentleman visited at least five packing plants in British Columbia and spoke to their officials, and that was the information given him by all five.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not denying that. All I am saying to the hon. member now is that I cannot follow all of those who may be interested in buying cattle at a lower price for any organization that is slaughtering cattle, whether it is a packing plant or whatever it may be. But the fact is that in every packing plant in this country there is a standing order to buy beef at the floor price; and there is no line drawn between what is marketed locally and what is marketed through the British contract. We have a standing agreement to buy. If, by some means or other, somebody is talking some people into selling them at a lower rate, I cannot be responsible for that.

Mr. Fulton: The weights and classifications which were issued to the packers, according to this information, covered only cattle originating in Alberta and Ontario. The minister himself has referred to this question of the weights which the department indicated they were prepared to support because they were concerned with those animals which had been prepared for the United States market; and it was those weights which they covered first. As I say, the packers had instructions with regard to those weights but only with respect to animals originating in Alberta and Ontario. Up to the time of my last letter, which was dated June 20, corresponding instructions with regard to animals of comparable weights originating in British Columbia had not been received at the packing plants there.

Mr. Gardiner: What I mean by saying it has been true from the beginning is this. It has been true from the beginning of the period when the embargo was removed by British Columbia. We certainly did not go into British Columbia to buy meat at a time when they said they would not take cattle out of Alberta, or they would not take cattle from somewhere else. We said, "We will go in there and buy the meat from cattle brought in and slaughtered." During that period I am sure my hon. friend would not be interested in what happened because their cattle were selling—

Mr. Fulton: The embargo has been removed since the beginning of June or earlier; but the situation I refer to—the absence of instructions—applied, as I say, up to at least June 20.

Mr. Gardiner: Let us say that it does not apply now and it has not applied for some time.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister is making the statement that instructions have now been issued, then he has answered my question. I am sorry it has taken us so long to arrive at that point.

An hon. Member: We are all sorry.

Mr. Riley: In reply to a suggestion made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South with respect to the extension of the principle of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the minister mentioned the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act. I know this comes under another item in the estimates, but I have to be away for a couple of days next week and I thought perhaps I would miss the item when it came up.

Since I come from a district which has received benefit in a material way from this act I think I should congratulate the minister and the officials of his department who are administering the act on behalf of the residents of Albert county in my constituency who are benefiting. At the same time I should like to know whether the minister can give me any assurance that the project which has been suggested, namely that of damming the Shepody river in Albert county, which will result in the reclamation of some thousands of acres of good farm land and give a somewhat better development to many more thousands of acres, will receive the real consideration of the minister and the officials of his department in the early future.

Mr. Laing: I was wondering whether we could revert from the maritimes back to Vancouver beef. I was surprised to hear criticism of the arrangements that have been made by the interdepartmental committee, particularly with respect to the province of British Columbia. If there is one province or one particular area in which the interdepartmental committee, which is an excellent committee, has done work it is in my own province of British Columbia. There was for a period of some two days no provision for packers in the Vancouver area to kill the heavy meat out of Alberta, but that was corrected by the committee. A man named Mr. Hall of the Department of Trade and Commerce took up immediately with the shipping companies out of the port of Vancouver the question of providing reefer space via the canal, and the matter of rates; and Mr. Evans of the Furness Withy line and the Vancouver secretary of the Pacific conference took up with the shippers the matter of bringing in a rate that would give shipments out of Alberta to Vancouver via the canal a comparable position with reefer car shipments to Montreal and then reefer shipments across the Atlantic.

As a result of the efforts of that committee and the co-operation of the shipping companies we are in a position where Vancouver today has the advantage of 70 cents per hundred. The result is that one packer alone picked up 2,700 heavies, and I believe he raised the price by going into that market and picking them up in that way. We are very well pleased in the province of British Columbia. We are customarily buyers of large quantities of Alberta meat, and I think most of the people in British Columbia realize that the most severe situation at that time existed in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Our response in taking meat out, whether going east or west, relieved the situation in those provinces, and I think this is one of the best jobs the government has ever done. We could have had utter chaos in the meat business if that were not done.

I am going to say this. Notwithstanding the fact that I come from a riding and represent a people where there are no cows or chickens at all, I realize that the thing that keeps this country together is workingmen's wages plus the annual crop on Canadian farms, the cash crop. If these can be kept in proper balance and proper relationship one to the other we will have good times in this country. If either fails we will not have good times. I think the department's work in this matter of marketing and sustaining the prices of meat in Canada until the United States market is open again should be praised by everyone in this House of Commons, not only those from those areas which are producing meat in vast quantities but from all of British Columbia, because the economy of one part depends upon the economy of all. We particularly in British Columbia, I repeat, have been admirably well treated by this interdepartmental committee and the officials down here.

Mr. Bryce: I want to ask the minister a question to clear my own thinking, because I have had a few letters recently in regard to freight assistance. I wrote back what I thought was right. I am now beginning to wonder whether I really was right. I thought that whoever was getting grain by way of purchase at the head of the lakes paid approximately $6 a ton freight on it, and then the government paid the rest of the assistance. I should like the minister to tell me whether I am right or wrong. If I am wrong, will the minister be good enough to put the regulations on Hansard, then I shall look over my correspondence and correct the mistakes I have made.

Mr. Gardiner: That is approximately so. It is as near to the exact thing as can be stated. What the hon. member has said to those who have written to him is correct. As I understand it, the freight is paid by the person who ships grain out in western Canada. The freight down to Fort William on the grain is charged against him. Then the government pays the freight from Fort William to the central point in the east from which it is distributed to farmers in the different areas to which it is shipped. It may not work out at our paying exactly all the freight, but it works out very closely to that.

Mr. Bryce: The point I want to clear up is this. The man or the company getting the grain in Montreal, in Newfoundland or in Prince Edward Island, pays only approximately $6 a ton, and the government pays the rest?

Mr. Gardiner: No; we are presumed to be paying the freight from Fort William east to the point from which it is distributed locally. We do not pay the local freight. That is different.

Mr. Bryce: Just at the main point?

Mr. Gardiner: But we only pay it provided we are satisfied that the feeder of the grain gets the benefit. If it is demonstrated to us that the person who is handling the grain gets the benefit, that he does not pass it on, we would refuse to pay. The intention of the whole policy is that the freight assistance is given to the feeder of the grain, not to anybody who is handling in between or anyone in that position. The intention is that we pay the freight from Fort William to the distribution point, let us say Montreal or Toronto or dfferent points in Ontario and Quebec, and the same applies to the maritimes.

Mr. Wright: I wish to commend the minister on the policy he established in setting up auctions in the province of Saskatchewan to purchase cattle. Some time during the discussion I should like the minister to give us the points at which these sales are made or where the auction points were established, and the numbers and grades of cattle purchased at them. The minister may not have the information now, but he can give it sometime later.

Mr. Gardiner: So far as I know there are four points up to the present time, Yorkton, Prince Albert, Battleford and Lloydminster. The committee is under instructions to set up the organization whenever it can be properly set up. That requires weighing facilities and everything that is necessary in connection with the handling of stock under those circumstances. But an application would have to be made in the first place. Our arrangement is with the livestock branch of the Saskatchewan pool. They have been authorized to put them in wherever the facilities are available, and where they can put them in.

Mr. Catherwood: Mr. Chairman, I think the discussion yesterday and this afternoon, since the estimates of this department have been before the committee, has been most profitable. Indeed, this has been the most interesting discussion on agriculture generally since I have come to parliament. Hon. members appreciate the fact, Mr. Chairman, that you have given them considerable leeway by way of permitting a free discussion of their problems on this item.

Agriculture is a vital industry in Canada. I would ask permission to speak for two or three moments to place before the minister some thoughts that have occurred to me. Yesterday and today the position of agriculture in Canada has been fully discussed, and we have heard reference to the number of abandoned farms, particularly in the maritime provinces. I might add that this situation also applies, to a certain extent, in that part of Ontario from which I come. To my mind, however, it is not so much a matter of abandoned farms as the condition of those farms across the country. When our United States friends come to visit us in Ontario, they are unfavourably impressed by the unpainted buildings and the fact that the condition of our farms is not what it should be. I believe the same can be said of the condition we find as we travel across the country.

The farmer offers perhaps the greatest single market in this country for industrial production; no one will question that statement. If a farmer has an income of $5,000 or $6,000 a year, he will spend it. If he needs additional equipment, if he must make extensive repairs, he will spend the money on it. Hon. members can depend upon it that if the farmer has money, he will spend it for needed supplies. It was suggested this afternoon by the hon. member for Melfort that cost of feed constitutes an important item in the economy of agriculture. There can be no doubt as to the truth of that statement. It is my view that at its central experimental station the department might give greater and more serious consideration to these feed costs. With the farm prices beginning to come down, as compared with what they were, farmers now find that costs of operation are more burdensome. I trust that this fact will have the serious consideration of the government.

Then this afternoon the minister referred to agricultural prices support. I was pleased to listen to the discussion, and to have the minister's explanation. The Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed in 1944. Hon. members will be surprised to learn the small amount of money spent for this purpose.

Figures show that from 1944 until March of 1951 less than $10 million has been spent for the support of agricultural prices. I agree with the minister's statement that there may be some people in the country who are opposed to the support of agricultural prices. I believe it can be said, however, that speaking generally people throughout the country, including our urban friends, now realize the importance of agriculture to the economy of this country, and are willing to have this important industry get a square deal. I trust the minister will give serious consideration to the matter of price support whenever occasion arises.

Anyone who voices criticism of the amounts spent for the support of agricultural prices in this country will be interested to know what this same process has cost the United States government. From a percentage standpoint, price support for the products of Canadian farms amounted to only one-seventh of one per cent of the national income, up to March 31, 1951. On the other hand 12 per cent has been paid out of the coffers of our American friends for a similar purpose. This is a most significant figure, and will be of particular interest to our urban friends who are now beginning to realize the importance of agriculture in our economy. It will be clear to them at once that, on this comparative basis, the support of agricultural prices has not cost this country anything like the amount of money some people had believed.

Those are the only two comments I wished to make at this time. I have further questions to ask, but I shall be content to ask them when the items are called. I would impress upon hon. members the fact that agriculture is the one industry in Canada that must have support. The Agricultural Prices Support Act is there for that purpose and, in the light of the figures I have indicated, no one can criticize the amount of money that has been spent or may be spent in the future for this purpose.

Item stands.

GERM WARFARE

STATEMENTS OF DR. ENDICOTT—ANSWER OF CERTAIN CANADIAN ENTOMOLOGISTS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if I might revert to motions I should like to make a statement.

[Mr. Catherwood.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson: I should like to make a supplementary statement concerning Dr. James Endicott. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), to whom it was first sent, has forwarded to me a convincing rebuttal of Dr. Endicott's libellous and false charges that the United States has been guilty of bacteriological warfare in Korea and northeast China. It is the work of three distinguished Canadian entomologists, namely, Dr. W. H. Brittain, F.R.S.C., F.A.I., vice-principal, dean of faculty and professor of entomology, Macdonald college, McGill university; Dr A. W. Baker, B.S.A., head of the department of entomology and zoology of the Ontario agricultural college, and Dr. C. E. Atwood, M.S.A., professor of zoology, university of Toronto.

When, on Wednesday last, in replying to questions previously asked by members of the opposition concerning Dr. Endicott, I justified the government's policy in relation to him in part upon the principles of freedom of speech and freedom of the press, I did not expect that there would be available within four days a clear vindication of these principles.

None of these scientists is in the employ of the federal government. As free men in a free society, without any sort of government compulsion, direction or inspiration, they have, upon their own initiative, produced this reply to Dr. Endicott's untruths concerning bacteriological warfare and, having produced it, turned it over at once to the parliament and the government of their country.

The statement of Drs. Brittain, Baker and Atwood is so important a contribution to this bacteriological warfare question that I propose to lay it upon the table with sufficient copies to supply all of the members of the house and the press gallery.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order:

House again in committee on Bill No. 62, intituled: An act to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation.—(As amended).—Mr. Larson.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 62, an act to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation, is very contentious. I assume that orders 19 to 90 on the order paper are more or less non-contentious, and with the unanimous consent of the house I would be prepared to allow Bill No. 62 to stand until orders 19 to 90 inclusive have been dealt with.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order stands.

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 364, intituled: An act to incorporate the Canadian Shipowners Mutual Assurance Association.—(Without amendment).—Mr. Macnaughton.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that all these bills that are to be studied in committee be referred to the committee in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: This bill has been to the committee.

Mr. Knowles: No, it has not. The sponsor is over here.

Mr. Sinclair: I meant to the standing committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The order is for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole upon orders 19 to 90 inclusive on the order paper under standing order 110.

CANADIAN SHIPOWNERS MUTUAL ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 364, to incorporate the Canadian Shipowners Mutual Assurance Association—Mr. Macnaughton—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: We shall first study Bill No. 364, to incorporate the Canadian Shipowners Mutual Assurance Association. This bill has been considered by the standing committee on banking and commerce and has been reported without amendment.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Green: It is my understanding that this bill is supposed to fit in with the measure passed by the house within the last day or two providing for war risks insurance. Will the sponsor explain to the committee the manner in which the operation will be carried out so the two bills will work together?

Mr. Macnaughton: The bill under consideration is a private bill for the purpose of forming together the ship owners in Canada who wish to carry insurance on their ships on the high seas against certain war risks. Under normal conditions the marine insurance companies of course issue policies on ships, but when we encounter a state of war or, for that matter, even when we run into conditions of banditry or agitation such as we had on the Suez canal a few months ago, or riot, insurrection, rebellion or anything else of that kind, there is no coverage for the owners of ships. Consequently over 150 years ago, in the early 1800's groups of ship owners in England gathered together and formed associations or clubs through which, in return for a small premium, they shared the risks on the various ships under insurance among all ship owners.

During the first and second world wars, there being no possibility of Canadian ship owners having that type of insurance in Canada, our ship owners were obliged to go to the United States or the United Kingdom and insure with one of these clubs or associations. It is a matter of pride that the Canadian marine fraternity are now strong enough and numerous enough and have enough insurable value to form their own club or association, and that they are proposing to do by means of this bill. The bill simply means that in the event of war risks arising or in the event of a state of war coming into existence, ship owners may insure their ships on a mutual basis through this club or association in return for a reasonable premium. The risks are shared by all the ship owners who are members of the association. In turn, inasmuch as a state of war is considered an unnatural state as compared to a peaceful state, it is felt that during wartime it is proper for the government to step in and carry some of the risk for ship owners who may be sailing their ships from one port to another. As I have said, the risks during wartime are unnatural and consequently to cover these risks the government had to set up its own reinsurance scheme, which it did in virtue of Bill No. 336 which was passed here some two or three weeks ago.

In virtue of that bill the government sets aside in the consolidated revenue fund a certain sum against which any charges would be made and from which any payments would come. These unnatural risks which are technically called "queen's enemy risks" are, for example, the following: danger from submarines, from bombing, from mines, from shelling by enemy ships, and from capture by enemy ships. Those particular unnatural risks are covered by the government reinsurance plan. Other extraordinary risks such as attack by pirates, bandits, damage through agitators, riot, insurrection and rebellion would be insured through this association.

I do not know what further details you would like.

Mr. Green: Apparently the shipping companies will have to pay a certain premium?

Mr. Macnaughton: That is right.

Mr. Green: I suppose this association would be responsible for a proportion of any loss, or is it a fact that the bulk of the loss would be borne by the government? I do not just understand how the losses are to be shared.

Mr. Macnaughton: The capital set-up, if I can describe it as such, is fairly simple. Each ship owner who insures a ship with the association pays a certain premium to the association depending on the value. Let us say for the sake of argument that it is 25 cents per hundred dollars—and my figures are imaginary—of that 25 cents perhaps 5 cents would remain with the association. The difference would go to the government under their reinsurance scheme. It is felt that the annual premiums paid by the various ship owners insured with this club are sufficient to start the association off; then if it is not sufficient, if there were a major loss in the first year for example, members would be prorated for their portion of the loss suffered by one of their members. In other words, it is a straight mutual insurance scheme.

A canvass of ship owners recently made indicated that insurable value to at least $112 million would be available.

Mr. Green: Does the government in effect merely act as trustee for the money?

Mr. Macnaughton: Answering your question obliquely, the government certainly controls the money in its possession and must make a report annually to parliament. If there were very serious losses during a sudden outbreak of war those losses would be paid by the government just the same as other war losses have been paid by the government in the past; so in effect I would imagine the government is trustee of its own moneys and the moneys which will eventually be accumulated by the organization are governed by the board of directors elected by the ship owners themselves.

Mr. Green: Are all ship companies in Canada participating in this scheme?

Mr. Macnaughton: All ship owners have the right to apply and become members, with the exception that the applications of course will be screened by the directors of the association. That is a very wise provision because we might not have people who would be good, honest or desirable risks, just as you have in an ordinary insurance company; so the directors keep to themselves the right to refuse applications. But the record and history of the fraternity of ship owners is such that I do not think there is much danger of that.

Mr. Green: Will the association include shipping companies on the great lakes?

Mr. Macnaughton: Yes, provision is made for shipping companies on the great lakes.

Mr. Green: Are they participating actively in this plan? Because it would seem to me that it would make quite a big difference if all shipping on the great lakes as well as deep-sea shipping is to be covered.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

Mr. Macnaughton: My information is that the large ship owners on the Atlantic and on the Pacific are only too willing and in fact anxious to start this scheme, and the lake shipping owners have been approached also and are favourably inclined. There is of course no compulsion used, but they have the opportunity of joining.

Mr. McLure: I suppose if a ship owner has to become a member of the association, as you say, before he gets advantage of this insurance company, I would take it from reading this bill that this is just another insurance company; only they are looking for business by having as many people as possible join the association. Those who join the association get a lower tariff rate on their insurance. Is that right?

Mr. Macnaughton: To only a certain degree. The difference between this association and an ordinary marine insurance company is that the ordinary marine insurance company does not insure the risks contemplated by this bill. We are dealing here with war risks, and an ordinary marine insurance company will not insure against war risks. They have a 48-hour cancellation clause and they also decide whether they care to insure at all in the event of war breaking out. At times Canadian ship owners may not be able to get Canadian insurance at all. During the first two wars they were obliged to go to the United States or the United Kingdom to get that extra protection. This association, however, does not compete with ordinary marine insurance.

Mr. McLure: Another question. How would they operate in comparison with a company like Lloyd's? All our marine insurance, or a great portion of it, goes through that great Lloyd's concern. Would this company that you are promoting here have the same kind of insurance on the cargoes as well as the boats themselves, and can it be taken out at any time without inspection, just the same as you apply for marine insurance at any time with Lloyd's? You can call them up on the telephone and say: My ship is sailing with a cargo valued at so much, and they tell you then and there whether it is covered from the moment you telephone them. Would this company be operated on the regular basis of a concern like Lloyd's or similar agencies?

Mr. Macnaughton: My information is that it will not compete with Lloyd's. As I have tried to point out, there is a difference between ordinary commercial marine insurance and marine insurance during a state of war or conditions approaching a state of war. The Minister of Finance in explaining the government measure used certain phraseology which might prove of interest here. It appears on page 3127 of Hansard of June 11. He stated in effect that when Canadian ship owners were obliged to insure with English companies their claims were paid in sterling and under present conditions that is not very satisfactory to Canadian ship owners. Then, too, the English operators place limits on the amount of insurance which Canadian ship owners can obtain. Then again the cost of replacement is much higher in Canada. Frequently Canadian ship owners found themselves without sufficient insurance when they sustained losses. These are advantages that this bill will give to the Canadian ship owner. There will be the settlement of his loss in Canadian funds and the replacement of his ship in Canadian shipyards.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention that government-owned ships will come under this plan? I think that is quite an important factor, because at the present time there are a large number of ships owned by the government or by crown companies. I presume in the event of another war most of the deep-sea cargo vessels would be owned by a government agency. Will this government fleet be participating in the scheme or is it to be restricted to vessels owned by private companies?

Mr. Macnaughton: I cannot answer that directly, but I have reason to believe that government ships will not participate.

Mr. Knowles: The minister answered that question when I put it to him during the debate on the government bill. He said they would not come under this plan.

Mr. Macnaughton: The minister says, at page 3129 of Hansard for June 11, 1952, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Greenwood:

> Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I notice the minister said that government-owned ships would not participate in any way.
> Mr. Abbott: I did not mean government-owned ships, I meant government-owned aircraft.

I can only deduce from that that government-owned ships would not be participating.

Mr. Green: Would not participate?

Mr. Macnaughton: Would not. I would not want to guarantee that, but I have seen nothing to indicate that they would be included.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of the association.

Mr. Green: Paragraph (a) of section 3 contains the broad general powers of this association, and they do not seem to be restricted to war risks. Is the intention that there can only be insurance against war risk or is power taken by the association to give a broader coverage?

Mr. Macnaughton: Well, certainly the first intention is against war risks. As a general thing in granting charters the legal lights try to include as many powers as they can because you cannot always anticipate every move in the future. After reading these powers, I believe they are in the general terms we usually get in a charter granted by the Secretary of State. Frankly, I do not see any contradiction in these general powers. Naturally, when you insure a ship you also have cargo inside the ship and you have other things pertaining to the ship; that is why they are set out in detail.

Mr. Green: The point I am making is that the powers seem to be broad enough to enable the association to do insurance business. It is not restricted to war risks. There is no mention in that section that I can see of war risks. It just refers to general risks of various kinds. I do not see any mention of war risks at all.

Mr. Macnaughton: In reply I can only say that the marine insurance business has been established for many years. The people following the business are rather skilful, and there has been no pressure by the established marine insurance companies to change the wording of this paragraph. I think they are quite satisfied that this association is not going to enter into active competition, certainly at the present or in the foreseeable future.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Board of directors.

Mr. Green: This section provides for the board of directors. Is there any plan in contemplation for dividing the directors between the east coast shipping, St. Lawrence shipping and the west coast?

Mr. Macnaughton: The first directors of the association are set forth in section 1. One of them comes from Westmount, one from Hampstead, one from Montreal, one from Montreal West, one from Vancouver and one from Halifax. Those are the provisional incorporators and first directors. You will have noticed that there can be up to 21 directors, so the leeway affords opportunity of adding directors across the country.

Mr. McLure: What is the capital of this company? What security have the insured? I do not see any mention here of the amount of capital they have; or do they reinsure all their risks?

Mr. Macnaughton: There is no actual mention of capital because this is a mutual association. The members who are accepted, the ship owners, pay a certain premium on the value of their ships, and that is how the association gets its money to finance operations. In the event of a disaster, all the members are prorated in proportion to the value of their ships, so you have the net worth of each ship owner as a guarantee against the risks of the whole association. The reinsurance provision, subject to correction, I think is up to 95 per cent with the government.

Sections 6 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Director may contract with the association.

Mr. Green: Can the sponsor explain that provision in section 16 which seems to enable a director to make a personal contract direct with the association?

Mr. Macnaughton: I would hesitate to give any direction to learned counsel facing me, because I am sure he can interpret that better than I can. If the hon. member cares to read subparagraphs 3 and 4 I think he will find sufficient precautions are inserted. Actually, I do not know what the technical reason is, but once a contract is made the director concerned must declare his interest in it in virtue of this section, and then I think he has complied with it sufficiently both morally and legally.

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 365, an act to incorporate Ogdensburg bridge authority.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Green: Apparently the plan of the applicants for this charter is to build a bridge over the St. Lawrence river. I should like to know from the sponsor just how that is going to fit in with the St. Lawrence seaway and power development, whether the bridge will be in that area of the river, and whether the plan is to proceed with the construction before the waterway and power projects are developed.

Mr. Fulford: Section 11 explains that any plans must be submitted to the government and passed upon before they are accepted. They must conform with all requirements of navigation. Although the proposed location has not been decided upon, according to this bill the bridge must be built within five miles either east or west of the city of Ogdensburg in the state of New York or the town of Prescott in the province of Ontario. That means the bridge itself will be well above any of the proposed seaway construction.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Capital stock.

Mr. McLure: This company is to have capital stock of $1 million divided into 100,000 common shares without nominal or par value. It is not stated whether this $1 million or any portion of it is to be paid up or ever will be paid up. This stock may only be there for sale to those who may be looking for some stock to buy. I should like the sponsor of the bill to explain that provision a little more thoroughly.

Mr. Fulford: As to this clause 4, referring to the $1 million of capital stock divided into 100,000 common shares, we find that this method is similar to the method in the bill with respect to the Thousand Islands Bridge Company, which was passed in this house in 1934 and amended in 1935. In that case—and we have every reason to believe the situation will be the same in this one—when the companies were amalgamated the stock was absorbed by the United States company. The bonds were sold in the United States. The financing was all done in the United States. No Canadian money was involved in any way. The stock can either be paid for outright by the directors or it can be sold on the market, or it can be acquired through the purchase of debentures, but ultimately it will be retired, along with any bonds or debentures, and the bridge will then be turned over to Canada and New York state free of encumbrance.

Mr. McLure: The purpose of this money is for the building of this bridge, is it not?

Mr. Fulford: Yes.

Mr. McLure: What is the cost of the bridge estimated at? What is it going to cost?

Mr. Fulford: There is a limit set in this bill, by clause 12, subsection 1. That limit is an amount which must not exceed $12 million. I might say that was an amendment made in the Senate. Originally it was $10 million and the Senate increased it by $2 million in case, when the bridge was finally built, it was found that it was going to cost more than the engineers' estimate.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Tolls and revenues.

Mr. Catherwood: No provision is made in this section as to the amount of the tolls. Should there be some regulation there for the purpose of limiting what the tolls could be in a case of this kind?

Mr. Fulford: Inasmuch as there are ferries running, and inasmuch as there are two other bridges not too far away from this one, it would not be to the advantage of the company to charge tolls in excess of the tolls charged by the ferries. When I say the "ferries" I mean the ferries that operate elsewhere than from Ogdensburg to Prescott. I believe they will not charge tolls in excess of the tolls charged by the Roosevelt bridge at Cornwall or the Thousand Islands bridge at Ivy Lea. It is not reasonable to suppose that any corporation is going to charge prices that will drive the travelling public to some other way of getting across the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. Green: Judging from the answer given by the sponsor of the bill I would take it that the setting of the tolls is entirely in the discretion of the directors of the bridge company. Is there not the necessity of going to the board of transport commissioners and obtaining a ruling on the reasonableness of these tolls?

Mr. Fulford: The tolls come under the jurisdiction of the Railway Act. Naturally the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada will ultimately be required to set the maximum tolls payable, as will also the corresponding body in the United States.

Mr. Green: It is perfectly clear that the board of transport commissioners will have the power to regulate these tolls?

Mr. Fulford: Oh, definitely.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Location of bridge.

Mr. McLure: I should like to know just what the length of this bridge will be. What is the estimated length of it when completed? If this bridge is a great success, and if it can be built for $10 million or $12 million, I cannot help thinking that in our part of our country we might be interested in a similar proposition with respect to a bridge to connect us up with the mainland. What would be the length of this bridge?

Mr. Fulford: The width of the St. Lawrence river in that district—that is in the area five miles east of Prescott and five miles west of Prescott—is almost an even mile. Not being an engineer, and not having seen the engineer's plan, I do not know how long the approaches will be. But as to the United States approach of the Thousand Islands bridge, where they have to go up from the river level to the height required for navigation purposes, it is just under half a mile.

Mr. McLure: A third of the distance.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Amalgamation with other companies.

Mr. Green: Section 14 gives power to amalgamate with other companies. Is it the intention of the sponsors of this bill to amalgamate with a United States company?

Mr. Fulford: With respect to an international bridge such as this, the usual practice is to have a Canadian company formed for the purpose of attending to the construction costs. But when the bridge is open for traffic, either the Canadian company can absorb the United States company for administration purposes or the United States company can absorb the Canadian company. The financial obligations of the one company immediately become the obligations of the other company.

Mr. Green: What United States company are the sponsors going to amalgamate with in this case?

Mr. Fulford: The company that has been set up and authorized by the New York state legislature. When the act was passed in May of this year it set up an authority with the power to raise the necessary funds in the United States. It is a private authority. The bonds do not have any government backing in any way. I understand, however, that a traffic survey was made by the state of New York before the New York state assembly passed this act allowing the authority to be created, and it was found that the traffic to be served would warrant the expenditure of a large sum of money to complete a bridge between Ogdensburg and Prescott. Therefore, with this blessing, there is no reason why the authority as set up in the state of New York cannot raise its funds through the usual financial channels—banks, trust companies or otherwise—in the United States. I do not anticipate that any money will be raised in Canada.

Mr. Green: What is the name of that authority?

Mr. Fulford: The Ogdensburg bridge authority.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Time for commencement and completion of bridge.

Mr. McLure: I understand there are two other bridges across this same river. Is there any guarantee that there will not be any interference with smaller boats going up and down the river, or is there allowance for that? One would think that in this day and age, instead of building a bridge they would consider plans for a tunnel. Have any figures been prepared on the cost of a tunnel as compared with a bridge?

Mr. Fulford: There should be no difficulty in respect to obstructing navigation for smaller ships. As I explained earlier, at this point the river is approximately a mile wide. There are wide channels that have a good depth. I would say the river is between 50 feet and 70 feet in depth. The very fact that the river is so deep at this point precludes the possibility of a tunnel ever being built at a reasonable figure. I believe the cost of the tunnel would be away out of line.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Do the plans ensure that this will be a safe bridge? The Duplessis bridge in another part of the country collapsed with great loss of property and life. I hope the plans provide for a bridge that will stand up.

Mr. Fulford: Inasmuch as bridges come under the authority of the board of transport commissioners and the corresponding body in the United States, the hon. member can rest assured that the plans when finally approved will guarantee the bridge to be perfectly safe.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 of these bills carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before the motion for clause 1 of these bills carries may I just say a word with respect to these bills, as part of the rather large batch of divorce bills we have put through at this session. This may be the last night of this session that we shall be dealing with divorce bills, and I should imagine hon. members would be interested in a few statistics as to what we have done with respect to divorce cases in the House of Commons during the current session.

If and when we pass these 70 bills, clause 1 of which is now before us, we shall have passed in this House of Commons 312 divorce bills. The Senate passed 313. I understand that the miscellaneous private bills committee turned down one of the bills which the house referred to it. That figure of 312 bills is the second largest number of divorces to be dealt with in any session of parliament. Hon. members will probably be interested as well in the amount of time that we have spent in this session on divorce bills. I have checked the record, and I find that tonight is the seventeenth occasion during this session of parliament that we have dealt with divorce bills. They were reached three times on Mondays and fourteen times, including tonight, on Tuesdays and Fridays.

I have also acertained that the total amount of time we have spent on divorce bills on these seventeen occasions, including ten minutes that might be taken this evening, adds up to five hours and twenty-five minutes. Now, it takes only a little bit of simple arithmetic to ascertain that if we have spent five hours and twenty-five minutes on 313 divorce bills it means that we have dealt with divorce bills at all the stages that concern us in the House of Commons, first reading, second reading, committee stage and third reading, in an average of one minute and two seconds per divorce. But, Mr. Chairman, as the hon. members know—

Mr. Ferrie: How long did the Senate take?

Mr. Knowles: —averages are deceiving. The hon. member asks how long the Senate takes. Perhaps he can go to the Senate and find out, but I am concerned about the way in which we observe our responsibilities as members of the House of Commons. I was saying that averages are deceiving. Perhaps it is not fair to say that we have dealt with divorces in an average of one minute and two seconds per divorce, because actually out of that five hours and twenty-five minutes which we spent altogether in the House of Commons on divorce we spent four hours and thirty-five minutes on 22 cases. In other words, these 22 cases actually had the attention of the House of Commons for an average of twelve minutes each. But that means the other 291 divorces were dealt with in this House of Commons in a total of fifty minutes, which means that the average time spent on each was ten seconds. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that is not a very commendable record for the House of Commons—ten seconds per divorce—regardless of what may be said of the Senate.

To be completely fair there is a further bit of time that perhaps should be added to this, namely the time spent by the miscellaneous private bills committee. I am not a member of that committee and I have no record of the time spent on them; but a little calculation suggests that even if you add that time in it would extend by only a few seconds the average time spent by the House of Commons in all of its stages on these divorces.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that one thing has to happen. Either some other way should be found for dealing with these divorce cases than by parliament, or we should take our responsibilities more seriously. I note that this matter has been commented on in the editorial columns of both Ottawa newspapers today. One of them even suggests that the Senate might go on strike and leave the job to us. As a matter of fact that is a suggestion of which the senators might well take note. Perhaps if we really had to do the job in this house hon. members might face up more seriously to the nature of the task and to the desirability of finding some other tribunal for it.

There is one other statistic I should like to give to the committee, Mr. Chairman. I have here the booklets of evidence and the bills for the 313 cases we have handled this session. It is a shameful pile, someone says; a perfectly apt remark. There it is, on the top of my desk, and it measures fifteen inches high. But this is just the pile furnished to me. The same pile is supplied to all of us. There are 262 members of the House of Commons and 102 of the Senate—364 members of parliament altogether. If one multiplies the bills I have here by 364 it would produce a stack of divorce evidence and divorce bills—and that is in English only, because the evidence is not printed in French, although the bills are—that would be 455 feet high.

That figure may not mean very much to the ordinary person. With that in mind I inquired of our good friends at the main door who know the statistics about this building and ascertained before I came to the chamber at eight o'clock the height of the peace tower. They tell me the peace tower is 300 feet high, right up to the very base of the flagpole. So I suggest to hon. members that when they are walking up to the building tomorrow morning they should just take a look at that peace tower, 300 feet high, and realize that this session's divorce evidence and divorce bills make a pile half again as high as the peace tower, or 455 feet high.

Mr. Brooks: Right up to heaven.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Royal says they would reach right up to heaven. Perhaps he is thinking in the wrong direction. I do suggest it might be an additional tourist attraction in this city if, when our tourists come to admire the parliament buildings and admire the height of the peace tower, there could be on one side of the tower piled up for them that 455 feet of divorce bills and evidence with which we have dealt in the House of Commons, at the average rate of one minute and two seconds per divorce, so the people of this country may see that evidence of this phase of our work.

I know none of us likes handling this business. None of us really feels that this is the place to deal with the cases we have before us tonight. I hope that as hon. members contemplate that record of one minute and two seconds per divorce—really only ten seconds per divorce for 291 of them—and as hon. members contemplate that picture of a stack of bills and evidence 455 feet high, they will decide next session to join with me and with members of the Senate who have once again this week made the same recommendation, in finding a way to get divorce bills out of parliament and before some other tribunal.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $344,433.

The Chairman: Shall item No. 1 carry?

Item agreed to.

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. Wright: Are films produced under this item for the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: Films are produced by the film board for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Wright: How many were produced last year?

Mr. Gardiner: Two were finished that were started the year before, and one new one.

Mr. McLure: Who are the personnel of this advisory committee?

Mr. Gardiner: The deputy ministers of the different provinces, the chief officials of the agricultural colleges, and the chief officials of our own department.

Mr. McLure: What work have they taken on in an advisory capacity? I have heard of them acting only once, and that was in connection with a position that could not be handled by the civil service commission, when an appointment was made.

Mr. Gardiner: They meet and discuss the whole range of activities, both provincially and federally, of the provincial and federal departments. They advise upon methods of dealing with problems.

Mr. McLure: They are not paid a salary or anything?

Mr. Gardiner: No salary in addition to what they get for their ordinary employment.

Mr. McLure: Just travelling expenses.

Item agreed to.

Science service administration—

6. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $1,331,525.

Mr. McLure: The new science building at the experimental station at Charlottetown would come under this item so far as its completion is concerned. I understand it is not quite complete.

Mr. Gardiner: We expect to have it finished in October.

Mr. McLure: The new science building?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Wright: Would it be under this item that the money would be spent on the buildings at Grosse Ile, or what item would that come under?

Mr. Gardiner: Expenditures on Grosse Ile are made by the defence board. There are arrangements entered into between this country and the United States.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What new buildings and new equipment are being provided at the experimental farm at Nappan?

Mr. Gardiner: A new office and laboratory building recently finished.

Item agreed to.

Animal pathology—

7. Operation and maintenance, $462,546.

Mr. Charlton: In view of some of the statements we have seen in the press in the last month, I wonder if the minister would say if there is any truth with respect to the statements about the animal diseases research institute in Hull. Is any consideration being given by the government to moving that laboratory from Hull?

Mr. Gardiner: There has never been any suggestion so far as I know upon which to base any statements that the laboratory is going to be moved. The only discussions that have taken place with respect to it had to do with what might happen in connection with the checks that are made on foot-and-mouth disease. Nothing else was discussed with respect to it.

Mr. Charlton: It was just the fact that the diagnosis might be carried on at Grosse Ile instead of at Hull.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no question so far as diagnosis is concerned under the policy that has been followed up to now and which, so far as I know, is still going to be followed. The policy is to have the diagnosis made on the premises where the disease develops, but other tests that may be made after the diagnosis will in all probability be carried on at Grosse Ile, as is being done at present.

Mr. Charlton: I hope they have better luck with their tests in the field than they had last time.

Mr. Gardiner: We had very good luck.

Mr. Blackmore: Is this the proper item under which to discuss foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. Gardiner: Not again.

Mr. Blackmore: Is item No. 7 the proper one under which to discuss foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the proper place to discuss it is under compensation for animals slaughtered.

Item agreed to.

Animal pathology—

8. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $81,895.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister to tell us where the money is being spent. I looked at page 82 but I did not see any details there to tell us where the money is being spent.

Mr. Gardiner: The first place is Hull, construction of incinerator, post mortem building, farm section, $4,800. Then there is construction of a root house and paddock building, poultry building and farm section, $4,500. Then there is a storage shed at the main laboratory, $2,000, a passageway connecting the main laboratory and the poultry disease laboratory, $2,000. At Lethbridge there is an addition to the laboratory, $10,000; a six-room bungalow to replace dwelling No. 3, $12,000; a frame house, $4,800. Then there is Vancouver animal quarters, $19,000; acquisition of equipment, $22,795. At Sackville, New Brunswick, there is an expenditure of $675; at Macdonald college, $1,200, and at Ottawa, $100. At Lethbridge, Alberta, there is an expenditure of $8,105; at Vancouver, $2,990 and at Hull, Quebec, another expenditure of $9,725. That is the total amount.

Item agreed to.

9. Bacteriology and dairy research, $191,189.

Mr. Charlton: Does any testing work so far as checking margarine for moisture and that sort of thing come under this branch?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: It does not?

Mr. Gardiner: Not for this department.

Item agreed to.

Botany and plant pathology—

10. Operation and maintenance, $1,233,231.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What headway has been made in cultivating new varieties of potatoes, more particularly at the experimental farm at Fredericton? I understand they have made a specialty of that, and that some headway has been made in securing new varieties which are free from disease. A great many diseases affect potatoes, and it is a very important accomplishment if varieties can be obtained that are free from blight and the different diseases that make such inroads on the raising of potatoes by the growers of the maritime provinces. What progress has been made, and what new varieties have been recommended to the producers of potatoes?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand we have developed two new varieties which are blight resistant, but I think we can get the details of that better under experimental farms. It really does not come under this item.

Item agreed to.

Entomology—

14. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $124,830.

Mr. Catherwood: The report of the Department of Agriculture says that severe outbreaks of spruce budworm resulting in the loss of millions of cords of spruce and balsam in northern Ontario during the past decade have now largely subsided. Will the minister state whether that is completely eradicated at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it has not been eradicated. It is still doing considerable damage in both New Brunswick and Ontario. We are still working on it, of course.

Mr. Catherwood: Has the situation improved at all?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it has improved some, but it has not been eradicated.

Mr. Catherwood: I would like to ask the minister a similar question with regard to the disease "dieback of birch" from which almost 80 per cent of the birch has died.

Mr. Gardiner: There is a team working on it in both Ontario and Quebec, but no final results have been arrived at yet.

Mr. Wright: I believe forests come under provincial control. Just what is the method worked out between the provinces and the dominion with regard to this department? Do the provinces have to make application to your department for investigations, or just what method is used in co-operating?

Mr. Gardiner: We supply the technical and scientific work in investigations such as are carried on in these buildings that are mentioned here, and the provinces look after transportation and actual operations in the field.

Mr. Wright: In spraying the forests for budworm and other diseases, who looks after the cost of the actual spraying material? Do you pay or do the provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: The companies and the provinces co-operate in doing such work as the actual spraying and that kind of thing.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service—

18. Experimental farms service administration, $171,213.

Mr. McLure: Last year I was making inquiries with regard to the experimental farm here. While I have nothing to say about it except that it is a wonderful place for visitors, I often wonder when there is going to be a limit to the increased expenditures. For instance, for a number of years expenditures have been going up at the rate of a quarter of a million dollars a year. I think this year the estimates are a quarter of a million dollars higher but we don't see very much about the revenue derived from it. I would like to find out if the revenue is going up in comparison with the cost as we have it here. Could I have that information?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, of course, the expenditure has always been considerably higher than the revenue from government experimental farms in general. That is particularly true of the experimental farm in Ottawa. It is not the intention or at least it is not expected that we will make a profit out of operating an experimental farm. It is an expenditure made by the government of the country for the purpose of giving scientific information after research to farmers in general across the country. It is not intended that we should make a profit out of that. As a matter of fact there is a very considerable cost.

Mr. McLure: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am quite aware of that and of what a wonderful benefit it is. What I was getting at is that there must be a limit to the increase in cost per year. The total for the head farm here is now $2 million, and with increases of a quarter of a million dollars each year it won't be long until it is a tremendous proposition. We have an experimental station down in our own province, a very wonderful institution for the benefit of the farmers, and I would like to see a little more money spent down there on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McLure: Another thing, the illustration stations seem to be of more benefit throughout the country than the experimental farms because there are really more people who take advantage of those stations. I would like to know from the minister whether there is going to be an increase in the number of illustration stations in our province.

Mr. Gardiner: They are increasing slowly all the time. There are 228 of these illustration stations in the country now. There has not been a tendency to decrease them at any time, and they are increasing in number slowly. I may say that we also consider them to be very valuable. It is not our intention to increase the number of experimental farms, as we have a sufficient number to do the work we think is required in that direction.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I would like to ask the minister if there are any plans for extending the work in the Peace river bloc in British Columbia. I should also like to know what progress has been made at the new experimental farm at Whitehorse. I am told that very valuable work is being done up there and that many things are being found out about the possibilities of food production even at that point in Canada which must be four or five thousand miles from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Gardiner: There are a number of rather important illustration stations up through that country. There is one at Athabaska Landing which I am quite sure the hon. member would know about, and there are others in the area. There is one very close to Fort St. John, just south of there. The one at Beaverlodge is the largest one close by. It is not in British Columbia; it is on the Alberta side of the boundary. Nevertheless it does serve that part of the country in a big way. Of course it is our desire as settlement moves north in that country to have illustration stations to assist those who are settling there.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Would the minister care to comment on the experimental work in the Yukon Territory?

Mr. Gardiner: There is an experimental farm just west of Whitehorse which is carrying on all the usual work carried on at an experimental farm. They have not as much livestock as you can see at some experimental farms, but they have poultry and they are also carrying on experimental work in connection with the growing of cereals and grasses of different kinds that are suited to that country. There is good acreage in that farm, but it is only partially cleared.

There are other experimental plots at different places. About thirteen miles out of Dawson City there is one run by a private individual to which we give some assistance. They have some plots for growing cereals, potatoes, vegetables, raspberries and small fruits of different kinds.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder if the minister could tell us the cost of the success that has been derived from the use of the new silo for the dairy barn at the central experimental farm here. It is supposed to be of glass lined construction, and I wonder how it is panning out for various silages.

Mr. Gardiner: The experiment which has been carried on with the one at the farm would indicate the cost is comparatively high. It would be probably too high for an individual to utilize to advantage. This is being tried out as an experiment, but at the present time the costs are high.

Mr. Charlton: Could the minister tell us what the cost was?

Mr. Gardiner: Around $7,000.

Mr. Charlton: What is the size of it, around 14 by 45?

Mr. Gardiner: It is about 14 feet across and 35 feet high.

Mr. McLure: What is the type of dairy cattle they have at the experimental farm here? Do they specialize in one particular breed, or have they herds of the various breeds of dairy cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: At Charlottetown?

Mr. McLure: No, at the central experimental farm here.

Mr. Gardiner: There are two breeds here, Holsteins and Ayrshires.

Mr. McLure: I suppose Holsteins would compose the larger part of the herd?

Mr. Gardiner: About the same of each.

Item agreed to.

Central experimental farm—
20. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $325,765.

Mr. Catherwood: The minister spoke about illustration stations this afternoon. I quite agree with his remarks, because I think they are a great benefit to the agricultural community. Can the minister tell me how many new illustration stations were built or put into operation last year?

Mr. Gardiner: There were 19 new ones.

Mr. Catherwood: Can the minister say how many of those were in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: The Fort William district, Fort Frances; the eastern and central Ontario district, Chapleau; there are just the two.

Item agreed to.

Branch experimental farms—
21. Operation and maintenance, $5,384,946.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is the item on which the minister suggested I ask him the question concerning the development of new varieties of potatoes. He stated two varieties had been developed at the experimental farm at Fredericton which the department is now able to recommend to the growers of potatoes. I should like to know if those varieties are now available to potato growers, and I should like to know the names of those varieties. There are the well established varieties such as Irish Cobbler, Green Mountain and a number of others.

Mr. Gardiner: There are the two varieties, Canso and Keswick, both of which are blight resistant. They were distributed last year to the growers of seed potatoes, and are now ready for distribution to the public in general through these growers but not from the department. They can be purchased from the growers.

Mr. McLure: Has any ceiling price been established on these seed potatoes?

Mr. Gardiner: No. There are hundreds of growers, however, and there will be some competition in the matter of selling them.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is the experimental farm able to give growers samples so they might do some planting, or is that done entirely by private growers?

Mr. Gardiner: They get them entirely from the private growers.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How do the private growers get them?

Mr. Gardiner: They got them last year from the experimental farm.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Other growers would not be able to get any this year from the experimental farm?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the practice has been to do it the way I have suggested, namely to distribute the seed to seed growers during one season; then they multiply the seed and sell it the following year.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister state the results so far as production per acre is concerned, that is whether these are good producers or whether they are merely blight resistant?

Mr. Gardiner: The records for both quality and production are particularly good. I have not the figures as to quantity, because the potatoes are in the hands of growers all over the area. Our information is that there is a considerable quantity.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister state where they may be acquired by growers in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gardiner: We can furnish a list of the growers who grew them to anyone who desires to have it. They can buy from whichever one they wish.

Mr. Wright: Who selects the growers who will propagate the new varieties of grains? Is it the department or the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, or how do you decide to whom you are going to distribute new varieties for propagation purposes.

Mr. Gardiner: The same practice is followed with grain that I have just mentioned in connection with potatoes. We produce the varieties, and when we have a certain quantity we put it out to the members of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association and they multiply it. Then they have it for sale.

Mr. Wright: Who makes the selection of the members of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association to whom these varieties are sent?

Mr. Gardiner: They make application directly to the seed growers' association, and we get a recommendation, of course, from that association. Then each person is supplied about equal quantities of the seed and those persons multiply the seed.

Mr. Wright: What I am trying to get at is who makes the selection. A good bit of money has been made in the propagation and sale of new varieties when they have come on the market in the first place. I should like to know just who makes the selection of the growers to be used in propagating these new varieties. Is it the Canadian Seed Growers' Association executive or your department?

Mr. Gardiner: The individual makes his application to the seed growers' association for membership in the association. He makes application for seed probably at the same time. The seed is distributed to him as a member of the association, but he must meet the requirements of the association as a grower before he will be admitted to membership in that organization.

Mr. Wright: I understand that thoroughly, but there is not enough of these new varieties to send samples to every member of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association who may make application. What I want to know is who makes the selection from the growers who make application for the right to propagate these new varieties.

Mr. Gardiner: There are two ways of doing the multiplying. We do some of it by contract. Of course where we do it by contract we make the selection ourselves. So far as others are concerned, I understand that it is a case of first come, first served, with no selection made. So long as they are admitted as seed growers by the association, they are entitled to get seed on application, so long as a supply is available. Of course, when we run out, we cannot supply them any further.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Will the minister give us some information with regard to what educational films on agricultural subjects are being sponsored by his department for production by the film board during the year?

Mr. Abbott: We passed that item.

Mr. Gardiner: I gave information with regard to the number a little while ago. Only two were finished, and they were started last year. There is one new one this year. Does the hon. member desire their names?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): No.

Mr. Charlton: With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Melfort, is it not a fact that there are two classes of growers in the seed growers' association? Is there not a list of elite growers who have the preference with regard to obtaining seed?

Mr. Gardiner: That is correct; there are the two classes of growers.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think the ordinary member of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association ever gets an opportunity, without passing as an elite grower, to get seed of that first generation seed.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the term that is used in describing that particular class of growers. They have the qualifications necessary for the multiplying of seed.

Mr. Charlton: They have the necessary qualifications, certainly. Can the minister tell us how many growers across Canada qualified as elite seed growers?

Mr. Gardiner: I am told that it would be difficult to get the figures with regard to that classification, which applies to the different kinds of crops that are grown across the country. They are classified and selected according to their qualifications for growing that particular kind of seed.

Mr. Fair: Before six o'clock I asked the minister a question in connection with the establishment of an illustration station at Derwent, Alberta, which is about 25 miles north of Vermilion. When the item was going through I was just returning from a meeting of the redistribution committee, and I was not here to ask it. I wonder if I could get an answer from the minister at this time.

Mr. Gardiner: Is it the station at Fort Kent?

Mr. Fair: At Derwent. It is on the north C.P.R. line between Lloydminster and Edmonton.

Mr. Gardiner: One is not established there yet. At least we have not one on record as being established there yet.

Mr. Fair: About two years ago quite a large number of farmers asked to have one established at that point. They were quite interested, and their interest has not waned as the years have gone by. Will the minister give consideration to the establishment of an illustration station at that point?

Mr. Gardiner: We will have that matter investigated.

Mr. Fair: If the minister will do that I shall be obliged to him.

Production service—Health of animals—

24. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $4,889,025.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell us what success his department is having with the new vaccine for Newcastle disease?

Mr. Gardiner: With the development of an improved vaccine by the animal diseases research institute it was considered desirable by the Department of Agriculture, after consultation with provincial authorities and the poultry industry, to provide for control of Newcastle disease in poultry by vaccination rather than by the slaughter of infected flocks. Arrangements were made with the provinces of Ontario and Nova Scotia whereby the Department of Agriculture, through the animal diseases research institute, would supply the necessary vaccine and the province would arrange for distribution and application of the vaccine.

The vaccine was used upon an estimated 22 flocks in Nova Scotia and 371 in Ontario, and results to date have indicated that the vaccination program has definite possibilities of success. Newcastle disease broke out in 12 flocks in Nova Scotia and in 35 flocks in Ontario after the vaccine had been administered. In Nova Scotia all flocks in which the disease occurred were slaughtered; in Ontario this was not considered necessary, as the disease was less virulent. In spite of careful investigation it has not been possible to determine the precise cause of the outbreaks; however, it must be assumed from the incidence of the disease in relation to the vaccination program that it was due to the vaccination or the vaccine.

It is hoped that a continuation of this vaccination program, complemented by the use of live vaccine in young chicks, will lead to a complete termination of the relatively costly slaughter and compensation policy. Regular compensation under the animal contagious diseases regulations would not adequately compensate the owners of the hatchery flocks referred to herein, who lost superior quality birds at the beginning of the season of hatching egg production.

Because of the special quality and purpose of the flocks concerned, the role of the government in the vaccination program and the importance of retaining the good will of poultrymen towards vaccination, it is considered desirable to provide special compensation for flock owners who suffered substantial losses by reason of death of birds and lowered production during the hatching season. Competent officers of the Department of Agriculture have appraised the loss sustained by each flock owner; the names of the flock owners and the amount of the loss in each case are listed in a schedule attached.

Mr. Charlton: I could not hear everything the minister was saying, but I understood him to say that special compensation was being paid to the owners of flocks that had been slaughtered owing to the vaccination. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Special compensation is being paid?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount is provided in the supplementary estimates which we shall be coming to later.

Mr. Charlton: Compensation is being paid? For whatever loss was occasioned by whatever went wrong with the vaccine, compensation is being paid?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. That is all being paid for.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand from the minister that no more of the virulent vaccine has been distributed since these unfortunate outbreaks in Nova Scotia? The department has ceased sending out any vaccine of the same type as that which proved to be so faulty in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gardiner: Vaccine is still going out to people who apply for it and desire to use it, and it is having very helpful results.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Evidently not; it could not have helpful results if it infected flocks with Newcastle disease. I gather from what the minister says there has been no similar experience since that which happened in Nova Scotia. I can take from what the minister has said that no Newcastle disease is being induced in flocks through the use of this vaccine.

Mr. Gardiner: It has not been established definitely that it was the vaccine that caused the difficulty. There were 12 flocks in Nova Scotia that did develop the disease after the vaccine had been applied, and there were 35 out of 371 in Ontario. The others claimed to have had benefits from it. The question as to what caused the difficulty in that limited number of cases has not been answered.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The disease did not develop in any flocks in which this vaccine was not used.

Mr. Gardiner: The disease was in existence before the vaccine was used at all, I understand. That is the reason they went in and started to use it; but not in nearly all the cases where the vaccine was used did the disease develop. As a matter of fact there were far more where it did not develop than where it did, and where it was presumed it did prevent the development of the disease.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I question the information the minister has given. The information I have is that Newcastle disease did not develop in any flocks except those in which this vaccine had been used. I think all the poultry owners and the owners of hatcheries took for granted that Newcastle disease developed because of faulty vaccine, and that vaccine had been used in those flocks as a preventive. It was not used after the Newcastle disease had developed. The owners of the hatcheries were encouraged, induced or persuaded to have the vaccine used as a preventive, not to cure the flocks already infected.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the story is that in the first instance the officials of the department were of the opinion that we should slaughter the poultry, and there was the very strongest of pressure brought to bear upon the department suggesting that it was a waste, and that the poultry should not be slaughtered in order to wipe out the disease. Those who held that opinion of course advocated the use of vaccines. We did get a vaccine from Britain that we had some trouble with in British Columbia, and we had some trouble in Nova Scotia with the vaccine that was developed. I think it is correct to say that the disease which did develop in most of the cases followed the application of the vaccine, but there were places or flocks in which the disease developed where no vaccine was used. But of the 22 flocks in which the vaccine was used, 12 developed the disease in Nova Scotia. Much better results were obtained in the province of Ontario than in Nova Scotia. In starting any of these experiments in connection with anything of this kind you always run some risk. It is a matter of experimentation, and when there are losses of course they have to be paid for.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, Newcastle disease did not develop in any instance in flocks in Nova Scotia, except where flocks had been vaccinated or had been in direct contact with flocks that had been vaccinated. I think that is the accepted statement in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it is not accepted in the department here. Our officials have made a check, and they say there are a number of flocks in Nova Scotia where no vaccine was used but the disease developed. I have not been down there myself and I cannot give you any further information than what I get from the officials.

Mr. Laing: Will the minister put on record the schedule of payments in compensation for those birds at various ages, and will he tell us how it compares with compensation paid in any states of the United States, if there are any states that pay compensation for this disease at all?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it is quite a big table. I would not like to read it all to the committee. It has been given as a return this session, has it not? If not I can see that it is put on the record as a return. It is correct to say that in the United States they do not pay compensation and they do not slaughter. It is not controlled down there by federal authority.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Would the minister care to comment on the rumour that Newcastle disease has spread to sea birds in the maritimes? Is there any possible grain of truth in that? Will the minister give us an indication of how the compensation paid for poultry destroyed owing to Newcastle disease was arrived at, and how it compares with compensation paid for poultry destroyed on account of foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. Gardiner: To answer the last question first, I understand the same schedule is used in connection with foot-and-mouth disease as the other. There is no evidence to indicate whether there is anything to the story that sea gulls have taken the disease. We know nothing of it. On the other point having to do with the basis, the regulations require that the poultry destroyed shall be burned and destroyed absolutely, or deeply buried, one or the other.

Mr. Charlton: Is it not a fact that in the United States they have been vaccinating for this disease for a number of years?

Mr. Gardiner: In the United States, as I said a moment ago, it is not done federally. Whatever is done is done in the individual states, and there may be some difference in the manner in which it is done. Anyone can buy the vaccine in the states and use it. Of course if one buys it, he uses it at his own risk.

Mr. Charlton: That would be the reason there is no compensation over there? It has been the accepted practice for some years to vaccinate for Newcastle disease in the United States, and there is no reason why any compensation should be paid. While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister whether he can give us the standing now of the t.b. testing work being done county-wide across Ontario.

Mr. Gardiner: As is well known by hon. members, we took most of the veterinarians who were available across the country out to western Canada, and that has slowed down the program considerably. But in order to indicate what has been going on it might be worth while to place on record the number of animals slaughtered in the last eight years under the act having to do with tuberculosis. In 1944-45 there were 5,037; in the next year, 3,040 and in the next year 3,659. Then in 1947-48 we put on the larger program, following the war, and the number went up to 12,413. There were 31,106 in the next year; there were 31,426 in the next, and in 1950-51 the figure was 21,019. That is a summary of the total number of animals slaughtered in an effort to eradicate tuberculosis.

Mr. Charlton: How many counties remain to be tested in southern Ontario, or in that part of Ontario known as the older section, as contrasted with the newer section?

Mr. Gardiner: The initial test has been completed in all the counties and districts in Ontario.

Mr. Charlton: How many counties now under the accredited area plan have attained that status?

Mr. Gardiner: I have here a list somewhat more than a page in length, setting out the counties in Ontario. I would say there would be 30 or 40 of them.

Mr. Charlton: What would be the percentage, roughly?

Mr. Gardiner: I would say about 75 per cent.

Mr. Charlton: I believe quite a few counties were tested only recently for the first time. They could not be accredited areas yet.

Mr. Gardiner: According to this list I find 37 of the Ontario counties are accredited, so I was not far out in my estimate. The simple way to get this information would be to secure a copy of this pamphlet. It can be had at any time.

Mr. Charlton: What has been the decrease in the percentage of reactors on second test, as against second-test reactors ten years ago?

Mr. Gardiner: In the county of Bruce I find that in 1947 there were 114,029 tested and that 5,324 were reactors. This is a percentage of 4·6. Then in 1930 the percentage in the county of Dundas was 22·4, whereas in 1948 it was only ·1 per cent. That gives an indication of what has taken place. The percentage was very heavy in that county 22 years ago. Four years ago, as is seen by the figures, it was down to one-tenth of one per cent. That would seem to be a good illustration of the success in checking the disease.

Mr. McLure: Prince Edward Island is a disease-free area for cattle. How often must they be tested to maintain their standard?

Mr. Gardiner: When the tests show that the number of reactors is reduced to one-half of one per cent the area is accredited for three years, which means that it has to be checked at the end of that time. When it is two-tenths of one per cent it is accredited for six years, at the end of which time the test would be made again. The area is accredited on the basis of the extent to which the disease has been eradicated.

25. Compensation for animals slaughtered, including compensation for eggs destroyed from infected premises under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $1,040,880.

Mr. Cardiff: Has the compensation included in this item anything to do with animals slaughtered by reason of the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. Gardiner: The amount paid in compensation under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act is in this vote, but the part which was contributed by reason of the passing of the special act at the beginning of this session was voted in the estimates of last year. It was a special supplementary vote for last year and not this year, and it does not appear in these estimates.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to have a word or two to say on the general foot-and-mouth disease situation. First of all I should like to point out that since the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic or plague members of the Social Credit group have said very little on the floor of the house. There is a definite reason for our reticence.

Mr. Riley: You are not reticent.

Mr. Blackmore: Social Crediters deeply regret the wide and panic-spreading publicity that has been contributed to so substantially by some members of this house. I simply marvel at what they have done. I could name those who have got up on the floor of the house since the outbreak and spread panic-creating propaganda over the world greatly to the detriment of everybody in the Dominion of Canada who is raising stock. I must confess that I simply cannot see how a responsible member of parliament can possibly justify himself in doing that. No Social Crediter contributed in any way, shape or form to any such thing.

On March 3, as recorded at page 43 of Hansard, I said that Social Crediters would expect the government to do everything possible (1) to discover the source of the infection, (2) to determine responsibility, (3) to exterminate the disease and (4) to protect the livestock industry from impairment.

We have been watching the record of the government with respect to these four points. As to the first three, I would say that the government has done very well under the circumstances. It is easy enough to get up and find fault with the performance of any particular group of officers in the field after an incident like the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak has taken place, but I wonder how many of the members who have so voluminously declaimed against the government regarding this matter have computed how many officers it would be necessary to have in the field all across Canada from coast to coast to enable the disease to be detected and more readily and quickly than it was in this instance.

That is the first thing responsible critics ought to take into consideration. I wonder if the men who have had so much to say in criticism and condemnation would be willing to vote the amount of money necessary to pay the increased staff that would be needed all over the country to provide the supervision which would be required to detect this kind of outbreak any faster than it was detected. That is the kind of thing Social Crediters have been bearing in mind.

I said a moment ago that I believed the government in the main deserved commendation for the way it had handled the foot-and-mouth disease, that is with respect to the three matters I have mentioned, namely discovering the source of the infection, determining responsibility, and exterminating the disease, which after all were the first things it was necessary to take care of.

As to the fourth point, I believe the federal government has left much to be desired so far as protecting the livestock industry of Canada from serious impairment is concerned. There have been very serious losses. In one of the western newspapers I noticed about four weeks ago an estimate that Alberta had already lost $14 million through decline in livestock prices since the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. That was serious enough, but the amount must be double and probably more than that by now. I have on my desk a pile of over sixty letters from all over my constituency. They are written by farmers who are in the main either feeders of stock or stockmen. These letters serve to indicate the kind of disaster which struck the people of my constituency.

There is a special reason why my constituency was hard hit. As I have pointed out in the house once or twice already, the wet weather last year did a great deal of damage. Many people who had crops in the fields that were snowed under, or that were growing on land too wet to deal with, bought livestock to carry through the year in the hope of having them eat the grain lying on the ground. When the foot-and-mouth disease struck they lost not only what they should have been able to get on the livestock but a great deal of their crop as well. This matter has been given no attention by the government, and probably there are reasons why it would not be; nevertheless that is the kind of situation that has existed in one of the important ridings of this country with respect to the production of grain and livestock.

As I said, I believe the federal government, as regards protecting the livestock industry from impairment, left much to be desired. In the first place I would say the floor prices were altogether too tardily announced. In spite of everything men could do many people became somewhat panicky and began to dispose of their cattle at lower prices than they should have obtained because the floor prices were not announced soon enough. Then when the floor prices were announced they were too low. The lowest floor price which should have been made available to the feeders in my constituency was 28 cents, if they were to be saved from damaging losses. Much of the livestock which were fed in my constituency cost 30 cents in the fall. To offer feeders of such cattle 25 cents for the finished product after they had put into that product their feed and labour was simply to condemn them to heavy losses.

Again, there was the general criticism that the government made no provision for seeing to it that the producers received the full benefit of the floor price. Far too many people reported to me that they simply could not get a price comparable with what the floor price indicated they should be able to get. There were always certain reasons offered by those who would buy, and in many cases producers found it extremely difficult to get people who would buy. There was not adequate provision to see that producers were able to sell their finished animals. The minister will remember the difficulty which arose in 1942 because buyers simply neglected a number of herds by just not coming around or if they did come around—

The Chairman: Would the hon. member tell me how he relates his remarks to the item under discussion—that of compensation for animals slaughtered?

Mr. Blackmore: We are talking about the general effect of foot-and-mouth disease on the livestock situation in my home constituency. If that is not relevant I do not know what is.

The Chairman: I am afraid it is a subject which could have been dealt with in the general discussion, and I think it was. I remember there was considerable discussion about foot-and-mouth disease and, according to the procedure followed throughout the study of these estimates ever since they have been before the committee, I think the remarks of all hon. members should be strictly relevant to the item before us. I think the hon. member early in the evening asked the Minister of Agriculture about the actual situation in regard to compensation. He was quite in order then, but I am afraid he is not in order now.

Mr. Blackmore: I asked earlier in the evening simply to protect myself against this very thing. I asked the minister if it would be all right to discuss the foot-and-mouth disease under a given item, and he gave this item. I could have discussed the matter under the general item, but it would have taken as much time as it will take now. There was such a tremendous amount of crying over spilt milk when the general item was under discussion that I thought it better to wait until we had cleared the air a bit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you say I must not discuss this I will have to stop, but I must say I do not believe the ruling is fair. Up to the present time for several departments we have been allowed considerable latitude under item 1 and then again under the individual items. I maintain that what I am saying is strictly relevant to foot-and-mouth disease experience although not necessarily relevant to payment for slaughtered animals.

An hon. Member: What is your opinion worth?

Mr. Blackmore: My opinion would be worth something on the matter.

An hon. Member: How much?

The Chairman: Order. May I intervene at this point. The hon. member has expressed the view that he is in order in discussing the matter he has been talking about for the last few minutes. The hon. member and myself have been in agreement sometimes and at other times we have not been in agreement; but I want to thank him for having said in advance that he will accept the ruling I give.

If I understood the question correctly from here, he asked the Minister of Agriculture to make a statement about compensation which had been paid in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease epidemic. I think the minister said that when this item was called he would make a statement about the amounts that were paid and what this vote was for. However, that may not have been the question the hon. member asked, though it is what I heard. In any event I think we are in agreement that the whole matter of foot-and-mouth disease has been discussed. If the hon. member wished to go further into the causes of the epidemic or the way it was dealt with by the officials, or the consequences which might have been suffered because of the epidemic, I think all that was a matter for the general discussion which took place last evening and lasted for a few hours. I hope the hon. member will be satisfied to deal with the compensation being paid for animals that were slaughtered.

Mr. Blackmore: I think a great deal more ought to be said, and that it is perfectly in order to say it; but as I say, I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. What you thought you heard was not at all what I asked the minister, but I do not blame you because I too cannot hear you in many cases because of the outrageous clamour on the side which goes on all the time.

An hon. Member: Talk louder.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I bow to your ruling, but I will look to a future time to say the things which I think need to be said.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

Plant products—

27. Seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $40,000 to Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $1,386,188.

Mr. Charlton: On page 102, Mr. Chairman, there is an item of $30,000—

The Chairman: Order. It is quite difficult for the Chair to understand the member who has the floor when other hon. members who are not supposed to speak are speaking almost as loud as the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Charlton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sinnott: There will be a slaughter this time.

Mr. Charlton: I am willing to wait. Do you want to stay another week?

Mr. Proudfoot: I only live 75 miles from here, so I can stay.

Mr. Blackmore: You may have to yet if you are not careful.

The Chairman: Order. If hon. members wish to speak they must rise and address the Chair.

Mr. Charlton: There is an item under production service—professional and special services. What is that for?

Mr. Gardiner: It is for analysts and lawyers, largely. It is $5,000 less than it was last year.

Mr. Charlton: Special analysts? For what purpose?

Mr. Gardiner: Samples of fertilizer and that kind of thing have to be analysed, and lawyers are engaged across the country for the prosecution of those persons charged with breaking the law.

Mr. Fleming: To prosecute the analysts.

Mr. Charlton: Are there not permanent analysts in the department for that purpose?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but there are others employed from time to time.

Mr. Charlton: Do you mean that you get commercial firms to do these analyses?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. McLure: Does liquid fertilizer that has to be examined and tested come under this regulation?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I understand it comes under the same tests and regulations as the others.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I had a question on item No. 26. There is an item of $95,000 for the purchase of livestock. Would the minister just give a word of explanation on that?

Mr. Gardiner: That is for the purchaser of bulls for the bull loan policy.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to ask the minister if there are any strings attached to the $40,000 grant to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association?

Mr. Gardiner: No, there are no strings to it. It is an outright grant.

Item agreed to.

28. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $645,700.

Mr. McLure: Are there any extra seed fairs in class A now or are they the same as usual? I see there is a reduction in the amount of the grant for these class A fairs. Another question I should like to have answered is, what revenue does the government receive from class A fairs? I understand that the government, through different forms of taxation, secures a greater revenue than the Department of Agriculture pays out in grants.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to the first question, which I understand is whether there are any seed fairs in class A or class B, I may say that there are no seed fairs in those classifications obtaining grants. Exhibits of seed, and that kind of thing, are made at the usual exhibitions.

In answer to the second question, there are no revenues from the class A or B fairs. Our activity in connection with them is the paying of the grants.

Mr. McLure: There is revenue, but it may not go to the agriculture department. There is revenue from all the betting at the parimutuel machines, and on the tickets that are sold.

Mr. Gardiner: There was during wartime. We did get some revenue from that during the war, but it now goes to the provinces.

Mr. Dinsdale: At page 103 of the details I notice there is an expenditure of $280,000 for building grants. Will the minister indicate the kind of expenditure represented by this item?

Mr. Gardiner: Those are agreements—we had one with Brandon—under which we pay a part of the cost. It is usually a three-way agreement under which we pay one-third, the province pays one-third and the exhibition board takes care of the other third by some means or other. In some places that portion is met by the municipal corporation in which the exhibition is situated. It is a three-way arrangement under which we pay over a ten-year period.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would it apply to fairs outside of the A or B classifications?

Mr. Gardiner: No, just to A and B.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is a very important appropriation, $645,700, in which we are directly interested. There is a grant of only $5,500 to the maritime winter fair, which is the senior winter fair in Canada and serves the three maritime provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. It has contributed more over the years to the improvement of livestock in that part of Canada than any other agency. I do not know how long they will be able to continue unless the grant from the federal government is materially increased. The fair could not operate at the present time except for the co-operation of the stock breeders and citizens of the town of Amherst. I gather from this estimate that the same amount is provided this year as was provided last year. I would ask the minister if consideration has not been given to at least doubling the grant to the maritime winter fair. It is urgently needed, and if there is any fair in Canada upon which an expenditure of this kind is warranted it is the maritime winter fair.

Mr. Gardiner: The amount, of course, is the same to all fairs right across Canada. The general grant is $5,000. I note that Amherst does earn another $500. The extra $500 is for junior work, but I presume if the others did the same work they could earn the $500. It is just a general grant of that amount for each fair, and it is not expected we are going to increase it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to point out to the minister and the committee that with present-day costs the grant is inadequate. There should be a minimum of $10,000.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell us whose responsibility it is to classify the fairs? Has there been any change this year? I understand that one or two of their fairs in my own district have asked for reclassification. Have there been any changes in those classifications this year, and how many have increased their classifications?

Mr. Gardiner: Whether it is a class A or B fair is determined in the first instance by provincial classification. In so far as we are concerned, we pay a grant provided the fair has paid out a certain amount in prizes for three years. If application is made after qualifying in that way, consideration is then given to the application.

Mr. Charlton: What are the different classifications, other than A and B?

Mr. Gardiner: Fairs paying a minimum of $5,000 in prize money each year for an average of three years are in the category known as class A, and up to a minimum of $3,000 are class B. There are no other classifications in so far as the federal department is concerned.

Mr. Charlton: Has Paris been reclassified this year?

Mr. Gardiner: No, Paris has not.

Mr. Charlton: Both Paris and Rockton have asked for reclassification. Has Rockton fair been reclassified?

Mr. Gardiner: Rockton is under investigation now, and so is Paris, but neither of them is in.

Mr. Charlton: Neither has been accepted yet?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Charlton: When will that decision be made?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand it is made just as soon as we get the evidence in and the facts are established. I understand that evidence has come in very recently, but the decision has not yet been announced.

Mr. Charlton: It has been in quite a while.

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot tell you when it came in, but apparently it is in.

Item agreed to.

29. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $64,500.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask where this appropriation of $5,000 is spent on Canadian hunter, saddle and light horses. It is probably well warranted, but I want to again point out that it is just about the same as the grant for the entire maritime winter fair serving the three maritime provinces.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. There is a $5,000 grant to the association that promotes the breeding of saddle horses.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Where is that located?

Mr. Gardiner: The head office is at Toronto, but it is for all Canada.

Item agreed to.

Marketing service—

30. Marketing service administration, $259,498.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the minister give us a brief résumé of just exactly what is involved in these marketing services and what co-operation there is between this branch and the Department of Trade and Commerce? The two departments are engaged in marketing. I notice that the main amounts in this particular appropriation of $216,265 out of the $259,498 are for salaries. Perhaps the minister could give us briefly a summary of the work of this branch. I am not asking for a long explanation, but just for a few words.

Mr. Gardiner: Having regard to general agricultural products, the two branches are concerned with the home market and the market outside of Canada. That is, we have charge of the marketing of all farm products in Canada with the exception of grain.

Mr. Coldwell: Within the country?

Mr. Gardiner: Within the country.

Mr. Coldwell: That is what I thought.

Mr. Gardiner: All activities in connection with that matter are carried on by us. But when it comes to the matter of advertising outside of Canada or to carrying on activities in connection with the marketing of a product, that is something which is carried on through the Department of Trade and Commerce. We have a few men in Britain. We have one man established in London. Then we have, I think, six inspectors under him at the different ports. We take care of that part of the marketing cost.

I think probably the point that is in the mind of the hon. member has to do with the different methods by which the grading and all the administration activities having to do with the marketing of grain are carried on. That is charged up to the grain. It is carried on through the Department of Trade and Commerce, the head office being at Winnipeg. The reason for that is largely the fact that in the beginning it had to do altogether with wheat and has been applied more or less to oats and barley since we put oats and barley under the wheat board. It had to do with wheat because practically all the wheat that was grown in Canada and that was being shipped long distances passed through Winnipeg. It was therefore a simple matter to have all the inspection and the grading done there at Winnipeg.

That procedure could not be made to apply to other farm products. For example, with regard to cattle, there are probably as many marketed at Toronto or at Montreal as at any other point. Some are marketed at Calgary, Edmonton and so on. You cannot take any one point and set up an organization there on the basis that any of the other products would pass through there. We take care of the inspection, grading and all activities having to do with the marketing of those products. That activity is paid for out of these votes. There is that difference between the grading of grain and the grading of the other products. The cost of carrying on that marketing activity is charged up to the treasury of Canada; but as to grain, it is charged up to the farmer's grain and is paid for out of that. That is the main difference between the two.

Mr. Coldwell: The reason I had for asking the questions was that today I sent to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the original of a letter that I had from Britain. I do not know why I was written to about it. The letter reads as follows:

> For many years prior to the war we imported thousands of Canadian turkeys.
> Since the war, we have made many but so far unsuccessful attempts to recommence this trading, due chiefly to the dollar situation.
> If possible, we would like to have a supply for Christmas of 1952 and would be obliged to hear if you can possibly help us.
> Our approximate requirements are 10,000 hen turkeys 8 lbs. to 12 lbs. each.
> The enclosed letter will substantiate our remarks.

The enclosed letter which I also forwarded to the Minister of Trade and Commerce simply indicates that this was a bona fide dealer who has dealt extensively in Canada in years gone by. I presume the difficulty arose through the dollar situation. I was wondering what facilities there might be, either through the minister's marketing agency or through the Department of Trade and Commerce, to try to open up a market of that description for poultry, turkeys in particular which may this year, as they were in the United States two years ago, be in over-supply. I have always thought some arrangement might be made, and I offered a suggestion in connection with the $1,200,000,000 British loan, that payments might be deferred without interest if the amounts coming to Canada, last year about $26 million, were used within this country for the purchase of farm products like cheese, apples, poultry and so on. I sent the letter to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I said. I suppose I sent it to the right minister. Is any part of the minister's organization engaged in this activity, namely in trying to find ways and means of disposing of poultry, for example, and meeting the requirements of dealers like this Mr. John Donaldson who wrote to me from Manchester, England, under date of June 6 of this year?

Mr. Gardiner: There is, of necessity, close co-operation between the Department of Trade and Commerce and this department. They get their information from us as to what the surplus of a product is likely to be. If there is no surplus of the product to be sold outside this country, of course the Department of Trade and Commerce would not have any considerable interest in it; and probably we would not be required to have much interest in it either, other than to keep check on it, because the trade itself would fairly well take care of any transactions in it.

With regard to a surplus to sell anywhere, immediately we get information which indicates that there is a great surplus, as we have this year in connection with the production of turkeys, we make a search for markets. Unfortunately for us there is a great increase in the United States as well. The two increases may make it rather difficult for us to market as many as we would desire to market in the United States. But when it comes to marketing in Britain, of course the problem with regard to turkeys is the same as it is with regard to anything else, namely that Britain is more likely to buy her supply from sterling areas, if she can get it, than she is to buy it here. If she were going to buy it here, I am afraid the price would not be anything like what we would expect in this country. But in any case we search for markets wherever we can find them.

Mr. Blackmore: I think probably I can say what a moment ago I intended to say, under this item, because it has to do with marketing. May I just preface the brief remarks which I shall make tonight upon this matter by reading an excerpt from the minister's speech before the Canadian Club at Winnipeg on January 9, 1952. He used these words, which I think have great significance:

> My conversations convinced me that Britain's need for our food is as great as ever. We are supplying her with more wheat and flour than ever before in pre-war peacetime. We are supplying her with less of every other food we produce than at any other time over a long period. We should be able to find some way of making a trade with Britain and others which will result in our being able to send our food in exchange for something she has which we want.
> That which she has, which we need more than any other thing, is people. Sir Clifford Sifton stated at one time that each immigrant was worth $1,000 to Canada. I am sure we will all agree now, fifty years later, that he was right. If an immigrant was worth $1,000 in his day, one is worth $2,500 today; 100,000 immigrants would be worth $250 million.
> That figure could be multiplied to whatever multiple is necessary by moving surplus population from Britain to Canada. They would produce raw materials and food here to help keep employed and feed those at home. If that kind of an exchange cannot be satisfactorily worked out to balance over 50 years, it is not dollars that are lacking, it is ideas.

I should like to concentrate for a minute or two on "the ideas". How in the name of common sense is it that we cannot find in the government "ideas" which are necessary to enable the minister to transact the negotiations which he visualized on that occasion? When I was talking about the effect of foot-and-mouth disease on the people in my constituency, great numbers of whom are stock producers—

An hon. Member: Louder, please.

Mr. Blackmore: Can't you keep your peace at all?

Mr. Riley: Are you looking at me?

Mr. Blackmore: Whoever made the remark.

Mr. Riley: Don't look at me.

Mr. Blackmore: In my constituency the feeders were very seriously injured because there was no adequate means of taking off the surplus products that became ready for market. A similar problem is beginning to face us in Canadian agriculture, as we might say, all across the board. If we cannot now solve the problem of selling turkeys, for example, which was the question the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised, to Britain when the British need the turkeys and we need the market for the turkeys, then it is high time we concentrated all our energies for a while on the solution of that problem. It is obviously a problem that depends on money, it is a problem that ought to be possible of solution.

I would say to the minister that my main criticism of his handling of the stock situation in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease is this: As soon as the outbreak occurred the minister should have declared that the government would buy all the surplus beef, pork and mutton as it became ready for the market. The government would not have had to buy directly from the producers; they could have bought from the packing plants enough to make room for the products that became ready for markets. They could then have sent those meat surpluses to Britain as a gift.

The question would be raised immediately, where would we get the money? Well, first of all would that have been the solution? Certainly that would have been the solution. If the government had announced that it would take the surplus just as fast as it became ready for the market, just as though that surplus were going to the United States, and sent the surpluses to Britain on a line of interest-free credit, even then there would have been no tragic fall in prices such as was registered all across Canada, with consequent losses immeasurable and incalculable to the livestock industry of Canada and the Canadian economy generally.

The question will be raised as to whether or not the money could have been found. I do not intend to go into details. I referred to this matter yesterday in a talk on the finance bill. I want to refer to what happened in world war I for the minister's sake. I think he was right in the chamber when I was mentioning it. In world war I the Canadian government created money under the Finance Act of 1914 and bought $50 million worth of wheat and passed it to Britain. They received no return for some time. By 1927 Britain had paid back all of the loan with goods which Canada had accepted from Britain, but the important things to bear in mind in this connection are these: That money did not cost Canadians a cent. It was not borrowed from anyone; it was not taxed from anyone. It was good money. It bought the wheat; it paid the men who produced the wheat. It was just as valuable to the Canadian economy as any money that possibly could have been put into the Canadian economy, and it would have been valuable and continued valuable even if Britain had never repaid with goods. Once we can register that simple fact, and the minister can get it accepted by a sufficient number of the cabinet, starting with the Minister of Finance, then we will have the "ideas" with which to solve that problem which he propounded before that important audience in January, 1952; until he can find a solution such as that there is no solution available. Knowing the simple fact, he could have dealt, and now would be able to deal, with the problem of marketing our surpluses.

Let us all face that fact. Either we strangle our agriculture to death at this time, when we are capable of the greatest production in our history, and when the world needs that production more than it ever did in all history—either we strangle our agriculture to death and cease to play as important a part in world affairs, and cease to keep our economy prosperous, or we find the "ideas" with which to market abroad without having goods coming in from foreign countries.

That illustration I have given, and which I gave yesterday, shows what can be done. I think I can safely encourage the minister to defy any member of the cabinet, or all of them put together, to show why that simple device would not have worked in the case of the foot-and-mouth disease. It would have saved Canadian stock producers great quantities of money; saved them from disposing of their livestock, their breeding stock, and saved them from losing confidence in the future, with all the evil effects that are going to devolve from those three ill results.

If one bears in mind that this device could have been used, then I think he must realize that the Department of Agriculture and the Canadian government were open to severe censure in their method of dealing with the marketing situation which developed from the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. Therefore that is the criticism I have to offer, and the reason I offer it. And that is the suggestion I have for the future.

Item agreed to.

31. Agricultural economics, $579,455.

Mr. Wright: What is the function of these various economists who are listed on page 105 under this item of $579,000? What functions do they perform?

Mr. Gardiner: These are the men who operate under Dr. Booth, the chief economist of the department. They make investigations with regard to cost of production across the country, and investigations with regard to marketing. These investigations are going on constantly in different parts of the country.

Mr. Wright: Do they do any work to determine what might be an economic unit in various types of farming, say in the dairy industry; whether ten head of milk cows or twenty head of milk cows would make an economic unit on a farm, or how many acres of orchard may be an economic unit, or how many acres under cultivation in grain in western Canada? Is any work done by that department to ascertain this information?

Mr. Gardiner: They conduct surveys in co-operation with the provinces on all matters of that kind, and they do make reports on units which may help in different kinds of production.

Mr. Wright: Are any available that have been made in recent years?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; they are being published constantly, and can be obtained.

Mr. Charlton: Under what item does the minister want us to ask questions regarding products purchased under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

Mr. Gardiner: Under item 51.

Mr. Charlton: I want to make it quite clear that it is not just the administration of the Agricultural Prices Support Act that I want to ask about. I want to make sure I will not be out of order when I get down to item 51.

Mr. Gardiner: The amount of money available is in the supplementaries. It could be discussed under that item.

Mr. Wright: What publicity is given to these reports of economic units, or other work done by this group?

Mr. Gardiner: They are listed monthly in a publication that is put out by the department, and can be obtained by writing to the information service.

Mr. Coldwell: Are many published? When a booklet of this description is published, how many are available?

Mr. Gardiner: Different numbers are published, depending upon whether they are simply published for the use of experts, or whether they are to be distributed to different groups. If they are for general distribution many more of them are published. It would depend upon what experience has shown would be a proper distribution.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friend and I are interested in seeing that the reports are made available. Here is a group of men who are not only capable but who are important to the industry. These economists perform a most useful service. How are people encouraged to get their reports and make the best use of them? If I were to be given a list of publications it might mean something or it might mean very little. Are they reviewed in any way, so that anyone looking at the list would realize the importance of certain of these documents?

Mr. Gardiner: I have known Dr. Booth over the years. He began his activities on a farm in Saskatchewan. I believe he was the first economist employed, years ago, by a provincial government. He has been a fairly good publicist himself. He has always seen to it that, in respect of any of these that are important, a review is given to the press. These reviews of course induce many to write for the publications. The only means, however, by which individuals can find out what these publications are is to send in to our publicity branch for a list of all the publications in the department. This will be sent to anyone asking for it, free of charge. These particular publications are also free to anyone asking for them.

Item agreed to.

32. Dairy products, $731,243.

Mr. Catherwood: What is the figure of imports of butter and cheese during the last year?

Mr. Gardiner: Of butter, the imports were just over 17 million pounds, and of cheese the imports were between 6 million and 7 million pounds.

Item agreed to.

33. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $446,066.

Mr. McLure: Is the North Wiltshire Dairy Company getting a grant, and will that be their final grant? Have the Crapaud Dairy Company and the New Glasgow Dairy Company been paid their final amounts?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the two last mentioned are dealt with in the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

37. Freight assistance on western feed grains, $5,750,000.

Mr. Fair: This freight assistance is a good thing for both eastern and western Canada. What has been paid during the last fiscal year, and what has been the total amount since the program was introduced?

Mr. Gardiner: This past year the amount was between $16 million and $17 million. Feed freight assistance through the years, down to 1949-50, has cost $138,937,000.

Item agreed to.

38. Agricultural lime assistance, $460,000.

Mr. Hodgson: What is the purpose of this vote?

Mr. Gardiner: It is mostly for payments made in respect of lime in the maritime provinces and in Quebec. The province operates the plan of encouragement in the use of lime, and we pay 60 per cent of the cost.

Item agreed to.

39. To provide for quality premiums on high grade hog carcasses and administration costs, $6,224,590.

Mr. Charlton: What is the percentage of grade A and grade B-1 now as compared to last year?

Mr. Gardiner: It is about the same as last year. I understand the grade A's are about 32 per cent.

Mr. Charlton: What has happened in the last three months would have knocked that figure out of balance.

Mr. Gardiner: Grades A and B together are about 75 per cent.

Mr. Charlton: But there nas been a considerable change in the last three months. What effect has it had on the variation of grades?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand there has not been much change. However, we will have the information tomorrow.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the department increased the allowance for lime for the farmers of Nova Scotia during the past year?

Mr. Gardiner: As I said a moment ago, this operation is carried on by the province. We contribute 60 per cent of the cost.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): If a farmer pays an additional amount, does that revert to the federal government?

Mr. Gardiner: No; we receive no money back.

The Chairman: Shall I leave this item for further consideration?

Mr. Charlton: Eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will consider the Senate amendments to Bill No. 306, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. I understand the government has no objection to these amendments which are coming from the other place, so they will take no time. Then we will consider Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation of the House of Commons. That may take a little more time. Then we will take the balance of the estimates, agriculture, post office, national revenue, legislation, citizenship and immigration, finance and any other remaining items.

Mr. McLure: May I ask the leader whether the house will sit after six o'clock tomorrow night?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes; we will sit until eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

GERM WARFARE

DR. ENDICOTT—STATEMENT RE RESIGNATION FROM UNITED CHURCH

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when I made a statement concerning Dr. James G. Endicott in this house on Wednesday last I was under the impression—as I think most people are—that he was an ordained minister of the gospel; and I referred to him as such. I have now received a communication from the Reverend J. A. C. Kell, M.A., secretary of the Toronto conference of the United Church of Canada, stating that:

. . . James G. Endicott has not been a minister of the United Church of Canada since his resignation from our ministry under date of May 5, 1946, and has not appeared on our rolls since that time. The degree which he received prior to his break with the church carries with it no legal status and hence it has never been the custom of the church to withdraw such degrees except in the case of extreme moral disgrace.

The Reverend Mr. Kell also informs me that Dr. Endicott's letter of resignation was written from Chengtu, Szechwan, China, May 5, 1946, to the president of the Toronto conference of the United Church of Canada, Toronto, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. President and Brethren,

I regret very much that I feel it is now necessary for me to resign from the ministry of the United Church of Canada. I will not attempt to go into any detailed explanation of how I gradually arrived at the necessity for making this decision. It has come after long and painful deliberations and travail of spirit. It is due primarily, of course, to a change in my own experience, understanding and explanation in regard to such matters as creeds, sacraments, especially orders and ordinations. It is also due to the fact that I now feel called to take an active part in the struggle for human betterment in the field of social and political movement, areas of life that are considered unsuitable for ministers to be active in unless possibly they happen to be on the "right" side.

I hope it will be possible for my resignation to take place without any undue publicity, especially of such a nature as would discourage people in their support of the overseas work of the church. It is not necessary for me to assure you that this decision on my part has been arrived at only after long and painful deliberations.

Yours very sincerely,

James G. Endicott

QUESTIONS REMAINING ON ORDER PAPER—ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps it would be appropriate, Mr. Speaker, if I were to mention the questions that have still not been answered at this point. There are some of those questions that have been standing on the order paper for some time. I agree that there has been a substantial reduction in the number of outstanding questions. Several of these, however, are questions which it would seem could have been answered. I would ask if the government could either give an undertaking or accept a motion that would have the effect of making any question still outstanding when this part of the session terminates an order for return.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): So far as my department is concerned, I gave nearly all the answers to questions, except those that were on the order paper under the date of June 25, and today is only June 28. Question No. 17 on today's order paper reads as follows:

Mr. Spence:

1. Has any department of the government received a request for drainage work in the municipality of Mistassini, Quebec?
2. If so, has consideration been given to such request?
3. Will this work be carried out in the near future?

My impression is that drainage works come under the provincial government. I suppose I would have to look over the files to see whether, in the last ten or twenty years, we had any correspondence on the subject. I think that question should be dropped. Clearly, it is not under federal jurisdiction. In so far as the other two subjects are concerned, I can try to give answers on Monday. I shall do my best.

Mr. Drew: The minister, who is the house leader for the government, has referred to his own department. I would point out that the comments he has made in regard to one of those questions are comments that would, in the ordinary course of events, be put forward as reasons why particular questions should or should not be answered.

What I am really raising at the moment is the fact that some of those questions relate to subjects which may have demanded more extensive inquiry than others. I would point out that if the government is prepared to make them orders for returns, then they can be dealt with in the ordinary way during the period when we are recessed. Having regard to what I have said and to the indication the minister has given that he will review the questions relating to his department, may I ask that he have a review made of the other questions, and then it may be possible on Monday morning to indicate the willingness or otherwise of the government to make these orders for returns. If there are questions which in the opinion of the government cannot be answered, that could be pointed out and dealt with appropriately.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall undertake to discuss the matter with my colleagues. I would ask that question No. 17 be dropped, because it does not come under our jurisdiction at all.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed that question No. 17 be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

TRADE

PURCHASES FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM—PAYMENTS ON LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production. Can the minister advise the house whether any further progress has been made in increasing Canadian purchases from the United Kingdom as a means of giving them greater purchasing power with which to buy from us and, in particular, has it been found possible to increase purchases of defence materials from the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, speaking for the Department of Trade and Commerce, every encouragement has been given to provide purchasers in the United Kingdom with dollars. The sterling trade committee has been active in promoting purchases in the United Kingdom, and I think some success is following their efforts.

So far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned, orders were placed in the United Kingdom last year, that is in the fiscal year 1951-52, to the order of about $45 million, and the results of the last three months indicate that the orders placed in the United Kingdom will be considerably higher in the fiscal year 1952-53.

I might point out, however, that purchasing in the United Kingdom depends a great deal upon availability, and to date we have found it rather difficult to obtain there the materials, equipment and machinery that we need for defence production.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question. Has any consideration been given to a proposal of this description, that payments on the $1,200 million loan be deferred, without interest, and the amount due Canada this year, we will say—last year I think it was $26 million—made available to the British to purchase in Canada such things as agricultural products, fish and so on.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): That matter has not been considered. The next payment on the United Kingdom-Canada loan will fall due in December, and there are certain provisions in the loan agreement, similar to the provisions in the United States loan, which provide for a waiver of the interest payment under certain conditions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Coldwell: The government will consider that when the time comes?

Mr. Abbott: Those matters are always kept under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance with respect to the answer he has already given. What was the position with regard to the interest payment last year?

Mr. Abbott: The conditions of the loan were adhered to both so far as the United States is concerned and Canada, and the interest and capital payments were made on the due date.

RUDOLF SHOHAN

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT—ARREST ON CHARGE OF FALSE PASSPORT DECLARATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice in connection with a news report of Canadian Press relative to the alleged charges having been laid against someone in Montreal, arising out of consorting with Russian agents. Although there was a great deal in the press report, the charge was not made clear. Is the minister in a position to say anything about the matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): We have not been in a position to make a press statement on this matter until this morning. Just before I came into the chamber, I sent the following press statement up to the press gallery:

Rudolf Shohan, also known as Raymond Arthur Davies of Montreal, was arrested on the morning of Saturday, June 28. He was charged under section 405A of the Criminal Code with having made an untrue or misleading statement in writing for the purpose of obtaining a Canadian passport. He is being escorted to Ottawa by the R.C.M. Police and will appear in magistrate's court there probably on Monday, June 30.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—OFFICERS ON LOAN FROM BUSINESS AND INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Would it be possible to get a return to an order passed on June 23, in connection with a question I asked concerning the officers on loan from business and industry to the Department of Defence Production? I am hoping that this return can be brought down before the house adjourns next week.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the only delay is in connection with compiling the list. It is a rather extensive list. I will ask that it be brought down on Monday if it is at all possible.

FISHERIES

LOCATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SCALLOP BEDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. According to a press despatch in the Halifax Herald on June 20 I note that the minister was to give me the location of the scallop beds of Prince Edward Island as reported by the fisheries research board. Later on, in another dispatch, I note that a new scallop bed is reported somewhere in the Northumberland strait. I should like to have from the minister more definite information as to the location of these beds than just that they are in Northumberland strait.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I will see that the hon. member gets the information he desires.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. MCIVOR—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. DREW IN FORT WILLIAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I just want to thank the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) for his kindness, during his recent visit to Fort William, in advertising me to the people of Fort William.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

TO PROVIDE FOR ADMINISTRATION, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 306, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the minister going to make a statement with regard to these amendments?

Mr. Garson: I do not think it is necessary to go into any details concerning them. They were all made in the banking and commerce committee of the Senate when members of our combines investigation staff and I were present. They are all acceptable to the government.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has been extremely brief in his explanation of the amendments. I should like to make a comment on them, Mr. Speaker; and I may say that it will not be an extended comment.

I think it is only fair to state that, in my view, the amendments made by the Senate to this bill result in an improvement in the bill. The amendments are not as extensive perhaps as some had been led to believe or expect as a result of the discussions which occurred there and which were reported widely in the press. But so far as these amendments go it seems to me that they make an improvement in the bill.

Personally I have noticed with some little degree of interest, Mr. Speaker, the fact that four of these amendments relate to penalties that follow upon breaches of the act or the Criminal Code. It is the very point that I raised when this bill was before the committee of the whole in this house. Those are amendments which are to be found at page 16, line 4; page 16, line 37; page 21, line 16; page 21, lines 25 and 26 where in each case the words "imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years" are stricken out and the words:

> a fine in the discretion of the court or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to both...

are substituted.

When I raised the point in the house the minister rejected the suggestion that there should be some amendment of this kind and said it was quite unnecessary, and that the subject was sufficiently provided for already by the Criminal Code. I do not wish to obtrude personal considerations into this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I must say that it is not a little gratifying to see these four amendments made by the Senate in connection with this particular subject and also to find now that amendments of this kind are entirely acceptable to the government whereas a matter of two short weeks ago the suggestion was quite unacceptable to the minister.

The other principal feature of the amendments proposed by the Senate relates to the imposition of a time limit in the cases where power is given by the bill, following upon a conviction, to follow up in the case of a person or corporation convicted. We now find the Senate proposing a time limit of three years in the power conferred by the new section 33, subsection 1, of the Combines Investigation Act. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that that is a desirable improvement.

As to the other amendments made, I think in each case they can also be said to be improvements. I am glad to see that, perhaps because of the lateness of the season in this session, the government is ready and prepared to accept amendments even though they were not quite so ready when the bill was before this house.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I shall be brief in what I have to say; but unlike the hon. member for Eglinton I do not approve of the amendments suggested by the Senate to the bill which amends the Combines Investigation Act. It seems to me that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was right the first time in the wording of the sections having to do with punishment for certain offences under the Combines Investigation Act. I realize that the minister can argue that the change is one more of form than of substance. I see him nodding his head to that proposition.

Mr. Garson: There is no change in substance whatsoever.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the minister goes a bit further with respect to what I have just said. But it is my submission that, if there is such a thing in law, there is a change in the spirit; and I think it is a poor change to be making. When the government brought in this legislation, its assertion was that it was for the purpose of strengthening our laws against combines and that one of the ways in which our laws against combines were being strengthened was by the stiffening of penalties for offences under the act. In that vein we had at least these four places in the amending bill where it was stated, as for example, in section 32 (1):

> Every person who is a party or privy to or knowingly assists in the formation or operation of a combine is guilty of an indictable offence and liable on conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

There are four places in the bill as it went through this house where that phrase appears, that the punishment shall be imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. In each of these four places the Senate has accepted the suggestion that was made in this house by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that the court should be given the discretion to choose either a fine or imprisonment. When the hon. member for Eglinton made that proposal in this house, the reply of the Minister of Justice was that section 1035 of the Criminal Code would give the court that discretion anyway; therefore, said he on that occasion, it was not necessary to indicate that discretion in the Combines Investigation Act.

I have the advantage of not being a lawyer, and it seems to me that it does make a difference when you have a combines investigation law which says—and it sticks out very prominently—to the judge who is dealing with it that the punishment is imprisonment. That certainly sounds to me a lot stronger—even though there is a loophole tucked away in some other law that may give the judge, if he can find that loophole, the right to substitute a fine—than wording the combines law so that it says to the judge: You can give this director of the corporation either a fine or imprisonment. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, the effect of this is to weaken in spirit at any rate the proposed strengthening of the Combines Investigation Act.

That same provision carries through in four places, as I say. When we were discussing that in this house on June 11 the minister and I got involved in a discussion over the matter, and I wanted to be sure that a director of a corporation could, under the amended legislation, be jailed if he knowingly was a party to certain offences under this act. Our conversation was in legalistic terms, but it ended in this way, as recorded in Hansard of June 11, 1952, at page 3147:

> Mr. Knowles: That is what I mean. Under the terms of 32(1), if a director of a corporation is a party to an offence and it is proved that he knowingly assisted in the formation or operation of a combine, can he be put in jail?
> Mr. Garson: Yes, if he is convicted.
> Mr. Knowles: Good.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the minister may reply that it is still possible under the amended form for the director of a corporation to be put in jail; but, as I say, the change that has been made in the combines law gives two alternatives, and to that extent it seems to me that the whole case against those who commit offences under this law has been weakened. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that when the Senate passed these amendments the other day, and if this house approves their amendments on this occasion, we are saying to directors of corporations across this country that they need not worry about the jail sentences that were hanging over them in the amended bill in case they are parties to breaches under this act, and for that reason it is my view that the bill should stay in the form in which it was passed in this house, and that we should not approve of the amendments suggested by Their Honours in the other place.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Garson: I am sure it will be a source of great comfort to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to know that his reasoning is identical with that of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. That chamber took the position that section 32 (1) of this bill in the form in which it was first passed was an intimidation of people who might be affected by it; and that it was preferable to have inserted in the Combines Investigation Act itself an alternative penalty of a fine.

Now, actually, as I explained when this suggestion was first made in this chamber by the hon. member for Eglinton, there is no difference whatsoever, so far as substance is concerned, between the present wording as amended by the Senate and the wording of the bill in its original form. The position was simply this. Strange as it might seem it is impossible to imprison a corporation. Therefore when you have a penalty of imprisonment of this sort in this Combines Investigation Act, and in many sections of the Criminal Code dealing with offences which it is possible for a corporation to commit, it is preferable, instead of having in each one of those sections, wherever they occur, a provision that if the accused is a corporation it shall be fined instead of imprisoned, to have instead only one section in the Criminal Code, namely, section 1035. This section provides, amongst other things, that the courts shall have authority, instead of imposing a two-year penalty of imprisonment upon an accused person—including a corporation that cannot be imprisoned—to impose a fine without limit. Read with this section 1035 of the Criminal Code, the original wording of this section 32 (1) of the Combines Investigation Act amendments was quite sufficient to achieve exactly the same effect that it now achieves when it is spelled out in the way in which it has been spelled out by the Senate.

The chamber of commerce wanted to have it spelled out for exactly the same reasons as those which have been urged this morning by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for not spelling it out; and I must say—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will just let me continue. I must say I find this reasoning equally unconvincing from both these sources.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, the minister seems to have misunderstood what I was saying. I did not want it spelled out in this way.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend does not want it spelled out in this way because my hon.

friend thinks the same as does the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and that is, if it is not spelled out that way it will serve as an intimidation. The argument is that you will then frighten these people into being good by the fact that there is no alternative of a fine. Well, I find that sort of argument extremely unimpressive. I cannot understand why corporations—

Mr. Knowles: You are encouraging corporation directors to break the law by telling them that there will now be no jail sentences.

Mr. Garson: —who will be advised by the cream of the legal talent in this country, are going to be frightened by a provision in the Combines Investigation Act which says that a person which includes a corporation is going to be imprisoned for two years—

Mr. Knowles: If they break the law there will be no jail sentences for directors of corporations. That is what you are now saying.

Mr. Garson: —when there is and can be no jail sentence for corporations, and when the court already has power to fine instead of imprisoning both an individual and a corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. Drew: May I ask if it is the intention of the minister to make any statement? If so, I will naturally wait until he has done so.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I have already explained on two occasions in the house, is a bill which was recommended to the house by the special committee on redistribution.

The purpose of the bill is to give legal expression to the decision which has been reached by this house in amending the British North America Act earlier this month. It sets out the number of seats which are allotted to the various provinces, the district of Mackenzie and the district of Yukon, and provides, incidentally, instructions as to the interpretation, descriptions and the like. It is, so far as I have been able to determine, in the form which has been common to these bills for some time, and certainly in the past two or three redistributions. It follows almost precisely the wording of the 1947 act, with minor variations. The procedure which we hope will be adopted, if second reading is given, is that I shall move that this bill be referred to the special committee on redistribution for consideration, and for the purpose of attaching thereto the schedule of the constituencies as defined by that committee. That, I believe, has been the custom since 1903.

There will be other amendments suggested, I think, in that committee—if I may be permitted to suggest this to the house—having in mind the fact that some constituencies will be renamed, and therefore amendments will be required in the Canada Elections Act.

I want to point out to the house again that this is merely a bill for the purpose of carrying out the allotment of members among the provinces as determined by the House of Commons recently. It does not contain and makes no reference to the boundaries of the constituencies, which have not yet been reported to the house, nor will they be until the schedule has been affixed to the bill.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this subject is one which has frequently engaged the attention of the house, since the British North America Act of 1867 requires a decennial census, and a redistribution of seats in accordance with that census. Section 8 of that act makes mandatory the taking of a census every ten years. Section 51 makes it equally mandatory that there shall be a readjustment of seats in accordance with that census.

There has been earlier discussion on a number of occasions about the interests of the provinces in the question of redistribution. I have expressed my own opinion that, when it comes to the number of seats each province will have, the provinces should be consulted. I mention that now because I would not wish any remarks I make in regard to the delineation of boundaries within a province, once that allocation of seats has been determined, to leave the impression that I am in any way disregarding my earlier argument, and the belief I hold very strongly, that the provinces have an interest, and that they should be consulted in regard to the number of seats by which each province will be represented in the House of Commons.

Up to that point, however, it appears to have been generally accepted by members in the house from every part of Canada that the problem of finding the method by which the delineation of the boundaries of the various constituencies will carry out the requirements of section 51 of the British North America Act is the responsibility of the parliament of Canada. Once again we are called upon to carry out the duty of members of the house to reallocate the seats as required by section 51 in relation to the census taken, under the provisions of section 8 of the British North America Act.

I agree that it is the duty of the House of Commons to carry out that responsibility, and that this responsibility should be accepted during the course of the present session. Having said that, I wish to review some of the considerations which it seems to me should be borne in mind at the time we are asked to accept a principle established by an act which perpetuates the unsatisfactory method that has been followed for so many years in carrying out that responsibility.

We have indicated our disapproval of the method. That disapproval has been expressed on both sides of the house. I am not claiming any originality either on my part or on the part of any member of the Progressive Conservative party in suggesting that the procedure is unsatisfactory, and that another procedure should be adopted.

Over and over again very strong arguments have been made against a system which has aroused cynicism in the minds of the people of Canada as to the way in which the boundaries of our electoral districts are actually decided. And, after all, it is of importance to the members of the House of Commons if the public does regard with cynicism the method we adopt, and if we do not do everything within our power to remove the grounds for that cynicism.

I am not suggesting for one moment that either party can claim any particular credit for virtue in the way in which this has been done in the past. Perhaps I may anticipate the fact that some hon. member opposite will recall the well-remembered words of Sir John A. Macdonald, that in carrying out a redistribution he was going, to use his own words, to do what he could to hive the Grits.

Perhaps there was a fairly frank approach to this subject at that time. At least it was frank; at least he left no doubt as to what his intention was. I must say that it is better to be as frank as that than to proclaim virtue and then to adopt a course which is just as cynical as any which has ever been followed since 1867.

After all, as we are so often reminded, there has been great progress in this country. Our parliamentary system has been described as a transcript of Westminster. Stage by stage we have advanced to an increasing measure of maturity, and of pride in our own acceptance of responsibility. Nevertheless we all recognize that our parliamentary system was borrowed from the parliamentary system of the United Kingdom, and that we have very closely followed the rules and practices of that system throughout the years.

That has been true in substantial measure of the other nations of the commonwealth. I mention this because there has been marked progress in the other nations of the commonwealth in dealing with this problem. While at one time they followed the same methods we follow, they have now advanced from the stage of the pocket boroughs and the political liquidation by redistribution of opponents whose presence in the House of Commons they were not inclined to encourage. The result is that in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa they have impartial bodies conducting an examination of this problem outside the House of Commons and presenting to the House of Commons recommendations which can be accepted, amended or refused. It has worked in the other nations of the commonwealth. It has found acceptance and has increased the confidence of the public in the way in which they have an opportunity to be represented in the House of Commons where government of the people by the people through their elected representatives is supposed to be truly representative as far as that can be possible.

Whatever may have happened in the past, whatever arguments may have been made for or against this system, we should be ready to move with the times. There comes some point when the professions of both parties should reach some effective interpretation by legislative action in this House of Commons and in the parliament of Canada. If the arguments had been made only on one side of this house then it might well be that the repetition of any of those arguments might be regarded simply as an attempt to embed in the records of this house a repetition of earlier statements so that the position of any party might be before the people of Canada and it might be possible at some future time to say, "This has been our position and we ask you to support us in that position."

The fact is, however, that objections to this system have been just as vigorous and just as critical when uttered by members of the Liberal party as when uttered by members of the Conservative or any other party in this house. Those remarks were particularly critical when they were uttered by the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King. Members of this party have not been notorious for their complete agreement with everything that Mr. King did in this house, but I think it is a matter of record that the members of this party have indicated their acceptance of his respect for parliamentary institutions and his knowledge of parliamentary practices. For that reason I suggest that when we are called upon to consider this measure at this time it is a good thing to recall what was said by Mr. King in regard to this subject in view of the extent to which the members of the Liberal party now in the house have expressed at all times their faith and confidence in his political opinions.

Again I would indicate that sometimes the views that have been expressed seem to have been more vigorous when some of the speakers were in opposition than when they formed the government. What I propose to quote now was said by Mr. King at the time he was in opposition. However, I point out these words because he indicated when he returned to office later that he had not changed his opinion in that respect. On May 25, 1933, as reported on page 5425 of Hansard of 1932-33, Mr. King had this to say:

> My own view, and I have come to it after observing pretty carefully what has been taking place and what has been said in debate in this house as well as in the corridors,—

May I repeat those words, "in the corridors."

> —is that redistribution should be taken out of the hands of the House of Commons, where the parties are immediately interested, and should be put into the hands of a commission of judges. I would have that commission composed of judges selected in equal numbers by both sides of the house. The redistribution, if it is carried out in a fair way has not to do with party advantage at all. It ought to have solely to do with seeking to effect a fair and impartial division of the constituencies, and if three judges were named from one side of the house and three from the other, and if the choice were made, if you will, from among those who have been in politics and who therefore may be presumed to know something about conditions generally as they exist throughout the country, I think a redistribution which would be regarded as fair might be arrived at. Probably it would not be perfect, and any report which the commission made would have to be submitted to parliament and made subject to discussion and debate in parliament. But I do think that something of that kind would serve to bring about a much fairer result. May I say that if the choice were made in the manner indicated the judges in my opinion ought to be chosen from different parts of Canada. The result would be that in the matters that came before them, there would always be a majority of the commission of judges from outside of the particular province whose affairs might be under consideration by the commission at the time a decision was to be made. It is impossible to get perfection in anything, but I do submit that part of the duty of every member of this house is to consider not only the problems of his own day, but as well the future of his country. I hesitate to think of the complexion of this house as it may be ten years hence. Looking back on the past ten years, the changes that have taken place in that period have been very many. I imagine that the greater part of those of us who are now here will before the time for another redistribution comes have, so far as continuing as representatives in this House of Commons is concerned, passed beyond its bounds. In the circumstances I think it is a duty that those of us who have views as to what we believe would most be in the interests of our country should assert our views and leave them of record, that they may be there to guide future parliaments in so far as their members may wish to be governed by them.

I have quoted those words because when Mr. King spoke them in this house he indicated that he was putting them on the record in the hope that they might be remembered by others who would recognize his parliamentary and political experience no matter whether they might agree with other views that he expressed. Mr. King had the opportunity to speak again on this subject. He was spared to return after the next decennial census and to express his views once again at a time when he was prime minister of this country. He again repeated his view that a redistribution of this kind should be carried out by an independent commission. He had not changed his opinion.

May I quote from Hansard for July 15, 1947, at page 5648. At that time he was speaking in reply to a speech by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the same hon. member who now represents that very well known constituency in Saskatchewan. These were Mr. King's words at that time:

> May I say that with much of what my hon. friend from Lake Centre has just said I am in most hearty accord and agreement. I think I made it very clear at the beginning of this session when I spoke on the question of redistribution that I myself would like to see the whole question of redistribution of the constituencies taken out of the hands of the hon. members of the House of Commons and placed before a commission of judges. I have here the daily Hansard of February 3, 1947, and I read my words as spoken at that time:
> I believe I have covered all that I think it desirable to say at present, beyond giving my hon. friend an assurance that the redistribution measure will be brought in at an early date in this session. I still hold the view which I expressed before. I personally would prefer a commission of judges to make the redistribution of seats in this house, but I do not believe that the majority of hon. members take that view, and in that particular I am prepared to accept the will of the majority. I hope, however, the day will come when the House of Commons of Canada will see the wisdom of allowing its redistribution to be made by some impartial tribunal and not by the members of the house themselves dealing with the matter in committee as it has been dealt with in former years.

Then he went on at that time to repeat the view that he had expressed in 1933 and to which I have already referred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that opinion has been put forward by other hon. members of the Liberal party and of those one who has put it forward most frequently and most vigorously has been the hon. member for Quebec

South (Mr. Power), who has spoken over and over again on this subject from his long experience in parliament. He has dealt with the subject during the course of the current session. He has over and over again emphasized the need for having a different method than the committee method which we are now asked to repeat. The member for Quebec South has referred to the difficulties which have arisen and he refers to the difficulties that arose in the committee which was set up after the speech made by Mr. King in 1933. On a later occasion this is what the member for Quebec South said:

> Members who were in this house in 1934 will remember that the committee pretty well ended up in what might have been called an unseemly turmoil, . . .

On that occasion the hon. member was using words which less than described the vigour of the exchange of opinion covered by the term "unseemly turmoil". The difficulty has been that, on each occasion when these very clear and, one would have thought, convincing arguments have been put forward, it always has been suggested that the next time will provide the opportunity. Over and over again we find the explanation that we are now confronted with—that of the necessity of carrying out the obligations under the British North America Act to effect redistribution, and therefore the consideration of a better method must be deferred until some other time.

May I quote from what the hon. member for Quebec South said in 1939 at the time that he was a minister of this government? I quote from Hansard for 1939, volume II, page 1807, and I will continue to quote until I indicate that the quotation is ended:

> . . . the object of this motion is to set up again for this year a committee which has been functioning for the past three sessions of this parliament. During the 1936 session the committee studied and reported on such matters as proportional representation, the alternative vote, compulsory registration and voting. During the session of 1937 it considered a large number of proposals which had been made to this house, and particularly to the committee, having for their object the revision of the elections act. Of these proposals, something over one hundred in number, I am informed, some thirty-three were adopted and passed into legislation.
> The committee also gave some consideration during the 1937 session to the question of the method of arriving at an equitable redistribution of the seats in this house. During the session of 1938, in the light of the information they had gained from the suggestions made to them by the public, by members of parliament, by organizations, and also by the chief electoral officer, whose long experience in matters of this kind formed the basis of his recommendations, the committee studied and finally recommended unanimously an act known as the Dominion Elections Act, which, with some minor amendments, finally passed this house. I think it can be said, generally speaking, that this act, so far as we are able to judge, since it has not been in operation in an actual theatre of war, has given general satisfaction.

There remain for the consideration of the committee two subjects which are cognate to those already discussed, namely, first, that of methods of effecting redistribution of seats in this house, and second, the question of election and campaign expenditures.

With respect to the redistribution of seats, I think the advisability and even the necessity of remodelling the procedure whereby every ten years or so this house is made the theatre of a somewhat unseemly, undignified and utterly confusing scramble for personal or political advantage, should be evident to all. The difficulty of making an equitable distribution of seats in any country is increased many fold in this country, where we must take into consideration diversity of interests, economic and social; the racial distinctions which exist; the growth of population; and the varying movements of our population brought about to some extent by economic causes in our cities, and in the rural districts, by the opening up of our hinterland. I say this country is an extremely difficult one to redistribute, and that makes it all the more necessary that there should be a drastic change in the system which we have followed up to the present.

As hon. members of the house know, these redistributions have taken place as a result of conferences, of meetings of committees, and finally of what you might almost call a battle royal in this house. It is inevitable no matter which party is in power that there should be complaints and that the distribution of seats will not meet with the approval of all. There are today, as there have been in the past, what I might call almost appalling inequalities of distribution. To cite only a few of them: In the province of Quebec, the constituency of Argenteuil has 11,122 voters and sends one member to this house. Another rural constituency, that of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, has 30,363 voters and sends only one representative to this house. Among the urban constituencies in the city of Montreal, St. Lawrence-St. George, with 22,549 voters, sends one member, and St. James, with 54,760 voters, sends one member. It is not surprising that there has arisen a suspicion that the redistribution was undertaken or was carried out not so much in the interests of giving a better distribution of seats but, on the part of some government, to have a greater number of their own followers in the house. But I say and repeat that this would happen no matter what government were in power, and we can only come to the conclusion upon looking over the ground that there should be evolved some method other than the law of the jungle—might is right—in order to bring about a distribution which would be fair to the people of Canada.

Now, that is the end of the quotation I propose to put on the record at the moment. I do so, and I place it side by side with the statement by Mr. King so that the arguments that have been made from this side of the house and the arguments that may be made now will not stand simply as partisan expressions in relation to a problem which, in the interests of dignity and respect for parliament, should be brought out of the turmoil and the type of log-rolling which have been part and parcel of this system no matter which government was in power.

Today, we are called upon to decide a simple question put forward in such clear terms by the dean of the Liberal party in this house, the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). We are simply asked, when we consider the principle on second reading, whether we are going to perpetuate the law of the jungle in carrying out redistribution or whether we are not. We are being asked to decide, in dealing with the principle inherent in this act, whether we are going to have an unseemly, undignified and utterly confusing scramble for personal or political advantage. Do not let anyone in this house suggest that there has not been a scramble for political advantage during the considerations given to this subject by the committee already. If anyone says that is not so, may I say in advance that his respect for the intelligence and confidence of the house will be left seriously in doubt when that statement is made. Granted, we have had professions of a desire for a fair and impartial way of dealing with this, but once again qualifying my remarks to say that no one party can claim particular credit for its virtue in tackling this subject in the past, may I say that the professions of impartiality have not gone hand in hand with the actual conduct of either the provincial committees or the general committee in dealing with this problem during this session.

The law of the jungle is the law that has been followed in several cases, and the inequalities referred to by the hon. member for Quebec South, in his very clear and intelligent interpretation of the weaknesses of the system we are asked to perpetuate, are still there. Being a very well known representative from the province of Quebec, he naturally dealt with the inequalities in that province, but those inequalities exist all over Canada. It is not only the acts of commission of the committee which are open to criticism, but it is the acts of omission as well. It is not only that there has been gerrymandering of the most vicious kind in certain cases, but it is also the fact that there has been no attempt to deal with this problem of inequality of representation. There are still seats, under the plans put forward, with a small population that will send one member to this house, and there are seats with more than 90,000 who will have one member; that is not representation by population.

I recognize, and I think all the members of this house recognize, there are certain considerations which must prevent any system of absolute equality of representation by population. I recognize that there are distant and remote constituencies where the distribution of population would make it utterly fantastic to follow any strict basis of the allocation of population. We had the example of one member representing that vast area including the Yukon and the Mackenzie area, an area greater than the most of western Europe. Here was an empire in itself, represented by one member. It is not only impossible for the member to get in touch with all the prospective voters before an election, but it is utterly impossible for any member, no matter what his energies or wishes may be, to keep in touch with all that vast area. There has, in this case, been a very sensible attempt to recognize that there are cases where any rigid rule will not apply, and it is therefore intended to have an electoral district for the Yukon and an electoral district for the Mackenzie areas. Even yet, they will be enormous areas for a single member to represent.

But surely there must be some line drawn. There must be some better explanation than we have yet of the necessity for having constituencies with a population of 20,000, or a few more, and other constituencies with a population of more than 90,000 as South York will have under the plans now being presented. We know, Mr. Speaker, that no real effort has been made to deal with this problem on the basis of any settled principle. Even under the unsatisfactory procedure which we are called upon to perpetuate, it would seem that the logical method would be for the committee to meet and decide on some basic principle which would guide the provincial subcommittees and the general committee in reaching a conclusion as to what the division of population within the various constituencies should be. But that was not the method. There was, of course, some confusion created by certain maps that got into the press. The members of the committee were told that there were no maps and then in some strange way maps appeared in the press, indicating an extraordinary prescience on the part of certain newspapermen in interpreting the minds of the members of the committee. It would indicate a very high ability on the part of certain members of the press to anticipate the opinion of the members of the committee in that particular case, because maps appearing in the press when no maps existed, according to statements made to the committee, afterwards turned out to be quite correct.

It does indicate, of course, that close association between members of the press gallery and members of the house which is extremely helpful in interpreting the events of this house to the public of Canada. Of course, in everything I say I am paying my respects in the utmost sincerity to the members of the press. They were performing their proper duty and seeking to interpret to the people of Canada this very important function of parliament which was being carried out. I must confess that it has strained the credulity of some of us to believe that there were no maps in existence. However, if we are told that is the case, we are bound to accept that statement. It would have seemed that the way in which maps should be drawn ultimately would have been to say, this is the principle we will follow, and then appoint subcommittees to draft maps in accordance with that principle. But that was not the method that was followed. The people of Canada should know that it was not the method that was followed, if we are by any chance to be forced to perpetuate the law of the jungle by a majority vote of this house at this time. I of course point out again that I am simply following the words of the very distinguished hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) in describing the procedure in that way.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask a question at this point, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The law of the jungle did not apply to the Yukon-Mackenzie River redistribution committee, of which I had the honour to be chairman. We have a great many wolves up there and we have some respect for the law of the jungle. But we did not have the law of the jungle apply to these beautiful tropical areas along the Yukon and Mackenzie rivers.

Mr. Drew: I do not know whether the hon. member came in after I discussed that subject. He must have done so, because I pointed out that a commendable course of action had been followed by the committee in dealing with the Yukon and Mackenzie river areas.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I thank the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I also indicated my regret that similarly wise considerations had not prompted the committee in dealing with other problems in other parts of Canada.

This committee, Mr. Speaker, is exactly the same kind of committee as that which has been criticized by such distinguished parliamentarians as the late Mr. King and the hon. member for Quebec South as well as by many others in earlier days and by members sitting in this house. May I say that Hansard will show that, among the extremely effective, wise and sound discussions of this subject, none rate higher than those of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on earlier occasions in this house. I am repeating these observations today for the purpose of showing that we are being called upon to repeat abuses or things that have been regarded as abuses by both sides of this house.

It will be pointed out that there was a time when there was no committee, and that in "those dear dead days beyond recall", at a time when parliamentary procedure had not advanced to its present point, governments in power did not go through the motions of setting up a committee. They simply presented maps and they admitted that the maps actually existed. They did not hesitate to say so; and they did not hesitate to declare the purpose behind those maps. As I have said already, I do not hesitate to quote the words of Sir John A. Macdonald who said that the maps were for the purpose of hiving the Grits. That was the attitude in those days. But on both sides of the house we are assumed to have recognized that changes have taken place over the years.

Yes, a committee is an improvement. But a committee of this kind is an improvement only to the extent that it gives the condemned man a chance to see the scaffold before his execution. That is all it does. Make no mistake about it, the scaffold is there.

An hon. Member: And the rope.

Mr. Drew: And the rope as well.

An hon. Member: And the hangman.

Mr. Drew: It is only a question of when and how, and the victim is given a chance to see where the trap is going to be sprung, if not when.

An hon. Member: And he is not even blindfolded.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the very fact that on both sides of this house this subject should have been so constantly the subject of criticism suggests to me that we should not be carrying this matter forward on a narrow, partisan basis. At a time when parliamentary government and free government all over the world is under the test as it is today, it seems to me that we will only be taking our responsible part in the great struggle to preserve respect for the processes of democracy if we say at this time that we are going to do what we can to give to the public a feeling of confidence. One way to do that would be to say that, under some clearly-established principle, we will come as close as possible to assuring representation by population in the parliament of Canada, and that we will not by our actions repeat all the things that have brought this procedure into such great contempt.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is not only in the interests of this House of Commons and the functioning of it and in the interests of respect for the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada that we should decide to take action now. Because of the importance of respect for parliament, for government and for the procedures of democracy in Canada I think we should decide now to end this confusing and unseemly procedure, and that we should impress upon the public the fact that, regardless of our political affiliations, we are going to end the law of the jungle in carrying out the duties we are called upon to perform under our constitution, namely the British North America Act.

Mr. Speaker, we might have been confronted with some difficulty in presenting this argument on the second reading of this bill if it had been decided by the government to prorogue parliament and not leave an opportunity for further discussion. At a time that it was thought that parliament was going to be prorogued, and that this job must be done in some way within a time that the subject could be dealt with by this house, there may have been some members who reluctantly supported the procedure that was suggested once again. That necessity does not now arise as a result of the decision of the government as indicated to this house yesterday. This session is going to continue and when we rise in the near future it is indicated that we shall adjourn until November 20. This will be a continuing session. It will therefore be possible at this session to provide a method by which this subject can be dealt with in a more orderly and a more satisfactory manner. Even assuming that we were impressed with the apparent desire of the government to remove some of the abuses which have been criticized so often in the past, any sense of confidence in regard to that matter has been removed by what has actually happened before this committee. When we refer to the law of the jungle, may I say that the law of the jungle applied to the decision to obliterate the historic riding of Lake Centre represented by one of the most distinguished members of this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is there anything before the house to that effect?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the committee have made certain decisions. I will anticipate your comment that the discussions before the committee should not be repeated in this house and I shall anticipate a ruling to that effect.

Mr. Knowles: Unless the committee's report was tabled. Was it not tabled?

Mr. Speaker: That was my question. I did not think the report of the committee had been tabled?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Why not?

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, may I point out that one committee report has already been tabled, embracing 97 constituencies. At the final meeting last night it was pointed out that the report should be tabled today embracing all the remaining constituencies.

Mr. Speaker: I will not go into the question of what the committee decided last night unless it has reported to the house. I do not think there is any report before the house in respect to the riding of Lake Centre.

Mr. Sinclair: He is wrong as usual.

Mr. Boucher: I may say that the name of Lake Centre is not eliminated from the map.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, not the name.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The report cannot be discussed until it is before the house.

Mr. Fleming: May I respectfully suggest that if it was agreed that the report should be tabled, in order that this debate might proceed intelligently we should have one of the ministers move that we revert to motions and have it tabled now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I speak to the point of order? There was no such agreement; the very opposite was true. It was not intended that we should debate the boundaries at this particular time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot permit a debate as to what took place in a committee of the house. I think the house appreciates my position.

Mr. Drew: A consideration has arisen which I do not think should be overlooked. There is already a report tabled. If it is correct that it was agreed last night that the report of the committee should be tabled before this debate took place, then I think we should have an explanation from the minister as to why that has not been done. I think also, Mr. Speaker, there are obvious reasons why it should be done, if that was the understanding of the committee.

Mr. Abbott: But it was not.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Again on a point of order, I hope there is no misunderstanding about anything which happened in the committee. We had one already this week and we do not want another. Last night I stated that if the work of the clerk would permit it, we would table a report of the remainder of the constituencies. Up until the time I came into the house that was not available.

There is no desire whatever either to delay this debate or to deny hon. members any opportunity to debate the matter. But I made it abundantly clear in the committee that it was not the intention, as far as I was concerned, and others, that we should at this stage debate boundaries. That debate will take place when the bill comes back to the house with the schedules attached to it, which can only happen when this bill receives second reading.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, the minister's present statement is I think a little different from the one he made two or three minutes ago when he said that there was agreement last night; there was no agreement with respect to the debate today being confined to principle and not including the question of boundaries.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No, I did not say that.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to make it abundantly clear that there was no agreement as to confining this debate.

As to the tabling of the report, there was not any specific agreement on that. The minister is quite right in saying that was a statement. The announcement made by the minister last night as chairman of the committee before the committee rose was that there should be a report made to the house. He thought—I think I am quoting his words correctly—that that report could be tabled at eleven o'clock last night or the first thing this morning. That being the background so far as the committee is concerned, Mr. Speaker, and thinking of the desirability of our having the whole information before us so that we have one intelligent debate on this whole subject and not two, I urge, sir, that the report be tabled at the earliest possible moment. I should think it must be available by now. The house, I am sure, would gladly give consent to our reverting to motions in order that that report could now be tabled and the debate proceed in a comprehensive and intelligent manner.

Mr. Speaker: As to what took place in committee I can only repeat that I can make no ruling. I was not in the committee. The report of the committee is not before the house. May I add, however, that even if the report were before the house it would not be in order on second reading of the bill to discuss the details. It would not be in order at this time to discuss the clauses. Schedules are considered to be clauses. The only question that is debatable now is the principle of the bill. I am sorry to have interrupted the leader of the opposition so long. I hope we have clarified the point.

[Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).]

Mr. Drew: That is the very point. The principle of this bill must of necessity be related to the manner in which it is intended to carry out redistribution, and I would suggest—

Mr. Speaker: I think that is right.

Mr. Drew: I would suggest that while it would certainly not be appropriate to enter into discussion of the exact boundaries of any constituency, it is appropriate to refer to the manner in which the procedure has been followed in order to present an argument as to why it is not a satisfactory procedure.

I go further, Mr. Speaker, and point out that we are asked to give second reading to a bill which refers to a schedule. Section 4 refers to the schedule; section 5 refers to the schedule; section 6 refers to the schedule; and section 7 refers to the schedule. The schedule is part of the bill. Without the schedule—unless there is unanimous consent by the house to proceed without it, as is sometimes done—I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot comprehensively deal with the subject, because the schedule will determine the procedure of which we are being asked to approve.

I would think that in the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it would be appropriate if I moved the adjournment of this debate for the purpose of giving an opportunity to the minister to present the schedule so that we can debate this subject properly.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should probably point out that my recollection of the procedure is, if the hon. member moved the adjournment of the debate at this time and the motion did not carry, he could not continue with his argument. In view of that, the leader of the opposition might like to reconsider his suggestion. There is no motion for adjournment before the house at the present as there can not be a motion without a seconder.

Mr. Drew: I thought that probably the government, with its professions in regard to this matter, would have accepted the suggestion and permitted the debate to continue. However, since they obviously did not, then I do not intend to discontinue my argument at this point. But I will say, Mr. Speaker, the very fact that we are bound to continue this debate without the schedule simply emphasizes the disgraceful results that follow from a procedure of this kind, as outlined by the hon. member for Quebec South.

Let us see what happens if the full schedule is not tabled. We are still dealing with an unknown factor in the discussion of this whole subject. I would hope that, in an effort to avoid some of the criticisms, perhaps before the schedule is brought down there will be further changes of heart, but that may be hoping for too much. Nevertheless I point out that it is an unsatisfactory way to debate this bill, when we cannot illustrate the extent to which these objections which have already been presented—in the past by Mr. King when he was in this house, as well as by the hon. member for Quebec South and by other hon. members from time to time—would be working in this particular case.

This subject is one which could be dealt with in a satisfactory manner, no matter what doubts anyone may have had. I would hope that the credulity of this house will not be tested by suggestions from the other side that the course that has been followed has been one of impartiality in approaching this subject. Members of the government have a chance to indicate that they really want an impartial procedure. There is plenty of opportunity to do it. This subject has been under discussion so often that I am satisfied there must be a draft bill on the files of the solicitor general at this very moment, and that later today a bill could be introduced for the purpose of setting up a commission. It is hardly thinkable, in view of the number of occasions on which a request has been made for the setting up of an impartial commission—by Mr. King, when he was leader of the opposition and when he was prime minister of Canada, and by other members on both sides of the house—that none of the legal officers of the government have at any time drafted that bill. I think it can be said that there is one that was drafted in 1940. Perhaps it has been improved from time to time since then.

I would suggest that, instead of repeating what has been described by the hon. member for Quebec South as unseemly turmoil in the procedure which results from redistribution in this country, a measure should be introduced which would set up a commission. It would proceed, having the advantage of all the discussion which has taken place, and it should prepare plans to be presented to members of the House of Commons when we reconvene on November 20, or at any other date that may be chosen by the government subsequent to that date.

We are not suggesting any untested and untried procedure. We are not suggesting this simply because it has been put forward by members of the Liberal party as well as by members of the Progressive Conservative party and members of other parties in this house. We are putting forward a proposal in regard to a method for effecting redistribution which has worked satisfactorily in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and elsewhere throughout the world.

I do not suggest that we necessarily confine ourselves to the proposal that the commission be made up of judges. It may well be that others should form part of such a commission. For instance, both in the dominion and in the provincial jurisdictions there are surveyors general whose experience would be invaluable, whether as members of or advisers to a commission. There are others whose experience would be of great help.

I do suggest that we now accept the opportunity hon. members on both sides of the house have to refresh our memories with respect to opinions which were put on the record for the particular purpose of being considered at some time in the future, and that we now decide that the opportunity presented by the intention of the government to adjourn instead of to prorogue be accepted, so that this will be dealt with in an orderly manner that will revive the respect of the people of Canada for our system of redistribution in this country.

I repeat that one of the things that should be in the minds of all members of the House of Commons, as representatives of the people of Canada, is respect for our parliamentary system. Respect for the way in which the people will be able to govern themselves through their choice of members to sit in parliament should be in our minds at a time when respect for parliament is part of the great struggle in which we are engaged.

Only a few days ago, I feel sure, every member of the House of Commons read the tragic story of a great naval hero of the last world war who was cashiered from the British navy because he refused to serve any longer. His explanation was that he had lost confidence in the system of government in the country, and in the general purposes to which they were dedicated. Most of us in this Canadian House of Commons would say that in Great Britain they are giving as fine an example of parliamentary government under the system they have as is to be found anywhere, along with the system we have here in Canada and elsewhere in the commonwealth.

The fact remains, however, that this was an expression of loss of confidence, whether justified or unjustified. And, recognizing the fact that loss of confidence in a parliamentary system and in the way in which government operates can unsettle people's minds to that extent, at a time when we are engaged in a war of ideas, let us do what we can to maintain confidence in that system, by everything we do.

It is with that thought in mind, and with the idea that this is an amendment which would produce a result that could be carried into effect during the life of the present parliament, and that therefore there would be no delay in carrying out our duty within the life of this session of parliament, that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That the said bill be not now read the second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the enactment of a measure to provide for the appointment of a commission to effect the redistribution of electoral ridings in accordance with the census of 1951 and pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952 inclusive; such commission to be instructed to make its report to this session of parliament upon the resumption of its sitting.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. But before proceeding I wish first of all to state, as a result of what was said a moment ago by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), that I did not mean to state that there had been an agreement in committee that we would not at this time debate the boundaries. What I was trying to say in answer to the question raised was that there had not been agreement to do so.

Then, on the other point, I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that earlier this session, namely in the debate on the British North America Act, the question was raised by my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg Lake Centre—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Redistribution is having its effect.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): A question was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in the form of a motion to refer back to the committee on redistribution for a decision the question as to whether a commission should be set up for the purpose of redistributing seats in parliament. On that occasion there was a division, and I submit to Your Honour that this question has already been settled at this session.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I speak at this point to the point of order. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) argues that, in view of my amendment to Bill 331 which was reported at page 3179 of Hansard for June 12, 1952, the question covered by the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has already been dealt with at this session of parliament.

[Mr. Drew.]

I submit that that is by no means the case. The amendment I moved to Bill 331 very specifically and very clearly referred to the redistribution to be effected following the decennial census of 1961 and each decennial census thereafter. My amendment on June 12 had no relationship whatsoever to the present redistribution. I note that the leader of the opposition has drafted his amendment in the same form in which I had drafted one which I would have moved had I the chance. It refers solely to the redistribution required in accordance with the census of 1951. I submit that this is a different question. The house already has disposed of my proposal that there be an amendment to the British North America Act requiring an independent commission to deal with redistribution in and after 1961, but the house has not yet dealt with the question as to whether there should be an independent commission to deal with the redistribution required as a result of the census of 1951. I submit that they are two distinct propositions and that the amendment of the leader of the opposition is just as much in order as is the one I would have moved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think it would be well to read the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to which he has just made reference. It reads:

That Bill 331 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the special committee on redistribution with instructions that they have power to consider whether the British North America Act should be amended so as to provide that the readjustment in the representation in the House of Commons to be effected following the decennial census of 1961, and each decennial census thereafter, shall be made, subject to any rules to be prescribed by parliament, by an independent commission to be established by parliament for that purpose.

The essence of that amendment is, first, that the matter be referred to the committee with instructions that they have power to consider whether the British North America Act should be amended. In any event it is not applicable to the present time; it refers to a future date. The essence of that amendment is that the commission should operate at a date removed from the present by ten years. The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) reads:

That the said bill be not now read the second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the enactment of a measure to provide for the appointment of a commission to effect the redistribution of electoral ridings in accordance with the census of 1951 and pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952 inclusive; such commission to be instructed to make its report to this session of parliament upon the resumption of its sitting.

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory to some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress;...

Similar amendments have been moved on previous occasions, and I would refer to an amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) on March 27, 1950, which reads:

That Bill No. 17 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the introducing of legislation to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act so as to provide that floor prices should be established at such levels as to guarantee to producers a price-cost relationship not less favourable than that prevailing in the period 1944-48.

My submission is that the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition is entirely different in application and in time period, and also in its purported relationship to anything that has been dealt with previously, in particular to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I submit that the amendment is proper and should be upheld by Your Honour.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to repeat the observations made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I should like to emphasize, by reference to the debate that occurred on June 12, the essential difference between the amendment now before the house and the amendment introduced at that time by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. As you will recall, that amendment was to have a future operation only and had no reference whatever to the redistribution required to be made following the census of 1951. The essence of that amendment, as interpreted in the debate which followed, was that it should write into the British North America Act a requirement that all future redistributions, commencing with the one following the census of 1961, should be carried out by a commission.

You will recall that in the notable speech made on that occasion by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) he emphasized that that was not the kind of amendment that ought to be written into the British North America Act. It seems to me that that is the basic distinction between the amendment introduced on June 12 and the amendment before the house at the present time. There was no opportunity under that amendment for members, who held the point of view that some of us did, that that kind of provision ought not to be written into the British North America Act, to contend that that should be a matter of procedure in this house covered by statute.

The issue decided on June 12 was that such a matter was not a proper subject of amendment to the British North America Act, but it did not go further and say that redistribution by means of a commission should not be carried out pursuant to ordinary statute or decision of this house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, just to refer to the aspect of this problem which has been raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I would point out that the motion at that time was a proposal to amend the British North America Act. It would seem that what was in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in presenting that motion was that he did not think that we could not proceed in this way at that time and was suggesting an amendment to cover 1961.

Mr. Knowles: I thought we could but I was afraid the house would not agree with me.

Mr. Drew: In any event there were many who had the idea at that time with the prorogation of parliament, no matter how desirable another system might be, it would not be practical to set up some other body and have them report back in time for the house to deal with it. I think that perhaps that is what was in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: And I did not know at that time that the house was going to be in session until November 20.

Mr. Drew: That is what I am pointing out. Assuming that such thought was in the mind of the hon. member—I suggest that that has something to do with the argument that is put forward that this is out of order—what in effect was sought by the motion made at that time was this: We do not think we will have time to deal with this act before we are through the present session, therefore I am suggesting an amendment to the British North America Act which would have effect in 1961.

First, we have the fact that an amendment was proposed to the British North America Act. That is not proposed in the motion I have presented. Second, we have the fact that it was something that would take place in 1961 and not at the present time, which makes it entirely different from the present motion.

To carry it to the point of absurdity, a motion could be made that something be done twenty-five years from now. If that were passed between now and twenty-five years from now we would be precluded from dealing with that subject simply because that resolution had been put forward.

Mr. Knowles: It sounds like the Liberal platform of 1919.

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to go that far afield or delve that far into the realms of imagination. I am simply dealing with the fact that this was a motion to do something in the future by an entirely different method than that now before us. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that acceptance of the proposal put forward by the hon. minister on this occasion would lead to a most extraordinary result because debate could be deliberately stifled through the delaying action of a motion to take place some time in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Fortunately it is one o'clock so I shall have an opportunity to consider this.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: When the house rose at one o'clock, we were considering whether or not the amendment which had been moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was in order. I may say frankly that when I first read the amendment I was under the impression that it was out of order, because it appeared to me to be substantially the same as another amendment upon which a vote had been taken in the present session. However, during the luncheon recess I have had an opportunity of reading the amendment which was moved on June 12, and comparing it with the amendment which has been moved today. I have also had the opportunity of considering what was said this morning, both against the regularity of the amendment and in support of it.

I have come to the conclusion that, although there is a similarity between the two amendments there is also a considerable difference. The amendment of June 12 was one to a bill which was moved in order to amend the British North America Act. That amendment proposed that the act should be amended by providing for the setting up of a commission to effect the redistribution of electoral ridings after the year 1961. The present amendment refers to another bill, namely the bill which is now before the house, and proposes that a commission should be set up now to consider the redistribution at the present time.

In my opinion, if the present amendment carried it would not be inconsistent with a decision which has been arrived at during this session. In view of that, and the fact that there is a difference between these two amendments, I have come to the conclusion that I should allow the amendment to stand.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We in this group, Mr. Speaker, are glad that the house will now have an opportunity to vote on the proposition set out in the amendment of the leader of the opposition. Naturally we most heartily approve of the decision that Your Honour has just given, and we hope that the house as a whole will really give serious consideration to the suggestion which is now being made. In your ruling a moment ago, Your Honour referred, as did some of us this morning, to the fact that there has already been one debate in this session as to whether we should decide now to have an independent commission do this job in the future. It is a matter of regret to me that the house rejected that idea. This is another question, and as the leader of the opposition pointed out this morning, the fact that this session is to be continued until November 20 does make it possible for consideration to be given to an alternative way of dealing with the present redistribution.

As I indicated this morning when we were on the point of order, had it not been for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, we in this group would have moved one in similar terms. Perhaps it might not be inappropriate for me to indicate to the house what the terms of that amendment would have been. It would have read as follows:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the referring of the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, required as a result of the decennial census of 1951, to an independent commission and that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the appointment of such a commission for that purpose.

As I have already said, had the way been clear by the time the debate reached our group, that amendment would have been moved, in line with a similar amendment which we moved in February, 1947, on the occasion of the last redistribution.

This morning the leader of the opposition gave a great deal of the history of this question so far as the Canadian parliament is concerned. I shall not repeat the quotations that he gave, particularly those from the late Mr. King and the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). Those references do indicate very clearly that there has been thinking in the direction of an independent commission by the Liberal party for a long time.

Now, there is one other bit of evidence pointing to the fact that Liberals have thought for a long time about this job being handled independently. I refer to a bill which was passed by the House of Commons in 1899. That was during the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as prime minister, and the bill in 1899 was designed to correct what the Liberals of that day felt to be some of the injustices of the redistributions following the censuses of 1881 and 1891. The bill was limited in its scope, so far as the idea of an independent commission was concerned, but at least it proposed that all those federal constituencies in the province of Ontario which crossed county lines should be reviewed by an independent commission of judges.

It so happens that the bill was opposed in the House of Commons by the Conservative party of that day. There was a recorded vote on second reading. Then, despite the fact it passed in the House of Commons, it was defeated in the Senate and thus never became law. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I have added that bit of evidence to that which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) gave this morning, in order to show that the idea of an independent commission is not something new. So far as the Liberals are concerned, they have been thinking about it and speaking about it for a long time. Perhaps I might mention again the words of Mr. King on February 3, 1947, when in reply to Mr. Bracken in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne of that year, he said:

> . . . I do not believe that the majority of hon. members take that view, and in that particular I am prepared to accept the will of the majority. I hope, however, the day will come when the House of Commons of Canada will see the wisdom of allowing its redistribution to be made by some impartial tribunal and not by the members of the house themselves dealing with the matter in committee as in former years it has been dealt with.

On that occasion Mr. King referred to the many times he had expressed that view. In other words, as far as Mr. King was concerned, it was Liberal doctrine across the years that redistribution should be effected by an independent commission, even though that doctrine was never implemented by Mr. King.

We of the C.C.F. have taken that view in this house during the time this party has been here. My leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), moved a resolution to that effect on a private members' day back in the thirties, in between the redistributions following the censuses of 1931 and 1941. Likewise in 1947, when the second reading of the redistribution bill of that year was before the house, it was my privilege, on behalf of this group, to move an amendment calling for that redistribution to be effected by an independent commission. Only a few days ago, on June 12, we of this group made that proposition again in the form of an amendment to the bill that amended the British North America Act.

Mr. Speaker, I have indicated the long-standing support—in words, at any rate—on the part of the Liberals for an independent commission. I have indicated that that is our view and, if I may say so with respect, without trying to pick a quarrel with anyone, we now welcome to our position the Progressive Conservative party which, I think it is fair to say, for the first time have officially asked for an independent commission to do this job.

In recent years there have been two recorded votes on the question. There was the one on June 12. I recognize the reason why—although I think it was splitting hairs—the Progressive Conservatives voted against my amendment on that occasion. But at any rate, on that occasion they voted solidly against the proposal that redistribution by an independent commission should be declared as a principle in the constitution of this country. Back in 1947, when this question was before the house in the form of our C.C.F. amendment, the Progressive Conservatives voted both ways. I have before me the Hansard of February 24, 1947, and I find that 19 of them were progressive and voted for our amendment and that the other 21 were conservative and voted against it. In that same session, although Mr. Bracken had asked Mr. King to state what his intention was with regard to the redistribution of that year, Mr. Bracken did not ask for an independent commission.

I cite that past history not in order to chide my friends to the right but rather to emphasize the fact that they have now joined with the rest of us in this house who, across the years, have been asking for an independent commission. I hope that the government will recognize the relative unanimity we have now attained on this point. I must not speak for the members of the Social Credit group. They have opposed our motions on this matter in the past. Their view today, which I should think would be different after the experience of the last few weeks, is one that they will have to express for themselves. But, Mr. Speaker, in view of what has happened now, in that the Progressive Conservatives through their leader have officially asked that this job be done by an independent commission, and in view of the fact that as long ago as 1899 the Liberals tried to get it done in that way through a bill, and have been suggesting it periodically every since then through the lips of Mr. King and through the utterances of the hon. member for Quebec South, I suggest that the time has come to adopt that method which is in effect—as the leader of the opposition has pointed out—in the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia and which we feel should be the method for effecting redistribution here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the reasons for the desirability of an independent commission are obvious. In the first place, it is desirable not only that there be fairness in the redistribution of the seats in the House of Commons but that there be satisfaction on the part of the country that there has been fairness. I know that members on the government side, whenever the matter of redistribution comes up for consideration, will argue that they have been fair. They have always done that, whether it was the Liberals or the Tories who were in power, except for the occasion when Sir. John A. Macdonald was so frank about hiving the Grits. But it is not a question of whether or not the Liberals or the Tories think the redistribution is fair or unfair. The question at stake is the impression created in the country. Certainly from a parliamentary redistribution the country always gets the impression that there has been a scramble on the part of all parties, and all members of the committee; and that the best that can be said for any map that is drawn is that it is a bundle of compromises.

This is a subject about which, as the leader of the opposition pointed out this morning, we all have to speak with some restraint. No one who has been a member of a redistribution committee can take any holier-than-thou attitude. It is inherent in the very set-up of this job being done by a parliamentary committee that there are compromises and discussions back and forth and that there are all sorts of interests—some of them that concern the people of Canada but some of them that concern personalities in the House of Commons—that come into the picture. We suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is wrong in principle that so priceless a part of our democratic heritage as the representation in the House of Commons should be determined by the members who are so closely affected, who cannot possibly take an objective view, and who certainly cannot take one that will be recognized by the country as a whole as being objective.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of fairness and for the sake of the appearance of fairness we suggest that the practice followed in the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Australia and other democratic countries should be followed in Canada. We suggest that it is high time that the start which the Liberals made in 1899 should be proceeded with, and that we should have an independent commission.

Not only is there the appearance of unfairness, Mr. Speaker, in the redistributions that have taken place in the past and in the one that may take place as a result of our passing this bill, as between individual constituencies, as between members and as between parties, but there is also the extremely difficult problem of apportioning the seats in any one province as amongst distinctly urban areas, mixed areas and distinctly rural areas. This is a problem that always enters into any attempt on the part of a committee to do the job of redistribution. No committee ever likes to upset more boundaries than it must. Thus it is that when you get a decade in which there may have been quite a shift in population within a province—as is happening in our time—from rural areas into urban areas, there is always reluctance on the part of the parliamentary committee to do an objective job and to give to the areas that have become congested representation in proportion to their population.

I accept the ruling that you gave this morning that it is not in order for us now to discuss what the committee has done, the report from which has not yet been laid on the table. But in principle, I suggest that past redistributions indicate to us that parliamentary committees do not deal fairly and objectively with the question of the proper disparity between distinctly urban seats on the one hand and distinctly rural seats on the other, let alone the problem that arises because of the fact that some seats are in between, are half one and half the other. When we come to the schedule I shall have something to say about that with respect to my own province in terms of actual percentages, in terms of the percentage that we were given last time and the percentage which we were given this time, which I think is quite unfair to my city of Winnipeg. But the submission I am making now on principle is that a parliamentary committee has not the objectivity, has not the freedom from the interests of the members who are here, to deal with that problem in the way that it ought to be handled.

The hon. member for Quebec South in the bill which he has on the order paper, the second reading of which has not yet been reached, deals with this problem. He proposes a formula, namely, that an urban seat should have approximately one-quarter greater population than the average rural seat. Some hon. members may agree with that percentage; some may disagree with it; but at least all hon. members will agree that it is a mighty good idea to have a rule. We do not have any; we just redistribute according to the whims and the compromises that go on in a committee of members, all of whom are personally interested either on their own behalf or on behalf of their friends here in parliament in the outcome of that redistribution.

Now, as Professor Norman Ward said in one of his articles on this question, it is impossible for any group of men with the best will in the world to deal with that problem in an objective manner. Perhaps I should place on the record once again these words of Professor Norman Ward, because it seems to me they do deal with the problem very aptly. This is what he said:

> The problem of redistribution has become too vast and complicated to be handled satisfactorily by a committee of the House of Commons, which like all house committees, has no staff trained in research techniques or anything else. With the best will in the world, a group of M.P.'s drawn from many occupations, provinces and political parties would find it extremely difficult to face objectively the problems connected with sharing seats fairly among the people within each province. Population density, homogeneity and topographical features and area, are all factors which ought to be considered seriously. But under the normal circumstances in which redistribution takes place in the House of Commons, with all parties jockeying for position, all factors become entangled in what Hon. C. G. (Chubby) Power, M.P., who ought to know, has called an "unseemly, undignified, and utterly confusing scramble for personal and political advantage."

That quotation from Professor Norman Ward includes a quotation from the hon. member for Quebec South, which the leader of the opposition placed on record two or three times this morning. I think that all of us, from whatever party we may come, who have participated in the present redistribution, or the one in 1947, or any who were here longer and were on any previous committees, will have to admit that that is an apt description of how things are done.

A case could be made against the changes that are harmful to opposition parties; a case could be made by government members, justifying the changes that have been made; but in any one of these efforts are we not simply demonstrating to the country that they are right in feeling that this job is not being done objectively when it is done by a committee of the House of Commons? Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because of that position which we have taken across the years, because it is the position that the Liberals have taken at least since 1899, because it is the position the Tories are now taking officially as from today, because of the request made by their leader today and his amendment, which I presume all his members will vote for, it seems to me that the house as a whole should give more serious consideration to this question than it has up to the present time.

This session is shortly to be adjourned, and we shall be back on November 20. I recognize that that is not long enough for a commission to do the thorough job that it could do in a few years if it had the time; but I suggest it is long enough for it to do something of a job that would at least appeal to the country as being an objective proposition rather than one worked out by people with too much personal interest in the whole question. That is a longer period than the committee has had to work on the matter. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we shall support the amendment that is now before us, it being in terms similar to the one that we moved in 1947, and similar to one that we would have moved today, and we hope that it will have the support of the house, and that this time we will decide that we have had enough of this kind of redistribution, and that we are going to have it done by an objective group of people made up of judges, perhaps geographers, statisticians, surveyors, professors of political science—

An hon. Member: Of the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: —people who have knowledge of these matters and have the respect of the community as being fair-minded, and objective. We strongly support this motion and hope it will have the endorsation of the entire house.

Mr. Larson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Larson: If that is the official view of the C.C.F. party, why did they not have an independent commission in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Knowles: I hope that when this house has decided on an independent commission all of the provinces of Canada will follow suit.

Mr. Bradette: Your party has not followed it in Saskatchewan. That shows what sincerity there is in that kind of argument.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): There is so much argument going on between different members that I doubt whether I will be able to be heard in the few words that I have to say at this time. However, I might say that I am now sitting on the redistribution committee for the third time since I came to the house back in 1935. I believe that if we can make use of the honesty, sincerity and good sense of each individual we can still do a good job under our present system. This is one instance in which politics should be left out, and I am sorry to say that it is not left out altogether, but that is the case with respect to the motion that is moved at the present time. We did have two or three small differences in Alberta, but we have done a fairly good job, and I am only sorry that all the other provinces have not been able to do the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should discuss the details of the bill and the schedules at this time.

Mr. Fair: I was speaking of the principle of the motion on the commission and the principle of the bill also. If we were to adhere to these things all around in the subcommittees as well as in the main committee on redistribution I do not think we would have any trouble whatever.

Under the commission plan, as I understand it, there will be no opportunity, when people are dissatisfied, to pick out any particular constituency and deal with it. The whole thing would have to be returned to the commission. Then again the terms of reference of the commission might be so loaded that many on the opposition side at that time might have difficulties, the same as they are having at the present time. I am satisfied, as I said before, that under our present system if our representatives in each province are allowed to exercise the good intentions they have when they go in there, in most cases—I do not say in all cases, because there are some intentions that are not so good—it will work out all right when they go into those committees. But I think if they act honestly, as they do in their everyday lives, in these committees there will be no difficulty at all with the system that is being used at the present time.

When troubles come up in the subcommittees and they are brought to the main committee, of course we know what the result is, and what it has been in the past. Again, if the results are carried in the committees, I know they will be carried here, also; because it would not do at all to change decisions that have been made in committee.

But, so far as I am concerned, and so far as the Social Credit group is concerned, we are quite satisfied to continue under our present set-up. At the same time we would express our regret that politics have been brought into the subcommittees in dealing with the boundaries of the several constituencies, and we would hope that in the future that would be eliminated.

Mr. A. E. Dewar (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak in this debate at all, but what I would like to say will be brief and to the point. What I intend to say I shall say when the schedules are brought back to the house.

This morning I listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) praise the many excellent speeches of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in support of the proposition to take redistribution away from parliament and to entrust it to an independent commission. I was surprised to hear this, because I had gone back to Hansard and had listened to the numerous speeches of the hon. member since I have come to the house, and I have never heard him speak on this issue at all. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Lake Centre always champions the supremacy of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This indicates that my hon. friend has not read very carefully, and that he did not receive proper instructions from those who are his mentors; for I dealt with this matter.

Mr. Dewar: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member has imputed to me that someone has instructed me to speak. No one instructed me to speak. I ask him to make a withdrawal of that imputation, that I have been instructed to speak.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Dewar: On a question of privilege; the hon. member stated I had been instructed.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle says that he was not instructed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is that?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle says that he was not instructed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, if he was not instructed, I just noticed the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) talking to him.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Brooks: Here we go!

Mr. Gardiner: It is quite correct that I went over and made a remark to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, but I had nothing to do with his speech. I did not know he was going to make a speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not tell him to make a speech, either. Of course this party may be a little different from the Conservative party. I would like to know who instructed my hon. friend to get up and make a speech now. I certainly did not ask him. I would advise him that he ought to be careful about what he says when he is speaking.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, I rise on a question of privilege, and say—

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will withdraw nothing; I will withdraw nothing!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre stated—at least I understood him to say—that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was instructed to make a speech.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

An hon. Member: Yes he did.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He said that.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member did not say that, probably he would repeat what he did say. But my suggestion is that—

Mr. McCusker: Who is instructing him now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ross (Souris): McCusker's last stand!

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member for Lake Centre should accept the statement of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that he was not instructed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I accept that, because it is obvious he was not instructed. I had dealt with that matter, and dealt with it in the house, and in 1947 referred to the need for a commission.

Mr. Dewar: I accept that, too. It has been my experience that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. We will go back and see what happened in 1947.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dewar: I do not see the hon. member's name reported in the vote taken, supporting the amendment of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Sinnott: He was not there yesterday, either.

An hon. Member: He ran away yesterday.

Mr. Dewar: As recently as June 12, when this subject was previously discussed, the hon. member for Lake Centre spoke about three minutes prior to the taking of the vote, and yet I notice his name is not recorded in the vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, again I rise on a question of privilege. Again what the hon. member says indicates that he was not instructed, because I was not here on that debate.

Mr. Sinnott: You were here yesterday.

Mr. Dewar: He said that I was instructed. I have here Hansard for June 12, and I notice that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: When we voted I was not here on that date.

Mr. Dewar: You were in the house; three pages previously you were in the house, asking a question. You are playing the same game this week. You were here about five minutes before the vote was taken—three minutes before the vote was taken.

In fairness to the hon. member for Lake Centre, however, I would like to ask the leader of the opposition to indicate where we can find some of these excellent speeches of the hon. member for Lake Centre, so I can read them.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the heat engendered on the part of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Dewar) with respect to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is just a repercussion of the gerrymandering that has been proceeding involving Qu'Appelle at the expense of Lake Centre.

Mr. Dewar: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Dewar: On a question of privilege; the only heat that has been generated by me, and will ever be generated, is that I shall speak my mind. Every time the hon. member for Lake Centre gets after me, I will go right after him.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend is going to be "going after" for a long time.

Mr. Ferrie: On a question of privilege; the charge that there has been gerrymandering is unparliamentary.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Ferrie: Let me make the statement that there has been gerrymandering of no constituency in Saskatchewan. I wish to say that there is no such thing as gerrymandering.

Mr. Fleming: The last remark of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) makes me think of the remark of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) who said there was nothing wrong with the present system, if only the members going into the committee on redistribution and into the subcommittees would forget their interests in politics. Now, if anybody can find a way to make the leopard change his spots, then there is some hope for the present system—but only if you can make the leopard change his spots. Anyone who has had the unhappy—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend knows all about spots; he can see them.

Anyone who has been through the unhappy experience of sitting through the meetings of the redistribution committee over the past couple of months will have remained unimpressed by any suggestion that the members should forget that they are members of political parties. Although I was in the house when the last redistribution was carried out in 1947 I was not a member of the committee at the time. I know from my more recent experience just what I missed then. So far as I am concerned, this experience of sitting on the redistribution committee has been an eye-opener. I hope I am not completely naïve in political matters; certainly I am not so naïve as to believe in the statement recently made by the hon. member for Battle River. I may say to him that if anyone goes into that committee hoping to see that important task carried out with some regard for principles he is in for a very shattering disappointment.

It has been a wearying and a very disappointing experience. In the light of this I can state at once that I am convinced that some better method of effecting redistribution must be found. I say that notwithstanding the fact that the present method has been in effect for a considerable time. While in times past I have personally entertained some serious doubts about the method of achieving redistribution by means of a commission, in the light of my recent experience I have come to the view that that method must be tried. The present method has exposed its own shortcomings so completely in recent weeks that in my view the time has come when we must apply our intelligence to finding a better method. Here is a method at hand, the use of a commission, which I for one not only will be prepared to see tried but will welcome the opportunity of giving it a fair trial to see if it cannot be applied to better advantage than the method now being followed.

At the moment there are only two alternative methods open to us. One is the method that has been followed at this present session; the other is the commission method. I wish to make some observations concerning the present method and I do so with my recent experience directly in mind.

In the first place, the present method necessarily implies that the government possessing a majority in the house will possess a majority in the committee. If they wish to make ruthless use of that majority, in the last analysis there is nothing that can stop them immediately, though public opinion will catch up with them eventually. The greater the government majority, the less its sense of responsibility, the greater the extent to which totalitarian ideas have seized the minds of the government and its following, then the greater the risk that abuses will result from the use by the majority of its powers in the committee. That is the point. I am not speaking of something theoretical, I am speaking of what has happened before our eyes.

The second point is that principles which receive lip service in all parts of the house from time to time fail to receive any measure of consistent support in the committee. We see one principle invoked to justify what is done in connection with one riding, but when we move to another riding where the political situation happens to be a little different, that particular principle seems to be completely forgotten; it is abandoned and something else arises to dictate the decision in that particular case.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: I think the minister can well applaud. He and I have been through this experience. We have attended a good many meetings together sitting across the table in room No. 430 during recent days and weeks. What is required is some consistent application of principle. Gross inequality of treatment of different constituencies is bound to result unless there is some means of guaranteeing a consistent application of principles. In the many and strange abortions in size and shape of ridings which we shall be seeing shortly will be found the truth of what I am saying, that there has been no adherence to principle.

In the third place, and this is a serious criticism which flows from the two factors I have just referred to, glaring inequalities do result within the same province. I am not comparing a riding in the territories with a populous metropolitan riding; I am referring to the situation within a single province. Take my own province of Ontario as an example. Can any member say that principle has been honoured consistently when you have a situation where the riding with the lowest population will be around the 30,000 mark and then there will be ridings with populations of over 90,000? Can that be defended in principle? In my submission, when you have results like that, when you have such glaring inequalities you see exposed the weaknesses of the present system.

Then in the fourth place there is in such a committee a great deal of pulling and hauling at all times, and gerrymandering. Ever there is the problem—I think this indicates one of the inherent weaknesses of the present system—created by the fact that government representatives on such a committee are the objects of a great deal of pressure from within the ranks of their own party. That will always be so as long as the present method is followed. There will be accusations within the same party of playing favourites, of favouring one member at the expense of another, of putting up a hard fight for one member and not putting up a hard enough fight to protect the rights of another member. So you have a situation where there is pulling and hauling, where there is accusation of internal favouritism. Hard feelings can be engendered whether such accusations are fair or unfair and there is always the temptation faced by government majorities to liquidate political opponents.

In the fifth place, there is the situation that is created in the main committee. I think in some of the provincial subcommittees the discussion has been quite brief, but in other subcommittees there has been extended consideration. I think at once of the Ontario subcommittee whose meetings were quite extended and numerous. What is the situation when the subcommittees report to the main committee? I do not think it is unfair to say that when decisions are taken in the main committee by those who do not reside in the province particularly concerned, government members are content with very little knowledge of the issues really involved. In the Ontario subcommittee when I said I wished to explain a particular situation fully to the members of the main committee I was told: "You are not going to change anything in the main committee".

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I can permit the hon. member to discuss at this time what took place in the committee.

Mr. Fleming: I was using it by way of illustration of the sort of thing that does happen, but I will not pursue the point. I will just say that I think under the present system, without making detailed comment on the present committee of the house or of its subcommittees, you are going to find that members of the main committee who reside in provinces other than the one particularly concerned have very little direct knowledge of the issues involved in the decisions affecting riding boundaries in that particular province. When we talk about using the wisdom and experience of parliament to apply to a particular situation I think in fairness, sir, and in the interests of accuracy it should be said that that type of knowledge goes very little beyond the borders of the particular province involved. At any rate that has been my observation.

Now, sir, you have indicated by your ruling this morning that you do not intend to permit discussion of the boundaries of particular ridings and I shall certainly respect your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but I ask whether a system can be defended in principle which results in glaring inequalities, inequalities of population as between constituencies in the same province, in the same part of the same province—for instance a low of 30,000 compared to 90,000 on the other hand. That cannot be justified in principle, Mr. Speaker, and it is principle that, as I understand it, we are discussing in this particular debate. When we see cabinet ministers enjoying benefits of ridings with low populations, pocket boroughs of which the sitting members are cabinet ministers, then again, sir, I think that is a situation that cannot stand up to honest and fair criticism.

So much, sir, for the system currently in vogue. I have had to speak critically of it because I speak of it as I have found it and as I have seen it, but I would like to speak briefly now of the other alternative, the proposal for dealing with this matter by a commission.

As I indicated earlier, I came to the view I now hold after having entertained originally —and when I say "originally" I mean in previous years—some serious doubts on the subject. I was impressed by arguments to the effect that this was a matter in which parliament itself should retain complete responsibility. However, Mr. Speaker, in the light of what I have now seen I am satisfied that another and better method must be found. The method by commission in the light of experience with such a method in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa has so much to commend it that I think in all earnestness it ought to receive a fair and complete trial here in Ottawa. It is true, sir, that in the United Kingdom this method has worked with eminent satisfaction. There is no responsible quarter in the United Kingdom today, as I am informed, from which criticism is directed at the commission method of achieving redistribution. If it can be made to work with such general satisfaction in the United Kingdom I do not see why, Mr. Speaker, this parliament cannot put it to work with equal satisfaction.

Now, sir, I wish to deal frankly with this question of whether the commission method does subtract something from parliament's control. In the United Kingdom there is a good deal of vigilance on the subject of retention of parliamentary control. That experience gives me reason to think that there is no basic discrepancy between the application of this method and the maintenance of parliamentary control, which is a very important factor for those of us who sit in the official opposition. But does it mean that there is a contradiction, Mr. Speaker? I think not. When the report of the commission is completed it still requires a statute of parliament to give the formal effect of law to that report, and there will then be in parliament the fullest opportunity for discussion of the report of the commission. The experience and knowledge of members of parliament will be available to be brought to bear on such report. There is no reason to think there will not be the fullest opportunity to discuss such report and when the report comes before this house, as a report is going to come before this house from its committee on redistribution either tonight or Monday, Mr. Speaker, the result will depend in large measure upon the weight behind the report. When the house receives the report of the commission it knows at any rate that the commission, if it is an adequate commission, has carried out its task and made its report without any desire to sharpen political axes, to liquidate political opponents or to perpetrate hardships and injustices upon individual members of this house or members of the party that happens to be in a minority.

The report of a commission if it came to parliament would I think receive the respect that would be due to the commission having regard to the personnel of the commission, the thoroughness of its labours and the intrinsic merits of its report. Parliament then will have full opportunity of weighing that report and taking its responsibility for either enacting that report and its recommendations into law or on the other hand for differing or departing from the recommendations made by a commission appointed with the consent of parliament.

Now, sir, there is another feature to this method of appointing a commission which must be faced. If there is to be a commission that body will require guidance from parliament as to the principles which it should follow in proceeding with its task. Now, there are some principles that are discussed from time to time; there are principles to which lip service is given here and elsewhere from time to time. But so far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, there has been no attempt by this house to write principles in the form of law or in any form that would even be binding upon a committee of this house, with the inevitable result that when a committee is appointed it has virtually a free hand to apply a principle, disregard a principle, or to apply a principle in one case and to ignore it in another case.

Mr. Speaker, with a commission appointed under parliamentary authority I think parliament will be obliged to take responsibility for directing that commission as to the principles which it ought to follow. In this house there have been proposals by one or two members indicating principles. There would have to be a body of principles. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has made a useful contribution with the suggestion on his part that the following would be principles worthy of parliamentary adoption for the guidance of any commission appointed to carry out redistribution:

(a) permanence in the definition of the boundaries of electoral districts is desirable;

(b) the development of a sense of community of interest among the electors in each electoral district is to be encouraged;

(c) the territorial area included in each electoral district should be continuous;

(d) electoral district boundaries should follow the lines of division between recognized municipal, administrative or other areas by reference to which the census figures have been compiled;

(e) the population included in each urban electoral district should be greater than in each rural electoral district;

(f) the population of each urban electoral district in any province should be equal, and that of each rural electoral district in each province should likewise be so.

It may not be, in every case, simple and easy to apply all such principles, but at any rate they would be a useful guide. There are others that could be added to them. I do not suggest that such a list is necessarily exhaustive, and I do not suggest that it is complete. But at any rate, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to have a fair and comprehensive discharge of the duty of redistribution unless there is some attempt to lay down principles in a way that will be binding upon those who are charged with carrying out the task of redistribution. As long as we follow the method of a parliamentary committee, I cannot see that we are going to have anything but the kind of situation we have now, where the principle is applied where it happens to suit the majority and disregarded where it happens not to suit their purpose.

Then there is a third aspect of this matter of the commission method, and in my view it is vital. The success of the commission method depends upon the quality of the personnel of the commission. We would not be very much further ahead if the government simply exercised the power it enjoys at the hands of the majority of this house and appointed a commission of partisans of its own choosing; that is not the kind of commission for which the leader of the opposition is contending. It will have to be a commission composed of men whose objectivity in these matters is above suspicion. Remove the political motives that necessarily enter into the calculations of members of a parliamentary committee, and I think you will have gone a long way toward eliminating the injustices, the political liquidations that necessarily result under the present method.

The suggestion has been made by one or two members that the commission should be composed of judges. I do not wish to be taken as subscribing to that view, because I am not at all sure it is a proper position in which to put a judge. But I am satisfied, sir, that there are men in this country whose objectivity or sense of justice and fair dealing are beyond reproach, and who would be available to render what would be a very outstanding public service in such a capacity. They will have to be men with knowledge, and they will have to have assistance. I do not suppose there is anybody in this house, regardless of the length of time he has been in the house or the extent of his travels across this country, with all the knowledge the members of such a commission would require. The plan put forward by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) has taken account of that fact, and proposed that assistance be provided by way of advisers or what he calls assessors in the various provinces, to assist those who are members of the commission appointed for this purpose.

Therefore I say that whatever objections have been raised to the commission method are capable of being fully met. There is no reason whatever why this method should subtract anything from the responsibility or the control of parliament over redistribution, or its duty in that regard. If the government of the day will apply its considerable ingenuity to the selection of men, and do it in consultation with the other parties in the house, there is no reason why competent men could not be appointed. The hon. member for Quebec South proposed that the political bias which would tempt the government in the naming of the personnel of such a committee be eliminated by having the appointments made in consultation with the leader of the opposition, who it was proposed would also consult others in the opposition as well. I am satisfied, sir, that if there is a will on the part of the government to see redistribution carried out in such a way that it will accomplish and not defeat justice, that will really be a fair, comprehensive and principled redistribution, it can be done by this commission method. It is not being done, and I am convinced it cannot be done under the method currently in vogue.

There is a question of the time element as applied to the present situation. As the leader of the opposition pointed out this morning, if we were about to prorogue in a day or two it might be said that by advocating the reference of this matter at this stage to a competent commission it would inevitably result in delay. Even if it did result in delay, Mr. Speaker, until the next session, that would be a very small price indeed to pay for so desirable a purpose. I do not think we are likely to need the redistribution act before the next session of parliament. I do not think the government will be in great haste to call a general election before parliament meets again. I believe they have had their fingers sufficiently burned recently in a series of by-elections so that any fears or expectations that there will be a general election before another session of parliament can be eliminated. I believe the feeling that the redistribution bill will need to be carried into legislative effect before another session of parliament has been allayed.

If there are those who are in great haste to see this redistribution put into effect before the next regular session of parliament, then, as the leader of the opposition pointed out today, the method is ready. Let us provide now for the appointment of the commission to take this task in hand, and they can derive whatever value—and very doubtful it will be indeed—there may be from the report of the committee of this house on redistribution. Then when this parliament meets in the fall, still in the present session, the commission's report could be laid before the house. The house could deal with it before the prorogation of the present session.

My final word, sir, is this. What my leader had to say this morning about preserving public respect for parliament as an institution is entitled, it seems to me, to very weighty consideration by members in all parts of this house. The strength of our parliamentary institutions in this country is no greater than the respect people have for those who serve them in this place. If the impression continues to be borne in upon the minds of the public that parliament goes about the task of redistribution simply by sharpening political axes and practising not the rules of fair play but the law of the jungle, then, Mr. Speaker, we are going to witness a continued decline in the respect of the public for their parliament. In days like these, when the battle for men's minds is a sharp battle being fought on a long front, let no one of us dare to turn his back upon his responsibility for seeing that the rules which govern the distribution of seats and which, in turn, determine in a large measure the representation of the people within this sovereign House of Commons, are governed by fair play. We should see that the procedure is carried out with justice, and is not calculated simply to pay off political debts or guided by political expediency at the expense of principles.

There are many imperfections, sir, in the way our parliamentary institutions function. We are all conscious of them, I think. Perhaps we in the opposition are more conscious of them than are those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, because we see more of the imperfections. But this is a human institution. Can hon. members leave the public any longer with the impression that the redistribution of seats in this house is determined simply by political expediency and the arbitrary exercise by the majority in these committees of the rights which they happen for the time being to possess as majorities? Times like these, Mr. Speaker, are much too serious for us to be any longer parties to the creation of an impression like that in the minds of the public.

In what I have had to say, sir, I hope I have been not unfair to people in different political parties. There is no member of any party who can go into that committee on redistribution and completely put aside party considerations or assume the role of objectivity which is rarely evidenced in this house or in our own political courses. We are here representing the people. We are here also as persons who subscribe to a particular party. What I have had to say, Mr. Speaker, by way of criticism of the way in which things are being done is not only criticism of the way in which the present majority in this house exercises its rights as a majority in the committee and the subcommittees, but is directed at a system where majorities, if the system continues, are always going to attempt to exercise their powers for the political benefit of the party to which they happen to be attached.

In times like these, Mr. Speaker, that kind of course is not good enough. Therefore I say that while I did not come to this decision quickly or lightly I am satisfied, on the strength of an extremely unhappy and disappointing experience as a member of the committee on redistribution appointed by this house, that the present method can no longer be retained. It is no longer entitled to any respect on the part of the public or of this house. It is at best a piecemeal method. It is not a method that is based upon principle. It is a method that is based largely upon political expediency. I say the time has come to discard this method and at least give a fair trial to another method such as the alternative that has been found to work in an eminently satisfactory way in the United Kingdom and in our sister nations of the commonwealth.

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak this afternoon on this subject, but in view of what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who has just spoken, I think it is quite fitting for me to say a few words concerning the province of Ontario. As I listened to the hon. member, it sounded to me as though he wanted the committee to be named by himself.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Gour (Russell): He began to talk about the committee following what his leader, the hon. member for Carleton, had said. He said that it should be a committee composed of some group of people, but that if the government named it, they would not be good people. They must be named by the hon. member. He is to be the judge of who are to be the people on that committee. He said the government have to be careful in naming it. He seems to say that if the government name them, they will be not be good people on that committee because they have been named by the Liberal party or by the government. It sounded to me as though the hon. member were saying that the committee should be named by him, that he was the only one who was capable of doing anything right.

To my hon. friends who are from Ontario may I say this. I know that we are not supposed to discuss the proceedings which took place during meetings of the committee, but I sat with my hon. friends on other committees. I did not belong to the committee on redistribution. I think hon. members will admit that the hon. member for Eglinton takes quite a bit of time in the committee and you are not sure that 100 per cent of what he says is supposed to be said there or has any value. Now he is complaining because we are a majority in all committees. That is not the fault of the members who are the majority in the committees. It is because the public of Canada want Liberal members; they want to elect us.

Mr. Fleming: That is the way you have gone about the redistribution.

Mr. Gour (Russell): I will come to the redistribution. You will get that, don't worry. The hon. member said that because they are the majority in the committee, the Liberals are taking advantage of the fact and are doing the thing that will best ensure that they will be elected. It is not the redistribution which elected the members, Mr. Speaker; it is the people who elected the members. There is no question about this fact. Canadian people are all intelligent people and they are all independent people. When the time for an election comes they vote for what they believe to be best for themselves and for their country. It is not a question of boundaries, of whether the eighth concession or seventh concession is going to belong to me tomorrow. The people on the seventh concession or on the eighth concession are Canadian people who are just as independent as any others.

I come now to the part where the hon. member said the Liberals were taking advantage of their majority. I think I can prove to him in one second that he is not exactly right. I do not want to say he does not speak the truth, but I will say that his judgment causes him to say that. In my own riding and my neighbouring riding, which began at confederation, are the nicest people that could be found anywhere in Canada; there are none better. There are Scotch, French-speaking, Irish and English; there is a mixture. Those two ridings, in federal elections, 99 per cent of the time elect a Liberal. Now they are represented by two good members; they are French-speaking and good Liberals. Those two ridings are to be lined up; they will be together. If we were to take advantage of the majority, then we would keep those two ridings as they used to be, and as they have been since confederation.

Those two ridings have sent some fine men here who gave of their best to the country. Now, in this redistribution, because of their small population they have been put together. If the Liberals wanted to use their power they would keep those two ridings as they were before. We have not a large number of French-speaking members from Ontario. We have not had enough up to the present time for our population. We will now have one seat less for the Liberals and for French-speaking members. The Liberal majority are so straight that they are trying to give fair play all over this country on every occasion. That is why they decided to combine those two ridings. I sincerely regret that they have combined them, but in order to be straight they have done so. That goes to prove that the Liberals are straight even with their big majority in the committee. They decided it was only straight to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gour (Russell): I have just finished, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member is discussing the various ridings in detail, I have ruled that it should not be done.

Mr. Gour (Russell): I will not do it any more; I have finished. I am of the belief that there is no one better able to do this job than a committee of the members of the House of Commons who have been elected by the people. I do not believe anyone is better able to represent the public than the members who are elected to this house. That is what we call democracy. The party that has the largest group in the house is entitled to the largest group on the committee. I believe the right way to do this job is to have it handled by a committee composed of the members of this house, and I support the bill.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I agree a hundred per cent with my leader in what he said this morning about the desirability of having redistribution carried out by an independent commission. The idea, as he pointed out, was brought forward a long time ago by the late Mr. King. It was brought up again later by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). To my mind it is fairness itself, when you consider that the individual judges may have had political experience; they may have been members of this House of Commons. They would bring in a redistribution bill which I believe would be much fairer than the redistribution bill which is to be presented to this house for our consideration.

In advocating this method of doing things I am looking to the future as well as the present, because I know that when the next redistribution comes up the Conservative party will have been in power for nearly ten years. I would hate to see us faced with the same temptations the Liberal party have succumbed to at the present time. To my mind the setting up of an independent commission would remove any possibility of or opportunity for political vindictiveness or reprisal by the party in power. It is very regrettable that there are a number of instances of what I think must be called political vindictiveness in the present bill.

During the past winter the gross negligence which the government displayed in mishandling the foot-and-mouth disease, the negligence which has already cost this country many millions of dollars, was brought to light largely by three very prominent members of parliament, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton). By the gerrymandering which is being done in their ridings at the present time it is very obvious to every casual bystander that the government has simply decided that they must be taught a lesson for what they have done, and to show other hon. members what will befall if at any time in the future they have the audacity to speak up against the large government majority.

I should like very much to deal with what has happened in those ridings, but unfortunately the ruling of Mr. Speaker makes it impossible to do so. Therefore I shall just have to leave the details. I think the riding of the hon. member for Lake Centre has been simply mutilated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. That is exactly the point on which the Speaker previously ruled.

Mr. Ward: The riding is still there.

Mr. Fleming: The name is there, that is all.

Mr. Hees: And the treatment received by the other two members, the hon. member for Souris and the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, is of a similar nature. I shall take great pleasure in dealing with it when this bill comes up for further study on Monday.

An hon. Member: What about Swift Current?

Mr. Hees: It seems a shame that at this time we cannot deal with the details of the gerrymandering which has been going on in so many instances in this redistribution bill. I think the public will be very interested to see the depths to which the party in power has gone in order to eliminate, or try to eliminate, those who have caused them embarrassment in the past. I believe this kind of political vindictiveness is just the kind of thing that must be stamped out, and I believe it can be stamped out by the appointment of an independent commission. I believe that kind of thing must be stamped out if our democratic political system is to continue successfully.

I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker—and I shall have a lot more to say on this when we reach the point where we can do justice to the subject—I do hope the government will see fit to follow the advice of the very able and experienced member from Quebec South, of their late revered leader, the late Mr. King, and of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) who so ably expressed his views this morning. I hope those views will be accepted and that very soon we shall see a commission of this kind in operation.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): It has been my privilege, if one can count it such, to serve on the redistribution committee on two different occasions, in 1947 and on the present committee. With respect to the present committee, I am very sorry the report has not been tabled so we could have had a more thorough discussion on the practical workings of the committee. I am sure it would be very enlightening to the country as a whole. The public in general have very little knowledge as to how the redistribution committee actually does function and do its work.

I want to support wholeheartedly the proposition made by my leader this morning. I will admit that at one time I myself, when I was rather green in this house, thought members of parliament should do this sort of job; but as I have studied history and have had experience on these committees I have become quite convinced that a commission of judges as suggested would do a much better job than any members of parliament can do on a political basis, no matter what party may be in power.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) to the fact that he had been a member of this committee on several occasions, and that he thought it was on a non-political basis. Well, people being what they are, they do not operate on a non-political basis; and of all committees, a committee on redistribution does not operate on a non-political basis. At least that has been my experience.

Mr. Wylie: Where does the hon. member get that idea?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Your colleague suggested it, and I say it does not happen.

Mr. Sinnott: They operate on a fair basis.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I have also seen some of the operations carried on by the hon. member for Springfield behind the curtains. He was not a member of the committee. If the public would just realize how these things operate, the present committee, the second to last one—

Mr. Sinnott: You are out of order in what you are saying now.

Mr. Ross (Souris): No, I am not.

Mr. Sinnott: It is out of order.

Mr. Hees: You are fair game at any time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): The general committee is divided into subcommittees for different provinces, and they have their subcommittee meetings. Some have very few; others have a great number. They have their differences in those subcommittees. Generally they are controlled by the majority of members supporting the government. They report back to their respective caucuses which, in the two experiences I have had, have been Liberal caucuses of those provinces. I have gathered from one source that they have their difficulties in the Liberal caucuses. A lot of jockeying goes on there, too.

Mr. Sinnott: The public send us here.

Mr. Ross (Souris): We are sent here to legislate for our people. That is the point I am trying to make. From my experience as a member of this house, I have somewhat changed my mind on how we should legislate in the matter of redistribution and the allocation of seats. When one thinks that in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and other places they have commissions, he must realize that it speaks well for their progressive thought and attitude.

We do not have any guiding principle that operates through all provinces in this dominion, as applied to our committee on redistribution. I know the government and those who support it maintain that there should be no reference to provinces in connection with this matter of handling redistribution; yet we see that the committee is divided into provincial subcommittees. My experience has been that scarcely any of the provincial subcommittees operate on the same basis or the same principle. Each committee has its own ideas. I could refer to a province in the maritimes where I believe changes should be made. Yet I am satisfied that when we receive their schedules we will see that that province will report on exactly the same basis that existed before the committee was set up.

One could find some glaring examples of disparity which should not exist. They should be rectified. Then, on the other hand, other provinces have tried to strike some sort of average. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be arguing, I have no doubt, about what he thinks is the great disparity between urban and rural ridings—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ross (Souris): —in a certain province. I believe the same principle does not operate in any two of the provinces. The hon. member will find the same thing in many provinces of this country with small rural ridings, with probably no more than 30,000 people. That will be seen in the schedule when the report is made. Yet it will be seen that there are other ridings with 90,000.

That is far from what it should be. We have heard a supporter of the government talking about what gerrymandering is, and he contended that there could not be gerrymandering unless there was a combination of the constituencies of two members in the same party. His statement was that when that condition existed there would be genuine gerrymandering. Well, again without referring to what happened in the committee, my guess is you will see exactly that sort of thing in respect of certain provinces when the schedules are brought in. But that is not brought about as the result of any general principle, either, because in the same province where this has happened you may see a riding with a small population, and then in contrast you will see another riding—likely an opposition riding—wiped out entirely.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I said you may. I am not saying what has happened in committee. I am guessing at what is going to be proposed, and giving an example of what has been proposed in the past.

Mr. Harkness: An educated estimate.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Alongside a smaller riding you will see another riding in a certain province, with a large rural population—again, in opposition—wiped out entirely. In other words, there are the two opposite extremes; no principle is being supported at all. I suppose it would be the same with any party in power; there would be a lot of political jockeying taking place. I think when the schedules are presented for a certain province, with respect to which instructions were issued from a certain party convention about the date of the opening of this session of parliament as to what must take place following the decennial census of that province, when redistribution would be brought about—

Mr. Fleming: Was that Manitoba?

Mr. Ross (Souris): It will be queer indeed if, when the schedules come in, they do not follow the instructions given by the brass hats or the brass tops of that party in that certain province.

That is the sort of thing we have to contend with under this system. I presume it has been carried on in the same way in some past redistributions. Because of those things, surely we should learn from experience and not continue to carry on in this way. Therefore I certainly am wholeheartedly in support of the proposition put forward by my leader today. It has been suggested before, and I hope the house will take this matter into serious consideration before hon. members are called upon to cast their votes in respect of this very important matter, which is of the most importance to the people of this country. For those reasons I shall support the amendment.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I think the necessity for a better means of redistribution than has existed in the past was amply shown by the proceedings of the past two or three months in the main committee on redistribution and in the subcommittees which have been working on this subject. I must say I speak from unfortunate personal experience when I say that.

I was a member of the committee this year for the first time, and I now realize how fortunate I was in not having been a member of the committee when the last redistribution took place. I think the present system can only be described as a mess. There was one remark by a Liberal member of the redistribution committee with which I think all members of the committee would heartily agree. He said, "Thank God this will not have to take place again for another ten years." I believe all hon. members who served on the committee were sick of the way the proceedings were carried out, and of the unsatisfactory results of trying to carry out a redistribution in this way.

On the other hand, the manner in which a commission such as has been suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) could operate was well illustrated by the work of the subcommittee which dealt with the Yukon-Mackenzie district. In other words that was an independent inquiry in which political considerations as well as personal desires, and a consideration of what might be to the advantage of an individual member, were absent. That procedure is bound to be more satisfactory than the present system of attempting to carry out a redistribution in which everyone is jockeying for position. Those factors—the absence of political considerations and personal desires—were absent so far as the subcommittee which dealt with the Yukon-Mackenzie district was concerned. No one on the subcommittee either represented or expected to represent either the Yukon or the Mackenzie area. There was no particular advantage to any party, no matter what was done. We realize that only one or two seats were involved, in any event. Circumstances were not such that anything in the nature of gerrymandering could be carried out.

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

In addition to that, the chief electoral officer was present at the committee meetings and gave expert advice as to the geography of the area and the problems involved in splitting it up, as well as in taking a vote. As a result of the absence of these factors there was a perfectly impartial discussion of the problem of redistribution in the Yukon-Mackenzie area, with the result that decisions were reached fairly and unanimously. I might add that to a large extent they were reached on the advice of the chief electoral officer. I would say that particular experience with redistribution might very well be taken to indicate how satisfactorily an independent commission could operate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that at this time he should not discuss the outline of any particular riding, but rather the principle of the bill before the house.

Mr. Harkness: I had not mentioned the outline of the riding, but was merely indicating how the work of that subcommittee was carried out so satisfactorily. I suggest it was a good example of how an independent commission might operate in this connection.

Being a member of the committee on redistribution this year was a very disappointing experience. Any idea a person might have had that redistribution would be carried out on a fair and impartial basis was dissipated very early in proceedings. It did not take long to get rid of that idea, if anyone had it at the beginning. The only principle that was apparent to me as far as redistribution went was the principle of political advantage. The various principles which were talked about were all contravened in one province or another or in one constituency or another. The principle stated to be followed in one particular province would quite often be the exact opposite to that which was being followed in the adjoining province. As has been indicated before, there should be some fixed and definite principle according to which redistribution will be carried out. These were outlined a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), and I shall mention just one.

I think the basic principle of representation is supposed to be and should be representation by population. That principle was fought for a hundred years ago and was thought to be firmly established in this country. Generally speaking this principle has been followed as far as the number of representatives in each province is concerned, though even in that regard there have been departures.

For example, in the case of the maritime provinces the special provision is that their representation shall not fall below the number of senators. This applies particularly to Prince Edward Island. I am not complaining about that, but it is a departure from the general principle. Then we have another departure in connection with Saskatchewan. Again I am not complaining particularly, but if we keep on departing from this general principle of representation we are soon going to have a situation where there will be no principle left in that regard.

It was away back in 1911, I think, that the exception as far as the maritimes were concerned, in favour of Prince Edward Island, was brought in. This year we have the exception in favour of Saskatchewan. If the present government has anything to do with the next redistribution and sees political advantage in it, I have no doubt another exception will be made. The first thing we know the whole principle will be gone.

When we come to the distribution of seats within the provinces we find that the principle of representation by population is honoured only in the breach. There just does not seem to be any regard paid to it in many cases. I think we should have some sort of provision in our electoral law, such as they have in Australia, where the size of a constituency cannot vary from the figure set—we will say it is 50,000 population—more than one-fifth up or down. I do not say that our provision should be one-fifth, but if we had a provision like that in this country we would avoid the extreme discrepancies which exist at the present time.

For example, in New Brunswick there is one constituency having just over 25,000 population and right next to it is another constituency with just over 84,000 population, or more than three and a half times as many people. The present redistribution has left them sitting exactly as they were; no change is to be made. Then when you come to deal with another province you hear the cry that a particular constituency cannot be left as it is because the population is too small. In other words what I said a short time ago appears to be the case, that the principle argued in the case of one province is thrown out the window when it comes to the next. The only principle left, the only principle followed is the one I mentioned, that of political expediency.

I doubt if the public of Canada have any apprehension of the way in which this redistribution has been carried on. As far as I was able to make out, the procedure in most of the subcommittees was to have a certain amount of discussion and then the Liberal members of the subcommittee would bring in a plan prepared by a Liberal caucus or by the Liberal headquarters of the province concerned and the members of the subcommittee were practically told, "There it is". Following that there would be a long or short discussion. In the case of some subcommittees the discussion went on for weeks; in the case of other subcommittees it lasted only one or two meetings. But it did not matter whether there was a long or short discussion, it ended always with: "There is the plan".

Ordinarily the result was a deadlock of opposition members versus Liberal members. Then the chairman of the main committee, the minister, or the deputy chairman, the hon. member for St. Boniface, was brought in to act as chairman of the subcommittee and break the tie, as it were. That is when the axe fell. As far as I know the vote was always in favour of what the Liberal majority of the subcommittee had laid down as the plan. As far as I can find out there was no disposition to make what might be called reasonable concessions.

Then the report of the subcommittee was presented to the main committee. In the main committee opposition members would move amendments to carry out the proposals they had made in the subcommittee. But the result was always the same. It did not matter what good arguments were presented, the decision of the Liberal members was always the same. As I have said, the arguments they used were the exact opposite of the ones that had been used in the subcommittee which had just reported, but the majority of the members of the main committee coming from other provinces would pay no attention to the arguments because they knew the way they were going to vote before they came into the committee. They may have been using exactly the same argument the opposition members used as far as another province was concerned, but they would just stand up and vote as a phalanx in favour of what the Liberal members from that particular province recommended.

In other words the thing did not work in a democratic fashion. I do not think there is any question but that the present procedure is not fair. I do not believe the people of Canada relish having this important matter of redistribution dealt with in the way it has been dealt with and is being dealt with. I think the people of Canada would welcome the setting up of a commission such as is asked for in the motion moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I believe the government would be much better off under such a system from the point of view of their own survival, rather than to have a gerrymander of the country in the way that is being done. In the long run activities along that line are not going to do any good to the party which carries them out.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have been a political survivor for 21 years and I believe the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is wrong. As members of parliament we have to assume our responsibility. We have been told often enough that we have to make a decision. I have looked at the reports of the redistribution committee, and I have found that the decisions reached by the committee have been fair. Unfortunately it is impossible to please everybody, but the members of the committee have done their best to be just as fair as humanly possible.

Therefore, sir, I will vote against the amendment of the leader of the opposition. It is untimely and uncalled for.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): As one of the members from British Columbia I would be doing myself a great injury to sit here and listen to the condemnation which has been offered for the last hour or so of those who tried to work out a sane and sensible arrangement of the seats in British Columbia, for instance. The committee for British Columbia worked conscientiously, and consultations were held with all interested parties. The proposed redistribution as outlined by that committee is fair and honest, and should have the approval and in the main does have the approval of all parties. There was no effort whatsoever to take any advantage by running boundary lines in such a way as to include this group or that group. I think it is clear that there was a unanimous opinion with regard to Yukon-Mackenzie River—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. May I ask the hon. member not to refer to the ridings, as they have not yet appeared before us in the schedules of the bill.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely unfair to say there was any subterfuge, any effort, any trick or anything that was not in the general interest of the province of British Columbia. I can only speak for myself, but I am sure I am expressing the opinion of my colleagues when I say the task was tackled in a way which would be creditable to the province of British Columbia and beneficial to all Canada.

The fact that we were creating four new ridings within the province of British Columbia gave us a rather difficult position, in that certain boundaries had to be extended. I think it was to the credit of everyone that they worked conscientiously to carry out the task which was entrusted to them.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate on a non-political basis, as usual.

Mr. Gardiner: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murphy: I happened to be a member of the Ontario subcommittee, like Your Honour, and I am going to be quite frank. From the experience I had during this last month I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if I had the opportunity of being offered that job tomorrow I would tell my whip in not very parliamentary language where he might reside. It would be a place a good deal hotter than Ottawa will be in the next two weeks if we are going to finish this debate.

When I hear the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) say that he thought the committees were as fair as humanly possible, I must tell him without any hesitation that there was not very much humanity exhibited so far as we in Ontario were concerned. I heard the hon. member who just preceded me say that as far as British Columbia was concerned the task was tackled in a creditable manner. I only wish that statement would apply to the other provinces in this dominion. Sitting on the committee was a disillusionment for me as I think it was to most of us, because it was not our experience to have been on a committee of that sort before. I have always considered it an honour to be on a committee and to do what I possibly could on that particular committee. As far as the opposition members of this committee were concerned we might as well have been a bunch of wooden men. Our representations did not mean one thing, and I can say that with all sincerity. What I do not like about the set-up is the unfairness of it. Let no one in this house think for one moment that decisions were reached on an impartial basis; they were all reached on a partial basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing Bill No. 393, an act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. I do not think remarks such as those which have just been made with regard to the workings of a committee are in order at this time.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that from my experience on that committee there must be some other way of arriving at a decent or sensible method of having redistribution effected, and most certainly it could not be worse than what we are enjoying or having to put up with now. That is my argument precisely, without prolonging the debate; because we can play some of these forty-minute records next week when we will not be restricted as we are today.

Under the system proposed by my leader we would not have members of parliament having maps printed in various papers from coast to coast showing what the ridings are going to be. Nor would we have statements in the press by members of the committee, or statements in the committee by the chairman to the effect that no plans were prepared thus far; and yet on the same day the statement was made out came a press report in an Ottawa paper giving details of the three ridings in Ottawa. Under a proper system we would not have that, and that is what I am complaining about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. Once again I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he is referring to work which was done in the committee and to particular ridings which are not before us at this time.

Mr. Murphy: I do not intend to mention ridings, Mr. Speaker, and I hope to abide by your decision, with all due respect; but I am saying the principles we must be guided by under the present method are entirely unfair. I used an illustration to show that some other method must be devised in order that the people of this country may be properly represented, not the method that exists at the present time.

There are political considerations under the present system, and you cannot dispute that. That was pointed out by the leader of the opposition this morning, and he referred even to a former leader of our own party. I think it has been emphasized particularly by members of my own party today that if we were in power and had the opportunity of appointing a committee we would probably do pretty much the same as the method that is being adopted today, and that is why I say we must get away from the present method. I can speak from some experience and I am frank in saying that it is ridiculous.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, without talking at any great length, that in connection with setting up a commission we have in this country a very large number of highly respected organizations. I refer, for instance, to the farm federations. I am not one of those who would say we should have five, six, or seven judges on the commission, because after all most of those judges, in spite of some refutations, have had some political affiliation. With all due respect to them and to their integrity, I believe there are other large organizations in this country from which we could select the members of a commission. Regardless of what party was in power, I would not like the idea of having the appointment of members of the committee made without due regard to classification.

For that reason I am going to make this suggestion. We will suppose there would be five members on that commission. I have not had the opportunity of giving the subject a great deal of thought, but one member could be selected from the farm federations. We have a Canadian Chamber of Commerce, so let it select a man. It is also a non-political organization. There is a dominion-wide organization known as the mayors and reeves association. Let them select a member for the commission. Then we have the manufacturers' association, which represents vital interests and would naturally be non-political. We have the labour organizations, which I think affect every riding in the Dominion of Canada. At least five men could be drawn from these organizations, and then a distinguished jurist could act as chairman.

In fairness to the members of this house and the people of this country, this suggestion should be accepted. I hope that we, as members of the house, never again have to go through this ordeal, the results of which will be unfair when it is completed.

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): I did not intend to take part in this debate on redistribution, but after sitting here listening to all this talk from the opposition I may say that it reminds me very much of the Hitler regime; the larger the lie the more people will believe it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Rooney: I should like to say—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Rooney: With reference to Toronto, I should like to say that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was the only member from that city on the redistribution committee. We did not have a Liberal representative, and we have never made any complaints.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. May I remind the hon. member of the previous ruling that references to the committee are not in order in this debate.

Mr. Rooney: I shall not refer to that matter again, Mr. Speaker. I would say that the hon. member for Eglinton has not been disturbed in anything he has wished to do in Toronto and the Yorks.

Mr. Fleming: I defended your interests. I defended the interests of all the Liberal members from Toronto.

Mr. Hees: Donald for a square deal.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make a few comments on this matter. In the first place I am glad that this morning my leader was quite frank in referring to the cynical remark of a former leader of this party, when he said he was not suggesting the present method was unsatisfactory because it would be used by one party in a way that another party would scorn to do. He made no pretence of that kind. He dealt with the thing on what he considered to be its merits. He quoted at length from a former Liberal prime minister of this country.

My own feeling is that the events of the last few weeks have pointed up the difficulties of this method in a way that I, for one, had not fully realized before. I have to confess that within the last few weeks I argued against the appointment of a commission. I said that the difficulties of creating a commission and giving it instruction would be almost insuperable. I made that argument, and I am not denying that I think the difficulties will be very great. The only reason I am voting for this amendment—I hope the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) will not rise to a point of privilege when I say this—is that I have been through somewhat the same mental processes which he described himself as going through. I have felt, from all I could see of the operations of the present system, that it was so unsatisfactory that we should try something else.

It is not as if something else was not being tried elsewhere. Apparently it has been tried elsewhere, and with considerable success. I was not a member of the committee, which in one way is a great disadvantage and in another way is an advantage, because while I will not go the length of saying I speak non-politically—I do not know that any man is ever sure when he is speaking non-politically—nevertheless I have not had the overwhelmingly sense of frustration which has been experienced by some of the members of the committee.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) pointed out, very fairly I thought, that we in this parliament work on the basis that there is a government majority on committees; that is the practice. I do not see how we can complain about it; nevertheless it obviously does produce certain results.

Here we have a situation, whether we like it or not, where we really have 262 members of parliament each with a vested interest, or hoping to have a vested interest, in a constituency. I think the difficulty of dealing with the thing impartially under such conditions becomes almost insuperable.

I do not know how they manage it in England, but apparently there is some tradition they follow which enables them to have committees which are not government-controlled. In the reports of the British parliament for 1948, during a debate on the representation bill, I find that Mr. Churchill referred to an incident which happened in 1944. I read it only to point out the difference, and to show that if that sort of thing could happen here we might not be facing the difficulty we are facing today. It does not happen here, however, and we might as well be honest with ourselves and say that it will not happen here. This is what he says referring to a committee discussing representation in 1944:

> Although the Conservatives at that time had a majority of 150 over all parties in this house, the representation which we agreed to on the Speaker's conference—

By the way, Mr. Speaker, apparently in Britain the Speaker presides over these conferences.

> —was in a very different proportion. There were 15 Conservatives and 11 Socialists out of a total of 32, and when the Liberals and the few Independents were added, the Conservatives did not even have a majority on the conference, although they had a majority in the house of 150 over all parties. It was not dealt with entirely on the basis of House of Commons majorities.

I say that if we were prepared to do that sort of thing, then this situation might not arise. But we do not do it, and I think we should be honest with ourselves and admit that we do not do it. There is no sign that we will do it.

I feel that in the last few weeks, even since we failed to approve the motion of June 12, the situation has changed. It has, so to speak, sharpened. I have not been on the committee but, I am sure like every other hon. member, I have had indications every day of the difficulties which were being met, the sense of frustration and, what was worst of all, the feeling that in the end there was not going to be anything which could commend itself as fair. It would be just a bunch of bits and pieces. It would be the result of horse trading. When I say that I do not wish to suggest that this is a slur on anyone. As I said, we have 262 people with vested interests, and it is horse trading.

Again I revert to the suggestion of a commission. It would be extremely difficult. We cannot just give them the population of Canada and ask them to divide it by 262 because, as I say, we recognize that there are other bases. I remember years ago reading a speech by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in which he argued that we had to have regard not only to the extent of the territory—which certainly has a practical bearing—but also that the existing political associations, like counties and so on, should be respected in so far as it is practically possible. Therefore I am not for one moment suggesting that this matter of redistribution will be an easy thing. I am only putting the suggestion forward, as the hon. member for Eglinton said, because I feel that anything will be better than what we are doing now; or at any rate I should like to try it to see if it is not better.

In passing I might say that I hope we shall not have to have recourse to the judges. Mr. Hackett, who sat in the last parliament, constantly harped on that point and I always thought he was right. He asserted that the judges should be kept as far as possible out of anything which might have a political aspect because such an association would tend to lessen that remoteness and impartiality which we so much desire them not only to have but to appear to have.

This point also occurs to me, Mr. Speaker. There are some men who are facing the elimination, or virtual elimination, of their constituencies. I myself had some small experience of that kind of thing five years ago, and I can understand what it means to a man who has represented a constituency for perhaps three or four parliaments to find that it is disappearing under his feet. Situations no doubt will arise where that has to take place. If it takes place as the result of a recommendation of a commission which the member feels has tried to look at the thing fairly, that is one thing; and he will just have to grin and bear it. But if in fact he has no such feeling; if in fact he looks about and sees that his constituency is eliminated whereas others have been left which look almost like pocket boroughs and which have populations less than his own, it seems to me it is utterly impossible for him to feel that he has been treated in a fair manner. I therefore come back, Mr. Speaker, and say that it seems to me the present situation is so unsatisfactory, so incapable of achieving a measure of fairness which will be respected by all concerned, that we should no longer continue with but should rather seek another method and at least give it a fair trial.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the extent of the argument that might be advanced on an occasion like this has been limited by the ruling made by the Speaker; and all I propose to do on this occasion is deal in some detail with the recommendations made by the leader of the opposition with reference to the setting up of a commission to determine this vexed question of redistribution that comes to the House of Commons for decision every ten years.

On this occasion I am not going into any detail in reference to any constituency. I am going to confine myself entirely to a discussion of the merits of and the need for a commission to determine this matter. I shall also deal in particular with some of those countries which have adopted this system and have found it to be both efficacious and non-political.

I commence by reading the amendment, which is as follows:

> . . . that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the enactment of a measure to provide for the appointment of a commission to effect the redistribution of electoral ridings in accordance with the census of 1951 and pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952 inclusive; such commission to be instructed to make its report to this session of parliament upon the resumption of its sitting.

As the leader of the opposition pointed out, there is no difficulty in the way of adopting this suggestion at this time, for the reason that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has introduced, and this house has passed, a motion to the effect that the sittings of the house will be adjourned until November. In anything the Prime Minister said in the course of his remarks there was certainly no indication of the possibility, much less the probability, of an election being called within the next three or four months. Indeed, all editorial writers have been unanimous to date in their opinion that the meaning of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday was that no election is in the offing and that, in any event, there would be none before the months following the coronation. The fact that the Prime Minister moved that motion gives added weight and importance to the proposition advanced by the leader of the opposition this morning, when he set forth the benefits of removing once and for all from the cockpit of partisanship the determination of a matter which is not directly the concern of members of parliament but is particularly that of the Canadian people.

I commence by saying that I am not one of those who believe that anyone has rights to any constituency. I believe that the changing events, the movements of population and the alteration in economic development all require a change from time to time in the determination of the boundaries of constituencies. We in Saskatchewan—and this applies also to Manitoba—find ourselves in a different position from that of other provinces by reason of the amendment to the British North America Act, which was passed, by virtue of which Saskatchewan, instead of losing five seats, will lose three. In other words, in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba the basis of population will be different in the determination of constituency lines from that in any other provinces in the dominion affected directly by population considerations.

I know one can read the story of parliament and its actions through the years with regard to redistribution. Every ten years there is a recurring and ever-stronger feeling of resentment against the use, by abuse, of the power given to the House of Commons to determine the areas and the territorial limits of constituencies. I have read the debates through the years, and in each ten-year period the feeling has become stronger and stronger. I go back no further than 1932; and I do not believe any party—and that applies as well to my hon. friends of the C.C.F.—can wrap itself in the garb of political piety when it comes to looking at the question of redistribution. For in the province of Saskatchewan there was a redistribution within the last year or a year and a half that in several constituencies violated the principle of fairness that should have been in effect. I say that not by way of criticism but simply to accentuate my view that the time has come for parliament to determine whether or not we shall forever retain in parliament the power to determine boundaries.

The only reason we would want to retain it would be the political advantage of the party with the majority at the time. After all, the setting up of a commission will not remove from parliament the right and duty to determine the question once and for all. But, Mr. Speaker, the experience in Britain and elsewhere has been that when an independent commission speaks no parliament anywhere within this commonwealth has ever dared to alter the boundary lines of any constituency in a way which would have the result of liquidating a political opponent. In other words the commission system would provide a scientific means whereby redistribution would be determined on the only basis on which it should be determined, namely the question of population, subject of course in every case to these peculiar exigencies that occur in various constituencies where, by reason of the industrialization, the urban nature of a constituency, the rural nature of another, there has been recognized at all times the principle that population shall not be equal in all constituencies.

Having said that, I am going to make this one reference to the subcommittee for the province of Saskatchewan. It is going to be entirely objective, because I am not going to discuss in any way any of the problems peculiar to Saskatchewan. I point out this. The subcommittee was set up some five or six weeks ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. The hon. member was in the house, I think, when a previous ruling was made in regard to discussion of the committee at this time. We are now on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the greatest deference, I am presenting arguments why the commission form should be set up. If I cannot point out the situation as I found it, I am in the position of being unable to advance arguments why a commission would be preferable to the present haphazard system that is a denial of justice in so many constituencies. I would also point out this. When the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) were speaking they both spoke in the highest and most unprejudicially commendable terms of the subcommittees on which they served. All I want to do, sir, is to follow the same constructive lead they gave during the course of their remarks.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): They were called to order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, you will make the declaration whether I am out of order. There are not eight or nine Speakers here.

Mr. Gardiner: He has already told you that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am simply pointing out that the commission form is infinitely better than any committee would be which for six weeks had no sittings, and which in all its sittings met for one hour and five minutes and produced a map, a plan for the province of Saskatchewan, with no discussion whatever regarding lines or territorial limitations.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, I would submit that the hon. member for Lake Centre should submit to the rules of the house in the same way as any other member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege, I would call attention to the fact that the statement made is not correct, there were meetings. There was a meeting of the committee at which the hon. gentleman was present and at which they decided to postpone the meetings for three weeks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Order. I must ask the hon. member for Lake Centre to adhere to the rules of the debate. We are discussing the principle of Bill No. 393, an act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, and more particularly the amendment to the motion for second reading, moved by the leader of the opposition, for the appointment of a commission. I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle as set forth.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right, Mr. Speaker. Then may I say this, sir, that as a hypothetical case a commission is preferable to a committee of parliament prejudged and prejudiced in its decision. Now, sir, having said that—

Mr. Dewar: The hon. gentleman has just used the term "prejudged". I would say that I handed him a blank sheet and asked him to draw his own map, and to date he has not done anything.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): As I apprehend it, the hon. member was stating a hypothetical case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What surprises me is that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle should have been so quick to grasp a hypothetical case. May I now leave the hypothetical case and deal with some of the suggestions made by a committee of parliament in 1939. As my leader said today, the former prime minister of Canada on more than one occasion gave his highest approbation to the idea that for the preservation of our democratic system a commission be set up unpolitical, unprejudiced and unprejudged in so far as its membership is concerned. The last occasion on which the then prime minister dealt with this very matter, as I remember it, was in 1947, at which time he went at length into the reasons he was in favour of a commission system. I do not think the leader of the opposition dealt with the then prime minister's remarks, and I shall therefore place them on Hansard.

Mr. Mackenzie King: What I was reading from at the moment was the statement I made in 1933. I was going to go on to say that I agreed with my hon. friend from Lake Centre that we have an excellent precedent in the act which was passed by the United Kingdom in 1944. But what I was quoting was what I had said in 1933. The British act was enacted subsequently. I myself would have welcomed this House of Commons adopting such a measure at this session, but this House of Commons did not share my view, and I am not a dictator in this House of Commons. I made that very clear at the time. I spoke to my own following both in the government and in this house.

Then he went on to set out in detail the various statements he had made, and in particular his suggestion on February 3, 1947, of a commission composed of judges. At that time he made this statement:

I believe I have covered all that I think it desirable to say at present, beyond giving my hon. friend an assurance that the redistribution measure will be brought in at an early date in this session. I still hold the view which I expressed before. I personally would prefer a commission of judges to make the redistribution of seats in this house, but I do not believe that the majority of hon. members take that view, and in that particular I am prepared to accept the will of the majority.

Then on that occasion in 1947 he used these significant words, which he had repeated on previous occasions. Let me say that had it not been for the advent of war in 1939 Mr. Mackenzie King would have had introduced in the House of Commons a draft bill which had been prepared and which was available for presentation in May of 1940; and was intended to be introduced, as I understand it, by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

On that occasion in 1947 he went on to say:

I hope, however, the day will come when the House of Commons of Canada will see the wisdom of allowing its redistribution to be made by some impartial tribunal and not by the members of the house themselves dealing with the matter in committee as it has been dealt with in former years.

And then, as Mr. King often did, he quoted with approval statements he had previously made, with a view to consolidating and reinforcing his argument. He quoted what he had said in 1933, as follows:

My own view, and I have come to it after observing pretty carefully what has been taking place and what has been said in debate in this house as well as in the corridors, is that redistribution should be taken out of the hands of the House of Commons—

I shall not quote further from that, because the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) quoted it. During the course of that debate in 1947 I brought to the attention of the house the position in the United Kingdom. I did so because I believed it deserved to be canvassed. I am not by any means wedded to the idea of a judicial tribunal, for I know the argument can be advanced—and I have been one who for years has advanced it—that in any matter that concerns political partisanship, or may even have a suspicion of political partisanship, the judiciary should be kept from it in order that their position may remain as inviolate as it is possible to have it.

But, of course, the question of the type of commission to be set up is not dealt with in the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition. After all, that is for determination by the government of the day, and ratification by parliament of the stand taken by the cabinet after it has made a decision in this regard.

On that occasion I made reference to the British system, in these words:

I suggest this, and I do so only in passing because the Prime Minister in 1933 indicated that some method must be found whereby fairness will be achieved and the liquidation of political opponents prevented or denied. I suggest consideration of the Redistribution Act of the United Kingdom. It is a matter which might well come up. It cannot come up at this session, but it might be considered.

It will be recalled that in that year the redistribution measure came in within the last two days of the session. Then I continued:

It is entitled the "House of Commons (Redistribution of Seats) Act, 1944". In the United Kingdom the matter of redistribution is under continuous review; a permanent boundary commission has been set up. There are several boundary commissions, one in England and one for the several other parts of the United Kingdom.

At that point the then hon. member for Davenport, who was such an authority on these matters, interrupted by saying, "There are four", following which I continued:

Yes. A report is made to the house from time to time. It is a continuing activity which, of course, would be different from the procedure here in Canada. Provision is made that—and I read from the act—

Then I read from the act to indicate the means whereby, by continuing the activity, the constituency picture within the United Kingdom would be changed, based on transitions in population and the like. I quoted from the act as follows:

A report of a boundary commission under this act showing the constituencies into which they recommend that any area should be divided shall state, as respects each constituency, the name by which they recommend that it should be known, and whether they recommend that it should be a parliamentary county or division of a parliamentary county or a parliamentary borough or division of a parliamentary borough.

Then I went on to point out that in no way would the setting up of a commission be an abdication of the responsibility of parliament, and went on to say:

Then the draft is approved by resolution of each house of parliament. That commission is one which is above partisanship. Parliament still rules; parliament still controls; but parliament would not act unfairly against a political opponent.

Then I referred to the personnel of the commission in the United Kingdom in charge of this responsibility in these words:

The commission for England consists of the chairman, the registrar general, the director general of the ordnance survey and two other members, one appointed by the secretary of state and the other by the minister of health; and no member of the House of Commons or of either house of parliament of Northern Ireland is permitted to act on such committee.

In other words the British found that a judicial commission was not in keeping with the finer traditions of an inviolate, independent judiciary. In Great Britain in 1944 the system I have indicated was set up.

Similar commissions have been set up in other parts of the commonwealth for the determination of the distribution of constituencies. Canada, indeed, is the only one of the self-governing dominions within the British commonwealth that adheres to the present archaic system, which is dangerous in the extreme if applied by an overwhelming and aggressive majority. No other part of the commonwealth adheres to this system.

As the leader of the opposition said this morning, in a world where democracy is challenged changes must inevitably take place. The fact that in the 1860's, 70's, 80's and 90's this system was regarded as a means whereby political opponents could be removed, and the fact that it has continued since, is no reason for maintaining a system that is the very negation of democratic principles, namely the application of equity and fairness within statutory limitations as provided by law.

I am going to read from a report made in 1939, for which I sent out a while ago. This is a report made by a special committee on electoral matters, headed by Mr. C. E. Bothwell, the then member for Swift Current, who was a very distinguished member of the bar and of parliament.

It reads:

Your committee was instructed by order of reference dated March 13, 1939, to study and report on "Methods used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts in Canada and in other countries, and to make suggestions to the house in connection therewith," but regrets that it has been unable to give this order of reference the consideration it merits, owing to the number of meetings necessarily devoted to consideration of suggested amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, the last of which meetings was held on the second instant.

That report was dated May 10, 1939. The report concludes:

Your committee therefore submits, without further comment, a statement of the methods employed in other countries, and the suggestions made, for the consideration of the house.

I have pointed out already that so effective was the study made by that committee that a bill would have been introduced by the then prime minister, Mr. King, in order to remove this record of partisanship which for too long has been the lot of the House of Commons every ten years, or even oftener in so far as the western provinces are concerned.

I should like to refer for a moment to the various systems in effect in other parts of the commonwealth. I have already given the house a not very detailed but I think sufficient summation to indicate what the plan is in Great Britain. I should lie to refer now to the Australian system which is set out in more detail in the minutes of evidence attached to the report made by Mr. Bothwell to which I alluded a few moments ago. Here is the system followed in Australia:

A distribution commission is set up. Each state returns the number of members of the House of Representatives to which it is entitled on a population basis, but subject to the provision that each original state shall be entitled to be represented by five members.

The representation of each state is determined after each decennial census, and at an intermediate intercensal period five years thereafter, in the following manner—

In each state a commission is set up composed of the surveyor general and the chief electoral officer, with a chairman nominated by the governor general. In making a distribution the commissioners are instructed to give consideration to community or diversity of interest, means of communication, physical features, existing boundaries of divisions and subdivisions and state electoral boundaries. Objections or suggestions in writing may be lodged with the commissioners at any time during the thirty days following advertisement in the Gazette. After the thirty days mentioned the commissioners are required to submit their report and the minister must lay the report before both houses of parliament. If both houses of parliament pass a resolution approving the distribution, a proclamation is issued declaring the names and boundaries of the divisions. That in general is the system in effect in the commonwealth of Australia.

In the case of New Zealand two commissions are set up to provide for periodical readjustment of representation, one for each island. Each commission is composed of five members. That of north island consists of the surveyor general, two commissioners of crown lands who are named by their title of office, and two members not being members of the public service or members of the general assembly, as the House of Representatives nominates from time to time. One of the five is a permanent commissioner. Again in that case certain regulations are followed. A report is made and within ten days thereof the governor general is required to submit the report to the House of Representatives to be dealt with.

In South Africa they have a judicial system under which three superior court judges determine the matter subject to regulations. Each individual state reapportions its constituencies and determines what the representation shall be on the basis of constitutional or statutory provisions.

I have referred to these systems in order to indicate my support of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and because I feel that in the interests of equity and fairness and in order to preserve the highest principles of representation in a democratic assembly the time has come to do that which Mr. King would have done had war not come and to which throughout the years he gave undivided support. At that time he was supported by two great leaders of his party, the late Colonel Ralston and the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, both of whom joined with him in the House of Commons in proclaiming the need of forever placing in the pages of history the record of the past and determining that parliament should once and for all assure that the bickering and prejudice which undermine our democracy every ten years when this question comes up could well be removed from partisanship as it has not been throughout the entire period of our confederation.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

41. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, $1,000,000.

Mr. Corry: As the representative of a constituency whose citizens are vitally interested in the production of cheese, I should like to say a few words on this item. The cheese industry has had a good deal of consideration during this session. I do not wish to deal at any length with the difficulties which face the producers. Our inability to sell cheese on the British market has been a great disappointment to our producers; and the curtailment of our outlet in the United States, through the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, has also contributed to the difficulty.

There was some good news yesterday. I read a press report which stated that the restrictions in the United States may be modified. We hope for some kind of beneficial effect on our industry. If every citizen of Canada would consume, on an average, one-half pound of cheese more than he has been consuming in the past the difficulty would be resolved immediately. Our cheese is the best in the world. We have improved our quality so that it is exceeded by none.

I should like to ask a question of the minister in connection with this estimate. I notice that two years ago the amount appropriated for this purpose was $1,400,000. Last year it was $1,100,000. This year I notice the estimate is $1 million. I should like to ask whether the reduction has been in the amount which was provided for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese or the improvement of cheese factories.

Mr. Gardiner: The quantity of cheese is down considerably. The amount of cheese that was being produced a few years ago was approximately 125 million pounds. Last year it was about 80 million pounds. Of course the amount of money paid out is less.

Mr. Charlton: The hon. member for Perth mentioned reading a newspaper article dealing with this industry. There is something in the press this morning with regard to the Ontario government doing something about the 15 million pound surplus. I wonder if the minister knows anything about that.

Mr. Gardiner: I hesitate to make a report about it. It is really a provincial matter. It was dealt with in Toronto yesterday, I think, by Mr. Kennedy at a meeting with the cheese producers. My information, although it is more or less indirect, is that they were successful in getting rid of the cheese. I should not like to make that as a definite announcement, however, or even as an announcement at all.

Mr. Charlton: Is it entirely the provincial government that is doing that, or is it in co-operation with the dominion?

Mr. Gardiner: It is entirely provincial, apart from this consideration; that they are organized under the federal co-operative act, which only means that we guarantee them against loss up to 80 per cent of the average price over the last three years. But all the transactions are carried on by the co-operative itself and largely under Ontario legislation.

Mr. Charlton: Is it a one hundred per cent responsibility of the provincial government now to look after surplus farm products across the country?

Mr. Gardiner: It always has been their responsibility to look after them if they could sell them within the province; and cheese is largely sold within the province.

Mr. Fulford: I have just one suggestion to make. Would it be possible for the Minister of Agriculture to persuade the Minister of National Health and Welfare to use some of the advertising which seems to be at his command to advertise cheese as one of the best and most healthful foods we can eat? We see a great deal of advertising by that department; and I know of nothing better on which to spend money than on something to get our own Canadian people to eat one of the most healthful foods produced.

Mr. Fleming: Does that mean the hon. member for Leeds agrees with me that some of the present expenditures of the Department of National Health and Welfare are being wasted and could be much better spent in such ways as the hon. member has indicated?

Item agreed to.

Special—

42. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment, $500,000.

Mr. Wright: What is the total amount that has been voted to date under this item? I notice it has been in the estimates for a number of years now. How long is it expected that it will take to replace this equipment?

Mr. Gardiner: The Quebec government is expecting it will take two or three years yet in order to complete the expenditures that are necessary to make the change.

Mr. Wright: What is the total of the payments that have been made under this item over the years? In what year did they start and what have been the amounts paid each year?

Mr. Gardiner: They started in 1940, and the amount has been $2,250,000; that is, our share of it is $2,250,000. We pay one-third.

Mr. Charlton: I believe the minister told us back in 1949 that it started in 1936, carried on for a year or so, skipped the war period and then started again just after the war. There had been some money spent at that time.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that is right, that it was started before the war began.

Mr. Wright: Can we get the exact figures?

Mr. Gardiner: The exact figures are here. We shut it off just at the beginning of the war for a time, but it had been going on for a short period. This record here is from 1940, which is for the war period.

Mr. Charlton: As I understand it, this item is for maple sugar equipment that was defective in some way.

Mr. Gardiner: Those who are familiar with the maple sugar industry will remember that we used to be accustomed to see rusty pails hanging on trees. Someone conceived the idea of covering them with something which prevented them from rusting. It was a sort of lead covering, and the effect of the sap standing in the pails at times resulted in lead being taken into the sap and eventually appearing in the syrup, constituting a form of lead poisoning that condemned the syrup. The syrup that came out of those utensils was utilized largely in the making of cigarettes. The Americans objected to the syrup being shipped into the United States for human consumption.

We entered into an arrangement prior to the war; I think it is probably correct to say that we started discussing it in 1936. We did not get down to making payments until 1939-40. Payments up to the present have totalled $2,250,000 so far as we are concerned. It is a three-way arrangement under which the province pays one-third, we pay one-third and the people who are interested in the equipment take care of the other one-third.

Mr. Charlton: The minister says only $2,250,000 has been spent by the dominion government?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Charlton: A total of $2,250,000?

Mr. Gardiner: Which is a lot of money.

Mr. McCann: It is $8 million altogether.

Mr. Fleming: One of your colleagues does not think it is a lot of money.

Mr. Charlton: How much longer are you going to continue this?

Mr. Gardiner: The work is done by the Quebec government. We simply undertake to pay one-third of the cost and the Quebec government does the actual administration. They tell us it will take another two or three years, but I must admit to the committee that I think it has taken a long time now. We are not carrying on the administration; the Quebec government is, and we shall probably have to check up sooner or later as to whether we should continue.

Mr. Charlton: Is the Ontario government taking advantage of it also?

Mr. Gardiner: No; it is only in Quebec.

Item agreed to.

43. For assistance in construction of potato warehouses under terms and conditions to be approved by the governor in council, $50,000.

Mr. Catherwood: What is the principle upon which assistance is given under this item?

Mr. Gardiner: Those co-operative organizations which have set up storages for potatoes started first in Prince Edward Island, and it has been taken on in some of the other provinces. The provision was that the province, or at least the co-operative, pays up to 25 per cent of the cost of putting up the storage and the province and the federal government split the other part equally between them.

Item agreed to.

44. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,249,270.

Mr. Knight: What is the estimate of the damage to the P.F.R.A. dams in the south-western part of Saskatchewan owing to flooding conditions this spring?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: An order for return was brought down quite recently, or an answer to a question was given, I have forgotten which, showing the total amount, which is something over $300,000.

Mr. Knight: Are repairs to those dams being undertaken at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, yes, it is under way, and I imagine in connection with some of them pretty well completed.

Mr. Knight: Can the minister give any estimate of the damage that has been done to the surrounding country in the loss of farms and livestock?

Mr. Gardiner: We had an increase in our estimates, including the supplementaries, which amounts to about $500,000, in order to take care of the damage done around about and to make some improvements in the structures.

Mr. Knight: The point I want to make is this. Does this vote include any compensation to the people who had losses in that flood?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it includes compensation in this way. We put some of the structures back in action that were on people's property and were destroyed.

Mr. Knight: I know the provincial government is making itself responsible for some portion of that cost. The dominion government is not working in co-operation with the provincial government on any scheme of that kind?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, we are working in co-operation in this sense. I understand the provincial government put an inspector in at Eastend, for example, to inspect the houses that had been damaged, and to report upon possible improvements, and I think possibly putting some money in it as well. The federal government has done a great deal of work in Eastend and elsewhere through that area in putting the streets back in condition and putting the lots around the people's houses back in condition, pumping water out of their basements and re-establishing the situation in general. That is of course one of the reasons for the expenditure of that extra amount of money.

Mr. Bryce: Is any of the money in this item for P.F.R.A. work in connection with cuts in the Assiniboine river?

There is only $50,000 in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Gardiner: Item No. 50 deals with the Assiniboine river, diking and cut-off.

Mr. Fair: Will the minister tell me whether consideration has been given to extending the benefits of P.F.R.A. north of the present line west of Lloydminster and extending as far north as the North Saskatchewan river? I asked this question during discussion of item No. 1.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it is involved in the larger question that we were discussing yesterday, as to whether we are going to extend P.F.R.A. work outside the Palliser triangle. That has not been done up to now, and I do not know whether it will be given further consideration until we apply the decision to all Canada rather than just to that area.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to follow the hon. member for Saskatoon with one further question. With regard to some of these big fires and so on that have occurred in various places in the country, the federal government has assumed some responsibility for rehabilitation and aid. What strikes me about this Eastend situation is that it resulted from the destruction of a government project, a dam. It seems to me there is some responsibility for compensation to individuals who have suffered losses as well as the town of Eastend and the surrounding territory because of the failure of a government project which caused the inundation of the town and the country around that town. I should like the minister to comment. The very fact that the department felt it should use its facilities to pump water out of basements, to repair the streets, to rebuild the lots around the houses and so on would indicate that the department at least felt that it had some responsibility. The point I am making is that it would appear to me that the responsibility is not recognized to the extent it should be to the individuals who have suffered. Has that been given consideration by the department and by the government?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, yes, it has been given consideration. I think I explained here on one previous occasion the fact that it was given consideration; but there is a difference of opinion as to whether building the dam that was erected and placing the storage there, and also placing the controls at Cypress lake, which is above that, resulted in making it more likely that there would have been damage, or less likely. There was a dam there before the government stepped in at all, of course. The Watson estate had irrigation carried on at Eastend before the government took any part in it. Later on the government took that project over and enlarged it. Our engineers maintain that anything that was done there did not increase the damage that would have been done in any case this year. There was a much greater flow of water in the stream this year than is usual. Damage would have been done in any case. I quite understand that one will never be able to settle that; there will always be arguments as between one group and another. We have equipment there which is working on irrigation all the time, in other words it is handling water. It is just a reasonable thing—it is not a matter of admitting anything at all—that when we have equipment there, and people's basements fill up, we pump them out. The fact is that we simply put the pumps to work, and pumped them out. That was the natural thing to do. However, it cost money to do it; and we require to have a vote to cover it.

The irrigation that was carried on there was not only in the country but was also done in respect of people's lots in the village itself. The water coming down through the village took some of the lots almost entirely away, at least it took away the top covering of earth. We used our equipment to put it back again. In some cases streets were torn up by the water, and we used our equipment in that connection, too. In other words, when we were putting in the ditches, the boxes, and all that sort of thing associated with irrigation, we completed the job in a way that was helpful to everyone.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Chairman, I do not think this item should be allowed to pass without some expression of appreciation for the splendid work the department is doing through the expenditure of this money. I have no doubt the great number of relatively small works throughout the prairie provinces are of benefit to agriculture out of all proportion to the amount of money invested in them.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with that.

Mr. Laing: We in British Columbia do appreciate the minister's entry, through this branch of his department, into one or two relatively small projects, the largest of which was a river containment plan at Pemberton. The hon. member for Kamloops is not in his seat to thank the minister, so I shall do so. There is some work being done on the west bench at Penticton and some work at Westbank in the Okanagan.

I was wondering if that expenditure would come under this item, and if we in British Columbia are officially acknowledged as one of the areas for P.F.R.A. assistance. I am wondering if we may expect the minister's engineers to continue their investigations within British Columbia, because in that province there are a number of additional points where this sort of help would be of great benefit to us.

Mr. Gardiner: The expenditures we are making in British Columbia would come under item 47 which deals with land protection and reclamation. However, it was as a result of the P.F.R.A. work we have done on the prairies that this work in British Columbia was undertaken some years ago. The first was in the Pemberton area, and it has been pretty well completed. I believe this season will complete what was undertaken there. There is the possibility of doing other work. We are undertaking further projects in the Okanagan valley and elsewhere, under this item.

Mr. Wylie: I listened carefully to the minister's statement a few moments ago about Eastend. It must also be remembered that Medicine Hat suffered a serious flood this year. Whether it was occasioned by the going out of the Seven Persons dam, I cannot say. We know, however, that the spillway of the dam went out, and that the results were disastrous. If Medicine Hat is to be treated in the same way as Eastend, then Medicine Hat should be given some compensation for the damage caused through the going out of the spillway. Is it the policy of the government to give assistance in cases of this kind?

Mr. Gardiner: I should imagine the hon. member would know as much as anyone about the situation out there. My officials say they have not received a report about any serious damage at that point. We realize that there is damage, of course, in the event of a big run-off of water in the spring of the year.

Mr. Wylie: As a result of the spillway of the Seven Persons dam going out, the city of Medicine Hat was flooded. Hundreds of families were kept out of their homes. I am sure all hon. members will recall reading about it in the newspapers. Today we are still taking up subscriptions to assist in putting the lots back into proper condition, pumping out the basements and other work of that kind. Many of the homes are damaged beyond repair. Would the policy that applied to respect of Eastend also apply to Medicine Hat?

Mr. Gardiner: The Seven Persons dam is a small stock-watering dam. I can scarcely understand how it would do that much damage. However, we will check and find out whether it was the cause of the damage. I would imagine, however, that any damage for which we would be responsible would only be that having to do with the stock-watering end of it, at the dam itself.

Mr. Wright: Under which of these items is work being carried on at The Pas in northern Manitoba in connection with the raising of dikes and reclamation of land?

Mr. Gardiner: It would be under item 48.

Mr. Corry: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time as a result of the comments made the other day by the minister in connection with the possibility of the provisions of P.F.R.A. being extended to other parts of Canada. As the minister and hon. members will know, in Ontario we have a number of persons engaged in conservation work. While this is in its earlier stages, public opinion is gradually being awakened to a realization of its importance. I feel sure I am voicing the sentiments of many farmers in Ontario when I say we would be deeply interested in having set up, perhaps under different auspices, a body similar to P.F.R.A. to take care of this problem in Ontario.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, the people in the area I represent deeply appreciate the help that has been given to them in the past through the construction of dugouts. A good deal of irrigation has been carried on from these dugouts through the use of sprinkler systems. A short time ago the board of trade of Hanna passed a resolution, of which I believe the minister was sent a copy, asking that a grant be made toward the purchase of a sprinkler system. I raised this matter I think three years ago. At that time some confusion was created in the minds of the people out there as to whether or not it was possible to get a grant under the P.F.R.A. for the purpose of purchasing a sprinkler outfit. The minister said that it was not, but I believe there was an understanding that if a farmer paid the full cost of building a dam or constructing a dugout it would be possible for him to get a grant from the government for the sprinkler system in lieu of the money that would have been paid on the dam. I do not know whether that is correct, but I think the minister will agree that it is a reasonable proposition. If a farmer has constructed a dam or paid the whole cost of constructing a dugout he should be able to get the amount of money he would have got from the government for that purpose.

Mr. Gardiner: It has not been our policy to assist in the purchase of sprinkler outfits. We do assist farmers to put in dugouts or dams. I suppose the dams the hon. member has in mind were put in before this policy was first in effect, which would be some seventeen years ago. I doubt if since that time there have been many dugouts constructed for which assistance was not given. I would hesitate to go back seventeen years and start to give special assistance in connection with dams or dugouts constructed before that time.

Mr. Quelch: Apparently the farmers were not aware that they could get grants and they went ahead and constructed the dams and then found that a grant could have been obtained. They were advised by the local agricultural authorities to use a sprinkler system, and they now wonder whether they can get money for that purpose when they did not ask for any assistance in the construction of the dams.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think the government would want to adopt a plan of that kind. It would seem a considerable expenditure of money for something similar to a lot of other equipment on the farm with which we might be asked to help as well.

Mr. MacKenzie: It seems to me that we are in a rather precarious position. The government builds a dam to store water; then when the dam goes out the government must compensate the people for building the dam. It looks like a kind of vicious circle. Where do the provinces enter into these rehabilitation and protection schemes?

Mr. Gardiner: The P.F.R.A. is handled by our own organization which spends the federal money. Personally I am a strong believer in the principle that the people who raise the money should spend it. In this particular case we raise the money and we spend it. I think we get better results that way. As far as a vicious circle is concerned, we probably do put back the dams when they go out. I suppose the principle is that they should have been put in well enough to stay there. We were talking about bridges earlier along somewhat the same lines. We have had no difficulty at all with by far the greater number that have been put in.

Mr. Wylie: I want to say that we do appreciate what the P.F.R.A. has done in the way of water storage, but many times a good dam is constructed and then the spillway is left uncompleted. I suggest to the minister and his parliamentary assistant that when dams are put in the spillways should be completed. We have had several instances of this kind, and I mention the Ross creek irrigation project in particular. The P.F.R.A. and the Alberta government spent considerable money on that project. The material was all there but it was not completed, and will now cost the dominion government about three or four times as much as it would in the first place.

Then the spillway was not completed in connection with the Eagle Butte dam. We were all afraid that dam would go out this year, but fortunately it did not. It seems to me that when the P.F.R.A. undertakes one of these projects the spillway should be completed, because that is very important in the storage of water. I do not mean this as criticism; I am simple offering advice and suggesting that these spillways should be completed so that what happened this year, last year and the year before cannot happen again.

I am glad to see that the department is spending some money in connection with water storage because we need water out there, especially in the summertime. But when a good dam is built, see that the spillway is completed so the dam will be protected when the spring run-off occurs.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have been listening to the discussion, particularly that of the hon. member for Medicine Hat; and to a maritimer it would appear that when these dams are built, they are built by the P.F.R.A., and then when they do not work properly, it is still the fault of parliament. It would seem to me that it works both ways. If it works, it is the fault of parliament, and if it does not work, it is still the fault of parliament. P.F.R.A. then means parliament's fault regardless of action. It looks pretty hard to determine whether these projects should be undertaken.

Mr. Wright: I would point out to the hon. member that when a wharf is built in Nova Scotia and for some reason it is washed out, naturally they want it replaced. They holler their heads off if it is not replaced.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is not the point. If the wharf is built and something around it is damaged, we would not expect the government to come back and repair it. Following your argument it would look as though after they were built it was still parliament's fault regardless of what happens.

Mr. Hosking: I have listened with interest to the debate, but I would like to ask the minister who puts up the money if these dams require maintenance.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the hon. member would speak louder.

Mr. Gardiner: If the others would keep quiet it would be all right.

Mr. Hosking: I know that when these dams get into disrepair the farmers say, let it wash out; we won't bother maintaining it because the dominion government will replace it if it does go out. I do not think that is a sound idea, and I would like the minister to tell us whether the taxes we pay in the province of Ontario are used to maintain these dams that are not properly maintained by the farmers.

Mr. Gardiner: Very few of them go out, but unfortunately you only hear about the ones that do. The dams are maintained by the people who have been assisted. There is a general impression that we build these dams and dugouts and so on, but we don't. We simply make a subscription towards their cost. We pay what is presumed to be about one-third of the cost and the farmers pay the remainder themselves. When a farmer puts a considerable amount of money into a project of that kind he does his best to maintain it. He does not want to put it back in and the government does not want to put it back in if it goes out; so the people who are interested in the water maintain the structure.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I point out that P.F.R.A. assistance ceases beyond a certain triangle on the prairies. We feel that the benefits of the act should be extended in British Columbia, and in fact it is already being applied at Pemberton and Kamloops through the very good offices of the Minister of Agriculture. The conservation of water is very important in the Peace river country, and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will extend the benefits of the P.F.R.A. to the Peace river country of British Columbia. It is a vast agricultural country which last year shipped 5 million bushels of wheat to the markets of the world.

In this connection I want to pay tribute to the minister for having started P.F.R.A. at Pemberton, where a vast area was reclaimed and where many soldier settlers, Indian settlers and others were enabled to establish farms. We feel that a great tribute should be paid him and that a very great debt is owing to him for having instituted that assistance at Pemberton in British Columbia.

We are steadily advancing with the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, and we hope the minister will extend the benefits of P.F.R.A. to the Peace river bloc of British Columbia so that cereals, grains and other products from that area may be made available to the lower Cariboo and Pemberton area. In short, I want to pay tribute to the Minister of Agriculture for having foreseen the development of the Pacific slope and that one part of that great area may supply the other in the agricultural development of that part of the country.

Item agreed to.

45. Major irrigation and reclamation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,064,630.

Mr. Knight: It is perhaps trite to say that the people of Saskatchewan are very disappointed at the tardiness with which the dominion government is proceeding with the work on what is commonly called the South Saskatchewan dam. I think the right hon. minister must bear some of the responsibility for that disappointment, because he has constantly painted glowing pictures of what the dam would mean to the province of Saskatchewan. He has said it would create a great agricultural revolution in that province, and I think with that I can agree at this time. The fact is, however, that this project has been delayed beyond all expectation, and indeed beyond all reason.

As I said, the minister himself has created glowing pictures of what that dam will mean to us as security against drought. I am afraid that in many of his pre-election speeches particularly he has made unfulfilled promises and we are very disappointed at the delay. I will not go into the history of the project.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member for Lethbridge gave us a very interesting background of the story of that part of the country the other day, and the minister told him that when we got to this item he would be prepared to discuss it. I feel it is simply my duty to say that the people of Saskatoon, who are looking forward to the results of the building of this dam, if it is indeed ever built, would expect me to register the protests they have made. Representations of course are constantly made to me as their member. I have for instance in front of me a letter from the Saskatoon board of trade dated June 4, 1951, addressed to the Prime Minister expressing their desire in the matter and their disappointment that action has been delayed.

There is in that part of the country, as the minister well knows, an organization known as the Saskatchewan rivers development association, which is doing valuable publicity work in regard to the matter. They have an annual meeting, and I am well aware that annually at least they send the minister an expression of their desires. I have in my hand such an expression under date of June 15, 1951, in the form of a wire addressed to the Prime Minister. I think I should read this one:

> Knowing that the irrigation of central Saskatchewan will raise the economic standards of our province to their proper place in our national economy and being assured that the South Saskatchewan river project is both feasible and practicable, we, the S.R.D.A. in annual meeting today, record our regret that the government has seen fit to delay approval of construction pending further consideration by a committee of experts; but in view of this decision we strongly urge the government to make this selection of experts without delay and that they be requested to hasten their report in order that an approval of the project may be entertained by the government at the coming fall session. So urgent is the need we ask that the project be proceeded with immediately.

I would also like to quote from the newspaper in our city, which certainly cannot be accused of doing anything but supporting this government and its kindred Liberal party in the province of Saskatchewan. I may say that is particularly true before elections; and if the minister read, as I have no doubt he did, the copies of the Star-Phoenix for the month previous to the recent provincial elections I think he will bear me out in that regard. I have not criticized the minister very severely, nor indeed the government, but this paper is more severe in its criticism. The article or editorial is entitled "No argument". It is contained in the June 2nd Star-Phœnix and it says among other things:

> The federal government's decision to pigeonhole the South Saskatchewan dam project is only less amazing than Mr. Gardiner's reasons for doing so. The project has been studied, surveyed, analysed, discussed and debated for more than four years.

I think that is an understatement, because I heard the minister, as I have reminded him before, make a very eloquent speech at the technical school in Saskatoon in 1944 in which he promised untold millions for the construction of water projects in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: The only part that is wrong is your last statement.

Mr. Knight: The article continues:

> On June 24, 1950, Mr. Gardiner assured an audience at Outlook that "I can tell you tonight that we know, that our engineers are satisfied the dam is feasible." He intimated that an arrangement between Ottawa and the provincial government for sharing the cost was the only thing then holding up a start on the project.

That is a very Gardiner-like statement.

> That arrangement has since been made. And now Mr. Gardiner says more experts are to be called in to study, survey, analyse and debate, because, he implies, some of his colleagues in the government are still doubtful. Has the government lost confidence in its own engineers, we wonder? Or has it some other reason for stalling?
> If Mr. Gardiner had used the international situation and the defence program as a pretext for delay—

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite out of order for an hon. member to quote reams and columns of things that have been printed in newspapers. The hon. member may easily state his own views or he might insert quotations from Eaton's catalogue. At this late stage in the session it is quite out of order for an hon. member to quote columns and columns.

Mr. Knight: If the hon. member is challenging me to make a forty-minute speech I may take him up on it. I am quoting this editorial because I thought it was concise and would save the time of the committee. I continue to quote with your permission, Mr. Chairman, and without the permission of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I shall finish in a moment.

> If Mr. Gardiner had used the international situation and the defence program as a pretext for delay he would at least have had an argument. The dam project, spread over a 10-year period, would be a drop in the federal treasury bucket, despite the burden of the defence program; but it would do much to ease the effects of a dislocated, defence contract period on this province, not to say strengthen the economy of Saskatchewan and thus of the whole country, for peace or war. Still, if the government had used this argument it might have had some grounds for rebuttal.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): On a point of order—

Mr. Knight:

> The argument it has used amounts to a direct slap in the face for the people of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, might I say—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Cariboo raised a point of order a moment ago, and the hon. member for Saskatoon explained that his quotation would be very short. As he was finishing his quotation, the hon. member for Cariboo rose again, and I thought it was to ask me to rule on the point of order he had raised. If it is true that the hon. member has now concluded his quotation, the point of order has been settled.

Mr. Knight: At this late date in the session, Mr. Chairman, I shall not carry out my threat to make a forty-minute speech giving my own ideas, although I assure the hon. member that on this subject I could speak for forty minutes with the greatest of ease. I shall say this, and it is not a quotation. We understand well enough that this is a long-term project. We do not want this government to enter into a national proposition, as this certainly is, without due care and consideration. But I do violently object to having this thing made into an election political football. I do violently object to being promised the project at every election, and then finding after the election is over that the government is pussyfooting and delaying getting on with the project. That is what I wanted to say.

I am going to make the prediction, Mr. Chairman, that before the next election comes there will be lots of dam building machinery down around the project. If the machinery is not there, then the minister will be there himself telling us once more that if the Liberal government is just returned to power in this country we will have the dam project in no time.

Mr. Blackmore: Would it not be wise for the minister to give us that outline of the project which he promised?

Mr. Gardiner: I might say, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister speaks, I have only a few brief remarks I should like to make. I do not want to repeat anything that has been said. I believe the situation is that the commission has not reported as yet; therefore I may not be as critical as I might otherwise be. I should like to ask the minister to do what he can to get an early report. Certainly the postponements that have taken place and the excuses that have been made in the last two years for not proceeding with the work have aroused a feeling of antagonism which was clearly evident at the meeting which took place last week at Outlook, to which the hon. member referred.

One interesting feature that was brought to the attention of the gathering there was a preview of the irrigation project which was given to those who were in attendance at this function, numbering some 243. I read from the Regina Leader-Post, in which it is stated:

> A preview of what south central Saskatchewan may expect in the way of crops and crop yields when irrigation replaces dry farming here was given to about 100 visitors who toured the P.F.R.A. pre-development farm at Outlook Friday.
> Dr. Thomson told delegates that it was a 1948 S.R.D.A. resolution that had been responsible for the government setting up the pre-development farm two years ago. And since that time the farm had been experimenting with a variety of crops to determine their suitability under irrigation.
> The farm—160 acres—had 60 acres under the sprinkler system and the balance under gravity irrigation.

From the experiments that have taken place there, some indication was given as to the extent to which crop rotation could be proceeded with in that area. I think that was a most commendable piece of work on the part of the department and one that deserves the support of all the members, particularly from Saskatchewan. We realize that if this project is proceeded with it will mean irrigation being made available to some 500,000 acres or even more, in an area that throughout the years has suffered from recurrent drought. Certainly it is rather difficult to understand why it became necessary to set up a commission to review the conclusions arrived at by the engineers of the Department of Agriculture and those connected with the P.F.R.A. Those engineers know conditions in Saskatchewan. Their experience is practical; and more than three years ago, if my recollection is correct, they determined that this scheme was practicable and that in addition to the irrigation possibilities and the probable improvement of production in that area, it would also provide a power development for Saskatchewan. Without such a development Saskatchewan could never hope to achieve a basis of industrial equality with the other provinces.

I think, in addition to the irrigation possibilities, the development of power there will be of material advantage in placing that province in a position to take advantage of some of its industrial potentialities. When you realize all the hundreds of millions of dollars being spent on defence, and the small drop as it were, finding its way into Saskatchewan, and that it would be otherwise if there were a power development, the necessity for something being done immediately in this connection is apparent.

The commission was set up composed of Dr. Hogg and two other distinguished gentlemen, Dr. Widtsoe and the president of the Calgary Power whose name I forget. That commission has had its ups and downs, and one chairman was ill. But the postponement and the procrastination that have taken place in connection with this matter are difficult to understand. The minister himself stated more than two years ago that this scheme had been found to be practicable and that there was no doubt as to the potentialities that were apparent in the province provided the plan was gone ahead with. For some reason—apparently the other ministers in the cabinet do not share the view taken by the Minister of Agriculture—the commission is set up. The commission now has been sitting for several months, or at least it has been in the process of sitting from time to time; yet we are apparently no nearer a solution to this problem than we were last year.

I feel that the delegates to this association were justified in the conclusions to which they came and to which the hon. member for Saskatoon made reference. He quoted from the resolutions or the general attitude adopted by the membership of this association; and no one can criticize them for taking the stand they now take, namely that the time has come—to use the words of Dr. Tufts—to take off the kid gloves and let Ottawa know that Saskatchewan is fed up with delays and excuses.

With all the hundreds of millions and billions of dollars being spent for defence and with this being a project that is needed in Saskatchewan, one that will be self-liquidating, one that in the years to come will pay dividends far in excess of any cost, the latest delay or the latest reason for delay, namely that engineers have to be called in to ascertain what the cost would now be, is scarcely in keeping with the kind of action the people of Saskatchewan have the right to expect.

I look back to 1944 and just prior to the election of 1945. Many teams and outfits started to work there. They were in the investigatory stage. After the election we passed to an expenditure of about $1 million a year; but since 1949 there has been nothing but delay. Small expenditures have been made, but we in the province of Saskatchewan certainly believe that the views expressed by the association and by Dr. Tufts are representative of a viewpoint held without regard to party considerations. All we want the minister to know is that we are with him in what he has told us he is endeavouring to do, namely to get this work under way with as little delay as possible.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In reference to the position in Saskatchewan, I would point out that none of us object to bringing as much prosperity as possible to the farms of Saskatchewan. But we are paying a large sum of money in order to indemnify freight from Saskatchewan to the various sources where animals are fed in Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and elsewhere. I want to say that I have a brother in Saskatoon who is feeding 500 cattle. I have another brother in the province of Ontario who is also feeding cattle, either a lesser or a larger number. The one in Ontario receives the benefit of free freight on feed from Saskatchewan to Ontario and is, as it were, in competition with the other brother who, at Saskatoon, at the very source of this feed, is handling his cattle. I say the various parts of our country depend one upon the other. We must remember that a great sum of money is going out from the treasury of Canada to indemnify those who are shipping cheap feed from Saskatchewan to British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: I want to say a word on this item. If I looked at the map for the proposed new constituency of Rosetown-Biggar, I think I could say that probably my constituents will have a still greater interest in it than they have had previously; because if the redistribution is made in the way it seems it is going to be, Rosetown-Biggar will comprise the whole of west central Saskatchewan, and both sides of the great river; thus the irrigation project on the South Saskatchewan river will be almost entirely in the new constituency of Rosetown-Biggar. However, I do not mind that because, as a matter of fact, if this irrigation plan goes through it will irrigate one of the finest sections of Saskatchewan. Already those who have a knowledge of soils and irrigation tell me that the area to be irrigated, or at least 450,000 acres of it, is far above the average in the potential production and fertility usually associated with irrigation projects.

I have always been in favour of this plan and, like the members who have spoken, I hope it will not be delayed further. When the commission was appointed a year ago I was rather surprised at the personnel. This is essentially an irrigation project, with power important perhaps but incidental to it. Whether the development of power on the river is feasible or economic should not in any respect interfere with the carrying out of what is essentially an irrigation project, power being I repeat relatively incidental. I was therefore greatly surprised when only one outstanding irrigation man was included on that commission of three, namely Dr. Widtsoe of Salt Lake City who, as we know, is one of the outstanding authorities on this continent with respect to irrigation projects. The other two gentlemen, Dr. Hogg, the former chairman of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and Mr. Gaherty, president of the Calgary Power Limited, were both primarily interested in electric development. When a project was primarily for irrigation and power was merely incidental thereto, and it was only in the power aspect that any doubt has been cast upon the project, as far as I know, I found it difficult to understand why a commission of that type should have been set up. I should have liked to have seen the commission weighted the other way, namely with two outstanding irrigation men and one power man.

This project has been a long time in prospect. As a matter of fact it was discussed a long time before 1944. I remember distinctly moving a resolution in this house in 1947.

Mr. Gardiner: 1937.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, 1937. I remember moving a resolution in this house dealing with irrigation projects in Saskatchewan—it was during the drought period—and spending quite a little time on the possibility of using the rivers which flow through Saskatchewan and more particularly, of course, the southern branch of the great Saskatchewan river which we know as the South Saskatchewan. This project was in prospect long before that time, of course. There was the Pearce report and the Pearce plan. I have forgotten what year that was but it was in the early part of this century; I believe it was in 1922. I remember the hon. member for Acadia discussing that plan and the irrigation possibilities of these western rivers.

The government may take the attitude that there is not the pressing need for it at the present time because there is plenty of water on the prairies. As a matter of fact I have never seen as much water in the 43 years I have been on the prairies as we have there at the present time. But we all know that the history of the prairies proves that is only a temporary condition, and at some time or other that water will go and the prairies will be subject to dry conditions again.

That has been the history of the prairies; it is to be found recorded in the soils, and if you look at the rings of the trees you can find it written in the trees that grow in the prairie regions. I say to hon. members who are not from the prairies that in my opinion this is one of the great insurance projects for all Canada and the economy of all Canada. By the time this dam is built and the irrigation ditches finished and the country irrigated we may once again enter upon a period of dry years. We do not know, but that has been the history of our prairie country.

I am most anxious to see this project proceeded with. I know it is a considerable project; I know the government and the country must be satisfied that the dam can be built; that the foundations must be such as to carry the dam and keep back the water and see that no seepage underneath will undermine the dam. I say that because I wondered why the minister introduced a doubt in Saskatoon quite recently: warning that in the event of the dam going out the city of Saskatoon would be the one city which would be wiped out.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not introduce that recently. My hon. friend sitting behind the hon. member is able to tell him that I have been saying that for many years.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, this was the first time I had seen it played up to the extent it was played up on June 9 in the city of Saskatoon. It almost looked as though the minister were trying to frighten the people away from the project. That was the way it looked to me when I read the newspaper report. But I am convinced of this, that the engineers who have surveyed the dam site know full well that a dam can be built with perfect safety and with security for the city of Saskatoon, and I have been satisfied that that could be done for a number of years now.

I certainly would like to see the report of the commission tabled in the house so we might know exactly what they had to say about it. I know that one of the reasons for the delay in the report is the illness of Dr. Hogg. Dr. Hogg I was sorry to learn has been apparently in ill health for a very considerable time. If I may say this with all due respect to Dr. Hogg—I know the difficulties the government would have in adopting the suggestion, but I am going to make it—in the interest of this project, if Dr. Hogg is to continue in ill health, extending over a long period of time, he should hand his resignation to the government in order that he might be replaced by someone who could carry forward this investigation, because delay is holding up the development of a whole section of Canada, in this prairie region, a region which has great potential production. Nothing else is holding it up.

I know it was said in this house, and I was rather surprised—I am not blaming the Prime Minister because the answer to the question of the hon. member for Kindersley would have been provided by his advisers—sometime in March that the delay was owing to the fact that the Saskatchewan government had not submitted a brief. Well, I happened to know from the secretary of the commission at that time, whom I met casually a short time before, that it had been agreed with the commission that no further brief was necessary, and that until the public hearings, if they ever were held, were undertaken, nothing more was expected from the government of Saskatchewan. I knew that at the time. I say I knew that from the secretary of the commission, and obtained the information in a casual conversation. Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, that these excuses will no longer hold water. What we want is the dam to hold water, and I have no doubt that if the dam were built, it would hold water. As the hon. member for —is it still Lake Centre?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: As the hon. member for Lake Centre indicated a few moments ago the demonstration that has been prepared at Outlook has illustrated what irrigation will mean to the area. Incidentally, the town of Outlook was across the river from the rest of my constituency in 1935; and I always wondered why it was included in Rosetown-Biggar at that time. Well, now it will be right in the very centre of the constituency because of the manner in which it is to be enlarged, so I shall have a beautiful garden in the middle of my constituency to demonstrate the feasibility and desirability of the South Saskatchewan river scheme.

When the minister rises I hope he will answer the request of the hon. member for Lethbridge and give us the information requested; but most of all I hope he will be able to tell us that the final report is about to be made, and that when the report is made—I hope it will be a satisfactory one—the appropriations will be made to proceed with this project.

It is quite true, as the hon. member for Lake Centre said a few moments ago, that we can find billions of dollars when we have to, and we have to find billions of dollars, for defence. I am not criticizing that; but when we have to find it for defence we can find those billions of dollars. Here is a plan which is a defence plan too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And self-liquidating.

Mr. Coldwell: And self-liquidating, not a wasting expense as defence expenditures usually are. It is a self-liquidating defence plan, a defence plan against what? Against possible drought and impoverishment of a large section of the country, and needed in the production of quantities of food—and food may in the long run be the very best means of defence the democratic world can find in this period of the world's history. Therefore I want to join not only with members of the Conservative party and my own party and the Social Credit party, but I am quite sure with many members of the minister's own party, in urging the immediate undertaking of this great irrigation project in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Drew: Before the minister speaks on this I wish to add some comments to what has been said about this project. I do so because I think it would be unfortunate if the impression were unintentionally conveyed that this is something of interest only to the people of Saskatchewan. It is something of very great interest to the people of the whole of Canada.

One of the subjects that have been causing hon. members some concern in the past few days is the impact of the reduction of population in the province of Saskatchewan. That has been partly the result of changing methods of agricultural production with the effect of greater mechanization, but also it has been very largely the result of the failure to deal with this problem years ago. Look at the areas where there has been a heavy reduction of population, and you will find some of the greatest reductions in the very area that would have been served by this irrigation project if it had been undertaken some fifteen years ago when it was first proposed and first regarded as a satisfactory project.

When I say this is something of concern to every member of the house and to every Canadian, I do so at a time when members are asked to regard the St. Lawrence deep waterway as a subject of interest to every Canadian. Those who live in the area where the most immediate benefit from the St. Lawrence deep waterway and power project would be felt ask the people from other parts of Canada to regard this as a national project, and not one that would be of interest only to that part of the country which will benefit most directly from the result of what is done in the area, at very considerable cost to all Canadian taxpayers.

May I say that the St. Lawrence project has been regarded in that light. I would like to see every member of the House of Commons regard the South Saskatchewan development in the same light, as a development which should be undertaken not only in the interests of Saskatchewan but in the interests of Canada as a whole, and as part of the general development of this country.

Having said that I do wish to emphasize the fact that this is naturally a subject of very great concern to the people of Saskatchewan living in that area. I am however impressed with the difference in the approach to this subject as compared with the approach to the St. Lawrence deep waterway. This government has committed itself irrevocably to the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway and the development of the power projects associated with it, although there are still uncertainties as to all the details connected with the carrying out of that immense project at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. The government expressed no unwillingness to commit the Canadian taxpayers as a whole to this project, though it was clear that there were certain details still to be worked out. They recognized the principle as sound, and the government and members of the house have committed themselves to the fulfilment of the project, though certain details must still be carried out.

Mr. Low: To the tune of $800 million.

Mr. Drew: I believe that long ago the House of Commons should have been given the opportunity to express its acceptance of the principle of this project, and should then have said to the engineers, "This job needs to be done." I am not saying that any project of this kind should be undertaken recklessly or without adequate consideration. We have had adequate engineering advice to the effect that this is a sound project.

First of all, there is clear evidence to be seen by anyone who visits that part of the country that this irrigation area, now almost a dust-bowl, can become one of the most productive agricultural areas in Canada. It has already been pointed out that near Outlook there is an experimental area which has been irrigated. In that area one will see as rich production and as fresh growth as can be seen anywhere in Canada. In that area one can see evidence of what irrigation of this kind would mean.

I do not want to take issue with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in anything he has said, because I agree with the general views he expressed. But there is one feature of this project that I believe requires emphasis. While the first concern, naturally, is the restoration of the productive capacity of the soil in that area, and to that extent irrigation is the primary consideration, it should be remembered that it will only be with electrical power that the irrigation can be carried out. It will take a very substantial part—perhaps a third or a half—of the primary electrical power to carry out the full project, and to provide the power for the pumping stations which will be needed to carry the water to the most distant points. Of course I admit that other types of power could be employed, fuel oil or gas, perhaps. But the project I have heard discussed when I have visited that area, and the plans I have seen, have been based upon the use of electrical power for the irrigation project itself.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not wish to be misunderstood; what I meant was that primarily this is an irrigation project.

Mr. Drew: As I said, I am not taking issue with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I was simply pointing out that the development of power is an essential feature of this development, unless fuel oil or natural gas were employed for that purpose. Conceivably at some time that might be a desirable development; but in the first instance it would seem that electrical energy is the most economical method of carrying out this development.

I do not claim expert knowledge beyond the fact that I have been associated with some decisions connected with power development of one kind or another, but I think it is safe to say that there are few places in Canada today where construction would be easier in connection with the erection of a dam for holding back the water for purposes of irrigation, and also for the provision of the necessary headwaters for the production of power in that area.

As I understand it, the engineers have agreed on a site where a dam can be constructed satisfactorily. There are no great rock cuts; there are no diversions of rivers or anything of that kind involved. It is a straight filling proposition between even river banks, one of the simplest engineering projects that could be imagined for the purpose of carrying out this great undertaking.

I am convinced that those who have been associated with the advancement of this project over the years have been working on a perfectly sound basis. Dr. Tufts, at Outlook, who has headed the local organization, has at all times spoken with moderation in regard to the project, and has at all times, along with those associated with him, sought to rely upon expert engineering reports in the proposals he has made. I mention this now because, while the effect of anything that is done will naturally be felt immediately by the people of Saskatchewan, I think all of us in the house should regard it as the responsibility of Canada as a whole, and we should ask the government to commit itself without further delay to the decision to proceed with this project. There is plenty of evidence that it is a sound project, and the engineering details can be worked out by those who are entrusted with the fulfilment of the undertaking.

Mr. St. Laurent: The government will not commit itself to this project until there has been a report that it is sound economically, and that it would be a proper investment of the money of the people of Canada. But if that is established—and I hope it will be established, as I have said before in the house—I think it is a project that is not merely in the interests of Saskatchewan but is in the interests of the Canadian nation.

There have been many engineering reports that it is physically possible to build a dam there that will stand, although it is a very high earthen embankment that is required, and not just as simple as the leader of the opposition, in his remarks, would represent it to be. There have been engineering reports upon it, and it has been established to our satisfaction that it is physically possible as an engineering proposition.

There remains the question as to whether that would be a proper capital investment for the people to make in view of its cost and the benefits to be derived from it. With respect to the production of electrical power there is still a question as to whether it could be produced more economically from the water that would thus be stored up or from low-grade fuels which are abundant in that part of Canada. That is a question upon which the leader of the opposition may have an opinion based upon data available to him; I have not. I have seen the reports made by those who hold conflicting views upon it, and I am not in position to form an opinion as to whether it would be better to produce hydro power or to use low-grade fuel to produce the same amount of electricity.

There is a considerable area that it is considered would be made much more productive. I do not remember the exact acreage, but I know it is substantial. It would represent a capital cost of many dollars per acre to provide the necessary reservoir. But I do not think that should frighten us. When our ancestors went ahead and built a railroad across the continent from one ocean to the other there were those who said that it would never earn its axle grease, but I think events have proved that that kind of investment and the spirit of adventure that made that investment possible was the kind of thing that has brought Canada to the position we enjoy today.

Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the speech from the throne in the session preceding this session three projects of national importance were put forward and lumped together. There was the St. Lawrence seaway project which will run into a large sum of money. A major portion of the hundreds of millions required for that project will be devoted to the production of hydroelectric power. I have been informed by reliable sources that the production of that power will mean to the people of Ontario, over and above the interest and amortization and the cost of operation of the hydroelectric plant, a saving of at least $25 million per year when compared with the cost of producing power by any other means that would be available.

The other half of the hydroelectric development will be paid for and taken care of by the agency to be appointed by the government of the United States to develop its share of the waterpower available. There will still be two or three hundred million dollars required to provide a seaway through the reservoir that will have been created for hydroelectric purposes. That is a lot, but I do not think that scheme is any more venturesome in this day than was the construction 75 years ago of a transcontinental railroad.

The second scheme put forward at the same time was the Canso causeway. The industrial development of central Canada has been more rapid and spectacular than that of the maritime provinces, but I think the portion of the maritime provinces which offers perhaps the best possibilities for large-scale development of natural resources is Cape Breton island. Though a causeway will be a costly undertaking I think it is of national interest to link Cape Breton island to the rest of Canada in such a way that its potentialities can be developed to the fullest extent.

The third project was the South Saskatchewan river project. This is of particular interest to the central prairies, but it is also of interest to the whole of Canada to have Canada developed in such a manner that there will be no depressed areas in this country.

These three projects appear to fill out the picture, because we know what huge developments are taking place in British Columbia; we know what huge developments are taking place in Alberta; we know what developments are in prospect in northern Manitoba for the promotion of which authority was given at the last session of parliament to the Canadian National Railways to construct a line of railway. I think all members of this house realize that these projects, though located in particular areas, are of national importance if they are sound and if we can get evidence reasonable men will accept that they constitute a proper investment of the capital of this country.

I hope this commission will find that the South Saskatchewan project would constitute a proper investment of the amount of capital required to bring it into existence. If it does there will be a commitment by this government, and I am sure there would be a commitment by any government in office, to carry out the project provided there are satisfactory reports that will justify us in saying to the people of Canada, "We think this is sound, and we think the future will demonstrate that this is going to help to maintain our agricultural development in balance with our industrial development."

Our population has increased two and a half times in the last fifty years; from five and a quarter millions it has become 14 millions and is increasing now as rapidly as at any time this century. This means that at the end of the century there will be no less than 35 million people for whom the country will have to provide agricultural sustenance. That means that agriculture will have to be able to produce from the same areas two or three times as much as it is producing at the present time.

I am sure all those who envisage the future of this country with the confidence which I think our resources warrant would wish to see all sound capital investment made that will do for the generations to come what the investment made by our forefathers have done for us, the Canadians of this year 1952.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I think this has been the finest debate I have heard in this house on the subject of the South Saskatchewan river project. I was delighted to hear both the leader of the opposition and the right hon. Prime Minister express views on the subject tonight. It seems to me that in their cogent statements can be found great comfort and hope for the people, not only of Saskatchewan but of all Canada, who have been wanting to see this great project completed at the earliest possible time. I want merely to stand as a sort of second witness to some of the things that have been said—not, Mr. Chairman, to take time unnecessarily but because I believe what I have to say will be quite important and quite pertinent to the subject under discussion.

I am glad to see the Minister of Finance here tonight because some of the things I have to say are going to be directed right to him. He is the main person on the treasury board and I want him to pay particular attention to one or two things I shall have to say.

We in the province of Alberta, Mr. Chairman, have proved the value of irrigation in the west. We started in that province as far back as 1889, and I have witnessed in my lifetime what can happen to a farm on that very dry Palliser triangle when water is applied to it. I have also witnessed—and this bears out what the Prime Minister said a moment ago—the development of a small scheme in southern Alberta where the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company in 1889 built a project at its own expense, settled the area, colonized, developed and eventually practically gave the whole project to the settlers, because they found that settlement and development was contributing so much to their traffic and freight income that it was possible for them to do that very thing.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Chairman, Brigham Young was a hundred years too soon.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. Low: You were a hundred years too late. My hon. friend from Cariboo must be feeling pretty good again tonight, but I can appreciate that and I can shake off his remarks.

I also saw the Canadian Pacific Railway develop a project in central Alberta, colonize it and eventually hand it over to the settlers for the sum of $1; and in addition they gave those settlers a considerable sum of money—if I remember correctly it was pushing up to half a million dollars in cash—to help them. finance the works and so on that in time were expected to be completed. If they could do that it simply evidences what the Prime Minister has already said; that the cost of development of these great national projects to strengthen our production can be reaped many times over in the revenue received by the railways, by the federal treasury, and in a good many instances by business concerns.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said we have demonstrated all that. Although the province of Alberta has had to carry some pretty heavy costs in the past that was due to the fact that up until comparatively recently there was no such thing as an agreement between the provinces and the dominion for sharing the costs of irrigation. In Alberta the Lethbridge northern irrigation district was formed in 1918 or 1919, if I remember correctly. I recall only too well the history of that project and what it involved. As I remember, it cost them $50 an acre of irrigable land to build the project. That cost was presumed to have been attached to the land itself and the settlers were supposed to be able to pay the capital cost and to make out in time from the profit.

Mr. Laing: Is that the E.I.D.?

Mr. Low: No, that is up in central Alberta. I am speaking about the Lethbridge northern irrigation district in and around the city of Lethbridge.

The government of the province of Alberta had to guarantee the bonds of the Lethbridge northern irrigation district to the full extent of the $50 an acre cost. It was about 1919 or 1920 that they got under way. The bonds were sold under a guarantee of the province; but, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the fact that the land was good, that the system itself was good, that the works were excellent and that the farmers put on the land learned quickly how to use the water, it took a good many years before that project began to return sufficient to the settlers that they could pay off the indebtedness; and then not until the province of Alberta finally took over and assumed the full cost of the project they had guaranteed. Since that date they have been paying interest on the bonds and paying off the bonds—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When did this land come into production and what was the state of prices at that time? Did they come in at a bad year?

Mr. Low: No, the land began to come under ditches in about 1925, if I remember correctly, and that would be in the heyday of the buoyancy of this country. It is the Lethbridge northern I am speaking about; and at that time it was presumed that the total value of the land, including the $50 per acre cost of putting the water on it, would be approximately $100 to $125 an acre. Well, the settlers were presumed to be able to pay the $100 to $125 an acre, but it was demonstrated for at least some years in the hard times that they could not do so. If I remember correctly, about 1933 or 1934 it was necessary for the government of the province to assume the indebtedness against the project and start paying the interest on the bonds themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that project will cost the government of the province of Alberta, before they are finished with it, $11 to $12 million, I believe; but it has proved its value many times over and the province does not regret the dollars they have spent on it. The project has become a wealthy project that is producing in tremendous abundance and does contribute immeasurably to the stability of our province. The Picture Butte sugar refinery is built on that project and is producing something like 100 million pounds of sugar per year. That in itself, together with the auxiliary industries like the feed industry in that area, makes it a very important project indeed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for this. Eventually the federal government came to realize that these irrigation schemes were national development projects, and they are now recognizing that fact more than ever. The Prime Minister informed us of that tonight when speaking of the South Saskatchewan dam. But it has taken some years to come to that point of view, and now in the province of Alberta we have one or two fairly large schemes under way that are based upon a contribution of about 50 per cent federal and 50 per cent provincial money. That is all to the good and we in Alberta are not complaining about it. In fact we are very thankful that the Minister of Agriculture and his associates in the dominion government have seen fit to value those projects highly enough that they will contribute 50 per cent of the cost.

There is just one thing I would like to say by way of encouragement to my friends in Saskatchewan. I want to see Saskatchewan get that project on the South Saskatchewan river as quickly as they can because I know what it will do for their province and for the rest of Canada as a whole. We in the province of Alberta have recognized so fully the value of that project to Saskatchewan and to the west that we have been prepared for some years to share our waters that rise on the eastern slopes of the Rockies in our province. We have already arranged that allocation of water through an agreement made with the federal government in 1948.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize this important point. I suspect that one of the things that may—I am not saying will but may—hold that project up or delay it, and I am speaking now of the Outlook project for irrigation and power production in Saskatchewan, is that the federal government may insist on an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan on a fifty-fifty cost basis.

While it is perfectly true that in Alberta we have been making out quite successfully under a fifty-fifty arrangement on the Lethbridge southeastern and other projects, we feel that this project in Saskatchewan is not only a national development project but in some respects, Mr. Chairman, a reimbursement project. When I say that I mean that for a good many years Saskatchewan has been shouldering a heavy burden of cost as a consequence of dominion settlement policies prior to 1931 when the resources were handed over to that province. The people of the province were carrying the burden even before it was organized in 1905. I think the hon. member for Lethbridge made that quite clear when he described the Palliser triangle settlement and the problems involved as a consequence of that rather blind policy, as it seemed to me under the circumstances.

I want to declare my conviction that Saskatchewan should not be required to bear half of the cost of the Outlook project as is required under national development projects, some of which we have in Alberta and some of which are elsewhere in this country. I say that for this reason. The Saskatchewan economy simply cannot under present circumstances carry that 50 per cent of the cost. I am convinced of that. Let us look at three important reasons why I say that. In the first place, remember that Saskatchewan has largely a prairie wheat economy, even today. That has been so ever since Saskatchewan was known; therefore the province carries all the disability of such an economy. It has good years when production is at the very peak, and years when the rainfall is bad, when wind, grasshoppers and drought cause poor crop conditions. At such times the economy of the province can hardly carry the ordinary services of government. I say that is a great disability.

The second reason Saskatchewan could not be expected to carry 50 per cent of the cost of that tremendous scheme, which I understand will be something like $100 million, is that the province is already carrying tremendous burdens by reason of its geography, population and so on. Let me give you one or two illustrations that help explain what I mean. In Saskatchewan today the number of miles of highway the province has to build and maintain per thousand of population is 169. Please note that, 169 miles of highway in Saskatchewan has to be built and maintained per thousand of population. How does that compare with Ontario for example? Ontario has to build and maintain 20 miles of highway per thousand of population. I understand that 38 per cent—I believe that is close to being correct —of all the surveyed roads can be found in Saskatchewan, and there is only 7 per cent of the population. I am getting plenty of help from those around me, Mr. Chairman, and that indicates the importance of this subject.

Mr. Darroch: Do you live in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Low: I am a neighbour of Saskatchewan, and I love those people, just as I love the people of Ontario. I want to see them get along. Saskatchewan, Mr. Chairman, has 850 per cent more miles of highway per thousand people than Ontario, and 400 per cent more than Canada generally. Just think of that for a little while, and then imagine the burden upon the economy of a province with less than 800,000 people. Those figures are correct, and if hon. members will take the time to look them up they will see that is true.

The same sort of illustration is provided by the telephone lines. The miles of telephone wire that have to be maintained per telephone unit in that province is 5 22/100, as compared with Ontario's 4 31/100. The acreage for the province of Saskatchewan compared to the population is 60·4, while in the province of Ontario it is only 6·6. Those figures tell a story; they indicate something of the terrific burden the people of that province do have to carry financially. I could go on and give innumerable examples of the burdens the province has to carry.

Let me point out, Mr. Chairman, a third reason why I feel Saskatchewan cannot possibly be expected to pay 50 per cent of the total cost of the project. There is a comparatively small population in this very large area, and they have a total budget of only $66 million a year to carry all the services for their people, pay interest on their debt, the amortization of the debt itself, and build public works and other projects. This $66 million is about equivalent to $33 million, as of the 1939 value of the dollar. This does not indicate very much in the way of financial resources.

Let us not forget this. If the population of that province is ever to be materially increased, that increase must be stimulated by industrialization and by large irrigation projects such as we are discussing right now. If the Outlook project is built we shall find the population of Saskatchewan going up very quickly, I have no doubt about that. Industrialization will proceed much more quickly than it has in the past.

I have given reasons, Mr. Chairman, why I feel that when it comes time to make a deal with Saskatchewan we ought to take into consideration those facts I have presented. I believe we should not feel that we have established a pattern by asking the province of Saskatchewan to pay 50 per cent of the total cost of the irrigation projects in that province. I think perhaps we have been fortunate in being in a position to carry our 50 per cent. I do not believe we should impose that sort of agreement on the province of Saskatchewan.

I do not want to take too much of the time of the committee tonight, but I did want to present that case because I am genuinely interested in the extension and development of irrigation in this country. I want to see Saskatchewan enjoy the benefits we have enjoyed in Alberta for years, but for which we have paid rather dearly.

Mr. Gardiner: I believe the hon. member for Lethbridge performed a real service for the committee and the country in general by giving two days' notice of this debate. In this house we have a general rule to the effect that anything we want to bring up should have two days' notice. Usually it turns out to be a fair sort of rule, and one that is most helpful. At no time has it been any more helpful than on this occasion. Although it is not just in accordance with the rules, we did have two days' notice of the discussion. The other day the member for Lethbridge suggested that we have a statement on the larger irrigation projects during this discussion, and at that time I said it should be made on item 45. We have been two days in reaching item 45, and we have had the discussion.

Two things have come out of the discussion which I think are most helpful, not only in connection with this debate but in connection with another very important debate that has been taking place. The first is that at least one member from the province of Saskatchewan is satisfied with his constituency in the redistribution.

Mr. Coldwell: Who is that?

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Coldwell: I am happy to have the river in my constituency.

Mr. Gardiner: He expects that the proposed dam, if it is built, will be in about the centre of his constituency. I of course hope that by the time it is built it will not be his constituency; nevertheless it is a good constituency in any case.

In addition to that, I think we have had tonight a fair demonstration of the advantage of not being in too much of a hurry. I have stated before in the house that I have been attempting to promote the South Saskatchewan river dam for the greater part of ten years now. The only objection I make to the statements that are referred to here from time to time in connection with speeches I have made is this. I do not object to anyone saying that the speeches have been eloquent, though I have not tried to make them eloquent. I do not object to anyone demonstrating that he remembers the speeches after they have been made. I certainly object, however, to anyone adding a little bit to them and saying I have ever promised anything in connection with them.

Those with whom I have been dealing, both in Alberta and in Saskatchewan, in connection with irrigation will, I think, be the first to say that I have never promised anything. I have continuously worked along with them to try to get everyone to the point where there will be acceptance of what we are proposing, and then to have it done. I have done my best at all times to promote the idea that the South Saskatchewan river dam is something that is worth while and ought to be constructed. I agree with those who have said that it was demonstrated about two years ago—perhaps it is a little more than two years ago—that the dam could be built with safety to Saskatoon and other areas, and it was in explaining that it has been well established that the question was discussed in Saskatoon recently.

No later than during the last two months the final conclusions were reached in connection with that matter, through discussions which took place with some of the foremost engineers. Those discussions took place in Washington. The engineers were gathered from various points in the United States. What I agreed to do the other day was give a short outline of what we call the larger irrigation projects in western Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: As to that meeting in Washington the other day, has a report been issued? Is it available?

Mr. Gardiner: I am coming back to that matter in a minute or two. First, I want to cover the four projects.

Mr. Coldwell: All right.

Mr. Gardiner: What I agreed to do the other day was give a short outline of what we call the large irrigation projects in western Canada. About nine or ten years ago we started out to make a systematic survey of the water projects in the west, and more particularly those associated with the Saskatchewan river system. Out of those investigations we developed four projects, three of them in Alberta and one in Saskatchewan. The one in Alberta that has had the greatest amount of publicity has been the St. Mary dam project. Behind the St. Mary dam is another one known as the Waterton dam which is still to be constructed and which we must construct if we are going to have made available a sufficient amount of water for the other projects which are being discussed from time to time in western Canada. We have already undertaken that that is a part of that project, when completed, and is associated with the international relationships in connection with water.

The St. Mary dam itself has been built at a cost of about $12 million, in round figures, with connecting ditches between that and the storages all through the area that is to be irrigated. The province has undertaken to arrange for the expenditure of a similar amount of money to complete the ditches and storages throughout what is known as the irrigation district. That irrigation district extends roughly from the neighbourhood of Taber, I think, on toward Medicine Hat. The result of the operations, when completed, will be that some 500,000 acres of land, or something approaching that figure, will be under irrigation.

One has only to travel from Medicine Hat to Lethbridge, either by air or by car, at this time of year in order to realize just what that irrigation has meant up until now. One passes over a road allowance near Taber, and one would think that one is in an entirely different country or in an entirely different area. The growth is great. The industry in the towns and villages is far more than comparable with that which can be found in some of the areas farther south where rainfall makes possible similar development. If one flies over it, one is moved to the conclusion that at least three times as many people live where the irrigation is as live where there is no irrigation.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: To fly over the farm homes and villages in that area makes one feel that even the one-third of the people who are in the less densely populated area are too many for that area. They are not living under conditions which people should be living under. Immediately water is put on the land these people benefit to an extent that one who has not seen it can scarcely realize. I only want to say that much with regard to the matter in order to emphasize the fact that it is a good thing for a country to be irrigated, irrespective of what the cost may be.

As has been suggested, the general cost of getting that land under water is something over $50. It is about $54. It stands to reason that the farmer who is going to live on the land is not in a position to pay that cost in addition to paying for the land, and for those other costs of operation, and paying taxation in connection with the building of roads and all that kind of thing. He is just not in a position to do that. It has therefore been thought that some authority ought to take some responsibility for it.

Some years ago—back in 1941 or 1942, I think it was—we had a report made. It was called the Meek report. That report was compiled by five or six individuals, some of whom were engineers. A few moments ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested that he was somewhat at a loss to know why the men who had been selected to be on the committee which is now investigating should have been chosen. This is all I am going to say about it at the moment; I will say a little more about it later.

One of the men, namely Mr. Gaherty, was on that committee. He was one of those who reported in favour of the irrigation schemes that are being developed or that are being talked about out in western Canada. He therefore has had experience which is of some value. There is not much need for discussing the St. Mary project any further than that. We have spent about $12 million on it. The province is in the process of spending about an equal amount in order to get water on the land that is now being irrigated through the building of the St. Mary dam, and it will be necessary to spend another few million in order to put in the Waterton dam in order to provide further waters for utilization through that system.

The next system that has been under consideration is the Bow river. That is an old project which was started through the investment of British capital. Some $13 million were spent by a British company in order to start irrigation in that country. They started out with the idea that they could make the farmers pay all the money back. At one time they thought they could get them to pay $75 an acre. They realized before very long that they were just driving people off the land by attempting that. Later on they reduced it to the neighbourhood of $50 an acre, and still it was too much. Finally they got it down to $27 an acre, and I think they are still asking them to pay $27.

My opinion is that prior to the war it was impossible for these farmers to pay $27 an acre. None of them was clearing his land. But the last time I was there and discussed it with them about half had their land absolutely clear as a result of the fact that we have had high prices and high production during the war period and since. But even when one went there three or four years ago and took a look at that area one was disappointed. When one compared that with what one would see down around Taber and in that country one was disappointed, because the surroundings of the homes were not very much better than they were out on the dry lands of the prairie country. The reason was that too much was being taken out of the persons who were living on the land, and they were not able to maintain their homes in the way they should be maintained.

To make a long story short, the government decided to buy out the interest of those who had been in the project before. We paid $2,225,000 for it, and we are improving the ditches. We are now developing or levelling the lands and making it possible for people to settle on some 40,000 acres more in that area; and we are bringing the people to settle on it from the lands that we are developing into pastures elsewhere, in order to take them off dry land.

That development is going along and I do not need to say any more about it than that we had financial arrangement from the beginning with the Alberta governments with whom we started to make agreements; and it is written into our correspondence in connection with those agreements that we would develop first the St. Mary project; that is, we would put in the storages in the St. Mary project; that we would adopt the same method and develop the Canada Land and Irrigation or the Bow river project. I should say before leaving that, that associated with it are some lands that the province is developing, as well as the lands which we are developing, and the number of people who will be served by that is much greater than the number we are placing on the land.

Well, then, there is the third project in the province of Alberta that has been fully investigated, and that we would be in a position to proceed with at any time if it were once determined that those projects are going to be gone ahead with; that is the Red Deer project. The lands that we are concerned with are largely around Hanna. Some 400,000 or 500,000 acres of land in that project could be irrigated. I am not going into the details as to how it could be done. Dams would have to be built; siphons would have to be built; ditches would have to be dug in order to take the water down closer to the area, and the costs could be on about the same basis as they are down in the St. Mary area. The costs there work out at about 50 per cent by the province and about 50 per cent by the federal government if we once undertake to go ahead with the project in co-operation with the provincial government. The costs of that project would be considerably less than the St. Mary dam project.

There is one difficulty about the discussion of the question recently, and it is that some of those who have been discussing the matter, and some of those who have been placing it before this commission that has been sitting have again started to discuss the old Pearce scheme of years ago. That was a scheme I heard discussed when I became a minister seventeen years ago and went to Hanna. At a public meeting that was being held that scheme was still being talked about. That scheme envisages the digging of an open ditch from Hanna to Saskatoon, about 500 miles long, through country much of which is sandy, where there would be great leakage of water from the ditch out over the areas, and where the costs of getting the water down there would be very great.

To make a long story short, at that meeting the engineers who were present convinced themselves and convinced everyone there that we should drop the idea of the Pearce scheme, of this ditch running all the way to Saskatoon and irrigating not only 500,000 acres of land at Hanna but some million acres of land between that and Saskatoon, including the lands now spoken of in connection with the South Saskatchewan river. But unfortunately a few parties have started talking about that project all over again, and putting it forward as something that would get better results than putting in the South Saskatchewan river project. I want to say that so far as I am concerned, and so far as the people of western Canada are concerned, I think we were convinced long ago that that was not a project which was feasible. They are still convinced of that, and are not asking the government here or the government of Saskatchewan to proceed with a project of that kind. Therefore I suggest we are pretty well convinced that the Red Deer project could be carried out. It is a possibility, and the expenditure there is not sufficiently high to warrant anyone saying there is any question about it from any point of view except irrigation; that from the irrigation point of view it is as feasible a scheme as the St. Mary or the Bow river project.

The South Saskatchewan is in a different class. In the first place it is much more costly. We are talking about $25 million in the St. Mary; we are talking about $12 million or $15 million in the Bow river; we are talking about a similar amount on the Red Deer. But when you come to the South Saskatchewan project it is at least $103 million. There is some question as to whether it can be done at the present time for $103 million. In 1947 it was estimated by engineers that it could be done for $103 million. Some people say it could not be done for that now. In any case, it would take ten years to construct. One cannot be sure whether costs will be up or down over the ten years, but in any event it will cost at least $103 million, and that is a lot of money.

It has been suggested that we have the wrong type of individuals on the commission that is investigating the whole matter. It has been suggested also that probably it was not necessary to investigate the whole matter. I should like to say that I am fairly well convinced—I am convinced—that the dam can be built. I am convinced that the engineers we have developed over the years in connection with this kind of work are the best engineers in Canada at least, the best engineers that can be found anywhere to deal with water development. As a matter of fact I think they are the only engineers that have the ability, because of their experience and training, either to examine into or to give a final answer to the question whether a dam can be built and what the results of building a dam would be in so far as that area is concerned. But we were not satisfied to rely upon these men, and so we went down to the United States and got three of the best engineers that are known, one of them being Mr. Ferguson, who was associated with the building of large dams down there, and associated with the army throughout the war. Another was a professor at Harvard university, who is the best authority in the United States on such matters. Another was an engineer in the city of Chicago, who has been associated with these larger projects. We got the opinions of those men two years ago with regard to the feasibility of the dam, and there was not any question about their opinions. There was no question in their minds. Well, it was those men who were approached in Washington a short time ago, and they have again given opinions just as strong as or stronger than they gave two years ago; and their opinions of two years ago are on the record.

It has been said that we ought to have a different type of men on the commission. I would just like to say that men are not as easily got at the present time as they were some years ago. Some people wondered why it took us so long to get the commission set up. We tried to get—and when I say "we" I mean the government did—four of the top-notch engineers in the United States and, one at a time, offered to appoint them. The first of those who were recommended did not find it possible to take it on. Then when that one did not find it possible to do it, he recommended still another one, until we had been in touch with the four of them.

It took some considerable time to give these men the opportunity to determine whether or not they would take the position. Finally they all turned it down. They said they had other work which was taking up all their time, and for that reason they could not take on this work. So eventually we got back to using Canadian engineers, in so far as the power end of it was concerned. So we have two men. And, as has been said by others, one of them became sick early in the year. He had two or three operations and was not able to get back on the job until April. So that accounts for some of the delay.

Mr. Coldwell: Is he back on the job now?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, and he has been back since April. That, as I say, accounts for some of the delay. But may I say that what we have heard tonight is an indication that that time was not wasted. I think the leader of the opposition will be the first to agree that when he went out west at first, after having been chosen leader of his party, he stated to the press that he was not informed with regard to the matter, and on that occasion he did not discuss it very freely. He went back later and became better acquainted with it, and on that occasion discussed it more freely.

More recently he has been stating quite openly that he is in favour of the construction of that dam. Others have taken a similar position; some had taken it before, and some have taken it since. But the most hopeful fact of all was what the Prime Minister said tonight. I think if hon. members will go back over the story they will realize that was not a new sentiment expressed by the Prime Minister. Before he became Prime Minister he expressed exactly the same opinion with regard to the St. Lawrence and related to it the South Saskatchewan river project, as he did tonight. He expressed that opinion in the city of Quebec, I believe it was, a year or two before he became Prime Minister. Since that time, on every occasion he has discussed the question he has shown sympathy with the idea.

But at the same time, being at the head of the government of the country, and the one who must take the responsibility eventually for any expenditures made, he has taken the position that we ought to remove any doubt with regard to the matter, if it can possibly be removed, before undertaking the project itself. I have not been inclined to hurry the Prime Minister or to hurry other members of the government, as they will agree. I have been inclined to say that I am still convinced myself that the project is a good project; I am still convinced that it would be one of the most helpful things for the people of Saskatchewan that could possibly be done by this government; and, through the people of Saskatchewan, also most helpful to the people of all Canada.

At the same time I must admit that what the Prime Minister said tonight was that some question had been raised as to whether the most feasible way of developing power is by developing it from water. That idea was not raised by our engineers; it was raised by an engineer engaged by the provincial government; and let me say that I am not criticizing them for engaging him. We get all the information we can in all these matters. Nevertheless he did raise the question whether the power could not be developed more cheaply from coal than through the damming up of these waters. He even raised the question of gas, too, which arose from the fact that gas was found in the neighbourhood of Rosetown, and it was thought possible even at the time he was making his report that that might be a possibility. Gas has been found there, and it has been suggested that it might be used for the purpose.

But what those of us who are in favour of the dam have been saying persistently and consistently is that it does not make any difference how you get the power; it does not make any difference whether you have power from the water that is there, or whether you have power from coal, or whether you have power from gas, or whether you get all the power you require from oil. The fact is that the power is not any good in that country unless you get water first. There has to be water before there can be any industry. It does not matter whether there is power or not. You cannot put industry in an area where there is no possibility of having a water supply. That would be not only for the purpose of developing power, but for the purpose of supplying water for all the uses to which water would be put in industry.

So we have always contended that the lake must be there. After that we have said power can be developed from that lake, and that the development of the power itself could be charged up to the land that is going to be irrigated. What the report actually does say is that if you charge the proper amount of the cost up to the power that will be developed, then the cost that will be charged against the irrigated land is almost exactly the same as the cost that is charged up in the Lethbridge area, and that is about $54 an acre. So the contention is that the dam should be built and the power should be developed. One of the reasons for having on the committee men who are associated with the development of power is to satisfy everyone that that is a possibility.

When you have satisfied them that it is a possibility, there is still one other question. Is the development of industry which would be associated with the development of power and the finding of gas, and everything else associated with it that is made possible by having a lake in the middle of the area, something that is worth while for the people of this country? I must say that is one feature which the Prime Minister emphasized tonight. He hoped the result of the investigation would be such that we could all come to the conclusion that that is a fact, that the putting of a dam there and the making of a lake 145 miles long and 180 feet deep in the middle of an area short of water practically all the year round, and one year after the other. would be helpful to the whole of the Dominion of Canada. Once convinced of that, then he has suggested to us that there would not be any question, no matter what government is in power, as to whether that project would be proceeded with.

So I say the time has been well taken, first by the hon. member for Lethbridge bringing up the question at the beginning of the debate and, secondly, through the discussion we have had tonight. I think the time has been well taken, too, in having the question so carefully looked into. I am not sure that I want to hurry the commissioners; I am not sure what they would say if they were hurried too much. I want the commissioners before they report to have all the facts in front of them and to have the views of people right across Canada as to what they think about it. To hear men talking as they have talked here tonight, saying that other parts of Canada are just as much concerned with having this dam built as we in Saskatchewan, is worth all the waiting anyone has done. The more they keep on saying it, the better it will be. I remember when Mr. MacNicol used to sit over there. He never let a session go by without hammering into all of us that the most important thing to do in so far as the west was concerned was to utilize every drop of water that could be obtained in this country. It is nice to know that after he has gone there are others who are taking up the cudgels and saying the same thing.

Some suggestion was made in the editorial read a while ago that I may have said in Saskatoon that the reason we have delayed is the expenditures upon defence. The reason I did not say that was that I did not think it was true. That is not the reason there was delay. No one has ever said to me that is the reason why there was delay in connection with this. The suggestion has been that we want to be absolutely certain, first that the dam could be put there and kept there, which I think is pretty clearly established now; and second, that when it was put there the water would be utilized for irrigation purposes by the farmers who were on the land in that area. When we know that situation exists we will hope the project will be a good thing for all Canada.

Something has been said with regard to what the department has done in connection with an experimental farm. There is a small quarter section farm near where the dam will be which has been demonstrating what irrigation can do. I do not place as much importance upon that as do some who have spoken. It has been known for a long time that if you can put water on the land in western Canada it will grow more than any other land I know of in the world and in a shorter period of time. If we did pump water and distribute it on the land with sprays it was more to indicate to the people the methods they will have to follow if irrigation is brought in. They would then know in advance what they would have to do and be ready to go ahead immediately the project was under way. I am quite sure the discussion which has taken place will be helpful, and I hope that what has been said tonight will give some encouragement to those who have been hoping for the completion of this project.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised to hear the minister say that certain people in Alberta are advocating the Pearce scheme in the place of the Red Deer project. That certainly is not the desire of the people in the Hanna area.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not use the term "Alberta". I said some people out west. I was not thinking in terms of Alberta.

Mr. Quelch: I am glad to hear the minister say that, because I would not like any confusion to arise. The people in the area around Hanna are still strongly behind the Red Deer diversion project. One reason for that is that they realize there is a great deal of opposition to the original project known as the William Pearce project which later became known as the North Saskatchewan project. As the minister has pointed out, that was a very ambitious project. It meant carrying water by canals to Saskatchewan where one million acres would have been irrigated, with half a million acres in Alberta. The cost would have been around $100 million. The project would have required the diversion of water from the North Saskatchewan river to the Red Deer river. A great deal of opposition arose to the proposal to divert that water.

When I was in Hanna several years ago I suggested that it would be better if they would adopt a modified project which would utilize the waters of the Red Deer alone. The Red Deer diversion project provides for the diverting of water from the Red Deer river by means of a canal to the Hanna area where approximately half a million acres would be irrigated. That would probably be one of the cheapest projects per acre of any in Alberta because it would cost only in the neighbourhood of $15 million and would, as I say, irrigate half a million acres.

The Alberta government are strongly behind this project. I am not going to say what perhaps has been said with regard to certain other projects, that the minister has played politics with this. During the last election he was quite frank when he spoke at Hanna. He told them that regardless of what the election might bring forth it was the intention of the federal government to proceed with the program that had been outlined. I very much appreciate the fact that he made that clear. Since that time the federal government has spent a good deal of money on engineering details with regard to the project and also on the actual construction of dams on Berry creek and Sounding creek.

However, these dams are dependent upon the run-off of surface water. Some years water accumulates behind the dams and other years no water runs off at all. When the Red Deer diversion project is completed water will be diverted from the Red Deer river down to Berry creek and Sounding creek. In other words these lesser projects will become part and parcel of the major project. I know that in the past it has been said that the area around Hanna is submarginal, but I think what has happened in the last few years has proved that it is good land. All it needs is water. During the past two years when we have had good rains the crops have ranged from 30 to 40 bushels per acre. All the land needs is water in order to produce heavy crops.

In addition the project will flood 1,200 miles of creeks which are dry, at the present time, and will help provide for the watering of stock being carried in that area. As I say, the people in that area appreciate what has been done, but they are becoming quite anxious as to the exact intentions of the government in regard to the project. As has been mentioned, the project originated back in 1922. It has been modified several times, and people have been hoping ever since that time that they would get irrigation. All they have so far is the number of small dams on Berry creek and Sounding creek. The minister has made it clear, however, that when the St. Mary river and Bow river projects have been completed the federal government, in co-operation with the provincial government, will be ready to go ahead with the Red Deer diversion. I was glad to hear him mention these projects in that way today.

I realize some people may fear that Alberta will take more than its share of the water from the rivers that flow down from the Rocky mountains and that perhaps not sufficient water will be left for irrigation in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. I understand, however, that a good deal of thought has been given to diverting rivers that flow into the Arctic to have them flow into Hudson bay. I have here a publication put out by the Alberta government entitled "Within our Borders" which reads:

Four rivers could be diverted into North Saskatchewan.

Plan of water resources office envisages diversion from Arctic watershed to compensate for irrigation drain on South Saskatchewan.

Water destined by nature to flow into the Arctic ocean may some day find itself in the Hudson's bay if a plan drafted by the water resources office is put into effect.

In a report entitled "Possible diversion from the Arctic watershed to the Saskatchewan (Hudson's bay) drainage basin," a plan is presented whereby the McLeod, Pembina, Lobstick and Wolf rivers would be diverted into the North Saskatchewan river.

Of course if that is carried out there will be no difficulty about a shortage of water, because that would provide ample water for the completion of the various projects contemplated in Alberta, and for any projects that may be contemplated in Saskatchewan or any other parts of the country. So, as I say, I was very glad to hear the minister mention that these projects were still being actively contemplated, and I hope it will not be too long before actual construction will be started on the Red Deer project.

Mr. Hodgson: I would like to ask the minister if there is going to be something doing in this project this year in the way of the commission sitting. I see in the estimates of the privy council an amount of $70,000 for that very thing.

Mr. Gardiner: Seven million dollars.

Mr. Abbott: No, $70,000.

Mr. Gardiner: That is just for the commission costs.

Mr. Hodgson: It was not in last year but it is in this year, and I wondered whether they were going to start sitting on this project.

Mr. Gardiner: The amounts were not paid in this department last year, but we are providing for the payment this year.

Mr. Blackmore: Just before the item carries I should like to thank the minister for the excellent review he has given of the whole system of irrigation projects and their resulting use which will benefit the whole country. The dominion government is to be highly commended for this attack on the Palliser triangle, which is Canada's problem.

I think there might be just one point which should be emphasized finally and it is this. In my opening remarks I said and the member for Peace River said that we in Canada could not escape the fact that settlement of the Palliser triangle between 1900 and 1915 by the federal authorities then in charge of Canada incurred for Canada as a whole a responsibility to the provinces or to the administrations that were going to be under the necessity of assuming responsibility for the administration of the local affairs of the provinces that were to be formed from that area.

May I just review what I said the other day. It was well known from the days of Captain John Palliser in 1857 to 1860, by everyone who had a right to claim to be well informed, that the Palliser triangle area was not suitable for settlement by people intending to farm. It was acceptable only as ranching country where herds could be moved from place to place. For people who were settling down to live on the land it was absolutely unsuitable because of the altogether unpredictable nature of the rainfall in that area. Notwithstanding that, Mr. Chairman, those in parliament then advocated bringing in settlers and placing them in that area.

What was the reason for wanting settlers there? There were three reasons. The first was that the settlers would buy goods many of which would be brought in from the United States and on which they would pay duty, that duty constituting revenue for the federal government at Ottawa. Second, those people on the land would buy goods that would be produced in eastern Canada, and consequently they would provide a market for the goods of eastern Canada. Third, the bringing of those goods from eastern Canada would give the railroads business.

Although I have not the quotations before me, and I do not think it would be fitting at this late hour to read them, it is quite clear and it can easily be shown from the Hansard record of those days that those were the objects which were in the minds of the men who instituted the immigration policies under which settlers were placed in that area. Obviously then the main consideration in the minds of those men was the well-being of central Canada. I am not laying any blame on anybody, and I believe those men were wise notwithstanding the ultimate cost of the policies to the provinces concerned, but is it not about time to make up to the provinces that came to have the responsibility of governing those areas, the losses inflicted on them thereby?

There is one other thing. Really there are many things, but I do not wish to hold the house up long. The one thing is that I am very anxious that the people of Canada should get to realize from those of us who have grown up there what the facts are. Other members of the house have a right to look to us for information about that area, just as we have a right to look to the hon. member for Charlotte and the other splendid people from the maritimes for information about those provinces. If we do not tell them we are remiss in our duty.

So let me point this out. When the time came for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway across the nation, the obvious place to run the railway would have been up through what we call the "good" areas in the north; the bushland, where crops are almost certainly assured. That route was shorter; that route was bound to be more profitable; yet it was deemed advisable to run the C.P.R. down along the southern border where it now is, right through this Palliser triangle where there would only be a meagre opportunity for the C.P.R. to make a profitable business out of its activities. Well, what was the result? The tendency was to bring the settlement in the prairie provinces down into that Palliser triangle. Once the settlers were there, there was a responsibility for providing them with roads, schools, and all manner of social services. That responsibility had to be assumed by the provincial governments. It had to be assumed in areas where there was likely to be a crop failure any year. It was wise to run the railway down along the southern portion. Why? Because the United States railways were beginning to show a disposition to tap into Canada with their lines. Manifestly that was not in the best interests of Canada nationally. But let us remember the fact that the railroad was put there and it indirectly placed an additional financial responsibility of considerable magnitude on the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Now when we contemplate the cost of building this dam and who is going to pay it, shall we say that we should require those provinces, and Saskatchewan in particular, to pay the full half of the cost of installing that dam? Can we look upon that as being equitable? I fail to see how we can.

There is another important matter, Mr. Chairman, that has a bearing on this whole thing. When the time came for the C.P.R. to be paid for building the railroad across Canada, paid with gifts of land, where was the land selected? It was selected in such a way that it scattered the population of Saskatchewan and Alberta all over these areas making it much more expensive to build roads to serve the people, to build telephone lines, to provide school facilities, and later much more expensive to provide health facilities. These two provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have found it necessary for example to establish travelling clinics to bring medical aid to the people in more remote areas of the provinces. All those things have constituted a tremendous disproportionate financial drain on the resources of those two provinces. Alberta by good fortune, because of the resources she has, has been placed in a better position financially than Saskatchewan. In my judgment Saskatchewan has done the very best she could with the resources at her disposal. The Minister of Agriculture knows, better than any other person in Canada, how meagre those financial resources are compared with the tremendous responsibilities that rest upon the government of Saskatchewan. I believe the minister will bear me out in that.

I thought it well to make those three or four comments before closing, just to reinforce what the hon. member for Peace River said. I shall back the member for Peace River every inch of the way. I too do not believe that it is in any degree fair to the people of Saskatchewan to ask them to assume half the cost of building this great irrigation project.

I should like also to express appreciation to all the members who have participated in this debate. I believe that as a result of this debate it will be made easier for the minister to get the support from all over Canada which he ought to have. As a result of bringing together the support from all of Canada, we shall be able to get this great project completed at an early date and put what we might call the capstone on these irrigation projects as well. This would show our intention, as a nation, to reimburse to some extent at least the people who have settled in that area of the Palliser triangle.

Item agreed to.

47. Land protection, reclamation and development in British Columbia under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $184,996.

Mr. Fulton: On item 47 I should like to ask the minister if he would answer today a question I asked him yesterday with respect to the possibility of extending to British Columbia the prairie farm rehabilitation administration, on a basis which would make it of general application to the province. Yesterday we reviewed briefly some of the earlier discussions, and the minister said it had been in his mind for a number of years to introduce legislation which would have that effect but that for various reasons it had been postponed from time to time. I asked him yesterday if he would give us a word about the relationship between the priority that must be given to defence requirements, and the possibility of introducing legislation.

In passing the minister referred to a very similar situation tonight when he mentioned an editorial which apparently alleged that the reason for deferring the Saskatchewan river project was because of the greater priority of defence requirements. They are obviously closely related subjects, and I wonder if the minister could give us a general word on that aspect of it.

Mr. Gardiner: There have been two reasons why the suggestion has been postponed from time to time. One had to do with provincial financial arrangements, and the other had to do with defence expenditures. It has not been considered wise to proceed with larger expenditure relationships with the provinces at this time. The idea has not been turned down; it has been postponed for discussion later.

Mr. Fulton: There are one or two particular questions I should like to ask the minister with respect to British Columbia, just before leaving the general subject. As the minister knows, British Columbia in general has a great interest in the development within the Fraser river system of a general program of flood control, irrigation and power development. I refer again, merely in a general way, to the study which is now going forward there, and which I believe is under the over-all supervision of the Minister of Public Works. Prairie farm rehabilitation engineers are taking part in the study, so I should like to ask the minister whether it is contemplated that eventually that administration will take over the federal side of whatever project may be put forward. It seems to me it is very much the same sort of thing that is contemplated with respect to the South Saskatchewan, though if I may take the liberty of saying so I think the potentialities in that area are as great as if not greater than the other.

Mr. Gardiner: The proposal that is to be made is one, of course, which would have to wait for legislation such as that to which I referred. Under the constitution as it is now the responsibility is upon the province, whether it is British Columbia or any other province, for that kind of thing. Until we have legislation covering it, it is not likely that we would go into the province and take part in that development. The Department of Public Works put up the diking, and it is not the usual thing to expect to have both diking and irrigation in the same area. The Fraser river valley is fairly well watered. It is perhaps the highest rainfall area we have in any section of Canada. Talk of irrigation in that same district is rather difficult to promote here.

Mr. Fulton: Evidently I have not made myself clear to the minister. The Fraser river, as he knows, goes through two entirely different areas. In the interior or dry belt area where the problem is irrigation, the river is confined to a narrow channel with large areas containing many thousands of acres of bench lands anywhere from 100 to perhaps 400 feet above the actual river itself. The problem is raising the water by pumping, which requires the cheap power to which I have referred, so the water can be used to irrigate the bench lands in the upper stretches of the river and its tributaries, the Thompson and various other rivers. The farm lands or flat lands to which the minister has referred are found only in the lower reaches of the Fraser. My question is related to the study which is going forward under an organization known as the dominion-provincial board, Fraser river basin, which is surveying the whole stream and studying the possibilities of a joint power, irrigation and flood control project.

What I wanted to know was, what is the real interest of the prairie farm rehabilitation people in that work? They have engineers who are participating in that study. I have expressed the hope, and I repeat it here now, that eventually a real impetus would be given to working out a project which would provide for the three things, power development, flood control and irrigation. I am asking the minister whether there is any concrete proposal or program in his mind or the mind of the prairie farm rehabilitation administration in that regard?

Mr. Abbott: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: If the minister desires, he can answer that on Monday.

Mr. Gardiner: This item is for a small amount. It is not nearly large enough to cover any such proposal as is made. This small amount is being used in an experimental way. We are going into certain valleys and doing certain works with regard to rather small projects, but if we were going to do anything as extensive as is suggested in the remarks made there would have to be a much larger vote than this. So I say that, irrespective of what investigation we make into the possibilities at present, I think that kind of development—that is, any larger development—would have to await other legislation which would cover not only that area but British Columbia and other provinces as well.

The Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I had one or two other questions to ask.

The Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Item stands.

REDISTRIBUTION

TABLING OF FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, may I revert to motions in order to table the fourth and fifth reports of the special committee appointed to consider the results of the census of 1951 and the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday as the first item we will take up Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: Period.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then we will consider the estimates.

Mr. Cardiff: Not on Monday; not as long as I am here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We shall start with post office estimates and then take agriculture, national revenue and the balance of the items.

Mr. Drew: Just so hon. members may make their arrangements accordingly, what is the government planning with regard to July 1?

An hon. Member: Work.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Adjourning at 11 o'clock, I suppose. This is for Monday.

Mr. Drew: I know. But what about July 1?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, July 1?

Mr. Fleming: You have heard of that day, I suppose?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I thought we would adjourn for good Monday night.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If we do not, we shall continue to sit on Dominion day. That will be one way of celebrating the day.

Mr. Drew: I asked the question having regard to the fact that I believe a number of members may perhaps be making arrangements with regard to the official garden party.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The intention was to sit on July 1.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

SUBSIDIES TO NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO GROWERS

Mr. Dube:

1. What subsidy was paid to potato growers in the province of New Brunswick, during the year 1951?
2. What are the names and addresses of those receiving such subsidy, and how much was paid to each of them?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. The following payments were made to the New Brunswick potato marketing board during the year 1951 for the benefit of potato growers in New Brunswick:

Agreement under Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act $34,403.24; Payment under the Agricultural Prices Support Act $150,396.66.

2. Payment of above amounts was made to the New Brunswick potato marketing board for distribution to individual shippers in accordance with the basis of agreement. No record of names and addresses of individual shippers is available in departmental files.

NORMANDIN AND MISTASSINI, QUE.—POST OFFICES

Mr. Spence:

1. Are arrangements being made by the Department of Public Works to construct post offices at Normandin and Mistassini, Quebec?
2. If so, when will each of these projects be carried out?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I answer this question orally? The answer to the first part is that we are considering these projects as we consider all requests for public buildings in the country.

The answer to the second part is that the answer to No. 1 would apply.

INCREASES IN OLD AGE PENSIONS, 1947 AND 1949

Mr. Lafontaine:

Were the increases in old age pensions in 1947 and 1949 granted as a result of representations made by the government of the province of Quebec?

Mr. McCusker: No. The increases in old age pensions from $25 to $30 in 1947, and $30 to $40 in 1949, were granted as a result of action taken by the parliament of Canada to amend the federal Old Age Pensions Act. Following the passage by the parliament of Canada of legislation authorizing these increases in pension, the government of the province of Quebec together with the other provinces of Canada accepted the offer contained in the federal legislation, and put into effect the increases authorized by the amending federal law.

The government of the province of Quebec was notified in advance of the federal government's intention to introduce these amendments in 1947 and 1949, but at no time were representations received from the government of the province of Quebec that the amount of pension should be increased.

2. If so (a) by what departments; (b) in what localities; (c) for what amount; (d) in what year?

LUDGER COURNOYER

Mr. Spence:

2. If so (a) by what departments; (b) in what localities; (c) for what amount; (d) in what year?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS REMAINING ON ORDER PAPER—ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before you proceed with notices of motions, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the first five questions on the order paper all affect the Department of National Defence, and they have been standing on the order paper for some time. I feel sure that if any real effort were made to obtain the information those questions could all be answered tomorrow morning.

Questions

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): On Friday, Mr. Speaker, I undertook to consult with my colleagues about changing those questions into orders for returns. We had no cabinet meeting on Saturday, so I shall submit this request to my colleagues today. As to the others, there are not many left on the order paper. We shall give an answer tomorrow, although I do not think questions come up before Wednesday. I understand that we shall be sitting on Wednesday because on Saturday night an hon. member in the opposition said we would be sitting indefinitely while he was here.

Mr. Drew: If the hon. member is not a resident of Ottawa, I should think we would be sitting while he is here. What I am pointing out, Mr. Speaker, is that the first five questions which have been directed to the Department of National Defence are questions which should be answered. My proposal is that any questions unanswered when we adjourn should be made orders for returns, and it simply applied to those questions which, for one reason or another, could not be answered. I am satisfied these five questions could be answered, because they all relate to ordinary matters of record and have been before the department for some time.

Mr. Wright: I think the same thing applies to question No. 7 under my name on the order paper. It is a simple question. It should be a matter of record. I would ask the leader of the house to consider making it an order for return. We shall not reach questions tomorrow and we may adjourn before Wednesday.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will discuss this matter with my colleagues.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) if he will include question No. 6 along with the others which might be made orders for returns.

[Mr. Drew.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RULES OF PROCEDURE—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government, before the house adjourns, to propose an amendment to the rules of the house in order to give effect to the first recommendation in the report of the committee assisting Mr. Speaker with reference to the rules of the house and which was tabled last Friday?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter will be considered today; and I hope that there will be tomorrow a motion to concur in the report.

FISHERIES

LOCATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SCALLOP BEDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked for more definite information as to the location of the new scallop bed recently discovered in the Northumberland strait area. This scallop bed lies approximately nine and one-half sea miles east, northeast, (magnetic) off the Richibucto harbour buoy. It runs northeast and southwest, is roughly oval in shape and approximately one and one-half miles long and one-half mile wide.

Using the British Admiralty chart No. 2034 or the U.S. navy hydrographic office chart No. 1066 for plotting, the positions are as follows:

Southern end 46 deg. 51′ 00″ N. lat.
64 deg. 37′ 00″ W. long.

Northern end 46 deg. 51′ 30″ N. lat.
64 deg. 36′ 00″ W. long.

The bed is marked at each end by staff buoys flying red and white flags.

There was a biological bulletin issued on June 25 regarding this bed, and I might also add that an item about its discovery appeared in Trade News of May.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Drew: Is it the intention of the minister to make any statement on section 1?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes, Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to do so. As I have already said, this bill follows the form of all previous bills on representation, with the exception of a certain number of incidental amendments having to do with the elections act and the controverted elections act which will be explained in detail later. But on the larger issue of representation, there are a number of points that should be mentioned.

It is clear to the committee that this bill is different from any other one in that we have altered, since the last redistribution in 1947, the basis of calculating the membership of the house from the several provinces. Section 2 of the bill carries out the changes which we have made. There have, of course, been increases and decreases in the several provinces. For example, the province of Ontario gains two seats according to the last census. The province of Quebec gains two seats. The province of British Columbia gains four seats. For other reasons the district of Mackenzie has been granted an additional seat. There have been decreases, in Nova Scotia of one seat, in Manitoba of two seats, and in Saskatchewan of three seats.

As a result of the committee work, there have been a great many changes in the constituency boundaries. For the sake of the record it should be pointed out that in the province of Newfoundland there has been only one change and that six constituencies have been left the same. In the province of Nova Scotia there are five changes and seven constituencies are the same, all the changes being brought about by the necessity for the loss of one seat. The province of New Brunswick has been left as it was before, with ten seats the same. The same applies with respect to the province of Prince Edward Island with four seats. In the province of Quebec there are two new seats, 45 are the same and 28 changes have been made. May I add that most of the changes or a considerable number of them have been descriptive changes. Might I also add that I understand from the committee that all the changes have met with unanimous approval of all the members of the provincial subcommittee.

In Ontario there are two new seats, 49 are the same and 34 have changes. In Manitoba and Saskatchewan there have been changes in all the seats because of the reduction in numbers in those two provinces. In Alberta two are the same and there have been 15 changes. It might be noted that last time there were no changes in Alberta. In British Columbia there are four seats added, seven are the same and there are 11 changes. The result is that in the provinces there are eight new seats, 130 are the same as heretofore and 125 have been changed.

On Saturday there was considerable discussion about improving the method of doing this work. I have no desire to make any remarks with regard to that debate, except to say this. In my opinion the members of the committee have found themselves seized with knowledge of the conditions not only in their own constituencies but in others and have contributed materially to the discussions in the committee and to the decisions which have been made as reflected in the schedule. I want to add my thanks to those which have already been expressed for the work of that committee.

As to the procedure to be adopted with respect to this bill, I should point out that in 1947 a general discussion was permitted on section 1. In fact, on that occasion amendments to the schedule were moved on section 1 of the bill, and the government of the day took some objection to that course. At any rate, it was suggested that it might be better if the discussion on the schedules took place on the schedules. I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that in conformity with the suggestion made in 1947, we should discuss the sections of the bill on their merits, leaving section 3 to stand, as it relates directly to the schedules. Then, as we come to the schedules, have a general discussion on the first item of each province with respect to the whole of that province. If that does not meet with the wishes of the committee, I would point out that there are a number of amendments to be moved to some of the schedules, and that it would be desirable to have those amendments before the committee so that the discussion which would take place then on section 1 might have in mind the changes in the schedules.

May I also add this. Hon. members may have before them two copies of the bill and the schedule. One was printed on Saturday in the desire to get this information before the members at the earliest possible moment.

There were a number of errors in the printing, and in fact a number of errors in the interpretation of what the committee has decided. Most of those—all for all I know—have been corrected in a reprinted bill which is now before the hon. members. Nevertheless, there are some changes yet to be made, and if hon. members have a purely descriptive change to suggest I would be glad to receive it so that we can check it with the original. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we proceed with the bill section by section, without a discussion of the schedules, leaving section 3 to stand. Then, permit a general discussion on the first item of each provincial schedule with respect to that province. If, Mr. Chairman, you feel that that is not the proper procedure, then I would ask leave to move a number of amendments before we have a discussion on section 1.

Mr. Drew: In so far as the suggestion that we proceed section by section without engaging in a general debate on section 1 is concerned, I would point out the reasons why that is not practical for the purpose of dealing with the matters that are concerning many hon. members at this time.

The well-accepted practice in this house in the committee stage has been to regard the first section as the point at which general discussion can take place. The general discussion will be largely guided by the result of the decisions that are made outside of this house which find themselves interpreted in the schedule to the bill. The minister has already indicated that he proposes to move a number of amendments to the schedule, and that indicates reasons why hon. members are not yet in a position to discuss the general effect of this bill as it stands with full knowledge of what the situation really is.

There is no reason to repeat any of the arguments that have been made as to the desirability or undesirability of this system. It would be improper if I sought to repeat any arguments as to the desirability of appointing a commission to deal with this. The house has made its decision. I simply make that observation so that no one will think that we are accepting this as a desirable system. We simply accept the decision that has been made by a majority of this house that we are to proceed in this way, and by the decisions of a committee of this kind. Therefore, by the rules of the house, we are compelled to make the best we can of a bad job. Let no one be in any doubt that it is a bad job. The task, however, should be to try to achieve the best results that can be achieved under an unsatisfactory system.

[Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).]

The minister has himself pointed out that the discussion can best take place with knowledge of what the schedule contains. I am simply stating what is known to all members of this house, or I imagine is known to all, when I say that there is still discussion taking place in regard to some of the constituencies. That being so, we are still not certain as to what the recommendation is to be in regard to certain of the constituencies covered by this schedule which is before us in printed form.

The minister has indicated that he will move certain amendments if we are to proceed with a general discussion at this time on section 1. The minister is of course aware that at this very moment discussion is taking place in regard to further changes in boundaries, I think it would be best that we wait until we know that any amendments that are to be made by the minister, who has been the chairman of the general committee, are in fact ready to be presented so that we are not dealing with a varying schedule, but with a schedule that is to be before us as the basis of discussion.

There are a number of other items of business that we can proceed with in the meantime. I think that to avoid any discussion that may be unnecessary we should not carry forward the general debate, or the debate in regard to any of the sections which affect the schedule, until we know what the schedule really is that we are discussing. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, simply to facilitate the procedure and to avoid debate that may perhaps become strenuous, as it has on other occasions in the past, when subjects of this kind were under discussion, I propose that we will save time by postponing discussion on this bill until the decisions have been reached and the minister is in a position to say: This is the complete schedule that is being proposed by the committee of the house.

We already know from one or two of the exchanges that took place on Saturday that strong opinions will be expressed in regard to particular constituencies. It is conceivable that some changes that are still to be made may have some bearing on the extent of the debate. I therefore, Mr. Chairman, with the thought in mind simply of avoiding unnecessary debate and with the knowledge that we have a great deal of business to proceed with otherwise, move that the committee rise to report later this day at the call of the chairman.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I point out that all the rights of any hon. member with respect to the discussion of the schedules are preserved if my suggestion is adopted that section 3 be not called, but that the bill be proceeded with in other respects.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I might make a suggestion. Perhaps it is in the form of a compromise, but in dealing with redistribution there are lots of compromises. I believe the leader of the opposition is perfectly justified in asking that the debate on clause 1, which is as general a debate as we can have in committee, should not be proceeded with until we have a more complete picture as to what is to be in the schedule. Therefore, I support him in the suggestion that the debate on clause 1 should be deferred.

I wonder, however, whether it is necessary to postpone all of the discussion to a later time. The leader of the opposition has said that there are constituencies in some provinces which are still under discussion at various levels. Some of the provinces are agreed to. In some other cases, although the decisions arrived at are those of the majority and may not be satisfactory to some of the rest of us, at least we know that there are no further discussions taking place. As a compromise I wonder whether we could not let all the sections of the bill stand and proceed with the schedule, taking up the provinces on which there has been agreement or in connection with which there are no further discussions outside of the house. In that way we can get part of the work done without forgoing the right for which the leader of the opposition has asked, and which I support, to have general discussion after we have the whole schedule before us. As I say, I make this suggestion as a compromise.

The Chairman: Hon. members realize that the motion of the leader of the opposition is not debatable, and it is my duty to put it forthwith. If it is the sense of the committee—and with the approval of the leader of the opposition—that some compromise suggestion be made before I put the motion, it is quite agreeable to me. But my duty is to put the motion immediately.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to bend the rule in any way in regard to debates, but perhaps it would simplify matters if I indicated why I would not wish to concur in the suggestion made. I point out that, so long as it is understood that changes may be made, I do not know how any of us is to be sure that there might not be some change made which would greatly affect the general discussion in regard to this subject, or even the discussion in regard to a particular province, although we might think at the moment that the schedule is complete in regard to that province. For that reason I would ask that the vote be taken on the motion I have made.

The Chairman: The leader of the opposition has moved that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again later this day. Is the committee ready for the question?

Motion negatived: Yeas, 35; nays, 62.

The Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Knowles: Now that we are back on section 1 I would press the suggestion I made a moment ago. I suggest that in view of some uneasiness on the part of some members because the final draft of all parts of the schedule is not really before us, we should allow section 1 to stand—in fact, allow all the sections of the bill to stand—and proceed to the schedule, taking first the provinces which are agreed upon, then the provinces concerning which there are no further discussions outside the house and leaving to the end those with respect to which outside discussions are still taking place.

The Chairman: Perhaps we could hear what the minister would wish to say on the suggestion made.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We would have no objection to adopting the course suggested. It would have been the one we would have suggested when we came to the schedule. It does leave open not only the right to discuss the schedule generally, under section 3, but the general purpose of the bill under section 1.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing suggestions with regard to procedure, I should like to make one observation with respect to one suggestion made by the minister a little while ago in regard to the way in which the committee might approach the schedule to the bill. He suggested the schedule might be taken up province by province and that there might be a general discussion with regard to each province under the heading of that particular province. I should like to point out that that falls short of offering an opportunity for a general discussion on the whole schedule and, with respect, I think there ought to be an opportunity for a general discussion—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That was the purpose of it.

Mr. Fleming: —without being narrowed down to any particular province. There should be an opportunity for general discussion on the schedule.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I thought I made it clear that in calling, for example, the first item of the schedule with respect to Ontario, it would be open to all hon. members to discuss the whole of the 85 constituencies. If hon. members wish to go further and compare what is done in one province with what is done in another, that is provided for in section 3 of the bill, which relates to the schedule as a whole. I think that meets my hon. friend's point.

Mr. Fleming: My point is that that discussion ought to come first.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I agree.

Mr. Fleming: Whatever may be the means selected, whether a section of the bill or the schedule of the bill is called as the first matter for discussion, whatever is called first should provide an opportunity for general discussion of all the boundaries in all provinces.

Mr. Adamson: Obviously there is a typographical or transpositional error in the description of the riding of York West. It is so obviously a typographical error in transcription that I am wondering what machinery would be available for making the necessary alteration.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): In my introductory remarks I said there might very well be errors of that kind. If hon. members would draw such cases to my attention, we would save time by having the provincial chairman in each case move an amendment. If that is not satisfactory, however, the hon. member could move the amendment himself in this committee.

Mr. Adamson: The minister does not want to have discussion on the particular ridings now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the procedure suggested by the minister will be followed from now on?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I cannot debate over again the merits of an argument that has been made and disposed of. But I have made and indicated our desire to facilitate the discussion, with the information before us as the basis of that discussion. I suggest that it is not a proper procedure to deal with a schedule until the section indicating the existence of the schedule has been adopted. One need not extend the argument to disclose what an extraordinary result there would be if one could defer the discussion of a section of an act, and then engage in a discussion of a schedule which, at least in theory, might never be adopted, or might never become a reality until the section giving it validity is approved.

The other point I would make is that in an important matter of this kind the whole effect of the act is not related merely to the satisfaction of individual members from any province, but it is related to the belief on the part of the hon. members and the House of Commons generally that what we are doing is in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

We do not think this is the best system, but we must accept it. Having been called upon to accept it, by a majority vote, it is our duty to do the best we can to make sure that we discuss this matter with knowledge of the way this method is going to work. That is governed largely by knowledge of what is happening, not in any single province but rather in different provinces.

It may well be that there is some single province where at least no very vigorous dissatisfaction will be expressed as a result of the sins of commission, no matter how strong the views may be in regard to the sins of omission. That does not become a subject for discussion by members representing only a particular province; it is a subject for discussion and concern on the part of all members. In my opinion we cannot proceed by the method indicated unless there is consent, and I do not think I should give that consent as I believe the business of the house will be expedited by proceeding with other business.

The Chairman: If there is no agreement to proceed in a manner different from the customary manner, I would call section 1 and according to the practice there could then be a general discussion. That is the customary procedure. May I make this suggestion. In order to preserve the rights of hon. members to have a general discussion perhaps sections 1 and 3 could stand. All rights to a general discussion would then be preserved.

The other sections of the bill were accepted in principle when second reading was agreed to and I do not suppose they are contentious. Therefore when we reached the schedule hon. members would be in the position of having all their rights to a general discussion preserved by sections 1 and 3 having been allowed to stand. They could then decide what they wished to do with regard to the schedule because at that moment the minister would be in a position to move the amendments of which he has given notice.

If that suggestion is agreeable it seems to me that it would permit the committee to make some progress toward the adoption of sections 2 and 4 to 11 inclusive. Perhaps we would be in a better position once the schedule has been called and, as I said, sections 1 and 3 still being allowed to stand—no right of general discussion would have been lost by hon. members—the minister could then move his amendments. Hon. members would then be in a better position to discuss the procedure to be followed as to the study of the schedule. Is that suggestion agreeable to hon. members?

Mr. Drew: No, I do not think that it is agreeable. If we are not to proceed in the manner already suggested then I think we must be free to have a general discussion at this time.

The Chairman: Section 1.

Mr. McIlraith: I have an amendment to move with respect to the part of the schedule dealing with the province of Ontario. I would have preferred to move it later, but since it has been decided that we should have a general discussion now I will have to deal with the matter at this time. This has to do with certain townships in the area of Huron, Perth and Wellington counties. Perhaps the simplest way to proceed would be to indicate the actual motion now although, as I say, I would have preferred to do it when we were dealing with the areas concerned. It is:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 5 (Bruce) by deleting therefrom the words "East Wawanosh, West Wawanosh, and Ashfield in the county of Huron."

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 25 (Huron-Perth) to read "Huron consisting of that part of the county of Perth included in the township of Hibbert and that part of the county of Huron included in the townships of Hullett, McKillop, Stanley, Tuckersmith, Hay, Stephen, Usborne, Grey, Morris, Colborne, Goderich, Ashfield, East Wawanosh and West Wawanosh."

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 48 (Perth) to read "Perth consisting of the county of Perth excepting therefrom the township of Hibbert but including the city of Stratford and that part of the village of Tavistock contained in the township of Easthope South."

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 65 (Wellington North) to read "Wellington-Huron consisting of that part of the county of Wellington contained in the townships of Arthur, Garafraxa West, Maryborough, Minto, Nichol, Peel and West Luther, including the towns of Mount Forest and Palmerston, and that part of the county of Huron contained in the townships of Howick, Turnberry, and the town of Wingham."

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 66 (Wellington South) to read "consisting of the city of Guelph and that part of the county of Wellington contained in the townships of Puslinch, Eramosa, Guelph, Erin and Pilkington including the village of Elora.

I have sent copies of the motion to representatives of the other parties on the subcommittee. As I say, I would have preferred to discuss it when we were discussing those constituencies in detail, but I indicate the actual motion now. I might indicate that there is an obvious typographical error in the description of Renfrew South which can be dealt with when we come to that part of the schedule. The word "Nipissing" is used instead of Renfrew. There is another obvious typographical error in the description of Carleton. This is rather unusual as it would exclude nearly all the population of the county. These can be dealt with when we come to the particular constituencies.

Mr. Cardiff: May I ask if Turnberry and Wingham and Howick are included in Wellington?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, and the hon. member will note also that the name of the constituency is being changed to Wellington-Huron. The name of the old constituency was Wellington North.

Mr. Cardiff: I have not missed very much.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, section 1 of the bill now provides an opportunity to discuss the procedure that has taken place. We are bound to do the best we can under the method that has been adopted. There may have been some who thought that the vigorous terms applied to a procedure of this kind by the hon. member for Quebec South would not be justified on this occasion because there had been assurances that the government would seek the co-operation and support of all hon. members. There might have been a number of hon. members who placed a great deal of hope in those assurances, but the fact remains that no matter how sincerely those assurances may have been given on behalf of the government, the actual procedure has not conformed with them in any way. It is true that attempts have been made to make certain concessions in regard to specific objections which have been brought before the different provincial committees, nevertheless the net result is that we find that there have been acts of barefaced gerrymandering never exceeded under the committee system or under any other system since confederation.

One of the difficulties in discussing this point with complete certainty as to the full extent of what is to be done at the present time is that further proposals are under consideration right now outside of the house which may to some extent modify the criticism that can be directed against the decisions as to certain particular constituencies. Even the changes now under consideration, however, will not remove the criticism as to the results of the procedure that has been followed. It may be that the full extent of what was contemplated with respect to the electoral district of Lake Centre may be modified, as I most earnestly hope it will, but that does not get away from what was originally contemplated. As a result of the most vigorous expression of opinion outside of the house I would hope that members of the committee dealing with the problem of redistribution have been impressed with the desirability of reconsideration of the proposals that they will put forward in final form with respect to that particular constituency. It is significant, however, that the changes that have been made have so conspicuously been efforts to affect those constituencies represented by Conservative members in the house.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): And Liberal.

Mr. Drew: That of course may be described as simply an accident of geography or an accident of the movement of population. It is very interesting that such sweeping changes were proposed with respect to the constituency of Lake Centre which is represented by a member who is recognized as one of the outstanding members of the Conservative party. I would point out that this practice has been carried out in other cases. In Manitoba it is significant that there is to be a gerrymander there by the joining of the Souris and Brandon ridings. I find it difficult to believe that most members will agree that the only adjustment of boundaries that could have taken place was one which would join a riding, which for so many years had been represented by the very distinguished member of parliament from Souris, with a riding which was won in a by-election by one of the younger but distinguished members of this party last year.

That kind of union of constituencies is of the type that led to the original adoption of the word "gerrymander". I feel sure all hon. members of the house know the source of the word. It perpetuates the name of a senator in the United States who found it convenient to propose a union of electoral areas which would do away with the riding of one of his opponents. On that occasion the boundaries suggested had such a strange outline that one of those present at the meeting of that particular committee, held as long ago as 1812, said that it looked like a salamander, which is a particularly unpleasant looking type of reptile. Another said it should no longer be regarded as a salamander but as a gerrymander. From that time this unusual and rather ugly word—

An hon. Member: A good word.

Mr. Drew: —has become a part of our political dictionary in this country as well as in the United States. I heard a remark from the opposite side that it was a good word. Members on the opposite side of the house are certainly expressing their belief in the word in what they are doing at this particular time. I have indicated already that I am not placing before the house any suggestion that either party comes into the house cloaked in robes of virtue so far as the question of redistribution is concerned. We had hoped however that, with the assurance that was given and with the very strong statements that have been made by members of the Liberal party as to the undesirability of this method, we might have seen some of these abuses overcome at this time.

I would point out that we also have an interesting situation in Nova Scotia where a very distinguished member of our party who represents Annapolis-Kings now finds himself with a constituency embracing a beautiful part of that wonderful province but nevertheless one involving an interesting problem in arithmetic. As a result of the redistribution we find that the constituency he will represent in the future embraces a very much larger number of voters than the two adjoining constituencies which were also under consideration at the same time.

Mr. Fleming: Almost 50 per cent more.

Mr. Drew: The number of people he will be called upon to serve will be approximately 50 per cent more than the two adjoining constituencies which were under consideration in the same deliberations. Perhaps it will be said that there is no significance in the fact that these two other constituencies are represented by Liberal members, and that it is entirely one of the accidents of geography that the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings will find himself called upon to serve that larger number of people. I feel sure he will be happy to serve them with the same efficiency and effectiveness with which he has served his present constituency in the past. Nevertheless he is called upon to represent a much larger number of people than in the constituencies nearby, and that hardly conforms with the general principle of representation by population which was supposed to be the basis of the redistribution that we are undertaking.

One of the difficulties with which we are confronted in matters of this kind is that, proceeding as we do under an unsatisfactory system with no basic policy adopted as to how the redistribution will be carried out, there is nothing that can be done but an utterly unmodified form of log-rolling in an effort to ameliorate the injuries that result from this kind of political gerrymandering. Another difficulty with which we are confronted is that in these matters the Liberal party speaks with two voices. They are both clear and unmistakable voices. One is the voice of virtue and of memory. The other is the voice of political expediency. When the subject is being discussed on a theoretical basis then from memory and experience members of the Liberal party speak in a way that all of us can support. We have already heard the statements of the hon. member for Quebec South read into the record, and many of us have heard him make these statements in the house. Statements of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King have been read into the record, statements he made both when he was prime minister and when he was leader of the opposition. A great number of statements can be cited here as to the high purpose of those seeking redistribution.

Another example of that kind of statement in regard to the desirability of an altruistic approach to this subject was contained in the words of the Hon. Colin Gibson at the time redistribution was under consideration a few years ago. At that time he was Secretary of State, and speaking of the hopes in regard to the committee he had this to say:

> I may say again referring to past history, that since the new method has been adopted of referring the question of delineating the constituencies to a special committee of the house, agreement has recently been arrived at owing to the fact that a real effort was made by all members of the committee to be fair, just and reasonable. I have every confidence the same spirit of justice and fair play will be displayed by those who form the committee this year.

That was the high and lofty statement made in regard to the actions of a committee which were described later by the member for Quebec South as the application of the law of the jungle. One was the voice of memory, the voice of altruism, and the other was the voice of reality indicating exactly what had happened in the meetings of the committee and in this house.

I am compelled, Mr. Chairman, to remember other words of the hon. member for Quebec South, because he has spoken with a frankness which still indicates reasons why we might have hoped for more from this committee. Writing in an article which has been referred to from time to time, and which appeared in Maclean's magazine, the hon. member for Quebec South spoke of his regret that the Liberal party needed to be saved from opportunism which neglected principle, and which is begotten of what can only be called the office-holding mania. Those are not my words, but the words of the hon. member for Quebec South who has spoken with that measure of frankness which we might have hoped would have, in some measure, guided the course of the committee dealing with this subject at this time.

Although my motion that the committee should rise has been turned down, I would point out that it is in order for the minister who is guiding this measure through the house to move at any time that the committee rise and report progress. I repeat the suggestion, with the further discussion we have had, that he follow this course. I have suggested reasons why this should be done. I would point out that I have only mentioned a few of the examples of what has happened in the province of Ontario. There are very serious examples of gerrymandering which affect the hon. member for Huron; which affect the hon. member for Frontenac, where that historic constituency is being merged completely with another constituency; which affect ridings right across the province of Ontario. These examples can be discussed in detail if the further arguments that are presented fail to convince the minister of the desirability of reconsidering this subject.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that under the procedure now before us it will not be possible to carry out redistribution in a manner which can give the people of Canada very much confidence in what is being done to assure some measure of representation by population. Nevertheless, some of the most glaring examples of gerrymandering, of the law of the jungle to use the term employed by the hon. member for Quebec South, could be avoided if this committee would rise and refer these most glaring cases back to the redistribution committee to be considered while the house is proceeding with other important business, which could be dealt with satisfactorily in the meantime.

Mr. Knowles: As I indicated earlier, it seemed to me that it might have been preferable to have the discussion of grievances that some of us have with respect to various situations take place on the schedule concerning the various provinces. But since it seems to have been decided to have that type of debate on section 1, there are a few comments that I should like to make at this time.

First of all, I wish to repeat our view that the way we have dealt with redistribution on this occasion is not the best way for it to be handled. We are prevented from discussing the alternative method which has been suggested several times at this session, namely an independent commission, because votes of the house have already been taken on that question. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, it is still in order for us to recite some of the experiences we have had in the committee, and to register our objection to the method still being employed, namely that of having redistribution effected by a committee of the House of Commons. What happened this time is practically the same as what happened in 1947, a time when many of us who were members of this committee were also members of that committee, and I have reason to believe it is similar to the experience of former committees.

A special committee of the House of Commons was appointed. That committee, Mr.

Chairman, broke itself down into a number of subcommittees. There was one subcommittee for the maritime provinces and Newfoundland, one subcommittee for the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and then there was one subcommittee for each of the other provinces. Those subcommittees, in turn, were supposed to deal with the problem of redrawing the maps of their respective provinces. The subcommittee met; some of them shortly after they were established, but some of them did not meet for quite a long time. In every case with which I had any connection I think it is correct to report that, although our official subcommittee met and took the formal decisions, whether they were unanimous or by a majority, the real decisions were not made in the subcommittees. The real decisions were made by the Liberal caucuses of the respective provinces. The course of procedure is well known. A subcommittee is appointed, and after a while it meets. In some cases, a map is presented to it—

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if I might rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am sure the hon. member means to be fair in this.

Mr. Knowles: I am overly fair.

Mr. McIlraith: I quite appreciate that, but I want to clear the record on one point. There has not been a Liberal caucus for the province of Ontario since the Ontario subcommittee started to meet.

Mr. Fleming: What about caucuses of parts of the province?

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps in some provinces like Ontario they have had to be sub-caucuses of a number of members—

Mr. McIlraith: I want to make the record quite clear. There have not been caucuses of parts of the province, either. It is just a matter of keeping the record clear.

Mr. Fleming: Maybe there should have been caucuses.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member would not deny the fact that in between the various meetings of the subcommittee there have been consultations with the Liberal members affected?

Mr. McIlraith: With individual Liberal members, as there have been in all others.

Mr. Knowles: Always one at a time?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; I am afraid so. At times it was extremely tiring.

Mr. Knowles: It might have been better if you had got them all together at once.

An hon. Member: Is that what you did?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Ottawa West can speak for Ontario but as to some of the other provinces, particularly my own, there is no question but that there were meetings of the Liberal caucus for the province as a whole. What happened was that, in the case of Manitoba, the first meeting we had was one with nothing laid before us. The chairman invited us all to make suggestions. It was a surprise and a most welcome one. We made suggestions. Then the next time we met a map was presented to us. By some strange coincidence, that map appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press in Winnipeg on the same afternoon that we obtained it here. That was on May 23.

From that day on we really went to work and our method of proceeding was that we on the subcommittee would make protests, counter-suggestions and proposals and the Liberal members of the committee would take our proposals back to the Liberal caucus. We give them full credit for doing that and for doing it repeatedly. I have lost track of the number of times that our proposals were taken back to the Liberal caucus in order to ascertain whether or not they would approve of the suggestions that were made. In giving credit, let me go further and say that some of our suggestions were accepted. Indeed the final map is quite different from the one published on May 23, and it is an improvement. But even if the Liberals had accepted all of our proposals—and they certainly did not—what I object to is the method of procedure. The real decisions were made not by the subcommittee which had its official status but by the Liberal caucus. That was the course followed in the case of Manitoba, to my knowledge; and I imagine that it was followed with regard to a number of other provinces as well.

Even if the results of that procedure were perfectly fair having regard to the members affected, and even though the map had the appearance of being a proper one, I suggest that the procedure lends itself to serious criticism and people wonder whether that is the right way to do it. As a matter of fact as a result of that procedure you do not get a perfectly fair map; and when there are any unfairnesses, the people of the country are led to the conclusion that redistribution is being done on a political basis.

One of the other factors involved in this method is—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that we went through all this on Saturday, and that my hon. friend has been breaking the rules for at least five minutes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have not referred to the subject to which I should like to refer. I know that it would now be out of order for me to talk about an independent commission, so I am not repeating those arguments at this time. I am simply reporting to you, Mr. Chairman, on what actually happened in the work of the committee which produced the report and which produced the schedule that is now before us.

The other point I wish to emphasize is that in our committee discussions, inevitably—it is inherent in the nature of the system—we have concerned ourselves with present boundaries and whether or not they should be adjusted, and we have concerned ourselves with sitting members. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not speaking in any holier-than-thou attitude. No member of the House of Commons who has been a member of that committee has been able to divorce himself from the necessity of considering present boundaries, the situations of which he is aware in his own province, and the situations with respect to particular members. It is precisely because it is inherent in the nature of the system that we take such considerations into account that I deplore the fact that we have been doing it in that way on this occasion. It seems to me that what we should be concerned with is not the situation of particular members, not the question of whether or not a boundary is an historic one, but rather with the right of the people of the country to proper voice in parliament as nearly on a representation by population basis as it is possible for us to achieve.

In my view in some parts of the country some progress has been made towards that objective. There are many cases in which glaring inequalities have been lessened. There has been some improvement. In fact, in some of the provinces I will say that the only things that are wrong are actual omissions; what has been done has been good, but that the committee has not gone far enough because it is inevitably hamstrung by the very conditions under which it has had to work.

Having made those general observations with respect to the work of the committee, may I say that I utter those comments not in order to cast any reflection on the individuals who have been engaged in this work. There have been many attempts to be fair. There has been a good deal of considering and reconsidering of proposals made by opposition members. In fact, that consideration is still going on at the present time. I ask that no members take offence at the suggestion that the work in which they have been involved is work they should not have been doing at all. It is not they who are at fault; it is the system. The result is that we now have before us a schedule in which there remain many unfairnesses and as a result there will be in the country the feeling that they arise from political considerations.

May I now make a few comments with respect to what has been done in my own province of Manitoba. We have been under the necessity of losing two seats. That fact creates a problem which our friends in Ontario do not know much about. If they have difficulties when they get two new seats, I wonder what their experience would be if they had to lose seats in proportion to the number we have had to lose. The two which have been taken out by the decision of the majority of the committee are the constituency of Souris and the constituency of Selkirk.

It is true that two constituencies have to come out. But in the subcommittee we offered suggestions alternative to those that were made. I will not spend any time on the alternative suggestions with regard to Souris because I have no doubt that the hon. member for Souris, who is a member of the committee, will have something to say about them. However, I want to register my strong objection to the elimination of the present riding of Selkirk. On the map of Manitoba there is to be retained a riding to be called Selkirk but it is really the present riding of Norquay, with the town of Selkirk added to it, with the name of Selkirk to be applied to that riding. The present riding of Selkirk is a suburban riding. It includes St. James, West Kildonan and adjoining territory and the town of Selkirk. This riding is to be eliminated. I object to that elimination. I naturally object to it because of the person involved, namely my own close personal friend, the hon. member for Selkirk. Many other members of the house will be unhappy about that change because many hon. members regard him as a close personal friend, as a splendid member of this house—

Mr. Drew: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: —and one who some of us are confident will be back again. But I make my protest against the elimination of that seat not on those personal grounds. I make it on two other grounds. The first one I can state briefly. It is this. Selkirk was one of the largest of the non-Winnipeg ridings in the province of Manitoba. One might understand the argument for eliminating Souris—even if my friend the hon. member for Souris does not like it—on the basis that it was the smallest riding in the province in terms of population. But having decided to eliminate Souris because it has the smallest population in the province, it seems strange that for the second seat to eliminate the committee should go right up the ladder until you get to the largest of the non-Winnipeg seats in Manitoba.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Very much the largest.

Mr. Knowles: Yes; very much the largest of all those ridings. In addition to that objection which I have registered to the elimination of the present Selkirk, I also register most strongly my objection to the increasing disparity which we are called upon to take in the province of Manitoba as between the population in distinctly rural seats and that in distinctly urban seats. It is fully recognized that distinctly rural seats are entitled to a slightly less population unit than distinctly urban seats. I not only recognize that principle, I assert it. There is no question about it. But it seems to me that we have allowed abuse of that principle to be carried too far in some areas in this country. I am glad to see in the province of Ontario that it is being reversed a little bit, if not sufficiently; but in the province of Manitoba a disparity which was already too great has been made even greater. And in my view the urban people in the province of Manitoba are being grossly discriminated against in the matter of proper and adequate representation in the House of Commons.

I want to demonstrate that, Mr. Chairman, with a few figures, and I will naturally keep my figures to a minimum. I want to tell the committee what the situation was as a result of the last redistribution, and then show the committee what has happened as a result of this redistribution, which indicates a trend against the rights of the urban people of the Winnipeg area.

As a result of the last redistribution, which was based on the 1941 census, we ended up with sixteen seats in the province of Manitoba. Three of these seats were combined urban and rural areas. They were Brandon, St. Boniface and Selkirk. Their total population was 125,176, or an average of 41,725. I have put that on the record, but I shall omit any reference to these three seats from the argument I shall make in a moment because they are urban-rural seats and cannot be included in any comparison between distinctly urban and distinctly rural constituencies. Having put that information with respect to these three seats off by itself, the rest of the picture was in these terms. There were left nine rural seats, distinctly rural, whose total population was 365,683, making an average population per distinctly rural seat of 40,631.

I move on to the urban situation as a result of the last redistribution. There were four distinctly urban seats, Winnipeg North, Winnipeg North Centre, Winnipeg South, Winnipeg South Centre. Their total population was 238,885, or an average of 59,721.

I have given you the average population in the distinctly rural seats and the average population in the distinctly urban seats following the last redistribution, Mr. Chairman. The difference between these two averages, between 40,631 for the rural and 59,721 for the urban, was 19,090. I ask hon. members to note that that figure of 19,090 was the spread between the average rural and the average urban seat following the last redistribution. I ask them also to note that on that basis the average urban seat had 46 per cent more population than the average rural seat. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that that disparity of 46 per cent, which was the result of the last redistribution, was unfair. It was too great. It was a case of discrimination against the rights of the people of the Winnipeg area on any theory of representation by population.

In the bill which is still on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Quebec South a number of rules are suggested. I make it clear that those rules are not yet the law of this land, but they do reflect the thinking of one hon. member who has given considerable attention to this whole question. The hon. member for Winnipeg South suggests in his bill that an urban seat should be one and a quarter times the size of rural seats in population. His suggestion therefore is that the disparity should be 25 per cent. We were handed in the last redistribution in Manitoba a disparity of 46 per cent.

Mr. Mutch: Will the hon. gentleman permit a correction? A moment ago he referred to the member for Winnipeg South. I think he meant Quebec South.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes. I would hope that the hon. member for Winnipeg South would agree with some of the ideas of the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. Mutch: I very often do, much more often than I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: On this occasion maybe the three of us can get together.

Now let us come down to the results of this redistribution, bearing in mind that the last one gave us a disparity of 46 per cent, which I regarded as too high. On this occasion we are left with only two of these combined or rural-urban seats, namely, Brandon-Souris and St. Boniface, with a total population of 107,002, or an average of 53,501. As to distinctly rural seats, we are left with eight, and their total population is 351,704, or an average per rural seat of 43,963. As against that, Mr. Chairman, we now have four distinctly urban seats, whose population make a total of 307,782 or an average of 76,945 per urban seat. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, whereas before we had a disparity of 19,090 or 46 per cent, that disparity is now 32,982 or 75 per cent. To put it in other words, 351,704 rural persons are given eight seats; almost the same number of urban persons, 307,782, will have only four seats. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is going too far.

I congratulate the Ontario committee on having moved a bit in the other direction. I do not think they moved far enough, but they moved in the right direction. In Manitoba we have moved in the wrong direction. We had a disparity against the city of 46 per cent. It should be only 25 per cent, says the hon. member for Quebec South, and that disparity is now being increased to 75 per cent.

There is room in some parts of the country for perhaps more disparity than the hon. member for Quebec South has suggested, but I suggest that in a province like Manitoba, where we have quite a few fairly populous centres out through the rural areas—Portage la Prairie calls itself a city, and there are other points through the province which are quite populous and increasingly so—there is no excuse for that disparity of 75 per cent. Perhaps it is not appropriate for me to discuss it here, but I may say that back home in Manitoba at the provincial level we have the same kind of unfair disparity between the urban and the rural areas and I would suggest—

Mr. Wood: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is it the policy of the C.C.F. party that urban constituencies should have the same population as the rural constituencies?

Mr. Knowles: I thought I made it perfectly clear that I accept the idea that the population in the rural constituencies should be less than the population in the urban constituencies. I went further and agreed with the proposal made by the hon. member for Quebec South that the difference should be of the order of 25 per cent. What I am objecting to is the difference of 75 per cent that is proposed by the redistribution that is now placed before us, which surely no one can defend. I know that in some quarters this is regarded as a touchy subject, and that one should not speak about it, but surely fairness should underlie our redistribution. Surely we do not throw the idea of representation by population completely out the window, and I contend that this is a grossly unfair redistribution so far as the city of Winnipeg is concerned.

In reply to the hon. member for Norquay, may I tell him that when one makes a complaint such as I have made—and I made it in the committee on redistribution—he has an obligation to suggest an alternative, and I did suggest an alternative. My alternative proposal was that there should have been retained in the Winnipeg area a fifth seat, one something like the present Selkirk, consisting of a suburban area around the city of Winnipeg, together with some of the country area just outside of that suburban part. If one did that he could create three urban-rural seats—I mean, in the province—three including the additional one in the Winnipeg area which I suggested—with an average population of 53,487. That would leave four distinctly urban seats inside the city limits with an average population of 66,080, and seven distinctly rural seats with an average population of 48,814. That would thus add an extra seat to the Winnipeg area and it would lessen the grossly unfair disparity in the map proposed by the committee in its majority report.

That is my answer to the hon. member, not only in general but in specific terms. The proposal which I made in committee—and I still have in my hand the typewritten figures I then used—suggested a disparity of 33 per cent. My proposal was that the distinctly rural seats should have 48,814, that the distinctly urban seats should have 66,080, which would have made each rural seat 17,660 less than each urban seat, or would represent a difference of 33 per cent.

In other words, in the light of the situation in Manitoba I was prepared to go even further than the hon. member for Quebec South, who suggested a disparity of 25 per cent, for I proposed a disparity of 33 per cent. But I certainly suggest that a disparity of 46 per cent such as we were handed last time was too great, and that a disparity of 75 per cent, which we are being handed now, is scandalous. It offends against the principle of representation by population, even with all the qualifications and modifications of that principle that are sometimes put forward, and simply cannot be defended.

One realizes that at this stage of the game amendments do not get anywhere, and that there is no point in moving any further changes at this time in the Manitoba situation; but I do protest strongly and I do insist that there should have been retained another suburban seat around Winnipeg, such as the present seat of Selkirk, and that it should have been done so as to retain a closer resemblance to the principle of representation by population than is involved in the redistribution now before us.

I wish to make it very clear that if the population in Manitoba stays on the basis which now obtains, or if it moves still further in the direction of a greater concentration in the urban area, as has been the case during the last ten years, then when the next redistribution comes around we simply must not have this kind of map for Manitoba. We must have for the city of Winnipeg and for the greater Winnipeg area a number of seats more in proportion to that to which we are entitled, which will call at least for five seats where we now have only four. I would settle for a 25 per cent disparity—I would even settle for 33 per cent—but none of this 46 per cent and 75 per cent, which means that in Manitoba every four Canadians out in the country has the same voice in the House of Commons as have every seven Canadians living in the Winnipeg area. And when you multiply that disparity by similar disparities, or others even approaching it in other provinces—although I believe the worst disparity may be in Manitoba—you get a completely unfair balance in the House of Commons, so far as representation of the people of this country is concerned.

This, again, is another of the reasons why we feel it is wrong that this matter has been dealt with in a parliamentary committee. This is the sort of thing which could be corrected if it were dealt with by some outside body, under rules given to it by the house, a body having the right and the authority to go ahead and to apply those rules objectively and fairly, and in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole, instead of only with an eye to what obtains at the present time.

Then, just one further word about Manitoba. It will be argued in defence of the map proposed that there is equality within the categories. That is true. Within the category of rural seats they are all in the forty thousands, varying from 40,000 to 47,000—and I commend that to some other provinces. Within the category of urban-rural seats, they are both in the fifty thousands. Within the category of urban seats, three of them are 75,000, and one is 80,000—so that they are close together.

But I submit that the virtue of equality within those categories does not get away from the fact that there is too great a disparity between the categories, in particular between the average for urban seats and the average for rural seats. It is the violation of that principle which has resulted in the loss of the seat of my hon. friend from Selkirk—a result which we think is most unfair. The violation of that principle is something which one just cannot accept as being fair to the people of the greater Winnipeg area, and indeed to the other urban centres in Manitoba. If we cannot have it corrected this time, then I hope when the next redistribution comes along we will have something more akin to fairness and more akin to the rules suggested by the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I would ask if, by agreement, I might be permitted to add one name to the list of constituencies in Ontario I mentioned. It has been called to my attention that I omitted reference to Haldimand. Since I was making general remarks, which will be followed by more detailed remarks, I wish to make it clear that I had intended to refer to the constituency of Haldimand.

Mr. Mutch: Mr. Chairman, I would not want this discussion to be concluded without saying a word about the redistribution in Manitoba. I feel impelled to do so, not only because of the interest I have personally, and which my constituents in the city of Winnipeg have, but also because of the attitude taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has preceded me in the debate.

It is not to be interpreted that, representing as I have for a long time part of the city of Winnipeg, I am not most desirous that those people who now elect four members from greater Winnipeg should be entitled to every consideration possible in the matter of representation in the House of Commons. I am on record during an earlier discussion in this session as having said that the principle of representation by population has been given very wide lip service in this country, but that its application has not been attempted across the country as a whole. Even within the provinces there have been wide discrepancies.

I join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in rejoicing in the fact that in Ontario some approach has been made to drawing closer together the figures of representation between rural and urban constituencies. But I would point out to him and to the committee, and to any others who may be interested, that the situation in Ontario is hardly parallel with that in Manitoba, because there are comparatively few rural areas in Ontario which do not have urban centres in the form of large towns or smaller cities, most of which are larger than anything we have in Manitoba outside Winnipeg, with the possible exception of the city of Brandon.

This time, however, although I was not on the committee, it has been a matter of satisfaction to realize that we have come much closer to equality of representation within the urban areas themselves. The hon. member has pointed out that there is a spread of less than 5,000 among the four constituencies, and that three of them are within a thousand. He has also pointed out that, with the narrowness of the spread in the strictly rural areas, we have an approximation of equality in population between those two ridings which include the major cities in our province, and a fairly large rural area, namely Brandon and St. Boniface.

Right away I will say I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says that in another five or ten years we will have to pay more attention to the redistribution of representation within the province, weighting the strictly urban areas more heavily. That principle has been acknowledged already in the last redistribution in Manitoba, although there the city of Winnipeg is represented only by slightly less than one-fifth membership in the legislature whereas even under this new arrangement we have about 30 per cent of the federal representation.

I think it is only fair to point out that when we had the federal redistribution five years ago Manitoba lost a seat. We sacrificed one of the rural ridings in that redistribution; the city of Winnipeg was not called upon to make any sacrifice. We are now to lose two seats, one of which is Souris which is a strictly rural constituency. It has no large-sized urban centre, being made up of smaller towns and villages.

We have had to bear in mind throughout the years that while the province is becoming industrialized to a large extent, while there has been a tendency to concentrate population in the urban areas, there is a perfectly sound reason for weighting rather more heavily the urban centres in arriving at the representation. I say that although I represent a city riding.

Mr. Fulton: Could you ask the hon. member for New Westminster to have the same principles carried out in British Columbia?

Mr. Mutch: I am not an authority on British Columbia. I have troubles of my own in my own area. There are a few of these problems I should like to export to British Columbia where perhaps they would not be noted.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member suggest what percentage of weighting he would regard as fair?

Mr. Mutch: No. I have not worked out the percentages of intangibles. I think in the confines of that province we have made a closer approach to representation by population, or perhaps I should say representation by community of interest in the national picture, than we ever achieved before. However, I would be the last one to suggest that there is perfection in it.

The hon. member spoke rather sadly about the elimination in this redistribution of the present constituency of Selkirk and expressed his personal regard for the sitting member. Apart from politics I share that regard, as I am sure do all hon. members of the house. However, we must look at the logic of what has happened. We must remember that the constituency of Selkirk was created for the first time five years ago. It does not have either the geographical homogeneity or the tradition which applies to many other constituencies. I was not on the committee, but I knew what was happening, and it seems perfectly natural to me that with the readjustment which was necessary the proper procedure to follow was the one which has been followed.

Another step has been taken which I am sure will commend itself to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, that we have drawn back into an urban area where there is a community of interest—this is important in matters of representation—both St. James and the Kildonans. While this has served to enlarge the seats of the Winnipeg members, except my own—mine is increased only to a small extent—I think it was a just redistribution and lays the foundation, if I may put it that way, for the point of view which the hon. gentleman has expressed as being desirable.

In my opinion we have not reached a state in the development of Manitoba where we are able to express adequately within the areas which the hon. gentleman and I and others represent, the general opinion of the province of Manitoba from the purely urban standpoint. While I regret, as I think everyone must regret, the increasing disparity between urban and rural ridings, we have made a substantial step toward the equalization of representation in each of these areas and we have approached full parity in the other two constituencies of Brandon and St. Boniface.

I do not know what the experience of my hon. friend has been, nor do I know what the experience of other hon. members who represent Winnipeg ridings has been, but I have had no sustained or substantial protests against the increased disparity. Perhaps we in Manitoba have become accustomed—

Mr. Knowles: We are inured to it.

Mr. Mutch: Perhaps we have become inured to it, but I would say accustomed. Perhaps we have become accustomed to it from our experience in the province generally speaking. I am sure that the electors generally will feel that a serious approach has been made to equalization of representation, not so much by population in this case except within the respective circles, but in seeing to it that points of view, which after all are important, have been placed in the position where one area of a similar and economic general nature will be weighted equally with the other. Looking back over the last few years, I think that that is a substantial gain.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I should like to begin by commenting on the fact that this important matter comes before us at this late stage of the session. The bill is before us now because the committee continued to sit up until Saturday night. A great deal of work was done during that period and indeed over the week end by the secretary of the committee and others who had duties in connection with the preparation of the boundaries in the schedule to the bill. I think it is only proper that we should make a sincere acknowledgment of the efforts and extraordinary exertions made by the staff of the house, particularly the clerk of the committee, Mr. Chassé, in having the schedule prepared in its present form.

I think it is regrettable that the work has had to be done under such pressure. Even with the real and desperate efforts that have been made during the last day or two in proof-reading and checking the boundaries of constituencies, I am quite satisfied that even after the bill has had extended consideration, there will still be errors in it. I do not think a work as important as this should have to be done under such pressure and in such haste. It would have been much better had some of the alternative suggestions been accepted; it would have been much better had this bill been allowed to stand over for further consideration to a later stage of this session in November.

The chairman of the committee, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in summing up the recommendations of the committee in general terms said that in the provinces it is proposed to create eight new constituencies; it is proposed that 125 constituencies be changed and that 130 remain unchanged. In speaking on second reading of the bill on Saturday I drew attention to the fact that as long as the present method of dealing with redistribution by a partisan committee is followed—when I say "partisan" I mean a committee composed of partisans from all parts of the house; it nevertheless still is a partisan committee with a majority of the partisans representing the party which holds the majority of the seats in the house—it is impossible to expect that principle will be followed or that it will be followed consistently. The fruits of such a system are to be seen in the glaring inequalities that appear before us, the strange and wonderful abortions of sizes and shapes of boundaries, and the complete disregard in so many cases of anything resembling a consistent retention of and adherence to principle.

In passing let me give one or two illustrations. According to the report of the committee the riding in Canada which will have the lowest population will have, under the 1951 census figures, a population of 9,999. While I have not the exact figures, the constituency with the largest population will have a population of some 91,000. Making all proper allowance, for we all do make allowance, for the necessity for giving larger and weighted representation to rural constituencies compared with urban, I say there are discrepancies here that simply cannot stand up to examination in the light of principle. Let us take the province of Ontario. We faced the fact that on the new basis the average population for the constituencies would be 54,000, and really desperate efforts were made to boost over the 30,000 mark all constituencies that had been below 30,000 in population. But we have finished up in Ontario, in the light of the schedule, plus the amendments proposed this morning by the chairman of the Ontario subcommittee, the hon. member for Ottawa West, with results like these. The constituency with the lowest population will continue to have about 28,000 and the constituency with the highest population will have about 91,000.

Making all proper allowances for what I have said is recognized by all parties and all members of the house, the necessity for taking account of the size of constituencies and the necessity for giving weighted representation to rural compared with urban ridings, we now face a situation such as I have described, and I say you simply cannot justify it in the light of any serious attempt to apply principles consistently.

Under this method we also see a defensive attitude taken by all members of the committee. I do not draw any distinction between parties in this respect because it is only to be expected that as long as we are working under the committee method a defensive attitude is going to be taken by most when it comes to tampering with or changing ridings in which fellow partisans are the sitting members. I also wish to say, and I sought to emphasize this on Saturday, that after the experience I have had in sitting on the committee I am not unaware of the difficulties faced by those who represented the majority party on the committee. I am quite aware that they have had their difficulties too as well as those of us who represented opposition parties on the committee.

The hon. member for Ottawa West said this morning that there were no meetings of the Ontario caucus of the Liberal party from the time the committee began its work until the present time. The hon. member has made his statement. Nevertheless we were told on numbers of occasions that their members would not accept some quite reasonable and proper suggestions that we put before the committee. We were told: Our caucus for such and such a part of the province will not accept that. I leave it at that.

An hon. Member: Maybe you imagine that.

Mr. Fleming: As has already been indicated, the bulk of the work is done in the subcommittees. That is only natural because that is the proper starting point, but I have a very serious criticism to make of the way the main committee worked. It may be, like so many of the criticisms one has had to make, that it is something inherent in the present system, but the fact of the matter is that the main committee, when dealing with the reports of the various provincial subcommittees, gave very brief consideration to them. Attempts were made by opposition members to explain in a general way, but as far as members from other provinces were concerned—I am speaking now of the government members on the committee as I tried to observe them—I do not think there was very much attempt made to understand the problems of other provinces or the reports of the subcommittees from other provinces than that of the individual government member concerned.

It would be very interesting today to call upon members of the main committee to sit down and write an examination testing their knowledge of the recommendations of the committee respecting changes in boundaries in other provinces than the one in which they happen to reside. I think such a test would produce some interesting results. I mentioned on Saturday that when at one time I said in the Ontario subcommittee that I would carry a particular matter to the main committee I was met with the answer: "You will not change anything in the main committee." That was an answer by one of the government supporters in the committee—"you will not change anything in the main committee." How perfectly true that was, Mr. Chairman! It was just a case of going through a matter of form in the main committee. A subcommittee from one province would make its report and the government members from the other provinces were there to stand up and vote. Nothing was changed in the main committee. I am saying critically that I do not believe any serious attempt was made by Liberal members of the main committee to understand the reports of subcommittees from any other province but their own.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I interrupt, Mr. Chairman, to have another amendment placed before the committee.

Mr. Boucher: I have an amendment which I should like to move when the matter of redistribution in Saskatchewan is before the committee. I should like to give notice now. The amendment reads as follows:

Deleted from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and added to Qu'Appelle, are the following townships: 16, 18, 19 and 20, and that part of township 21 lying south of the Qu'Appelle river and the eastern two rows of sections in township 17, all in range 19 west of the second meridian.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the population?

Mr. Boucher: Approximately 1,000. The next amendment reads:

Deleted from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and added to Melville, townships 22, 23, 24 and 25, together with that part of township 21, lying north of the Qu'Appelle river, and all in range 18 west of the second meridian.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the population?

Mr. Boucher: Approximately 1,200. The amendment continues:

Deleted from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and added to Yorkton, townships 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and 31, all in range 18 west of the second meridian.

The population is approximately 1,600. I shall reserve the remarks I have to make on this matter until a later time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Wright: What does that make the population of Yorkton?

Mr. Boucher: It makes the population of Yorkton approximately 49,900.

Mr. Fleming: What is now the population of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre?

Mr. Boucher: Approximately 53,000.

Mr. Fleming: There has been gerrymandering, Mr. Chairman, and there have been glaring inequalities created by the proposed redistribution. I propose now to refer specifically to some of these. I do not intend to confine my remarks to one province.

History does repeat itself, Mr. Chairman. Those of us who were in the house at the time of the last redistribution in 1947 will recall the pattern followed at that time. It was not without significance that the ridings selected for major operations by the government of the day were the ridings represented at that time by leading figures in the Progressive Conservative party. One recalls some of those major operations.

There was the case of Mr. Bracken, then leader of the party, who represented the riding of Neepawa. Next to him was a riding represented by another Progressive Conservative, the riding of Portage la Prairie. What could be more obvious than linking those together? And that was done. Then, there was the financial critic for the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Macdonnell), representing then the riding of Muskoka-Ontario. What could be more obvious than to liquidate him by annexing that riding to another? That was done. There was also the hon. member for Lake Centre. At that time a major operation was performed upon his riding. I think it is a great tribute to him that, in spite of the difficulties put in his path by those who were responsible for redistribution in 1947, he came out of the 1949 election with an even greater majority than in 1945. This was in spite of the best efforts of those redistribution surgeons who went to work on his riding in 1947. Then there was the hon. member for Kamloops, who was also singled out for a major operation. One could cite many others. The pattern became familiar, and what we have in 1952 is largely a repetition in that certain prominent members of this party have been singled out for special attention by the Liberal surgeons. It may be something of a compliment to be selected for this class, because the class is outstanding.

Let me review briefly the fate of some of those who have been marked out for special attention. I begin with the province of Saskatchewan. Again the riding of Lake Centre has been singled out for special attention. We see that when the major operation has been performed, the riding of Lake Centre has had removed from it no fewer than 90 townships. There remain 102 townships, but the operation does not end there. There has been added to this riding the whole of the city of Moose Jaw, with a population of some 25,000, as well as 25 other townships. Further, there have been added, from the city of Regina itself, 3,600 people off the riding of Qu'Appelle, and from the outskirts of the city of Regina itself 6,000 people have been added. According to the report of the committee, this makes a total for this riding of 56,800 people. With the exception of the urban riding of Regina, this rural riding is by a considerable measure the most populous of all ridings in Saskatchewan.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is not the only consideration. It is not simply population and size, but the question of access which has to be considered. As most hon. members are aware, the riding of Lake Centre is bisected by Last Mountain lake, which is a serious impediment to access in that riding. It is quite possible in that riding to be ten miles from some place across the lake and have to go ninety miles around the lake to reach it. However, when the Saskatchewan Liberal surgeons had completed their surgery, we find Moose Jaw-Lake Centre to be one of the largest ridings in area and the largest in population outside of the city of Regina. We see interesting comparisons with some of the ridings around it. For instance, here is Qu'Appelle with a population of approximately 41,000; here is the riding of Melville with a population of 42,300. Both of those are smaller in area than the riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. Then there is the riding of Yorkton with 48,300, and a still smaller area than the riding of Muskoka-Lake Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Who is doing the redistribution now?

Mr. Fleming: I mean Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. Of course there have been these last minute changes. The situation was a little too obvious.

Mr. Dewar: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming: We now find them introducing an amendment which will have the effect of taking a thin strip off this proposed new riding. Involving the subtraction of a total of 3,800, it will have the effect of reducing the riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre to 53,000.

Mr. Dewar: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton wants to be fair in his remarks. The area in Yorkton, Melville and Qu'Appelle is something in the neighbourhood of 1,400 square miles greater than the proposed riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Don't talk such nonsense.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. member says "Don't talk such nonsense." I know what I am talking about.

Mr. Fleming: It will not be too difficult, Mr. Chairman, to get the exact area. I think the map speaks eloquently. With respect to comparisons of size and population, here are some of the interesting aspects that do not always appear on the surface. In some of these areas which have been shorn from Lake Centre, we have some interesting facts. For instance, here are the townships that have been shorn off to be added to the riding of Rosetown-Biggar. In the last general election the results were as follows. I will give the names of the candidates and the votes: Diefenbaker, 2,278; MacRae, Liberal candidate, 575; Valleau, C.C.F. candidate, 701. It will not be hard to find the reason for that particular shearing. Then we look a little further along and we find the polls that were shorn off and added to the riding of Yorkton. Here are the results in the last election: Diefenbaker, 367; MacRae, 207; Valleau, 498.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Is that as a result of the amendment which has been placed before the committee?

Mr. Fleming: No. I think the shoe is on the other foot. I think the amendment may be the result of our bringing these facts to light now. Then there are the polls that were shorn off to be added to Humboldt. These were the results in 1949: Diefenbaker, 377; MacRae, 102; Valleau, 449. Then again these are the polls that were shorn off to be added to Melville: Diefenbaker, 425; MacRae, 282; Valleau, 401.

The net result of this shearing was as follows. Here are the votes: Diefenbaker, 3,447; MacRae, 1,166; Valleau, 2,049. You will see that in those particular areas marked for shearing, the hon. member for Lake Centre had a plurality of 1,398 votes and a clear over-all majority of 232. Is it any wonder that those particular areas have been marked off for surgical attention on the part of the government's representatives?

Then if we look at the ridings represented by ministers we find adjoining the riding represented by the Minister of Agriculture, that of Melville, which even after the changes proposed by the amendment, is going to be left with a population of 43,000 while just next door in an area which is larger—

Mr. Dewar: Not much.

Mr. Fleming: I have a difference of opinion with my hon. friends, and we shall have the figures on that matter.

Mr. Dewar: I had them.

Mr. Fleming: It is a much more compact riding, one not divided by a lake creating difficulty of access. The population is 43,000. These figures are not without significance. I think we can see a repetition of what has become a familiar pattern. The higher a man rises in the House of Commons and in the respect of the nation, as long as he is a Progressive Conservative, the more likely is it that the axe will fall on his constituency. That is quite apparent in the case of the distinguished and eminent member for Lake Centre.

Let us move a little further east. Let us move into the province of Manitoba. What do we find there? We find another of these extremely interesting situations. Before leaving the subject of the proposed new riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, may I say that even with these changes that are proposed in the amendment this afternoon it will still leave in that riding 5,275 persons out of the city of Regina.

Mr. Coldwell: It is ridiculous.

Mr. Fleming: As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says, that is utterly ridiculous. Surely it is enough that in this riding there is the city of Moose Jaw without putting into this riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre 5,275 persons from the city of Regina. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, they are not satisfied simply with having these votes out of Regina. All the built-up suburbs of Regina are put into this riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. McCusker: I rise on a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member who is speaking would not want to be wrong. I merely want to set him right. No people are being taken out of the city of Regina. The constituency of Regina is remaining practically the same as it is at the present time, unchanged. There are none being taken out. These votes to which the hon. member has reference were formerly in the constituency of Moose Jaw and Qu'Appelle.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the hon. member for his statement. I did not intend to convey the idea that these 5,275 persons were being taken out of the city of Regina for the first time. As I understand it, they are today in the riding of Qu'Appelle.

Mr. McCusker: No. They are partly in Qu'Appelle and partly in Moose Jaw.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: What I am saying is that there is no occasion whatever for putting 5,275 people who reside within the municipal limits of Regina into the riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. There is no rhyme or reason to it. In addition to that, they take all the people in these suburbs of Regina as well and put them into the riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. McCusker: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the city of Regina still remains the largest constituency in the province.

Mr. Fleming: I have already said that. I have said that it is the most populous. It has 66,000 people. But as the committee made this report, this particular riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre stands next. Surely no sensible person in the house is going to compare a small urban constituency like Regina with the huge rural constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. It is quite apparent that what has been done here is an abortion and that it has been committed at the intended expense of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Blackmore: It sounds like an abomination.

Mr. Fleming: I come now to the province of Manitoba. Here we see a similar pattern. I have recalled what happened in the year 1947 when Mr. Bracken, representing the riding of Neepawa, happened to adjoin the riding represented by another Progressive Conservative, namely the riding of Portage la Prairie. What could have been more obvious on that occasion than to combine the two? And of course the same tactics have stood the Liberal party in good stead here again, because they found the hon. member for Souris, one of the leading members of this house, who has through three parliaments rendered very distinguished service in this house, and whose contributions—

Mr. Weir: On a question of privilege; my hon. friend has referred to the last redistribution of the province of Manitoba, laying emphasis on the joining of Portage la Prairie and Neepawa into one combined constituency. He overlooks the fact that the constituency of Macdonald appeared and was joined to the constituency of Lisgar which were both represented by Liberal members.

Mr. Fleming: I stand precisely by what I said. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa can say what he likes about what happened to the constituency of Macdonald. I am talking about what was practised at the expense of Mr. Bracken and the Progressive Conservative party on that occasion.

Now we see the same surgical operation practised on the ridings of Souris and Brandon. They happened to be adjoining; they happened to be represented by Progressive Conservative members in this house. The hon. member for Souris, who has given distinguished service in this house through three consecutive parliaments and has contributed in a way that has reflected great credit upon him and upon his constituency, is particularly expert on problems of agriculture in this house, and I am sure no one is better informed of the problems of that industry. It happens that next door to him is the riding of a new member in this house, a very promising member, from whom great things are being heard and of whom great things are going to be heard in the future, the hon. member for Brandon. What could be more obvious there, ignoring other things, than to seize on these two ridings and link them together with obvious results?

Here is what we do find, Mr. Chairman, leaving out of consideration for the moment the four urban ridings in the city of Winnipeg. The new riding of Brandon-Souris is the most populous riding in the province of Manitoba, having 54,784 people. Is that a pure accident? Well, those who have sat in this house will not be no naïve as to conclude that anything so obvious was purely accidental. One may look at other ridings and see other ridings in this province substantially smaller in both population and area. But it has suited the purpose of the majority of that committee to take these two ridings and to unite them, with the obvious result that, as I have said, this riding is disproportionately large in both population and area.

Let us go to the beautiful province of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia, it must be said regretfully, loses one seat in the current redistribution. That loss, it was agreed in the subcommittee for the maritime provinces, would come from the southern extremity of the province where four ridings would be combined into three, those four present ridings being Annapolis-Kings, represented by the distinguished member who happens to be president also of the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada; the riding of Digby-Yarmouth; the riding of Queens-Shelburne and the riding of Lunenburg.

It happens that a plan was offered to the Nova Scotia subcommittee which gave an opportunity of taking that area and dividing it almost exactly three ways. Had that suggestion met with approval, the riding of Annapolis-Kings would be retained with a population of 54,930, as at present. It would have remained unchanged. The riding of Digby-Yarmouth, with Barrington municipality included, would have had a population of 49,356. The riding of Lunenburg, with Queens and Shelburne municipality added, would have had a population of 53,619. That would have left Annapolis-Kings with somewhat the largest area of the three, and with a slight margin of population over the other two. But that was not good enough. It looked like too even a break; it looked too much like equality; it looked like too much of representation by population, and so the surgical operation performed by the maritimes subcommittee has resulted in this. The riding of Digby-Annapolis-Kings now has a population of 66,510; the riding of Queens-Lunenburg a population of 45,800; and the riding of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare a population of 45,595. Where is the representation by population there? Where is the principle there, Mr. Chairman? Well, I will tell you what the principle was, Mr. Chairman, and it escaped the lips of a Liberal member of the maritimes subcommittee in the main committee at the conclusion of the discussion. He said this: "This goes back to the situation prior to 1947; this goes back to 1932. And if this division was good enough in 1932 it is good enough in 1952".

Well, Mr. Chairman, what are we dealing with? Are we dealing with the figures of the 1951 census or the figures of the 1931 census? And if we are dealing with the figures of the 1952 census, why should an attempt be made now to rake up old sores and try to settle old accounts? For we were told unmistakably that there had been some hard feelings created by what was done in 1932. So now Liberals were out to square up the accounts in 1952 for the errors of 1932, regardless of what it means in terms of principle, regardless of what it means in terms of representation by population. But, Mr. Chairman, this story does not end there.

I come now to the province of Ontario, and here we have this situation. I have time to mention only three cases which stand out and, I am sure, will appal a fair-minded person. Let us understand, Mr. Chairman, that there had to be changes in Ontario. Shifts in population had occurred. There has been nothing static, and changes had to be made. In every case that fact was faced up to by the minority on the Ontario subcommittee and faced up to frankly. But here is the result of the surgery practised there.

In eastern Ontario three townships and two islands now forming part of the riding of Frontenac-Addington have been added to the city of Kingston. The rest of the historic riding of Frontenac-Addington has been literally thrown into the riding of Hastings-Peterborough. The riding of Hastings-Peterborough is already today by far the largest riding in the whole southern part of the province. When I say "southern part of the province" I am including everything lying south of what we commonly refer to as northern Ontario and Parry Sound. But, by the time this surgical operation is completed, we shall see added to that riding which now embraces 28 townships another 21 townships, making a total of 49 townships. That is added to the population of this riding till it now becomes 43,741, and becomes a veritable empire in itself, with 49 Ontario townships in that empire.

For a basis of comparison let us look around at some of the adjoining ridings. Here I happened to notice Renfrew South, represented by a minister in this house. That riding has at the present time a population of 29,240. Well, just to even things up a bit, a total of 6 townships are added, bringing the population of the riding up to the total of 31,439.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, it is very evident that the hon. gentleman does not know anything about some of the townships which are added to South Renfrew. There is a township there—

Mr. Fleming: If the minister wants to make a speech—this is not a point of order—he can speak afterwards.

Mr. McCann: I say that you misrepresented—

Mr. Fleming: No, Mr. Chairman. If it is a matter of privilege, all right; but the minister wants to make a speech.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As I apprehend it, the minister has risen on a question of privilege. I would like to hear the minister's question.

Mr. McCann: My question of privilege is that the hon. member is misrepresenting the position when he refers to the transfer of townships. One township that is transferred to South Renfrew is the township of Dickens. It is an entirely barren township. There are 16 people there; and I suggest that the name be changed to "Fleming".

Mr. Hees: That really stinks.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, are you going to tolerate that? May I ask, sir, if you are going to tolerate that? It was put forward as a question of privilege, and you can see it had nothing to do with privilege. There was no correction mentioned, and the minister has chosen to interject a palpable, intentional insult. I request you, as chairman of the committee, to ask the minister to comply with the rules of the house at this point.

The Deputy Chairman: I cannot see that there was anything insulting in what the minister said. But in these matters where we are discussing certain ridings I would ask hon members of the committee to allow the person who has the floor to proceed with his speech uninterrupted. If an hon. member wishes to reply at a later time in the debate with regard to matters being raised, he is of course at liberty to do so.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but did he refer to the boundaries of the new riding, or to the old riding of Hastings-Peterborough, as it was before?

Mr. Fleming: In which remark?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): When you spoke about the area of the riding.

Mr. Fleming: Of Hastings-Peterborough?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes.

Mr. Fleming: I said that the riding of Hastings-Peterborough prior to the redistribution—in other words, as it stands today—had 28 townships, and that there were added to it in the formation of the new riding of Hastings-Frontenac 21 townships from Frontenac-Addington making a total of 49 townships.

Mr. McIlraith: Many of them had no population at all.

Mr. Fleming: The fact of the matter is that there are over 17,000 people added. Over 17,000 people were added. The result is that this riding now has a population of 43,741. It is a veritable empire of 49 townships; while, right alongside of it, is the riding of Renfrew South which, even with the addition of six townships, will have a population of just 31,439.

Now, if you are looking for a basis of comparison, compare the riding of South Renfrew with this veritable empire, this proposed riding of Hastings-Frontenac. The Minister of National Revenue, who rose a moment ago in such dudgeon, is apparently uneasy. I can understand why he should be. His riding is increased by very little. It will be about half the size of the riding of Hastings-Frontenac and it will have 12,000 fewer people in it than the riding of Hastings-Frontenac.

Is that fair at all? Is that representation by population? The fact of the matter is that the minister refused to take any more, we were told.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, he just put down his foot and said he would not have it.

Mr. McCann: I had nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. Fleming: I suppose that is the minister's contribution to fair play. But let us leave that monstrosity of a situation and proceed farther west.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

We then come to the riding of Haldimand which is represented in the House of Commons by a very distinguished and thoroughly admirable Progressive Conservative member of the house. The fact of the matter is that the result of the changes that have been made in Haldimand is to destroy a riding which has been traditionally Conservative, and to leave unchanged alongside of it a riding with over 89,000 people in it. This is the price that has been paid for the extermination of the riding of Haldimand, with 89,000 people remaining in the adjoining riding.

Is that representation by population—with 89,000 people in one county? There is no suggestion made of evening up the population there. There was a perfectly good plan put forward to even up the population; but the majority in the committee were not at all interested in evening up the population. They were only interested in the extermination of the riding of Haldimand. And they succeeded; they have done it. But they will be called upon to pay the price at the polls some day.

Then we go farther west. The reason given for the extermination, or for putting forward the extermination of Haldimand, was that there were in it 24,138 persons. But, you see, we come to the next smallest riding, farther west, which happens to be represented by a Liberal. It has 24,463 persons in it, or 325 more than Haldimand had. But let us see what happened. What treatment was handed out to it? All kinds of gymnastics were gone through in order to retain that riding in existence. Townships were picked off elsewhere and added to it here, yonder and different places, fiddling here and fiddling there with the riding, always in an effort to keep that riding alive.

Now, that is all very well if you can arrive at a result which can be justified in principle. But I am afraid we have a result where a riding with 24,138 in it is exterminated, without regard for the fact that alongside it is a riding with nearly 90,000 in it. And a little farther west we see another riding alongside others with populations not large, by comparison, a riding with 24,463 kept alive by all kinds of what I call gymnastics, juggling with townships here and townships there.

Now I wish to make a comment on what happened. Finally the subcommittee got down to changing four present ridings into three. Three of those ridings were represented by Liberals, and one by a member of the Progressive Conservative party. So you know what happened. It was perfectly obvious. The one Conservative seat was marked out, and the plan that appears in the schedule to the bill represents a slicing of the riding into three parts. What could be more clear!

There is an amendment which was put forward this morning by the hon. member for Ottawa West, and which is an improvement. I have told him so, and I wish to repeat now that it is an improvement. It reduces the extent of the operation performed on the riding of Huron North. But the fact of the matter is that in the net result the hand is there. It is the same overriding purpose. And in the net result we have exposed the very same thing as happened in 1947, where this seat has been cut up as one returning a member of the Progressive Conservative party.

Now, it may be that this is a sort of compliment to members of this party, to be selected in this way for liquidation, and to have special attention paid to them by the Liberal surgeons on the redistribution committee. But in my submission those tactics are not good enough. Surely there could not be exposed a more palpable attempt to use the mechanism of redistribution to effect the liquidation of certain prominent and very active members of the official opposition.

Mr. McIlraith: To give the complete picture, refer to Glengarry-Prescott.

Mr. Fleming: I am very glad to do that, because I wish to be fair. The ridings of Glengarry and Prescott are, in the report of the committee, proposed to be united into the riding of Glengarry-Prescott. It so happens—and these were the reasons that prompted the committee to make this recommendation—that Glengarry has the smallest population of all the ridings in the province, a population of 17,702. Prescott is the fourth smallest, with a population of 25,576. That was the reason for joining them. We of the official opposition did not call for that. It was a situation which appeared to the majority of the committee from the beginning. It was not our suggestion. There the matter has stood.

Now that does represent as things stand—and I wish to be fair about it—a reduction by one Liberal seat in the House of Commons. But, Mr. Chairman, that is no answer at all to what has been done elsewhere. And it all points to this, that as long as this method is going to be used it will be possible for the majority on the committee—because the committee is composed of partisans—it will be possible for the majority on the committee to perform a surgical operation which will have the intended effect of exterminating political opponents who happen to enjoy prominence sufficient to attract that kind of attention. I said this morning that—

Mr. Blue: You said it several times.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member who has just interrupted was one of those who had something to say about this. As a matter of fact, he objected. His riding has 28,205 people in it and he objected—I can understand his reason for doing so—to the addition of certain townships from the north end of Huron riding. His riding is a long, narrow riding, and that was one reason he gave for objecting. I am not castigating him for that, but the fact of the matter is that the net result is that his riding stands as unchanged, and will be the smallest in Ontario, while other ridings, like Haldimand, were marked out for extermination.

It is high time that a method was devised that will pay some attention to the maintenance of principle in these cases. When it comes to arriving at a fair approach to the problem of urban and rural representation surely there ought to be some agreement as to the principle to be followed. Every member accepts the principle that area should be taken into account and that rural representation should be higher in proportion than urban representation, but if you look over this map and compare urban riding with urban riding, and rural riding with rural riding, you will find the most extraordinary contrast, both in area and population.

That is the reason I compared the proposed new riding of Hastings-Frontenac with the adjoining riding of Renfrew South. Renfrew South contains the town of Renfrew but in the proposed riding of Hastings-Frontenac there is no town to compare with that in size. So that if anything, going on that basis, the riding of Hastings or the riding of Frontenac should have a higher proportionate representation than the riding of Renfrew South. But that is not what happened. The surgeons went to work and they practically doubled the riding of Hastings-Peterborough until it is a huge thing on the map here, when right alongside is another riding with less than half the area and only about 75 per cent of the population, which is represented by a minister of the crown.

I have just one other observation to make. I think due account should be taken of the demands upon ministers and I do not think that they should be singled out to have population thrust upon them where it would not be fair to do so, but by the same token a minister should not have any more favoured consideration than hon. members of this house who also carry heavy responsibilities.

If you look at the riding in northern Ontario represented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—I am comparing it with other ridings in northern Ontario, not with ridings in southern Ontario or with urban ridings—you will find that in area it is one of the smallest ridings in northern Ontario. Even with some slight boundary changes which are proposed, it finishes up with a population of 32,000, which is 22,000 less than the present average of other ridings in northern Ontario. It is one of the smallest ridings in northern Ontario in population; it does not begin to compare in population with some of the large ridings in northern Ontario.

Hon. members may have their own ideas about the modern definition of pocket boroughs, but I am suggesting that simply because an hon. member of this house happens to be a minister is no reason for extending favourable consideration to him. This matter should be dealt with on the basis of principle and some sensible attempt should be made at achieving equality of representation subject to the proper considerations and allowance being made for the differences between urban and rural populations.

The amendments that have been put before the committee, even when all put together, are not really significant in changing the picture. What has been put before us in the report of this committee is I submit something devoid of principle. It is not a redistribution that may be said to be comprehensive. I urge that we ought not to adopt this scheme of redistribution. Let us find a better method of going about it if this is the best that a parliamentary committee dominated by a Liberal majority can do.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about this present system of redistribution. First of all, I would point out that there is a complete lack of principle in dealing with this redistribution across Canada. As has been mentioned in other debates, concessions have been given to Prince Edward Island in that they can never go below their Senate representation which gives them four seats. With less than 100,000 population it means that there are four constituencies with less than 25,000 population each. I am not objecting to that, but I do want to point out that differences do exist in certain parts of this country.

One of the first things this committee did was to bring in the formula known as the 15 per cent formula which provided that no province should lose more than 15 per cent of its constituencies as a result of the change in population as shown by the last census.

An amendment was moved that the formula should be 10 per cent, but that amendment was voted down on a partisan basis. Every member supporting the government voted down that amendment. Had the amendment been adopted it would have assured three extra seats on the prairies, one for Manitoba, one for Saskatchewan and one for Alberta. By not adopting the amendment three voices which could speak on behalf of those provinces were eliminated. That was a most important move by the committee.

It will thus be seen that we are not following a genuine principle across the country in an effort to achieve representation by population. It now means that Manitoba loses two seats and Saskatchewan loses three. Manitoba has gained in population in the last ten years while Saskatchewan has fallen off. The result is that it will require an average of 6,400 more population for a constituency in Manitoba to elect a member than will be required in Saskatchewan. That is a rather unfair situation to exist in two provinces situated side by side. As I say, one province has increased considerably in population while the other has faced a considerable decrease in population.

A great deal has been said by previous speakers about the way in which redistribution has been carried out across the country. As I pointed out, we had to lose two seats in my province. I was a member of the committee and I do not think we followed any general principle as to what seats should be eliminated. I do not think those two seats should have been taken from the opposition. We are losing one seat in central Manitoba which, as has been pointed out, has the largest population of any rural seat in the province. If it was right to take away one seat in the central part of the province, then I think that should have been followed by taking two seats.

The other seat was Souris, which has a small population. It is a corner riding. Irrespective of the stories that we have heard in the past, the first consideration of the committee when it met was whether the constituency of Lisgar should be eliminated. That is, we would take two corner seats, both of which were small in population, and make two seats rather than three in southern Manitoba. However, we got into an argument about racial origins and matters of that sort and it was decided that we could not proceed on that basis. It was decided we could not proceed on that basis but that was the first proposition. There were several counter-proposals discussed before the committee. As the result of all these discussions the proposal was adopted by a majority vote that in the case of Souris some 84 townships should be joined with 53 townships of Brandon, including the city of Brandon which has a population of 20,000, thus giving a population of 54,784 to the new Brandon-Souris constituency. I think one should keep in mind that the number of townships involved is 137 because a comparison was made this morning by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I believe, of St. Boniface and Brandon-Souris, and he mentioned how well it had worked out.

Before referring to that comparison I might say that there are another 31 townships of Brandon which will now be in Marquette constituency, and the other 18 townships of Souris are to be taken into the constituency of Lisgar. However, when anybody compares the proposed constituency of Brandon-Souris with St. Boniface I should like to point out that the city of St. Boniface has a population of some 26,000, 6,000 greater than the city of Brandon. The constituency of St. Boniface will now have approximately 33 townships including the city of St. Boniface compared with 137 in Brandon-Souris. The population of St. Boniface constituency will be 52,218 or only 2,500 less than Brandon-Souris. Surely there is no principle of parity there as to either area or population. I think the set-up of these two ridings is most unfair from the point of view of either area or population.

Several of the counter-proposals would have produced a much better looking map than is now the case so far as the map of Manitoba is concerned. With respect to the central ridings, part of the present riding of Selkirk is now to be included in Portage-Neepawa. If one wishes to leave Winnipeg to drive to Riding Mountain national park and Clear lake one will follow Portage avenue or St. James street and at the outskirts of the city one enters the riding of Portage-Neepawa which at that point is some eighteen to twenty miles across from north to south. When you reach Poplar Point on No. 1 highway there is a narrow neck in the constituency where it is less than six miles wide north and south. Then you enter an area which extends to a great distance north and south, and if you follow highway No. 1 to Carberry and drive north to Riding Mountain national park and Clear lake you cover a distance of almost 200 miles. On the map Portage-Neepawa has a very peculiar appearance. I admit that the community of interest is east and west and that one travels mainly east and west, but I do say that political considerations have certainly played a great part in the majority report presented on behalf of the Manitoba subcommittee.

I think the same thing can be said of several other provinces but I want to point out particularly what I think is a very great disparity between what now may be considered the urban-rural ridings of St. Boniface and Brandon-Souris. Again I repeat that I think it was quite unnecessary to deal with the ridings of Souris and Brandon as they have been dealt with in this instance. From the points of view of geography and representation I do not think there has been equality of treatment, and again I am bound to agree with those who say there has been considerable gerrymandering in the redefining of boundaries in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, as I said when speaking in the debate on Saturday, one of the very desirable features of a redistribution commission would be that it would eliminate any chance of political vindictiveness or reprisal on the part of the party in power. I think anybody who has examined the redistribution that has taken place, will agree that there are at least three very regrettable instances of political vindictiveness. Three members who played a prominent part in bringing to light the gross negligence that the government displayed in mishandling the foot-and-mouth disease last winter—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: We are over that spot now.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: The mouth disease appears to be here.

Mr. Hees: —were the members for Lake Centre, Souris and Brant-Wentworth. It is obvious from the gerrymandering that has taken place in the ridings of these three members, that the government has decided that they must be taught a lesson, and set up as horrible examples of what happens to members who have the courage to stand up and expose the mishandling of affairs by the government.

An hon. Member: You want to be careful, George.

Mr. Hees: Take, for example, the riding of Lake Centre. That riding has been literally mutilated. There is no other word one can find to describe the situation. The riding has simply been mutilated.

An hon. Member: Obliterated.

Mr. Hees: Somebody has said "obliterated". For all practical purposes one can say that it has been obliterated. Large parts of the riding which have always been in the constituency of Lake Centre, and which have always given the present member a large majority, have very conveniently been removed; and in their place, large areas have been substituted, such as the city of Moose Jaw, which, of course, has voted heavily C.C.F. in the past. Finally, from the riding of Qu'Appelle, which is right next door, 3,600 people have been transferred to Lake Centre.

An hon. Member: C.C.F.

Mr. Hees: They have been fairly strongly C.C.F., and they have been transferred to Lake Centre even though the riding of Qu'Appelle has a population of only 41,600, and the new riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has a population of 53,000. I should like to hear anybody get up and try to justify that that little bit of gerrymandering. There is no explanation at all, other than the simple fact that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle happened to be a member of the Saskatchewan subcommittee on redistribution. He just did not want to have those 3,600 people in his riding any more, and so they were transferred to Lake Centre. That is the kind of explanation one finds all the way down the line.

Mr. Dewar: Speak for yourself. Don't speak for me.

Mr. Hees: Of course he was a Liberal or it would not have been done. Now take the cases of the hon. members for Souris and Brant-Wentworth. The Liberal party looked around and determined that these two members should also be taught a lesson. Unfortunately, there were no large handy blocks of C.C.F. votes to put in these ridings to help to eliminate the two present members, and the Liberal members in the adjoining ridings were not willing to give up Liberal votes to help defeat them. What did the Liberal party do? They simply joined the two ridings involved with two other Conservative ridings, in the hope that in the nominations for the combined ridings, the offending members would be eliminated.

That is the kind of thing that has been taking place with respect to redistribution, and those are three reasons why redistribution by an independent impartial commission is an absolute must if we are ever going to have the job done on a fair and equitable basis.

Mr. Boucher: What about Saskatchewan? Tell us about Swift Current and Maple Creek.

Mr. Hees: I was not a member of the redistribution committee, but I am told by those who were members of the subcommittees that in several cases the subcommittees did not at all resemble democratic committees; where people present their case; are heard in a democratic way; have the pros and cons of their case listened to; and receive a fair deal. In several cases, these committees were far more like kangaroo courts, with the decision made ahead of time, and the maps drawn before the committee even met. I think that is the kind of procedure that should be reserved for dictatorship. It is the sort of thing that happens in dictatorships, and the fact that the practice is creeping more and more into the way things are done by this government is, I think, very regrettable indeed. We have democratic institutions and ways of doing things, of which we are proud, and I am sorry to see that we seem to be slipping away from that democratic way and getting more and more into the dictatorial way.

I just have one last hope, and I suppose it is a last hope, that some of these real injustices will be reconsidered before this bill is passed, and that in the interests of fair play and good government these wrongs will be righted.

Mr. McIlraith: In view of the speech by the hon. member for Broadview I think perhaps I ought to take a few moments of the time of the committee to try to clarify some matters with respect to Ontario.

It is not always an easy job, of course, to deal with redistribution in a committee. I believe it is only fair that the house should be told that the smallest constituency in Ontario at the present time is Glengarry. When hon. members talk about historic constituencies and so on, it is probably well to realize that that county has had a very outstanding history. If the remarks about the great history of any county are to be applied to other counties, they certainly should be applied to that one. This constituency happens to be represented today by a Liberal. I think the term used by the opposition is a "distinguished" Liberal—certainly I think a distinguished and outstanding Liberal—but in any event that is the first constituency you deal with in Ontario.

This constituency was joined with the fourth smallest constituency in the province, Prescott. Prescott had a population of 25,576, and that is a constituency with a very fine history, too. It is a constituency represented in this house by a Liberal member. I do not understand why the opposition always pick out only one or two illustrations upon which to make their case. If they have an argument, surely they should deal with the whole matter. These two, the first and fourth smallest constituencies, were joined together. It is a most difficult and frankly embarrassing thing to agree to having them joined together, but it is the fair and proper thing to do in all the circumstances.

Now then, the second smallest constituency in the province of Ontario is Haldimand. Much has been said about that historic county today. Abutting Haldimand on the one side is the constituency of Welland. A new constituency has been created there, but nothing has been said by the opposition about that new constituency so far. Not only that; another constituency that was mentioned a great deal this morning was Brant-Wentworth, represented in the house by an opposition member. This constituency extends from the city of Hamilton to the city of Brantford. Not quite half of its population was put in with a portion of the population of the present constituency of Wentworth, and the remainder was joined together with the second smallest constituency in the province. Naturally it is a matter of regret that there are two sitting members of the opposition party representing those two constituencies. I understand the feelings of the opposition members on that point, but those feelings are no greater than the feelings of other parties when these things arise, including the party in power at the moment. It is unfortunate that the present member for Brant-Wentworth lives in that part of his constituency that will be in Haldimand, if the suggestion now before the committee should be carried out. It is unfortunate, but the fact remains that the argument would have been completely destroyed if he had lived in that part of his constituency which is in the city of Hamilton. The argument is based on the residence of the sitting member, and not on a question of joining counties. It is unfortunate, and I am quite frank to say that I do not like the idea of the constituencies of the members being joined together like that, but under the circumstances I think it is the fair and proper thing to do.

The next constituency which has been mentioned is that of Wellington North. It is the third smallest, and I shall come back to it in a moment. The fourth smallest is Prescott, and I have mentioned what happened to it. The next one is Huron North. Huron North and Wellington North abut each other, and an attempt was made to work out something that would join those two together. As the hon. member for Huron North will be the first to agree, I think, it is not proper at all to do that, having in mind the layout of the counties and the surveys. It is not a proper way of approaching the thing. The surveys in that area, incidentally, are rather peculiar, and the boundaries of these old historic counties are quite curious because of the fact the surveys have different fronts. Some of them front on Georgian bay, some on lake Huron and some to the south. In any event, an attempt has been made to take the historic county of Huron and keep it—

Mr. Cardiff: Eliminate it entirely.

Mr. McIlraith: —as a constituency. It is quite true that in the effort to do that the county of Bruce to the north is left with a small population. We did suggest putting some of the townships out of Huron in with it and increasing the population by 4,000, but that suggestion was dropped because I think the hon. member for Huron North would be the first to agree that it is better to have them back in Huron, even though it does make for a disparity in population. Under the present suggestion, Huron will have practically all its townships, with the exception of two townships put into Wellington North, together with one township from Perth in the south; that is what was done there.

This brings me to the sixth smallest constituency in the province, which is the constituency of Hastings-Peterborough. Admittedly it is a large area. It is a very rough piece of country, and is serviced by one main highway, No. 7, running across it. This is what is to be done with Hastings-Peterborough. The smallest city constituency in the province was Kingston city with 36,000, obviously rather small when you are talking about areas as the hon. member for Eglinton was doing a moment ago. I did not compute the area of Kingston city, but I would think it would be of the order of one mile square. I am subject to correction on that point, but in any event it would be very small.

Mr. Fraser: It would be more than that.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps it would be one and one-quarter mile square, something of that order. What was done there was to take the suburbs of the city of Kingston where, incidentally, they are going through the problems of annexation with all that involves, and add six townships adjacent to Kingston city to bring it up to a population of 55,000. Surely, that is a fair and proper attempt to deal with the problem.

This left Frontenac abutting Hastings-Peterborough, the sixth smallest constituency with a population of 17,000. This 17,000 was combined with Hastings-Peterborough into a new constituency with a population of 43,000. It is quite true that the area of the new constituency is large, but I would point out that a number of townships in there have no population at all. Be that as it may, the population admittedly is large. It is an awkward constituency in that it does violate the boundaries of counties; but there is no other way. None of these counties in the immediate area have sufficient population to stand on their own. There is one other feature. It is serviced by one main highway running right across its length and practically all the population is on that highway, with the exception of another branch highway to the north.

A great deal was said about Renfrew South in connection with the Hastings-Peterborough situation. May I just remind hon. members that if they can devise, for getting from Renfrew South into the Hastings and Peterborough counties, a way that is feasible and workable without travelling tremendous distances, I wish they would come forward with it. I do not know of any. There just is not any. The townships of Hastings-Peterborough abutting on the Renfrew South constituency just simply have not the population, nor is it possible to get access to them from that position.

Mr. Fraser: There is a highway right down to Kaladar.

Mr. McIlraith: I have examined the roads fairly well, and if anyone wants to argue on the road situation there I can say it is fairly bad. I think the hon. member for Lanark is reasonably familiar with the road situation and I believe he will agree with me if I go so far as to say that the road situation is rather bad in that area and that it is a fairly inaccessible area.

I have dealt with the six smallest constituencies and shown how they have been combined. Perhaps I should take the largest constituencies and show what has been done with them. There was one matter of some embarrassment; that was the city of Toronto. As everyone knows who deals with the city of Toronto, there is a question as to whether or not that city is over-represented. We passed that matter by and I think we were right in doing that, in all the circumstances. But I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Broadview, of all people, arguing the merits of redistribution in Ontario this afternoon; because if there is one thing that is self evident in Toronto it is that the area east of the Don river these three constituencies of Broadview, Greenwood and Danforth do fairly well on population figures, if you are talking about the elimination of constituencies. In any event, we agreed not to do that.

I think there is a situation there which, in fairness to the house, could not be overlooked; and I think we arrived at something that was quite workable. We took the smallest one, namely the constituency of Danforth in the city of Toronto and added 27,000 of population from the township of Scarborough immediately abutting that constituency. That procedure does not in any way do any violence to the road system. It is the back area immediately adjacent to Danforth. That is what was done there. In any event, I now revert to my former point, namely of taking the largest constituencies and dealing with them one by one.

The largest constituency in the province was York East with a population of 159,000. Of that number 27,000 were taken and joined to Danforth, the smallest city seat in Toronto. The remainder was divided approximately in two; and I think there can be no charge of unfairness with regard to our dealing with that constituency.

The next largest constituency is York West, with a population of 126,000. That was divided in two and I think there can be no charge of unfairness in the method of division. The two constituencies have a population within a thousand of each other.

Mr. Adamson: What is the population?

Mr. McIlraith: It is 126,420. I will give the precise population of the new constituencies if I can find the sheet. The new constituency of York-Humber will have 64,480 and the new constituency of York West will have 63,816. I was overgenerous when I said there was a difference of almost 1,000; it is 600.

The next largest constituency is Welland. Its population was 123,233. Incidentally it is a constituency abutting on Haldimand. Instead of amalgamating the two, we divided Welland in two. I have not the figures with me at the moment, but it is an even division. I think there can be no disagreement with the boundaries there.

The next largest constituency is York North, having a population of 122,538. That constituency was divided in two. The next largest constituency is Wentworth having a population of 119,728. That constituency, plus 750 of population that was in the former Brant-Wentworth constituency and was within the city of Hamilton, was divided in two, making a purely city constituency and another by putting together the remainder of Wentworth county that was in Wentworth constituency and the part of Wentworth county that was in Brant-Wentworth constituency. It seems to me that is the fair thing to do. That means Hamilton now has three wholly city seats and Wentworth county has one member with I think the right number of population in relation to a built-up county of that sort.

The next largest constituency was Sudbury. Subject to adjusting the population in order to meet the travel conditions with the two railway lines through the area, that constituency was divided in two; and I have not heard a word of quarrelling or difference of opinion with respect to the division of that area.

The point I want to make is that I have shown how the six smallest constituencies were combined and the six largest constituencies were divided in two. It seems to me that point has not been dealt with by those criticizing the plan. The truth of the matter is that there cannot be much criticism within that field. The criticism I felt might be levelled at us is that maybe we did not go far enough, or that we should have continued and tried to readjust all constituencies. There are endless problems if you get into that field. However, I felt these things should be put on the record here in answer to the arguments of the opposition.

There may be things they want to say about particular constituencies, and I well understand their feelings with respect to particular members who happen to live in the areas being combined. Incidentally it arose only in one case as far as the official opposition is concerned, and in that case it arises only because of the fact that the hon. member happens to live in one part of his constituency. I would remind hon. members, when they speak so strongly on that point, that it is no less personally embarrassing and personally unpleasant to amalgamate constituencies which are wholly represented by Liberal members. It is no less embarrassing at all. I think the committee should realize that fact and deal with the matter on that basis.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I think we have here an illustration of how redistribution should not be done. If ever a parliament had a demonstration of how it should not be done, this parliament is having one at the present moment. This is to a large extent an unseemly controversy largely among members of parliament.

I am not going to go into the details that have already been gone into by other members of the house regarding the various constituencies. I have before me a map of the province of Saskatchewan. I have a great respect for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I am very sorry indeed that he is associated with the kind of thing that is being done in this redistribution, and particularly as I see the map of Saskatchewan at the present time. For example, I cannot understand why the constituency of Moose Jaw should include part of the suburbs of Regina as well as part of the city itself. I think the thing is so palpably absurd and so palpably abhorrent to both the people of Moose Jaw and of Regina that it is very difficult for me to understand why anyone would take responsibility for such a suggestion. Even at this late stage I think the parts of the city proper and the suburbs of Regina should be restored to Regina. As a matter of fact that would increase the population of that constituency to around 70,000 and the objection will be taken that 70,000 is above the quota set for constituencies under redistribution. There are 17 constituencies in the province of Ontario alone that have populations of 70,000 or over under the new proposed redistribution. There is one Nova Scotia seat which might be classified as rural, though there are some incorporated towns in it. I refer to the constituency of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings, which will now be Digby-Annapolis-Kings. That has a population of pretty close to 70,000, over 66,000 anyway. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says the constituencies of Winnipeg North Centre, Winnipeg South Centre and the other Winnipeg constituencies are all 75,000 or over. I am told that one of them has a population of 80,000. Then what is the objection to doing the right, the proper, the intelligent and sensible thing and putting the suburbs of Regina where they belong, namely in the city of Regina? It is absurd to take the suburbs of a city and put that suburban area into a rural constituency. Other areas included in Moose Jaw are inside the Regina city limits; I am talking about what were once the suburbs. They are inside the city limits. To put areas inside the city limits of Regina into the constituency of Moose Jaw is an absurdity, and I can tell you that both the people of Moose Jaw and Regina will resent it, and will properly show their resentment a year or so from now, as they should.

Mr. Fleming: The sooner the better.

Mr. Coldwell: The thing is so palpably a gerrymander that one could not resist rising and saying a word at this time.

I look at this map and note the area of Saskatchewan where the population has been increasing over the last ten, fifteen or twenty years, the northern portion. I find the constituency of whatever it is to be called, now Prince Albert, has a population of 56,000. Mackenzie has 49,600. Down in the southeast, where the population has been dropping, you find Moose Mountain with a population of 41,300 and Qu'Appelle with 41,500.

Mr. Dewar: It is 42,500.

Mr. Coldwell: That is under the amendment that was made this afternoon. Well, on the map it is 41,000. We now have it at 42,500. Then there is Melville with a population of 43,500. Those are in areas where the population has been dropping.

Mr. Gardiner: About the same as yours.

Mr. Coldwell: I know. Just a minute; I am not talking about my own constituency. I have not lifted a finger in connection with my own constituency.

Mr. Gardiner: No, but the population is about the same.

Mr. Coldwell: And I do not intend to lift a finger regarding it. But let me point out to the minister that if we had a commission sitting in connection with redistribution in my constituency I would not have 250 miles of an almost impassable river running through the centre and cutting it in half. I am not going to say anything about that, but I understand that the population of my proposed constituency is 44,300. The reason for that is that it has an area of very large farms, and the consolidation of the—

Mr. Gardiner: I am just rising to say that if my hon. friend will divide the number of rural seats into the population of the rural communities he will find that it is about that figure. That is the only reason.

Mr. Coldwell: Very good; but if that is the case, why 56,000 in Prince Albert-Melfort, in a district where the population has been increasing over the last while?

Mr. Boucher: Because of the large city of Prince Albert.

Mr. Coldwell: Look at the rural area in it.

Mr. Boucher: A large city.

Mr. Coldwell: A large city in it? Look at Swift Current, 50,700. If that is because it has a large city in it why should not Regina be in the same position? Why should a part of the city itself be taken out of Regina if you are keeping the whole of Swift Current and increasing the population of the Swift Current constituency? The same applies to Prince Albert.

Mr. Gardiner: It was not taken out; it was that way before.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps it was that way before, but that does not make it right. That is the whole point. It does not make it right; and the city of Regina—

Mr. Gardiner: They did not take it out.

Mr. Coldwell: The city of Regina has grown quite a lot in the last ten years, as the minister knows. I can remember that the first time I was elected to the Regina city council in 1921 the population was 26,000. Now it is 66,000. The fact that certain areas have been outside the city over those years and are now within the city limits does not mean that we should stick to the old boundaries of the constituency of Regina.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend will not object if I state to him what was the basis that was taken by the provincial committee in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not think the minister was on the committee.

Mr. Gardiner: I can still talk, and I can hear, and the people who are on the committee talk to me, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend thinks there is anything peculiar about that I should like to ask him if he discussed the matter with his own people, to find out whether any of them had opinions on the matter or not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is why my hon. friend—

Mr. Gardiner: Anyone who was not interested enough to discuss the matter in the last four weeks should not be in this house.

Mr. Coldwell: I had the floor. I was quite willing to have the minister say a few words, but I am not going to sit down and allow a debate between him and the other side of the house in the middle of my speech.

Mr. Gardiner: May I make a short statement?

Mr. Coldwell: How short?

Mr. Gardiner: Just about two sentences. The basis followed by the committee was this. They gave the two cities representation, and they figured it out at 66,000 in one and 56,000 in the other, approximately. They deducted that from the population of Saskatchewan. Then there were six city seats left, and they estimated about 50,000 per seat, not exactly 50,000 but about that, and then they took the rest of the population and divided it about as equally as they could among the other nine rural constituencies.

Mr. Coldwell: It is very interesting to hear the Minister of Agriculture tell us how the thing was done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sure.

Mr. Coldwell: Sitting beside me is the hon. member for Melfort. He was on that committee, and this is the first time he has heard how it was done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I am in that position.

Mr. Coldwell: So who actually did this job?

Mr. Gardiner: Anyone with a pencil could have sat down and figured it out at any time.

Mr. Harkness: It is a "jimmymander".

Mr. Coldwell: I think that as far as this map of Saskatchewan is concerned, it should be rejected in its entirety at the present time and the whole matter started over again. You have only to look at it, you have only to look at the way the jogs occur in the map, to see that certain polls have been taken from one constituency to strengthen or weaken another constituency, and so on, to realize exactly what has been done.

I am not going to make a long speech. I have now said all I wish to say. I think the manner in which this has been done is a reflection on the House of Commons. I think it demonstrates that we should do what has been done in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and several other countries, and turn over the matter of redistribution to an expert committee such as I suggested some years ago. I am not suggesting who the personnel of the committee should be, but I am suggesting the kind of committee when I say it should have a judge as chairman, and that as members of the commission there should be a statistician who could deal with figures, and a geographer or surveyor or whatever he would be called, to consider the topographical features of the countryside.

The procedure we are now following does none of these things. It is done purely on the basis of political deals. As one member of the committee said to me—and I am speaking of a government member—when I said something about redistribution, "We do not look at the map; we look into the faces of our friends." And the friends are on both sides of the house, may I add. I am not saying it is done always among political friends. Sometimes there are friendships across the floor of the house, and those friendships have some influence in setting up the constituencies.

I do not know of any stronger indictment that could be made of the manner of carrying out redistribution than the present proposed map of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: Except the one drawn recently in Saskatchewan probably.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friend says except the one drawn in Saskatchewan; but it was not an abomination like this one.

Mr. Gardiner: This is not an abomination. The other one was.

Mr. Coldwell: Let me say, because it is generally known that I did say this, that I said in Saskatchewan long before the redistribution was undertaken that it should have been carried out by an independent commission. I say that now, and I said it before it was done. But it was done the other way. After all, it may not have been liked, but it would not have made any difference to the results of the recent provincial election. This is the worst thing I ever saw.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I usually have good attention when I speak; no one interrupts me. I happened to be in the house when the hon. member for Ottawa West was doling out the soothing syrup. One would almost have thought from the tone of what he had to say that the operation performed in Ontario was a success.

I happened to be on that committee. I noticed this morning when the hon. member for Eglinton was referring to the dissection and the vivisection that took place, that he described it as a surgical operation, as if it were being performed by professional men. In my opinion it was nothing but plain butchery; and they used not only the butcher knife but the cleaver.

Anyone who would take the trouble to look at the map of Ontario, and the proposed redistribution, must be ashamed of the job that was done. We could take people from our institutions in Ontario who would have done a better job of it. They could not have done any worse. I do appreciate having been a member of the committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: While the Ontario subcommittee was a good one, I think the minister was placed in an unfortunate position. I do not think it was fair to place an assignment of this kind upon him as a minister of the crown. Those of us in the opposition attempted to do what was fair; but there was not much we could do. It was apparent from what happened that our representations were of no avail. That is one reason I spoke with such force on Saturday, stating that this kind of redistribution could not be worse if it had been handled by kids.

Some principle is supposed to be involved. Well, I never saw less principle than has been shown in the redistribution of Ontario seats. If the principle applied in one area did not suit the Liberal members on the committee, it would not be applied in another area. Or, failing that, they would apply a different principle.

We have a perfect set-up in northern Ontario, with its ten ridings averaging about 52,000 people. I should have thought that would have been a fair basis for redistribution in respect of the various seats, always having due regard to whether they are urban or rural. But at the very first meeting we were given the ultimatum that there was an extra seat to be placed in at Sudbury—no question about it. It just had to go in. Yet we find a minister's riding immediately to the west, that of Algoma East, with a population of only 30,629. True enough they applied the cleaver here and there and gave him enough so he would be able to say that his riding was increased.

The same may be said of Renfrew South, which is represented in the house by another minister. And, by the way, if he wishes to designate as "Fleming" and "Murphy" the two townships to which he referred a moment ago, I would take one of them; but I would want to have my choice.

Mr. McCann: You can take the one with the 80 people in it; that is about your size.

Mr. Murphy: I would be very happy with those 80 people—

Mr. McCann: You would get lost among the rocks.

Mr. Murphy: —because some of them would be Irish. Under this method of carrying out redistribution we have one minister with a riding of only a little more than 30,000. The riding of the minister who served as chairman of the committee has a population of some 35,000. The hon. member for Ottawa West referred a while ago to the virtue to be found in the combination of Prescott and Glengarry. Well, that was a most obvious thing to have happened, in any event. Even if it were being done by a commission I am sure that would have been the result.

Then we come to Hastings-Peterborough. That was butchered. Then they butchered Frontenac-Addington, and gave part of it to Kingston and made another Liberal seat, though the result will likely be different. What disturbs most of us who have considered the matter at all is that no sane policy has been followed either in Ontario or in any other area. They made the claim this morning that two new seats were introduced, one at Welland and one at Hamilton. The population justifies that, of course, because Welland had a population of 123,000, and the Hamilton seats prior to redistribution were about 60,000 and 69,000 respectively. Then they took from Wentworth some 70,000 to make a third Hamilton seat.

Incidentally—I referred to this on Saturday—it seems unfair to members of the house because we simply wasted our time. Weeks and weeks before this committee was set up a map of the various Hamilton ridings and of the Wentworth riding was published in a Hamilton paper. That shows the ridiculous position in which the members of this house were placed. The time of hon. members was wasted by having to sit on this committee when the Liberal caucus might just as well have prepared the maps of these ridings and let it go at that. That is what happened in any event. I am quite sure that what happened here has happened in every other province of the dominion. A paper which is not unfriendly to the present government had this to say on June 18:

> Mr. McIlraith stated at the commons redistribution committee this morning that "unfortunately" the Ontario subcommittee is not yet ready to submit its report to the main committee.
> J. Leo Gauthier (Lib., Sudbury), a member of the Ontario subcommittee, remarked, "We're as ready as we'll ever be; might as well have the report now."

That is why I say a Liberal caucus could have gone to work, and that is likely what had been happening for months before the committee was set up. They prepared the boundaries and let it go at that.

The butcher boys certainly got to work in grand style. They wanted to eliminate the riding of Haldimand. Most of us sat in the house with the late member from that riding, and we were glad to have him in the house. We are also honoured to have the present sitting member for Haldimand. But the Liberals, who formed the majority, were determined that he would get the axe, and he got it all right.

What happened? They combined Haldimand with part of Brant. Brantford city with 48,016 remained the way it was. Brant-Wentworth could have stayed the way it was. Wentworth, with some 40,000 after the Hamilton part was taken out, could have stayed the way it was. But no, that would not do; they must cut down another Tory member. So they butchered Haldimand riding. They could have taken the townships of Gainsborough, Clinton, North Grimsby, South Grimsby including the village of Beamsville, into Haldimand. Those are all rural and farming townships and it would have formed a perfect riding. I do not think there is any area in Ontario that would lend itself so well to such a combination as Haldimand.

Then they talked about Lincoln. I would not have said anything about Lincoln if it was a riding of some 45,000 or 50,000, but Lincoln has a population of 89,360, so the Grits decided to leave it alone. I do not think there is anything fair in the method that was adopted or in the results that have been finalized. There are other ridings in rural Ontario which are smaller than the various ridings I have referred to, that is Brant-Wentworth, Wentworth, and Brantford. Renfrew South has a population of 29,240; Durham has a population of 30,115. But because this is represented by a Tory it has to be amalgamated in order to eliminate that Tory member. But even with all that has been done I do not think there will be ten Liberal members from Ontario after the next election.

An hon. Member: Durham is a Grit riding.

Mr. Murphy: It was supposed to have been, but it was not in 1945 and I do not expect it will be in 1953. Just look at the way that map is butchered. They attempted to butcher Huron by taking three townships from the north and adding them to Bruce. Even with the amendment of this morning Bruce is still left with a population of 28,205. They propose taking out the riding of Huron entirely and calling it Huron-Perth. That is being done to eliminate another Conservative riding. There is nothing fair about it at all.

No doubt the butchering that has taken place in Ontario is the same as has occurred in all provinces. I gather this from what I have heard about Saskatchewan. They may call it "jimmymandering" out there, but I think in Ontario we can call it "georgemandering."

An hon. Member: George Drew?

Mr. Murphy: What we should do, and we still have plenty of time to do it, is see that some other method is adopted instead of wasting the time of members in trying to arrive at a settlement of redistribution which is by no means satisfactory. It was brought about on a political basis and no argument we in the opposition could make had any effect. I do hope that no future member of this house will have to go through the mess we had on this committee. As an opposition member you could accomplish nothing. Those on the government side rode roughshod over everyone else. They had their plans prepared in advance and they were announced in the newspapers. Those plans were carried out in spite of the opposition of members on this side.

The disgraceful attitude of the Liberal party in connection with this redistribution was indicated by the announcement weeks in advance of the committee being set up of how the ridings were going to be divided. It is about time we changed our minds about redistribution.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this morning the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration indicated the number of constituencies in which changes had been made as 124 and those in which no change had been made as 130. He made quiet a point of the fact that in the case of approximately half the constituencies no change was being made. I think we all agree that where no change is necessary in order to equalize population changes it is to the advantage of everybody that things should be left as they are. It disturbs people to be shifted around from one constituency to another and they do not like it.

It is rather noteworthy that as far as Alberta is concerned this general principle, if it was one, which the minister attempted to indicate was followed, was not followed. In fact no attention was paid to it. The minister stated that 15 seats in Alberta were being changed with two remaining as they were. With the exception of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, the greatest number of changes in constituencies is taking place in Alberta. In the case of Manitoba and Saskatchewan all constituencies are being changed.

This great number of changes is taking place in Alberta despite the fact that there is to be no change in the number of members from that province. We had 17 members before and we will have 17 members in the next parliament. In spite of that there were more changes than in any other province. In the case of Nova Scotia, where a seat is to be eliminated, there were fewer changes than in Alberta. Therefore it leads one to wonder why the Liberal majority on the Alberta subcommittee and on the main committee found it necessary to make all these changes in Alberta.

What has happened so far as the Calgary area is concerned is that boundaries that have been in existence in their present form since 1923, and to a large extent in their present form since 1911, have been completely done away with and other boundaries have been very materially changed. Something was said in the subcommittee about certain people having asked for a change. So far as I know none of the sitting members from the three seats covering various parts of the city of Calgary have received any complaints with regard to the existing set-up. I certainly did not receive any. The hon. member for Bow River, who was a member of that committee, stated that he had never received any. To my knowledge while the late Arthur Smith was the member for Calgary West he did not receive any, and the present member for Calgary West has certainly never said anything to me about having received any.

In spite of the fact that the three members representing that area were quite satisfied with the present set-up the Liberal majority on the committee insisted on destroying the present boundaries and changing things around more or less completely. The odd thing about it is that the city of Calgary under the present set-up has three constituencies each of which contains a part of the city of Calgary and has a rural area attached to it. As it happens the population of these three constituencies added together is almost exactly the same as the population of the three new seats to be created in Edmonton by this redistribution. Edmonton formerly had two seats and an extra seat was added, giving an average population for the three new seats of about 61,000. Under the old set-up the average population for the three Calgary seats is about the same.

There is also the fact that when Edmonton was divided into three seats the same principle was put into effect that has existed in Calgary for the last twenty years. In order to build up the population sufficiently to justify a third seat in Edmonton some of the rural areas surrounding the city were included, so in the city of Edmonton you have three seats with rural areas attached to each. It is quite true that one of these seats has a very small portion of rural area attached to it, but the other two have a fair amount. Therefore under this redistribution the same general set-up was put into effect in Edmonton that had existed in Calgary for some twenty years. However, in spite of that fact the set-up in Calgary was destroyed and the city of Calgary was reduced to two purely urban seats.

The result of that action is of course to make the population of the Calgary seats upwards of 8,000 greater on the average than that of the three Edmonton seats. There was no necessity to create any disparity in population between the seats in Calgary and Edmonton. If the existing set-up had been retained in Calgary the populations would have been almost exactly the same, but by putting a new set-up into effect in Calgary the result is that it takes 8,000 more people to elect a representative in Calgary than is the case in the city to the north.

So far as the Calgary area is concerned, redistribution could have been carried out quite simply and easily and, so far as I know, to the satisfaction of all the people of the southern part of the province, certainly to the satisfaction of the members now representing the people of Calgary. All that was necessary was to leave the existing set-up as it was, move the boundaries a few blocks to the west in order to equalize the population, and redistribution in that area would have been accomplished. The population would have been equalized and so far as I know everybody concerned would have been happy except the Liberal machine in Alberta. The only thing I can believe is that the members of that party have some far-fetched idea that by juggling things around in this way they are going to do themselves some good, but I do not think for a moment that will follow.

[Mr. Harkness.]

In order to accomplish the changing around of the Calgary area the constituency of Bow River had to be excluded completely from the city of Calgary. There was added to it all the rural area that had formerly been in Calgary West and some of the rural area that had been in Calgary East, with the result that under this plan you now have a constituency extending from the British Columbia boundary at Trail some 200 miles to the east to within 84 miles of the Saskatchewan boundary, thus creating an unnecessarily large constituency. There was no necessity to create a constituency of that size and at the same time create a disparity in population between it and the two Calgary seats of some 28,000. The population of the constituency of Bow River will be down to something over 40,000 while the two Calgary seats will have a population of just under 69,000.

All these things, which were contrary to the principles we have heard should be followed so far as redistribution is concerned, were done in order to get rid of the existing set-up in Calgary. I think one of the statements made when this matter was discussed in the main redistribution committee explains the matter. It was said there that the existing set-up had to go, that it was the result of gerrymandering in 1933 and that the situation was just not going to be allowed to continue as it was. I do not know how the constituencies were established in 1933 because I was not here. However, I know that the constituency of Calgary East, which was objected to particularly, happens to be an area which at that time contained and still contains, in a strip about a mile to a mile and a half wide running through the centre of the city, the bulk of the population. That is the area in which the greatest density of population is found. I do not think there is any question but that the constituencies were set up in that form in order to divide the population evenly and to avoid having overly large rural constituencies.

I think the fact the statement to which I have referred was made in the committee is the explanation why there was such insistence on destroying a set-up that had existed in Calgary for such a long period of time, and putting into effect an entirely new one. The only argument advanced against the existing arrangement and in favour of the plan proposed in the schedule now before us was that the existing set-up looked funny on the map. If you look at the map of any province you will see many very peculiar looking constituencies. In other words, the argument that it looks funny on the map means absolutely nothing. It was a ridiculous argument.

The only other argument put forward was that Calgary should be made into two purely urban constituencies because two urban constituencies would be preferable to the existing partly urban and partly rural constituencies. As I said in the committee, there is no magic in a purely urban constituency. All kinds of arguments can be advanced in favour of a constituency which is both urban and rural. I think those arguments carry more weight than the argument that a purely urban constituency should be created wherever it is possible to do so. I think what we need in Canada is to get the people in the cities and in the country more closely together instead of trying to separate them by artificial means.

In order to indicate what is thought of this projected plan I should like to read a portion of an editorial which I just received today, and which appeared in the Calgary Albertan, a newspaper which has supported the Liberal party as long as I can remember. At the outset I might say that I believe this editorial could be summed up by saying that it condemns what has been done in the Calgary area by faint praise. The editorial says:

> The juggling of Calgary and southern Alberta federal constituency boundaries makes sense, in general, although it is disturbing that the parliamentary Liberals, who have no representation in southern Alberta and therefore know nothing about the region, forced the changes over the objections of the members who do know the region.
> This historic constituency of Calgary West, represented so illustriously by the late R. B. Bennett and the late Arthur L. Smith, passes out of existence. But Calgary North and Calgary South will continue to send capable men to parliament, we may be sure.
> Calgary is now split into three constituencies, Calgary East, Calgary West and Bow River. All three include considerable rural territory, and in the case of Bow River the rural section, including Drumheller, is actually in the majority. The new set-up strips all the rural territory away and leaves Calgary with two constituencies. Actually the city's representation is not increased although it has grown much faster than the province generally.

In other words, we are under-represented. We were under-represented before, and that under-representation will be considerably greater now.

> Population in each of the new city ridings is up to 20,000 higher than in the adjacent rural ridings, and that's not right.

As a matter of fact one area is up to 29,000 higher. The editorial continues:

> Is it better to have one member represent both city people and country people, or to have a separate representative for each? This is a debatable point. If an M.P. is responsible to both farmers and city folk he will understand the problems of both of them better. And since they have to live together, so to speak, there will be less occupational cleavage. On the other hand there may be a tendency, when one member represents too many different interests, to overlook the peculiar charms and problems of any one of them.
> The new Bow River constituency will stretch from Drumheller to British Columbia. That makes it something of a geographical monstrosity. But over most of that territory the population is sparse, and some other constituencies are even larger.
> The original Calgary constituency was created in 1903 and split in 1914, while Mr. Bennett was the member, into East and West. Calgary West is regarded as a Conservative stronghold. Calgary East, on the other hand, is good fighting ground for almost any party. Since 1917 it has been represented by Labour, Liberal, Conservative and Social Credit members. The current Conservative hold is precarious.

I shall leave out a portion which does not apply.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: I shall read it, if you like.

> But the easternmost part of the city, which has been in Bow River, is rebel territory, populated by working people who feel they owe nothing to the old-line parties. Not since 1917 has the constituency gone to a Liberal or Conservative.
> The new alignment will necessitate revision of the above generalities. With the Bow river the dividing line between Calgary North and Calgary South, and with Bowness in Calgary North, it can be assumed that the centre of gravity in Calgary North will be farther to the left than in Calgary South. In other words the Conservatives will probably be able to hang on to Calgary South, while they won't be secure in Calgary North. In fact, the cynic might be justified in saying that the revision of boundaries is an attempt to gerrymander the sitting Calgary East member, a Conservative, out of a seat.

That is from a Liberal newspaper, and they frankly state that even to them it would appear that this redistribution is an attempt to gerrymander me out of a seat. I can probably assure the members of the house that I do not think it will have that effect. However, that does not detract from the probable intention. Even at this late date I would think the only fair and reasonable thing to do would be to throw out the division that has been made in so far as Calgary is concerned, and go back to the original division. As I say, the whole thing could be done in ten minutes so far as that area is concerned. After the old boundaries are reestablished the constituencies could be equalized in size, but the traditional set-up would remain almost intact. Even yet I would hope that something along that line might be done.

Before I resume my seat there is one other matter I should like to mention. On page 71 of the printed copy of the bill, toward the last of the description of Bow River constituency, there is this statement following a semicolon:

> . . . excluding therefrom those portions of Calgary South in township 23 . . . and all Indian reserves or portions thereof within the area herein described.

As this reads, it would mean that all the Indian reserves on the Bow river, that is three, would be excluded from the constituency. There would be, therefore, no constituency in which those people could vote. I mentioned this matter to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, and he telephoned the chief electoral officer. I am told it was intended that the semicolon should have been put after the words "west of the fifth meridian". Then the following phrase would stand by itself:

. . . and all Indian reserves or portions thereof within the area herein described.

In other words, that would be removed from the exclusion. Even when the semicolon is put in the right place the wording is ambiguous, and I believe the description should be reworded so there is no question about the Indian reserves being included within the boundaries of the constituency.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I just interrupt to say that the last objection raised will be looked after.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): As a member of the redistribution committee, both in 1947 and this year, I wish to take advantage of the opportunity this afternoon to reply to what the member for Sarnia said about northern Ontario. I hope I know more about northern Ontario than he does. I am not going to attempt to discuss that part of the province in which Sarnia lies. The hon. member started by saying that the redistribution committee had set out certain districts in the province of Ontario, northern Ontario being one, but I want to state that there was no such thing. We discussed with the opposition members of the committee what we were going to do in general, and as was pointed out by the hon. member for Ottawa West this afternoon it was decided that six of the smallest ridings of Ontario would have to be dealt with in some way and six of the largest ridings of Ontario would have to be dealt with. Now, northern Ontario happened to be—

Mr. Murphy: I wonder if I might ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Yes, you can question me for twenty years.

Mr. Murphy: I would not need to question you for twenty years.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): You would get answers for twenty years anyway.

Mr. Murphy: Does the hon. member deny that at the very first meeting in the railway committee room he said, "There is going to be another riding in Sudbury"?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Certainly; and there will be one in the next redistribution, too. We are growing three times as fast as you are in the other parts of the province. When we are entitled to it, we are going to get it. I want to continue by saying this. Ever since this morning we have been accused by members of the opposition with respect to the unfair attitude taken by the members of the redistribution committee. When one listens to the argument of the hon. member for Sarnia this afternoon—

Mr. Murphy: You might refer to him as the hon. member for Lambton West and be right. You might say something that is correct for once.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): All right; the hon. member for Lambton West. We have heard accusations about unfairness. I might state that it is almost unfair on their part—I would not go as far as they go; it is always said by them that we are very unfair—to suggest that northern Ontario, having regard to the territory we have to represent in that part of the province, should be compared with the territory that hon. members represent in other parts of Ontario. I should say that it is not unfair for us when we get 100,000—we now have 95,000—in the district of Sudbury, to ask that Sudbury be redistributed.

Mr. Murphy: With 30,000 next door, represented by a minister.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Next door, the hon. member says. The western boundary is 200 miles away. That is next door? That is the figuring of the hon. member for Lambton West.

Mr. Murphy: It is the next riding to you.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I think the hon. member for Lambton West raised that point in the commitee.

Mr. Murphy: It is the next riding to you.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I cannot listen to the hon. member. I am trying to make my speech.

Mr. Murphy: Just stick to the facts.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): We looked at the map. Naturally these men are not too familiar with our part of the province. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Lambton West was that we take a large part of the district of Sudbury and put it into East Algoma, the constituency of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is nothing I should like better than to have part of my district put into the constituency of East Algoma, but that could not be done. We have territories there that are not comparable with those in other parts of Ontario, and you have to go along with what you have. The hon. member suggested that I take some 25 or 30 of the districts in Sudbury and put them in East Algoma; that would mean we should have to take at least 20,000 or 25,000 off Sudbury because we are now 95,000. That would mean that 40 per cent of the city of Sudbury, which lies almost in the east end of the Sudbury riding, would be in East Algoma and 60 per cent would be in Sudbury. That shows how much those hon. members know about northern Ontario.

Mr. Murphy: Why do you not apply that reasoning to Lincoln and Haldimand?

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I should like to make another point with regard to northern Ontario and to mention the hon. member for Port Arthur, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He represents 66,931 people, which is a larger number than that represented by any member from a Toronto constituency sitting in this chamber.

Mr. Fleming: Wait a minute.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I mean the average member.

Mr. Fleming: There are several Toronto ridings.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Yes, there are several ridings; but I said the average of the sitting members. He has a riding that is only 16 miles long. That is an example of the fairness of the members of the opposition to the members for northern Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member not agree that right at the beginning the question was asked whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce wanted any change made in his riding? That question was asked by opposition members, and the answer we were given was no, that he wanted no change.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): How could we expect to have more representation for that one, when Sudbury has 95,000? We are going to start with the largest, not with one of the smallest in northern Ontario. It is one of the largest in territory but it is not the largest in population. We are trying to get a fair representation and this is the way we are treated.

Mr. Murphy: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): All right.

Mr. Murphy: Is it not a fact that at the first or second meeting the hon. member said the Minister of Trade and Commerce was satisfied with the riding as it stands?

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): No. There was never anybody satisfied. We are not satisfied yet. If this thing goes on much longer we will ask for another riding in northern Ontario.

I want to state to the committee here today that I am not quarrelling with anything that has been done with regard to any other part of the province. I do not know the other districts as well as I know my own part of the country. But I do not want anybody from some place down in western Ontario to tell me what is going on in northern Ontario. I come from northern Ontario and I think I know just as well as they do the territory in that part of the country.

In conclusion I want to say that I was greatly surprised this afternoon to find members of the opposition accusing us of being unfair in the committee in treating them as we did. We certainly could have decided to put one less riding in the Yorks, which would have meant just three divisions of the Yorks of 71,000 each, and still the whole territory of the York district would have been just ten times smaller than Sudbury district with 95,000 population. That is an example of fairness. I believe we were fair in giving three ridings to the Yorks, and only one to northern Ontario.

Mr. Murphy: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): Go ahead.

Mr. Murphy: Is it not a fact that I said this afternoon, quoting what you said on June 16, that we might as well vote on all Ontario now because it is all settled?

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I do not know what paper you got that from.

Mr. Murphy: It is from your paper, the Citizen.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I do not often talk to newspapermen. I never said any such thing to anybody. I did say that I felt northern Ontario was entitled to more representation on account of its population and the territory involved. I want to thank the members of the committee who so far have not advanced any more criticism than they have for the purpose of calling us unfair.

Mr. Welbourn: I should like to make a short statement in explanation of the division that took place in the province of Alberta. I should like to point out to the minister that in his opening remarks this morning, in regard to the province of Alberta, he stated that there two constituencies were unchanged and 15 changed. As far as constituency boundaries are concerned, there were three constituencies in Alberta unchanged and 14 that were changed.

The subcommittee on Alberta was faced with two problems. The first was the decided population shift, and the second was the correction of a most glaring case of gerrymandering that was done in 1933 by a former government. I might say there has been no change in the distribution of seats in Alberta since 1933. In connection with the first problem I mentioned, the constituencies of Acadia, Battle River, Camrose and Vegreville were all low in population. It was agreed to make three constituencies out of the four; and because of the tremendous increase in the population of the city of Edmonton, it was necessary to set up a third seat there. All these changes, by the way, received the unanimous approval of the subcommittees, so I do not need to spend any time over them except to point out that it was because of this situation that there were so many changes in boundaries of constituencies in Alberta.

The problem of correcting the situation in the Calgary area was not so easy, and I may say we did not have the same unanimous approval. Formerly the city of Calgary was divided into three parts known as Calgary East, Calgary West and Bow River. The constituency of Bow River took in the eastern part of the city together with 96 townships of the rural areas. The former riding of Calgary East consisted of a narrow corridor extending from the north to the south through the centre of the city. In one section this corridor is only seven blocks wide, and it is only 16 blocks wide in its widest part. It has also had attached to it a rural area of 52 townships extending from the city of Calgary west to the British Columbia border. Calgary West did have the western portion of the city at least to justify its name, but it also included 96 townships of rural area extending again from Calgary west to the British Columbia border.

The committee decided to set up two urban Calgary seats made up of the city proper, together with certain suburbs, to be known as Calgary North and Calgary South. The rural part of Bow River, together with the former rural area of Calgary West and a small portion from Medicine Hat, will now constitute the constituency of Bow River, which will be a rural constituency.

Changes made in Macleod, Lethbridge and Medicine Hat were all of a minor nature to equalize population.

The hon. member for Calgary East regrets the loss of what he termed the historic constituency of Calgary West. I might say it was on his recommendation that Calgary was divided east and west, thus constituting the constituencies of Calgary South and Calgary North. As convener of the subcommittee, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that these changes are justified and reasonable.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I intend to confine my remarks this afternoon to one riding, that of Lake Centre. Representing one of the constituencies of western Canada I must protest the treatment that is being meted out to the hon. member for Lake Centre and to his constituents.

This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar dealt with some of the changes proposed for that riding but I should like to give them in a little more detail. The riding, under the 1951 census, was one of the six smallest in the province of Saskatchewan; at that time it had a population of 35,940; yet under the new plan there are to be very extensive portions of the riding taken away. In the old riding there were 192 townships. Under the new plan 90 of those townships are being transferred to other ridings, leaving 102, which include a large lake known as Last Mountain, which I understand is about 70 miles in length and a mile in width.

A large portion of the area and population being taken away is being placed in the riding of Rosetown-Biggar to the west. The present member for Lake Centre has represented the people in that portion of his riding for twelve years. He has received a very favourable vote in that district; yet these people are now being transferred to Rosetown-Biggar. Smaller groups are being transferred in the north to the riding of Humboldt, and in the east to the ridings of Yorkton and Melville. Then on the south there is being added to this former riding of Lake Centre, or what remains of it, the city of Moose Jaw and territory around the city of Moose Jaw; extending to the west some six or seven miles, and to the east from Moose Jaw right to and beyond the city of Regina, including over 5,000 people who actually live within the city limits of Regina and another 500 or 600 living in the organized municipality of North Regina; also others living in the suburbs of the city of Regina.

Many people who are being put into the new riding from that area lying to the east of Regina have been in the riding of Qu'Appelle, which I believe will still be one of the smallest ridings in Saskatchewan. It is hard to understand why these people should be taken away from Qu'Appelle and put in this new riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, which is to have—

Mr. Dewar: I will tell the hon. member why. Moose Jaw is semi-urban; Qu'Appelle is not. There is nothing in common in the two.

Mr. Green: This district has been in the riding of Qu'Appelle.

Mr. Dewar: Do you know how it got there? The late Mr. Perley, who was a very great friend of mine, an esteemed friend of mine, had it put there back in 1933. That is when it got there.

Mr. Green: The late Mr. Perley was also a great friend of mine; but the present member for Qu'Appelle has represented these people, and I see no reason whatsoever why they should be transferred to the new riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, particularly when the population of the new riding of Qu'Appelle will be fewer than 43,000, whereas the Moose Jaw-Lake Centre riding will be over 53,000.

Mr. Dewar: It follows the pattern of the semi-urban riding.

Mr. Fulton: How many square miles?

Mr. Dewar: It has 3,816.

Mr. Fulton: That is semi-urban, eh?

Mr. Green: Who has the floor, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

Mr. Green: I do not think any member of this house can believe it is fair to put Moose Jaw city, a portion of Regina city and the suburbs of Regina into one riding, quite apart from any consideration of the old riding of Lake Centre. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, a change of that kind is simply ridiculous. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the manner in which this new riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has been set up is an obvious attempt to eliminate John Diefenbaker from public life.

Mr. Ferrie: Rubbish.

Mr. Green: Someone says "rubbish".

Mr. Ferrie: I say rubbish.

Mr. Green: I repeat my contention that it is an attempt to eliminate John Diefenbaker from public life in Canada. I am sure the Canadian people will believe that from coast to coast.

Mr. Dewar: What happened the last time? You said the last time he was not going to be elected and he came back stronger than ever.

Mr. Green: You are trying to do the job a little better this time.

Mr. Ward: Lake Centre is still there.

Mr. Green: His riding is there in name.

Mr. Ward: The territory is still there.

Mr. Green: The riding is there in name.

Mr. Dewar: Sixty per cent of it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: It has been altered in a way which is obviously unfair.

Mr. Ward: You have not the same respect for the hon. member for Lake Centre that the rest of us have.

Mr. Ferrie: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: He has not any respect for him at all.

Mr. Gardiner: Any Conservative can win that seat if he is capable of being a candidate.

Mr. Green: I can only repeat, I believe this to be an obvious attempt to eliminate John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Jutras: Rubbish.

Mr. Green: He has been—

Mr. Jutras: He does not live in that constituency.

Mr. Green: He has been a severe critic of this government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member across the way had better direct his last statement to some of the ministers over there.

Mr. Green: He has been a fair critic. He has been a great champion for western Canada. I resent an attempt of this kind to run him out of public life.

Mr. Gardiner: And we resent your saying that we have attempted it.

Mr. Green: He is admired and respected from coast to coast.

Mr. Ward: Of course he is.

Mr. Green: And he is one of the great public men of Canada of all time. If this plan is forced through it will be disgraceful gerrymandering. I believe it will be resented by all Canadians, no matter what their political affiliations may be. They need only look at the map to see the unfairness of this proposal. I do not see how the Prime Minister of this country or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration can sit back and countenance a change of this kind.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all hon. members will agree it is very strange that although we have had a debate extending over two-thirds of this day, nothing has yet been said about British Columbia. It is time to rectify that situation.

An hon. Member: We understand you are all in agreement out there.

Mr. Fulton: I would like to have as much hope that the proposed map of British Columbia might be rectified; but from what I have heard before, I think that is a forlorn hope. Nevertheless there are certain observations with respect to the proposals being made in British Columbia which I think should be drawn to the attention of the committee, in the hope that the same sort of wrong principle which I maintain has been followed in that province on this occasion may not be followed there at a later time.

All the arguments which have been heard today and the arguments I intend to put forward with respect to British Columbia do, I maintain, further reinforce the suggestion that instead of having redistribution carried out by a committee of members of parliament, with the inevitable manoeuvring and counter-manoeuvring and political considerations which must enter into the matter, it should be carried out by an independent commission which could look at the task impartially and report to parliament its recommendations so we might give our final approval.

This time we are to have four new seats in British Columbia. This means that our membership will increase from 18 to 22 members, or almost 25 per cent over the present number. This gives us an opportunity, or at least should give us an opportunity, which is unique, that of looking at the map of our province and placing therein the constituencies on a scientific and impartial basis so as to properly represent those areas having a community of interest, while at the same time relieving some of the bad features in the present distribution of constituencies in British Columbia, by reducing certain constituencies from their present enormous size—a factor which makes it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to represent those areas adequately.

But, instead of that, a Liberal majority on the subcommittee—and in this respect we have been in exactly the same situation as every other provincial subcommittee—decided there should be an arbitrary allocation of seats, one to the lower mainland area surrounding Vancouver, one to Vancouver island, one to the interior of the province and the fourth to the city of Vancouver.

As it happens I have no quarrel, in general, with the first three suggestions. But I maintain that the population figures of our province are such that there is no justification for placing one of the new seats within the city limits of Vancouver. I start with the fact that the national quotient obtained by dividing the population of Canada by the proposed number of seats in the House of Commons is approximately 54,000. I am told by the chief electoral officer that it has been traditionally recognized in Canada, as well as in other commonwealth countries—indeed, I believe he went so far as to say it is recognized in every democratic country with a system of representative government—that there should be a differential between the population average for city ridings and the population average for country ridings. The reason of course is obvious, namely that if one were to insist upon absolute equality of population between rural and urban ridings, rural ridings would cover areas which individual members would find it impossible adequately to represent. On the other hand, in the city ridings population is confined within a reasonably small geographical area.

I am told further that the average margin of tolerance in respect of the differential between city and rural ridings runs at a maximum of from 20 to 25 per cent. If one takes 20 per cent of 54,000, or approximately 11,000 he gets an average for city ridings of 65,000. If one were to apply the maximum of 25 per cent it would become permissible to raise the population of city ridings to 67,500, which would be 13,500 over the national quotient.

If you take the population figures for British Columbia and divide them by the number of seats now proposed to be given to that province, namely 22, you will find that the average provincial quotient works out to 52,964, or in round figures 53,000. Then if we divide the population of Vancouver by the proposed number of seats it is now to get—that is, six seats instead of five—we find the proposed average for city ridings in Vancouver is 57,856, or just about 5,000 over the provincial quotient and only about 4,000 over the national quotient. On the other hand the average for the remainder of the seats outside the city of Vancouver would then be 51,130.

We get the result therefore that under the proposed arrangement the city of Vancouver will have an average of 57,856 while the remainder of the province will have an average of 51,130, or a differential of only 6,726 between seats in the city of Vancouver and those in the rest of the province.

I am not going to maintain that all the seats in the rest of the province are rural, because that is not correct; but for the purposes of my argument I confine my attention to the city of Vancouver. Let me say that all the people of British Columbia, including those in the interior of the province from which I come, are proud of the city of Vancouver. We know it is the finest city in Canada, and that so far as cities are concerned it should be entitled to the maximum possible representation.

But when you compare the present proposal as it affects Vancouver with the proposals for the other major cities in Canada, you find that not only is the differential between city seats in Vancouver and the rest of the province too low, but that the average size of the city seats in Vancouver is very considerably less than the average size of the seats in practically every other major city in Canada.

I gave the figure for the city of Vancouver on the present proposed basis as 57,856. Looking at the proposals as they will affect the other cities of Canada we find that the city of Winnipeg has an average for its constituencies of 76,945, or almost 20,000 more than the city of Vancouver. Incidentally in that connection we heard this morning the hon. member for Winnipeg South justifying that large population average for the city of Winnipeg by saying he recognized that there should be a differential against the city ridings. You will remember that I asked him to advance the same argument to the chairman of the British Columbia subcommittee, but unfortunately he declined to do so.

When you come to Ontario you find that the average for the Toronto seats is 64,000; the average for the York seats will be just under 70,000, and the average for the Toronto and York seats will be approximately 65,300, as against the average of 57,856 for the Vancouver seats. The average for the seats on the island of Montreal, which are not all city seats, is 65,000. The average for the seats in Calgary is 69,000. In every case the proposed average for Vancouver is substantially less than the average of any other city in Canada, and is only a little more than the average of all the seats in British Columbia, the vast majority of which are rural and which have a pressing problem resulting from their enormous geographical areas from which they require relief.

It has been my contention, and still is, that instead of that one extra seat within the city limits of Vancouver there should be two seats on the lower mainland outside of Vancouver. Not only would this give necessary relief to the lower mainland area—which now does not get the relief it should have and which is still going to have the New Westminster riding with approximately 81,000 people, and the two Burnaby ridings still very large—not only does the confinement of one seat within the city limits of Vancouver mean that the lower mainland area does not get the relief it should have, it means that there are not enough seats left to bring relief to the constituencies in the interior of the province which now have such huge areas.

If the proper principle had been adopted and two seats allotted to the lower mainland area it would have enabled the moving back northward and eastward of the boundaries of the seats immediately surrounding Vancouver, including Fraser Valley and Coast-Capilano; and that, with one seat going to the interior, would have enabled real relief to be given by adjusting the boundaries of the interior ridings of the province so as to make manageable constituencies.

As a result of the insistence of the majority of the subcommittee that their proposals be followed, we are left with the riding of Vancouver Centre with a population of between 47,500 and 48,000, one of the smallest city ridings in all Canada. There you have a population of 48,000 in an area of perhaps five square miles at the most. In contrast you have constituencies with 49,000, in the case of Kootenay West, approximately 40,000 in the case of Cariboo and 45,000 in the new riding of Kamloops which ridings cover areas of as much as at least 50,000 square miles on the average. On the one hand you have 40,000 people and an area of 50,000 square miles, and on the other hand you have 47,500 people and an area of 5 square miles. That is the sort of ridiculous situation you arrive at when you follow the wrong principle which the Liberal majority on the subcommittee has been following.

Just in passing it does seem to me that if they are going to do anything in Vancouver; if they are going to insist upon putting an extra seat in there, surely the time has arrived to adjust that situation and bring up the population of Vancouver Centre to something approaching that of the other city ridings.

Another result of the proposal of the majority on the subcommittee is in connection with Revelstoke. At present Revelstoke is in the Kamloops federal riding. I believe the people are reasonably satisfied to be there. I have had no substantial complaints from that area against their being in the Kamloops riding, although representations have been made from time to time that the Revelstoke district has its community of interest, both geographically and economically, with the Kootenay country.

When the subject of redistribution was first discussed this year I received representations to the effect that the time had arrived when it should be considered whether Revelstoke should now be placed back in one of the Kootenay constituencies. In fact they named the constituency of Kootenay West. I replied that I did not consider that that was essential; that if it were done it would mean that the populations of Kootenay West and Kamloops, instead of being practically equal as at present, would be changed so that Kootenay West would be increased and Kamloops would be reduced, thus producing an inequality. But I did say that if any change were made with respect to Revelstoke it was my view that it should go into the Kootenay constituency where its community of interest lay.

Then as to the needed relief in the interior of our province; because there is to be only one new riding there, instead of further relief being afforded by way of two ridings on the lower mainland outside of Vancouver, as I have suggested; since there is to be only one new riding, all you can do in the face of the present figures is to divide the present riding of Yale, which has a population of nearly 80,000. But that would create a situation where you would have two constituencies of some 39,000 each, both with much smaller areas and substantially smaller in population than the next door riding of Kamloops, and about the same population as, but an infinitely smaller area than, Cariboo and Skeena, both the latter having less population than Kamloops.

It began to be felt by the majority of the committee that that would not be fair, that Yale should not be divided exactly in half but that a line would have to be run slightly north of centre. Then in order to bring the population of the northern half of the riding up to a point where it would compare with the southern half and the surrounding constituencies, it was suggested that Revelstoke should be added to the new North Okanagan seat. That has been done, with the result that instead of it being included in the Kootenay West riding as it should have been if a change was to be made at all—that is where the majority of the people wanted it to go—it is being artificially included in an Okanagan riding.

While it is true that Revelstoke is a lovely city with a beautiful golf course to which the people from the Okanagan area come over the week end; while it is true that they have joint curling matches, the fact is that being on the main line of the C.P.R., being a lumbering and mining area, that district has practically no community of economic interest with the Okanagan area. But it is being artificially taken from that area to which it belongs and is being included in the Okanagan riding, an artificiality created as a result of the improper limitation of one of the extra seats to the city of Vancouver.

This is about all I propose to say with respect to our province, except to say that it is regrettable that the same practice was followed in connection with British Columbia as apparently was followed in every other provincial subcommittee. I refer to the fact that although there were some general discussions, there was no discussion of detail; yet maps began to appear in the press which must have been inspired from somewhere, and which were stated to have been approved by the British Columbia subcommittee. They were released before the details were considered, and in some cases before the general principle concerning some of the ridings had ever been discussed in the subcommittee. That is particularly the case with respect to the first details released of the new riding in the city of Vancouver. The proposal, about which we first learned through these articles in the press, was to put a new riding in the city of Vancouver by making it stretch the whole way from the east boundary to the west boundary of the city, a perfectly ridiculous and absurd proposition. I wish you could see from this distance, Mr. Chairman, the way the thing looks on the map then released. We have heard various descriptions of this practice this afternoon. We have heard the expressions "gerrymandering" and "jimmymandering". The leader of the opposition said this morning that the word "gerrymander" originated in the resemblance of the proposal to a reptile, the salamander. This riding looks almost exactly like a salamander.

There is one other thing it resembles even more closely than a salamander. It starts with a long thin strip out in the west end of Vancouver, the Point Grey area, a curved strip which might be said to resemble a fairly convenient handle. Then it narrows into a long straight thin strip—I believe in one place to be only seven blocks wide—right across the centre of the city until it comes within a short distance of the east boundary—

Mr. Applewhaite: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Not now—where it suddenly widens out into what obviously resembles the head of some cutting instrument. The whole thing is symbolic of the process it was then proposed to follow, namely to take an axe or cleaver and chop up the city of Vancouver to suit the supposed requirements and convenience of the Liberal members of the subcommittee.

Mr. Applewhaite: Would the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Applewhaite: Which constituency among those reported to the house is the hon. member discussing?

Mr. Fulton: I thought I had made it quite clear. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not listening. I was referring to the original proposal of some members of the subcommittee, reports concerning which appeared in the press.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no such seat.

Mr. Fulton: The fact is this would have been a very obvious gerrymander and it did not carry the knowledge or approval of the subcommittee because it had not been disclosed, at least to myself, and I was a member of the subcommittee. As we learned the details later we found that the proposal carried with it a proposal that the riding of Vancouver-Quadra should be altered so that it would closely resemble in appearance this extraordinary absurdity, which was then proposed to be called either Vancouver-Langara or Vancouver-Narvaez. There were to be two equally hideous gerrymanders in the city of Vancouver.

Then we were told about the middle of June that the chairman of the British Columbia subcommittee had resigned. The reason given, according to the statements that were made, was that he was opposed to any gerrymandering. It is a strange thing that after the resignation of the former chairman of the British Columbia subcommittee, the member for Vancouver South, the proposed gerrymander in the city of Vancouver was dropped; and what has been done in the city of Vancouver, with the exception only of the refusal to alter the riding of Vancouver Centre, is sensible and sound and does not produce these monstrosities on the map. Therefore, whatever may have been said in the press as to the motives of the then chairman of the subcommittee in resigning, the fact is that since that time the proposed gerrymander has been dropped and a reasonably sound and sensible proposal, within the limits of the principles being followed by that subcommittee, has been adopted for the city of Vancouver.

In summary, however, may I say again that I believe it is unsound to insist that one riding go to the city of Vancouver, because of the artificial situation which that produces and because of the low average of population which will result for the seats in that city, and because it makes impossible the granting of necessary relief from their present size to the constituencies in the interior of the province.

I should like to turn for a moment to the proposed redistribution in Saskatchewan. I do so because for a short time I was a member of the Saskatchewan subcommittee. Once again, what happened in Saskatchewan demonstrates clearly the necessity for the submission of redistribution to an impartial commission. I have referred to some of the absurdities we had in British Columbia as a result of doing it not in a scientific and impartial way but within the limits of the considerations imposed by political considerations. That was even more clearly demonstrated in the case of the Saskatchewan subcommittee. About the middle of June the hon. member for Lake Centre had to absent himself from the house because of having accepted a previous engagement. I might say that that engagement was to speak to the annual international meeting of Kiwanians at Seattle, Washington, a gathering of some 12,000 people, the majority of whom were Americans although there were some Canadians. Owing to the fact he had accepted that engagement the hon. member for Lake Centre was absent from the house, and he asked me if I would take his place for the time being on the Saskatchewan subcommittee.

With the consent of the chairman of the main committee that alteration was made. That was on a Monday. I was in the house for the whole of that week and I was wondering when I would be called to a meeting of the Saskatchewan subcommittee—because the change in personnel had been announced in the main committee. On the following Friday at noon the chairman of the Saskatchewan subcommittee came to me and said, "We are going to have a meeting of the subcommittee on Monday at 12.30 in my office. Can you be there?" I said that I would go to his office at 12.30. I asked, "What is the purpose of the meeting?" He said, "It is to discuss the map. The map is being prepared now." I said, "Can I have a look at the map? Can I have a look at what you are proposing?" He said, "No, it is not ready."

I said, "It may not be ready for final publication, but surely you have some lines tentatively drawn on it. Can I have a look at it?" "No," he said, "it is not ready yet". I said, "When will it be ready?" He said, "It will be ready on Monday at 12.30", so I said, "All right, I will be there on Monday at 12.30". I want to be strictly accurate. It so happened that I was making a radio broadcast at 12.30 and it was not until 12.45 on the Monday that I went to the hon. member's office to attend this meeting.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: When the committee rose at six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I had just dealt with British Columbia, and had shown how the proposal there which is wrong in principle is now being carried into law as a result of this unfortunate procedure which we are following. This result would never have occurred had there been an independent commission handling redistribution. I then turned to the question of what is taking place in Saskatchewan—which demonstrates even more clearly the impropriety of this method—and stated that for a week I had been a member of the Saskatchewan subcommittee. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that I explained the reason was that the hon. member for Lake Centre was compelled to be absent from the house, having accepted an engagement to speak in Seattle, Washington, at which time he added, I may say, further laurels not only to his own career as a public man but to the reputation of Canadians in international affairs. On that occasion he addressed an international audience of some 12,000 people.

During his absence, at his request and as the result of a motion made by the chairman of the main committee, I took his place on the Saskatchewan subcommittee. That was on Monday, June 16. I was here all during that week, and as I say I wondered when there was going to be a meeting of that subcommittee. On Friday, June 20, the chairman of the Saskatchewan subcommittee spoke to me and said there was to be a meeting in his office on the following Monday, that would be June 23, at 12.30. He said the map would be ready then. I said that was fine, but I wondered if I could see the map in the meantime, as I should like to take part in some of the discussion which apparently must be taking place in the subcommittee while the map was being prepared. He said the map was not ready. I said, "I quite understand the map is not ready for presentation or final publication; but obviously you must be talking about the map and must be drawing some tentative lines on a map. I should like, in my capacity as a member of the subcommittee, to take some part in this discussion." I asked if I could go to his office that afternoon, but he said no, the map was not ready. I asked when it would be ready, and he said it would be ready at 12.30 on Monday, so I said, "All right, I shall be there at 12.30". On Monday I was actually there at 12.45. By that time the member for Lake Centre had returned, and he was also there.

Mr. Boucher: You should have withdrawn when the hon. member for Lake Centre was there.

Mr. Fulton: I said I was there as a member of the subcommittee, as I was still an official member of the subcommittee until the chairman relieved me and reappointed the member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Boucher: Then the member for Lake Centre should have withdrawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He may as well have withdrawn.

Mr. Fulton: It would have been just the same if none of us had been there, for all the part that we were allowed to take in the discussion.

Mr. Boucher: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I thought it was not fair for me to show the map before the other members of the committee were there. One of the members was absent, and that was the reason the map was not shown.

Mr. Knowles: Where did you get the map?

Mr. Boucher: I got it that morning, but it was not fair to show the map while the hon. member was absent.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has explained the reasons which were in his mind at that time concerning why he would not allow any of us to take part in the discussion leading to the preparation of the map. The Minister of Agriculture has explained that, although he was not a member of the subcommittee, he was invited to take part in this discussion; but other hon. members who were members of the subcommittee were not allowed to take part in the discussion.

Mr. Boucher: That is wrong.

Mr. Fulton: However, be that as it may, as I have said, on this occasion, on Monday, June 23, not having been relieved of my appointment I was still a member of the subcommittee although I took no particular part in the discussion of details. I was there in my official capacity, but expected to be relieved by the chairman of the main committee when we met that night.

On the desk in the office was a map, which was substantially the map I have here on my desk, with a lot of lines showing the proposed boundaries of the Saskatchewan ridings drawn in red pencil.

Some hon. Members: Black.

Mr. Fulton: No, the lines were drawn in red pencil and the old constituency boundaries were rubbed out in black pencil.

Mr. Dewar: The original lines were red and the new lines were black.

Mr. Fulton: I said, "What is this map?" They said, "This is a map of Saskatchewan". I said, "Who prepared this map?", and they said the surveyor-general had prepared the map. I said, "Well, let us not blame this on the surveyor-general; obviously the surveyor-general did not draw those red lines."

Mr. Boucher: On a point of order—

Mr. Fulton: Is it a point of order or is it just a speech?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Rosthern is raising a point of order. I cannot decide whether or not it is a genuine point of order until I hear it.

Mr. Boucher: I am sure no member of the committee said it was the surveyor-general who had drawn the map.

Mr. Fulton: There were a number of members there at the discussion, Mr. Chairman, and my recollection is reinforced by the recollection of others.

Mr. Boucher: But your recollection is wrong.

Mr. Diefenbaker: His recollection is right.

Mr. Fulton: In any event I said, "Let us not blame this on the surveyor-general. He may have prepared the map of Saskatchewan, but you are not suggesting he drew those red lines on it." They said that the committee drew this map, and I said, "What committee?" They said, "The Saskatchewan subcommittee." I said, "Wait a moment. You remember I asked on Friday whether I could have a look at the map and you told me the map would not be ready until today at 12.30. I am here, and this map is presented to us for the first time, so you cannot say the Saskatchewan subcommittee drew it, because it did not. There was one member of the subcommittee at least who had nothing to do with it." I think the hon. member for Melfort will state that there was more than one member of the subcommittee who had nothing to do with it; the members other than the Liberal members of the committee had nothing to do with drawing this map. One of the Liberal members finally said, "Yes, we three Liberal members of the subcommittee drew this map."

This afternoon we have heard the Minister of Agriculture himself say that he had spoken to, and had been spoken to by, the Liberal members of the Saskatchewan subcommittee. What has taken place is quite obvious. In spite of the requests of other members of that subcommittee to take some part in the discussion leading to the preparation of the Saskatchewan map, those requests were denied. The Liberal members of the subcommittee, under the instructions of the Minister of Agriculture, drew the map to satisfy their own ideas of how Saskatchewan should be divided up.

Mr. Boucher: That is untrue.

Mr. Fulton: And that is what we have before us today.

Mr. Dewar: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Dewar: It happens that I was on that committee, not through desire but as a result of being selected. I presented each member of the Saskatchewan group with a blank map. At no time have we had any suggestion or counter-proposal offered us in the form of a map.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Dewar: That is the question. Where is the map you fellows were going to draw? Have you ever drawn a map? We drew a map. You were entitled to draw one.

Mr. Wright: The hon. member never yet handed the rest of the members of the committee any map and asked them to put down what they thought.

Mr. Dewar: Yes, I did. I handed a couple of maps to the hon. member for Moose Jaw. He will bear that out.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Wright: He was not on this committee.

Mr. Knowles: He is not a member of the committee.

Mr. Dewar: I said "members". I did not say "committee men".

The Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members not to participate in discussion across the floor and not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor unless it is with his permission.

Mr. Dewar: I apologize.

The Chairman: At the moment the hon. member for Kamloops has the floor.

Mr. Dewar: Yes; to my regret.

Mr. Hees: Dewar's special jurymen.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wants to ask a question he must ask his question and not make statements.

Mr. Dewar: I did ask a question.

The Chairman: Order. It looks as though the discussion should be proceeded with in a much more serious vein. As has been indicated from its inception, this debate is an extremely serious one and it seems to me that we are not going to make any progress unless we keep it at a high level. I must ask hon. members to observe the rules. The hon. member for Kamloops has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Nevertheless the interruption by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has served a certain purpose. It has demonstrated that he was showing maps to those whom he regarded perhaps as his own special friends, but who were not members of the Saskatchewan subcommittee, and that when a member of the Saskatchewan subcommittee asked to see the map, that member was denied any opportunity or right to see it until it had been worked upon by the Liberal members of the subcommittee and was ready for final presentation—which was made at 12.30 on Monday, June 23—

Mr. Proudfoot: That is incorrect.

Mr. Fulton: —with the lines that are now drawn on the map, with only one or two minor modifications which have been made since.

Mr. Hees: It was shown only to Dewar's special friends.

Mr. Adamson: They were the ne plus ultra members.

Mr. Hees: Dewar's special friends.

Mr. Fulton: When that was done—when the map was presented—I asked what opportunity there was going to be for discussion of the proposals contained in this map, what opportunity there was going to be for variation in the "jimmymander" which had taken place in that province. I was told that there was not going to be much opportunity because this map was to be presented, along with the final report of the Saskatchewan subcommittee, at the next meeting of the main committee which had been scheduled for 8.30 that night. So during the week—

Mr. Boucher: Absolutely untrue. There was plenty of opportunity.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, did I understand the hon. member to say that is absolutely false?

Mr. Boucher: Absolutely. Plenty of opportunity was offered.

Mr. Fulton: I thought the hon. member said it was false. If he had said that, it would not be the first time he had said so and it would not be the first time he had completely twisted what actually took place.

Mr. Boucher: You are the twister.

Mr. Fulton: So although the map had taken a week at least to prepare, we were told about one o'clock on Monday, June 23, that this map was to be presented, along with the final report of the Saskatchewan subcommittee, to the main committee which at that time was scheduled to meet at 8.30 that night.

Mr. Boucher: Was it presented that night?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: In spite of the fact that the house was meeting at 3.00 and again at 8.00, and the meetings of other committees which were sitting at the time, only eight hours were to be allowed for consideration of any variations or alterations to the "jimmymander" which had taken at least a week to prepare. It had taken a week—

Mr. Boucher: Ridiculous.

Mr. Fulton: As I say, it had taken a week to carve up Saskatchewan. My friend the hon. member for Eglinton used the expression this morning that the surgeons had gone to work; well, they may have been surgeons, but they were pretty crude. Perhaps the surgeons were somewhat the victims of their own chloroform; the knife made a number of slips from the line of equity and the body of the victim was badly carved up by the time they were through.

An hon. Member: Mutilated.

Mr. Fulton: The main committee did not meet at 8.30 that night.

An hon. Member: It met at 9.00.

Mr. Fulton: It met at nine and when it met it adjourned almost immediately because there were other unsolved difficulties in other subcommittees. At that meeting which took, as I recall it, about ten minutes on Monday night, the official motion was made and the hon. member for Lake Centre who had returned again became a member of the Saskatchewan subcommittee; I no longer continued as a member of it. The details of the discussions which took place after that time are therefore something with which I am not familiar. But I am familiar with the fact that the map as it is now drawn and incorporated in the report of the Saskatchewan subcommittee is virtually the same map as was presented to us at 12.30, a week ago today, in the office of the chairman of the Saskatchewan subcommittee; and that map, Mr. Chairman, is nothing more nor less than an iniquity. That map is drawn clearly and obviously with the intention of eliminating the present constituency of Lake Centre and the member for it, and with the intention of throwing that constituency, which preserves the name but nothing of the appearance of the former constituency of Lake Centre, in with the constituency of Moose Jaw.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe these things should be decided altogether on the basis of the individuals or the personalities involved. I admit that is an incorrect principle, although I must say that I recall other cases where constituencies have been preserved because of the personality of the individuals who happened to represent them. The obvious example of that procedure is what took place in the 1947 redistribution, when the constituency of Glengarry was preserved because it happened to be represented by the right hon. gentleman who at that time was prime minister, namely Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): The same thing was done in Haldimand in 1947.

Mr. Fulton: I am not denying that.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): That is all right. Let us keep the record straight.

Mr. Fulton: I am saying it has been done in certain cases. Let us therefore look at what has been done here by deliberate design. This is not a case where it is just a matter of politics, where constituencies are being eliminated and somebody has to suffer; and if somebody has to suffer, it is obviously going to be "the other fellow and not myself". This is a case where a deliberate plan has been drawn so that two members of the House of Commons who are prominent, useful and distinguished members, both having tremendous contributions to offer but neither of whom is acceptable personally to the present government, are going to be pitted against each other in order to make it absolutely certain that one of them at least cannot come back here. Mr. Chairman, this thing far transcends the mere ordinary political consideration. In my view this thing which makes sure that either the present hon. member for Moose Jaw as an individual, or the present hon. member for Lake Centre as an individual, cannot come back here from that constituency is an affront to parliament and to the public life of Canada. It is on that ground that I say this map is an iniquity and should be withdrawn, and that the whole of the map of Saskatchewan should be redesigned.

Mr. Boucher: Rubbish.

Mr. Fulton: One could easily multiply these examples by others, but it seems to me these have been fairly fully rehearsed during the course of this debate. I want to refer to only one other and that is the constituency now represented by my deskmate, the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings. What we have in Saskatchewan is bad enough. We hear about the proposed constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre being a semi-urban constituency. When I asked how many square miles there are in it I was told there were 3,800. Did you ever hear of an urban area of 3,800 square miles, Mr. Chairman? Did any hon. member in this committee ever hear of an urban area of 3,800 square miles?

Mr. Dewar: Semi-urban; get it right.

Mr. Fulton: You can see the length to which they are driven to justify the monstrosity they have perpetrated when they say that an area of 3,800 square miles is urban or semi-urban, to use the words of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. He made very certain that his constituency of Qu'Appelle—

Mr. Dewar: Would remain entirely rural.

Mr. Fulton: It is small enough, abutting closely on the city of Regina; in fact, his constituency practically surrounded the city of Regina. The city of Regina is larger than the city of Moose Jaw, and using that same argument would it not be more urban or semi-urban than Moose Jaw-Lake Centre? But no; the hon. member for Qu'Appelle wanted to leave no doubt either as to the rural nature of his constituency or as to the possibilities of his winning that constituency in so far as he could ensure that result, and so he—

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question? Did not Lake Centre surround Regina following the last Conservative redistribution?

Mr. Fulton: I am not quite sure what the situation was there because I was not here following the—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman,—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Dewar: His point of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It did not.

Mr. Gardiner: It almost surrounded it, except on one side.

Mr. Fulton: I have the map here showing the boundaries of Lake Centre and all the other constituencies around Regina as they were in 1947, in fact all the constituencies in Saskatchewan as they were in the 1947 redistribution, and I understand that the line with respect to Regina as it was in 1947 was the same as it was in 1933, and certainly the constituency of Lake Centre did not surround Regina. I did not know what the purpose of the minister's question was unless it was to leave with the committee a totally erroneous impression, and one which he himself knew to be erroneous.

Mr. Gardiner: It went two-thirds across the north side and all the way down the west side and two-thirds across the south.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister has confused the constituencies. I am not surprised, because he has been drawing lines so rapidly and with such profusion and confusion that he is now confusing the former constituency of Lake Centre—which did not surround Regina—with the present constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre which does—

Mr. Gardiner: I will send it over to you.

Mr. Fulton: —and which he has now placed together. The confusion is understandable, because the former constituency of Moose Jaw did surround the city of Moose Jaw, but Lake Centre as it was from 1933 to 1952 did not surround the city of Regina.

Mr. Gardiner: Not 1952; 1933.

Mr. Fulton: I am looking at the line on the map as it was in 1947, which was drawn—

Mr. Gardiner: It is 1933.

Mr. Fulton: —by the Liberal government, and the constituency of Lake Centre does not surround the city of Regina.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has not since 1933.

Mr. Fulton: Now Moose Jaw-Lake Centre does surround the city of Regina; whereas the constituency of Qu'Appelle has had that area removed from it. It was already smaller than Lake Centre and it is now made even that much smaller by the loss of that area which has been added to the proposed new constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

[The Chairman.]

Then we have the same process in reverse directed toward the member for Annapolis-Kings. That hon. member now represents a rural riding, larger in population by a considerable number than either of the two neighbouring rural ridings in that province; but instead of the relief being given in accordance with principle, as we were assured this subcommittee would follow the principle, further relief has been given to the neighbouring constituencies at the expense of the constituency of Annapolis-Kings which now is to be Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Winters: May I rise on a question of privilege to correct the erroneous statement that relief was given to the neighbouring constituencies as proposed, and tell the hon. member and members of the committee that the proposed constituency of Queens-Lunenburg has a greater increase in point of population and in point of area than the proposed constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Fulton: The point the minister has conveniently omitted from his remarks is that the elimination of a constituency in that area meant that there had to be additions to the surrounding constituencies; but the result of the additions, as carried out by the Liberal majority on the maritimes subcommittee, is that the constituency of Annapolis-Kings, which was already the largest of the three neighbouring constituencies by a very considerable amount, has been increased by a further 12,000 people to a total of 66,510, while Queens-Lunenburg, the county represented by the minister, or the constituency to be represented by the minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fraser: Flap your wings now; you won't have a chance later on.

Mr. Fulton: —as he hopes; but I rather fancy that the people of Nova Scotia will know what has been going on and will know how to indicate their disapproval, as will the voters in other parts of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I can understand that these remarks are not acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite. They did not give us a chance to say anything in the subcommittees; they might let us have our say in this committee.

Mr. Blue: You have spoken for forty minutes now and have not said anything.

Mr. Fulton: The proposed constituency of Queens-Lunenburg has been increased to 45,800, which is over 20,000 fewer people than the proposed constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings. But all these constituencies could have been made very nearly equal by a perfectly proper—indeed a more proper—change in the constituency boundaries than that proposed; yet we find that here is another betrayal of the principle of equality directed exclusively and purposefully to the end of making it more difficult for the present member for Annapolis-Kings to continue to represent the new riding, and which can only have the additional result of ensuring that there have to be 20,000 more people in that riding to elect a member than in the neighbouring constituencies. The task of proper representation of that area is greatly increased.

Mr. Winters: It is the same area as the hon. member represented before.

Mr. Fulton: And it is the same area that he will represent again. But that is no justification for ignoring a proper, simple and obvious form of readjustment which would equalize three rural constituencies, and for putting 20,000 more in one constituency than in either of the other two.

This whole procedure is obviously improper but unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, we are left only with the conclusion that so long as redistribution is carried on in this way so long will we continue to have an improper readjustment of boundaries for proposed and hoped-for political advantage.

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member for Kamloops having brought us all the way from the Pacific to the Atlantic with that versatility for which I congratulate him, I think this is the proper moment for me as member for the Magdalen islands to take part in this debate.

While listening to this debate, and particularly to the hon. member for Eglinton this morning, I heard members of the opposition mention several times the exact number of electors in my county, although the name of my county was not mentioned.

Mr. Harkness: The number is 9,999.

Mr. Cannon: I am glad to be able to tell the hon. member that we have now passed the 10,000 mark.

Mr. Harkness: Were you responsible?

Mr. Cannon: I was responsible, but not in the way to which the hon. member is referring. I brought new industries to the county.

Mr. Harkness: What is the other one?

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member for Eglinton and other hon. members made reference to my constituency, and the fact of it being represented. Perhaps I imagined it, but I thought the hon. member for Eglinton was looking at me when he made certain statements this morning. Anyway, whatever my reasons may be, I think it is only right that as the first member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine in the House of Commons I should take part in this debate and defend the action of the government and committee in not changing the area of the constituency of the Magdalen islands by including them in another county.

Mine is a relatively small constituency—and this will not be a long speech. I can reassure hon. members that it will be short. Also let me say that I have such a good case that it will not take me long to convince members of the House of Commons that the committee did a good thing in leaving the Magdalen islands as they are. The constituency of Iles-de-la-Madeleine was created a federal riding in the redistribution of 1948, only four years ago. The house decided at that time that it should have its own representation in the House of Commons. Since that time the population of that county has increased. The reasons that existed at that time for giving it a representative of its own exist today; indeed, I shall try to show hon. members that they exist to an even greater extent now than they did at that time. Those who were on the redistribution committee in 1947 or 1948—I am not quite sure of the year—have told me there were three reasons why the Magdalen islands were made a constituency in their own right. These were ethnic, economical and geographic reasons.

The ethnic reason was that it was felt that the Acadians, the French-speaking citizens of Canada in the maritime provinces, did not have the representation they should have in the House of Commons. It is known that on the Magdalen islands 90 per cent of the people are French-speaking, and they are all of Acadian stock. It was felt therefore that they should be given an opportunity to be represented in the House of Commons by a French-speaking member.

The economic reason is that, although it is a small county, it is the county in my province in which there are the most fishermen. No other county in the whole of Quebec has more fishermen than have the Magdalen islands. As fishermen they have special problems, and it was felt that if they were left to form a part of another county, as they were when they formed part of the constituency of Gaspe, their member would not have time to give the amount of attention their problems require.

Hon. members may have noticed that during my membership in the House of Commons I have endeavoured to take a particular interest in the fisheries, and have tried to do what I could to improve the lot of the fishermen, by getting them harbours, wharves and breakwaters, with the assistance and good will of my good friend the Minister of Public Works. These are the economic reasons for which the county was created.

There was also a geographical reason. As you know, this constituency is situated out in the middle of the gulf of St. Lawrence, far from any other land. It is more than a hundred miles from Gaspe and about the same distance from Newfoundland. There were only two counties to which it could have been joined. One of these was the county of Gaspe to which it was attached before. Gaspe already has a population of over 60,000, and hon. members will have noted that the average population for constituencies stands at 54,000. The other county to which it could have been attached was the county of Saguenay. But that county, too, has a comparatively large population. It is far removed from the Magdalen islands, and to have attached the Magdalen islands to the county of Saguenay would not have been a practical procedure at all. Perhaps I might draw the attention of the committee to the fact that both of these counties, Gaspe and Saguenay, are at this time experiencing a large increase in population. Through the discoveries of copper in Gaspe and iron ore in Saguenay, considerable development is taking place in those counties. Because of that they now have a considerable population, and because of the additional development which is increasing their population it would not have been practical to attach the Magdalen islands to either of them.

I submit therefore that the reasons that existed in 1948 when the constituency was created exist now with even greater weight. As we are nearing the end of the session—we hope—I shall not detain the committee longer. However, I did wish to set out these reasons which, I suggest, are good and valid reasons why my constituency should be left as it is. I submit that the committee on redistribution for these reasons did well not to interfere with the status of the Magdalen islands; and the suggestion that the government and the Liberal party were at fault in allowing such a comparatively small group to be represented by their own member in the house is unfounded. I wish to set the record straight, and to reject any such suggestion.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I must say that it would have given me great pleasure to speak in French on this matter of utmost importance to the electors of the Magdalen islands, the matter of their right to be represented here, in the House of Commons. However, since the members of the opposition who have made the remarks I feel compelled to refute are English-speaking, I have deemed it advisable to use their own language. That is why I did not speak in French.

(Text):

On the general subject of the debate let me say that, as a new member in the house and in my first parliament, I have found it interesting to listen to what has been said in this debate on redistribution. While listening to it, however, I could not help thinking that much the same debate must take place at every redistribution after every census. My thoughts go back to 1932, when the Conservative party were in power and made the redistribution in their own way. At that time accusations of gerrymandering were made against them by the Liberal party, which was then in opposition.

I cannot help thinking that if members of the opposition are really sincere when they say they believe the problem of redistribution should be taken out of the hands of the House of Commons and referred to a commission they should explain why they did not do it when they were in power. My personal opinion is that the problem of representation in the House of Commons and the problem of the divisions with respect to the different federal constituencies is a matter that should remain in the hands of the House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: Some of the ministers do not think so.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that after listening to this debate, as you have, for the last several hours you must agree with me that this is about as weird a way of carrying on redistribution as anyone could very well imagine. One hon. member has described it as an abomination. Others have used other language. But what they all say amounts to this, that in the House of Commons we should find a better method than the one we are now using of carrying out a redistribution of seats in the Dominion of Canada.

I have not taken part in the debate up to this point because I have been waiting to see if I could make out any principle the government was following in the matter of redistribution. It seemed to me that they would have some general principle they would be following across the dominion. I was surprised when the hon. member for Ottawa West told us about the principle they had followed in the Ontario subcommittee, when he said that they had taken the six smallest constituencies and had added to them, and taken the six largest constituencies and subtracted from them. They had divided some of them, taken parts out of others, and tried to get some equality so far as representation by population is concerned.

Mr. Fleming: But not very much.

Mr. Wright: But after they had looked after the six smallest and the six largest constituencies, or at least had done something about them, they seemed to throw up their hands and pretty much accepted the others. That principle certainly was not carried out in Nova Scotia. I was a member of that subcommittee and there we found that one of the largest rural constituencies in Canada, if not the largest instead of being reduced or left as it was had another 12,000 added to it. I refer to Annapolis-Kings, to which Digby was added. They have created one of the largest rural constituencies in the Dominion of Canada.

When we came to Saskatchewan they took the largest constituency there, divided it into four and distributed it among the other constituencies in the area, putting them in the position where they had from 8,000 to 10,000 more population than many of the other rural constituencies in the province.

Down in Nova Scotia they have another principle which they follow, the shore line principle. That is a new one. I did not know that members represented shore lines; I thought they represented people. They told us in the subcommittee that a member could have only so many miles of shore line in his constituency and therefore they had to take some of the shore line out of Queens-Shelburne or one of the other constituencies down there and place it in Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

When we get out to Saskatchewan we find that the hon. member for Lake Centre has a lot of shore line in his constituency. He has a lake running right up through it. However, the shore line principle was not followed in Saskatchewan; in fact they had no principle to follow out there. They followed the Minister of Agriculture. I think he is a poor man to follow as far as redistribution is concerned.

Mr. Fleming: A poor substitute.

Mr. Wright: A poor substitute for principle. For many years the Minister of Agriculture has been following a narrow line between truth and fiction. As he gets older the line gets more faded and he wanders off into the realm of fiction more and more. The result is that we have a pretty weird redistribution as far as Saskatchewan is concerned.

I think it is ridiculous the way this redistribution has been carried on. In Saskatchewan we find three constituencies up in the northeast corner of the province, Humboldt-Melfort with 53,500; Prince Albert with 56,000 and Mackenzie with 49,600. Any hon. member looking at the map will realize that that is a new area. It contains a considerable acreage of land which is being taken out of the forest reserve and placed under cultivation every year. Last year between 300 and 400 half sections of land were taken out of the forest reserve and placed under cultivation. Families were established on that land. There are 750,000 acres in one area in the constituency of Mackenzie which in all probability will be settled in the next ten years.

Mr. Dewar: Why is the population less than it was in the last ten years?

Mr. Wright: I am not talking about what happened in the last ten years, I am talking about what is likely to happen in the next ten years. That is the trouble with the Liberals, they are always looking backward, they do not look ahead. This is the only really new area in the province. It is being opened up and a large population is being placed in each constituency.

Then down in the southeast corner of the province we find the constituency of Moose Mountain with 41,300. There is the constituency of Qu'Appelle with a population of 42,500. Then there is Melville, represented by the Minister of Agriculture, with 43,500. After looking at the map one realizes that the only principle they could have followed in Saskatchewan was that the constituency of Melville must not be interfered with, or as little as possible; the constituencies north and south were to be maintained. After that anything could happen, and pretty nearly anything did happen so far as representation by population in that province is concerned.

I was on the Saskatchewan subcommittee for the 1947 redistribution. The present leader of the opposition in Saskatchewan was on that committee. He drew a map, just as the Liberal members of the subcommittee drew one this year. I said then, and I say now, that at least he followed some principle. The principle he followed was to try to maintain representation by population in the province with a variation of not more than 10 per cent. He carried that out pretty well, but this time that principle has been thrown to the winds. Apparently the Minister of Agriculture does not believe in it, or the committee does not believe in it. I do not know on whom to place the blame. The indications before the election, according to the press, were that the constituency of Assiniboia was to be eliminated. Apparently the election results changed the minds of certain people and they decided to do it another way. So we find the constituency of Swift Current taken out and the constituency of Assiniboia again on the map. I think it is a fairer map than it would have been had they carried out the original intention.

This whole redistribution, not only as it concerns Saskatchewan but as it affects the other provinces as well, has apparently been built around individuals rather than around the basic principle of representation by population, representation to conform with the geographical areas to be represented.

In the constituency of Melfort, which was taken out, we had a constituency consisting of the drainage area in the northeastern part of the province from the Carrot and Saskatchewan rivers. The people who have gone into that area during the last 30 or 40 years have similar ideas and carried on similar pursuits. I think that constituency should have been left on the map. But it is taken out and the population redistributed, with the result that we do not have representation by population in the province of Saskatchewan. All we have is a mess. I think any honest person who looks at the map will agree with me.

When I was speaking in the main committee on this subject I mentioned that the population of the new constituency of Humboldt-Melfort would be some 53,500. At that time the hon. member for Rosthern rose and said, "Yes, but you have three towns in there, Humboldt, Melfort and Tisdale; besides that, the people in the area have large families." Just why people with large families should not have the same representation as people with small families is something I do not know. Apparently that is another new theory in redistribution which has been developed.

There you have it. The most weird excuses have been given for this map which has been described by some as an abomination. I could refer to the constituency of Lake Centre, but I am going to leave that to be dealt with by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I know he is quite capable of doing that. The whole thing is simply ridiculous. I do not think anyone can make out an honest case for what has been done in Saskatchewan. I am not going to deal with the other provinces except Nova Scotia, because I sat on that subcommittee. Exactly the same performance took place there. The thing is ridiculous. You have the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings with 66,510, and then a constituency right alongside represented by the worthy Minister of Resources and Development having 20,000 people less. I like the Minister of Resources and Development, but why should he represent 20,000 fewer people than the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings? It just does not make sense. Therefore I hope that we can all agree at the next session or the one following that to do away with this method of redistribution. It is so ridiculous that one only has to talk about it to see people smile. I am sure if people throughout the country were listening to this performance, of if they read Hansard, they would be a bit disgusted with the method we are following at the present time. If we want democracy, if we want representation by population, then let us do something different from what we are doing now.

Mr. Weir: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Weir: The hon. member and others from the province of Saskatchewan particularly have been labouring over the redistribution in that province, but they have entirely lost sight of the fact that Saskatchewan actually has more constituencies than it would be ordinarily entitled to. Are you better off under the present arrangement or would you be better off if you had lost three more seats?

Mr. Wright: The answer to that question is obvious. Of course we are better off with the present method of redistribution; but that has nothing to do with the redistribution within the province after the question of the number of seats has been decided. Legislation was passed to provide for the number of seats. A special amendment was introduced to correct what we thought was an injustice that was being created there. I think all members of parliament agreed that there was an injustice, and so far as I know the amendment was passed unanimously by the house.

Mr. Weir: Will my hon. friend not give the government credit for permitting Saskatchewan to have additional representation?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Wright: That is a different problem altogether. I do not know whether the government would have followed the method they did if we in the opposition had not had something to say about it. When the Prime Minister was talking about the matter he said it was a decision of the house and not a decision of the government.

Mr. Weir: Is it not also true that the constituency that has disappeared in the province of Nova Scotia was represented by a Liberal member in this house?

Mr. Fleming: What has that to do with the question of equal distribution?

Mr. Wright: You know that as well as I do.

Mr. Harrison: I should like to ask the hon. member a question if he would care to answer it. How does he reconcile the speech he has made with the actions of his own party in the province of Saskatchewan so far as provincial redistribution is concerned?

Mr. Coldwell: We made our position plain.

Mr. Wright: I think we made our position perfectly clear. As far as I am concerned I would have much preferred to see a commission set up in the province of Saskatchewan to deal with redistribution, but I do not think the result there was anywhere near as weird as the result in the province of Saskatchewan so far as federal redistribution is concerned.

Mr. Harrison: Nevertheless that applies to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: Will the hon. member permit another question? Will he admit that the one seat that was completely wiped out in Saskatchewan was represented by a Liberal member?

Mr. Coldwell: Look at the number of seats in this house represented by opposition members.

Mr. Wright: The minister says that was the only seat that was completely wiped out. The constituency of Melfort is just as completely wiped out as the one formerly known as Swift Current. The only thing they did was retain the name "Melfort". They gave it the hybrid name of Humboldt-Melfort. So far as the actual constituency is concerned—

An hon. Member: It is still there.

Mr. Wright: —there is more of the old constituency of Swift Current in the present constituency of Maple Creek than there is any part of Melfort constituency in any constituency in the northern part of the province.

Mr. Gardiner: The only Saskatchewan constituency that has been wiped out in which any member of this house could have run is a Liberal seat.

Mr. Johnston: As I have sat here listening to the speeches I have found it somewhat amusing when I heard the government trying to convince everybody in the house that there had been no political gerrymandering. I think we of the Calgary area have about the greatest joke of all the cases that have been referred to. When I am through I think I will have convinced at least some of the members on the government side that this is true. I thought the purpose of redistribution was to make the changes that were required and that no changes would be made that were unnecessary, particularly when there was satisfaction on the part of the sitting members and the people concerned in these districts. If that had been done I do not think there would have been a great deal of trouble. When I say "trouble", I am not getting up to speak tonight because I want to beef about something that was done. I accept it. There is nothing else to do. We had to accept it in the subcommittee. We had to accept it when it came to the main committee and we have to accept it in this committee. There is nothing else we can do.

Mr. Harkness: We were guillotined.

Mr. Johnston: That remains to be seen. We can beat the tar out of them just as well this way as any other. We have done a beautiful job in Alberta up to the present time and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Abbott: We Tories together.

An hon. Member: It would not be any worse hitching up with them than with you.

Mr. Johnston: I think there is no other situation like ours in Canada. All three sitting members were perfectly satisfied. So far as any redistribution in the southern part of Alberta is concerned, all the members involved were perfectly willing to allow the seats to remain as they were. The only ones who were dissatisfied were outsiders who were pushed in from the northern part of the province and came down to southern Alberta to settle something for the Calgary Liberal Association. Don't make any mistake about that. These people from the northern part of the province who were the Liberal members of the committee did not even know the conditions in Calgary and the surrounding area or how the population was distributed, and they will admit that. If they do not know they are certainly trying to deceive themselves, because they did not know anything about it when the matter was before the subcommittee. When they were talking about changing Calgary they talked about a principle. It is nice to have principles, Mr. Chairman. I have no objection to that.

Mr. Coldwell: I hope not.

Mr. Johnston: No. I am a free enterpriser. I am not a socialist who tries to take away from the other fellow. I am not a Liberal who pretends to be Liberal but is socialist; and I am not a Conservative, something that is almost of the past. I am a Social Crediter, the thing that is sweeping British Columbia now.

Mr. Prudham: Tell us what that is.

Mr. Johnston: You will find out soon enough. I was talking about the question of principle. I was not always a member of the subcommittee. The hon. member for Red Deer was on it for some little time at first when the subcommittee was dealing with the northern part of the province. Then the hon. member for Red Deer was compelled to leave and I was put in his place. For the last three or four weeks we have not had a solitary meeting of that subcommittee. When we were called in a few days ago—I think it was last Tuesday or Wednesday—to discuss the redistribution of the southern part of the province of Alberta, the map was all prepared. They said so far as Calgary was concerned they were very noble men and were going to act on a matter of principle. Nobody could object to that if it were followed out. I did not mind them having a little principle. The thing that shocked me was when they began to express it.

They explained the matter of principle in this way. They said that the city of Calgary is one of the most perfect opportunities anywhere in the province of Alberta to create two purely urban seats. Then they extended that and said that it was not only the outstanding city in Alberta where two urban constituencies could be set up, but in all of Canada. If I mistake not, they went so far as to say in all of North America, or perhaps I am exaggerating there.

The principle which the Liberal members of that subcommittee outlined to us was this: We are going to have Calgary as a purely urban centre, made up of two constituencies. So when the vote came to exclude the Bow River section of Calgary—they were still standing on this principle—they said we could not allow that to be in Bow River and we must put it out, because remember we are standing on principle. There could not be a great objection to that, when it is a case of principle. Then the chairman came in, not knowing anything about it, and of course you knew which way the vote was going so the Bow River section of Calgary was cut out of the urban centre, because it was a matter of principle. We were going to have two purely urban seats. Then, Mr. Chairman, these members suddenly forgot their principles; they began then to be men of no principle. No sooner had they accomplished that than they started adding suburban areas and even rural areas.

Mr. Darroch: They are just as good as any city areas.

Mr. Johnston: If you do not call that political gerrymandering, I do not know what to call it. I was interested in what the Minister of Agriculture said about the constituency of Lake Centre a moment ago, when he pointed out that in the last redistribution—he will correct me if I am wrong—

Mr. Gardiner: The second last.

Mr. Johnston: We shall not argue about it; the second last, he pointed out the ridiculousness of having Lake Centre surround Regina. Was that it?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say it was ridiculous, I said it almost did surround Regina.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnston: You would say that was ridiculous, or why would you put it in your argument? I am agreeing with you. When they finished with Calgary, Bow River surrounded Calgary completely except for six miles on the south side.

Mr. Fraser: Giving you the runaround.

Mr. Johnston: Surely this was political gerrymandering. Then finally, when the thing looked so confoundedly absurd, Bow River ended up by only surrounding Calgary on three sides; that is the way it stands now.

Mr. Adamson: That is what they call the mother constituency.

Mr. Johnston: The boundaries of the Bow River riding extend from the British Columbia border to the Saskatchewan border, minus 84 miles; and the constituency is 56 miles across at the widest point. With the exception of 84 miles, my riding goes from one provincial boundary to the other. I shall have to have an airplane to cover it.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the modern means of transportation.

Mr. Johnston: Now, Mr. Chairman, there can be no logic in that. Probably when these men get up to talk about how they are men of principle, to start with at least, they will tell you: Well now, listen; we gave you fellows what you wanted after we cut Bow River out of Calgary. We were going to have a principle of having purely urban constituencies there, and then we did not do that either. We forgot about that later on and we ceased to have principle, but now how would you fellows like your eggs fried? You can run the boundary line for Calgary along the Bow river or you can run it along the railroad tracks. We do not care much where you run it—that is after they have completely eliminated the Bow River section.

Mr. Cardiff: You cannot fry rotten eggs.

Mr. Johnston: They did a swell job of messing up a natural area. As I indicated, the odd part of it was that there had been no objection from the three sitting members at all. They were not of the same political party; yet so far as I know there was no objection. If the thing had been left exactly as it was, it would have been all right. To my knowledge, there were no objections from the residents in any of those areas. You would have thought that had there been dissatisfaction among the people the members would have been the first to hear about it, but even to this day I have never received one word of complaint.

But I shall tell you what I did receive. We might as well be frank, and this is the first time I have mentioned it. The Liberal associations were holding meetings right down on the boundary line between Calgary East and Bow River, and have been doing so for the last six or seven months. I shall go further and tell you that I had one man come out of a Liberal meeting and tell me what was going to happen. It is no surprise to me at all. In fact one of the members of the subcommittee said to me, "We are going to make Calgary purely—" and then he did not quite finish the sentence. Then he said, "It is my opinion that it should be made purely urban."

Mr. Knowles: Make Calgary pure.

Mr. Johnston: Calgary was pure before it got mixed up in Liberal politics. I am not so sure about it now.

It does seem to me there has been a great injustice committed by the gerrymandering of these ridings in the southern part of Alberta. Even at this time I would suggest that this committee of the whole should decide to leave the three federal constituencies of Calgary East, Calgary West and Bow River exactly as they were.

Mr. Harkness: Hear, hear.

Mr. Johnston: So far as I know, there was no one who was dissatisfied with that. In the seventeen years I have represented that constituency I have never heard one complaint. The hon. member for Calgary East tells me he has never heard any complaints. So far as I know the hon. member for Calgary West has not heard any complaints, although it was pointed out by one of the Liberal members of the committee that he had. The member said, "Are you sure the member for Calgary West did not receive a telegram of complaint the other day?" I can quite understand that the Liberal association in Calgary would send a telegram of complaint, so there would be at least one complaint. As has been pointed out to me, particularly would that be true if they had a suggestion from Ottawa in the first place.

There were certainly no good reasons put forward by the Liberal members of the subcommittee for disturbing that area at all. They did not know the area, so why should they do anything about it? The actions of these members certainly show that they know nothing about it.

Mr. Murphy: That is not unusual.

Mr. Johnston: It certainly was not unusual in that case, but I did expect there would be a greater measure of fairness in the allotment of these constituencies in the southern part of Alberta. There was no reason whatever for changing the boundaries. This is the one place in Canada where there was no necessity for making any change. As I said, I am not complaining because my section of Calgary was cut out. I had the industrial section of Calgary which joined in well with the industrial area of Drumheller, and I had the agricultural area between. The Liberal members of the committee said, "There is lacking a community of interest". So what did they do? They added two Indian reserves, a ranching area, a farming area and the mining area of Drumheller, and the tourist area of Banff. Then they said: "Now you really have a community of interest."

An hon. Member: The Indian reserves are all right.

Mr. Johnston: I am not saying they are not. In fact I much prefer them to the Liberals. But we are talking about community of interest. They said, "Now you have the tourist business of Banff; you have the Indian reserves; you have the industrial area of Drumheller and you have the farmers. What more do you want?" That is community of interest! They have never put up even one argument that consisted of common sense. They just brought the map in and said, "This is what you are going to get." When the vote was tied, they brought in another chairman who did not know any more than they did; and when he voted the result was a foregone conclusion. As I say, Mr. Chairman, that was the way in which the subcommittee worked. That was the way the main committee worked; and I am not passing any remarks about the chairman of that main committee. I want to say that I think if he had had his way, there would have been at least some measure of justice. I am speaking of the main committee absolutely.

Mr. Laing: What are you afraid of?

Mr. Johnston: There is not much use of our doing any arguing here, Mr. Chairman, because the thing is going to go the way the Liberal machine wants it to go anyway. I assure you, however, that when the election comes, no matter what changes they make in the boundaries, we will come right back in here just the same.

Mr. Catherwood: Mr. Chairman, being one of those members who has fallen out of favour with the present government, I hope that I may have an opportunity of speaking for a few minutes this evening on this extremely important matter which was discussed on Saturday and is being discussed again today. I find it difficult to follow the reasoning adopted by the members of the government in bringing this report to parliament in this manner. In the first place, I feel that this point has not been seriously considered in any way, shape or form by any of the subcommittees. Of course we all recognize the fact that when it came to the general committee only on Saturday it was simply impossible for them to give this matter the consideration a question of this importance deserves.

This is a measure of extreme importance to the people of Canada. With the many constituencies across this country which are vitally concerned by the action of this government, and with this matter being brought to this parliament in the dying days of this session, when the heat of this July weather is driving us from this chamber and when members are anxious to get home, I feel that we simply cannot give this matter the thorough discussion we should give it at this time. It is most unfortunate that the government have decided to rush this legislation through, because there could have been ample time to discuss this matter. It was first mentioned in the speech from the throne back in February. I think the resolution was presented to parliament on March 10. We have had almost four months to study this matter. Then they bring the matter before parliament on the first day of July, a day later than we intended to adjourn.

I feel that the government will regret exceedingly the fact that we have not had time to study thoroughly this extremely important matter, and to give it the analysis and detailed examination that I think it should have. I leave it to every hon. member of this committee to decide whether this is the proper method to deal with matters such as this. In this last minute rush before adjourning, we should have before us the evidence of the subcommittees; we should have the printed report of the general committee. That is something I think is extremely important. We have none of this evidence before us, except what we hear from hon. members. From what we have heard here today, I think it is all the more reason why this matter should not be decided at the present time. If we are going to give intelligent study to and make a thorough analysis of these factors, I feel that this matter should be referred back to the committee for further study. I feel the government will deeply regret the hasty action they have taken at this time.

I will say this, and it is with deep conviction. I feel that the government still have time to reconsider this matter. If they do so, they will only be following the principle established by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier back in 1892 in the redistribution committee set up at that time. I will briefly quote his words. Sir Wilfrid was in the opposition at that time. His words were: the very fact that this measure has been postponed and put off until the dying hours of the session deserves the most severe censure of this house. Those are extremely telling words, Mr. Chairman.

I refer also to the late William Lyon Mackenzie King, who many hon. members of this committee will agree was an outstanding statesman. I quote these gentlemen because I know these two references I have just given are the only ones we can speak of convincingly when we try to get the government to see our point of view on these matters. Mr. Mackenzie King also quoted the same statement in the redistribution committee in 1933; and I might say, Mr. Chairman, that subsequent events have proven the wisdom of his statement at that time. I am sure all hon. members will agree that what has been said by these outstanding leaders should be given serious consideration by hon. members of this committee.

There is another matter which has been dealt with in this committee and which I feel has been most unfair. I also feel that it does not bear the slightest resemblance to what we consider to be good government. I refer to the approach made by the government to the rearrangement of the seats in this House of Commons. When I supported this resolution to set up a committee, I did so because I, along with many other members of the house had, shall we say, sufficient faith and confidence in human nature to think that this committee would bring in a report which we could at least say was brought in without having behind it ulterior motives. I had sufficient faith, as I think all hon. members had, that that would happen. But when we see reports such as those which have been submitted by the subcommittees—particularly from the province of Saskatchewan, for example—I feel that the faith we had in this committee has crumbled into dust at our feet.

How any committee could bring in a report such as that brought in by the subcommittee for the province of Saskatchewan is beyond anything that any of us, by the widest stretch of the imagination or in the most vivid dreams, could possibly contemplate. I refer, of course, to the mutilation and dissection of the seat of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that the hon. member for Lake Centre is one of the great parliamentarians of this generation who, during the twelve years he has been here in the House of Commons, has given ample evidence of the great ability he possesses. I think we should get down on our knees and thank the Almighty that we have a member in the House of Commons of the type of the hon. member for Lake Centre. Is this the reasoning the people of Canada expected of us as elected representatives of the people? Is this the type of legislation that the 262 constituencies across Canada expect of their representatives in this parliament? In fairness, I ask all hon. members: Is that the type of legislation they expect us to put through? I think it is not. I will say this, that shattered as our thoughts have been by the report of the subcommittee, I do feel that the members of this parliament could not have expected recommendations such as those which have been presented by the subcommittees of the general committee, and particularly the subcommittee from Saskatchewan. God forbid that it should pass. All I can say is that this great institution of parliament, and we as members who comprise this institution, will regret and regret exceedingly what we do in this house if we adopt that report. We shall certainly not be proud of it.

May I again refer to a statement of the late leader of the Liberal party and the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, who said at page 5238 of Hansard of May 22, 1933:

> I submit that there is no higher trust imposed upon a House of Commons under our constitution than that of justly redistributing the constituencies.

When we think of that statement we wonder how the Manitoba subcommittee in particular could have brought in the recommendation they did, which report deliberately amalgamates two constituencies represented by two very able and outstanding members in this house, the hon. member for Souris and the hon. member for Brandon. This action may be considered by some as smart political manoeuvring, but it certainly is no fine achievement.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, we had the opportunity of producing the reports of the various subcommittees that have been presented, but unfortunately that is denied to us. I should like to say a word concerning the subcommittee for the province of Ontario. We had as our chairman a man whom I have always held and still hold in very high esteem in this house, the hon. member for Ottawa West. May I just digress for a moment. Before coming to this house I, along with many other hon. members, had many opportunities of presiding over meetings of different organizations. That was part of our duties in so many cases, before coming to parliament. Our obligation as chairman of any group was this. When matters of particular interest to any person came up for discussion we always consulted the people who were affected or whose business was under discussion.

Following that line of thought I had hoped that, as has happened from time immemorial, the hon. member for Ottawa West, who was chairman of our subcommittee, would have consulted the hon. member for Haldimand and my colleague the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth on the matter of the amalgamation of our two constituencies. He did not. I regret this exceedingly, because in answer to a question this morning the hon. member for Ottawa West informed us that he consulted different members of the government when it came to questions of changes in their constituencies. For that reason I felt it would have been only common courtesy had he consulted my colleague and myself, particularly when a matter of such consequence as the amalgamation of our two ridings was under discussion. I regret very much that he did not, sir. As I said before, I have great respect for the hon. member for Ottawa West, but I regret that he did not consult us, and more particularly since he admitted this morning that he consulted government members on matters of additions to or subtractions from their ridings. I do not know whether he considered it beneath his dignity or what the reason was, but he did not consult the two members affected in the redistribution of these two ridings.

I should like to ask the members of the government whether the lust for power is so great that they must crush every semblance of opposition in this House of Commons. To me it is regrettable. The actions that have been employed prove beyond any question of doubt that it is the intention of the government to eliminate wherever possible anyone who opposes them in this house. Unfortunately the Prime Minister is not in his seat. I should like to ask him whether he approves of this kind of action. The Prime Minister is a man of integrity and high principles. I should like to ask him and all hon. members whether they do approve of this sort of thing in this House of Commons to which we are elected to do a job for the people of Canada in an honourable way. The matter of redistribution has been thrown out the window so far as representation by population is concerned. We found that out this afternoon. The hon. member for the Magdalen islands has informed us of the population of the riding which he represents. I am very glad that his riding is maintained. I think he represents that riding well. I do feel, however, if no general principle whatsoever is to be put into effect in the redistribution set-up, then the situation should certainly be corrected.

I do not intend to go into any lengthy discussion, but as a member representing a rural constituency in this parliament of the Dominion of Canada I do feel that this legislation points to a tendency to take away rural representation in this house. I regret that exceedingly. Agriculture is an important industry in Canada. It is one of the primary industries of our country. The whole trend of the report of the redistribution committee is to take away rural representation in this House of Commons.

In conclusion may I say that by some strange methods the Liberal members of this committee have managed to stack the cards against the time-honoured constituency of Haldimand. It is a very historic riding and has been represented in this house ably and well over a period of a hundred years. Hon. members who have read history will recall that William Lyon Mackenzie represented the constituency of Haldimand for four consecutive elections. If a Hansard record of that date had been kept it would show how good a member he was, but he did represent that riding a hundred years ago. Naturally I regret to see Haldimand county being amalgamated, but we must recognize progress and we have to accept these changes.

Certain members of the subcommittee—and I commend them for it—suggested an alternative method under which a portion of a neighbouring constituency could have been associated with Haldimand county. That could have been very effectively carried out, but the members of the committee decided otherwise. My colleague the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth and myself are interested. We do not know yet which one of us will be chosen to contest the constituency, but I know he will be very happy to represent the people of Haldimand as I would be happy to represent the residents of his constituency. The remarks I have made, sir, are addressed in all sincerity to the members of the government. I hope they will seriously consider the whole set-up, which is wrong. It is wrong in principle. I think the evidence we have heard here tonight will demonstrate more clearly than any further words I can use that this system should be changed, and that the government should further reconsider the matter. I feel that if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the chairman of the committee, whose responsibility it has been to guide the policy of the committee, will do that he will improve his position in the estimation of the people of Canada to a very great extent.

Mr. Welbourn: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a further word in regard to Alberta. It seems to me the subcommittee for that province must have done a fairly good job, because since the orders of the day were called this morning there have been very few references to the Alberta situation.

A little while ago the hon. member for Bow River referred to a principle brought up by my colleague the hon. member for Vegreville. The principle was this, that Calgary should be an urban constituency. That principle was voted on and carried. It was on the motion of opposition members that we added to the urban constituencies so as to take in certain suburbs. I cannot see how that is deviating very much from our original principle. Certainly there is not much difference between the suburbs of a city and the city itself.

In one of our committee meetings the hon. member for Calgary East referred to the community of interest between the Turner valley and the constituency of Calgary East which, as I explained earlier in the day, consists of a narrow corridor through Calgary. I asked him why the community of interest existed between the Turner valley and that particular part of Calgary, rather than all of Calgary, but he could not explain.

The hon. member for Bow River stated also that there were no complaints with respect to what we had proposed in the northern part of the province. Naturally there would be no complaints, because it was Liberal ridings we were carving up in that part of the province. We had to do it because of the shift in population. The hon. member for Bow River is a new member of the committee. We had another member of the Social Credit party on the committee before, and at one of the meetings that hon. member made the statement that whoever drafted the set-up in Calgary, as it was, was either intoxicated or had ulterior motives. I agree with him.

I would challenge any member or any citizen from the province of Alberta or from any other part of Canada to compare the original map with the map we have now drawn and not say that the one we now have is a much better map.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Gloucester was about to speak. Is the hon. member for Calgary East speaking to a point of order?

Mr. Harkness: I wished only to comment on the speech just made.

The Chairman: Very well.

Mr. Harkness: In the latter part of the speech just made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson he has defied anyone to look at the map as it is now drawn, and the map as it was originally, and say the first one was a better map. The hon. member may be quite correct when he suggests that the second is the better one. But I do not think that what we are looking for is only better maps. What we are seeking is proper representation in the House of Commons. What a map looks like has absolutely no significance so far as fair and reasonable representation is concerned. That was one point I made when I spoke earlier today.

One of the chief arguments made by the Liberal members on the Alberta subcommittee was that they could make a better looking map. Who cares what the map looks like? The thing people care about is whether they will vote where they voted before, where their community of interest lies, and matters of that kind. What a map looks like is the least important factor in redrawing the boundaries of a constituency.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Does not the map to which the hon. member refers, the new map we have under consideration, show the constituencies? Can the hon. member not refer to the constituencies as they are now constituted?

Mr. Harkness: I do not grasp the meaning of the hon. member's question. Certainly throughout our subcommittee meetings, so far as Alberta was concerned, there was great talk about making a better looking map. But surely that has no significance; it means nothing. The main consideration is whether, in the end, there is a reasonable arrangement of constituencies, particularly from the point of view of the people voting in those constituencies.

The hon. member for Jasper-Edson made reference to the community of interest which I had mentioned as having existed, and which now exists, between the Turner valley, in which was located the first major oil field in Canada or for that matter in the British empire, and the city of Calgary. I did not say at any time that the community of interest existed solely between that part of Calgary known as Calgary East and the Turner valley. I said there was a community of interest between the Turner valley and Calgary. As it happens, the head offices and the direction of the Turner valley oil field enterprises are almost entirely in the constituency of Calgary East. There can be no doubt that there is a certain community of interest, and in addition to that a large number of the workers in the Turner valley oil fields, as well as those who operate those oil fields, move back and forth between the Turner valley and Calgary.

The hon. member has also said the reason there was no dispute so far as the northern part of the province is concerned was that it is composed entirely of Liberal ridings. That is palpably untrue. As a matter of fact the four constituencies in the north which were merged to form three constituencies consist of one which is now held by a Liberal member—held in the last parliament by a Social Credit member, may I add—and three held in this parliament by Social Credit members, and also held in the last parliament by members of that party. So any suggestion that the changes made in the schedule were made entirely in Liberal ridings, and that therefore there would be no complaint about them, does not hold water.

The chief change was in the elimination of one constituency. Increased representation was allowed to Edmonton because of its increased population. Everyone agreed to that additional seat. Had we acted as some have we might not have agreed to it. We could have said, "Let them go ahead with their increased population, but without any increase in their representation." But the fact is that we did agree to increased representation.

In order to do that a constituency had to be wiped out; and that was a Social Credit constituency, one that has been held by them in the last three parliaments. There can be no argument about that fact. I said this morning and I repeat tonight that I have yet to hear any reasonable argument as to why the general arrangement so far as Calgary seats were concerned should not have been left as it was. No good argument has been put up, either in the subcommittee or here in the House of Commons, as to why this change should have taken place. On the other hand a reasonable argument has been offered as to why a large number of people will remain convinced that the only reason it was done was some fanciful political reason held by the Liberal political machine in Alberta.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the first thing I did this morning when I received my copy of Bill No. 393 was to look hastily at that part of it dealing with New Brunswick to make sure that Gloucester is still an electoral district. I will admit frankly that, after listening carefully to the debate on Saturday, I had a dream last night in which I witnessed the mutilation of my dear native county of Gloucester as a reprisal for the major surgery we performed there on May 26 last, when finally the people of Gloucester decided to carve out of the Liberal bloc this county of mine which had been on the other side of the house since 1900. Fortunately I find that Gloucester is still there, and it is going to be there for a long while.

An hon. Member: The sooner you sit down the better.

Mr. Robichaud: I am going to take my good time, don't worry. This is a bill to adjust the representation in the House of Commons, and my protest against it is coupled with the full realization that whatever arguments I may be able to marshal, they will in no way bolster the case which has been so ably prepared and presented by the able speakers who have preceded me—the leader of the opposition and his able lieutenants, as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others. In my opinion they have shot such strong bolts across this chamber as to have penetrated the armour of the government. It is inconceivable to me, novice though I may be in the intricacies of parliamentary manoeuvres and of political expediency, how, in view of the unassailable logic of the opponents to the principle of this bill, the government, confident of course, and secure and safely ensconced behind its imposing majority—

An hon. Member: For the moment.

Mr. Robichaud: Pro tem, of course,—should prefer to remain deaf to the clamour of sound reason and logic, and should choose in this instance at least—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask a question?

An hon. Member: Order.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the hon. member a question?

An hon. Member: Later on.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Chairman: I do not want to interfere with the good mood in which hon. members find themselves this evening, but I know all hon. members are interested in maintaining decorum in this chamber and I am sure they will agree that the debate should be carried on more seriously than it has been. The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor. The hon. member for Charlotte stood up and asked if he might ask a question. It was noticeable that the hon. member for Gloucester was not giving way and therefore was not giving his consent. If consent is not given the question cannot be asked at this time. It may be that when the hon. member for Gloucester has finished the hon. member for Charlotte may again ask if he will permit a question. However, if he does not give way at the moment by resuming his seat he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): On a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Charlotte is rising on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I just wanted to state that when I spoke the other night there were two members from New Brunswick—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —including the hon. member from Gloucester who asked questions.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. Robichaud: After I have finished the few remarks I wish to address to this committee I shall willingly subject myself to any line of cross-examination by the hon. member for Charlotte. As I was about to say, I am surprised that in the face of this logic and argument the government should prefer to remain deaf to the clamour of sound reason and argument and logic and should choose in this particular instance at least to cover its favourite slogan "democracy" with the sticker "might is right."

The debate on this redistribution bill has been most instructive and interesting and pregnant with unsuspected revelations to all newly-elected members of this house. Although I had read a rather surprising editorial in the Montreal Gazette of January 23 last on redistribution entitled "Not by Prayerful Exercises", I came to parliament with an open mind on the subject—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: That is permitted.

An hon. Member: Not in the Liberal party.

Mr. Robichaud: I never for one moment suspected that what I considered to be broadsides in that newspaper article would ever prove true. May I be permitted to quote two paragraphs of that editorial for the edification of the Canadian people and for the enlightenment, if that is still possible, of the government. I quote:

> In Canada the redrawing of constituencies before an election is known by the word "redistribution." But there is not too much in a name. For, some years ago, an encyclopaedia of Canada was published in five volumes, under the distinguished editorship of the librarian of the University of Toronto. In this encyclopaedia, "redistribution" is defined with a scholarly exactitude:
> "Redistribution, a familiar feature of Canadian political life, is the legislative process whereby the boundaries of electoral constituencies are rearranged prior to an election, in such a way as to improve the chances of the party in power."

Is this not the most lamentable spectacle with which we are now confronted? I had a faint notion of the meaning of gerrymandering at the time I was introduced to the House of Commons, but I was not in the least suspicious that this age-worn political tactic would in 1952 prove so dynamic as to steamroller my concept of democracy in favour of political expediency. I came here somewhat imbued with the theory which was so curtly expressed by the London Free Press in an editorial on April 11, 1952, from which I quote:

> The days of political gerrymandering belong to the dark ages of politics.

But to my great stupefaction and surprise I became convinced, after listening to the debate last Saturday and today, that we were indeed being subjected in this redistribution scheme to what has been so aptly described as the law of the jungle; and, as the law of the jungle and the dark ages are two things which in my concept are contemporaneous, if not synonymous—

An hon. Member: Great words.

Mr. Hees: He will explain them to you later.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: —I am tempted to admit that I have been sadly disillusioned—

An hon. Member: Soon in, soon out.

Mr. Robichaud: —by the redistribution jigsaw puzzle.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Robichaud: I did. I submit that in a proper redistribution under our recognized modern and truly democratic parliamentary methods, the mere reallocation of some 265 seats on a strictly mathematical basis is not, in my estimation, sufficient.

An hon. Member: Who put you up to this?

Mr. Robichaud: Not you, my friend. There are certain other factors which must be considered and which were certainly not taken into account by the committee, top-heavy with good Liberals—

An hon. Member: Delete the word "good".

Mr. Hees: There is no such thing.

Mr. Murphy: You are too complimentary.

Mr. Robichaud: —and wielding the carving knife with such dexterity that the juiciest slices were sure to fall in the plates on the right-hand side of Canada's political table. The shuffling of seats after a census should not be an operation predicated on party voting strength. A readjustment of our representation is a purely technical matter, and should be so treated. In addition to the mathematical factor already referred to, there are others such as the geographical factor, and the ethnic consideration which was referred to for the first time in this debate, I think by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine. These factors, and there may be others, add up, in my opinion, to the broader concept of a proper redistribution, and this is: the adaptability of a proper scheme of representation to present conditions.

From what I have been able to gather from the debate on this bill I am thoroughly convinced that a parliamentary committee is not and never can be the proper body to evolve such a scheme. I am advised—this may be considered hearsay and I do not know whether it is admissible in the house—that a remark such as "who's running this show anyway" has been made by a prominent supporter of the government after a patent example of proposed political carving had been attacked in committee. It is very apparent now to everyone who are the real showmasters in this redistribution circus. Nevertheless, in the final analysis who should be really running this show if not the people of Canada?

It may be argued—and as a matter of fact an abortive attempt was made last Saturday afternoon in that direction by the hon.

member for Russell, I believe—that the elected members of this house constituting the membership of the committee thereby made the latter a committee of the people. I cannot agree with such a proposal when it refers to a committee where the electoral rights of the people are in issue and where the members of the said committee cannot be considered as impartial inasmuch as their own and their party's interests are so predominantly at stake. The electoral rights of the people are dangerously imperilled by the dictatorial powers of a parliamentary committee on redistribution, whatever party may then be in power.

The soundness of this proposition cannot be successfully denied in view of the citations already recorded in Hansard from such men at the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, the hon. member for Quebec South and others. As further concrete evidence of the ineptitude, incapacity and, may I say, impotency of the parliamentary committee to properly solve the 1952 redistribution scheme—

Mr. Adamson: There is no pregnancy there.

Mr. Fulford: What is he reading from, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Robichaud: —which in my humble submission is nothing short of a miscarriage instead of a readjustment—

Mr. Abbott: Who prepared this?

Mr. Robichaud: —in our representation. Let me refer before concluding to the recommendations of the committee in so far as my native province of New Brunswick is concerned. There you will find a glaring example of the committee's complacency in a policy of laissez-faire as long as the interests of the party in power are properly safeguarded. At page 46 of the schedule you will find that the province of New Brunswick has been allotted ten electoral districts to be represented by ten members.

Mr. Gibson: Ten senators, too.

Mr. Robichaud: Here is a list of our electoral districts with their respective populations:

Constituency	Population
Charlotte	25,136
Gloucester	57,489
Kent	26,767
Northumberland	42,994
Restigouche-Madawaska	70,541
Royal	35,673

An hon. Member: Wow!

Mr. Robichaud: I did not know there were any catcalls in this house. The table continues:

Saint John-Albert	84,407
Victoria-Carleton	40,810
Westmorland	80,012
York-Sunbury	51,868

I wish to record in Hansard that the dual constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska consists of Restigouche with a population of 36,212 and Madawaska with a population of 34,329. I also wish to point out that in the dual constituency of Saint John-Albert the population of Albert county is 9,910 and that of Saint John county 23,718, whereas the population of the city of Saint John is 50,779. I also wish to register in Hansard that in the constituency of Westmorland the city of Moncton accounts for 27,334, whereas in the dual constituency of York-Sunbury the city of Fredericton accounts for 16,018. I know that the hon. member for Charlotte will permit me to say that geographically the small constituency of Charlotte with a population of 25,136 borders on the constituency of Saint John-Albert with a population of 84,407.

An hon. Member: All good people.

Mr. Robichaud: All good people; and likewise the second smallest constituency, that of Kent, is the next door neighbour of Westmorland on the south with a population of 80,012; and on the north of Northumberland with a population of 42,994. With a total population of 515,697 New Brunswick has ten members, which in my submission means that the unit of representation in our province should be 51,569. All those factors were apparently overlooked by the subcommittee for the maritime provinces, and by the main committee as well.

The point I wish to underline, however, is this. The main point I wish to make in my remarks tonight is that the subcommittee for the maritime provinces, and the main committee, have not only overlooked the mathematical factor but they have also chosen to forget the geographical aspect and that most important factor, the ethnical element. On behalf of my French Acadian compatriots I wish to state in a most emphatic manner that, as usual, we have been forgotten in the proposed scheme of redistribution. My submission is that we are, as of right, entitled to four French Acadian representatives in this house from the province of New Brunswick. According to the last census the French Acadian population represents over 40 per cent of the total population of New Brunswick. It cannot, therefore, be successfully gainsaid that we are entitled to four of the ten seats in our province. Our population is so distributed that this can be achieved.

At the time redistribution took place in 1947 we were likewise entitled to four of the ten seats, as at that time our population was over 38 per cent of the total population. We were ignored then, of course, and we are again left in the lurch. May I further respectfully remind the government that the French Acadians of New Brunswick are totally dissatisfied and saturated with the treatment they have received from the present administration as a reward for their practically everlasting faithfulness to the party in power. As evidence of this may I also be permitted to remind the government that on May 26 last Gloucester county, the largest French Acadian county in the maritime provinces with 85 per cent of its total population French-speaking, broke its continued allegiance since 1900 to the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Robichaud: I know it hurts, but it is not my fault. This was done in protest, amongst other things, against the treatment meted out to us by the present regime. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister is not in his seat tonight, because I want to quote in French part of an article from Le Devoir concerning the situation in New Brunswick. The title of this article is:

(Translation):

They are too sure of them?

As may be seen, the New Brunswick Acadians have many representations to make. They should receive sympathetic consideration by the St. Laurent government and by the Liberal majority in the House of Commons, especially since those people have always been as faithful to the Liberal party as the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. It is possible that the government is thinking of granting them their full representation in the Senate, when the time comes of making that batch of appointments that certainly will be made before the next general election. However, they have every reason to believe that they will not get the fourth seat which they are entitled to, in the House of Commons, before the 1961 census and the following redistribution.

The results of the Gloucester election should offer food for thought to the federal Liberals. The people of that county must certainly be greatly dissatisfied to change a Liberal majority of 8,000 into a Conservative majority of more than 1,000 votes.

(Text):

Mr. Laing: Family allowances should be doubled.

Mr. Robichaud: I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the ethnical factor is one that cannot be forgotten if Canada is to have proper readjustment of its representation in this House of Commons and if national unity—a drum so loudly and frequently beaten in election campaigns by the hon. gentlemen opposite who lead and compose the present government—is to survive.

Mr. Cannon: May I ask the hon. member a question? Let the hon. member answer this for the enlightenment of the house. He stated, to the vigorous applause of his partisans, that the people of Canada should run the show on redistribution. I am asking him, does he not think the people of the country would have a better chance of running the show through their elected representatives in this house rather than through some body that might be appointed outside of this house?

Mr. Robichaud: If I have to answer the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, I would say that in my estimation a committee of this house is not the proper body to decide such a question. It should be an independent commission.

Mr. Dickey: There is logic for you.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Like many others who have spoken in this debate, I can assure you that I did not have any intention at all of entering it until the hon. member for Gloucester spoke tonight. Usually you expect someone who has been hurt to start crying, but why the member for Gloucester has taken the stand he has with regard to redistribution is more than I can understand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He is a man of principle.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I consider I am a man of principle, and I should like to have you understand that. I want to say now, so far as a matter of principle is concerned, that in the redistribution of 1932 one of the most able speeches ever made in this house for the salvation of New Brunswick was made by Mr. A. D. Ganong, a Conservative member for my county. Read it in Hansard. Mr. Ganong fought to have the province left as it was.

I should like to have the member for Gloucester explain to his people some time where he finds a single instance, all down through history, when a government sitting in Ottawa did not have a majority on a committee. I have listened to this until it is beginning to get under my skin. I believe that in 1932 the late R. B. Bennett most certainly had a majority on his committees, because they put the constituencies on the block and used the cleaver. This was known all over Canada. I want to speak briefly about the three old maritime provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, where there is one change.

We gained in 1947 a seat and a Liberal won it. They look it away from the Liberals, and we are back where we were before. Why all this bellyaching about the maritime provinces? I fail to understand where the material comes from to support it.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no mystery about it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I admit there are only a little over 25,000 in my county, and I am proud to be their representative here. But I would rather have two inland counties in the central part of New Brunswick than the one I represent on the coast line. Again I want to say this. Look back over the record from 1932 and note the arguments that were used in the house by the Conservative members from the province of New Brunswick to leave the thing as it was. Again I want to repeat that the three old maritime provinces have not been disturbed in any way other than by losing one Liberal seat.

There has been a great deal of talk about Annapolis-Kings. What is there to complain about? We gained a seat in 1947. A Liberal won it. We have lost it now.

An hon. Member: He has left the house.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Why the Conservative members of this house are trying to make such a fuss is more than I can understand.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member for Gloucester has left the chamber.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Correct.

An hon. Member: He has run out.

Mr. Fleming: Don't be absurd.

Mr. Abbott: These new members come in and make speeches and then run out.

Mr. Fleming: Utterly absurd.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If the Tories are trying to strengthen the Tory party, they have to use all their membership. I am going to give the hon. member for Gloucester the benefit of the doubt and say that he was conscripted for this job.

Mr. Abbott: He has left the chamber.

Mr. Fleming: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: I rise on a question of privilege. I just heard the hon. member for Charlotte say that the hon. member for Gloucester was conscripted.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member for Gloucester is back.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, you know that it is entirely unparliamentary to cast aspersions like that on an hon. member, to indicate that he was compelled to do a job. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that you direct that the remark be withdrawn.

Mr. Gardiner: That brought the hon. member for Gloucester back.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, if I can make myself heard above this din raised by hon. members to your right who insist on talking in breach of the rules of the house, I would ask you to require the hon. member for Charlotte to withdraw that unparliamentary remark which casts an aspersion upon another hon. member of the house.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I happened to be out of my seat when my good friend, the hon. member for Charlotte, made this remark as to my having been conscripted to do this job.

An hon. Member: Who told you?

Mr. Robichaud: I submit that this remark is not parliamentary, and I want to thank my good friend, the hon. member for Eglinton, for bringing this matter to your attention, Mr. Chairman. I want to have the honour to request that you require the hon. member for Charlotte to withdraw this remark.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The last thing I want to do is to make any remark that would offend anyone.

An hon. Member: Especially a new member.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes; particularly a new member. But I want to say this—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I would ask—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Abbott: Let us hear what the leader of the opposition has to say.

The Chairman: Order. I greatly appreciate the chance which hon. members are giving to the chairman to say a word on this occasion. The hon. member for Charlotte had the floor. He said he was of the opinion that the hon. member for Gloucester had made a speech which was surprising to him; he also said that he would give him the benefit of the doubt and say that he had been conscripted for this job. The hon. member for Eglinton raised a question of privilege, and as he was resuming his seat the hon. member for Gloucester, who was the offended member, rose on a question of privilege and made a statement. It was only fair for the chair to allow the hon. member for Charlotte to give his own interpretation of what he was going to do on the question of privilege. At that point the leader of the opposition rose. Then I intervened because I wanted to hear what the hon. member for Charlotte was going to do. If he does not conduct himself properly, perhaps it will be at that moment my duty to intervene. But so far we have not given the hon. member for Charlotte a chance to give his own interpretation with regard to what he will do.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the last thing I want to do is say anything that would injure anyone. If the leader of the opposition was going to interrupt me or to interfere I would not have withdrawn the remark. But since he has taken his seat, I should be pleased to withdraw any remark which I have made that is offensive. Before I take my seat I will say this. The words I used might not have been in order, but the hon. member for Gloucester came into the chamber tonight with a prepared speech which he read throughout.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have a perfect right to form my own opinion.

An hon. Member: He read quotations.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): He did not read quotations only. He read the whole speech. That is what I say, and I am not going to withdraw it.

An hon. Member: He was not smuggling.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I was honest enough to admit it. There is no one in your group I know of who is equally honest. I want to say that I did not rise to make an argument for New Brunswick or so far as the maritime provinces are concerned. I have listened here both Saturday and today to members who start at the British Columbia coast. If it is a matter that affects them in their own province I am always pleased to sit here and listen to them. But when each and every member who speaks on this subject feels obliged to start at Vancouver and end up in Newfoundland, I fail to understand what impression they want to leave. Each and every one has submissions to make about some member who has been hurt in some other part of Canada. Before I sit down I want to emphasize once more the fact that in my honest and humble opinion I believe it is the greatest example of trying to make martyrs out of a few Conservatives that has ever taken place in this chamber.

Mr. Larson: Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly happy about the debate that has been going on; we have not heard anything about Saskatchewan for about forty minutes.

An hon. Member: We are waiting for Jimmy Gardiner.

Mr. Hees: We are waiting for the boss.

Mr. Larson: We have heard about "georgemanders" "jimmymanders" and other kinds of "manders"; and I should like to talk for a while about a "tommymander" which affected me personally. In 1948 I ran in the provincial election and was defeated by some 150 votes; my colleague to the north won the election. A line was moved six miles, with the idea of giving my colleague everything, and so the deputy speaker of the chamber in Regina would be elected. I was greatly excited about this matter because I thought a great injustice had been done. I made a couple of speeches around the country about it, but I could not get anybody to show much enthusiasm as a result of those speeches. From that fact I assumed that all the excitement about these various things that go on is created mostly in the minds of the various members themselves. I do not think the people of Canada care much about them at all.

The only really contentious point I have seen raised in regard to Saskatchewan is that which has been raised by the friends of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I do not know whether he has been badly hurt or not. A lot of people say he has; but I have heard a good many friends of the hon. member say he could win practically any seat in Saskatchewan that he set out to win, and I am not so sure that he could not.

I would suggest to him that he consider this proposition for a minute, and let some of his friends do the same thing. The seat of Rosetown-Biggar is held at the present time by the leader of the C.C.F. party. As the boundaries have existed up to now I think probably that hon. member could continue to win that seat. But knowing the situation as I do to some extent around that part of the country, I feel that the boundaries as they have been moved in the new redistribution would give a chance to a colleague of the hon. member for Lake Centre also to come to the House of Commons, if there were a little swing the other way, which I hope does not take place.

Mr. Murphy: The by-elections show that already.

Mr. Bradley: Don't count on that.

Mr. Larson: The hon. member for Lake Centre should give some of his colleagues a chance; and he could, if he would accept the western boundaries of the constituency as they are set up today. That is all I am going to say on that matter.

My own seat has been enlarged by some 90 polls. There has been a great deal of difficulty around here about seats being enlarged. Naturally if my seat is enlarged I have to do a great deal more work; I have to go out and see many people that I have never seen before. I have to drive many thousands of miles. My constituency now covers 15,000 square miles, approximately. Some contain hundreds of thousands of square miles, but the population is not scattered all over them. But in this seat, outside of a few square miles, which is a small part of the seat, I have to drive up and down every country road to see every part of it, and it involves a tremendous lot of work. My only reaction is that the population factor decreed that that had to be done. I accept the people who are there. My chief worry is whether the people who are there will accept me. I hope they do. I am very glad to welcome those people in the Kindersley constituency. I hope they will be able to fit into that constituency.

An hon. Member: They will.

Mr. Larson: I have only one further remark to make, and it is on the matter of a commission. I have not said anything about it up to now, but since I am on my feet I am going to say that we could send this matter to an independent commission—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Larson: —but I do feel that the present way of doing it is the best way.

Mr. Murphy: For the Liberal party.

Mr. Larson: Because the matter has to be threshed out in the House of Commons anyway.

Mr. Gardiner: We will do it better than the Tories did.

Mr. Larson: No matter who does it, it has to be threshed out here; and I do not think there are people any better qualified to do it than the members of the House of Commons themselves.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I have been drawn into this debate, not because I wanted to be but because I have to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardiff: I want the left shift over there to be quiet and I will be reasonable with them. If they are not they will just take what is coming to them.

Mr. Hees: That's the kind of talk.

Mr. Abbott: Fire-eater.

[Mr. Larson.]

Mr. Cardiff: Before I begin my remarks may I say that I am in a changed mood. If the committee does not want to accept me in that mood I will give them exactly what I would have given them had I spoken two or three hours earlier. I have been mellowed during this debate. One hon. member who has spoken in this debate has mellowed me more than anyone else. I would not want to be one of those who were parties to the endeavour to eradicate the hon. member for Haldimand. I would not want to be a member of the committee that has done that. He is one of the members of this house for whom I have the most profound respect, and it is because of that fact that he is in the position in which he finds himself today. The engineers who drafted this report should be proud of the effort they have made.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Good butchers.

Mr. Cardiff: It is without exception the best example of political skulduggery that I have ever known. It is the most glaring and cowardly example of injustice. If that is the best effort the Liberal party can make to pull themselves out of a bad position, then I feel sorry for them.

I want to speak about my own riding. I have sat back and listened to the reports of the others, and I have come to the conclusion that I am not as badly off as a lot more. For that reason I have mellowed in some respects in what I intended to say.

When you came into the county of Huron to do away with one member for that county all you had to do was to stay within the confines of the county. That was suggested by the members of our party in the committee, but you would not adhere to that suggestion. No word would have been said about it. You could have stayed within the boundaries of Huron and you could have given me about 23,000 more people and I would not have said a word. I like working with my own people, but you did not do that. You started to carve my riding in the first instance. You took two townships off the northeast corner and gave them to Wellington. Then you went to the northwest corner and took three more townships off and gave them to Bruce. I do not object to that particularly, except that it left me sitting in the centre with nothing on either side of me. I had to go twenty miles to get to the other side of where I was previously.

I have been the senior member of that county for the last twelve years. If you wanted to be fair and just—I remember on Saturday two members of the Liberal party getting up in the house and telling us how fair and just this committee had been—you could have added to what I already had and nothing would have been said about it. Instead of that you took away from what I had, and then you gave me 30,000 people who were strangers to me. You are not content to stay inside the confines of the county of Huron; you went out to Perth to get the remainder. I do not object to taking Perth; I do not care if you give me all of Perth.

Mr. Boucher: I wish the hon. member would explain that.

Mr. Cardiff: Wait a minute; keep quiet until I get through. My riding is such that it has been a political fight for the last 25 years. It is not Conservative; it is not particularly Liberal, but it is just as much Liberal as it ever was Conservative. In the 1940 election I had 92 polls. There was not one poll in that whole riding with respect to which the Liberals did not come and tell me that if it had not been for them I would have been defeated, which was true. In 1945 it was not so hard. In 1949 even the Prime Minister went down into my riding. They really turned on the heat. Then, because of the fact that they did not beat me, they now turn around and try to gerrymander me out of my riding entirely.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Cardiff: Ever since coming to the House of Commons I have had the greatest respect for the minister who served as chairman of the committee. At no time have I ever expressed anything but the highest regard for him. I refer, of course, to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. I have, too, a great deal of respect for the other members who served on the committee. But I cannot understand why they picked on me. I do not know whether they do not like me, or what is the matter with me. I cannot understand why they wanted to pick on me, and put me out of my seat.

Mr. Harkness: Simply because you are a Conservative.

Mr. Cardiff: The county of Huron has served this country through any government. It did its bit during the war, and that county has always done everything possible to meet its obligations. The people there have never done otherwise. Why the committee should have tried even to beat us out of our name of Huron county is more than I can understand.

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, I wish to make it clear that there was no attempt to change the name of Huron at all.

Mr. Cardiff: There certainly was an attempt. You were going to make it Huron-Perth.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry; the hon. member will have to ask the members of his party who served on the committee about that point.

Mr. Cardiff: I have already asked them.

Mr. Murphy: I am sure the hon. member for Ottawa West would not wish to have on the record anything that is not accurate. I sat on the committee; and when you proposed to bring in three townships, the riding was to be Huron-Perth.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to say emphatically that that was my understanding of it; that the original proposal was to bring in three townships and one town from the county of Perth, and the riding was to be known as Huron-Perth.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the very point; at that point when it was suggested the name was wrong you were invited to bring in a suggestion as to the name, but you did not.

Mr. Blue: I do not like to see Huron or Bruce kicked around. I was born in Bruce. I lived for 35 years in Huron, and I am now living in Bruce. I honour the name of Huron-Bruce.

Mr. Cardiff: I am glad we are going to retain the name of Huron, because if that had not been done it would have been very detrimental to this government—more detrimental to the government than it would be to me; and I am telling you that right now. We are a proud people in the county of Huron. We respect good citizenship, and we try to practise it. I know the county of Huron will object very strenuously to the idea of this or any other government trying to take away the accredited name of Huron, the good name it has always carried.

Then I made reference to two townships on the northeast corner that were given to Wellington, and three on the other corner given to Bruce. Let me say this, with respect to Bruce, that regardless of what the population is in Bruce, that county is plenty large enough to keep a member in action 365 days in the year. The county of Bruce is a long county; it is a rough county in some parts. So far as I am concerned it does not make any difference whether there are 28,000 or 25,000 people in it; it is plenty large enough for any one man to serve.

If the committee had paid any attention to members of the official opposition who suggested that the boundary be held within the county of Huron, there would not have been any fuss at all. But when you start to bring in parts of Perth, for no reason other than that of political advantage, then I think it is high time someone had something to say about it.

I am not yet satisfied with the last report brought in, when the subcommittee changed the three townships back into my riding, out of Bruce, and retained three in the northeast corner. Is that not what was done?

Mr. McIlraith: Two in the northeast corner.

Mr. Cardiff: And you took one town, did you not?

Mr. McIlraith: That is right; yes.

Mr. Cardiff: You had two townships before, but you did not have a town. Now you have a town and two townships.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Cardiff: You took Wingham, did you not?

Mr. McIlraith: Wingham was always in there.

Mr. Cardiff: I did not know you had taken Wingham before; that makes it even worse. Those of you who do not know anything about the set-up will understand this, that Wingham is right in the centre of my riding, east and west. They are not going to be very gracious about being shot off into Wellington. I am not suggesting that Wellington is not just as good as Huron; that is not the point. But we are not going to be satisfied with it, and neither are the townships of Turnberry and Howick.

I suggest to the committee, before it is finally settled, that it leave Huron within its own boundaries. If anyone in there does not want to run in Huron, then let him move out and run somewhere else. I want to run in my own county; I want to serve my own people. I would welcome any part of any outside county that wants to come in there, but I do not want to get out. If they want to come into the county of Huron and be served by us, well and good. We have within the county of Huron almost 50,000 people; I forget the exact number, but I know it is more than 49,000. That is a much larger riding than many others around. I do not object to that; I do not care if you give me 100,000. I will look after it, even if I am given that number. But I cannot help objecting to the fact that you are taking away from me three municipalities, and then adding on one municipality for nothing other than political reasons. No one can deny that, and I do not care who tries to do it. So long as you hold my county within my own boundaries—and it is plenty large enough to do that—I have nothing to say. But if you insist upon going outside the boundaries, then I am going to protest as long as I am able.

I do not think any useful purpose would be served if I were to speak longer. I have stated my position. I have represented that riding for 12 years, and I am not ashamed of my record. If anyone wishes to take my place and carry on from there, well and good. But so long as I am charged with the responsibility of serving my own county, I am going to serve it to the best of my ability regardless of anyone else. I shall continue to do that, regardless of what you add to it.

Mr. McLean (Huron-Perth): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in this debate, but since there has been considerable discussion to do with the constituency of Huron North, and as it affects me in a sense, I believe I should speak for a few moments.

As I understand the schedule now before the committee, it is proposed that there shall be a riding to be known as Huron, which will contain some 44,000 people. That riding will consist of some 20,000 people presently in the riding of Huron North and 24,000 people presently in the riding of Huron-Perth. That means some 76 per cent of the people presently in the riding of Huron North will be in the new riding and some 80 per cent of the people now in Huron-Perth will also be in the new riding. I appreciate the difficulty the committee has had in arriving at an equitable division and in setting proper boundaries for the ridings across Canada. I do not think that task would be any easier even if it were done in another way on another occasion.

Be that as it may, I think the decision with respect to the riding of Huron was made with the intention of taking every possible advantage of the geographical set-up and at the same time avoiding as much as possible the dislocation of existing municipalities. Various references have been made to gerrymandering. Apparently that is the word the opposition uses with reference to the distribution job that has been done, but in this instance I fail to see that it is applicable. In 1945 this riding as it is proposed to be constituted would have provided a Conservative majority of 1,041. In 1949 the majority would have been 316. That would seem to be gerrymandering in reverse. Certainly I cannot think it is to the detriment of the hon. member for Huron North.

Reference has been made to the fact that it is proposed to attach the township of Hibbert. The township of Hibbert has been part of Huron-Perth since 1933. That arrangement was made with the concurrence of the party which receives the support of hon. members opposite. If the job done in 1933 was satisfactory to the party of the hon. member for Huron North, nothing has occurred in the meantime which would indicate that a change should be made.

There is one problem that does cause me concern; that is the situation in rural parts of Ontario created through the mechanization of farming. This mechanization permits the farmers to do a particularly good job with fewer people. This means that in those particular areas the population tends to reduce. If we apply the principle of representation by population this will result in fewer members. I certainly would regret if that trend were permitted to continue to the point where the introduction of policies detrimental to rural Ontario became a political expedient. The fact is that these farmers are continuing to do just as good a job despite their fewer numbers. As a matter of fact the necessity of support governmentwise is greater than ever in view of the increased responsibility that is on the farmers to feed the increasing populations in the cities. Perhaps in this age of floors it would not be unwise to suggest that a floor be created to ensure that the voice of rural Ontario—I speak particularly of Ontario—may always be heard.

When the bill passes, as I anticipate it will, there will be a new riding of Huron in which will be contained some 20,000 residents now in Huron North. I know I speak on behalf of those presently in Huron-Perth when I say that I welcome those citizens of Huron North. Their problems, their outlooks and activities are similar, and I am satisfied that in this new and larger riding their interests can be represented by the member.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, throughout this day arguments have been advanced by members of all three opposition parties and the government has remained silent, except for the interruptions of those who slavishly follow it. One would have expected that when a matter affecting the entire domestic representation of this country was being debated the Prime Minister, unless there were other duties that denied his presence here, would have been present with a view to hearing at first hand what manipulation had taken place in the committee on redistribution.

Having seconded the motion on Saturday for a scientific commission to allocate representation in the House of Commons, I am reinforced in the arguments that were advanced by the leader of the opposition and those associated with him the other day by what has taken place today to indicate the monstrous manipulation of constituencies for the purpose of political expediency.

As the hon. member for Melfort has said, various principles were involved. There was the urban principle, there was the semi-urban principle, there was the shoreline principle, there was the ministerial representation principle which has been extended to the parliamentary assistants. No one could listen to the representations made here today without realizing that in the main those who represent the small constituencies are members of the government or associated with it.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Except the Prime Minister's riding.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As an example let me mention the constituency represented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which has only 32,000 or 33,000.

Mr. Abbott: Take the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McIlraith: Take Port Arthur.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is able to speak because he is in the position of being in almost solitary magnificence in that regard.

Mr. Abbott: How about Port Arthur?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us proceed on the basis of the ruling—

Mr. Abbott: There is Port Arthur and there is Quebec East.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently these hon. gentlemen do not believe in listening to anyone whether they agree with him or not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Another I might mention is the Minister of Agriculture in Saskatchewan.

Mr. McIlraith: Finish northern Ontario.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that province—

Mr. Gardiner: Mine has 4,000 more than yours.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In a province in which the representation level is lower than in other provinces because of the amendment to the British North America Act he will represent in the new house—

Mr. Gardiner: How about the old house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in the event he is returned, 43,500 people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: Give him a show.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not asking for a show. I am asking for the same consideration others got. I ask for no show. All I ask is that there be principle applied rather than the expediency of political considerations. When one looks at the actions of the main committee one can realize that under no circumstances were the views of the opposition listened to. Amendment after amendment was proposed and as regularly as they were proposed they were regularly turned down. Let me now give an example of the kind of subcommittee that operated for the province of Saskatchewan. I do not believe any committee can operate when it consists of members—and I have no particular committee in mind at the moment when I say this—who act as automatons under direction. What of the province of Saskatchewan and the subcommittee? Let me point out that before the Saskatchewan election we met on one or two occasions merely to say we were not going to meet.

Mr. Boucher: You agreed to that, did you not?

An hon. Member: Answer that.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We met in order that the hon. member for Rosthern might announce—

Mr. Boucher: You agreed, did you not?

The Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members not to interrupt and not to conduct private conversations at the other end of the chamber.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Rosthern said that because a provincial election was going to take place in Saskatchewan many members would be away and there would be no meetings until after that election. Yet the map of Saskatchewan in part was available and was spoken of in Saskatchewan during the election.

Mr. Gardiner: By whom?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was that mental telepathy or was it the Minister of Agriculture who had drawn the map? That is a question one wonders about today.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not mention the map in the Saskatchewan election.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say that.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend threatened to use it unless he was shown the map, and there was no map in existence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is once again in keeping with the minister's usual gross exaggeration. I asked—

Mr. Boucher: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: —for the production of the map. There is no privilege.

Mr. Boucher: On a point of order—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Rosthern has risen on a question of privilege.

Mr. Boucher: The matter was raised—

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Boucher: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no privilege.

Mr. Boucher: On a question of privilege—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Rosthern has risen and I could not hear whether it was on a point of order or on a question of privilege. Order. Would hon. members please be silent so I can hear the hon. member for Rosthern?

An hon. Member: He won't say anything anyway.

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Boucher: On a question of privilege.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre says there is no question of privilege involved. Perhaps we might give the hon. member for Rosthern the opportunity to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Boucher: At a meeting of our subcommittee when every member was present the hon. member for Lake Centre said—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that a question of privilege?

Mr. Boucher: —if you will show me the map—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down. Learn some manners.

Mr. Abbott: I guess they do not want to hear it.

The Chairman: I have heard the hon. member for Rosthern state his question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let him make his speech.

The Chairman: Order: It seems to me it is a matter he wants to clarify.

Mr. Boucher: That is right.

The Chairman: That can be done only in two ways. One is by asking the hon. member for Lake Centre for the floor and not rising on a question of privilege. The second is to wait until the hon. member for Lake Centre has terminated his speech. Then the hon. member may rise and clarify the point which has not been clarified.

Mr. Boucher: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Gardiner: He dare not answer the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gardiner: He is afraid of the question.

The Chairman: The hon. member does not indicate that he consents to the question being asked by resuming his seat.

Mr. Gardiner: He dare not answer.

The Chairman: Order. Therefore the question cannot be asked. As hon. members know, my position at this moment is rather difficult. I am trying to apply the rules and give satisfaction to all hon. members. I am trying to be fair but it is very difficult for me to make myself heard and also to hear what is being said by hon. members. The mood of the committee is good and I want to keep it that way, but I should like hon. members to co-operate with the chair. The hon. member for Lake Centre.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: Let him go on.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will have my say whether it is now or some other time. The zeal with which my hon. friends call eleven o'clock is indicative of the way the star chamber operated in the committee.

Mr. Abbott: Quite a punch line.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Prime Minister, after consultation with the leaders of the opposition parties, will suggest tomorrow that the house recess from one to two instead of from one to three and then recess from four until eight p.m. Tomorrow I will move the motion concerning the report of Mr. Speaker on the rules of procedure of the house. I think that was requested today by some hon. member. Then we will take up Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, and then we will proceed with estimates.

Mr. Hees: Quite a bit later.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 1, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

DOMINION DAY

85TH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this being Canada's 85th birthday as a nation, I should like to suggest, supported by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and, I hope, by all hon. members, that we mark our proud and happy loyalty to our great country and to our gracious sovereign lady by rising and singing together "O Canada" and "God Save the Queen".

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

O Canada

and

God Save the Queen.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOURS OF SITTING FOR TODAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If I might have the consent of hon. members to do so, I should like to move, seconded by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

That when this house rises at one o'clock this day, it will resume its sitting at two o'clock, and that in the place of the usual intermission from six o'clock to eight o'clock, there shall be an intermission from four o'clock to eight o'clock this day.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

APPLICATION OF GOVERNMENT TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION FOR DEVELOPMENT OF POWER IN INTERNATIONAL RAPIDS SECTION—EXCHANGE OF NOTES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table for the information of the house copies of the application of the government of Canada to the international joint commission for an order of approval of the construction of certain works for development of power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river which I signed for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and forwarded to the commission yesterday. I should also like to table copies of an exchange of notes which took place at a meeting in Washington yesterday between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the Acting Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Bruce, and the Canadian ambassador to the United States, Mr. Wrong. The United States government has also sent an application to the international joint commission which was signed by the Acting Secretary of State in the presence of the Minister of Transport yesterday. I am sure I am expressing the sentiments of the house when I say that we commend the Minister of Transport and the officials who have been dealing with this matter for the diligence they have shown in advancing this great project.

These applications request the international joint commission to approve the construction of works for the development of power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river which are to be constructed by entities to be designated by the two federal governments. The works for which approval is requested are set out in section 8 of the application and are described in the agreement with the province of Ontario dated December 3, 1951, which forms the schedule to the International Rapids Power Development Act passed at the last session of parliament.

As the question of the deep waterway is not being referred to the international joint commission in the applications to which I have just referred, and as the governments of both Canada and the United States have for many years considered that navigation and power should be developed concurrently in the international rapids section, it was thought advisable to place on record, on an international basis, the nature and extent of Canada's undertaking to provide an uninterrupted waterway between lake Erie and the port of Montreal. That is the main purpose of the notes which were exchanged yesterday.

The house will recall that last September I discussed with President Truman the desirability of proceeding as quickly as possible with both the seaway and power phases of this project. We agreed that it was desirable to proceed with both phases of the project as a joint undertaking by our two countries, but I informed the President that if this were not possible, the Canadian government was prepared to proceed alone with the construction of the seaway when appropriate arrangements were made for construction of the power phases of the project. The President promised to support this alternative proposal if it was not possible to obtain congressional approval for the joint undertaking at an early date. And that having proved to be impossible, we have proceeded on this conditional undertaking that the President had given me last September.

While we shall always welcome the co-operation of the United States in undertakings of this sort which benefit the economies of both countries, it is fitting that, on the 85th anniversary of confederation, we were able to take this major step toward the accomplishment of a goal which has, for certainly at least half a century, excited the imagination of so many Canadians. And after many years of negotiations and working out of arrangements for co-operating in the joint enterprise with our great neighbour to the south, we are now prepared to construct alone this deep waterway which will link the ports of the great lakes with all the other seaports of the world.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has expressed his hope that this announcement would meet with the approval of all hon. members, may I say without any reservation that the members of the Conservative party in the house do support this great national project as part of a general development of our resources across Canada; and in that respect I would of course wish to make it clear that there are those who naturally believe this should be a pattern of development right across Canada.

Having said that, I wish to offer my very hearty support for the indication which is given that, along with the decision to seek immediate approval of the development of the immense power resources on the St. Lawrence river, it is the decision of the Canadian government to proceed alone with the waterway development along that part of our great inland transportation system.

It is a significant thing that this announcement should be made on Dominion day when we are commemorating the birthday of Canada as a nation. This is of significance to all Canada because it is the one area where the development calls for a substantial measure of international agreement to carry forward an undertaking that we all wish to see completed as soon as possible.

Perhaps because it might have been such a striking example of international co-operation, there have been many who have expressed the hope throughout the years that the United States might see fit to join with Canada in the construction not only of the power development, but also of the deep waterway. This gesture between two nations which carry on their daily activities in such harmony would have been significant not only for us but for other people throughout the world who are seeking proof that nations can live in that measure of harmony and good will which we accept as a commonplace on this continent. Nevertheless, since it has been the decision, in their judgment in the United States, not to proceed with the waterway part of this development, I hope that Canada will proceed without any delay.

I wish to refer to statements that I have seen in some newspapers in the United States which convey the impression that there is still some thought in the minds of those writing editorials even in the most responsible publications that Canada is not prepared to carry on with this undertaking alone. Speaking in this house as leader of the opposition, I think it is appropriate that I should join my voice with that of the Prime Minister in expressing complete confidence that Canada is capable of proceeding alone, and that there is no doubt whatever of our ability to finance the project and also our ability to carry out the construction in a manner which will be consistent with the standards of work that have distinguished the construction of the whole of this great inland waterway system.

There are many things about which we differ, and it is the duty of the opposition to express those differences. On this occasion I wish to leave no doubt that we join in expressing the hope that this application will receive early approval, and that this whole project will proceed as an appropriate expression of Canada's confidence, on this 85th birthday, in our very great future.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) have expressed the views of all hon. members. There is little to be added. I feel confident that Canada can carry this project through; and, personally, I am rather glad Canada will be undertaking the project alone. There would be some value in demonstrating co-operation between these two great countries, but on the other hand, when I look into the future, I think it is better that one of the two countries should undertake this, and be responsible for it.

I am very happy indeed that the government of Canada has decided to be the country to carry the project through. It is indeed fitting that this announcement is made on the anniversary of confederation. I want to join in expressing appreciation of the diligence that has been shown by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and his staff, and indeed by the government, in pressing forward this great project which I believe will be, in the long run, of inestimable benefit to all of Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, Social Credit members have been in favour of this great project from the beginning. We, too, appreciate the fact that the announcement is being made on the 85th birthday of Canada. We are in sympathy with what has already been said by the Prime Minister and by the leaders of the other parties. The leader of the opposition said that Canada has the ability to carry out this project. I think we need only add, as I am sure the leader of the opposition intended to do, that Canada has the will to do it, too.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister one question, by way of clarification in connection with this St. Lawrence seaway development. Assuming that Canada is proceeding with this waterway deepening alone, what constitutional difficulty could arise in virtue of the position of the United States, whereby any obstacle could be placed by the congress of the United States in the way of our proceeding alone? I ask this, having in mind what has happened before.

I can understand that, if the government has full power to approve of our going ahead on an international basis with this waterway, that would be all right; but having in mind what happened before in congress, does the Prime Minister know of any obstacle they could place in the way of Canada's developing the seaway alone?

Mr. St. Laurent: Our information is that under the laws of the United States this application can be approved by the international joint commission, and that its approval under the treaty would make it binding upon the two countries. Of course the treaty could be repudiated before action is taken upon it, but I think that is most unlikely.

Secondly, according to our information the government of the United States has the right to designate the entity that would proceed with the Canadian entity in the construction of the works necessary to develop the hydroelectric power. That entity, after having been designated by the government, would have to get a licence from the federal power commission, which is a semi-judicial body. There is no action required from the congress of the United States in order to carry the project through. Of course the congress of the United States could adopt laws preventing these agencies which now exist from exercising the jurisdiction they have under the present laws. But I think that is very unlikely, also.

There is also the possibility, to which some consideration has been given, of opposing interests endeavouring to have the courts pass upon the regularity of the proceedings, and the extent of the jurisdiction of the federal power commission. That is something that would be referred to the courts. But our information from our own law officers, and from the law officers of the United States government, is that what is being done is regular, and that it is within the jurisdiction as it now exists of the federal power commission.

Of course the Canadian government cannot proceed with the seaway phase of the undertaking unless there are two entities, one Canadian and one American, that are at the same time proceeding with the power phase of the undertaking. The President had told me quite frankly that he would not favour the designation of an American entity to proceed with the power phase unless there was an undertaking to proceed concurrently with the development of the seaway. In his opinion, it was highly desirable that both phases of the project be proceeded with at the same time.

He had told me that he hoped the congress would allow the provisions of the treaty of 1941, with the appropriate amendments, to be carried out, and the two phases handled as the joint undertaking of the two countries, but that he felt it was so desirable to have the matter proceeded with at once that, if the congress did not act within a reasonable time, he would exercise his executive power to designate an agency, and to put that agency in a position where it could apply to the federal power commission for a licence.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RULES OF PROCEDURE—CONCURRENCE IN PART I OF REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) inquired of the Prime Minister if someone would move concurrence in the report of the special committee on house procedure which was tabled by Your Honour on June 27. This was the unanimous report of the special committee. I now move:

That part I of the report of the special committee on house procedure presented to the house on Friday, June 27, 1952, be now concurred in; and that the provisions of part I of the said report become effective at the next session of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Redistribution

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed, from Monday, June 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce)—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, parliament is a great institution. Yesterday we were engaged in a most acrimonious debate which would indicate a wide separation in viewpoint; today on our national holiday parliament indicates by its action that regardless of those things that separate us in the ordinary affairs of life we stand united in the great things that make for a great Canada.

On this occasion I am going to deal for a short while as objectively as I can with the question of the redistribution of constituencies, with particular reference to what has taken place in Saskatchewan. May I say immediately that I want to thank the hon. members of all parties in the opposition who spoke yesterday so feelingly and so kindly of my constituency. In particular I want to say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar how much I appreciate the references that he made to the nature and quality of the map drawn for the province of Saskatchewan.

Over the years I have taken the stand that committees of parliament are not very effective. Standing committees of parliament have an effective way of securing information on matters that are non-controversial and arriving at conclusions based on the greater knowledge that comes to members who participate in such committees. In the United States committees are set up under their system of government for almost every variety and type of matter that comes before congress and are generally successful in their results. I think that in large measure that is due to the fact that in the United States the members of the various political parties do not leave their independence behind when they enter congress. Over the years members of congress—it is a continuing process—consider propositions in committee regardless of any consideration that they might be negatived by the President or the party in majority in the other house. We in Canada have developed over the years the concept that after all a committee, when it is a political committee, is merely a means, either of refusal or to cover up things that are brought before it.

Generally speaking, what is taking place now has taken place in previous redistributions. In 1932 there was a long and acrimonious debate and the legislation did not pass until it had been discussed in the house for five days and then only when the prime minister had communicated with the then leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Mr. King, and each of them appointed representatives of their respective parties to sit down and arrive at least at a basis of agreement which ended the stalemate that existed. I would have liked in this case to have the Prime Minister consider doing the same in regard to the various matters that have been brought to the attention of the house from almost every province in Canada wherein the allegation has been made, and in many cases established, that the result of the activities of the general committee was that some members were in fact subjected to gerrymandering.

I know that there are many definitions of "gerrymander", but Mr. King gave a definition which I believe reveals in its entirety the essence of the expression. Speaking in the House of Commons on May 22, 1933, as reported on page 5276 of Hansard, Mr. King said:

> The word gerrymander in political parlance simply means that in redistributing a constituency the boundary lines are so altered as to do an obvious injury to one political party and give an obvious unfair political advantage to another party.

That was the definition that he gave at that time. He pointed out on that occasion the difficulty, or the impossibility even, of a committee composed of representative members of the House of Commons, having regard to the emotions that are aroused and the considerations that appeal to each and every individual, being able to arrive at fairness in connection with the redistribution of seats that might take place. Today we find ourselves too often in the position where our committee system becomes merely a means whereby a rubber stamping of government policy is carried out by the ciphers appointed to that committee. In every case the decision is dominated by government majority. No one is suggesting that the government should not have the majority on a committee, but certainly no one can suggest that anything approaching judicial or judicious consideration is given to the determination of the conclusions arrived at by committees.

I am going to refer for a moment in general to what the evidence yesterday disclosed. Summarized, it indicated that there had been a gerrymander and that the decision arrived at in a number of cases, in particular those affecting opposition members, had been prejudiced as well as prejudged. Sufficient was said yesterday and in recent weeks to indicate that a gerrymander has been effected by arriving at constituency boundaries in a manner that indicates that considerations other than symmetry were involved; in other cases by the dissimilarity in population and in still other cases by joinders that were made of opposition constituencies.

I am going to refer for a moment to what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Melfort, who dealt with the Saskatchewan situation. I am going to review what took place in determining the recommendations made by the subcommittee. The hon. member referred to the constituency of Melfort where a grotesque result was produced for political purposes. When the hon. member made a motion in the committee that an alteration should be made in the constituency of Melfort-Humboldt in order to remove a line of townships that had no place in any fair constituency map, after a discussion lasting a matter of two or three minutes, in came the hon. member for St. Boniface to act as chairman of the committee. The vote was three to three and he cast a vote in favour of a refusal to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Melfort. When I point out what took place in the Saskatchewan committee I do so because of the fact that it places before the house something of the activity or lack of activity that was apparent in the committee. The committee met for one or two minutes prior to the Saskatchewan general election. On that occasion I asked for the production of the map because there had been maps in the press that bore a peculiarly prophetic appearance in the light of the final map as it actually was. I asked whether or not there was a map and the members, including the chairman, said there was not. If there was not, then all I can say is that the prospective projection that appeared in the press bore such a similarity to the final result as to indicate at least some foreknowledge on the part of the press as to the composition of the map.

I said if it were not produced before the election I would certainly take it for granted that the prospective map published by the press indicating what was going to be done did in fact indicate what was to be done. By agreement there were no more meetings until after the election. Following the election certain meetings were held to which the hon. member for Kamloops has alluded. He has revealed what took place and has also indicated that the length of time taken did not exceed a few minutes and that there was no discussion regarding what should or should not be done. Proceeding a bit further, on June 23 there was a meeting. That was the one to which the hon. member for Kamloops made reference yesterday. He asked for the production of the map on the Friday preceding the 23rd of June and was advised that there was no map. On the 23rd of June we met and the map was produced. We looked it over. There was about twenty minutes' discussion and there was only one copy of the map there. We asked for copies of the map and were advised there were none available. A little later the hon. member for Rosthern said that copies would be made available, and at five o'clock that afternoon I received one. It was understood that the subcommittee would meet again later that day, but the hon. member for Rosthern agreed that it should not meet until the next day.

On June 24 we met for a total period of not over half an hour. The map was produced. The attitude taken was: There is your map; that is all there is to it. There was no question of compromise, no question of discussion and no question of the consideration of the wishes of any member of the committee except those who produced the map as an accomplished fact. On that occasion the hon. member for Melfort made a motion, and I have already told the committee the result of that motion. I also pointed out that there was something obviously wrong with the Prince Albert constituency with respect to the removal of an area in the southeastern corner thereof extending from Kilwinning to Blaine Lake, an area of approximately twenty-four miles square and one which has been in Prince Albert constituency throughout the years. No explanation was given.

Following that I made certain motions. I moved that certain changes be made, and in particular that the area in the western part of the constituency of Lake Centre, which has been in that constituency ever since Lake Centre was created, the area extending from Hawarden to Elbow and along the South Saskatchewan river from Kenaston to Aylesbury, including the towns of Craik and Davidson, should continue to be within the constituency. I also referred to the fact that the populations of Melville and Qu'Appelle constituencies did not nearly approximate that of Lake Centre. There was no discussion of the matter at all. The hon. member for St. Boniface was there. A vote was taken the result of which was three for and three against, and the deciding vote was cast by the hon. member for St. Boniface.

On the evening of June 24 the matter came before the general committee. In other words the matter had not been before the subcommittee for a total period of over one hour. There was no question of any discussion. There was nothing but the applied steamroller. The general committee met and the chairman and other members of the general committee asked on that occasion that the subcommittee should sit again the next day for the purpose of discussing the question. In pursuance of what the general committee had decided, the subcommittee met on June 25 at ten o'clock in the morning in the room of the hon. member for Rosthern to reconsider the matter as requested by the general committee. As soon as we were convened the question was asked whether or not there was any change, and the hon. member for Rosthern said "no". An inquiry was made whether they had any suggestions to offer and the answer was "No, this is the map." We met for two minutes. That was the total discussion that took place at any time and the complete consideration given in determining the revamping and redrafting of constituencies in Saskatchewan. I ask you, Mr. Chairman: Is that the consideration that members of the opposition deserve? Certainly we did not expect to get some of the things that we wanted but at least we should not have had a map placed before us as certain in its effect as the law of the Medes and the Persians, and as certainly subject to no appeal or consideration.

I have mentioned the fact that for a considerable period of time it had been said that tremendous changes would be made in the constituency of Lake Centre. Mention was made yesterday of populations. I wish to place before the committee the populations of the various constituencies in Saskatchewan at the time of the 1941 and 1951 censuses. These details will give some idea as to the falling away in population and where the population is falling away. The figures are as follows:

Constituency	Population 1951 census	Population 1941 census
Assiniboia	39,917	44,335
Humboldt	43,050	48,066
Kindersley	34,325	41,068
Lake Centre	35,940	42,993
Mackenzie	42,200	45,797
Maple Creek	39,511	....

Mr. Gardiner: That should be 32,511.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say again what it is.

Mr. Gardiner: 32,511.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The table continues:

Constituency	Population 1951 census	Population 1941 census
Maple Creek	32,511	43,414
Meadow Lake	35,298	41,458
Melfort	44,559	46,438
Melville	39,995	42,687
Moose Jaw	42,418	42,439

That is in a large part a city constituency and there was only a change of 21.

Moose Mountain	42,647	42,414
Prince Albert	46,936	46,969

Prince Albert has a decrease of only 30.

Qu'Appelle	42,235	42,706
Regina City	66,039	58,235

Regina City has had a very great increase.

Rosetown-Biggar	33,033	40,964
Rosthern	34,173	42,809

The figure is down 8,800 there.

Saskatoon	58,041	47,609
Swift Current	33,472	42,601
The Battlefords	40,676	44,382
Yorkton	44,263	49,578

Those figures placed on Hansard indicate that with the exception of two cities where there was a material increase in population, and a comparatively stable population in two others, the population of Saskatchewan went down very considerably.

Now I come to the question of what was done particularly with reference to the map of Saskatchewan. The minister stated yesterday that they started with Regina and Saskatoon—two cities with 66,000 and 56,000—subtracted that amount from the total population arriving at a base which I believe is around 43,000—it may be less than that. One would have thought that in drawing the plan regard would have been had to the question of achieving a reasonable equality of population.

Mr. Gardiner: May I suggest, and I think my hon. friend will agree, that he left out part of what I stated: First the two large cities and then the next six smaller constituencies were allowed 50,000 as an objective.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not recall the minister saying that. I have Hansard here and I will look at it. If the minister said that, then there is no question about it but I did not get that in my notes. I will look at Hansard to see just how fully the minister did say it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I give you this picture and I simply point out that after all no one asks for consideration other than justice. No consideration but justice. One does not ask to be discriminated in favour of, but every member of this house has the right to ask that he be not discriminated against. And I ask you this, Mr. Chairman: Viewing the matter as reasonably as possible how can anyone justify taking the constituency boundaries in this way and removing from the west side of that constituency an area most heavily populated within the constituency? They remove there a large number of townships of which I will give the exact detail—and a township is six miles square. That area has always been in Lake Centre. It was in the constituency that was the predecessor of Lake Centre—west of the lake—the old Long Lake constituency. They remove that area and it is merely a coincidence that the constituency represents an area wherein, as Mr. King said in 1932, a large majority is to be found for a Conservative candidate. Then, the city of Moose Jaw is added to this constituency—a city of 24,000 or 25,000 population, and a city that is growing. I have no objection to that because changes must take place and I want to be fair, but I cannot understand any justification for a city being placed in a rural constituency. Trying to be fair you can say: All right, after all changes take place; and I offer no other conjecture but that it is coincidence that two opposition members are thus covered by the joinder.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I point out this fact. Here is the Qu'Appelle constituency represented by the hon. member who was one of those who participated in the modern Mercator's projection and apparently he objected to the area around Regina. At no time was the area surrounding Regina ever in Lake Centre, as the minister said yesterday. The only area that was ever in Lake Centre was the area west of Regina, and the word "surround" to me does not imply surrounding on one side. In answer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the minister said yesterday that all this area around Regina was in Lake Centre. I should know. No map indicates it. The only person who says otherwise is the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not say that. You should read Hansard again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister said "surrounding Regina".

Mr. Gardiner: I said two-thirds on the north, down the west side, and two-thirds on the south—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You made no qualifications yesterday. It is the same old thing. Yesterday the statement was "surrounding" and there can be no "surrounding" of a city or of any other place by merely being adjacent to one boundary line.

There was one change made to the map in the committee. At the last meeting of the committee the hon. member for Rosthern I believe asked if there were any changes; and he himself answered his own question and said in effect that we are going to add three miles across the entire southern boundary of the constituency of Qu'Appelle, and that was passed. That raises the population from 40,650, as originally intended, to 43,300; but the area east of Regina has been in Qu'Appelle for years. No objection was raised in 1947. It is now being tacked on to the constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. If they really want to preserve names they also should have Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and Regina city junior; for after all, it takes from Regina city, and out of the confines of Regina city, several thousands of population. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, is that justice? Is that fairness? Somebody may say, as does the Canadian Press today, "Oh well, an alteration was made yesterday." The effect of the alteration yesterday was simply to add one column of townships on the east boundary line wherein the population is almost equally divided politically, except for this area around Regina which is within Regina city and which is still to be put into a constituency of Lake Centre-Moose Jaw city. Can there be any justification for adding approximately 5,000 city population from Regina—right out of the incorporated city—besides the several hundreds if not thousands who live in the suburbs of Regina, all of whom will now be placed in Lake Centre although not within the incorporated portion of the city of Regina?

Mr. Chairman, the object of representation by population is to assure equality. The changes that are made are made only because it is more difficult to represent a large area in a rural constituency than it is to represent a city; and there are other physical features that demand changes. But let any hon. member view this picture and ask himself whether that fairness and impartiality that is expected is exhibited by those who place in a rural constituency, which is still a matter of about sixty miles wide and eighty miles in length, one city and, not satisfied with that, place in it 5,000 population from another city, forty miles removed from the first.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I said a while ago. No one asks for favours; but on behalf of the people I represent in that western part of that constituency and also on behalf of the people in Regina and in Moose Jaw I ask that there should be no discrimination against them any more than there should be personal discrimination against any member of the house.

It is said that the name remains. The other day there was an interruption by the hon. member for Rosthern who said, "It still has the name." Let us see what about the area. There were 192 townships in Lake Centre and the population was approximately that of the adjoining constituencies. It was not large. I think the population was some 35,000. But there were five smaller populations than that in the province in these areas. People have moved away. That is why we have been asking over and over again for the provision of irrigation; it is needed if the population is to be preserved.

Let me now give you the picture as to how these modern Mercators fixed the map. There were 192 townships in Lake Centre. Ninety were removed. Eighteen were added on the south side, some of which were removed in 1947. No one has objected to that procedure. They were always in Lake Centre. Eighteen townships were added to take the place of the 90 that are out. Then the city of Moose Jaw is added. Then 36,023 are added out of Regina city on the east side and removed from the constituency of Qu'Appelle. Can you tell me, Mr. Chairman, that there is anything bordering on non-discrimination when a member of the committee has removed from his constituency which is readily accessible, with a line of railway throughout the entire length of it, an area east of Regina that never has been in Lake Centre, with a population of 43,300. He has this area removed from his constituency. There may be a reason. It may be only a coincidence that that is a strong area of people who voted against the Liberal party.

Then in addition to the 36,023 in Regina city on the east side, 1,651 from the city are added on the west side of Regina. Further to that, all of the suburbs around Regina—and they are spreading out continuously as that city grows to one of the great cities in the west—go into Lake Centre. As the hon. member for Melfort said yesterday, an area where further growth is to be expected, around Regina and Moose Jaw, is placed in a constituency with 53,000 population. When one looks at these other constituencies and finds the difference, surely he must conclude that there is more than coincidence in it.

When it is said that the name is still there and a part of the area still remains, let me give some figures on the basis of acreage; for after all, that information indicates something of the vastness of these empires that constitute constituencies in Saskatchewan. From the constituency of Lake Centre—from the west side of it which is to be put into Rosetown-Biggar—1,267 acres are removed. Then from the east side, including the amendments yesterday, approximately 650,000 acres are removed. Then there are added on the east side 691,000 acres. As the position now is, about 44 per cent of the acreage of the constituency has been removed. That fact indicates something of the area that was removed from that constituency.

My friend the hon. member for Eglinton yesterday also mentioned the question of population—which I think is of interest—and how these people voted. He mentioned that area on the west side that has always been in Lake Centre, wherein the majority for a Conservative candidate is from 1,500 to 1,700. Then he mentioned the areas that had been added to Melville and to Humboldt and to Yorkton. These areas are almost neutral ground with a small majority in them for the C.C.F. But the main portion of the amputation proceedings was the assurance that these parts of the constituency should be moved where there was a majority for the Progressive Conservatives. What did they do in return? They brought in Moose Jaw. And again I am referring to the definition that the late Mr. Mackenzie King gave to gerrymander. In the provincial election Moose Jaw recorded 7,209 for the C.C.F. and 3,402 for the Liberals. Lumsden recorded—

An hon. Member: How many Tories?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There were no Conservative candidates there.

Mr. Gardiner: By arrangement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is entirely untrue.

Mr. Coldwell: And the minister knows it.

Mr. Gardiner: We will deal with it in due course; go ahead.

Mr. Hees: Make him withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a false statement, and the minister knows it.

Mr. Gardiner: I have a few facts of my own to give.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In Lumsden the vote was C C.F., 2,415—a large portion of these comes into this new constituency—Liberals, 1,589; Conservatives, 1,392. That is the area of the city of Regina that is to be tagged on. The majority there is overwhelmingly C.C.F.

Those are matters, Mr. Chairman, which I believe indicate an attitude of mind that is far removed from that judicial, calm and sober consideration that one expects in the committee set up for the purpose of determining the right of people to representation in the House of Commons.

Mention was made yesterday—I saw it in a Canadian Press dispatch—of the changes made in order to remove any cause of complaint. Those changes which were made yesterday are as ephemeral as they are ineffectual. They are simply designed for the purpose of indicating that the give and take was entirely absent not only from the subcommittee but from the general committee.

Mr. Nowlan: Lots of take.

Mr. Knowles: Lots of take, no give.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friends understand that. But there was no desire to compromise. We will not always be right in the motions we move in the general committee, but when we move them and find that they are voted down on every occasion with regularity, and with monotonous regularity, without even the acceptance of one little change, one wonders whether or not that consideration has been given which is deserved.

What about the change yesterday? It takes from Lake Centre approximately 3,800 people; and it is merely coincidence—I am not going into all the details—that all three parties have much the same vote there. But they did not remove the cause of the objection, namely, east of Regina and incorporating in Lake Centre that area by taking it from Qu'Appelle. That has no reason to be in Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, and there never was any justification for putting it in. There was no give and take yesterday in what was done. It was simply a form of last minute repentance, not for the purpose of true repentance, but for the purpose of leading the people of Canada to believe that there had been some serious endeavour to alter the boundaries of Lake Centre in order to remove some of the causes of objection.

What took place yesterday alters nothing. It is as meaningless as is possible in the widest sense of the use of that word. I will say no more on this subject. I have presented the case. I have asked for no special consideration and I will not do that. What I have done—and I only wish the Prime Minister were here to be able to say it to him—is to have placed before this committee the picture which was described by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in a way that was as appealing as it was effective, and it was true. The hon. member for Eglinton dealt with it, along with other constituencies. Coincidence? What about the president of the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada?

An hon. Member: What about him?

Mr. Diefenbaker: How can anyone justify a population such as he will have in comparison with those adjoining him? What about the hon. member for Souris? He is being put into a constituency with the hon. member for Brandon. There are not many Conservatives from the west in the House of Commons. Apparently there are too many in the opinion of those who drew the map for Saskatchewan and Manitoba. As far as Alberta is concerned, the hon. member for Calgary East showed that that principle was applied with respect to him and those associated with him, but the principle ceased to be applied when that piece of work was done and when the drawing was to be made in another part of Alberta.

Surely, if there had been consistency in the desire to achieve a reasonable degree of equality, those inequalities would not have occurred. I have placed the matter before you without heat, without recrimination. Yesterday everyone was in warm good feeling. Today we are calm, thanks to you, Mr. Chairman, and also the fact that this is Dominion day. Today I have tried to present the argument free from those prejudices that all of us have, in the same spirit as that exhibited by the hon. member for Haldimand. I only wish I had the power and the effect on the house that he had last evening when he spoke so feelingly over the loss of a constituency historic in its importance. He reached in his speech last evening one of the high points that come in parliament—

Mr. McIlraith: The constituency is still there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no. The territorial limits are still there, joined with the constituency of the hon. member for Brandon. Again it is merely a coincidence, two Conservatives brought together, thereby assuring at least the elimination of one.

Mr. McIlraith: That is just not right.

Mr. Boucher: Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer at this time to some of the statements, which are not correct, made by the hon. member for Lake Centre. My remarks at this time will be very brief because I intend to have more to say when the Saskatchewan schedule is called.

The hon. member for Lake Centre said last Saturday that we had held no meetings of our subcommittee for six weeks. Well, Mr. Chairman, we met about five weeks ago. The hon. member for Lake Centre was there, and it was decided that the committee would not meet for another three or four weeks.

Mr. Murphy: The Saskatchewan election.

Mr. Boucher: That was decided unanimously. But he comes here and complains now that there was no meeting of the committee.

He asked for a map. I told him we had no map. That was the truth. "Well," he said "surely you can give me a rough outline of what the map will be." I said, "Well, we have not got the figures yet. I cannot give any outline at the present time." Then he made the threat, "Well, if you do not give me the map I will assume that the reports in the papers are correct, and I am going to use that in Saskatchewan."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the last part of the statement is not correct.

Mr. Dewar: Yes it is.

Mr. Boucher: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No threat at all.

Mr. Boucher: There are other members of the committee here, and they know what was said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sure.

Mr. Boucher: He said, "I will use what was said in the papers." I said to him, "Which article will you use?"—because there were two different reports—"which report will you use?" And he said, "I will use the report of the Liberal paper, the Regina Leader-Post". "But", I said "there is another Liberal paper over there, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix; it has a different report." And that is what took place.

He said the other day that there was no meeting, and he said yesterday that he had made no threats. Well, he has made threats. He said—

An hon. Member: "He said."

Mr. Boucher: Who is making this speech?

An hon. Member: Nobody.

Mr. Fraser: He himself does not know.

Mr. Boucher: He said he wanted a map. One hon. member said, "You draw a map". He suggested that to the hon. member for Lake Centre—that he draw a map. I have here the exact words of the hon. member: "It is not up to me to draw a map."

An hon. Member: He would rather squawk.

Mr. Boucher: He had ample opportunity to draw a map, but he said it was not up to him.

Mr. Graydon: Would you have taken his map?

Mr. Boucher: He refused to draw a map.

Mr. Fulton: Would you have taken it, if he had?

Mr. Graydon: No use wasting time drawing a map, if you would not take it.

Mr. Boucher: The hon. member said the other day that all the meetings lasted five minutes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Boucher: Pardon me—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never at any time did I say that. I said an hour and five minutes—and that was the total time, an hour and five minutes.

Mr. Boucher: I meant to say that.

Mr. Murphy: Say it, then.

Mr. Boucher: One hour and five minutes.

The Chairman: Order. It might be well at this time, at an early hour in the day, to make clear the rule that has been so often violated since the beginning of this debate. The hon. member who has the floor says something which, in the opinion of others, is not correct. Someone will rise to a question of privilege, or a so-called question of privilege.

If an hon. member wishes to make a statement with respect to information given by another hon. member, he must ask the permission of the hon. member who has the floor, and not rise to a question of privilege —although that practice is now being followed regularly. Interruptions are made in this way with the result that the hon. member who has the floor is in the position where he cannot make his speech.

I would ask hon. members to take this into consideration. They should ask the hon. member who has the floor if he will permit a question or an interruption, and should not rise to questions of privilege. Once the hon. member making the speech has concluded his observations and resumed his seat, in the event of his not having given consent to the making of a correction by another hon. member, then the hon. member wishing to make the correction can rise and make it.

I would ask hon. members to observe this rule. Otherwise it will be almost impossible to carry on orderly discussion. The hon. member for Rosthern may proceed.

Mr. Boucher: The hon. member for Lake Centre has said that our meetings lasted only one hour and five minutes. Well, I do not know if he had a time clock; certainly I did not follow that closely. But I will tell him one thing, that if our meetings did not last longer it is entirely the responsibility of the hon. member for Lake Centre, because on every occasion, with the exception of the last two meetings—and I must say that he has been different at the last two meetings—on every occasion he said, Well, we will discuss that elsewhere.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whom are you quoting?

Mr. Brooks: You.

Mr. Boucher: On every occasion he took the attitude, "Well, we will discuss that elsewhere"—on every occasion, that is, with the exception of the last two or three meetings. So the meetings had to be short; he did not want to discuss the matter. He wanted to discuss it elsewhere. He did not want to discuss it there. He has had every opportunity, but he did not want to take it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And that statement is not true, either.

Mr. Boucher: We tried to satisfy the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boucher: But we could not satisfy him—and I will tell you why. I read the record of the redistribution in 1947; I have it right here on my desk. Although he signed and approved the report of the Saskatchewan subcommittee, when it came to the house he criticized it as vigorously as he could.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just as Mr. Totzke did in 1932.

Mr. Boucher: That is what you did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And that is what Mr. Totzke did.

Mr. Boucher: Is it not amazing to see an hon. member acting that way? Again this time we tried to satisfy him; but this time he did not go as far as he did before: he did not sign the report. I have to give him credit for that. But when he comes here he is dissatisfied and worried—and I think he has some reason to be worried. Do you know that if we were to put into the constituency of Lake Centre all the people of Saskatchewan who voted Conservative in the last provincial election the hon. member would not have enough votes to be elected.

Mr. Sinnott: That is the real trouble.

Mr. Boucher: Yes, if we took all the Tories who voted in the whole province of Saskatchewan—in the whole province—at the last provincial election, that would have been the result.

An hon. Member: How many seats did your party lose?

Mr. Boucher: We increased our vote by 30,000 or 40,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But what happened to the seats?

Mr. Sinclair: No wonder he would not draw a map!

Mr. Boucher: As I said at the beginning, I shall have something further to say when that part of the schedule dealing with Saskatchewan is called. I wish to give notice of an amendment that I shall move. In the light of what was said yesterday we have decided that we should draw a straight line—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who are we?

Mr. Boucher: The committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The committee never had anything to do with it.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Boucher: Sit down. You fellows would not permit questions yesterday, so just keep quiet.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is afraid to answer the question.

Mr. Fraser: Who are we?

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member is afraid to answer the question because he does not want to reveal the identity of the people who have been carving up Saskatchewan.

Mr. Sinclair: You and your counsel.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Rosthern may resume.

Mr. Fulton: Will he permit a question now?

Mr. Boucher: I give notice that I will move an amendment when Saskatchewan is called that the east half of townships 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20, all in range 20, and that part of the east half of township 21 in range 19 lying south of the Qu'Appelle river, all west of the second meridian, be deleted from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and be included in the constituency of Qu'Appelle.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to go too much into detail at the present time with regard to Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Rosthern has just stated that as chairman of the subcommittee he will be discussing the matter more in detail when we are considering the Saskatchewan schedule. However, I think it is necessary that I should make a few remarks with regard to what has been said by hon. members about the Saskatchewan position.

I was a little bit surprised when the hon. member for Lake Centre rose in his place and commenced his remarks by expressing some concern that members of the government had not spoken in the debate up to that time. I recall that on each occasion that I rose yesterday and even attempted to interject I heard the same chorus from across the chamber, "You are not a member of the committee." On each occasion that I got up to say anything I was told that I was not a member of the committee so why should I be discussing the matter. I was asked what I knew about it. I was presumed to have known nothing.

Mr. Fulton: You were simply trying to interrupt.

Mr. Gardiner: With the exception of the minister who is the chairman of the committee and who has spoken already, no member of the government was on the committee and therefore had no reason to discuss the matter. It was for that reason that the chairman of the subcommittee for Saskatchewan made the remarks he did a few moments ago. If I had attempted to make them I could properly have been told that I did not know anything about the matter because I was not on the committee. The details of the discussions that took place were known only to members of the committee. The chairman has recited what did take place in the committee and therefore I am not going to discuss that further.

There are some peculiarities about the Saskatchewan situation which are unique to that province. In the first place, we were not entitled under the constitution as it existed to 17 members; we were entitled to 15 only. After listening to the discussion, particularly by the two hon. members who were most concerned, I have been wondering whether we improved the situation by increasing the number to 17.

Before saying anything more about it I want to thank hon. members from all parts of Canada and from all sides of the house for listening to the representations that were made by the Prime Minister to the effect that some change should be made because one province was being asked to drop 25 per cent of its membership in the house under the constitution as it then was. At the time that suggestion was made, if it was not suggested in so many words it was certainly inferred that it would be impossible to make what would be looked upon in this country as a reasonable adjustment of the seats if an attempt was made to take 5 seats out of the 20 in the province of Saskatchewan. It was agreed unanimously that there should be 17 seats.

Whether we were right or whether we were wrong, we took it for granted that when that decision was made there were at least two members from Saskatchewan to whom some consideration had to be given. One was the leader of the C.C.F. party who has a seat in that province—the leaders of other parties have seats in other provinces—and the other was the hon. member for Lake Centre. Neither of them seems to have appreciated that we did anything for him at all. That was the central fact in connection with redistribution in Saskatchewan to which the members of the Saskatchewan subcommittee had to pay attention.

It would have been a simple matter to have redistributed the seats in Saskatchewan and have them all within one thousand of one another in population, if we were not required to pay any attention to that fact. The areas in which there is a shortage of population are apparent to everyone. If you take the west side of Saskatchewan and divide it into constituencies as it is now, you find that under the census of 1951 Kindersley had 34,325; Maple Creek had 32,500; Meadow Lake had 35,511; Swift Current with a city had 42,600. The Battlefords with a city had 44,382 and Rosetown-Biggar had 33,033.

If one were to remove the cities from that group he would have four rural seats in that area which would only have had an average population of less than 40,000. Therefore it was obvious that one constituency should come out. The easiest constituency to have taken out was Rosetown-Biggar. I think even the hon. member will agree that the simplest thing to have done was to have taken out the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar and run one constituency east and west instead of north and south. We would then have had a rate of population for the constituencies which would have thrown the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in along with the hon. member for Kindersley. They would have had to contest that constituency. I can imagine what would have been said if we had done that, but that was the simplest and easiest thing to do.

What did we do? We took a Liberal seat out of that area, just removed it. We did not remove any C.C.F. seats. We did not remove any Conservative seats. We removed a Liberal seat from that area, and when I say "we" I mean our committee from the province of Saskatchewan. Those who were on that committee representing the Liberals made that recommendation. There has been a lot of discussion about when there was a map and when there was not a map. These other matters were the important questions to be discussed in the first instance. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that if the matter had been referred to a commission there would have been quite a different map. I agree that there would have been, and his seat would not have been in it.

There would have been no constituency of Rosetown-Biggar running down south of the river. There could not have been enough population obtained to put a seat there at all unless it did run south of the river because of the very situation outlined a few moments ago by the hon. member for Lake Centre, namely, that is a part of the province that is going down in population and going down very rapidly. Because it is a part of the province that is going down very rapidly and because of the fact that two additional seats had been put into Saskatchewan largely because of the difficulty that would have been involved in trying to make an adjustment of 25 per cent in population with relation to the population in other provinces in any one redistribution, we were given special consideration. I think we treated that special consideration in the manner in which it was intended to be treated by leaving the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar there with the result that the leader of that party does not have to contest the seat with any other member of the house.

That was the first consideration and the committee acted upon it. If anyone wants to know what the opinion of the Saskatchewan caucus was on that question, that was their opinion. The committee of three appointed by that caucus was definitely instructed that there had to be a seat of Rosetown-Biggar when the map was drawn no matter how it was drawn, and that it had to remain there because of the special consideration we had been given.

Coming now to Lake Centre, I quite agree that Lake Centre has been a matter of controversy ever since the hon. member for Lake Centre came into this house. I quite agree too that he is quite capable of expressing his point of view on any question on which he has a mind to express it. I am not going to question the statements made by those who are supporters of the point of view that he holds. He is most capable and can express himself here on the floor of the house or outside of the house in the manner he wishes to express himself. In saying that, I want to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Melfort. He was on the committee six years ago.

Mr. Knowles: Five.

Mr. Gardiner: Five years ago, 1947. He was on the committee in 1947 and when speaking yesterday he referred to the fact that a map was drawn by Mr. Tucker in 1947 which was very favourably received by him, and he sort of threw out the suggestion that probably I drew the map this time and it was different. I should like to recall to the memory of hon. members the situation that existed in 1947. There were only two Liberal members in the house from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: You drew that one too.

Mr. Gardiner: I had as much to do with it as I had with this one for the obvious reason that there are fourteen Liberal members in the house now from Saskatchewan and there were only two then. Therefore I suppose I had half the responsibility then and I have one-fourteenth of the responsibility now for what may be done by members of the house from Saskatchewan. The point I wish to make is that there was only one Liberal member to act on the committee at that time. Ministers do not act on committees of that kind. Therefore the then hon. member for Rosthern acted on that committee.

Mr. Knowles: Is not the hon. member for Grey-Bruce a minister?

Mr. Gardiner: He is the chairman but he is not acting on the committee other than as chairman.

Mr. Murphy: Is that so?

Mr. Gardiner: The chairman never acts on the committee. There is no minister from the other provinces who is a member of the committee. I have not been a member of the committee so maybe I do not know all that is to be known about it.

Mr. Graydon: I guess you know pretty well.

Mr. Gardiner: At least I do not know of any ministers other than the chairman who are on the committee. Going back to that time, what happened? No one would draw a map then except the Liberals.

Mr. Graydon: They are experts.

Mr. Gardiner: They just said: We will not draw a map; you draw one and let us look at it. Therefore in so far as we were concerned, there being only two of us, we did draw the map.

Mr. Wright: On a question of privilege, we were never asked to draw the map then nor at this time.

Mr. Gardiner: It is too long ago to talk about what happened five years ago in that regard.

Mr. Wright: I am sure the chairman of the Saskatchewan subcommittee will admit he never asked me to draw a map this time.

Mr. Gardiner: You attempted to draw a piece of it anyway, and we will come to that in a minute.

Mr. Wright: I was never asked to take any part in it until we were presented with the final map.

Mr. Gardiner: Coming back to the position five years ago, the hon. member for Melfort was on the committee as he was this time. He can correct me if I am wrong and I know he will correct me. The hon. member for Lake Centre was also on the committee. The then hon. member for Rosthern was on the committee. There were three of them, and as I recall not a single complaint was made about the boundaries of any constituency other than the constituency of Lake Centre. The other two members of that committee agreed 100 per cent on the boundaries of all the seats at a time when there were only two Liberals in the house from Saskatchewan and when all the other members from that province with the exception of one were C.C.F. The whole C.C.F. group represented by the hon. member for Melfort agreed with the map as it was drawn by myself and Mr. Tucker, and presented to them.

It is stated that the population on that map was as it should have been, and I am going to say that it was more nearly equal in all the constituencies of the province than it was in any other province in Canada. I am not contending that there is any reason for saying that the Liberals of Saskatchewan are any more fair when they do a thing of that kind than Liberals elsewhere. We have a different kind of province. Our province is almost as level as this floor from the United States boundary line up to the northern settlements. We have a few big gullies which my friend from Rosetown-Biggar referred to yesterday as being difficult places to cross over, but if you go back a little piece from them, lie down on your stomach and look straight across, you do not see the gully at all. It is level. That is the nature of our province. It is a level province in more ways than one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: A further fact is that the northeastern section of it was treed before the white man came, and as the white man has cleared the trees off that part it is just as level as the other section. That is different, and when someone across the floor yesterday was saying there were only so few people someone said, "Well, there are a lot of rocks there," and the suggestion was made that maybe they ought to count the rocks. Well, our province is different. You can go into our province and you can draw squares or oblongs all over the province and get pretty nearly the kind of result in one area that you get in any other, but that is more difficult in other provinces.

I agree with the member for Melfort that when the map was drawn five years ago those squares were made just about as they ought to be and the population in them was comparatively equal. Now we are asked: Why is it a little different this time? Again, I agree that if anyone has reason for complaint it is the people who live in the northeastern section of the province. Those constituencies are higher than average.

That brings me back to the question now being discussed a few minutes ago as to what I said yesterday. I do not need to read it but I have turned it up and it is there. I know what I said yesterday and on some other days as well in spite of what some members may think. Yesterday I did not refer to the fact that we had under consideration these two seats of Rosetown-Biggar and of Lake Centre as being fundamental in drawing any map; but I did refer to the remainder, namely that the first thing we had to agree on was that there should be two city seats—Regina and Saskatoon—irrespective of what the population happened to be. When you take those out that gets your population down to a certain level. Then I said the next thing we considered was that there were six other seats—with smaller cities in them. We suggested that when the committee was drawing a map they should allow those constituencies about 50,000 each. That is 300,000 in the six. We deducted that from the total population. That left us nine rural constituencies without any city population in them at all and we divided nine into the remainder of the population.

That gave us a unit and the unit is between 44,000 and 45,000 for the rural seats. The only criticism I have heard with regard to the constituencies is that people start out by saying: Look at the seat of the Minister of Agriculture. Well, the seat of the Minister of Agriculture has 43,300 in it, which is within 1,000 of the unit. That applies in any seat. I then wish to say this about that seat. I have not always represented it in this house. It has been there ever since the province of Saskatchewan was set up and it has had almost its present boundary lines during all that time. When you look at that constituency today and compare it with the rest of Canada you will see it is within 1,000 of the population to which it is entitled under any redistribution. Consider it in relation to all the other constituencies in Canada—and after all that is what we were getting down to when we made a redistribution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the minister mean?

Mr. Gardiner: I mean that when you take the city seats out of Saskatchewan, and no one questions two of them should have members of their own, and when you take out the six smaller city seats with 50,000 each, I think everyone will agree that your representation is reasonably fair when the unit turns out to be 44,500 for these purely rural seats, or about there. There is not very much complaint then. Our rural seats are only 5,000 below our city seats and our smaller city seats are only 5,000 or 6,000 below our larger city seats, so there is not very much for anyone to complain about. If you once agree to that as the proper unit for the rural seats in Saskatchewan as compared with all the remainder of Canada, we are comparable with the rural seats elsewhere. They can be made more nearly exact in our province because of what I said—by the very nature of the province. Ours is an agricultural province largely settled by the same kind of people in the same kind of areas. You can make them about the same size and you can make them about the same in population. That was our intention in 1947 and it was our intention again here.

That intention was affected somewhat by this other point I raised a few moments ago, namely that we have to make provision for these two constituencies and do not forget that we had to take out three seats. We took out one down in the southwest because there was not enough population up across the west side to keep our unit up close to 44,000 in the rural areas and at the same time keep our two city seats in that district up to about 50,000. So we wound up with 50,000 in the Swift Current seat, and we wound up with 48,000 in the Battleford seat and around 44,000 in the others except in the extreme north seat which has only 35,000. I think it will be agreed for the extreme north seat stretching almost over to the Manitoba boundary that there is justification for having 35,000 there, and the others are just about as they should be according to the adjustment that was made.

An hon. Member: How about Humboldt-Melfort?

Mr. Gardiner: I am coming to that now. When you take everything into consideration there is bound to be more population in the northeast than would be normal for the others. If we had been able to take out Rosetown-Biggar there would have been no question about what might have had to happen up in the other seats. We had to cut three seats out and the question which arose was: Are you going to lop off a seat of some member of the C.C.F. party? Are you taking out all Liberal seats? Or are you going to lop off the only seat the Conservatives have?

An hon. Member: One o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner: I will continue later.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind committee members that the committee will resume its sittings at two o'clock in accordance with the motion which was agreed to this morning.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned for lunch, I was dealing with the eastern side of Saskatchewan and more particularly with my own constituency. I had pointed out to the committee that we in Saskatchewan were working under special conditions, one of them being that we were given two constituencies in addition to those that we were entitled to under the constitution as it had previously been drawn and which required of us some things which I had discussed.

Then I had pointed out that the western side of the province was the part that had been reduced in population—and considerably reduced—in the ten-year period with the result that one constituency had to be taken out of the west side. I had also pointed out that the constituency which was taken out by the committee was a seat which is now represented in the House of Commons by a Liberal. If we had simply had the intention of doing what has been suggested from the other side of the house has been the main objective of Liberals, I think we could have found a way of taking out a seat other than one of the Liberal seats.

Then I had undertaken to give a similar review of the eastern side of the province and had started with my own constituency, the reason being that most of those who have been discussing the question of redistribution as related to Saskatchewan have referred to the fact that the population in my constituency is 43,500. I had pointed out that that figure is within 1,000 of the normal, average population for a rural constituency in Saskatchewan.

Just before the committee adjourned I had made the remark that the constituency which I represent in the House of Commons has not changed much since the province of Saskatchewan was first formed. The boundary lines of the seat are almost exactly the same on the south. They are the same as far as they go on the east side. They are almost identical on the north side. They end, or did end prior to what we did yesterday, at the same place on the west end. Hence, over the period of years there has not been much change.

The only effective change was along the east side where prior to the time that I was in politics at all, either provincially or federally, the constituency ran northward along the Manitoba boundary up to Togo or up to the Assiniboine river, then followed the Assiniboine river for a way, then ran west and down on the east side of Yorkton.

In other words, it cut Yorkton out of the seat but took in that section between Yorkton and Manitoba. If we had simply been trying to strengthen the constituency at this time, I would say that we would have put that section back on again because it is a Liberal section and one in which I am satisfied that I could get at least two-thirds of the votes. But we did not do that. We left the boundaries much as they were and we left the population within 1,000 of the average for rural constituencies in the province of Saskatchewan.

Because of the method by which that procedure was worked out, and which I outlined just before lunch, it places that constituency in the position where it bears the proper relationship to populations right across Canada and it bears out the statement that that constituency is at least one constituency in Canada which, since 1914, has continued to bear the same relationship to the population of all the rest of Canada as it did in 1914. In other words, the development of that section of the province has been on a par with the development in other sections of the Dominion of Canada. I am sorry that is not true of the whole province of Saskatchewan but it is true of that particular area and that particular constituency.

Then the seat immediately north of it is Yorkton; and under the plan which has been submitted to the house, that constituency will have a population of 50,000. That is exactly the population which it was calculated at the beginning that it should have, because that is a constituency with a city, one of the smaller cities of Saskatchewan. Yorkton is a city and Yorkton constituency will have a population of approximately 50,000 under this arrangement. That really cut off the north from the south. There are two seats in that area running east and west from the Manitoba boundary to the boundary of Lake Centre. These two constituencies having within themselves all the requirements for units make a cut-off as between the Qu'Appelle river and the north. In view of the fact that I represent part of that area it was suggested to me that I draw a map. I do not know what suggestion was made to other members; there has been some dispute here this morning as to whether it was suggested that some members draw a map, but all I wish to say about it is that there was nothing to prevent anybody from drawing a map. Anyone who was on any one of these committees could have drawn maps to his heart's content and could have submitted them to the committees and had them considered. There never was anything to prevent anyone from doing that.

I drew a map with regard to my own area. As the basis of that map I took the redistribution that was submitted to the house by the Tories in 1933. I quite agree the map of 1933 did not go through the house. Nevertheless, the map was submitted. I obtained one of the maps and found what were the boundaries; not that were passed by the house but that were submitted to the house. The constituency as suggested at that time was a constituency of Yorkton-Melville running north and south; not a constituency running east and west, but one running north and south. If you take the boundary line of that constituency as it was suggested at that time and put both the town of Melville and the city of Yorkton into the same constituency you have a population of just about 50,000, taking in the proposed area. Therefore it could have been justified to have drawn it in that way.

Well, my suggestion to our own people was: why not draw it that way? And then we took a look at the next constituency alongside of it. If you put another constituency running north and south, with the present populations, starting at the Qu'Appelle valley and running it right over to Long lake, you would have had to go away up into the constituency of Humboldt in order to get enough population to make it a constituency. In other words, you would have wiped out half of the constituency of Lake Centre, and so naturally our people said at once: if you are going to carry out the undertaking which the caucus decided in the first place was a reasonable undertaking, that cannot be done. You cannot take and put another constituency in there and run it up north and take off the whole east half of the constituency of Lake Centre. That is the reason why the decision was reached that they would not do that, they would not take out two old constituencies and substitute two running north and south. What relation has that got to the fact that there are 42,000 or 43,000 people in Qu'Appelle south of the Qu'Appelle river, and that there are about 42,000 in Assiniboia, down in the southeast corner?

Mr. Knowles: Moose Mountain.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; it used to be Assiniboia. The relationship is this. There is only one way that you could increase that population in Moose Mountain, and that was to extend the constituency westward. You have to extend it westward only six miles until you take the city of Weyburn into it. The city of Weyburn is the centre of population of the constituency of Assiniboia, which is represented in this house by a C.C.F. member. Well, we could have increased the population of Qu'Appelle and the population of Assiniboia or of Moose Mountain up to something approaching 50,000 by that one movement. But by that one movement we would have to cut off a very considerable part of the constituency of Assiniboia. As a matter of fact, if we had proceeded on that basis, we would have to cut out the constituency of Assiniboia altogether.

We did not think that was a reasonable thing to do, and we therefore had to consider something else. The something else resulted in the fact that by leaving Weyburn in Assiniboia, by leaving a constituency in the southeast corner at around 42,000, which is about 2,000 below the average for that province, we could still continue Assiniboia in the province, provided we had one thing, provided that we did not go far enough to take Moose Jaw in. If we went far enough to take Moose Jaw in, then we had to start all over again on the whole adjustment of populations in order to meet the situation. But by taking Weyburn, and the area up to within six miles or ten miles of Moose Jaw, in the constituency of Assiniboia we had a population of somewhere between 48,000 and 50,000 people: in other words, the population which was required in order to meet the condition that we have 50,000 in constituencies where there are small cities was satisfied.

We had Weyburn within that constituency. That, too, removed another complication. If we had done it in any other way, and provided for a constituency in the south central part of the province of Saskatchewan, we would have to go far enough north to take in Moose Jaw. If we had done that we would have been accused immediately of wiping out a C.C.F. seat. It is all very well to be accused of putting the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Moose Jaw in the same constituency, but to have put the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Moose Jaw in the same constituency would have meant wiping out one of those members, and saying that he had no constituency in which one or other could run. Well, I can imagine what would have been said in the house if we had done that.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend says "hear, hear". There was only one thing to do so far as that matter was concerned, if you were not going to place them in that position, and that was to move around in some other way in order to get adjustments.

I have pointed out to you that we could move only as we did move around from the southeast corner until we got up to Moose Jaw; we could not move the boundary line of Yorkton to take in population, and therefore we left the line just about where it was.

This all brings me into the northern seats that the hon. member for Melfort has said have too much population. I agree with him that if there was nothing else to be considered, and nothing else that should have been considered, his criticism is a reasonable and legitimate one. There are 48,000 people in the constituency of Mackenzie. There are about 52,000 people in the constituency of Humboldt-Melfort as it is drafted.

Mr. Wright: There are 49,600 in Mackenzie, and 53,500 in Humboldt-Melfort.

Mr. Gardiner: There are over 50,000 in one, and over 48,000 in the other. When you get the figures adjusted I think you will find they are just about as stated. But anyway, it is within reasonable distance of the 50,000 in the one case. Then, when you go over to the constituency of Rosthern it is 48,000. There are still a few to be added to that. Then when you get into Prince Albert it is 56,000 and a few. I quite agree that these constituencies of Prince Albert, Rosthern, Humboldt-Melfort and Mackenzie are higher than they would be if you could adjust the whole thing to meet the situation exactly over the whole province; and they are perhaps high on an average by about 2,000 or 3,000 per constituency.

Well, we examined into every possible way of adjusting them differently from what they are without interfering with the other things I have spoken of. We had to take three members out. We had taken one Liberal in the south. We had to start somewhere in the centre in order to get rid of two more. And we tried to do it without, with our pencils, driving people out of this house. There was only one way of being able to do that without driving people out of this house, and that was to have at least two constituencies in which members would have the right to refer the matter to the people in the area rather than for a committee of this house to sit down and draw a line around a particular area and say: This person is out; he has no convention to go to. We did not do it in that way. We looked the whole area over and proposed to the house what has been proposed.

In so far as Humboldt-Melfort is concerned, I understand that, apart from saying the population is a little high, the hon. member had only one proposal to make, namely, that four townships up in the northeast corner of the constituency be moved out of his seat over into the other. It has been suggested that it is in the constituency only because of one reason. It is in the constituency only because when the line was being drawn and came up to a certain point it came head on into a railroad, and all of the railroad south of there is in the constituency of Mackenzie. Then, if you drew the line straight on north, it would cut across that railroad again about ten miles farther north, and it would cut out two towns, New Osgoode and one other over into the constituency of Humboldt-Melfort, and leave the territory which is tributary to those towns over in the constituency of Mackenzie.

Well, all that was done on that map was to run a line across six miles of the southern boundary of the township, and run it 24 miles north to give the boundary of the other constituency. And that not only put the whole railway with all the towns on the railway into the one constituency, and all the territory tributary to the towns into the one constituency, but when you go up to the north end there is another railway which comes to an end in the corner of that constituency just over the boundary line. And instead of leaving the spur sticking out there, a spur that had no relation to any other area, that spur is also still in the constituency of Humboldt-Melfort.

Now, that is the only reason it is there, and I think it is a good reason. I repeat that the only amendment I know of that was moved by the hon. member, who is a member of the committee, was that those four townships be put over into the other seat. I do not know that there is any very good reason for doing it. I still think it would be a bad thing for people in that area, no matter how they are going to vote or whom they are going to vote for, to be put in a position where they are not properly related to the railways and towns in the area where they live.

I do not know whether that reason satisfies those who think the population up in the north is greater in those constituencies than it should be. But it is the only way that was found for adjusting the position in relation to what we must do down south. It provided a seat in which two members now in the house may run.

That brings me back to the constituency of Lake Centre. We have a number of constituencies right up through the central part of the province on the map as it is now drawn. They were Assiniboia, with 39,917 people in it before the new map was drawn; Moose Jaw, the third largest city in Saskatchewan, with only 42,000 people in it. I will read the round figures. Then we had Lake Centre with 36,000 in it. Then we had Rosthern with 34,000 in it. Then we had Regina with 66,000.

Now, that is Regina as it was under the census of 1941, and as it is on the map now as a constituency—66,000. Then we had the old constituency of Saskatoon with 58,000. But that constituency had considerable rural area in it. Then there is Prince Albert with 46,936.

One has only to read those figures in order to realize that, apart from Regina and Saskatoon, every constituency in that area is away below its unit of population—every constituency. There was not any way of taking Regina out. There was not any way of ignoring the fact that Saskatoon was there. And so what was done was to take the population in the constituency of Regina, as it was before, and the population in the constituency of Saskatoon, as it is anticipated in the present schedule, add them together and subtract that from the population of Saskatchewan, as I indicated, in order to take the first step in making the adjustment. Then the next step was to take the six city seats and adjust them up to around 50,000.

Now, Moose Jaw was one of those city seats—the largest city, apart from Regina and Saskatoon. Prince Albert is another. It is the fourth largest city—much larger than any of the other smaller cities. And so I think it would have been fair under any circumstances to have had Prince Albert a little above the 50,000. But I still admit that 56,000 is pretty high for Prince Albert. And I still admit that some of the other constituencies—for example, let us take The Battlefords with 48,000—are a little low. When you compare The Battlefords with Moose Jaw, the population of Moose Jaw being 53,000 and that of The Battlefords 48,000, that is the position it results in, an adjustment of city and rural seats. Averaging the two you are not far away from what we are driving at when we try to make an adjustment which will be satisfactory.

Now, coming back to the situation so far as Lake Centre is concerned: There were not very many people left, no matter how you looked at it, to provide for one rural constituency. The best you could find is 20,000 people; and if you were going to leave Rosetown-Biggar with the 44,500, which is the average, and if you were going to leave the two constituencies on the east side, one with 43,500 and the other with approximately 50,000, then there were only 20,000 rural people in the area that was left in Lake Centre. There was only one way of getting sufficient population to take care of a situation of that kind, and that was to take some of the city population along with the rural area.

There are 26,000 people in Moose Jaw. That 26,000 plus 20,000 would have been only 46,000, with the third largest city in the province in the constituency. The northern part of the city of Regina outside the city limits, as they were in 1941, had already been in Moose Jaw, over to the main road that comes in from the north. The other small corner of the city on the east side had been, since 1933, in the constituency of Qu'Appelle.

That seems to be the one question which has been uppermost in the minds of hon. members of the committee. They say: Why could that not have been left in Regina? There are several reasons, the first of which is the fact that it was not in Regina before. Then there is the further fact that population had to be found in order to have a constituency in that area with a reasonable population. If you were going to have city population in it, 30,000 city people plus 20,000 rural people is not a bad combination in a province such as Saskatchewan.

With all due respect to those who have been discussing the question, I would point this out, that there is not a single person in any of the groups on the other side of the house who has said that the committee, either acting as three from the Liberal side of the house or acting with three from the other side of the house, has tried to gerrymander those two seats so that Liberals could win. There is no one who has suggested that the Liberal party could win Rosetown-Biggar. There is no one who has even suggested that a Liberal could win Moose Jaw-Lake Centre—and I am not suggesting they could either.

An hon. Member: Who will, then?

Mr. Gardiner: I will try to get the Liberals to win, if possible; but I am not saying that they can win, any more than hon. members on the other side of the house have been saying it. As a matter of fact Saskatchewan is in some respects a peculiar province. We have always been voting Liberal up until quite recently. We still voted almost as strongly Liberal three or four weeks ago as we ever voted in our history. Still we did not elect as many people as we thought we might.

There is another peculiarity about Saskatchewan, and this will be confirmed by the records. We never did have a Liberal representing Rosetown-Biggar in this house, either as it is constituted at the present time or as it was constituted when it was called Saskatoon county. It was represented by John Evans for some years, and when it was taken away from Mr. Evans it was taken by a Conservative, Mr. Loucks. It is the strongest Conservative section in the province of Saskatchewan; there is no question about that. It has been represented by Conservatives in the local house; it has been represented by Conservatives in the federal house; it has never been represented by Liberals in the federal house.

Then coming to the constituency that has been known as Lake Centre. The Conservatives set it up in its present form, but before that Long lake was on the west side of Long Lake constituency and it was represented in this house by Dr. Cowan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One parliament, that is all.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, represented by Dr. Cowan for one parliament. Peculiarly that was one parliament during which the Conservatives were winning across the Dominion of Canada. It was not considered a bad thing to have eight members from the province of Saskatchewan when they were winning across Canada. They had one out of Long Lake; they had one out of what is now Rosetown-Biggar; they had one out of Saskatoon; they had one out of Moose Jaw and they had one out of Melfort. That is, from a district running angleways down from the north into that central group of constituencies, practically all these seats coming within that group, are seats right in the middle of Saskatchewan—I should have said they had one from Regina, one from Qu'Appelle, and one from Battleford, which is angling out in two other directions. In other words, if there is any Tory stronghold in Saskatchewan, that is it, centring right around Outlook and from there east and west.

There were a great many reasons for that. I am not going to recite them here because I do not want to give information to the Tory party. As I say, there were a lot of reasons as to why it was that way. All one has to do is to examine the records to find out that what I am stating is correct.

There is another thing to consider. The province of Saskatchewan has voted on a few occasions. In 1929 we had 170,000 Liberal votes in Saskatchewan, and there were 134,000 Conservative votes. That was the vote for the Conservative party under the leadership of Dr. Anderson as late as 1929. That is about the way the province of Saskatchewan had divided itself in politics from the time it was formed in 1905 down to that period. The only reason why we were defeated on that occasion was that the Independents and Progressives joined with the Conservatives and afterwards formed a coalition government.

Mr. Coldwell: Led by Mr. Carl Stewart.

Mr. Gardiner: Not led by Mr. Carl Stewart, but he was in it. Then we had another vote in 1934 on which occasion there were 206,000 Liberal votes and 117,614 votes for the government of Mr. Anderson who was the leader of the Conservative party. There was a farm-labour vote of 100,256, the Farm-Labour party afterward becoming the C.C.F. Then there was a small independent vote of 5,421. That was 1934.

The next leader of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan following Dr. Anderson was the present member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Mutch: That was the end of it.

Mr. Gardiner: There was a Conservative vote of 117,000 at that time. The hon. member for Rosthern said this morning that if all the Conservatives that voted in the last provincial election had voted in one constituency they would not elect a Conservative. In other words, there were about 8,000 of them. Of course one can take these figures from Hansard and put them together in different ways and reach different conclusions; but one conclusion will be that there were not very many Conservatives who had a chance to vote in the last election. If they had had a chance to vote the results would have been quite different in a number of constituencies and we would be in a better position today to be quoting majorities.

The hon. member for Lake Centre has been quoting the votes in different polls in the recent election in the province of Saskatchewan. I agree with him that they do not mean much in certain areas. It is still possible to elect Conservatives in the province of Saskatchewan despite what some people think, but there are certain ways of doing it and certain ways of seeing that it is not done. I do not know of anyone who is working to see that it is not done except the Conservatives themselves in the way they are not keeping their organization alive and not nominating candidates when elections come around. How in the world can anybody vote Conservative when he has not a candidate to vote for? If you have no candidate to vote for you just cannot vote at all. You can vote without a leader, but not without a candidate.

That has been the situation and I do not think it is going to help by quoting votes in different polls under the circumstances that have existed during the last two or three elections. I should like to direct attention to the fact that in our last vote we were not very far from the peak vote we had in Saskatchewan of 206,000. Therefore we are back pretty nearly to where we were in 1929 when there was an arrangement made under which the opposition did not run any two candidates against one another and in which they finished on top.

If I was looking for an opportunity to advise our friends of the Conservative party I would call their attention to their own representations. No one on the other side of the house has said one word about the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar, which is a Conservative constituency, being so organized as to favour a Liberal. No one has raised the question as to whether we were trying to take the Lake Centre constituency away from the member for Lake Centre. It is obvious to the member for Lake Centre, it is obvious to the C.C.F., it is obvious to everyone else that if we had been trying to do that we would have done something very different from what is indicated on this map.

Mr. Coldwell: When the minister says that Rosetown-Biggar is a Conservative constituency has he forgotten that in 1921 there was a Progressive, Mr. Evans; in 1925 there was a Progressive, Mr. Evans; in 1926 there was a Liberal-Progressive, Mr. Evans? It was only for a short period that there was Mr. Loucks.

Mr. Gardiner: I still say it is Conservative, and I have campaigned in every poll in it and have organized many of the polls.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, I know.

Mr. Gardiner: I still say it is Conservative, and I am quite satisfied that if some of us were organizing for the Conservatives we could elect Conservatives there too. The vote in that constituency is naturally a Conservative vote, and there are reasons for that which do not need to be explained. All I am suggesting is we have not done anything to try to take a seat away from somebody. We have simply said that we have got to get rid of three members somehow because we have three fewer seats. We have got twenty members now and there can only be seventeen seats. We said we were not going to draw a line around any seat except that of one Liberal. We took away the Liberal seat but we said we were not going to draw a line around any other seat and take it away from either a C.C.F.'er or a Conservative. We said that we would recommend the lines to be drawn in such a way that the people in the constituencies could settle the matter. I do not know what my C.C.F. friends have in mind to do with some of their candidates. I only know that on occasions gone by they have read some of them out of the party. I hope they are not going to do that on this occasion because we did not read any of them out of their party or out of this house.

I am quite satisfied to accept the statements made across the floor of the house that there are two good men in the constituencies of Moose Jaw and Lake Centre who now represent those seats in the house, and I would not be at all surprised if either one or the other could be elected in Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I would not be at all surprised either if one of them went home and could be elected elsewhere. But when a member comes down into the middle of the strongest Tory section in Saskatchewan and wishes to take all the Tories into his constituency so he can be sure of being elected, I say to him if that is what the Conservative party wants they are decidedly on their way out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has been dealing with Lake Centre as a Conservative riding with the same freedom that he dealt with Rosetown-Biggar. Is it not a fact that the only Conservative apart from myself ever elected since 1921—go back to 1917 if you like—in either Long Lake or Last Mountain constituencies, or the constituency of Lake Centre since it was established, was Dr. Cowan. All the rest were either Liberals or Progressives.

Mr. Gardiner: I would say that Dr. Cowan was elected to the house, and I have got something more to say about that. A further examination of the records will indicate, however, that one of the reasons for that in most instances was that the Conservatives did not run a candidate. You have got to examine a little further in order to find out who was elected and who was not. A Liberal was not elected in a great number of instances because of an arrangement entered into. But now that I am questioned about it I do want to say that the first time I ever met my hon. friend was at a meeting right in the area he has been talking about today. I spoke at Elbow in 1928 and my hon. friend turned up and asked for the right to speak at the same meeting. I had never seen him before although I had heard of him because he used to be a Liberal. I had heard of him as the secretary of the Liberal party in a certain place. But on this occasion in 1928 he turned up, and I am not going into details as to what the 1928 election meant in the constituency of Arm River. I am going to suggest, however, that was my first experience in meeting him. I campaigned every poll in that constituency on that occasion. I canvassed most of the people and we succeeded in winning the election by fifty-eight votes. If anybody wants to tell me that is not a Conservative seat let me say that I know Saskatchewan well enough to know that it is.

I know Saskatchewan well enough to be able to say that I think very fair treatment has been accorded to the Conservatives in the province in so far as the drafting of the new constituencies is concerned. We have not attempted to make any change in the two seats which we were under obligation, as I said at the beginning, to draw up in such a way as to give consideration to two members. We were given two extra seats and we were expected to deal with them fairly. We think we did. So far as the other seats are concerned, not a single member has asked for any change in his own seat except the hon. member for Melfort and he only asked that four townships be moved into another constituency. I doubt if there is any other province in Canada where as good a job has been done, and I rather resent people getting up and saying that the committee made a miserable job of it or that they did something which was detrimental to some person, group or party. We do not think they did any such thing, and I am quite satisfied that if anyone will sit down and examine the map of Saskatchewan, and take into consideration the facts as I have outlined them, they will agree that the presentation of the province of Saskatchewan to this committee is just as good as has been made by any other province, and in addition it is just as good as could have been made by any kind of commission that you might appoint.

I want to add one other thing. I have been in politics for thirty-eight years as of the 25th of last month, the day I thought I was going to be able to go home from this session. I have run in most of the elections that have come along since then and when I did not run in them myself I helped somebody else to do so. I have not missed any of them, and that means that there have only been three years since 1911 that I have not gone through an election campaign. Therefore I am not asking anybody to pass on information to me as to what happens in elections. I know pretty well what happens in elections. I also want to say that I have never once complained about how my constituency was drawn up, no matter who drew it up. I represented a seat in the Saskatchewan house for twenty-two and a half years or twenty-five sessions, and the only time my constituency was ever changed was during the period when the hon. member for Lake Centre was high in the councils of the Conservative party in the province of Saskatchewan.

Do you know what they did to me then? They took one of my best friends, who was one of my best helpers in the province of Saskatchewan and put him in my seat. That is the first thing they did. In doing that they added to my constituency what they thought was 400 of a majority against me. They thought they would trim me by doing that. In the next election I succeeded in getting a majority of 1,500 in the part they had added on and had a majority of 3,000 whereas before my majority was something over 1,000. I say that in order to give a little advice to young members of the house. I do not think you get anywhere kicking about the seat you have got.

Mr. Mutch: "Crying" is the word.

Mr. Gardiner: Somebody says that "crying" is the word. I might also say that we had —I was going to say "gerrymander" but I do not like that word; I do not even like "jimmymander"—a redistribution of seats in 1933 but it was not by the Liberals. I accept everything that the opposition has said to the effect that it would make no difference what party you had here or what government you had here they would do it just the same as this is being done. You know what happened after it was done by the Conservatives in 1933. We won almost as large a proportion of seats as we have now—almost as large a proportion of them; and the constituency which I represent now Mr. Motherwell represented. He won by a majority of 4,500—just a little less than I won it by the last time. After they had changed it and added on to it what they thought would give him some trouble he won the constituency. I have seen in the press recently a statement that is absolutely wrong, to the effect that they gerrymandered Mr. Motherwell out of this house. They did not do any such thing. Mr. Motherwell won the next election by 4,500. He was not gerrymandered out of anything, no matter what they tried to do.

We won most of the constituencies—16 out of 21 in Saskatchewan—on the Conservative redistribution. I am quite sure that if they were to make the redistribution now we would win more constituencies than we will after having made it ourselves—the reason being that you do not satisfy very many people when you are making a redistribution and those that you do satisfy never mention it any more. The only people who mention redistribution are those who do not like it, and they keep talking about it.

As far as I am concerned I would rather see the other fellows make the redistribution than make it ourselves; and for that reason this is the first time I ever made a speech in this house on redistribution. I would not be making one now if it were not for the fact that so many misrepresentations have been made with regard to Saskatchewan.

I take the boundaries of the seat I run in as they are handed to me and I go out and try to win the votes of the people living in the constituency. I am not very much worried whether there are 50,000 or 30,000 or 40,000. I do not know which I prefer to have; but nevertheless I think when you are drafting constituencies of a province it ought to be done just as fairly as you can do it.

You know, I am going to say one thing which perhaps my friends think I should not say, but I am not so sure about that. I think it is reasonable to say it anyway. I have been in this house for seventeen years and there are two men I have marvelled at in that seventeen years. One of them was the last member for Haldimand and the other is the present member for Haldimand. I have said to people on this side of the house that there must be a lot of good people living in Haldimand because I do not know where you could get two better Grits, let alone two better Tories, than those men—as far as their relationships with the rest of us are concerned. Mr. Senn was the agricultural critic here for many years and he criticized our activities. Nevertheless, he was always fair and I found the same thing with regard to his successor. I regret, of course, that changes have taken place which make it necessary to have the representation of that area changed. I think everyone will agree that when you get down to a position where you have only half of the population you ought to have some change has got to be made.

The man who taught me to be a Liberal was the editor of the old paper up in Seaforth the Huron Expositor. His grandson is here a member. I used to read the old Huron Expositor as it was the only paper we could afford to have around on the farm. The editor was a good Grit and his editorials were all Liberal. I read them very carefully every week and they had an influence on me. I naturally regret that in this adjustment that is being made something has to be done with that constituency which some may not like. The two members in question made about as reasonable speeches in this discussion as we have heard in this house.

I want to say that after all I do not think we are going to do very much good to ourselves or to the country by getting up and shouting that all these things we have been doing ever since confederation have been wrong. I do not think they have been wrong. I think we are doing it just about as well as it can be done and I have sufficient faith in the members of this house to think that none of them are ciphers. The suggestion was made that we have on committees men who are ciphers. But I do not think you can pick a cipher out of this house. There is no such thing here. We have members who can sit on committees and perform their duties in the manner in which members should and they take the responsibility for drafting constituencies in different provinces. Personally I think they have done as good a job as could have been done by a commission or any other kind of organization.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that whatever else we may think of this speech we have just listened to we will all agree that it was very interesting and very disarming. I think we have to be on our guard unless we be entirely disarmed by it.

I perhaps might point out, in case any suggestion is made later on that we took up too much of the time of the house on this matter, that the minister—and I am not complaining because I found him interesting —took nearly an hour and a half. I am rather glad that he did, but at any rate I mention that just in passing.

Now, as far as I am concerned I was not a member of the committee and I am not one of those butchered to make a Roman holiday this time, so I can speak with a certain amount of detachment. Notwithstanding all that the Minister of Agriculture has said I am wondering whether there are any other people in this house who have had the experience I have had of feeling that what has been happening in the last three or four days is the best argument that could possibly be made for trying some other system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me give you one small illustration. However dark views we may have from time to time of the Minister of Agriculture, and notwithstanding that I was interested in his speech as I have said, it seems to me a pity that the Minister of Agriculture has to be spending an hour and a half on this kind of thing when there are many other duties that would call him.

Now just for a moment or two I want to review some of the things which have been said and to which as far as I can see no answer has been given or no attempt to answer has been made; because to me that is one of the interesting things in the debate. We seem to have got lost in the multitude of detail which I suppose was inevitable. But as far as my recollection goes there has been no attempt of any kind on the part of the government to answer the general argument made by the leader of the opposition and supported by others that this is a bad system and that we should try another system. I am going to refer to very few figures but I want to refer to one figure which I think has not been questioned and which was given by the member for Winnipeg North Centre when he pointed out that now in Manitoba the disparity between rural and urban seats has increased to 75 per cent. If I remember rightly the hon. member quoted the hon. member for Quebec South as saying that he thought 25 per cent was the right figure. The member for Winnipeg North Centre himself said that he would have been prepared to settle for 33⅓ per cent; the disparity previous to this redistribution had I think been 46 per cent, and he pointed out that it would now be 75 per cent. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that anyone in this house will say that makes sense. If that is the best that can be done by these men after weeks of work in respect of one province then it seems to me that prima facie the system is not sound.

Now, I am glad that the Minister of Agriculture swept away one argument which is so tiresome and which the leader of the opposition did his best to remove at the outset. The Minister of Agriculture said that this was not done by one party more than the other. There has been nothing suggested to the effect that anyone is trying to establish a monopoly on virtue. All we are saying is that this is a stupid method and that we should try another method.

If we take another method we are not taking a pig in a poke. I understand, and my information is, this has been used in England. While it is true, as one of my colleagues on the right said last night, that when the report is made it must come back to the house, nevertheless I am told that the report of the commission has been accepted and followed in the British House of Commons.

I want to say a word here about the answers which have been given to some of the arguments made on this side. As to the hon. member for Ottawa West, I think he has had a most difficult job. I sympathize with him in it. I am prepared to believe that he has worked at this job extremely hard and has tried to produce a good result. But it is not possible to produce a good result under the circumstances.

Last Saturday I said something that afterward I thought might have been a little bit extreme. I said that we had 262—or whatever the number is—members with vested interests. What has happened since then makes me feel that statement was not an exaggerated one. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar used a phrase which I have forgotten, but he quoted somebody as saying that we carried through the redistribution as looking in the faces of our friends, or something of that kind. You cannot get away from that fact; and to me it is one of the great evils.

I noticed that the hon. member for Ottawa West, in answering the hon. member for Eglinton, properly pointed out certain changes which had been made in Ontario which on the face of it seemed to be reasonable. Certainly they gave evidence that in these cases they were trying to deal with things in a common-sense way but he virtually made no reply—because I do not think any reply could be made—to the criticisms made by the hon. member for Eglinton with regard to what has been done in other cases; and, may I say, done—and I say this sincerely—in spite of what I am sure was a genuine desire to work out the situation in a workmanlike way.

I come now to the answer given by the Minister of National Revenue which interested me greatly. I think, perhaps not quite intentionally, he helped the hon. member for Eglinton to underline the argument he had made, because the hon. member for Eglinton as reported at page 3979 of Hansard explained that the population in the minister's riding of Renfrew South had increased by some 2,000, or six townships, and the minister on a question of privilege raised the point that one of those townships had a population of only 16. I have no doubt that is entirely right, and it was a pleasant endorsement of what the hon. member for Eglinton was saying or arguing, namely that the change which had been made was practically no change at all in population.

I want to repeat that no answer has been given; and I suggest that we are getting that kind of thing often. The government does not believe in arguments. It believes in votes. I suggest that we are now getting to the undemocratic situation that members just vote and do not feel that they need to justify what they are doing. I now want to refer again—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Will my hon. friend permit a question at this point?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The hon. member referred to the constituency of my colleague. I was wondering whether he was going to offer a suggestion with respect to that constituency, as to what he would do.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not hear the question.

Mr. McCann: What would you do about Renfrew South?

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not making detailed suggestions. I was not on the committee. I explained that I am not going into details. I am here making a general argument as to the principle.

Mr. McCann: There is no principle there at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are plenty of people here who will be prepared to answer the minister's question; but it would be foolish for me to try to answer it because I was not on the committee. I am just referring to the fact that the hon. member pointed out that the addition to the minister's population was trivial, namely about 2,000, and that the minister helped the argument on by saying that in one of the six townships the population was 16.

Mr. McCann: I rise on a matter of privilege in order to make a correction. The argument that was being made by the hon. member for Eglinton was as to the number of townships. He was basing it on townships and not on population. I sought to correct him.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will read what the hon. member for Eglinton said.

Mr. McCann: I sought to correct him by pointing out what was the fact, namely that one of the townships according to the census has only 16 people in it; it is a barren township.

Mr. Fleming: I rise on a question of privilege. The minister is completely mistaken. I was not basing my argument on townships at all. I was dealing with the population of areas.

Mr. McCann: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming: The minister was too stupid to take it in; that was all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will settle the matter. I will read what the hon. member for Eglinton said.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, will you kindly ask the hon. member for Eglinton to withdraw the word "stupid" as used in reference to me? I respectfully suggest that it does not apply.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Eglinton never tells a lie.

Mr. McCann: I ask that the word be withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton will be glad to withdraw it if he used such a word.

Mr. McIlraith: He used it.

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry, but I did not hear the chairman's remark.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member heard it.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister asserts that the hon. member for Eglinton used the word "stupid" in reference to him. I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton will agree that the word should be withdrawn if it were used.

Mr. Fleming: According to my understanding, Mr. Chairman, the word "stupid" is not unparliamentary. It has been used in the house quite often in my hearing.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I can add that I am sure I have been called stupid.

Mr. McCann: Perhaps the cap fitted.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If it would help to soothe the feelings of the Minister of National Revenue, who is a fellow graduate of Queen's university, I may tell him that the hon. member for Eglinton regards all us Queen's men as stupid.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, on a matter of privilege, I demand that the word "stupid" as applied to me be withdrawn.

Mr. Hees: Oh, don't be a stuffed shirt as well as being stupid.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member can't buck me down. He is a big man but he is not big enough for that.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister asking me to withdraw, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor on a matter of privilege. The hon. member for Eglinton—

Mr. Hees: Take it easy.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hees: Take a run at it.

Mr. McCann: In referring to me, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Eglinton said I was too stupid to understand. I demand that that remark be withdrawn. As to the hon. member who has spoken last—I refer to the hon. member for Greenwood—with reference to members of the house being all called stupid, may I say that if the cap fits, let them put it on; but it does not fit me.

An hon. Member: Wear it anyway.

The Deputy Chairman: In view of the remarks made by the minister, I feel that the hon. member for Eglinton should withdraw the word "stupid".

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, if I had used an unparliamentary term, I should be the first one to withdraw it; but I did not use an unparliamentary term. The word "stupid" is not unparliamentary. It has been used in this chamber many times as applied to members of the house. I may say that I used the word with some care.

Mr. Hees: After great consideration.

Mr. Gardiner: I would say that if the hon. member does not withdraw it, he ought to apply it to himself.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I deliberately refrained from using an unparliamentary term.

Mr. Gardiner: Withdraw it anyway.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege may I say that I have heard the word "stupid" used in connection with stupid remarks, but I do not recall any hon. member referring to another hon. member as stupid.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I always like to make a contribution to peace and harmony in the House of Commons; and if it will assuage the injured feelings of the Minister of National Revenue, for what I said I will substitute the statement that the minister made a very stupid remark.

Mr. Hees: We will all agree to that.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a matter of privilege. That is not a withdrawal. I demand a withdrawal of the word which the hon. member admits that he used with reference to me.

An hon. Member: Might is right.

The Deputy Chairman: As I apprehend the situation, the hon. member for Eglinton has withdrawn the word "stupid" as applied directly to the Minister of National Revenue. He has amended that and said that there was a stupid remark. I think the withdrawal was complete in so far as any personal reference to the minister was concerned.

While I am on my feet may I draw to the attention of the members of the committee the fact that members are rising ostensibly on questions of privilege which I do not believe to be valid questions of privilege. I think the work of the committee would be expedited if only valid questions of privilege were raised. In some instances during the course of this debate, both yesterday and today, members have risen ostensibly on questions of privilege that the Chair felt might possibly be either the refutation of argument or the delivery of a counter-argument. I would ask hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and rise on questions of privilege only on the proper occasions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, an awfully long time ago that I was speaking.

Mr. Hees: Start it again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I almost feel like starting it again, but I will not. I had just got to the point where I wanted to refer to statements made about this practice we are following and from here on I am going to try to be serious. I hope I will be allowed to be.

There are three or four comments which were made by the hon. member for Quebec South that I want to read. They are very brief, and as I read each of them I want hon. members of this committee to ask themselves whether or not what he says is correct. If what he says is correct then all I can say is that we should be ready to change this method. First of all I read his general comment from page 1808 of Hansard of 1939. He refers to what he calls:

> . . . the procedure whereby every ten years or so this house is made the theatre of a somewhat unseemly, undignified and utterly confusing scramble for personal or political advantage.

Now, Mr. Chairman, either that is a clear description of what goes on, or it is not. I suggest that notwithstanding the disarming speech of the Minister of Agriculture that we listened to, there is, and is bound to be, a very considerable amount of truth in this remark made by the hon. member for Quebec South years ago. Later on he speaks about what he calls the law of the jungle, and he uses the phrase "might is right". I do not think anyone can doubt that even what I called the disarming speech of the Minister of Agriculture made perfectly clear that that is true; and therefore I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether it is reasonable, whether we as responsible people should be prepared to continue a method which is characterized in the way I have read, and I think fairly characterized.

We have been debating this now for three days. I do not know how much longer it is going to go on. I will not add much to it, but it will go on. As a matter of fact, when you come to think of it, Mr. Chairman, we are in a rather ridiculous position. There is no principle at all that we are following. I cannot find that there is any principle. The only principles that are mentioned have been ignored.

We had the old slogan of "representation by population" which is supposed to be the basis. We all recognize that there has to be some qualification of that, but how much qualification nobody knows. And so we get those fantastic results which have been pointed out. It is suggested there is give and take but as was pointed out here this morning, it is usually one side doing the giving and the other side doing the taking.

It occurred to me that it might be of interest to see whether any comment had been made in this country from which this gerrymander comes. I have here an article written by an American some years ago, and I want to quote from it very briefly because I think he describes very clearly what the effect of this is. His point is that it is really an evasion, a setting at naught of the democratic idea that representation should be by population.

That leads me to this point; it leads me to interject this. I hear people say that nobody in the country cares about this; nobody outside this house cares two straws about it.

Mr. McIlraith: Nobody said that at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member is covering quite a lot of territory when he says nobody said this. I am not suggesting he said it, but I have heard it said, and I have heard it said more than once; and my comment on it is that at the moment it may be true. There may not be very much interest in this throughout the country, but I believe that when people find out what has been happening there will be interest in the country. There will be great interest in Haldimand when they find out what has happened here, and I might mention other places, too. But I want to read now briefly from this statement which is found in the book entitled "American Political Science Review of 1918", which is a long time ago:

> The gerrymander is an American name for a political abuse, which, though by no means exclusively American, has been most widely practised and generally tolerated in this country. It is a device for the partial suppression of public opinion—

That I believe is worth thinking about; I believe it is true. I continue:

> It is a device for the partial suppression of public opinion that simulates agreements with democratic institutions.

And further he says:

> It is solely the accident of numerical superiority that determines which party is the offender and which the victim.

I think we can all say "amen" to that. I just wanted to raise these points. I imagine there will be more in this house who will agree with that than would like to say so. I can well imagine that some of those who have been occupied for some weeks in trying to work things out might be among the first, if they felt free to do so, to say: Let us get some other plan.

As I said earlier, if we adopt the commission plan we are not taking something that is untried; we are taking something that has been tried elsewhere and is working, and I do not think any man in this house will say that he is satisfied with the present plan.

Mr. Bruneau: I should like at this time to congratulate those who sat on the redistribution committee for a job well done. As regards our two ridings in eastern Ontario, one of them, Glengarry, with a population of about 17,000 and Prescott, with a population edging 27,000, not much more could be done than to have a merger; and no happier marriage could have been thought of than to unite the two historic counties of Glengarry and Prescott.

As early as the year 1880, during the third parliament of confederation, the counties of Glengarry and Prescott were united through an act of parliament; and I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the people I now have the honour to represent in this house welcome to their fold those of Glengarry, and I know that as much can be said for the population of the neighbouring riding now belonging to the new electoral district.

Two great nationalities have lived together in harmony since the beginning of our political history. Those of Scottish origin and people of French extraction have always lived happily together and have also, to use a French expression, "fait bon ménage" with the Irish and English-speaking people.

The very word Glengarry calls up visions of chivalrous chieftains in waving tartans and plumed bonnets. It was after the suppression of the Jacobite rebellion of 1745 that the highlanders of old Glengarry in Scotland first emigrated to America settling, at the invitation of Sir William Johnson, in the Mohawk valley. It was a beautiful and fruitful land, but not for long did the highlanders give themselves to the quiet cultivation of their farms and orchards. The revolutionary storm was brewing when they arrived, and when it broke many of the Gaelic clansmen took up arms to strike for the king.

The war ended, and many of the highlanders settled in what are now the three counties of Glengarry, Stormont and Dundas. The government land agent allotted lands to them by letting them draw some numbered slips of paper shaken together in a hat. Amongst the newcomers were a number of highland gentlemen who had held commissions in the Royal Highland Emigrants and other regiments, and the half-pay received by these ex-officers was for some years the first source of the very limited supply of cash which circulated in the settlements.

Sir John Johnson, who had lost an enormous amount of property, received some land in Glengarry. He built a mill at Williamstown, named after his father, and later presented to the people twelve acres for fair grounds which are still in use under the name of the Glengarry agricultural grounds.

In the first parliament of Upper Canada, two Macdonell brothers sat for Glengarry and one of them was elected Speaker. The famous Glengarry Regiment of Light Infantry which so distinguished itself through the war of 1812 was raised chiefly through the exertions of the two other men of that name; and a Macdonell shared the fate and the glory of Brock in the battle of Queenston Heights. Yet another Macdonell, a priest, Alexander, came from Inverness in 1786 with almost his whole parish of about 500 souls, to found in the new Glengarry St. Raphael's, the pioneer parish of his communion in Upper Canada. Here he built the first Roman Catholic church known as the blue chapel upon the site of which another priest of the same name, who became the first Roman Catholic bishop in Upper Canada, erected a large and handsome church.

Later, when war with the United States was threatening, the future bishop, actuated by patriotic motives, was more active in rousing and recruiting the Glengarries. But by no means were his energies devoted to military affairs. As a missionary the sphere of his labours extended over a great part of Upper Canada. For instance, immediately after his arrival in this country he made it his business to obtain legal patents for the lands held by the highlanders. The "man from Glengarry" had the reputation of being strong and forceful and it is said that the history of the county is a proud record of most valuable services rendered to the county in early times when the men of that county made its name famous in war and peace.

Prescott county, set apart in 1798 and named after the governor of Canada who succeeded Lord Dorchester, has special links with the French regime. There is a tradition that the rude little fort at the foot of the Long Sault rapids on the Ottawa, where Dollard des Ormeaux, with his sixteen heroic Frenchmen, made his stand against the Iroquois, was at Greece's Point in Hawkesbury township.

The township of Longueuil represents one of the very few grants made during the French regime, on the feudal system, within the limits of what is now Ontario. On a map of 1828 it was marked as the seigniory of Pointe à l'Orignal. It was owned by descendants of Charles Le Moyne, elder brother of the famous d'Iberville, but in 1796 was sold to an American named Treadwell who opened it to emigrants.

Both United Empire Loyalists and Americans who sympathized with the other side in the struggle with Britain were numerous among the Prescott pioneers. Settlers of French origin cultivated the low-lying lands and also helped to build up the county. During the war of 1812, at which period the county was grouped with its southern neighbour Glengarry for parliamentary representation, Prescott men of both races fought for England.

In 1805 a mill was erected in Hawkesbury which was bought three years afterward by three brothers named Hamilton. One has since become a senator and another was in succession bishop of Niagara and of Ottawa.

The parish of Hawkesbury originally included the whole of Prescott county, but in 1869 the two parishes of Vankleek Hill and Plantagenet were set off from it. L'Orignal, the French word for moose, is still the county seat. Formerly most of its inhabitants were English but the great majority are now French. It is an historic little village, on the shore of the Ottawa river. At first the court sat in a schoolhouse, and a private house, generally the sheriff's, was used for a jail.

To have been a member of the first Canadian parliament and represented the riding of Prescott in the Commons under the premierships of Sir John A. Macdonald, 1867-1873, and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, 1873-1878, was the distinction of Mr. Albert Hagar. When the first session of the new federal parliament opened on November 8, 1867, Mr. Hagar was 40 years of age. He was also in the Commons chamber on the tragically memorable night of April 6, 1868, when Hon. Thomas D'Arcy McGee, famous Irish orator, writer, patriot and statesman, made his last speech a few hours before he fell victim to an assassin's bullet. It was a dramatic incident in the history of the nascent Canadian nation that Mr. Hagar vividly recalled on occasion when in a reminiscent mood.

Mr. Hagar and Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who was Canada's sixth premier and held that office from 1894 to 1896, were roommates. No railways linked Ottawa and Montreal by direct route in those far-away pioneer days, and the first member for Prescott used to make the forty-mile trip from his home in Plantagenet to the capital to attend to his sessional duties by sleigh in winter and by boat in summer. This trip he would undertake weekly during the session, no matter how severe the weather.

The constituency of Glengarry-Prescott will now constitute a wedge in the whole eastern tip of Ontario bordering the province of Quebec between the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa rivers. This fraternity of people of different denomination and racial origin will, I am sure, as it has in the past, have its bearing on the development of our great country, and will leave its imprint on our national history.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I think it is appropriate that on this Dominion day we should be debating the subject of redistribution in the various provinces of Canada. For a while we heard a discussion respecting Ontario. Then we shifted to the west, where we dealt in some detail with the problem in Saskatchewan. From the hon. member who has just taken his seat we heard a most interesting discussion of the historical background of two of the older constituencies in Ontario.

Then in the course of the debate this afternoon we heard the most optimistic survey I have heard for some time as to the possibilities of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan. I only hope the Minister of Agriculture is as sound in his diagnosis of the position of that party in Saskatchewan as I think he was unsound in his diagnosis of the lines that should be drawn in that province.

For a short time I should like to discuss the situation as it affects one of the most easterly provinces of Canada, the province of Nova Scotia. I do this because some reference has been made to that province and to one or more constituencies during the debate which has progressed during the last two days.

It is a matter of record, to be found by looking at the bill, that the representation of this province is to be reduced at this time. It will be recalled that at one time the province of Nova Scotia had 21 members in this House of Commons, and we are now to lose one of our present members. It is true that we are losing one which we gained, but we will be back to 12 members despite the fact that the census indicates an increase in population of some 64,000 to 66,000. In other words our population has increased more than the quotient which is necessary for the election of a member. However, because of the increase in other parts of Canada it is found necessary to reduce the representation of this province by one member.

I agree with what the Minister of Agriculture said this morning about hon. members welcoming and supporting the formula which prevented a marked reduction in the representation of certain provinces. We supported that; we believed it was necessary and right. But we rather wish that some formula could have been devised which would have prevented the representation of this province, which has suffered such a marked reduction through the years, being still further reduced at this time. This is not because of any decrease in population; it is despite the fact that there has been a substantial increase in the population of the province.

Having made those general remarks, I should like to look for a moment at the redistribution of seats within the province. There are bound to be anomalies in such a distribution. For instance, there is Cape Breton island with a large industrial city, having a population of over 80,000. Then there are rural seats with populations substantially less. I do not think any consideration was given nor should it have been given to a redistribution in that particular area. It is separate and apart from the rest of the province. It has a huge industrial area; and although the populations of other ridings are not in proportion, there are areas there which make redistribution difficult.

Then coming to the mainland we find a tremendous increase in the population of Halifax with no change being made in that riding. This is one of the two dual ridings in Canada. When one realizes the disparity between the populations of these different ridings he can appreciate the argument—in fact it was more than an argument, it was more or less a prophecy that was made by one hon. gentleman—that this is probably the last redistribution we will have by the House of Commons, that within the next decade steps will have been taken to provide the method which has been suggested during this debate and thereby overcome the anomalies which undoubtedly exist.

Let me deal briefly for a moment with ridings apart from those I have mentioned. According to the last census report supplied by the department the smallest riding in the province, the one which I shall deal with first, has a population of 26,212, indicating an increase of only 210 in population during the last decade. The second riding has a population of 26,936 with an increase of 1,700 during the last decade. The largest rural riding in the province, Annapolis-Kings, has a population of 54,930, with an increase of over 8,300 during the last decade. The riding of Annapolis-Kings showed the largest increase of any riding with the exception of the city and county of Halifax. It is one of the two rural ridings in the province which is above the quotient of 54,000 which is needed. That was the situation that existed when the committee came to consider what action should be taken.

A committee was set up which considered these various factors. It was faced with the fact that one seat had to be removed from the province. It was decided that the riding which should be dropped was the second smallest in the province, the one with a population of 26,936. That riding was done away with at the committee meeting. After considering all the factors involved in the situation the committee decided that the constituency of Annapolis-Kings should remain as is and that the population of this riding which was being removed—

Mr. MacNaught: On a question of privilege, I was chairman of the subcommittee of that province and no such agreement was entered into.

Mr. Nowlan: I knew this question of privilege would be raised; I knew there would be an abuse of the question of privilege to which you, Mr. Chairman, objected a little while ago and to which your predecessor had earlier objected. If the hon. gentleman wishes to make a speech in connection with it, it is his privilege to do so. I am giving my word as a member of this house that the definite decision was arrived at in that committee that the constituency of Annapolis-Kings should be left alone. That is supported by other members of the committee who were with me, not only Conservative members but others as well.

Be that as it may, as I said weeks went by and finally the report was shown to me. I then found that the municipality of Digby had been added to Annapolis-Kings. So we arrived at this situation. The smallest constituency in the province, Antigonish-Guysborough, with 26,212 remains unchanged, yet 11,508 of population is added to the largest rural constituency in the province, giving it a population of 66,500 odd.

An hon. Member: That is a shame.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not questioning that; I simply want to bring out these facts because we are discussing the manner in which redistribution has been carried on. The suggestion has been made that some other system would work more effectively, and I suggest that these facts corroborate that suggestion. The largest constituency receives this addition while the smallest constituency remains as is.

It may be said that there were political difficulties in removing the small constituency. I am quite prepared to admit that there were difficulties, but I do suggest that it is a rather anomalous situation when you find this disparity. It rather bears out the statement found in the new testament where the Saviour said, "To him that hath shall be given." Certainly that was the case here, because one of the largest constituencies had more given to it.

It is true that yesterday the minister, in replying to a statement made by the hon. member for Kamloops, said the constituency of Lunenburg had received a greater addition than any other constituency in the province. It is true that the constituency of Lunenburg received 12,544 additional votes and that the constituency of Annapolis-Kings received 11,580. In other words, the constituency of Lunenburg got 964 more people than the constituency of Annapolis-Kings. But you start off with the constituency of Lunenburg with a population of 33,256, and you start off with the constituency of Annapolis-Kings with a population of 54,930. Therefore the argument about having received such an increase is not quite so effective as one might think.

Alternative suggestions were made. I am not going to labour the matter at this time. The net result of redistribution in so far as these three constituencies in the southwestern part of the province are concerned is as follows. The new constituency of Queens-Lunenburg will have a population of 45,800; the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare will have a population of 45,595, and the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings will have a population of 66,510. In other words, after redistribution there is a disparity of over 21,000 between the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the other two constituencies to which I have referred.

I am suggesting that is not redistribution as it should be. Some system could have been worked out. We have finally decided to divide counties on the basis of municipalities, and if that suggestion had been adopted the constituency of Annapolis-Kings would still have been larger than either of the other two but the disparity would have been a matter of 4,000 or 5,000 instead of over 21,000.

We have heard discussions today about urban ridings in Saskatchewan with a population of 45,000 or 50,000, and we have heard discussions about rural ridings in Ontario with populations of 50,000 and much less. If you describe a rural constituency as one containing no cities within its boundaries, then I say the net result of this redistribution in Nova Scotia is that in Digby-Annapolis-Kings you have the largest rural constituency in Canada with a population of 66,500.

Mr. McIlraith: That is not so.

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. gentlemen say it is not so. They can produce their figures. I have checked the records and I believe that to be a true statement. I could have made a mistake in checking the records. I was certain of what happened in the committee, but I am prepared to be corrected with respect to the report of the census commission, though I went through it and could not find any other riding in Canada not containing a city which had a population as large as that. However, if there is one, well and good. It will certainly be an exception. I know that if the committee report that was first brought in had been adopted this situation would not have prevailed, and one would not have to talk about it now. I should like to know why the decision made by the committee was not acted upon and why for some reason there were no subsequent meetings of the committee whatsoever until objection was taken.

In saying what I have said, may I say that I have heard some members discussing the situation in the constituency of Annapolis-Kings. I presume there are slips of the tongue but some almost seemed to speak in such a way as to assume that one has a vested right in a constituency. I want to make it abundantly plain that I am not seeking to create any such impression in so far as the constituency of which I am the member at the present time is concerned. No candidates have been nominated by any party. I do not know when they will be nominated, nor do I know who will be nominated, and certainly I would be the last to suggest who might be elected because that is the prerogative of the people of the constituency and certainly not one which anyone can assume.

In speaking as I have this afternoon I want to explain that I am not speaking at all because of any personal implications whatsoever. I am speaking on behalf of the people of that constituency who I think are going to be placed in a most invidious position in the future in so far as representation is concerned, no matter what member of what party may represent it. If I were a candidate again and it were my good fortune to be elected I would be very happy to represent as well as I could the people of this whole constituency, both Annapolis-Kings and the Digby addition. It is an honour to anyone to represent a constituency in which he has lived and which he has adopted as is the case so far as I am concerned with respect to Annapolis-Kings.

In so far as Digby is concerned, if I should be elected to represent it I would be elected by the county in which I was born, because Digby county is the place of my birth. It is true that it is just outside of the municipality which has been added to the constituency, but it is so near the boundary that one can almost throw a stone across it, and the school I attended as a very small boy is the school that is established within this municipality. I well remember as a very young boy going to Weymouth, which is in the constituency, and being amazed and enthralled at the signs of industrial activity I saw there. There were a few sawmills and some schooners lying at the wharf. In those days Digby of course was an industrial centre which was almost as remote and certainly more important than Boston, which was the centre of the maritime provinces as far as we were concerned at that time.

As I have said, one could welcome from every standpoint of tradition and sentiment the representation of that constituency. My forefathers established their homes there. Their names have been associated for generations with the development of the county as stipendiary magistrates and municipal councillors. Therefore I say that from the standpoint of tradition and sentiment I welcome the opportunity to represent a constituency which now includes the municipality of the county of my birth as well as that part of the constituency which was mine by adoption.

But, sir, how can it be done adequately when the population is so large? Some talk was heard in the committee about the fact that there were many long miles of coast line which it was very difficult to represent in the House of Commons. I quite admit there are difficulties in representing fishing communities. We all know that. I have them in my own constituency as it exists today, and although there may not be the deep indentations along the coast line of Annapolis-Kings that there are in the Yarmouth or Shelburne districts, my impression would be that there are just as many fishing communities along these smaller indentations in the coast line as there are along the much deeper ones in the other counties.

After all, one is not elected to this house to represent scenery or miles of beautiful highways. It is a question of representing the people who live along those highways. It is a matter of representing the population, whether along the seacoast or in the interior. Take the constituency of Annapolis-Kings. It is approximately 112 miles from Hantsport to Weymouth along the highway. In addition there are five parallel systems of highways running east and west down through Kings county including the trunk highway and over to the bay shore. It is true that when you get down into Annapolis county you only have two, but in addition you have all the crossroads running back and forth. All the fishing communities, the apple growers and dairy farmers, and now the lumbermen and other fishermen of Digby county, have to be represented. No matter how efficient a member may be, whoever may be elected, no matter how conscientious he may be, it is going to be most difficult for him to give to the people of that constituency the representation which they deserve and which they need. I do suggest that a system of redistribution could have been followed, sir, which would have given more equality of representation and which would have been fairer to the people involved than the one which has been adopted and carried out.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I was not a member of the committee, and I thought perhaps somebody might ask me why I am speaking on this occasion. I expected the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings would make the remarks he has made. I was led to that expectation by reports from the members of the committee as well as by reports in the press.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that what was done by the committee was done in the best interests of Nova Scotia. Perhaps it might be well in the few minutes remaining before four o'clock to give a brief review.

In the 1947 redistribution on the basis of 1941 figures, the Nova Scotia population was 577,962. The 1951 census showed us to have a population of 642,548, an increase of 64,622 or 11·2 per cent. The corresponding increase for Canada for the same period is 17·5 per cent, which means that although Nova Scotia gained 64,622 in population we lose one seat.

As the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings has said, our representation in this house has varied quite widely since confederation. At the date of confederation, 1867, we had 19 members; that rose to 21 members in 1872; it remained at 21 members in 1882. Then we started to decline. In 1889 we had 20; in 1903, 18; 1914, 16; 1925, 14; 1933, 12; and in 1947 we went up to 13 members. In this redistribution we go back to 12 members.

It is interesting to note here that the committee has recommended a return to the precise constituency boundary arrangement that prevailed after the redistribution of 1933 which of course, as hon. members will recall, was done under a Conservative government. In Nova Scotia at the present time we have 12 constituencies with 13 members, Halifax being a dual constituency. Following this redistribution we will have 11 constituencies with 12 members. At the present time representation of the constituencies is: eight constituencies represented by nine Liberals; three constituencies represented by three Progressive Conservatives; and one constituency represented by a C.C.F. member.

It has been said that in every redistribution somebody is bound to be hurt. Well, Mr. Chairman, the only people who are going to be injured in this redistribution are the people of Queens-Shelburne, who will sacrifice the services of one of the finest members that has ever represented them in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winters: It has been the practice of opposition members in this debate to refer to their members, perhaps with reason, as being without exception distinguished members.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Outstanding.

Mr. Winters: Quite outstanding. I wish to say here that when we are talking about distinguished members in the House of Commons the present member for Queens-Shelburne is the peer of anybody. On that basis I say the only people in Nova Scotia who stand to be hurt are the people of Queens-Shelburne who will be deprived of the privilege of being represented by that distinguished member.

A look at the map of Nova Scotia by anyone who is observant will show that the three constituencies represented by Progressive Conservatives in one way or another adjoin each other. There were possible ways of redistributing Nova Scotia so that these three seats would become two seats. It was felt by members of the committee, and I concurred of course, that the arrangement that would cause the least disturbance to voters in Nova Scotia generally would be a reversion to what took place in 1933 under the Progressive Conservative government.

An hon. Member: Just Conservative then.

Mr. Winters: Just as a matter of interest I read some of the debates on that occasion. The chairman of the committee was Mr. R. K. Smith, who represented Cumberland. He was justifying the constituency set-up at that time, the same one we are proposing now, and he said:

> In effect, all that has happened to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis is this. He has had a small portion cut off the western end of his constituency namely, Clare, and he has had a larger portion added to the eastern end, namely, Kings. It is unfortunate, I admit, that this constituency is larger than desirable in population and area, and no one regrets it more than I do, but we had to come to that conclusion under the circumstances. Somebody in the province of Nova Scotia had to get hurt in this redistribution; some one had to make a sacrifice, and in the layout and recasting that presented itself to me I felt that the sacrifice would have to be made where recommended.

Exactly the same conditions prevail here, and another sacrifice had to be made. It seemed to be the fair thing. And I must say in all honesty and sincerity that I was never more surprised than at the objection coming from the member for Annapolis-Kings, when it was decided that a seat would have to be dropped and when the committee recommended, I think with justification, that it should be a Liberal seat that should be dropped. Despite the distinguished representation here in the house, there was a population of 26,936 that had to be absorbed.

I should say here that the new constituency of Queens-Lunenburg will reflect a greater increase in both population and area than any other constituency in Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Four o'clock.

At four o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Larson: Mr. Chairman, I have heard from several quarters that the pressing of this bill is impeding the progress of the business of the house which all hon. members want to complete. I feel that the bill has had ample discussion. I do not think anything can be clarified more than it has been clarified. I submit that we should go ahead and pass this bill. We could do it in ten minutes, and the business of the house would be completed that much more quickly.

Mr. Fraser: Right or wrong, pass it! That is not good business.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, fortunately there is not unanimous opinion on that matter in the house.

Mr. Applewhaite: Let us take a vote.

Mr. Brooks: I was discussing this bill at nine o'clock on June 24. It is really so long ago that I have almost forgotten. Before I continue with my remarks may I say that I have been asked by the hon. member for Lambton West to make for him a correction in his remarks here some time ago when he was discussing the Boundary Pipeline Corporation bill. At that time he said that about 2½ billion cubic feet a year were coming back into Canada from the United States, and that was coming in through the province of Ontario. This was a mistake as far as the number of cubic feet were concerned. During the calendar year 1950 3 billion cubic feet came into the province of Ontario. In the calendar year 1951 3·3 billion cubic feet were received. At the present time the Union Gas Company are receiving at a daily rate which will ensure receipt of the 5½ billion cubic feet this calendar year which is covered by their contract and the export permit granted by the federal power commission in the United States. The hon. member for Lambton West wished me to make that correction for him.

When I was discussing this matter the other evening I stated what I thought was in the interests of the people in my part of the dominion. While we do not expect to obtain any great benefit from this great natural resource in the province of Alberta, we are nevertheless concerned that it be preserved for the people of Canada. That is the chief reason I am speaking tonight. Also at this time I should like to commend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra for the great interest he has taken in this matter. I know that the only interest the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has in trying to protect this great natural resource for the people of Canada is the interest he has in the future of this country.

At 9 o'clock last Tuesday night I was discussing the policy of the United States. At that time I was comparing the policy there with what I thought should be the policy here in Canada. In the United States the government protects its people in the exportation of gas; that is, if they consider there is not sufficient gas for exportation and for the use of their own people in the United States, then they prohibit the export of gas to Canada. In that connection I had read a paragraph from the decision in the Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company case re the application of the Union Gas Company of the city of Toronto. If further evidence is necessary—and I think perhaps it would do no harm to produce further evidence—I should like to read section 3 of the Natural Gas Act of the United States:

> After six months from June 21, 1938, no person shall export any natural gas from the United States to a foreign country or import any natural gas from a foreign country without first having secured an order of the commission authorizing it to do so. The commission shall issue such order upon application, unless, after opportunity for hearing, it finds that the proposed exportation or importation will not be consistent with the public interest.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the first consideration of the government of the United States is their own public interest. To continue:

> The commission may by its order grant such application, in whole or in part, with such modification and upon such terms and conditions as the commission may find necessary or appropriate, and may from time to time, after opportunity for hearing, and for good cause shown, make such supplemental order in the premises as it may find necessary or appropriate.

This act was passed on June 21, 1938. As I stated before, that is the practice in the United States with regard to the exportation of gas. There must be an order from the federal power commission. This order is subject to cancellation upon proof of an unsatisfied need for gas in territories adjacent to the pipe line in the United States. As far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, I think that is sufficient evidence that the United States does not intend to export this great natural resource to Canada. Naturally they could not export it to any other country, unless it would be Mexico or South America because, as we know, the only way in which gas can be exported is by pipe line. It is not like gasoline, as one of the hon. members here mentioned the other night. Gasoline or oil can be exported by boats, by tank cars and in many different ways. And besides protecting their own interests as far as their export of gas is concerned, the large gas pipe line companies in the United States also wish to protect their own market against imported gas from other countries. We might almost say that they want it both ways.

The Pacific Northwest Pipe Line Company, which is controlled by the Fish Engineering Corporation in the United States, as is the Boundary Pipeline company, is opposing the export of gas from Canada through the province of British Columbia. The other evening the hon. member for Kindersley mentioned the fact that we are already exporting gas. Well, it is a fact that we have already arranged to export and hope to arrange for the further export of gas to Seattle and Portland, but this large United States company is trying to prevent the export of Canadian gas to the United States at the present time because, as I say, they want to reserve that splendid market for themselves.

It is well known that we export gas at the present time, some 10 billion cubic feet a year, to Montana to be used by the Anaconda Company there.

I should like to read a quotation from the Sunday Sun of Vancouver, dated June 14, which says:

Gas reserves key to pipe-line permit

This article mentions the fact that it is hoped gas will be exported from the Peace river area through British Columbia and into the western United States. It is practically the only market we would have for the gas from the Peace river area, besides serving local needs.

The article goes on:

Big rival of Westcoast in securing the necessary United States Pacific northwest markets is Pacific Northwest Pipelines Incorporated, a company affiliated with the Fish Engineering Corporation, Houston, Texas, well known in the gas transmission industry. It wants to pipe Texas gas to Portland and Seattle.

Pacific Northwest Pipelines have secured the allegiance of Henry Gellert, president of the Seattle Gas Company, who has declined to give Westcoast even a letter of intent to purchase Canadian gas.

These forces will oppose Westcoast before the FPC.

At the board hearings in the past three days they were represented by S. Bruce Smith, Q.C. of Edmonton, who battled long and hard with cross examinations to prove that Peace river gas reserves are not sufficient, that Westcoast is not financially sound in its backing, that it should have firm commitments from gas suppliers and distributors before any permit is granted by the board.

The board was satisfied in all requirements excepting that of the problem of gas reserves.

I quote that to show to what ends the gas companies in the United States will go to try to retain their own markets. I quoted the former references to show just how difficult it is for us to obtain gas from the United States, if they consider their own people are not being fully served.

I do not wish to repeat what I said on a former occasion, but it has been shown to this committee that both Ontario and Quebec are well acquainted with the fact that it is very difficult indeed to secure gas from the United States. They realize that the government of the United States is averse to shipping gas into Canada unless, as I said a moment ago, all their people are served along the different pipe lines that have already been constructed. Evidence was adduced in this committee to show that along most of the pipe lines from Texas to the Canadian border there is still a great demand in the United States for gas. The gas companies of Ontario realize this, and they also realize that if they are to have in the future a permanent supply of gas they cannot depend on the United States for it. They must depend on the gas which comes from the province of Alberta. This has been stated definitely by the officials in the government of the province of Ontario and very emphatically by the premier of Quebec, who said that if his province is to obtain gas anywhere he is determined that it shall be from an Alberta source, because he believes it is the only sure source from which a guaranteed supply for the future can be drawn.

I want to commend also the Alberta resources board. I believe they are anxious to supply the Canadian market. They are anxious to supply the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but before doing so they are investigating the supply of natural gas in their own province. That is a very wise decision. The Trans-Canada company already has a charter to build a pipe line across Canada which would supply both Ontario and Quebec. In connection with the Trans-Canada pipe line I should like to read a quotation from the Globe and Mail of January 22, 1952, which gives the attitude of Mr. Gemmell, who is the minister of mines of the province of Ontario. This article has been quoted before in this house. After mentioning why they wish Alberta gas the article goes on:

For these reasons, the Alberta petroleum resources board is giving long consideration to the Delhi application for permission to pipe gas to Ontario and Quebec. Some experts say Alberta has plenty of gas and to spare but the board is investigating. And when and if the Alberta board gives the pipe line the nod, its promoters must next get permission from the board of transport commissioners here to build the line. It is thought, however, that if the Alberta board agrees, the transport commissioners will not make any difficulties.

An alternative suggestion, Mr. Gemmell said, is that if Alberta would allow gas to be piped into the western United States, Ontario might draw an equal volume from the Texas wells. Gas is now being piped north from Texas to Detroit and thence into Windsor and western Ontario.

Mr. Gemmell declared the provincial government was wholly opposed to any deal of this kind. In the first place, he said, it was very doubtful that the United States authorities would agree to supply Ontario with a firm uninterrupted volume of gas.

That is the situation as far as these great provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned. It is not necessary for me to point out the great need of this natural resource in the large provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Those who are in favour of this Boundary Pipeline bill state that they are to supply gas to Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Evidence and arguments have been produced to show that this line would not be feasible. The chief argument against it is its size. It would be only a 16-inch pipe line whereas Trans-Canada pipe line would be 30 inches. The difference in capacity between a 16-inch pipe line and a 30-inch line is in the ratio of one to three and a half. It would be impossible for Boundary Pipeline to supply Ontario and Quebec, as well as Manitoba and other places, even if it were not the intention of the company— and we submit it is the intention— to pipe this gas into the United States. As I say, even if that were not the intention of the company, we contend that a line of this size would not supply Ontario and Quebec. Another line would have to be built, thus greatly increasing the cost of gas not only to the people this line proposes to supply but to the people purchasing gas in Ontario and Quebec.

As far as I am concerned, personally I hold no brief for any company; but I do believe that Trans-Canada has the right idea in that already they have provided themselves with large areas in Alberta capable of producing gas. Boundary Pipeline has no gas areas of its own. Trans-Canada has undertaken to build a pipe line in this country at a cost of about $350 million, and this would give a tremendous amount of work to the people of this country. It would also mean that in those great areas at the head of the lakes the pulp companies would have the opportunity to use this natural gas.

I was deeply impressed by the speech of the hon. member for Calgary West on May 2 of this year. I do not suppose there is anyone in the house who knows more than he does about this situation. He has made a thorough study of the production of gas in his own province, so when he speaks he speaks with authority. I am not going to read what he said, but hon. members will see that at page 1836 of Hansard he pointed out that Boundary Pipeline is condemned first of all on account of its limited size, to which I have already made reference.

He pointed out further that it opened up only a limited market. If there are the great quantities of gas in Alberta which we think there are, then it is not a limited market we want. We want opened up the great markets of Ontario and Quebec, and other parts of Canada. He also pointed out it would cost the consumers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba more because of the small size of the pipe. He added the irrefutable argument that the building of this small pipe line might delay for years the building of a larger one capable of serving Ontario and Quebec.

I have said that, as opposed to the Boundary pipe line, there is the Trans-Canada with three and a half times the capacity. Trans-Canada is a company which to a great extent has already made provision for the transportation of the gas, and has the financial backing to carry it through.

Another phase brought very much to the fore by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra not only in the consideration of this pipe line but also in that of others, is our Canada first policy. I can see nothing wrong with a Canada first policy. We in Canada have great natural resources. I do not suppose there is any country in the world with resources to equal ours, and there seems to be no reason why we should not try to conserve those resources for our own people. In the early days when Canada was a new country we did not have the financial institutions we have today. There was not available the great financial backing we now find in this country. At that time we did allow our natural resources to be exported to a much greater extent than they should have been. I believe that today there should be more manufacturing in this country of our own raw materials. If we conserve our resources and manufacture our raw materials we will build up our own industry and, better than that, we will build up our country.

Mr. Wood: Back to the thirties now.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member makes what he thinks is a very smart remark, and then walks out of the house.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He is just interested in your speech.

Mr. Brooks: The thirties have nothing to do with it. When we talk about our natural resources we must go back to the time the country was settled. It is our duty as Canadian citizens to conserve those resources not only for ourselves but for future generations. Unless we do so we can never be the great country we were intended to be.

In the early days of the United States when they did not have the financial backing to build their own industry, the New England colonies and other states shipped their natural resources to England. The United States did not become a great country until she began to manufacture. The same is true of the southern United States. We have heard how in days gone by they exported their cotton to other parts of the world so that the southern United States remained the poor section of that country. But that condition did not continue when they began manufacturing their cotton.

In common with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I do not think any apology should be made in the house or anywhere else in Canada for advocating a Canada first policy so far as our natural resources are concerned.

Mr. Laing: How would the hon. member relate the theory he is now expounding to the importation of bauxite, upon which our aluminum industry is one hundred per cent dependent?

Mr. Brooks: I am not saying Canada should not import bauxite or any other raw material from any other country. If another country wishes to export its raw material to Canada, that is perfectly all right so far as I am concerned. But the fact that some other country wishes to export its raw material is no logical reason for stating that we should do the same. I know the hon. member comes from British Columbia, and that out there they are developing a great aluminum industry. I congratulate the hon. member and his province upon having that great industry there. But, so far as I can see, that is no reason why we should export all our raw materials such as pulpwood, iron ore and other products out of this country in order that some other country might become prosperous.

I see that my time is practically up but, as I said a moment ago, I do not believe it is in the best interests of this country that this bill should pass and a franchise be granted to the Boundary Pipeline Corporation to build a pipe line from the Alberta oil fields to the province of Manitoba.

(Translation):

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Chairman, it is with pleasure that the province of Quebec, which is at present experiencing the most phenomenal industrial development in her history, if not in the whole history of Canada, finds that a sister province, the province of Alberta, is also going through a period of prosperity and progress.

In Alberta, oil and gas may be considered as the two main factors of this new and truly prodigious era. In the province of Quebec, the causes appear to be more diversified and more numerous. There is obviously the Ungava iron ore, but one must not forget our copper, zinc and lead mines, our gold, titanium and asbestos mines, our pulp and paper production, our almost inexhaustible hydroelectric resources. One must not forget either another very important factor, namely, a very active, progressive, judicious and far-sighted provincial administration.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Conservative.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Do not go too far!

Mr. Courtemanche: Obviously, talk such as this may not please some of my hon. friends opposite, but truth has rights and it is a pleasure for me to make that truth known!

[Mr. Laing.]

As far as the industrial development of Quebec as well as of Alberta is concerned, there is a fact which we should never forget; this development benefits the whole country. A more prosperous Quebec province means a more prosperous Canada and a richer province of Alberta means, also, a richer Canada.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow a question on this comparison between Alberta and Quebec. Does my hon. friend know that the recent development of natural resources in Alberta has benefited the people of that province to a much larger extent, through reductions in the capital debt and a consequent reduction in taxes?

Mr. Courtemanche: If my hon. friend wants to make a political issue out of it, I think there is another place where we might discuss this thing. I understand there is a provincial election on these days.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): My hon. friend should not venture on such a ground, if he wishes to avoid disagreeable remarks.

Mr. Courtemanche: There is a time for everything. It is commonly known that we, from the province of Quebec, jealously defend our province's rights and intend to protect and keep them at any cost. However, this does not prevent us from understanding the economic interdependence of the various provinces, or from surmising that in ensuring a better future to the province of Quebec, we also ensure a brighter future not only to our immediate neighbours but to all those who belong to the Canadian confederation.

Besides, the whole of the Canadian press has shown some interest in the new Quebec developments. The newspapers have dispatched observers to Ungava, Gaspe, the Chibougamau area, Sept Iles, Havre St. Pierre and other places. Why have they done it? Because people are ready to admit that what benefits Quebec will benefit, directly or indirectly, the rest of the country.

I trust that the citizens of Alberta, like those of the province of Quebec, wish to contribute not only to the prosperity of their own province but to the welfare of Canada as a whole.

Now I believe that in granting the request contained in Bill No. 62 to incorporate the Boundary Pipeline Corporation, we would serve the interests of others before the interests of Canada. Why? Because the new company plans on laying a pipe line which would run from Alberta across Saskatchewan and Manitoba and then, instead of continuing eastward toward Ontario and Quebec, would go south into the United States.

Now, why would we supply American cities and states with natural gas before supplying our own cities and provinces? Is it not true that charity begins at home? Would it not be more logical for Alberta to sell her products in Canada first? Especially when many parts of the country are in need of natural gas!

Business is business, of course. However, if I can be successful and at the same time help my brothers why should I give preference to foreigners? A matter of patriotism and national unity is involved in this bill. National unity calls for mutual assistance, co-operation between the provinces whilst patriotism requires each one of us to favour first of all our fellow countrymen, our fellow citizens.

There are some people, businessmen, industrial leaders, who, as soon as they walk into their office, cast aside all concern for the welfare of the nation. They claim to be good Canadians and even, sometimes, great Canadians. But as soon as money enters into the picture they forget those high principles they so loudly proclaim at every opportunity.

I do not claim that the promoters of this company are that kind of Canadians. I consider, however, that they are making a mistake and the legislator is duty bound, under the circumstances, to call them to order and to prevent them from doing what would be detrimental to the public interest.

Would it mean that, by adopting such an attitude, we want to express a certain measure of animosity against the United States? Certainly not, and it would be ridiculous to think so. The good neighbour policy between Canada and the United States is something wonderful, something unique in this world, I would say. It should and will be preserved for all sorts of excellent reasons.

The Canadian humourist, Stephen Leacock, pointed out one day that we were wasting so much time explaining to the English that we were not Americans and to the Americans that we were not English, that there remained scarcely any time for us to be real Canadians.

I am convinced that now the Americans know and understand us much better, particularly since the last few years. If Mr. Leacock were still living, he would doubtlessly hasten to correct his assertion, which somehow has become less true now. Today the Americans and the British are informed about us and we have much more time to behave as true Canadians. And that is what the members of this house who have objected to Bill 62 have done.

Will the Americans resent it? Will they show any spite? Not at all. And everyone knows quite well they would be the first to do the same. We want to co-operate with them and no doubt they wish to offer us their fullest co-operation. Nevertheless, both sides, of course, will look first of all after their own interests. It is normal, it is fair, it is sensible.

Providence has been kind to us in allowing us to live in Canada, where the soil and underground are probably the richest in the world. It is true that at one time there were some who would not believe in the great resources of Canada.

Voltaire, as you well know, had no admiration for Canada and this is what he wrote in chapter twenty-three of his book Candide, published nearly two centuries ago:

"Who are all these people?"

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Is Voltaire not on the Index?

Mr. Courtemanche: Perhaps, but the paragraph I will quote certainly is not. The hon. member will understand it perfectly.

. . . said Candide on the Dutch vessel. "Something quite silly and quite abominable," replied Martin. "You know England; are people there as silly as in France?" "It is another kind of folly," said Martin. "As you know, those two countries are at war over a few acres of snow in the direction of Canada and they are spending for this fine war much more than Canada is worth."

So it was England who inherited these few acres of snow. Nevertheless, in 1816, a large number of Britishers were quite ready to believe that Canada was a very poor conquest.

Was it not Mr. Alex Baring, later Lord Ashburton, who, in that year, wrote Mr. John Q. Adams, then American ambassador to London, the following words:

"I wish the British government would give you Canada at once. It is fit for nothing but to breed quarrels."

Fortunately, Baring's advice was not followed and Canada did not fall into American hands.

Indeed, little by little, it was realized that this country had tremendous possibilities. Even in 1842, Charles Dickens wrote the following in his "American Notes":

"It is full of hope and promise."

And the first years of the twentieth century, which, according to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was to be Canada's century brought an era of progress and change. For instance, it was in 1903, while the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway was being built, that silver ore was discovered in the Cobalt district. The development of our mines was then to be ceaselessly carried out all through Canada, in the east, west, north and south.

That is how natural gas was discovered in Alberta. According to statistics for the year 1949, according to the Canada Year Book, 1951, page 520 of the English edition, Alberta produced approximately 85 per cent of Canada's natural gas. In 1949, total production in all provinces amounted to 60 billion cubic feet, of which 51 billion cubic feet were produced in Alberta. Ontario's production in 1949 was but 8 billion cubic feet.

It can therefore be said that Alberta is truly the producer of natural gas. It is undoubtedly a great honour, but an honour that entails heavy responsibilities. Needless to say, Alberta cannot use all that gas and must export some. I do not object to her exporting it first to the neighbouring provinces. But we believe that she should then think of the other provinces—although they may be a little farther—that could benefit from Alberta's natural gas transported by way of a pipe line.

People in the other provinces, and more particularly in Ontario and Quebec, cannot understand why it has been decided to build a pipe line which, instead of serving them, would branch off towards the United States. But why take the southern route, the route that leads abroad, when in the east are provinces which need this natural gas, demand it and stand ready to buy it?

Nothing is more natural than to insist that our natural resources be developed in Canada for the benefit of the people of Canada! Let Alberta first take advantage of her natural resources, but let her think afterwards of her sister provinces, before worrying about the needs abroad.

Have you ever considered the ridiculous situation in which Quebec and Ontario might find themselves should they have to import natural gas from the United States, while Alberta was exporting gas to our neighbours? For heaven's sake, let us act more consistently and, above all, show more patriotism.

If Canada had a surplus of gas available, it would be a different matter altogether. If, for instance, Quebec and Ontario could be supplied natural gas without going to Alberta, we would no doubt advise our friends in Calgary to sell some to the United States and we would then consider it our duty to help them to do so.

Exports are justified and can be profitable under two conditions. First, there must be a surplus available of the product that we want to export. But just the opposite is taking place. Supplies are insufficient. Secondly, the export of a product may be justified when supplies of it are sufficiently ample to satisfy local needs even though for financial reasons it has been decided to do without it in order to reap benefits from its sale. We have seen Great Britain for instance, and other European countries, selling us wares which had disappeared from their shops. The financial position of Great Britain was such that its citizens had to do without these products which were sent abroad in order to bring back precious dollars. That is not at all our case just now. Our financial situation does not require that we make such a sacrifice. What sacrifices there are must be made by the taxpayers of this country who deprive themselves in order to meet their tax payments.

Nothing then can justify the export of natural gas to the United States. On the contrary there is every necessity for Alberta satisfying as quickly as possible the requirements of the people of Canada.

Often in the past we have complained of having had to import the products we were badly in need of.

We have naturally complained that the exporter would set his own prices, if he were in a position to do so, because very often we could not get the kind of service we would have liked to receive. We are now in a position to obtain our natural gas at home, in Canada, but instead of supplying our own needs we are going to exhaust our resources by exporting that product to another country, namely the United States.

My hon. friend from Three Rivers gave evidence the other day to the effect that the government of the province of Quebec, as well as that of Ontario, wished to foster the building of a pipe line across Canada, and that neither of these provinces wished to import natural gas from Texas or elsewhere, while a Canadian province could easily supply that product. In that connection, the member for Three Rivers quoted a statement by the premier of the province of Quebec and another by the minister of mines for Ontario. The statements of those two gentlemen cannot be taken lightly.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): They need to be enlightened.

Mr. Courtemanche: You give me proof that we should keep our natural gas at home.

It would be unthinkable that the governments of Quebec and Ontario should now learn that Alberta, which they tried to encourage on grounds of patriotism and national unity, as I have stated a while ago, has now reversed her policy and decided to sell her products to people outside our own country.

Under such circumstances, there would be no cause to be surprised should the stand taken by Calgary be denounced both in Toronto and Quebec, and should Alberta feel that she were more or less being left aside.

Can our confederation stand such disunity? I do not think so. All parties interested should examine this problem calmly and from every angle and I am sure that they will then come to the same conclusion. The project may, at first sight, offer certain advantages, but they are negligible compared with the disadvantages that would ensue.

A country can only prosper in an atmosphere of harmony and mutual understanding. Such harmony and mutual understanding sometimes imply certain sacrifices on both sides—it is everyone's lot, now and then—but they are worth while.

We all want to see Canada keep on progressing, to see our natural resources add more and more to our national wealth and raise still further our standard of living. However, we might very well jeopardize this promising future if, instead of acting as a team, as shareholders in the same company, our sole concern is to please people abroad. Let us think first of ourselves and our own people; nobody can expect more.

I therefore believe, Mr. Speaker, that in the name of national unity, of national harmony, as well as in the name of our economic interests we must, without hesitation, reject this request which is made to us.

The Progressive Conservative party has always championed private enterprise and it still does to this day. It will nevertheless never allow private enterprise to work against the national interest. There is no better way of ensuring the future of this country. There is no better way either of ensuring the future of private enterprise in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the number of speakers who have taken part in this debate, ranging from the Atlantic to the Pacific, of all provinces, of all races and of all parties, suggests that this is a much more important subject than is usually found in bills which sometimes come before the house at this hour. I do not know that I would have intervened in this debate had it not been for what I considered a rather captious article in the Financial Post regarding the House of Commons and dealing with this matter. In that article the august journal said that the House of Commons was making a spectacle of itself. Of course it is the prerogative of those who sit outside in ivory towers to prejudge and so declare; but I think it was Bobbie Burns who said:

> O wad some power the giftie gie us
> To see oursels as ithers see us!

The Financial Post went on to say that the House of Commons was delaying most important business. That, of course, suggested some of the superiority complex which affects editorial writers when they presume to write about matters upon which they are not too well informed; because the editorial writer did not realize that this hour is provided for private members and, no matter how these private members' matters are discussed, they do not interfere with the business of Canada.

I would make no further comment but that it is nine o'clock.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at four o'clock.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce)—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, before the dinner recess we were dealing with the problem of redistribution in Nova Scotia and I was addressing myself particularly to the remarks made previously by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the most serious criticism he made was that a decision had been reached in the committee and later revoked. I believe the hon. member must be labouring under a misunderstanding. I say that and add quickly that I was not a member of the committee; but we Nova Scotian members are pretty friendly with each other. We have a great many conversations and naturally I was pretty familiar with what was going on both before and after most committee meetings. I was not aware that there had been any discussion along the lines of the proposal now being suggested by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings as having been decided upon by the committee. I first learned of it in the newspapers whilst I was away from Ottawa on business elsewhere. Immediately upon my return I consulted the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough who represented Nova Scotia on the committee and the hon. member for Prince who was chairman of the maritimes subcommittee. Both told me that there must be some misunderstanding. They said the suggestion did come from the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings that there should be no change in his constituency boundaries, but that there had been no decision upon it.

I believe there are certain circumstances under which it is fair to make deductions; and I think this is one instance in which it is safe to deduce, even though I was not a member of the committee, that it was most unlikely that the decision to which the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings referred could have been made. At any rate I am sure of one thing, namely that it never was in the mind of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough or the hon. member for Prince that that decision should be made.

Mr. Nowlan: Pure nonsense.

Mr. Winters: I should now like to refer more specifically to the problem of the representation from Nova Scotia. The constituency arrangement now being proposed was first brought into effect by the redistribution in 1933. At that time there were a great many suggestions as to how the redistribution should be carried out, just as there are now. It is interesting again to refer to the pages of Hansard. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the debates of the House of Commons on May 26, 1933, and in particular to page 5496. The speech of Mr. R. K. Smith, who was then the chairman of the subcommittee for Nova Scotia and who was the member for Cumberland reads in part as follows. Hon. members of course know that Mr. R. K. Smith was a Conservative member.

> The next proposal was put forward by the hon. member for Hants-Kings, namely, that the county of Pictou be practically split in two, and one-half of the population and area thrown into Antigonish-Guysborough, which would bring the county of Antigonish-Guysborough up to approximately 45,000, the other half in Colchester, making the second constituency out of the existing three. That again would mean the complete obliteration—yes, the complete elimination of Pictou county, that fine old Scottish county with their high pride of ancestry and tradition. The population according to the last census, is over 39,000, and the proposal would have meant throwing these people of Pictou into other constituencies with whom they have nothing in common; and whose interests were as far removed as the poles. I did not think it was fair; I did not think it would be just to divide Pictou county throwing one half into the county of Antigonish-Guysborough and the other half into Colchester.

Mr. Chairman, that was a reasonable approach to the problem. That proposal would have carried with it the further rearrangement which would have resulted in reducing to two the present three Tory constituencies in Nova Scotia. That matter, of course, was considered; but it was decided that it might not be clear to the people of Nova Scotia generally that that was the right thing to do. With the warm support of Mr. R. K. Smith, the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett, and the then minister of finance, Hon. E. N. Rhodes, the redistribution was decided upon which was exactly the same as the arrangement being proposed now.

Hon. members may say the fact that that was done by a Tory government does not necessarily mean it is correct; and I would imagine there would be a fair amount of agreement with that statement. But the fact remains it does indicate that this arrangement was given mature consideration by the party in power at that time, just as it has been given mature consideration by the party in office at this time. The constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings created at that time was represented from the election of 1935 until 1948 by that eminent Nova Scotian, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, and represented with distinction. From December 1948 to the general election of June, 1949, that self-same constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings, the very one being proposed now, was represented by the present member for Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Fulton: And will be again.

Mr. Winters: Then we come to the 1947 redistribution. While the arrangement arrived at then may not have been the best one possible under all circumstances, I think it met with the general approval of the people of Nova Scotia. I myself was most reluctant to sever my close and warm connections with the people of Queens county. I was not anxious to have the county of Lunenburg stand alone as a constituency, but that was the arrangement. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that we Nova Scotians often say it is an ill wind that blows no man good. In this instance this redistribution had the result of bringing into public life Dr. Donald Smith, who represents the newly-created constituency of Queens-Shelburne in a manner that does credit both to his constituents and to himself.

Mr. Chairman, we are now faced with another redistribution. I think hon. members of this committee know that the people of Nova Scotia set great store by institutions and arrangements that have been tried and tested by tradition. They also have a fine and well developed sense of justice. Anybody who reads the speeches of Joseph Howe will know exactly what I mean. The proposed arrangement contains both these ingredients of tradition and justice. I have heard no complaint about the arrangement that was put into effect by the redistribution of 1933 or that which was decided upon in the redistribution of 1947 and which has been effective since that election of 1949.

There is of course the disparity in population between Annapolis-Kings on the one hand and Lunenburg on the other. That fact was referred to by Conservative speakers in 1933 just as it is being referred to now. I say again that I personally did not request that Lunenburg as a county and in itself be a constituency, but that was the decision. In the constituency of Annapolis-Kings a considerable part of the increase in population can be attributed to service installations there. I do not need to dwell upon the conditions and elements that apply under those circumstances. This redistribution we are proposing now will tend to reduce the disparity in population rather than to accentuate it, as some hon. members have tried to lead the committee to believe. Perhaps it might be interesting to hon. members if I dealt briefly with the recent history of representation in Nova Scotia and some of the reasons for the committee's decision.

The county of Digby was first split in the redistribution of 1914. The division of this county goes back that far. This redistribution became effective in the election of 1917, when our representation was reduced from 18 to 16 seats. At that time Digby municipality became associated with Annapolis county to form the constituency of Digby-Annapolis. Clare was joined to Yarmouth county to form the new federal constituency of Yarmouth-Clare. This, of course, was done under a Conservative government. Following the 1925 redistribution, the representation was reduced from 16 to 14 seats. In the election of the same year Queens county was joined with Lunenburg county for the first time to form the federal constituency of Queens-Lunenburg. The other constituencies in western Nova Scotia at that time became Digby-Annapolis and Shelburne-Yarmouth.

The redistribution of 1933 became effective with the election of 1935, when representation was reduced again from 14 to 12 seats. Queens remained with Lunenburg county and continued to form the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg. Digby county was again split into two municipalities with Clare being part of the new constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare and Digby forming part of the newly-created constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings. This too was done under a Conservative government. The redistribution of 1947 increased the representation from 12 to 13 seats. With the next election in 1949, Lunenburg became a constituency by itself for the first time since prior to the election of 1925. All Digby county became associated with Yarmouth to form the constituency of Digby-Yarmouth; the two counties of Annapolis and Kings were associated to form the constituency of Annapolis-Kings for the first time.

The two municipalities of Digby have been in different constituencies for 20 of the last 38 years, and Digby county in whole or in part has been associated with Annapolis county for 33 of the past 38 years.

Queens has been associated with Lunenburg county to form the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg for 24 of the past 27 years.

In recommending the constituency arrangement in this redistribution, the committee is following precedents which are firmly established and have been found to be workable and congenial.

When the new arrangement is analysed from the point of view of population, and on the basis of 1951 statistics, it is found that the reconstituted constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare has a population of 45,595, compared to the present population of 42,783 for Digby-Yarmouth. This is an increase of 2,812, or 7 per cent. Digby-Annapolis-Kings will have a population of 66,510 against the present population of 54,930 for Annapolis-Kings. This is an increase of 11,580 or 20 per cent. Queens-Lunenburg will have a population of 45,800 as against 33,256 for the present constituency of Lunenburg. This is an increase of 12,544 or 36 per cent. It will be seen that on both a numerical and a percentage basis the increase in the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg is greater than that obtaining in Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

As regards areas, to which the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings attached a considerable amount of weight, Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare has an area of 2,212 square miles, as compared with 1,840 square miles for Yarmouth-Digby. This is an increase of 372 square miles, or approximately 20 per cent. Digby-Annapolis-Kings will have an area of 2,785 square miles as compared with 2,150 square miles for Annapolis-Kings. This is an increase of 635 square miles or 29·5 per cent. Queens-Lunenburg will have an area of 2,173 square miles, as compared with the area of the present constituency of Lunenburg of 1,190 square miles. This is an increase of 983 square miles, or 83 per cent. It will be seen that the greatest increase in area takes place in the reconstituted constituency of Queens-Lunenburg.

On the basis of votes, lest it be said that the Liberals were favouring themselves there, the majority for the Liberal candidate in the municipality of Digby in 1949 was 284; in Queens county the majority for the Progressive Conservative candidate in the same election was 309. On the basis of these figures it certainly cannot be argued that the present member for Annapolis-Kings is being put at any disadvantage as compared with the present member for Lunenburg.

The present member for Annapolis-Kings, as I said before, represented the former constituency which is now being reconstituted, that is, Digby-Annapolis-Kings, from the date of his election in the by-election December 1948 to the time of the general election in June, 1949. The area was then the same as it is now, and the population was about the same.

It has been suggested that Shelburne county should have been added to Queens-Lunenburg. Mr. Chairman, Shelburne traditionally returns a Liberal majority, and the Liberal members on the committee—and I agree—thought it would be misunderstood if a Liberal increment of votes was added to the constituency represented by the present minister from Nova Scotia. It would certainly have opened us to the more serious charge that we were attempting to make a safe seat of Shelburne-Queens-Lunenburg, and it was decided not to follow such a course.

It has been said in Nova Scotia in various circles that the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough, which has the smallest population in Nova Scotia, 21,216, should have been re-arranged in some way so as to even up the population by constituencies. That was implied in the proposal made by Mr. Ilsley in 1933, but part of that proposal too would have meant that one of the Tory constituencies would have disappeared instead of one of the Liberal constituencies, as was actually decided upon.

The problem of splitting Antigonish-Guysborough presents some very real difficulties which, on the face of it, seem almost insurmountable. It would be possible and reasonable to add Antigonish to Pictou to form the constituency of Antigonish-Pictou, with an area of 1,709 square miles and a population of 55,973. This would pose the problem of what to do with Guysborough county, and would almost necessitate it being added to Halifax county to form the constituency of Guysborough-Halifax. This, however, would constitute an area of 3,711 square miles with a population of 174,462. We have heard the criticism that the area of Digby-Annapolis-Kings is too large. It is a large constituency, the area being 2,785 square miles. But the constituency of Guysborough-Halifax, if that suggestion were accepted, would have by comparison 3,711 square miles. It might be said by way of argument that Halifax is represented by two members so that population should be divided by two for purposes of considering problems of representation. But hon. members will realize that Halifax is a dual constituency, and each member on his own is required to cover the whole constituency and deal with all the constituency problems wherever they may arise.

The only other reasonable alternative would be to form a constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough-Pictou, which would be virtually an empire on the eastern end of the mainland of Nova Scotia, with an area of 3,320 square miles and 70,218 people. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, this would be out of the question. It might be said that Antigonish-Guysborough could be combined with one of the constituencies on Cape Breton island. The most logical one would be Inverness-Richmond, which already has an area of 2,100 square miles, and 32,500 people. If Antigonish-Guysborough were to be included, the total area would be 4,280 square miles and the population would be 58,716. From the point of view of population this might be acceptable, but its area would be so vast that it would be very difficult for any one member to service it. In the circumstances I think the committee made the right decision in reverting to the constituency arrangement arrived at in the first instance in 1933 and tried and tested between 1935 and the election of 1949.

Reverting again to this old expression we hear that people are hurt by redistributions, I would say again that the only people in this redistribution likely to be injured in Nova Scotia are the people of Queens-Shelburne in the first instance, who will be deprived of the services of Dr. Donald Smith, and in the second instance Dr. Donald Smith himself, who will likely be deprived of the honour of representing the people of Shelburne and Queens counties in the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: He could go to Queens-Lunenburg.

Mr. Winters: I said Queens and Shelburne. As hon. members know, Dr. Smith earlier this year underwent a very serious operation and is still incapacitated because of it. I am sure hon. members will realize how difficult it was for the committee to come to a decision to eliminate his constituency, a Liberal constituency, during his enforced absence. Hon. members will be pleased to know that Dr. Smith is improving. He has already given outstanding public service and, God willing, he will continue to find ways to further the interests of the people of Queens county in other fields.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, may I say with the hon. member for Lunenburg that we hope for Dr. Smith a speedy recovery and a return to public service. It is not my purpose in rising to get into a debate with regard to redistribution either past or present in Nova Scotia. But I do think that, as a neutral member of the Nova Scotia committee, I should give the committee what was my understanding as to what took place at the first meeting of that subcommittee.

The first thing that was agreed upon was that Queens-Shelburne should be the seat that would be eliminated in Nova Scotia. The second agreement that was reached at that meeting, as I understood it, was that Annapolis-Kings should remain as it was, and that the other Liberal members of the committee would be left free to decide what would happen to Digby county. It was explained that the minister was in Nova Scotia at the time, and would not be available for a day or two. The members of the committee asked that the matter be left open, with no decision being taken at that meeting as to what should be done with Digby county.

I may say I was rather surprised when I returned to Ottawa after having been in the west to find that Digby municipality out of Digby county had been returned to Annapolis-Kings. My memory is clear on the matter because, after we left the committee meeting which was held in the room of the hon. member for Prince, I spoke to the present member for Annapolis-Kings and remarked to him that his seat was being left as it was at that time. He appeared to be quite pleased. That was the way the matter stood, so far as I was concerned. That is what I understood, at least, as to what the agreement was at that first meeting.

I think the amendment offered by the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings in the main committee, in which he suggested that Digby-Yarmouth plus Barrington municipality should be one seat, and that Lunenburg, Queens and the Shelburne municipality should be another seat, was a reasonable suggestion. Certainly it left the populations in those constituencies reasonably equal. Annapolis-Kings had 54,930; Digby-Yarmouth-Barrington had 49,356, and Queens-Lunenburg-Shelburne had 53,619. That seemed a reasonable division of population. The only objection offered was that which I mentioned before, namely the argument with regard to shore line. It was argued that Digby-Yarmouth-Barrington had a much greater shore line than Annapolis-Kings, and because the members from that area considered it was more difficult to represent fishermen than farmers they decided to make the division in another way.

I do not know whether it is more difficult to represent fishermen than farmers, because I have always represented farmers in the House of Commons. I know that as a group they are fairly easy to represent. Usually they work out their own difficulties. I am inclined to think that fishermen are probably the same, and that taken as a class they are not any more difficult to represent in the house than any other group of individuals in Canada. Certainly on the basis of population I think the amendment offered to the main committee was reasonable. Certainly my understanding of what took place at the first committee meeting is as I have stated it, namely that Queens-Shelburne was to be the county in Nova Scotia which was to be taken out, that Annapolis-Kings was to remain as it was, and that it was left to the Liberal members of the committee to decide, in consultation with the hon. member for Lunenburg, what they considered would be a fair division with regard to the other three counties.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I shall not delay the proceedings of the committee very long this evening, but I do wish to make some comments and what I hope will be some constructive suggestions with respect to the matter causing so much anxiety in the committee, and dealing with representation of the various constituencies in Canada.

Redistribution

I was not a member of the redistribution committee, nor did I follow very closely its deliberations from day to day. I am not in a position where my own constituency is affected by redistribution changes. What I am attempting to do this evening, if I may, is to assess, on the basis of what I have learned from the discussions to date, what the situation actually is, and then try to apply what little common sense I may have at my command—

Mr. Knowles: Don't be so modest.

Mr. Graydon: —in an attempt to make some constructive suggestions as to what might be done.

Speaking neither as a cartographer nor as an expert in the matter of redistribution, but only as a layman, it seems to me that the system under which we are now operating is an open invitation to injustice. I have been greatly impressed by the arguments used by hon. members on this side of the house in favour of some different system of redistributing the representation through our various constituencies in Canada. Try as it may, a parliament without a plan, without a principle and without a program, no matter how conscientious members on all sides may be, is travelling on a road bristling with all kinds of dangers to our democratic system.

Having in mind the difficulties that must face those who serve on redistribution committees, let me say that I would not be an applicant for a position on any future redistribution committee. In addition to that it seems to me that we must begin early to review the situation, and perhaps as good a time as any to start would be now, when we have reached an impasse in this committee of the whole house.

I am not one who believes we ought to take out of the hands of parliament the whole question of redistribution, in its final analysis, or so far as any final decision would be concerned; but I do think there is a stage which was well and properly described by the leader of the opposition in another debate where we ought to set up a commission to deal with this vexed problem. I feel that a commission with a proper reference would, first, set up a plan, set out principles and be a guide for the ordinary member of the House of Commons to follow. I have been listening to this debate most intently and I have not been able to find anything in the nature of a general over-all plan set out. I am quite sure that members of the committee were unable to find any plan that would be applicable right across Canada in working out the problems with which they were engaged. Even though we have gone through all the years redistributing in the wrong way, that is no reason why we should continue redistributing in the wrong way during the years that lie ahead.

I am satisfied in my own mind that there has to be some pattern which will be applicable right across the dominion. It may be that there will have to be some alterations here, some changes there, some differences in the pattern to meet varying conditions that may arise, but it does not seem right to me that we should be working on a patchwork quilt basis or something which resembles a jigsaw puzzle. When you look at the redistribution map you can think of nothing else. That does not seem to me good enough for an enlightened parliament such as we think this is.

I should like to suggest that this commission be set up at an early date. I think there are enough people in this parliament who are disgusted at the way in which redistribution has been carried on, not just in this parliament but in the parliaments that have gone ahead, to buttress any argument put forward that there should be some type of commission to at least lay down general principles and set up plans and patterns so members of parliament may be able to work in some concerted and unified way in an effort to arrive at proper representation in this house.

In addition, it seems to me there is a need for consultation with other bodies, legislative and otherwise, in order to get their views and opinions. I know it is not possible to work these things out on a completely scientific basis because to do that would mean that the whole nature of parliamentary representation would be lost. We should not intrude the scientific too far into our deliberations, but it should come in a certain distance. Somewhere between the pole where everything is done in a hit and miss way and the pole where everything is done in a scientific way it should be possible to arrive at a reasonably accurate and reasonably satisfactory method that would apply to all seats in the house.

It is not satisfactory to have ridings so split and divided and cut up that the federal riding is not anything like the same pattern as the provincial riding, and the municipal pattern is also different. The result is all kinds of confusion from time to time as between the municipal, provincial and federal set-ups. That causes great concern and difficulty, not only for the members of this parliament but for the members of the provincial and municipal legislative bodies. I am the first to admit that this could not possibly be worked out on a complete pattern right across Canada, but I think there is need to consider at least the possibility of trying to make these things work into a better pattern than the one which can hardly be described as a pattern at all at the present time.

These things will have to be done by trial and error. You cannot expect to work everything out overnight and have it accepted by everybody. In the House of Commons we do not attempt to set up our rules from day to day; we have a certain set of rules that we follow. If we did not have such rules there would be chaos and confusion in our work. I think there is a great need for rules, for some kind of pattern or plan by which we could work out an intelligent system of redistribution in the days that lie ahead.

After all the future is our responsibility, just as the present is. Someone must make the first move; someone must make a beginning. I am much concerned over the fact that we seem to have reached an impasse during the last few days in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Take your responsibility.

Mr. Graydon: I am going to take any responsibility that is mine. I have always shouldered it in the house; I have not attempted to throw it on anybody else, and I am not going to do that now.

I should like to deal with this objectively and I hope my hon. friend is not attempting to have me do it otherwise. There are some points with respect to the present redistribution that deserve comment. I must confess that there are quite a number of members in this house who perhaps are not saying so but who are passing through rather anxious days while this redistribution is going on. I do not mind saying that one of the reasons I am taking part in this debate is to give support and assistance to some of those members who are passing through days of anxiety and concern.

It is all very well for us to read in Hansard or in newspaper reports about changes in constituencies, changes which mean eliminations in some cases, enlargements in others, creation of new seats in others. All these create concern and anxiety for many members of the House of Commons. It is a serious matter to a great many, and our sympathies ought to be with those who are faced with these difficulties at this time.

I want to refer, if I may, to the Annapolis-Kings seat. It seems strange to me that the constituency in Nova Scotia represented by the president of the Progressive Conservative Association should be singled out as a seat to be enlarged to such a great extent as has been indicated by the minister and as appears on the records of this house. The minister has argued at length about this, but I must confess that his argument must leave a great many members unconvinced when there are 12,000 people added to that constituency. That is the kind of thing the government and the redistribution committee should have been careful to avoid. There are those who cannot help being suspicious when the president of the Progressive Conservative Association is singled out in that way.

Mr. Winters: Do you view with suspicion the dropping of a Liberal seat in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Graydon: I am not going into that point because it is not my purpose to get into an argument with anybody tonight. All I want to do is point out that I believe in that case the redistribution committee might very properly have given a better deal to the present member for Annapolis-Kings. I am not going to argue on the floor of the house with respect to other ridings because I was not on the redistribution committee and I have no desire to mix in that kind of struggle at the moment.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Graydon: You have a lot to say over there, but you may not have so much to say after the next federal election. I am not going to deal with every seat because that would not be quite proper, but I want to refer to the constituency of Frontenac-Addington which is represented by one of the most prominent livestock men in Canada. He is a man who is highly regarded everywhere, and his constituency has been pretty well wiped out. I think the redistribution committee should have tried to avoid that kind of thing as far as possible, having in mind the general structure of the constituencies in that area.

I also want to say a word with respect to Haldimand. I listened last night with a good deal of interest and concern, as I think everyone did, to the plea made by the hon. member for Haldimand. I thought he carried great conviction and sincerity in what he said. I hope that somehow it will not be necessary to carry into effect the proposal that appears to be on tap at the moment and which he referred to last night so eloquently and with such conviction. The member for Huron North also represents a rural constituency. He has been here since 1940 and has served his constituency and parliament well, but he now finds himself in difficulty with respect to his riding.

Mr. McIlraith: He is not in difficulty.

Mr. Graydon: Then we go a little farther west into Manitoba.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Are you not going to shed a tear over Glengarry?

Mr. Graydon: If I were the Minister of Agriculture I would say I was just coming to that, but I am not. In Manitoba the riding of Souris has been represented by a man who has served Canada well in peace and war. He now finds himself in difficulty. He is one of the leading men in our party. I raise my voice in complaint with regard to the situation in which he finds himself. I do so on a purely personal basis, because frankly I do not want to see him in a position of difficulty after the long and faithful service he has given to the House of Commons. The situation in Calgary has been described by some hon. members during the course of today's debate. I shall not go into it because my knowledge of the geography of Calgary is somewhat limited. I know it is one of the finest places in Canada to visit. I want to come now to the constituency of Lake Centre. I do so because I feel that one of the finest and most outstanding of all parliamentarians in the last quarter century has represented that constituency well and favourably in the House of Commons.

Mr. McIlraith: Why did you not make him your leader if he was so outstanding?

Mr. Graydon: In plain and simple terms, I do not think he should be pushed around. The only other redistribution of which I have any knowledge occurred in 1947, and at that time there was also difficulty over his riding. There is difficulty now, and I think he deserves better treatment than to be given a seat that looks like a combination between a jigsaw puzzle and a patchwork quilt. I am looking into the faces of many experts on redistribution, but I am not an expert on the matter. However, I have looked at the situation carefully and I think it is going a little too far to create a new riding for the hon. member for Lake Centre to contest which contains two cities and a large portion of rural territory.

Of course it may be said that the city of Regina is not included, but as far as I can make out from looking at the map the new constituency takes in a rather substantial area right in the city of Regina. It also includes the city of Moose Jaw, forty miles from Regina, with most of the suburban territory around Regina, and in addition there are 180 miles of shore line in the middle of the constituency which makes matters worse. It may be quite all right for the Minister of Agriculture to say today that of course the Liberals have no chance in that riding, the implication being that the hon. member for Lake Centre has an easy task ahead of him. I have some knowledge of the task that faced him in the last federal election, and I know that nobody in Canada worked harder than he did to try to overcome the difficulties and obstacles placed in his way by virtue of the last redistribution. It was an onerous task, and one that kept him in the constituency almost full time. I hope that behind the move now being made there is no motive to try to keep him continuously in that constituency during another federal election, because he is a valuable man not only to our party but also to Canada. I do not think any move should be made to keep him full-time in the constituency so he will not be able to move around and do his part in other sections of the dominion.

I must confess that in that respect he is a lot different from me. It does not make much difference whether I happen to be at home or elsewhere in an election campaign, except it sometimes helps my opponents. I want in lighter vein to make a confession to the house. During the last federal election campaign I made 34 speeches starting at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, and ending at Vernon, British Columbia. Before the election we had 66 members, and by the time I had finished we were down to 39. What would have happened if I had made any more speeches I leave to conjecture.

Mr. Winters: You are invited to come to Nova Scotia.

Mr. Graydon: There are a lot of government supporters in the house who in their own hearts really must be thanking me for some of the success they had instead of giving all the credit to themselves. As a matter of fact I might say to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that in 1940 I went to Flesherton and made a speech there, and he was immediately elected. He has been trying to get me to come back ever since but I have refused, and that will hold true when the next federal election takes place.

Seriously speaking, so far as redistribution is concerned it seems to me that we should not have to come to such an impasse as we are facing at the present time. Frankly I do not like to see it. I have felt great concern over the debate of the last couple of days in the house. It has not been simply a debate staged for the purpose of delaying parliament's closing. There has been far more at the bottom of this debate than perhaps many people realize.

An hon. Member: We hope so.

Mr. Graydon: It largely stems from the fact that we have a rotten system of redistribution; and when you have a rotten system it is pretty hard to have anything but rotten results, no matter how conscientious may be the men connected with its operation.

So I am going to ask one favour in connection with this whole matter, if I may. It seems to me this thing may run on for some considerable time. The longer it runs the less good will there is in the house, and perhaps the further we are away from any really concrete conclusion. More than that, it seems to me that if we are going to start afresh and have a different system in years to come there are a number of these outstanding trouble spots, which have been revealed in the debate, that demand some attention from a higher level. Therefore I am going to suggest to the Prime Minister that before we continue with the debate tomorrow morning he and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration sit down and review the debate that has taken place up to now to see if between them they cannot come to the house and make some concrete suggestions that will wipe out most of the difficulties that have been brought forward in this debate, in an effort to see if we cannot have some greater measure of equality and equity with respect to matters which have been bothering so many of the members at this time.

I make that proposal in perfectly good faith because frankly, Mr. Chairman, I am not enjoying this spectacle. Nobody in the house is enjoying it. There are some things that could be done to wipe out the difficulties overnight, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that they at least make a try and see if we cannot reach agreement and bring this session to a close.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, one of the purposes of a debate of this kind on the first clause in a bill is to place before the members of the house the opinions of other members in the hope that there may be some reconsideration of the course that was originally proposed. The arguments that have been put forward in support of a reconsideration of the proposed redistribution as contained in the schedule of this act have been advanced with an earnestness that could not have failed to impress members on the other side of the house with the sincerity of the arguments, whether they agree with them or not.

I do not think any hon. member of this house who extended the courtesy due to other members and sat in this house during the arguments of the hon. member for Lake Centre, the hon. member for Haldimand, the hon. member for Huron North, the hon. member for Souris, the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and other members of this house, could possibly have been unimpressed with the sincerity and the earnestness behind the plea that what is being done here should be examined, not in the light of its effect on any individual member of this house so much as from the point of view of the effect it would have on the people of Canada who have the real right to expect impartiality, justice and common sense in the redistribution of the seats where their members will be chosen.

We listened this afternoon to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture give an extremely interesting political history of his own province of Saskatchewan. Much of it was new to members who are not resident in that province; much of it was probably new to the residents of that province as well, but little of it had to do with the problem before us and none of it had anything to do with the direct problem of explaining to this house why there has been such a cynical and outrageous gerrymandering of Lake Centre as well as other seats in that province.

I am speaking of Lake Centre particularly because of my interest in the hon. member who represents that riding; but even if it were not the member who sits here today, who has put forward his own case in such clear and cogent terms, nevertheless the fact would remain that there can be no explanation of the butchery—to use a term that has already been applied—that was performed in seeking to arrive at a new constituency which retains the name but little relationship to the historic background of that constituency.

I need not repeat the arguments that have been put forward by the leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. His argument has not been answered. None of these explanations we have had offer any satisfactory argument whatever. Not one of them in any way seeks to explain the failure to approach this vitally important question in the way we would expect any problem of this kind to be tackled. There was no attempt to agree upon some basic principle which would apply. There was no attempt to consult the members of the committee and agree upon a method of drafting the boundaries of the changed constituencies.

The members of the committees who were not supporters of the Liberal party in this house were only accorded the courtesy of being let in on the secret after the decision had been made as to what was going to be done. It is perfectly true that on certain occasions, as a result of discussions in those committees, for one reason or another certain changes came forward; but those changes in turn were presented to the committees as decisions which had already been made.

Mr. Chairman, rather warm exception was taken yesterday by one hon. member when the word "directed" was used. It was regarded as an offensive term. Well, any doubt about "direction" was removed by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. At least we are indebted to him for a perfectly clear and unequivocable statement as to the direction that was given to the members of those committees. Let me give you the exact words of the minister.

An hon. Member: They surely were.

Mr. Drew: As one of the Liberal members has said, they surely were. There is no doubt about it. The Minister of Agriculture has left no doubt about it. These were the words of the Minister of Agriculture spoken here in this chamber this afternoon and in reference to the suggestion that there had been a caucus of the Liberal members of the committee—and referring to a caucus not merely of members of the committee but of Liberal members from Saskatchewan. These were the words of the Minister of Agriculture:

> If anyone wants to know what the opinion of the Saskatchewan caucus was on that question, that was their opinion. The committee of three appointed by that caucus was definitely instructed that there had to be a seat of Rosetown-Biggar when the map was drawn no matter how it was drawn, and that it had to remain there because of the special consideration we had been given.

Those were the words of the Minister of Agriculture. Because the name of Rosetown-Biggar remained and because there had been the retention of that seat, the Minister of Agriculture was claiming some credit for that result. As he put it, he does not know whether their generosity was really appreciated. He is a little bit hurt that the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar have not expressed their deep gratitude that the names of their constituencies remain. But never mind whether the names remain or not. Just let us examine these words and they are not words coined by any hon. member on this side of the house but are the words of the Minister of Agriculture:

> The committee of three appointed by that caucus—

That is the Liberal caucus from Saskatchewan.

> —was definitely instructed that there had to be a seat . . .

And later on there had to be. In other words, again to use words that have already been used, this was no impartial approach. The matter had been prejudged. The committee was merely a kangaroo court. The decision had been made. The committee met for the purpose of hearing the judgment that had already been passed elsewhere. There is no other interpretation of the clear and unmistakable words of the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon.

That being the case, let us recall the speech made in this chamber last night by the hon. member for Haldimand. I do not think there was an hon. member of this committee who was not impressed by the sincerity of that speech and, above all, by its appeal to those instincts that should guide every member here who is conscious of the fact that we are merely servants of the people whom we represent. Surely hon. members who heard that speech will not forget his description of the attitude of someone who has not yet become a member of the house, and his reference to the expectation that a member coming into the House of Commons will find standards of justice, of decency and of fair play consistent with the dignity and responsibilities of the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada. He pointed to the disappointment that must be felt by anyone who expects an approach of that kind to our problems in seeing the way this particular task has been undertaken. In saying what he said, he was perhaps unconsciously but with deep sincerity putting into his own words the sentiments of the people of Canada.

We have sought to make it clear that we are not suggesting for one moment that, on the basis of past records, one party or another can come into the House of Commons and claim any special virtue as to the merits of the system that has been employed in the past. No pretence has been made that we should seek to justify the course that has been followed on other occasions. We had hoped—and we had reason to do so—that at long last, with the progress that has taken place in other fields and in other parliaments which follow the same general traditions that are followed by us, we might now have come to the point when the cynical approach of gerrymandering, log-rolling and cheap political expediency would give way to an impartial approach to this subject.

The thing that was difficult to understand was the argument that was made from time to time yesterday and again today that this system is perfectly all right. We had not heard that argument for some time; we had, in fact, heard the contrary argument from Liberal members of the house, both in the house and out of it. That argument was made, of course, at a time when the problem of redistribution was not before us.

This is not a new subject of discussion. As has been said before, no one here claims any originality in putting forward the argument for a better, a more impartial method of redistributing the seats so that the people of Canada, not the members of this parliament, will have the best and most satisfactory form of representation. In approaching that question of course we must not disregard the personal factors involved here in the House of Commons, particularly when an unsatisfactory method is being employed to make it difficult for some of those members to return. I do not know how long before that this subject was raised, but it was raised with great earnestness in the house as long ago as 1892; that is 60 years ago. On that occasion a man who later became chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada—I refer to Louis H. Davies—speaking in the Canadian House of Commons, expressed the opinion that parliament should "agree on fair and just principles on which to frame a bill". Then outlining his own opinion as to how such a bill should be framed, he said the redistribution should—> . . . have an authority outside the house to apply these principles to the country at large.

Mr. McLure: He represented Queens county.

Mr. Drew: It is pointed out to me that it was natural that he should have expressed such wise and sound opinions because he represented Queens county. They were wise and sound opinions. Unfortunately opinions of that kind have been expressed over and over again but have not been acted upon. Yes, I admit without any hesitation that members of the Conservative party have expressed those opinions and have failed to carry them out on earlier occasions. This is not something any of us should approach in the spirit of the kind of political badgering that was adopted by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. The question simply is whether the high hopes expressed by the Prime Minister when this subject was first under discussion were a real expression of the desire of this government, or whether that was simply a statement that was made as window dressing, with every indication of going ahead with the exact course that has been followed. In any event we have the words of the Minister of Agriculture that leave no doubt that there was direction in regard to the cynical gerrymandering of Lake Centre, with the effect of greatly prejudicing the position of one of the outstanding members of this parliament and one of the outstanding men in public life today.

Not one word has been said on the other side of the house which in any way lessens the strength of that comment which has been made, and made with every justification, more than once already. What doubt can there be, after listening to the Minister of Resources and Development, that there was direction in the case of the members of the committee? What possible doubt is there about the direction of the other members who have come in and said what was going to be done? What doubt is there about the direction there was in regard to Haldimand?

May I refer to Haldimand particularly. At the time this subject was first raised the Prime Minister expressed the hope that in dealing with this we would avoid political controversy, and that if there was any complaint the views would be expressed to him so that if possible steps might be taken to meet those objections. Following that request and following subsequent discussion of this subject, which was in no way confidential but related to the business of this house, I placed before the Prime Minister the views in regard to Haldimand which I hoped would receive some consideration. Nevertheless the course originally intended has been followed in regard to Haldimand, and there is gerrymandering of the very kind that was criticized so vigorously by the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King in this house and outside the house, and by other Liberal members in this house.

There was a case where Haldimand, which could easily have been combined with other areas to retain its identity, an old historic riding, was merged in a way that has the effect of eliminating one of two Conservative members in this house, one a member who represented the riding before. Can there be any doubt about the direction that took place in regard to the merging of Souris and Brandon? Significantly enough they are two Conservative ridings in a province which has three Conservatives, having had only one a little over a year ago. There again, nevertheless, the riding of Souris, represented for many years by a member who has given distinguished, loyal and effective service in this house to his own province of Manitoba, as well as to the constituency he serves and to the people of Canada, has been merged. After all these years of service the hon. member now finds himself confronted with the problem that is presented by his riding being blended with the riding of Brandon, represented by a brilliant young member who won that seat just over a year ago.

Then we have the directions that were given in regard to Huron, another riding described last night by the hon. member for Huron North as a riding with great pride in its own traditions and its history. We have the extraordinary fact of Wingham being taken out of that riding and placed in a riding with which it has had no historic association at all. There is no reasonable explanation of what has been done in that case, nor has any reasonable explanation been offered.

Then you have Frontenac. There again you have the combining of two ridings represented by Conservatives, significantly enough. There you have the member for Frontenac and the member for Hastings confronted with the necessity of deciding which of them shall continue to represent the ridings that they have represented so well for so many years. That is gerrymandering in the exact sense of the definition of that term given in this house by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. No satisfactory explanation has been given of that kind of readjustment.

Well, there are these ridings; and I use the term "riding" in Ontario where it is the term commonly accepted for electoral districts as distinguished from the term "constituency" employed in most of the rest of Canada or "district" in the province of Quebec. In these cases we have the significant joining of ridings which confront Conservative members with a choice of that kind, and still we see a situation of this kind, of which the riding of Algoma is an example. Algoma East remains with only somewhere between 32,000 and 33,000. Then again there are other ridings represented by ministers where that feeling that there must be some readjustment upward to conform with the changes that have taken place does not seem to press with anything like the same urgency it did in these cases to which I have referred.

All this brings us back to the fact that the sins of omission are as great as the sins of commission. There has been no real attempt to explain away, except on the grounds of political exchange, the gerrymandering of Lake Centre with its effect on the distinguished member for that constituency. There has been no attempt here to give any sound explanation for the fact that it was necessary to gerrymander the ridings of Souris and Brandon. There has been no satisfactory explanation for the gerrymandering of Frontenac and Hastings. There has been no satisfactory explanation of the greater gerrymandering in the case of Haldimand and Brant. There has been no explanation of what has been done in Huron and the truncating of that historic riding. There has been no explanation of a number of other cases that have been put before hon. members which affect members of other parties, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and others in this house, as has been mentioned in the discussions that have already taken place.

There has been no satisfactory explanation yet of the difference in totals arrived at in the case of the redistribution of Annapolis-Kings and the different totals arrived at in the adjoining constituencies. Nobody is questioning the desirability of associating one part of any province with another part. That is not the point. It is whether representation by population under some understandable principle has become a reality at some time or whether it has not.

I have reviewed the situation, Mr. Chairman. I have raised once again the very cynical approach to this important problem because of the fact that the people of Canada are going to form their impressions as to the way they are being served by the extent to which they are convinced that this is done in the interests of the people of Canada instead of in the interests of political expediency, which is the only thing that can be taken from what has already occurred.

If the government will recognize the opportunity it has, it can still do something to restore the confidence of the people of Canada in the action of this government. This is one case where every member of the house should hope that the government, no matter what party forms that government, should do what it can to establish respect for the institutions of government and parliament by what is done for the people of Canada in arranging for their representation in the next parliament.

We are only now at the first clause. It will be a long time before we dispose of subsequent clauses and the schedule in this bill. There will be ample opportunity for the government to reconsider its position. The amount of time that will be taken will be measured by the extent to which the government will at this stage seek to give some reality to the statement that was made by the Prime Minister when this subject first came up for consideration. If the Prime Minister's statement was intended to be a statement of government policy, then may I ask members of the government to re-examine that statement and see how far they have strayed from it in giving the instructions which were so accurately described by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. No hon. member need become impatient. They are going to hear a lot of arguments on the subsequent clauses and on the schedules.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You may hear some, too.

Mr. Drew: I hope hon. members will not become impatient, because there will be opportunity to express their opinions in more detail. But on this first clause I am still expressing the hope that between now and eleven o'clock tomorrow the government will re-examine the statement of the Prime Minister, that they will come to the house at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning and will tell us that that statement was really intended to mean something.

What we have been told this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture is that these committees were nothing but a sham, that the Liberal caucuses met and said what had to be done. Those were his words. They were told what had to be done.

Mr. Ferrie: Have you told them what they have to do now?

Mr. Drew: The hon. member who has just spoken obviously has not yet discovered that the government has not changed—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): And it will not; don't worry about that.

Mr. Drew: —and that the responsibility for government, unfortunately for the people of Canada, still rests with those who are disregarding so completely the statement of the Prime Minister as to what the policy of the government would be in regard to redistribution at this time.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Dickey: Whose turn is it? Get it straight, now.

Mr. McLure: I thought that at this time it might be well for me to say a few words with respect to Prince Edward Island, particularly the dual constituency of Queens. There has been a great deal of debate concerning different constituencies affected throughout Canada. I am not going to deal with any of those, and shall confine my remarks to the one in Prince Edward Island in which I am interested, the dual constituency of Queens.

In 1873, under Sir John A. Macdonald, Queens became a dual constituency. I am going to be brief in setting out the history of that constituency. I came here prepared, in case things went wrong, to give more detail. Perhaps I should say that after the census of 1891 there was a redistribution bill in 1892 or 1893 under Hon. Mr. Thompson, who was then Prime Minister.

At that time the constituency of Queens was divided into East Queens and West Queens. This continued for a number of years until, in the redistribution following the census of 1901 and under the premiership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the county was reunited and became again a dual constituency with the duty of electing two members, perhaps at times of one political complexion and at other times of different political views. I consider we should continue to have a dual constituency in Queens.

From 1903 on, further representations were made. After the census of 1911, that of 1921 and again in 1931 it was argued that the constituency should be divided again. But the prime ministers of the different governments holding office during those years were opposed to it, and believed it was better that it should remain as it was. In 1947 a direct drive was made by some persons to have the constituency divided into two constituencies of East Queens and West Queens. However, that did not go through.

I was not a member of the committee that studied this redistribution bill, but I attended two or three meetings, sitting on the sidelines. At the last meeting I attended the chairman of the committee said he would notify me when matters affecting Queens and the city of Charlottetown were before the committee.

In connection with matters affecting the subcommittee for the maritime provinces I dealt with the hon. member for Prince, who is parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, and met him on two or three occasions. We talked the matter over, and I found him most attentive in listening to what I had to say. From him I learned, however, that considerable pressure was being brought to bear to change the boundaries and make a division of the constituency so that once again there would be two instead of one. When I thought there might be difficulty, I offered a compromise whereby if a division should be made, one part would be urban and the other rural. However, neither of these suggestions received any further consideration from the chairman of the subcommittee, or from the committee as a whole. I am grateful to the chairman of the main committee and to the chairman of the subcommittee for granting the request I made that if they could not divide it as I suggested, it be left as the dual constituency of Queens. But they might have corrected one thing in the description of the constituency. It reads:

Queens consisting of the county of Queens, which shall return two members.

They should have added "Conservative" so it would read: "shall return two Conservative members." Again I want to thank the chairman of the main committee and the chairman of the subcommittee for the way in which they dealt with my representations on behalf of the dual constituency of Queens.

It has been proposed in the past and again during this session that some other method be adopted to carry out redistribution. I think if people would get together we could get clear of all these disputes about boundaries and so on. I know that in the little conversation I had with the chairman of the maritimes subcommittee we were able to iron out our difficulties, and I am better pleased with what has happened than if the constituency had been divided.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in the arguments presented by the Conservative party during the last couple of days, and have tried to follow them to understand what they want done.

With regard to Saskatchewan, I gathered that the leader of the opposition would like to have the boundaries of Lake Centre set by his party; then the rest of the constituencies could be arranged by other members of the committee, as has been done. May I point out to the leader of the opposition that any change made in the boundaries of Lake Centre is not going to materially help the fortunes of the Progressive Conservative party in Saskatchewan. The state of their fortunes lies with their own party, not with this committee. If they would make the hon. member for Lake Centre the leader of their party they would do far more for their party in Saskatchewan than could be done by any change in the boundaries of Lake Centre. I leave that for their consideration. I say it with all respect, but it is a matter of record in the province of Saskatchewan and is just one of the plain facts of life out there.

I felt some amusement following the remarks yesterday of the hon. member for Eglinton when he referred to the changes made in Saskatchewan. Usually he talks with considerable logic, but when he got out on the prairies of Saskatchewan he got himself more or less lost. He had been talking about the riding of Kingston-Frontenac, which he said was an empire of 46 townships.

An hon. Member: You are lost.

Mr. Harrison: Is it not Kingston-Frontenac?

An hon. Member: Get the right riding.

Mr. Harrison: Out in our country 46 townships is not a large empire. As a matter of fact a slight change was made in my own riding when they added some 60,000 square miles. The hon. member referred to Lake Centre as being one of the largest ridings in Saskatchewan. It may be in point of population, but in point of area it does not compare with my own.

Mr. Low: Does the hon. member mean 60,000 square miles?

Mr. Harrison: Sixty thousand square miles were added to Meadow Lake. Previously it had an area of 45,000 square miles, and it now consists of 105,000 square miles. There are 250,000 square miles in the province of Saskatchewan and I now have 105,000 square miles of it. That might be a basis for complaint. As far as I am concerned I think it is a tremendous area. A lot of it is sparsely populated, but there is population in all parts and it requires covering at least once a year. The commitment I made when I came down here in 1949 in connection with the 45,000 square miles—

Mr. Fulton: I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but will he check the figures he has given?

Mr. Harrison: I can show the hon. gentleman a map of Saskatchewan with Meadow Lake in its proper perspective, if a page boy will take it over to the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: From what the hon. member has said he has about half the province.

Mr. Harrison: I have close to half the province. When you talk about the addition of a few townships you are not talking of anything in that part of the country. When I came down here in 1949 I made the commitment that the people even in the sparsely settled areas would see me and be able to bring their problems to me personally at least once a year. That had never been done before. I have been able to accomplish that even though we have been sitting on an average of eight months a year here in Ottawa. It has meant the use of pontoon-equipped planes to cover that area, and the new area that is being added will complicate the situation, as it will mean that double the mileage will have to be flown. I want to state publicly for the information of the people in my riding, and especially those who live in the north, that the parts where there is any population whatsoever will see me at least once a year, and I include the portion that has been added.

This means considerable flying and some expense. I am sure some hon. members have no conception of what it means to cover a northern riding with an area such as I have mentioned. If some hon. members could come with me for two or three weeks when

I cover the north end of my riding they would get some idea of the expanse of that part of Saskatchewan.

Sometimes it is a lovely trip, but unfortunately we cannot always choose the time because of our duties here. The people in the north are very hospitable, perhaps more so than those in the southern regions. The simple reason for this is that they must depend upon each other for their very lives. No matter where you land they are willing to divide what provisions they have, though they may be very short at times. There are settlements all over this new area.

There are three watersheds in this riding. In the southern part there is the watershed of the Saskatchewan river. The centre part contains the beginning and the greater portion of the Churchill river system. In the northern part the drainage is into the Mackenzie river, Great Bear and Great Slave lakes, and from there up to the Arctic. That gives you some idea of the immensity of the area. As I say, there may be some complaints from various members as to what has been done with their ridings. I do not regard the matter of 60,000 square miles being added to my riding very lightly, because I know just exactly what that means in terms of being away from home. It means that during the four months I am not in the building here I will be on the road practically continuously trying to cover that constituency so the people will have a chance to see me. Whether that has been of advantage to them or whether they like it, I will be able to tell you better after the next election because, as I said, nobody has ever done it before.

I promised the people in 1949 that I would do that, and I re-emphasize now that I will also cover the additional 60,000 square miles in addition to the 45,000 I already have. If they appreciate it I have no doubt they will show their appreciation. I should also like to say that in covering that northern area one sees a great variety of occupations. In the centre portion I have to deal largely with fishermen. In the north there is a large uranium development taking place. That uranium development is certainly going to mean a much greater population there, and I have no doubt that by the time another redistribution rolls around a large portion will have to be cut off the riding of Meadow Lake. You will not see the riding then as it exists today.

Recriminations have been tossed back and forth across the floor and naturally I have been interested in hearing each member's troubles. However, we all have our troubles and I think I have them the same as anybody else. They are going to remain with me until such time as the people decide to replace me in that riding. Covering that area every year is going to be a recurring thing so far as I am concerned. You cannot have an operation on the human body without causing some pain, and the body politic is not much different. The usual idea of an operation is to endure pain for a short time in the hope that the body may become better and the pain will pass away. In this case we hope that in the course of time the wounds will heal.

As Saskatchewan has had to lose three seats the operation has been a little more substantial than in other provinces. I hope hon. members will be able to reconcile their differences, and in view of the addition to Meadow Lake I point out to hon. members that they are not the only ones who have trouble. If they think they have been badly done by I suggest they travel around my constituency with me. As soon as this session of the house is finished I am going to start to cover that 60,000 square miles, and the people of that area are going to see me before the snow flies. They are going to see me before we come back here on November 20.

I wanted to make that statement publicly to try to ease a little of the tension so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. The hon. member for Lake Centre and I are very good friends, and he knows that I would not want to do him an injury at any time. So far as he is concerned, I hope something can be arranged to help him a little; but so far as the map of Saskatchewan is concerned I do not think he has been treated any worse than anybody else. If he would sit down and discuss the matter with some of the other members I think he would find that they had to give and take, too. We all had to take some kind of trimming in order to bring our strength down to 17 members instead of 20. It is much better to sit around a table and talk things over than to cast recriminations across the floor of the house. If he does not think he has received as good treatment as anyone else I suggest that he should get together with some of the other members, discuss the matter quietly in one of our rooms and say where he thinks he has been treated worse than others.

I make that suggestion. I have always found it preferable to approach somebody with whom you have a difference in an amicable manner and see if you cannot get together and iron it out. I think that has been the purpose of most of the subcommittees, and most of them have done a fairly good job. Members who wished to do so could present their case as to why they felt something should not be done to them, and if the hon. member could show that he was being hurt worse than somebody else I think the committee would show some leniency in his case.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, at this late hour I do not intend to take much of the time of the committee. In fact I could not if I wanted to. I intend to discuss my own province to some extent, but I will not do so now. I was a member of the maritime provinces subcommittee, and I should like to refer to a matter concerning the province of Nova Scotia. When we first met we did not seem to have very many problems, and we had a very congenial meeting. There were two problems with which we had to deal. First there was the question of the constituency of Queens about which the hon. member for Queens has told you. The second question had to do with what would be done in Nova Scotia where the number of seats was to be reduced by one.

It was decided unanimously at our meeting that the constituency of Queens-Shelburne should be the one to be dropped. We did not discuss the matter at any great length, but it seemed obvious to everyone that that was the only logical conclusion to which we could come. I know it was mentioned that it was regrettable that it had to be the constituency of the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne, and may I personally say how much I regret his ill health. I wish to join with the Minister of Resources and Development and others in the hope that he may soon recover.

The minister and others have referred to Queens-Shelburne as being a Liberal constituency. As I recall what took place in the committee it was brought out that the constituency was usually a fifty-fifty proposition and that in the last federal election Dr. Smith won the seat by something like 200 votes at a time when there was a definite swing against the opposition party. That will indicate to hon. members that the Liberals on the committee did not consider that the abolishing of the seat was such a great loss politically.

It was also definitely decided—and this is my recollection of what took place as outlined by the hon. member for Melfort—that the constituency of Annapolis-Kings was to remain as it was. I have a definite recollection of that, and was very much surprised when I heard that there had been a change. It was understood that the affected areas in Nova Scotia would be the constituency of Lunenburg, the constituency of Queens-Shelburne and the constituency of Digby-Yarmouth. As a matter of fact after the committee meeting the hon. member for Melfort and I were with the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings and we congratulated him. The hon. member for Melfort referred to the fact that his constituency was to be left as it was. What understanding was reached later I am not in a position to judge, or why a misunderstanding arose; but the fact is that after the meeting it was agreed that since it was entirely a Liberal matter we would leave it to the Liberal members to decide what they should do with Queens-Shelburne. If the constituency of Annapolis-Kings had been involved do you think we would have left it to the Liberal members as we did? I am sure the Liberal members will agree that was the understanding, that we would leave it with them. I remember that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said: We will have to do a bit of juggling. He did not mean it in the sense meant when you speak of juggling things around to suit yourself, but he realized at the time that it was up to them to look after this proposition.

So as I say I was amazed later on when I was told that another committee meeting had been held—I was away at the time—and it had been decided to put half the county of Digby in with Annapolis-Kings and the other half with the constituency of Yarmouth. I am sure hon. members can see just why we considered that the constituency of Annapolis-Kings would not be touched. These figures were brought in to the committee. The constituency of Lunenburg had 33,256; Yarmouth-Digby had 42,783; and Annapolis-Kings had 54,930. It surely would occur to any logical group of men that a constituency of 54,930 would not be added to when you had two adjoining constituencies, one of 33,256 and the other of 42,783.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brooks: We never for a moment thought that Annapolis-Kings would be touched. As I say, we understood that it would be left alone. When I heard of the proposed change —that is, that Lunenburg and Queens would be joined to make 45,800, Yarmouth, Clare and Shelburne to make 45,595, and Annapolis-Kings and Digby to make 66,510—a constituency with almost 22,000 more than the others—it immediately appealed to me as being most unfair. We asked for another committee meeting, which was called; and at that committee meeting, Mr. Chairman, I moved an amendment. The amendment was to the effect that Lunenburg and Queens be joined, giving a population of 45,800; that Yarmouth, Digby and Shelburne be joined to give a population of 57,175; and that Annapolis-Kings be joined giving a population of 54,930—three constituencies which would have practically the same population. Yarmouth, Digby and Shelburne would have about 2,000 more than Annapolis-Kings.

Well, my amendment to the report was voted down in the subcommittee and I might say—and it happened through all the subcommittee meetings—that the hon. member for St. Boniface was the man who cast the deciding vote in that committee. It was three to three; the hon. member for St. Boniface cast the deciding vote and decided against that recommendation.

The matter was carried to the general committee and there, since that did not seem satisfactory, we put up what we considered to be another logical proposition. I might say here that the reason we spoke of dividing Digby county was because Digby county is divided into two separate municipalities, Clare and Digby. One municipality could go with one constituency and one with the other without upsetting the municipal government to any extent. We found out that the constituency of Shelburne was divided into two municipalities—which I did not know at that time—of Barrington and Shelburne. I moved another amendment in the main committee. I moved as an alternative to the proposition which had been brought in by the subcommittee, that Lunenburg, Queens and Shelburne municipalities, having a population of 53,619, be made one constituency; that Digby, Yarmouth and Barrington municipalities with 49,356 be made another constituency; and that Annapolis-Kings again be left as it was as we had been promised; there is no doubt about that in my mind.

There you have three constituencies, Mr. Chairman, with practically the same population; and I don't see how any logical group of men could ask for a change such as is being asked here when you give the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings 22,000 more than either of the adjoining constituencies.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Brooks: I will be through in a minute, Mr. Chairman. I listened to the minister this evening give us the history of Nova Scotia. He gave us the geography of Nova Scotia and he mentioned every combination that would have been possible in that province except the one which we recommended to that committee, the only logical combination that could have and should have been made.

If I had more time, Mr. Chairman, I would go on and point out the great unfairness that has been done to the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Winters: I just wish to say that I did mention the possibility of adding Shelburne in whole or in part to Queens-Lunenburg, and the reasons that was rejected.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

WAR REPARATIONS

COPIES IN FRENCH OF REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table copies in French of the report of the advisory commission on war claims. The English copies were tabled on June 18, and I said then that it might be some days before we could get the French version from the printer.

QUESTIONS

FLIGHTS OF AIRCRAFT A.O.P.-10,000

Mr. Coyle:

1. On what occasions since January 1, 1951, has the C-5 aircraft bearing registration A.O.P.-10,000 been dispatched on flights outside of Canada?
2. What was the mileage, destination and route flown on each such flight?
3. Were passengers other than members of the Royal Canadian Air Force personnel carried on any such flight?
4. If so, what are the names of such passengers, and in each case, what was the status and reason for travel?
5. Were such passengers carried throughout the flight, and if not, between what points was each passenger carried?
6. Having regard to the number of passengers carried and the over-all cost per mile of operating the aircraft, what was the estimated cost of such trips for each passenger named?
7. What was paid by each of the passengers named for such flights?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to making this question an order for return, with the following reservation. I received this note from the department because of the absence of the minister. As a rule, Canadian air force records containing the detailed information requested by this question are preserved only for a period of one year. The information asked for can only be provided back to the 1st of July, 1951.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Will note be taken of the reservation?

Mr. Drew: As a matter of information, in regard to the point that has just been raised and without particular reference to this question, is it to be understood from that statement that the records are destroyed periodically each year?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand that they keep those records back one year. Every month they destroy the records because they would have a great many of them. I am no expert in these matters; I am just reading the note which was handed to me by the department.

Mr. Drew: This is a matter of more importance than might appear from the explanation that has been given in relation to a single question. I would point out that it is a well established practice that each aircraft has a log book, and along with that log book is a record of the operation of the aircraft and its task on each particular occasion. It would be a most remarkable situation if the log books of the aircraft, with the entries that would go with them, were not kept in the way that has been the practice for so long.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only thing I can say is that if there were any objection to the reservation we would like the question to stand because I have not the same knowledge of these things as the leader of the opposition. I have no objection to allowing the question to stand.

Mr. Graydon: It might create a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. Drew: I have not had the opportunity naturally, Mr. Speaker, to discuss it with the member in whose name the question stands. What I am concerned with is not the fact of this particular question, but the general effect of the answer given. I would ask that this be allowed to stand until later in the day so that I may have the opportunity of discussing it with the hon. member, because in indicating agreement with the proposal made I might also be thought to indicate agreement with the broader proposition contained in the answer of the minister on this occasion. If the minister will agree to let this question stand until three o'clock this afternoon, I can have an opportunity of discussing it in the meantime.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No objection.

Mr. Speaker: Question stands.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons—Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce)—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with the discussion of this measure may I direct a question which might conceivably limit debate, if there is a possibility of that. I would point out that we are now still discussing the first section. I suggested the advisability of considering reference back of the constituencies which are particularly in dispute. Before we proceed with any further debate I would ask if the government has given consideration to the proposal made, that this matter be referred back, and that we proceed with the discussion of the estimates in the meantime.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, there were two suggestions made last night by hon. members opposite, that by the hon. member for Peel and that by the leader of the opposition. In effect the hon. member for Peel suggested that even at this late date we might reconsider the question of having redistribution effected by an independent commission and, if that were not possible, that there be further consideration of the five or six particular constituencies he mentioned at that time.

With reference to the question of a redistribution commission: this House of Commons settled that, at least for the time being, by a vote last Saturday. I have not interrupted hon. members opposite, after the first one had spoken, by suggesting to you, Mr. Chairman, that they have been out of order. In fact, almost every one who has spoken has made direct reference to a commission.

I do not wish to instruct hon. members opposite on how to act in debate, but I do suggest that when they go further and make the specific suggestion of some other system, namely that of a redistribution commission, they are out of order in this debate. Nevertheless I wish to assure hon. members that the question of a redistribution commission will be given the most serious consideration. There are views which are held by members, and which are strongly held, on both sides of the question.

It is not an entirely open and shut question, one which can be decided overnight, merely by the assertion by hon. members opposite that another system would be better than the one we now have. And I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I perhaps would be out of order myself if I were to discuss the matter, except that I was asked this question. However, I do wish to say one word about it, and then conclude this part of what I have to say.

Hon. members opposite have spoken in the most glowing terms about the success of what has been achieved in the United Kingdom and in other commonwealth countries. I am just hesitating to ask whether they read the debates of any of the legislatures to which they referred, for if they had I am sure they would not have made the statements they did make.

I am not going to give many opinions, but I am going to place on record one opinion, and then I shall say no more on this point. That is the opinion of the leader of the Conservative party in the United Kingdom, a gentleman who is held in the highest regard in this House of Commons, and whose words I have no doubt are frequently quoted by hon. members opposite. This is what he had to say with respect to a bill introduced by the government following the boundary commission report in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Drew: What is the date?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is reported at column 3042 of volume 448. He said:

> This bill is based on no principle except that of party advantage and has no sanction behind it except the party majority, obtained on false pretences and with an electorate utterly disproportionate to the results produced in the House of Commons.

And so, let me conclude my reference to a redistribution commission by saying this, that it is not a closed question. We can study it and I can assure the house that we will give the most serious consideration to this question of redistribution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister allow a question? Had he read that statement before he made the statement to Michael Barkway, as reported in Toronto Saturday Night of this week, that he is in favour of a commission?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I had read it before I saw the article in Saturday Night, and I made no statement to the writer of that particular article. If he chooses—

Mr. Fleming: When the minister said that the question would be reconsidered, did he mean with respect to the present redistribution?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No; I was going on to say that I have concluded what I have to say on that point, and I go on to say this: When the house decided last Saturday to proceed without having a redistribution commission for this session at least, it had reference to this particular redistribution.

At the moment I am not going to debate the details of this bill. Complaints have been made about it, and they have been answered most effectively by the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Resources and Development and other hon. members. But bear in mind that there are a great many members who would like to speak on this bill when the schedule is reached having to do with particular constituencies. It will take some time, I understand, to have that discussion. It is therefore the hope of the government that this bill may be proceeded with, to the schedule, at which point we can have specific discussion on specific items.

The leader of the opposition, closing his remarks last night, suggested that we should look at what the Prime Minister had said and, as he put it, see how far we had departed from the course he had outlined. May I read at this time that part of the Prime Minister's observations to which he was referring, although he did not indicate it specifically, as they are reported at page 1419 of Hansard when he was introducing the motion to set up a redistribution committee. At that time he said:

> This motion is being submitted to the house in furtherance of the statement I made on March 10 about redistribution. I stated at that time that it was at least my view that this matter of redistribution, the matter of the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons, was not a responsibility of the executive branch of our constitutional set-up but that it was a responsibility placed by the constitution on parliament, generally. I pointed out that it had always been the custom for the leader of the majority group in the house to provide an opportunity for members to discharge that responsibility, by submitting a bill for consideration by the house and which was drawn in accordance with the rules then applicable to the matter of readjustment and which, after it had received second reading, was referred to a committee composed of members of all the groups in the house, to determine the schedules that would describe the territorial divisions entitled to return members to parliament.

Now, that is precisely what is being done. We have before us a report of a committee appointed to prepare schedules. It is not the function of the executive of government to draw that bill—at least it has not been since a Liberal government in 1903 changed the procedure which had applied up to that time. Since that time we have always followed the procedure of referring a bill to a committee, and then discussing the report of the committee. The government recognizes that the bill may have imperfections in the eyes of hon. members, and for that very purpose it is brought here to the committee where no doubt amendments will be offered. If those amendments commend themselves to the majority of the committee, I have no doubt they will be carried. The place to deal with these matters is on the appropriate schedule by debate and by the decision of parliament, as indicated by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is clear that the minister who has just spoken has misapprehended completely the reference to the Prime Minister's statement and the effect of that statement upon the procedure that has been followed. When I suggested yesterday that the government should examine the statement of the Prime Minister I was referring to the statement to which the minister has just referred. What the Prime Minister said was that it was not the responsibility of the executive branch of government to decide what will be done but rather that it is the responsibility of parliament generally. We had a perfectly clear explanation yesterday which by no possible chance could be misunderstood, that Liberal caucuses in the provinces had instructed their representatives what must be done. The word "must" was the word employed in the explanation given to us yesterday.

That is not leaving the responsibility to parliament generally. What I was suggesting in my remarks last night, as on earlier occasions, was that the government let the committee approach this problem in a way that would recognize the very principle that the Prime Minister laid down, that is, that it is the responsibility of parliament generally. What has happened is that the committee has been told what is to be done. There has been a certain discussion back and forth and in certain cases some arguments have undoubtedly received some response, but no doubt was left by the explanations that were given yesterday at the ministerial level as to the extent to which direction had gone to members of the committee.

Mr. Gardiner: Nothing to do with what we are talking about.

Mr. Drew: It has everything to do with what I am talking about.

An hon. Member: What is he talking about?

Mr. Drew: The minister who has just spoken has said that that is precisely what is being done after having quoted the words of the Prime Minister. That is precisely what is not being done. Not only has the executive branch, but that segment of parliament represented by the party in power —we are told so frequently by the members of the government that it has such a large majority—have made their decision as to what must be done by their members on the committee, as explained to us yesterday at the ministerial level.

Without extending this beyond the point raised by the minister on this occasion, I simply want to point out that last night I was suggesting that this matter go back before the committee for re-examination, particularly those points which have been so much under discussion in this committee. When the minister says that amendments may be moved, they would be amendments in relation to a particular plan that has already been decided upon. I used the simile before that the only difference between what had happened on earlier occasions and now is that in this case the condemned man is allowed to see the scaffold in advance. That is the only difference, but in this particular case, if it is left on the basis it is now, the only change would be that he would be permitted to make a motion by way of amendment which would change the length of the rope. That is really all that is left when you are dealing with constituencies where decisions have been made.

I would still hope, when it is so clear that there are these specific objections, that the general committee on redistribution—I am not talking about the committee of the whole house—be permitted to re-examine this and see if they cannot meet some of the objections that have been made. In the meantime we would be wasting no time because we could proceed with other business that is available.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I just make a brief reference to what has been said. My hon. friend suggests that, because the Liberal members of a particular province met together to discuss the problems of that province, they are offending against parliament. By inference he suggests that no one else does that.

Mr. Drew: Now, Mr. Chairman, let us keep this on a reasonable basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Get a little more rope.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I hope hon. members will recognize that at least it is less inconvenient for me to remain here in Ottawa than it is for some others, and I am quite prepared—

An hon. Member: Do not worry about us.

Mr. Drew: —if hon. members—

Mr. Gardiner: That is why you are keeping us here.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Do not threaten.

An hon. Member: That is one reason we are still here.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to wait whatever time is necessary to have my remarks heard in this committee. I was simply pointing out to the minister that I was not suggesting for one moment that there should not be discussion; there was never any suggestion of that in what I said. What I was referring to was the absolutely clear and unshrouded statement that a caucus had said what must be done and that those were the instructions.

Mr. Gardiner: My remarks were with regard to the existence of constituencies; not with regard to any boundary lines at all.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think both parties have made their position clear and we might proceed with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. Adamson: I know the minister does not want to leave any misapprehension about the United Kingdom situation. I happened to be there at the time and the objection to that bill was that it was in fact a gerrymandering bill in that it did away with the twelve university seats where normally people of independent thought were elected and it weighted the representation toward Socialist urban and away from Conservative rural representation. Those were the objections to the bill.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I quite agree. I quoted that simply to point out that even under this wonderful system there can still be political objections.

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate on redistribution I first of all want to compliment the Minister of Resources and Development upon the very fair statement he made yesterday in the house in reply to the observations of the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings. As a member of the redistribution committee for the maritime provinces I endorse everything said by the hon. minister.

May I in passing say that I know all hon. members were glad to hear the minister say that our good friend, the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne, is improving in health so much that he may be taking his seat in the house when parliament reconvenes in the fall.

At the outset I may say that I had not intended taking part in this debate, for two reasons. First, I did not think that there would be any occasion to do so as I was firmly convinced that the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings, if not pleased, would at least be satisfied that the redistribution was fair to his party. However, his remarks indicate anything but satisfaction with the fair way in which the matter was handled.

Second, after he had finished his remarks and the minister from Nova Scotia had replied I felt that the minister had answered satisfactorily the criticisms that had been made. But when the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings had to commandeer or rally to his support outside help, so to speak, by calling upon members from other provinces and even from distant parts of Canada I decided that I should say a few words. Why did he not commandeer the Conservative members for Cumberland and Colchester-Hants to support his fallacious contentions? They at least know the conditions in Nova Scotia.

As far as the contention is concerned, which was made by opposition members, that an understanding had been reached by our subcommittee at its first meeting, this is not in accordance with the facts. I do not think that the member for Annapolis-Kings or the other members are deliberately misrepresenting the understanding that was arrived at during that meeting. To be fair to them all, I believe they simply misunderstood that understanding which was that we would not change the boundaries of the riding known as Digby-Annapolis-Kings from the description which it bore from 1935 to 1949 when Nova Scotia was a twelve member province. I think the member for Annapolis-Kings surely understood. Otherwise, why did he make the suggestion that the whole constituency of Queens-Shelburne, which it was agreed was the constituency to go and which, mark you, meant the loss of a Liberal and not an opposition member, should be added to the riding of Lunenburg? Why did he suggest that Queens and Shelburne should both be added to that riding? He did state later in the committee that this was said facetiously but if he understood, as he claims, that the matter had been decided at the first meeting, then even a facetious remark was unnecessary and uncalled for.

Before 1945 Nova Scotia had twelve members but following the redistribution in 1947 an extra member was allotted to us, and the constituency of Queens-Shelburne again came into existence in 1949. When we learned recently that Nova Scotia had to lose its extra member the natural course for us to follow, unless we were to drop a Tory seat, was to consider the plan of reverting to the boundaries that had been in existence before 1947 and which boundaries, I may add, had been decided upon by the Conservative government when in power during the 1933 redistribution.

[Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough).]

In drawing up the constituencies several factors were taken into consideration, not only population and area but community of interest which was another factor. The industrial life of the people living in the riding, race, creed, culture, etc., were combined to make up what we thought to be a homogeneous group of ridings. With respect to population, as already indicated the present high population of the proposed riding is made up in part by a floating military population which may well disappear in large measure when the present military activities become less necessary.

All in all I cannot think that the opposition can find great fault with the decision to revert to a division of ridings which they themselves set up in the first place, especially when it is a Liberal riding which we have eliminated. As a member of the subcommittee on redistribution for the maritime provinces, I am still satisfied, in spite of everything that has been said, that the right redistribution was made.

Mr. Fleming: There is one aspect of the statement made to the house this morning by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who was chairman of the redistribution committee, upon which I should like to make specific comment, and I am glad the Prime Minister is in the house because I think it also concerns him. Last night, when the leader of the opposition was speaking on this subject, he said, as recorded at page 4079 of Hansard:

> At the time this subject was first raised—

That is the subject of redistribution.

> —the Prime Minister expressed the hope that in dealing with this we would avoid political controversy, and that if there was any complaint the views would be expressed to him so that if possible steps might be taken to meet those objections. Following that request and following subsequent discussion of this subject, which was in no way confidential but related to the business of this house, I placed before the Prime Minister the views in regard to Haldimand which I hoped would receive some consideration. Nevertheless the course originally intended has been followed in regard to Haldimand, and there is gerrymandering of the very kind that was criticized so vigorously by the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King in this house and outside the house, and by other Liberal members in this house.

Further, the leader of the opposition also said last night, as found at page 4080:

> The amount of time that will be taken will be measured by the extent to which the government will at this stage seek to give some reality to the statement that was made by the Prime Minister when this subject first came up for consideration. If the Prime Minister's statement was intended to be a statement of government policy, then may I ask members of the government to re-examine that statement and see how far they have strayed from it in giving the instructions which were so accurately described by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon.

If I understand correctly the statement made this morning by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—and I take it that it was a statement made on behalf of the government—it is quite clear that the government now takes the attitude that this is not a matter that concerns the government. The suggestion was made that it would be left to the house because redistribution is a matter for the house. All who have a sense of reality as to the precise position in these matters wonder how the subject can now be made one that is not a matter for government policy, particularly in the light of the statement referred to last night which was made by the Prime Minister in the first instance.

With respect, I should like to say to the Prime Minister that, after the debate that has been going on now for several days, a debate in which some very serious questions have been discussed in the house, I think he ought to make a statement to the house. I consider the Prime Minister owes a statement to the house particularly in the light of the reference made last night by the leader of the opposition to the statement made to him by the Prime Minister several months ago at the outset of this matter. I suggest that the statement made by the Prime Minister on that occasion simply cannot be reconciled with the statement made this morning by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that this somehow ceases now to be a matter in which the government as such is concerned but becomes a matter for the house.

There is the first point. I think these statements cannot be reconciled. If the statement made this morning by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is a statement made on behalf of the government, then it cannot be reconciled with the statement made to the leader of the opposition by the Prime Minister several months ago unless in the meantime there has been a change in the position of the government with relation to the whole question of redistribution.

In the second place I wish to make this observation. How can it be suggested seriously by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that this is a subject which ceases to be a matter of concern to the government? How does it suddenly cease to be a matter concerning which the government has a policy? We know perfectly well that several government ministers have already spoken on this subject. We know how attentive government supporters in the house are to what is said by ministers of the government, and surely it is not a very realistic approach to this matter to suggest now that it is a matter for the house and not one for the government. I am sure that anybody who sits in this house or makes any attempt to follow what happens in the house is not going to be very deeply impressed by the suggestion that the government at this stage ceases to be interested in this matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has suggested that I owe a statement to the house. I think I do.

I think that when there is anyone in the house who implies in his speech that the members of the government are not members of the house then there is a statement due to the house to correct that impression. The hon. gentleman is a very good lawyer and the hon. gentleman realizes, as a very good lawyer, that there is a distinction between the executive branch of our constitutional set-up and the legislative branch of our constitutional set-up. It is my opinion, and in spite of anything he has said here I hope to be able to convince him so that it will be his opinion, that it is the legislative branch of our constitutional set-up that has to do with the definition of the constituencies which will send members to parliament; and that that is not one of the functions of the executive branch of our constitutional set-up.

Now, it is as a member of this house that I suggested to the hon. leader of the opposition, as a member of this house, that I felt we both wished this matter to be handled in such a way as would be fair to the Canadian public generally; and that if there came to his attention that there was something going on which he considered unfair, if he brought it to my attention, I would make it my business as a member of this house to see that the objections received consideration. They did get consideration but in the debate that has been going on here I think we must all admit there has been both in words and in implication substantial exaggeration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: From the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition last night the inference would be that it is unfair that there should be any change whatsoever to the boundaries of constituencies represented in this house by members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is not the real position of the leader of the opposition but that would be the implication to anyone listening to his speech and to the list of unfair dispositions that were being made. I am sure that is not his position and it is not the position of hon. gentlemen on the other side; and I am sure that it is not the feeling of hon. gentlemen in this house that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has not been doing his best to do a fair job—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: —in this report to the house.

Of course on these matters of fact there is always room for a diverging view of what is most desirable and what is not so desirable, but on the whole I am sure that all members in this house want the result to be fair to everyone concerned and these inevitable differences of views are things which I think have to be settled in this house.

I would deprecate, as I am sure the leader of the opposition would deprecate, the suggestion that redistribution should be the responsibility of leaders of political groups with an eye to political advantage or disadvantage. That is not what the leader of the opposition wants; that is not what I want. I said in the house and I repeat it now that I look upon this as something that is the responsibility of every one of us. Some of us may be members of the government but it is not as part of the executive branch that we have that responsibility, it is as members of this House of Commons. It is the responsibility of every one of us to attempt to get a fair redistribution under this system.

Now it may very well be that there should be some other system devised for a future occasion, but at the stage we have reached now the house has decided that this redistribution is going to be made in accordance with this procedure and I submit that we should get to the consideration of the details of the report that has been brought in by the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would ask all the hon. members who belong to the Liberal party not to examine these different boundaries in the light of what they may do for Liberal prospects, for Conservative prospects, for C.C.F. prospects or Social Credit prospects but in the light of what they feel is the proper thing in virtue of their responsibilities to the public generally as well as to their own constituents.

I know that every one of us has friends in his constituency who help him do the work that has to be done at election time to bring out as large a vote as possible—and I think it is in the interest of good democracy that there should be as large a vote as possible. I know from my own experience that these gentlemen do not like to have a new set-up of any kind suggested to them and that each one of us feels that we have a certain responsibility to those helpers not to increase the difficulties of the task they perform directly in the interests of ourselves and indirectly in the interests of the proper functioning of democratic institutions. It is therefore natural that each one of us should say: Well, of course this is a readjustment and there has got to be a readjustment somewhere—but if it can be made without affecting my situation I shall be very much happier than if my situation is affected.

Because there has to be a readjustment some situations have to be affected. Now they should not be, and no member of this house should wish them to be affected in any way that is unfair. I said at the outset and I say now that I hope each member of the house, to whatever party he belongs, will endeavour in considering each one of these matters to render his verdict, and his conception of what is fair and what is in the public interest.

The hon. leader of the opposition did communicate with me with respect to a certain number of matters and usually he said that he was not expressing personal views but that he was passing on views that were held among those closely associated with him; and that he felt that they deserved very serious consideration. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that in most of the cases there was consideration and that the attitude which the Minister of Agriculture expressed yesterday was the attitude adopted with respect to them. The Minister of Agriculture said that the Liberal caucus in Saskatchewan had been concerned that there must not be any wiping out of the constituency represented by the leader of the C.C.F. group or of the constituency of Lake Centre because, whatever the merits might be, it would afford serious grounds for misconception by the public.

I think the hon. leader of the opposition will feel that I recognized the same situation with respect to his own constituency. There was disappointment expressed in Ottawa that there was not a change made here; but a change was not essential and I was not convinced that a change would have been an improvement. I felt that unless there was evidence that a change would be a substantial improvement it should not be made.

There are other like instances but this readjustment is bound to affect constituencies represented in the house by government supporters and represented in the house by members of the opposition. That is inevitable but I hope that we can get to the schedule. There are some cases that have been discussed—the hon. leader of the opposition says "with great sincerity" and I admit that—but "great sincerity" or "sincerity" does not mean that they are right.

I think that when we reach each one of these individual cases they should be looked at with great sincerity by every member of the house and the right conclusion reached. The special committee that was set up has reported and is now functus. Each member of the committee of the whole should discharge his own personal responsibility as a member of the house in determining whether or not every part of that report should be accepted or some parts should be modified. On that, I invite all hon. members to form their own opinion, and not be influenced by what may be the opinion, honest as that opinion may be, of any member here who happens also to be a member of the executive branch under our constitutional set-up. I am going to take my stand on each one of these questions as it arises, not as the Prime Minister but as the member representing the constituency of Quebec East.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister has expressed an approach to this problem, Mr. Chairman, to which no hon. member can take exception in so far as that statement represents an interpretation of the kind of approach that all of us would wish to see followed once we recognize that, by the majority decision of the house, no other system of redistribution can now be adopted. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I feel that we must recognize the extent to which any of the hon. members, and not of the Conservative party alone, are undoubtedly strongly convinced that the approach which has been described by the Prime Minister is not the approach which has been followed in reaching these decisions.

It was because of that indication by the Prime Minister of his desire that there be an approach of this kind, that I had made the suggestion last night that there be a review by the general redistribution committee of the proposals that were made in the light of the discussion that has taken place, so that we might hope that the decisions of that committee would be in conformity with the hope expressed by the Prime Minister at the beginning and reiterated this morning, that we would be able to deal with this subject on the basis of the general interest of the people of Canada rather than the narrow interests of any particular consideration in one area or another. One of the difficulties of dealing with this problem at this stage by amendments moved in relation to each constituency as that constituency comes up is that the complaints which have been made are not of a nature that could be solved by a change in a single constituency. It would necessitate a re-examination of the general approach to this problem.

May I say to the Prime Minister that, far from suggesting at any time that there should be no change in any of the boundaries of the constituencies represented by members of the opposition, I have said exactly the opposite. I have said that in examining this subject we should do so on the basis of some agreed-upon principle which was settled by the members of the redistribution committee in advance of the decision as to what the boundaries would be. I never at any time, by inference or otherwise, left the slightest impression that I did not think the boundaries would require change. The boundaries must require change if this subject is to be dealt with satisfactorily. What I have emphasized on different occasions in my earlier remarks has been the obvious fact that old and historic ridings, represented at this time by Conservative members, have been brought together by the redistribution committee in a way that gerrymanders those constituencies, and prevents the possibility of one or two Conservative members representing the people they represented on an earlier occasion.

I have pointed out on several occasions that there seems to be a particular coincidence in the fact that there should be such an attraction to the committee in bringing together constituencies which happened to be represented by Conservative members. It was because those could have been changed, and these objections met, that I did urge that this matter go back to the committee.

I recognize, as the Prime Minister does, that this is not the first time debates of this kind have taken place. The Prime Minister has spoken of the earlier strong expressions that have been used.

Mr. St. Laurent: They have been used before.

Mr. Drew: As the Prime Minister says, he has heard them before, and Hansard records expressions on earlier occasions, which makes one wonder if we are becoming a particularly thin-skinned group of members when one heard some of the objections to the descriptive terms employed yesterday, which were terms that might be used at the most modest tea party. One can read the extremely violent expressions used on earlier occasions by members of the party on the opposite side, as well as by members of the parties on this side. This is a subject which, apparently, has always aroused very strong views. Undoubtedly, the views are stronger in direct relationship to the nearness of the problem to the individual who expresses them; that is human nature and is not unreasonable.

Mr. St. Laurent: The strong expressions usually come from that side, but it is not always the same people who are over on that side.

Mr. Drew: That is quite true, Mr. Chairman, and may I assure the Prime Minister that the members on this side are not always going to be on this side—and perhaps for not very long.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): They may be out altogether.

Mr. Drew: In earlier remarks, I did point out the fact that the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King had expressed the same view when he was on both sides of the house concerning another method, which I know I cannot discuss in detail at the moment. Unfortunately, when he was in the government the views he expressed, which were not contrary to those he expressed when he was in opposition, were not expressed at a time when a bill was under consideration which might have changed the procedure in a way that would have conformed with the views of many members in this house. Nevertheless, the views have been expressed on both sides of the house, by members of the Liberal party as well as by members on this side, and undoubtedly those who have sat in this house before during these debates must be reminded of those lines we learned when we were young:

> For old, unhappy, far-off things,
> And battles long ago.

There is no expression that could be used now in regard to what is taking place that could not be strengthened by quoting from Hansard, except that I am inclined to think if we quoted some of the things that were said by members on both sides of the house there would be an immediate appeal to the chairman, in view of some of the reactions we have seen to very much milder expressions on this occasion.

I only want to refer to the point the Prime Minister raised in his suggestion that I communicate with him. He did, as he has indicated, present certain opinions to me. I did communicate with him, but I was not presenting opinions with any idea that there should be a rigid acceptance of one point of view or another. The Prime Minister replied, and said that those would receive consideration. However, I do think I should deal with one comment of his, and that was the suggestion left in relation to the constituency that I have the honour to represent, that it was as a result of any representations of mine that there was a change in attitude in regard to that constituency. I have made inquiries from the members of the Conservative party who were on that committee, and I am told that there was never a proposal before that committee that there be a change in the boundaries of Carleton.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the leader of the opposition wants to be accurate on that. Early in the proceedings there was a very definite proposal put forward with respect to that constituency and it was asserted with considerable vigour, I may say, as well. There is no confusion on that point. So that there will be no confusion about it at all the effect of the proposal was not to eliminate a member, but rather to take part of the constituency which is contained within the limits of the city of Ottawa and make it into one constituency, subject to possible boundary changes which might develop, and to take the rural part of the constituency, which has some 17,000 persons in it, and put the three townships adjacent to Grenville-Dundas in with Grenville-Dundas, bringing that constituency up to some 40,000 in population, and putting the other part in with the adjacent constituency of Lanark, bringing that constituency up to some 45,000. The thing was debated at some considerable length, because there was the constituency of Danforth in Toronto which was very much under size, and the argument was being advanced by the opposition that we must not change Carleton, but we also must not change Danforth, although it was not much smaller than the section of Carleton wholly within the city of Ottawa. The matter was brought before the committee.

Mr. Fleming: As one of the members of this party on the Ontario subcommittee perhaps I should clarify this reference to the subject of any proposals for changing Ottawa, or the riding of Carleton. It is true that the hon. member who has just spoken, the hon. member for Ottawa West, who was chairman of the Ontario subcommittee on the redistribution, did touch on this question and did sketch out what would be involved in it, but never at any time did I understand that he was putting this forward as a definite proposal. I want to make that clear and I so reported to the leader of the opposition.

I think the hon. member for Ottawa West will agree that on the one or two occasions where this was mentioned in general terms his following statement was: "But I am not pressing it".

Mr. McIlraith: I must make it clear, Mr. Chairman, I never said such a thing.

Mr. Fleming: Well, certainly, if these were not the words—

Mr. McIlraith: These words were never said in the official meeting.

Mr. Fleming: That was the effect of the words uttered in the committee. One does not like to have differences of opinion between members of the committee as to what happened there. No verbatim record was kept of these meetings of the subcommittee.

Mr. McIlraith: It is obvious there was not.

Mr. Fleming: Therefore members can rely only upon their memory, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to state that my memory is quite clear on this point. On the several occasions out of I suppose maybe 15 or 20 meetings that the Ontario subcommittee had, a couple of times this subject was mentioned by one member, the hon. member for Ottawa West, and on no occasion did he give those of us who were opposition members on that subcommittee the impression that he was pressing it. As a matter of fact, his words indicated that he was not pressing it. It was a subject, he said, or an idea of representation in this part of eastern Ontario, that had been suggested not simply by Liberals but by one or two Conservatives, and on one occasion he mentioned one particular Conservative, not a member of this house or one who has ever been a member of this house, who he said was favourable to such a method of redistribution. But never were any of us who were opposition members on that Ontario subcommittee given the impression that this was being put forward as a definite proposal by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, just so I may understand this, because naturally I am interested in it, do I understand from the chairman of the Ontario subcommittee that there was in his opinion a proposal for a change in the Carleton constituency along the lines that he mentioned?

Mr. McIlraith: I am sorry; I did not get the first part of the question.

Mr. Drew: For clarification of this matter, am I to understand that, in the opinion of the hon. member who was chairman of the Ontario subcommittee on redistribution, there was a proposal before the Ontario committee to change Carleton along the lines he suggested?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there was the most definite proposal. It was one of the general questions in eastern Ontario dealt with in the earlier meetings of the committee. It was put forward right at the very first and asserted with considerable vigour, and it also involved another argument about inconsistent principles.

Mr. Drew: In view of that, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am more concerned than ever about the procedure that has been followed. I naturally asked the members of the Conservative party who were on this committee what had taken place, and they reported exactly what the hon. member for Eglinton has reported to me. And it is rather interesting that each of the three members had exactly the same recollection of what took place. Nevertheless, taking the explanation that has been given, I do want to indicate what the implication of it is, because this raises a question that is of some importance.

Every one of us is naturally interested in what is going to take place in regard to the constituency that he represents. For that reason I was greatly interested when I read in the local press that Mr. John McDonald, who had been the Liberal candidate in the last election, had stated publicly as reported in the press that he had—

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether we can keep the record clear on that point. As was pointed out to the members on the committee at that time when they raised that very point in committee, the first published press items about this proposed re-arrangement of Carleton were press items relating to the Conservative convention in a new constituency of Ottawa, and the proposal that one local Conservative was to be the candidate in that area, and then the usual news speculation about where the sitting member for Carleton would run. That is the first large press item on that, and the McDonald press item which I saw, and which caused the leader of the opposition a great deal of displeasure—

Mr. Drew: No.

Mr. McIlraith: —came days after the earlier one.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member's memory of events is strangely confused, and may I assure him that the McDonald statement caused me no displeasure but a great deal of pleasure, because it explained to me what was taking place, which is now confirmed by the hon. member who has just spoken.

I was very interested when I read in the press that Mr. McDonald had stated to a Liberal executive meeting—

Mr. McIlraith: Annual meeting.

Mr. Drew: —locally that he had seen a plan and that he was able to inform them therefore what was contemplated in regard to the Carleton constituency. On seeing this I wrote to the Prime Minister, and I think I should place on record the letter I wrote to him:

Ottawa, May 9, 1952

Rt. Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, Q.C., LL.D., M.P., Prime Minister of Canada,
East Block,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

You asked me to inform you of any matter connected with redistribution which I might think should be called to your attention. For that reason I am now placing before you something which could have far-reaching implications.

On more than one occasion Mr. John McDonald, who was a candidate in the Carleton constituency in the last election, has stated publicly that certain townships of Carleton county are to be transferred to adjoining constituencies.

I do not propose to comment at the moment about any proposed dismemberment of historic constituencies for what would appear to be a somewhat obvious purpose. What I am now calling to your attention is the implication which must be drawn from Mr. McDonald's statement if it should prove that what he said is correct.

Members of the redistribution committee have asked the chairman for any tentative plans which may have been drafted as a basis for discussion. They have been informed that none exist. You will realize that far more serious than any question as to whether certain changes should or should not be made is the implication in Mr. McDonald's statement that information which is being denied to members of parliament who have been appointed to the redistribution committee is being handed out to those who have no connection with the committee or with parliament. Mr. McDonald made his statement so definitely that very naturally the matter has been drawn to my attention by members of the committee who are astonished that they should on the one hand be told by the chairman of the committee that no plans exist, while at the same time they read in the press reports of definite statements regarding plans which are said to have been communicated to others than members of parliament.

I trust that you can assure me that Mr. McDonald's statements were made without any authority or foundation in fact, so that I may assure the members of the committee who have brought this to my attention that they are not being asked to sit on a committee for which the decisions have already been made.

I read that now because I was not in that letter discussing the merits or otherwise of any change. But I made it clear that what I was discussing was the suggestion that those not even connected with parliament were in a position to say what was going to be done, and that they had information which was being denied the members of the committee. That was the point I made, and that is a point, I suggest now, which does raise a question in the mind of everyone here.

I would point out that it would have been a very interesting thing if that suggestion had been carried out, because that would have meant the joining of two of the rural areas of Carleton with Lanark, providing the breaking up of the constituencies in a way which again would have presented a choice to two Conservative members of the House of Commons as to which one was going to continue to represent the seat.

Mr. McIlraith: You represent city people too, do you not?

Mr. Drew: It is situations of that kind which do raise the question in our minds and which have prompted the suggestion that even at this stage the whole subject be referred back to the committee on redistribution, with the thought that, as the result of discussions that have taken place here, they might possibly be able to recommend some amendments which would obviate some of the particular criticisms which have been directed to the decisions made.

I most certainly agree that the Prime Minister on that occasion wrote to me indicating that he had passed on my letter for consideration. I raise that now for no reason other than that of supporting my argument that if, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has said, he is prepared to consider individual amendments that might be put forward here, it would be much better if the redistribution committee met as a whole, and that these subjects be discussed with some elasticity and some opportunity for general readjustment, rather than simply dealing with rigid amendments which could only be made to a fixed basic decision that is reached in the house through the discussion of the schedules of the bill. It was with that thought in mind that I made the proposal, and that I do so now, in all seriousness, with a desire to avoid the kind of debate to which the Prime Minister referred.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, let me say at once that what I may say now has not been occasioned by anything the Prime Minister has said, or anything said in the house today. When I heard the Minister of Agriculture speak yesterday I was rather surprised to learn that special consideration had been given to the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar.

I want to say now, and I hope all members will take notice, that even to members of my own party, at no time did I make any suggestion that any special consideration should be given to my constituency. Let me put on record what the Minister of Agriculture said yesterday. These are his words as they appear at pages 4042 and 4043 of Hansard:

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that if the matter had been referred to a commission there would have been quite a different map. I agree that there would have been, and his seat would not have been in it.

There would have been no constituency of Rosetown-Biggar running down south of the river. There could not have been enough population obtained to put a seat there at all unless it did run south of the river because of the very situation outlined a few moments ago by the hon. member for Lake Centre, namely, that is a part of the province that is going down in population and going down very rapidly. Because it is a part of the province that is going down very rapidly and because of the fact that two additional seats had been put into Saskatchewan largely because of the difficulty that would have been involved in trying to make an adjustment of 25 per cent in population with relation to the population in other provinces in any one redistribution, we were given special consideration. I think we treated that special consideration in the manner in which it was intended to be treated by leaving the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar there with the result that the leader of that party does not have to contest the seat with any other member of the house.

And then this paragraph:

That was the first consideration and the committee acted upon it. If anyone wants to know what the opinion of the Saskatchewan caucus was on that question that was their opinion. The committee of three appointed by that caucus was definitely instructed that there had to be a seat of Rosetown-Biggar when the map was drawn no matter how it was drawn and that it had to remain there because of the special consideration we had been given.

I am sure the people in Rosetown-Biggar constituency will be very glad indeed that that constituency is to be preserved, and I am very happy indeed that I may be able, I hope, to retain my association with Rosetown-Biggar as long as I am a member of the house—which I hope will still be some considerable time. But I wish to say frankly that if the preservation of the constituency for which I sit has given rise to any injustices or great difficulties in other parts of that province, I regret very much that that consideration has been given.

In my opinion it is not the individual who should be considered in connection with a redistribution; it is the constituents. As I say, I am very happy that this consideration was given to my electors, and I say "Thank you" to members of the committee for it; but at the same time I think it is wrong to decide it that way. Had the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar been taken out, and had the population in that constituency been divided, undoubtedly, had I been invited to do so, I would have been happy to accept nomination in that part of the province where the bulk of the constituency was to be placed; or, indeed, I might even have considered accepting an invitation, if it were tendered to me, to run elsewhere in the province of Saskatchewan.

But I wish to be perfectly clear about this, that at no time either to my own colleagues on that committee, or to any other person, did I suggest that, if the redistribution presented difficulties, then at all costs Rosetown-Biggar should be preserved. And I see the chairman of the committee agrees with that, completely. That is a fact, and I wish to make it clear.

But even at this late stage, if reconsideration is to be given, and although I would regret exceedingly if Rosetown-Biggar were to be changed in any way from what it is, as well as the name of it, if justice demands that it should be done, then I wish hon. members to know that I am not standing in the way of doing justice in the matter.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say that the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are absolutely correct. He did not make any representation, nor did anyone make any representations on his behalf so far as I know, in connection with the matter. It was simply dealt with as I have described.

Mr. Fleming: I have one or two comments to make arising out of the statement the Prime Minister made this morning. I am glad he has spoken on the subject. I indicated when I spoke earlier that I thought the Prime Minister should speak to the house, and I am glad he has.

He has not been in the house very much during the course of the debate.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have read all the debates.

Mr. Fleming: I would expect that. Therefore I think I should tell the Prime Minister that he has quite misapprehended the position taken not only by the leader of the opposition but by other members of this party who have spoken in connection with the schedule. So far as I am aware, there never was any suggestion from any member of the opposition who has participated in the debate that under no circumstances should the changing of seats affect Progressive Conservative members. On the contrary, member after member has recognized the fact that there is nothing static about conditions; that changes have to be made in constituency boundaries to meet changes in population; that there may be decreases or increases or shifts here and there.

I wish to say to the Prime Minister that in every case in the subcommittees, as well as in the house, where a particular change proposed by his party majority in the committee was made, which was unacceptable to the opposition, an alternative was proposed on behalf of the opposition in the committee. In every one of the cases that have been most acutely disputed in the course of this debate the opposition offered an alternative that would have adhered much more closely to principle and which was not dictated merely by personal considerations.

Then in regard to the point mentioned by the Prime Minister as to the government's responsibility in connection with this bill and schedule: Mr. Chairman, this is a government bill introduced on behalf of the government by a minister of the government. During the course of the debate it has been supported by ministers of the government. Let there be no misunderstanding, it is a government measure.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Recommended unanimously by the committee.

Mr. Fleming: What was recommended?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The bill.

Mr. Fleming: Not the schedule.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We are speaking of the bill.

Mr. Fleming: I am speaking of the bill with the schedule. Surely we are not going to have a fine line drawn there. The government introduced the bill in the first place and proposed setting up a committee. At the moment what appears on the order paper under item No. 4 is this:

House again in the committee of the whole on Bill No. 393, an act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. (As amended).

That stands in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It is a government bill.

Quite apart from a question of that kind, surely we are not so naïve as to think that Liberal members of this house are going to do anything when they come to vote that is at variance with what has been indicated to be the view of the government in regard to these boundaries.

Let us look realistically at the situation in which the house finds itself at the present time. Every situation related to a province that has emerged from the recommendations of the subcommittee on redistribution for that province has been supported by government ministers. Here we have a government minister sponsoring the bill and the schedule. Surely in the face of that it is apparent to everyone who knows the strength of the discipline of the government party in this house that the only way in which this situation can be dealt with realistically and effectively is to follow the method adopted in connection with the redistribution following the 1931 census. At that time after several days' debate in the house the then leader of the opposition, the late Mr. King, who had led the attack on the redistribution, made the suggestion that the matter be made the subject of consultation in the house with a view to ironing out and adjusting the proposals that had been the object of attack in the house.

What other expedient will realistically meet the situation in which the house finds itself at the present time? Surely the people of this country are entitled to expect that we will face this situation realistically, and that we will not be led into a course of action based upon the assumption that Liberal members are not going to support the view declared by government ministers in connection with this measure.

The Prime Minister said that the committee was functus, but I must disagree with him on that. When the committee rose last Saturday night at about 9.30 o'clock the minister, who was chairman of the committee, said, "Do not go away, you may still be called together; the committee is not discharged." He then added, "If the house refers any matter back to the committee we will have to meet again." Therefore I am afraid that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration are at odds in their views as to the present status of the committee.

There is another aspect so far as reference back to the committee is concerned. I do not know that there is much to be expected from that unless the main committee addresses itself to this subject in a manner different from the way in which it has hitherto. In view of the fact that this is a government bill it seems to me that a much more sensible suggestion would be to hold conferences, as was the case, I believe, in 1933.

However, if either of those alternatives, namely, a conference or reference to the committee, is not acceptable to the government, there is a third possibility. This matter should stand until the public has had more opportunity to consider the subject, bearing in mind the fact that the final report of the committee on redistribution came to this house last Saturday and the details of the riding boundaries were not available until Monday morning, June 30.

The public has an interest in this, probably a greater concern than the concern of anybody in this house or indeed of all members of this house combined. It seems to me that the public has had the least consideration in the way in which this has been dealt with in the house. Is it not fair and proper that this matter should stand until the people of this country have had an opportunity, which they have not had hitherto, of studying this question and expressing their views upon it?

I am satisfied that if the bill stands, as it is my submission it ought to stand, until the house reconvenes on November 20, some members will come back with very definite instructions from their constituents which may have the effect of changing their views in regard to the schedule of this bill.

It is obvious that in that way and in that way alone are the views of government members going to be changed, unless the government itself decides on the course suggested, namely, that there should be conferences. It seems to me that that would be the sensible course to follow. The house is always under criticism when it appears to the public to be acting precipitately to serve some other motives than the due discharge of public business. We have seen that time and again. The impression created sometimes is fair and sometimes it is not fair, but the fact of the matter is that on this occasion when the details of the proposals were available only on Monday morning of this week, June 30, the public is unquestionably and inevitably going to come to the conclusion that this has been jammed through the house by the government majority.

What could be fairer under those circumstances than that the public should have ample opportunity to review this matter and to make the views of the public known to members who are going to have to take the responsibility eventually of voting on the schedule and the bill?

Mr. Abbott: The public do not care; it is only the members who care.

Mr. Mutch: The hon. gentleman is overestimating public interest in what goes on here.

Mr. Fleming: That is a most significant statement. The Minister of Finance says that the public does not care and the parliamentary assistant—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, he did; he certainly did.

Mr. McIlraith: No, he did not.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Finance said that the public does not care and members on this side of the house besides myself heard him say it right now.

Mr. Abbott: The public does not care about this discussion, it is only interested in the result.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Finance is trying to change it. The fact is that the minister said the public does not care and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs said that the public takes—words to this effect—very little interest in what goes on in the house.

Mr. Mutch: On a question of privilege, I said nothing of the sort. What I said was that the hon. member overestimated the attention the public paid to what he said.

Mr. Fleming: No, no.

Mr. Mutch: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fleming: That is not what the hon. member said. He said we overestimated the attention paid to what goes on in this house. He did not tie it down to me at all.

Mr. Mutch: You were doing the talking.

Mr. Fleming: He said we overestimated the interest of the public.

Mr. Mutch: Leave it to Hansard.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: In these two significant comments you have what it seems to me is a very complete exposure of the attitude of the government in this matter. What could be more plain? The Minister of Finance takes the attitude that the public does not care.

Mr. Abbott: No, Mr. Chairman. What I said was that members are more interested in their self-preservation than the public.

Mr. Fleming: That is an afterthought. That was not the first statement of the Minister of Finance. The first statement of the Minister of Finance was that the public does not care.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Easy now.

Mr. Fleming: That statement is not going to be changed. I repeat that the statement of the Minister of Finance was that the public does not care.

Mr. Mutch: That is what you say.

Mr. Fleming: That was said just as plainly as it could be. The Minister of Finance may feel unhappy now that he made it.

Mr. Abbott: He does not feel the slightest bit unhappy.

Mr. Fleming: He may feel unhappy that he made a confession of his attitude and the attitude of the government. He may feel uneasy about it.

Mr. Abbott: Not the slightest.

An hon. Member: Where do you think you are, on a county council?

Mr. Fleming: That statement is completely significant. We have the attitude of the government clearly exposed. They say that the public does not care and that it is a matter for us in the house. Whether or not the public understand the unfortunate loss of time—

Mr. Abbott: Take all the time you like. Don't hurry.

Mr. Mutch: The hon. gentleman is showing more imagination than he ever did before.

Mr. Abbott: I merely indicated that the public were not interested in my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. Fleming: See how the Minister of Finance is squirming.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: He would give his eyeteeth right now to be able to take back that statement.

Mr. Gardiner: You ought to be practising law in a police court.

Mr. Fleming: The fact remains that the Minister of Finance said that the public does not care. That is his estimate of the attitude of the public—

Mr. Abbott: And the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: —and the degree of concern of the public as to the responsibility of the representatives the people elect to represent them in this sovereign House of Commons.

Mr. Mutch: Public votes do that.

Mr. Abbott: They do that by their votes.

Mr. Fleming: That is the view of the Minister of Finance. Those of us who sit in the opposition have a very different conception of the responsibility this house owes to the people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: In our view the people are supreme.

Mr. Mutch: Would it be unparliamentary to say "nuts"?

Mr. Fleming: The people should have the final authority in this matter.

Mr. Laing: They will.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Did you have the same view in 1933?

Mr. Fleming: No one will find that out sooner than the hon. member for Vancouver South. I want to say—

Mr. Mutch: Must you?

Mr. Fleming: —that under these conditions, particularly in view of the startling confession by the Minister of Finance—

An hon. Member: Sing it to music.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: —that there can be no excuse for or palliation of what the government now proposes to do in rushing this through—

An hon. Member: Who is rushing?

Mr. Fleming: —before the public has a chance to fully understand and realize what is being done here in the way of gerrymandering, "jimmymandering" and all the other kinds of mandering being perpetrated by the government.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think there are one or two comments that should be added to what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton. It is interesting to observe that this debate is serving the very useful purpose—

An hon. Member: It isn't a debate.

Mr. Fulton: —of revealing clearly for the first time the attitude of the government toward this whole program—toward what is being done, and toward the public and the House of Commons of Canada. I know my hon. friends on the government side of the house do not like us to take any time.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We are not complaining.

Mr. Mutch: Take all you want, chum.

Mr. Fulton: They are always worried lest by inadvertence some remarks will slip out from them, as has happened now, showing what the attitude of the government really is. That is why they like to have things hurried through. That is why they shout so loudly when any hon. member gets up to express a view which does not happen to coincide with their own.

I was interested in the statement made by the Prime Minister about half an hour ago. In the principles which he then enunciated as to how redistribution should be carried on within the confines of this present system he put the matter on a very high plane, and I am quite sure that hon. members would agree that that is the way it should be done, if it is to be done by this method.

Unfortunately what has actually happened to date indicates that the Prime Minister is moving in a world of fantasy, quite removed from the reality of what his government is doing with respect to the very proposal now before the house, and quite removed from reality with respect to what his followers in the Liberal party are attempting to do. What has happened makes it quite clear that the matter has not been handled in accordance with the principles which the Prime Minister once more repeated this morning.

We heard from the leader of the opposition for the first time this morning what had in fact been attempted with respect to the constituency of Carleton. Instead of these matters being settled by members of parliament of all parties in the house, acting as representatives of the people throughout the country and approaching the subject impartially by way of informal discussions between themselves, so that at all stages all shades of opinion could be heard on the question of how these maps are to be made up, they have rather been decided in secret behind closed doors, and have been decided with definite finality by one group in the house.

The results were then presented to the rest of the members of the subcommittees by which time it was quite impossible to have any substantial changes effected in the maps. What would have happened in the case of Carleton—

Mr. McIlraith: Read what the former Conservative member for Carleton said in 1946 and 1947.

Mr. Fulton: —was only forestalled because the chairman of the Ontario committee, who is now interrupting, then following his usual practice of saying things out of time and out of place, let slip to the candidate for the Liberal party in the 1949 election what was proposed with respect to Carleton and that gentleman in turn, speaking out of time and out of place, let it slip to the press. The whole plan of what was proposed to be done was prematurely revealed and a withdrawal was forced in that case.

Mr. Mutch: By whom?

Mr. Fulton: It is surprising to find that the Prime Minister should have so little knowledge of what is actually being done by his own followers, not only private members of his party but also by cabinet ministers, as to suggest that the principles he outlined have even the faintest resemblance to the reality of what has taken place.

Mr. Mutch: Would it be unparliamentary to suggest that that is an impudent suggestion?

Mr. Fulton: What came out this morning with respect to Carleton was not an isolated instance. We know very well that the same thing took place in practically every subcommittee at the instance of the Liberal members on those subcommittees. That was the case in the province of Manitoba. You will remember that it was necessary for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to rise on a question of privilege and to point out that a map, with the boundaries of constituencies clearly drawn, had appeared in the Winnipeg papers, and particularly to emphasize that the report accompanying the map to the effect that it had been approved by the Manitoba subcommittee was in fact inaccurate, and that the members of the Manitoba subcommittee, other than the Liberals, had never even seen that map or discussed the details of what was proposed.

Mr. Chairman, it is to move in a world of fantasy to suggest that these maps and reports were not inspired by the Liberal members of the subcommittee; because the maps bear too close a resemblance to the maps finally produced for any other conclusion to be drawn. We found the same sort of thing in the province of British Columbia, particularly when the hon. member for Vancouver South was the chairman of the subcommittee, when a map in detail of the new proposed riding was reproduced in the Vancouver papers before the details of it had ever been discussed with opposition members of the subcommittee. The same thing is true with respect to the constituency of Carleton and particularly does that also apply to the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Laing: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the member has stated that an indication was given to the press of Vancouver indicating the territories before the matter was ever discussed with opposition members of the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Before the detail of the proposal was ever discussed, I said.

Mr. Laing: Well, in this case particularly I want to deal with this matter—

Mr. Fulton: It is not privilege that the hon. member raises.

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

The Chairman: Order. The point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South is not a matter of privilege according to the rules. If the hon. member wishes that the statement be made the hon. member for Vancouver South must ask the permission of the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, surely the point taken by the member for Vancouver South is a valid one. This is a reflection on his character and he is seeking to answer it. I submit, Mr. Chairman, with great respect that he ought to be given an opportunity of answering an attack which by implication is an attack on his character.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver South is not going to be denied the right of having on the record his interpretation of what took place. The question is when should that be done and how should it be done. The hon. member for Vancouver South chooses to have it done by way of raising a question of privilege. I followed what the hon. member for Kamloops said and I would say that it is a borderline case. It is very difficult perhaps on this occasion not to recognize that there might be some privilege in what the hon. member is complaining about; but on the other hand it is so much easier when the member who has the floor is asked for his consent. Normally, according to my experience, members give way and resume their seats, letting an hon. member correct part of a speech by an hon. gentleman who has had the floor. Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops would care to resume his seat and the question will be settled.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member says I have been incorrect as to the facts and wishes an opportunity to correct me I will gladly give him the floor; but I do not think it should be done by way of privilege.

Mr. Laing: That is my purpose. When I was chairman of the committee I met as individuals all members of the house from the province of British Columbia, including opposition members. I had a discussion with the hon. member for Vancouver East; I had a discussion with the hon. member for Nanaimo; and I had a discussion with the hon. member for Kamloops. I must say that I was very disappointed to find out the manner in which he treated that interview which was of a private nature without being so regarded by him. He wrote me a three-page letter and sent copies of that letter to the Vancouver papers. That is not the way in which I would have acted.

Mr. Fulton: After you had already published the map.

Mr. Laing: I had published no map.

Mr. Fulton: The Vancouver papers published the map you gave them.

Mr. Laing: I think the hon. member for Kamloops will agree with me or at least take the statement that I published no map. I endeavoured to work with the members and get their views. I had the views of the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Nanaimo and I am going to say that their views were of great value to me. I think they were in substantial agreement with the proposals that we made at that time. As a matter of fact, at the interview that I had with the hon. member for Kamloops, which I considered to be of a private nature and which he has made public, he was not greatly critical at that time of the views expressed—not until he wrote the three-page letter and sent copies to the press.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has made a statement which conveniently omitted certain details which are not pleasing to him. Certainly we had an interview at which general proposals were discussed. I did not, as the hon. member has claimed, release the details of that interview to the press although, for reasons which I will indicate in a moment, I think I would have been quite entitled to do so. No details of the proposed riding boundaries were discussed at that interview. There were outlined general areas within which new ridings would be located along the lines of what is now being done, including one seat for the city of Vancouver. This can be verified by the member for Vancouver-Quadra. No details with respect to where or how that seat would be fitted into the city of Vancouver were discussed at that time. Shortly after that reports appeared in the Vancouver papers discussing in detail the proposals for the new riding in Vancouver city and giving an outline of just how it was proposed to fit that riding in. Those reports appeared in both Vancouver papers.

The details had not been discussed with me although I was a member of the subcommittee. I know that they had not been discussed with the member for Vancouver-Quadra who is a Vancouver member although not a member of the subcommittee; and the details then published were quite different from anything which either of us had been led to suspect would be the way in which the extra seat would be fitted into the city of Vancouver. The report appearing in the press carried the implication, if not the definite statement, that these plans had been discussed with and were pretty well approved by the British Columbia subcommittee. It was as a result of these press reports which were different from my understanding—of the details as a result of interviews with the hon. member—that I thought it well at that point to reduce to writing, so I might have it on the record, my view of how redistribution should be carried out in British Columbia.

I wrote the letter to the hon. member on a Friday. At that time he was away and I was unable to locate him. I am not trying to suggest anything improper there because a lot of other members were away at that time, on a visit organized for members of parliament. It so happened that he was not here and I let the matter rest over the week end. On Monday, without any apology—and I make no apology for it now—in view of the fact that these details he had furnished to the press had already appeared in the Vancouver papers, and in view of the fact that he was not here and that the letter had been available to him for three days, and as these published reports were circulating, I felt quite entitled to release my views to the press and I did so. I have no apology for so doing. It was made perfectly clear in my letter that I was expressing my personal view. There was no suggestion in my letter, as there had been in the press reports, nor any implication that it represented the views of the subcommittee—when as a matter of fact the details referred to in the press had not been discussed with the subcommittee.

Mr. Laing: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, contrary to your statement, had been consulted.

Mr. Fulton: I will let the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra speak for himself. My understanding, however, is that the hon. member for Vancouver South had spoken to him about the inclusion of the extra seat in Vancouver but, from my conversation with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when the press report to which I have referred appeared, I was certainly advised and am under the firm impression that the details appearing there concerning that seat were as much of a surprise to the member for Vancouver-Quadra as they were to myself. I may say the detail of what appeared there was quite contrary to the understanding either of us had at that time. I believe there is further evidence that the report in the press did not conform to any understanding we had been given, Mr. Chairman, when I tell you that the riding as now fitted into the city of Vancouver, with the consent of the British Columbia subcommittee, is entirely different from the proposal which appeared in the press during the time when the member for Vancouver South was chairman of the subcommittee. That is additional evidence of the proposition that his proposal was not acceptable, and it certainly would have been so indicated to him had we had any details of it. We had no details, beyond a general understanding that a new riding was to be fitted into the city of Vancouver.

I have referred to this incident as another illustration of the fact that this matter is being handled in a manner quite contrary to the high principles which the Prime Minister outlined to us this morning. In no case has this been more clearly illustrated than in what took place in Saskatchewan. Although we were told a map was being drawn which would contain the boundaries of the new constituencies, no member of the subcommittee, other than the Liberal members, was allowed to take part in any discussions or negotiations while that process was going on.

Mr. Boucher: The hon. member for Lake Centre was asked to draw a map.

Mr. Fulton: I am referring to the discussion which took place while the map which was finally presented was being drawn. I have told the house before, and I repeat it, that while I was a member of the Saskatchewan subcommittee I asked to be allowed at least to see the proposed boundaries, even if I were not allowed to take part in the discussion.

Mr. Dewar: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fulton: I was told that I could not see the map until 12.30 on Monday, at which time the map, as finally presented, was first shown to us.

Mr. Dewar: You agree in substance with most of what the hon. member for Eglinton says?

Mr. Abbott: There is a big order.

Mr. Fulton: Do I agree in substance—

Mr. Dewar: —with what he usually says? This morning, the hon. member for Eglinton—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: While I have the greatest respect for my colleague the hon. member for Eglinton, I do think the hon. member who is asking the question should be a little more specific and tell me to what he refers.

Mr. Dewar: This morning the hon. member for Eglinton suggested that, in the Ontario subcommittee, each time a proposal for amendment or change was offered by the members on the government side they offered a counter-proposal. I can tell this house or anyone else that at no time were we offered any counter-proposals by the member for Lake Centre or anyone else in the opposition parties.

Mr. Fulton: I just got through explaining, but perhaps I should explain it again—

Some hon. Members: No, no; once is enough.

Mr. Fulton: —that during the period when I had anything to do with it, and that is the only period about which I can speak with any certainty, I asked to be allowed to take part in the discussion and make counter-proposals on behalf of the member for Lake Centre, but I was not allowed to be present when the matter was being discussed. I was told by the chairman of the subcommittee that I could not see the map until 12.30 on Monday when it would be ready in final form. What is the use of the hon. member—

Mr. Gardiner: The map was not in existence then.

Mr. Fulton: —stating that there were no counter-proposals when a member who had asked to see the map, and be allowed to take part in the discussions during the preparation of that map, was told that he could not see the map? And proposals were offered by the hon. member in the committee.

Mr. Dewar: You cannot honestly state—

Mr. Fulton: Could anything be further removed from the high principles outlined by the Prime Minister this morning, that all members of the house, as representatives of the public, should take part in the discussions, removed entirely from the plane of political considerations, so that the maps of the constituencies of Canada might be drawn in the best interests of the people? It is too bad that the Prime Minister did not get the members of his own party into a conference and lay down the law to them in accordance with the same statements of principle which he gave to the house this morning. It is too bad that, having done that, he did not also insist upon his own followers following the principles he had laid down with the same rigidity with which they have followed instead the principles of political advantage.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. member a question? Will he kindly tell us what political advantage could be gained in the province of Saskatchewan by any party?

Mr. Fulton: The matter has been discussed here for the best part of three days now, and if the hon. member has not proven capable of absorbing what he has heard during that time I have no illusions that, within the space of two or three minutes, I could make any improvement on the situation.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was obviously misinformed when he made the statement he did this morning concerning the opinions which had been expressed at Westminster about the commission. For that reason, I propose to read into the record what did take place, because it has a bearing on what we are now discussing. Since it will take some minutes to do so, I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we now call it one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: If the members are impatient, I shall read until one o'clock.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of hon. members that I do call it one o'clock or do hon. members wish to allow the leader of the opposition to continue past one o'clock?

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to read past one o'clock. We have the ordinary hours, and I propose to respect them. If hon. members do not wish it to be called one o'clock, I shall read until one o'clock.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

The Chairman: My understanding of the situation is that, since it was one minute to one o'clock and the leader of the opposition indicated that his statement would take several minutes, hon. members were giving him their consent to sit past one o'clock. If it is not the wish of the leader of the opposition to continue making his statement past one o'clock, it being one o'clock I do leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I had better say that I am acting as a pinch hitter, Mr. Chairman. It is not often that a pinch hitter has so little to do.

Mr. Croll: And does it so well.

Mr. Drew: One of the things which have been so conspicuous in the discussion of this subject has been the fact that, as we read the records of the discussion in regard to redistribution, we find that on each occasion that this subject is brought up again there is reference back to what has been said on earlier occasions. I am sure that will be true in the future. I hope that while many members may think that more is said than may be necessary, there will be assistance to future members of this house in some of the things that have been said, because this discussion will take place. Perhaps because the government may have been misled by some statements that they may have misapprehended, I do not think I should let pass an extraordinary misinterpretation placed before the committee this morning by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

In fact I question whether there ever has been a case in this committee where a quotation has been used which more clearly gave the opposite effect to what was put upon it by the member who quoted it. This morning, in referring to the different proposals that have been made, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who has acted as chairman of the redistribution committee, spoke about the views that had been expressed by members on the opposite side of the house from him. He said:

> Hon. members opposite have spoken in the most glowing terms about the success of what has been achieved in the United Kingdom and in other commonwealth countries. I am just hesitating to ask whether they read the debates of any of the legislatures to which they referred, for if they had I am sure they would not have made the statements they did make.

Now, the minister need not have hesitated, because I for one would have told him that I had; and it was for that reason that I immediately sent for a copy of Hansard when he used the quotation that he did, because I knew that it did not interpret what had taken place. He went on to say:

I am not going to give many opinions, but I am going to place on record one opinion, and then I shall say no more on this point. That is the opinion of the leader of the Conservative party in the United Kingdom, a gentleman who is held in the highest regard in this House of Commons, and whose words I have no doubt are frequently quoted by hon. members opposite. This is what he had to say with respect to a bill introduced by the government following the boundary commission report in the United Kingdom.

Then he went on to quote from Hansard and he quoted accurately in part from the statement made by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons in London in 1948, and these were the words he quoted:

This bill is based on no principle except that of party advantage and has no sanction behind it except the party majority, obtained on false pretences and with an electorate utterly disproportionate to the results produced in the House of Commons.

The quotation was left there with the impression that this system, to which we have referred with approval, in the United Kingdom and in other commonwealth countries had been condemned, and that it was in relation to that system that Mr. Churchill was speaking of the bill being based on no principle, and that it had nothing behind it except party advantage.

Let us see exactly what Mr. Churchill did say. He was dealing with something entirely different. He was speaking about a bill which had been introduced by the government, and that bill was dealing with a number of matters which went beyond the recommendations of the boundary commission; and it was those recommendations beyond the recommendations of the boundary commission that he was criticizing in such severe terms. It dealt with matters outside of the recommendation of the boundary commission, and in fact what Mr. Churchill was criticizing was that it had disregarded the recommendations of the boundary commission. Let me read one quotation from column 3029 of Hansard of the British House of Commons for March 24, 1948. There is a remarkable appropriateness to the words. This is what Mr. Churchill had to say:

If hon. members opposite think that they are going to knock us about to get their dirty racket through they are very much mistaken. Why was this information withheld? The boundary commission had nothing to do with it.

May I underline the words "the boundary commission had nothing to do with it." It was not the boundary commission he was criticizing; it was this bill that disregarded the recommendations of the boundary commission, and which carried out what Mr. Churchill described as a dirty racket. I can imagine how quickly there would have been a demand for a retraction here if this had been described as a dirty racket; but if one examines it, one will find that perhaps there would be less reasons for strong terms there than there are here in some instances.

Then we come to that part of Hansard which does contain the words quoted, and I am going to quote just a little longer to show how dangerous it is to take a truncated statement and use it as an argument to convey an impression entirely opposite to the impression which should have been conveyed. I am quoting now from column 3042 of British Hansard. Let me read what Mr. Churchill had to say:

The commission had done their work.

Remember, this quotation was used for the purpose of conveying the impression that this commission had not been satisfactory. Mr. Churchill was being put forward as a witness to the fact that the commission is not satisfactory. This is what he said, and I quote:

The commission had done their work. They had given their verdict fairly and impartially upon the basis prescribed by the government, and in accordance with the agreement between the parties at the Speaker's conference.

Now that the commission has discharged its primary task and placed its conclusions before us, and the government proceed to make further changes in the measure which they themselves take the responsibility for bringing before the house in accordance with the recommendations of the boundary commission, the last pretence of impartiality and fair dealing between parties is swept away. We are to have a redistribution bill—and I am glad that my words will go out, as they will do, far and wide throughout this country—which is deliberately based on no principle except that of party advantage, and which has no sanction behind it except the party majority, obtained on false pretences and with an electorate utterly disproportionate to the results produced in the House of Commons.

Then, let me quote a little further, because after all they were dealing with a similar problem, and since the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has quoted Mr. Churchill, let me quote what he had to say about this manner of dealing with a matter of this kind.

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Drew: I cannot help paying attention to a comment I heard from one of the Liberal members, "what has that got to do with it?" Apparently when a quotation which gave the wrong impression was given by the minister it met with approval, because the very member who has now made that statement applauded with great satisfaction when the minister gave a quotation which he had thought was a demonstration that there was no satisfaction with the commission system in Britain.

Mr. McIlraith: He was not here when the statement was made this morning.

Mr. Drew: I am reading from the very speech to which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has referred. I quote from column 3045 of the same British Hansard record for March 24, 1948:

> Anyone can see from what has already happened the spirit in which this process will be conducted and the object at which it aims. It is one which we are familiar with on the continent of Europe, in countries where the communists have established their totalitarian rule, where the Minister of the Interior shapes the constituencies in accordance with his own party interests, after taking such advice as he thinks fit.
> If ever there was a time to avoid the adoption of such continental methods over here, it is surely now, when the arbitrary regulation of voting and the shaping of constituencies, in order to secure the permanent domination of the party in power, is one of the principal objections we are raising to the totalitarian system in all its forms.

Now I have placed these quotations on record, first of all to remove any suggestion that the statement that Mr. Churchill made was a statement intended to condemn the commission system. It was a statement intended to condemn the very kind of thing that is being done right now. And when he uses the terms that he has used, and describes methods of that kind as a dirty racket, I am quite prepared to accept this speech of Mr. Churchill, which has been introduced here by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It seems to me that the words he has employed appropriately describe conduct of this kind as that of gerrymandering constituencies for political advantage.

We have read Hansard and we have considered this. And may I say that as recently as only a few days ago the Prime Minister of Australia, as I think hon. members opposite know, indicated his satisfaction with the way this system worked over there. And there is plenty of evidence that a system of that kind does work.

I would remind the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration again, in regard to that reference to the commission, that Mr. Churchill said the commission had given their verdict fairly and impartially upon the basis prescribed by the government. After all, the government and the house must be responsible for the basis upon which any independent commission will carry out its duties. His words are clear that in his opinion it had carried out those duties fairly and impartially, and we have simply made this suggestion, and based our suggestion upon the experience in Great Britain, Australia and elsewhere, where they have been able to carry out their duties fairly and impartially, as Mr. Churchill said. That was all we have ever contended, and we contend it with even more vigour now, in view of the reference made by the minister.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly flattered by what the hon. member has said, because it is an indication that he did not pay too much attention to what I said this morning. I shall read what I said this morning, so that there can be no doubt as to what was said at that time.

Having indicated that for two days hon. members opposite had been debating a question that had been settled last Saturday, without any protest from this side, in the hope that we might as a consequence get on with the debate, I proceeded to answer what had been asked of me by the hon. member for Peel, and said that I would break the rules only to that extent. I spoke in these words:

> It is not entirely an open and shut question, one which can be decided overnight—

I was referring to the question of a redistribution commission.

> —merely by the assertion by hon. members opposite that another system would be better than the one we now have.

I was referring to the system; I was not referring to a commission as such. I was referring to the system of redistribution by an independent commission. I went on to say then what had been said in the United Kingdom with respect to the operation of the system, that system being the introduction of a bill in the House of Commons, after a report. And I quoted Mr. Churchill on that point, saying that he disapproved of the government of the day, as he said, introducing political advantage by changing the representation by the report and by presenting it to parliament.

Now, there was no suggestion whatever that Mr. Churchill was speaking of the operation of the commission itself. The suggestion was that he was referring to the system of an independent commission subordinate to parliament—and that is what my hon. friends opposite have been debating. It is not to be taken as an argument from me that such a system is wrong, and that the commission should be rejected. I am not saying that. I am merely pointing out that every hon. member opposite who has spoken on this subject has ended up with the statement that parliament must be supreme, and that in Great Britain the commission's report is subject to debate and action, and that the government of the day must accept responsibility for what they do.

Now, no one can question, I think, that that is the opinion held by hon. members opposite. If they do question it, then I shall quote from what they have said. We will take first the leader of the opposition himself when, at page 3898, speaking of this system in the commonwealth countries, he said:

> The result is that in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa they have impartial bodies conducting an examination of this problem outside the House of Commons and presenting to the House of Commons recommendations which can be accepted, amended or refused. It has worked in the other nations of the commonwealth. It has found acceptance and has increased the confidence of the public in the way in which they have an opportunity to be represented in the House of Commons—

And I called Mr. Churchill as a witness that that is not a correct statement of what happened in the United Kingdom. He was not satisfied with the operation of the system there, as suggested by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Fleming: A pretty thin distinction.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): And again quoting the leader of the opposition, at page 3905 of Hansard:

> —a measure should be introduced which would set up a commission. It would proceed, having the advantage of all the discussion which has taken place, and it should prepare plans to be presented to members of the House of Commons when we reconvene on November 20, or at any other date that may be chosen by the government—

And later, on the same page:

> We are putting forward a proposal in regard to a method for effecting redistribution which has worked satisfactorily in the United Kingdom.

And then he goes on to say:

> I do not suggest that we necessarily confine ourselves to the proposal—

I shall not read that, because it had to do with judges as commissioners.

And then at page 3915 of Hansard the hon. member for Eglinton, who has just interrupted, said:

> There is no responsible quarter in the United Kingdom today, as I am informed, from which criticism is directed at the commission method of achieving redistribution.

Mr. Fleming: Quite in accord with what Mr. Churchill said.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

> If it can be made to work with such general satisfaction in the United Kingdom I do not see why, Mr. Speaker, this parliament cannot put it to work with equal satisfaction.

He goes on at a later point to say:

> When the report of a commission is completed it still requires a statute of parliament to give the formal effect of law to that report, and there will then be in parliament the fullest opportunity for discussion of the report of the commission.

And then later he says:

> Parliament then will have full opportunity of weighing that report and taking its responsibility for either enacting that report and its recommendations into law or on the other hand for differing or departing from the recommendations made by a commission appointed with the consent of parliament.

And then the hon. member for Lake Centre, quoting his own remarks in the 1947 debate, said, as reported on page 3930:

> Then I went on to point out that in no way would the setting up of a commission be an abdication of the responsibility of parliament, and went on to say:
> "Then the draft is approved by resolution of each house of parliament. That commission is one that is above partisanship; parliament still rules; parliament still controls; but parliament would not act unfairly against a political opponent."

Lest there be any doubt whatever about the view that I tried to express this morning, it was this: In the United Kingdom they have a system different from that in effect in some other commonwealth countries. The report of the boundary commission is not final, it is subject to debate in the House of Commons and to that extent, as it turned out, it is subject to political debate. The point I was trying to make was that this was not an open and shut case; there is something to be said for all sides. I went on to say that the government would give full consideration to the matter in the future. I did not indicate in any form that Mr. Churchill's remarks were directed at the work of the boundary commission. It followed in consequence of my reference to the system and I specifically attributed the remarks to the bill that he was then discussing.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, that is as specious an argument as has ever been presented in this house. The Hansard record of what the minister said this morning will stand quite clearly as to what he intended to convey and as to the veiled insult to members opposite when he said that he would not imagine that they would have made the argument they did if they had read the record. What Mr. Churchill said was that he was expressing regret that there should be these attempts to cloud the realities of what was being discussed. I can only close by quoting Mr. Churchill's words, which do not seem unduly inappropriate, when he said, as reported in column 3035:

> I have long had respect for the right hon. gentleman, and I must frankly and sincerely say that it was with sorrow and surprise that I witnessed him perform this disreputable job this afternoon.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

The Chairman: Schedule 1, Algoma East.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I have not been able to hear just what you are calling, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I am calling the constituency of Algoma East as it appears on page 4 of the schedule.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, are you calling the schedule before you call sections 9, 10 and 11? The last section I heard you call was section 8 and then you called the schedule, but there is a page in between containing sections 9, 10 and 11.

The Chairman: The hon. member and I may not have similar copies, but I notice that the bill has been reprinted and apparently I have made a mistake. I apologize to the hon. members of the committee. Shall section 9 carry?

Sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

On the schedule—Ontario.

On paragraph 3—Brantford.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to move an amendment which simply changes the word "street" to "avenue" after the word "Baldwin" in the ninth line.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 4—Brant-Haldimand.

Mr. Murphy: I am not going to argue about this riding at length, but I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming):

That item 4 in the schedule to Bill 393 be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

"4. Brant consisting of—

(a) the county of Brant less that part thereof contained in the townships of Burford and Oakland and that part of the township of Brantford lying south and west of Grand river and that part of the township of Brantford not included in the electoral district of Brantford, and excluding the city of Brantford; and

(b) that part of the county of Wentworth consisting of the townships of Beverly and Ancaster."

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, may I take just a moment to point out the effect of this amendment? At the present time the riding of Brant in general terms consists of that portion of the county of Brant lying outside the constituency of Brantford, together with four townships in the county of Wentworth. The house has just approved in item 3 a change in the description of the riding of Brantford to make a slight enlargement of that riding. This present amendment would leave the riding of Brant-Wentworth as it was before with one or two slight changes. It would mean that all of the county of Brant lying outside the new riding of Brantford would be in this riding of Brant, and that two townships from the county of Wentworth would continue to be part of the proposed riding of Brant and the other two townships in the county of Wentworth, which are now part of the riding of Brant-Wentworth, would become part of the riding of Wentworth.

Some of these consequences do not appear on the face of the amendment, but they will be dealt with when we reach the riding of Wentworth after this amendment has been adopted. This will make it possible to deal with the riding of Haldimand in a way that will be recommended when we reach that item.

Amendment (Mr. Murphy) negatived: Yeas, 22; nays, 63.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to say a word on this section before it carries. The committee has rejected a method of dealing with the riding of Brant in a way that would have made possible the retention of Haldimand in union with another portion of another county. As to independence in this house, I have noted that all the Liberal members in the house have voted against the amendment, including the Prime Minister and six other government ministers who are in the house.

Mr. Abbott: All the Conservative members voted for it too.

Mr. Fleming: I am glad they did. I wish some of the members of the government had supported the amendment.

I wish to make the situation clear because I am not sure that all members of the house appreciate the details. The point of this discussion relates to the riding of Haldimand. It was not suggested at any time that the riding of Haldimand should continue in precisely its present form because the population is down, but what was put forward as a much more sensible alternative was that—

Mr. Mutch: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member will keep an open mind instead of an open mouth he may hear what is the alternative put forward.

Mr. Mutch: We have heard it ad nauseam.

Mr. Abbott: Toujours la politesse.

Mr. Fleming: Haldimand is a rural riding and right alongside Haldimand is the county of Lincoln which has today a population of over 89,000. The schedule put forward by the Liberal majority of the committee proposes that there should be no change whatever in that very large county but that it should continue to have only one member for over 89,000 persons. That riding has a rural part to it and it also has an urban part consisting principally of the thriving city of St. Catharines. What was suggested as being a sensible solution from every point of view was that five rural townships in Lincoln county should be added to the rural riding of Haldimand making an excellent rural riding with a population of something over 43,000 which would have been almost an ideal population for that type of riding, and would still have left the very populous county of Lincoln with approximately 70,000 people.

That very sensible proposal has been rejected in favour of one that leaves Lincoln with a population of just under 90,000 and eliminates Haldimand effectively so far as the type of representation it has had is concerned by throwing it in with the riding of Brant so that there is a merger of two ridings represented by Progressive Conservative members. When you look at that situation which preserves great inequalities in the present representation in the province of Ontario, compare the rural riding which would have resulted with rural ridings elsewhere, and see to what lengths the Liberal majority in the committee went to preserve the identity of another riding which has only 350 people more than the present riding of Haldimand, then you have a very good measure of the extent to which principle was thrown to the winds in favour of expediency.

Just mark this, if you will, Mr. Chairman. In the case of Haldimand, with its population of just over 24,000, it became necessary in the view of the Liberal majority that that riding should be merged completely with a riding now represented by a Conservative member so that there would necessarily be the elimination of one of them. But when we come to another riding with just over 24,000 persons in it, and which happens to have just 350 people more than Haldimand, then it becomes so essential that that riding should remain, so essential in fact that all kinds of extraordinary things have been done in the way of picking off townships from all manner of surrounding counties in order to preserve the existence of that riding. Does a difference of 350 in the population of the two ridings I am comparing make such a difference that in the one case nothing will do but the merger of two adjoining ridings represented by Progressive Conservative members, and in the other case nothing will do except the preservation of the riding by throwing in townships here and there from other counties?

Surely there should be consistency. In the second case let me remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the area in which it became so important to the government majority that the riding which had only 350 more people in it than the riding of Haldimand should continue as a riding is an area which has not as high a population as the general area in which the merger of Brant and Haldimand has been carried out. The per capita representation of population is substantially lower in the whole area in which Brant and Haldimand are located than is the case in the other riding to which I have referred with only 350 more people in it than Haldimand and where it became so necessary, and such a matter of principle, that that riding should be preserved. It happens to be represented in the house by a Liberal member. In the light of the statement of principles the Prime Minister made in the house this morning, a statement with which no one would quarrel, I ask the Prime Minister how the recommendation sponsored by the Liberal majority on the Ontario subcommittee and the Liberal majority on the main committee stands up in the light of the principles he laid down this morning?

I urge that this matter should be reconsidered. Surely this is one of those cases where, within the principles laid down by the Prime Minister this morning, this matter should stand over for further consideration.

Mr. Drew: I do think there would be a practical demonstration that the very excellent statement made by the Prime Minister this morning is to be lived up to if there were agreement now by the minister piloting this measure that the definition of the boundaries of Brant-Haldimand should stand aside for reconsideration. I do not intend to extend the correspondence although I could give a number of cases where matters of this kind have been under discussion; but so that it will be understood that this is not something brought forward at this time simply with the idea of raising an objection, I do want to place on record a letter I wrote to the Prime Minister with regard to this matter, and which I am sure the Prime Minister passed on for consideration of the committee. I read it merely for the purpose of showing that this subject has been before the committee for some time and in a way that did not suggest that there should be any dogmatic approach to the subject. On May 29 I wrote to the Prime Minister with the usual formal address and then said:

Dear Mr. St. Laurent:

Once again I am writing to you in connection with proposals for redistribution in view of your request that I communicate any questions to you which are causing concern to our members.

Redistribution

The immediate subject that I wish to place before you is the reallocation of part of Lincoln county. Because of the very large growth of population in that county, it is apparently regarded as necessary that there be a division of that county. Various plans have been suggested, but the plan which is advocated by our members of the committee is that the westerly part of Lincoln county, including the townships of North Grimsby, South Grimsby, Caistor, Gainsborough and Clinton, should be added to Haldimand to make one riding. The total population of the five townships I have mentioned, in addition to the village of Beamsville, is 16,959. Adding these to the population of Haldimand would give a riding of 41,097.

I have been asked to place this before you as the suggestion of our members of the committee, in view of the fact that this is essentially a rural riding and our members believe that this is a much more logical rearrangement than any other which has been proposed. An examination of the map suggests to me that this would be a very satisfactory rearrangement, because the part of Lincoln county which would be added to Haldimand is a self-contained area with a straight easterly boundary line.

I have read that letter at this time because at the time that this was placed before the Prime Minister it was indicated that there was going to be a division of Lincoln county because of its size. We did not wish to see Haldimand disappear as a riding in the form that it had been and therefore this proposal was made with the suggestion that as a rural riding it would retain a natural association.

Now again I repeat that the Prime Minister has stated here an approach to the problem with which I am sure members are in agreement. The minister who is accepting the responsibility for guiding this measure through the house can give practical proof that the statement of the Prime Minister is a statement which is going to be followed by those who support him and I would hope that even after what has already been said he would agree at this time to refer this subject back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. Cavers: As reference has been made to the county which I have the honour to represent, the county of Lincoln, by the hon. member for Eglinton and by the hon. leader of the opposition, I think I ought to say a word in connection with the matter now being discussed.

First, it is my opinion, and this has been referred to by several members here today, that the wishes of the people who live in the county should be respected to some extent. In the last week I have received letters from the reeve of the township of North Grimsby, the mayor of the town of Grimsby, the deputy reeve of the township of Clinton, the reeve of the town of Beamsville, the reeve of the township of South Grimsby who is also warden of the county of Lincoln, and the reeve of the county of Gainsborough, expressing their desire that those townships and towns should remain as part of a single constituency made up of the county of Lincoln.

Now, I realize as I think most members realize that voters do not like to be shifted from one constituency into another; from one county into another county, although in many cases it is necessary to be done; but I think where possible it is the interest of the people who reside in the riding that should be considered more than that of the members who represent them. Secondly there is to be considered the question of the interest of the county. Our country is a large country. Some of the constituencies in this house—those in western Canada—are chiefly concerned with wheat. There are other constituencies on the Atlantic seaboard which are concerned solely with fishing. In our own province of Ontario we have the riding represented by the hon. member for Sudbury which is chiefly concerned with mining. There are other constituencies concerned with lumbering, but the constituency that I represent and part of the constituency which it is desired to eliminate from the county of Lincoln is one which is concerned chiefly with fruit growing. They grow cherries, peaches and grapes. The grape growing industry has developed a fine wine industry chiefly in the county of Lincoln. None of those interests are common to the county of Haldimand. Then, more recently we have had a problem of which I have spoken before in this house, the problem of erosion of the shores of lake Ontario. That is a problem with which we have not had rapid success but I am sure we will move gradually towards a more satisfactory arrangement. At this time I might just say that I wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth who has co-operated to the full in trying to solve the problem; but that problem is no problem at all for the county of Haldimand.

So, I think the problem of interests must be considered in a redistribution of this kind. Now, I should like to refer to the matter of historic association. Last evening when speaking in the House of Commons the leader of the opposition at page 4080 of Hansard stated:

We have the extraordinary fact of Wingham being taken out of that riding and placed in a riding with which it has had no historic association at all.

I might say that in our riding the townships of North Grimsby, South Grimsby, Caistor, Gainsborough and Clinton and the towns of Beamsville and Grimsby have had entirely no historic association with the county of Haldimand. The county seat of Haldimand is Cayuga and the principal town is Dunnville. In our constituency which lies below the mountain the county seat is St. Catharines. Most of the people from Clinton, Beamsville, North Grimsby, South Grimsby, and Grimsby come to St. Catharines or Hamilton, so I say there is no historic association at all with the county of Haldimand.

Then with regard to historical significance, I believe the constituency I represent in this house takes second place to none. It was the seat of the first government in Upper Canada which was held at Navy Hall in Niagara-on-the-Lake then known as Newark. The great battle of Queenston Heights was fought within the boundaries of my constituency and Major General Isaac Brock is commemorated by a fine monument in Queenston Heights park.

The riding of Lincoln was created in 1882 by the late Sir John A. Macdonald. It was ratified by the late Lord Bennett in the redistribution bill of 1933. It was continued by the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King in 1947 and I am pleased to know that it is to be continued as a single entity under this present administration. After the next census I am sure, with the rapid growth we have had in St. Catharines and the county of Lincoln, we will be well between 110,000 and 120,000, and at that time there will be ample room for two constituencies within the boundaries of the county of Lincoln.

I desire to quote one reference, a reference used on former occasions by the leader of the opposition. It is a biblical injunction and I should like to use it in a context different from that used by the leader of the opposition:

"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good".

I wish to continue serving the good people of the county of Lincoln. As a native son of that county the people of Lincoln have been good to me, and I shall be happy to serve them just as long as they desire me to be here. I shall endeavour to serve them conscientiously and to the best of my ability.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am just going to make a reference to what I have said, but I shall be glad to defer to the hon. member.

Mr. McIlraith: I am always deferential to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I was going to point out, as stated in my letter to the Prime Minister, it had been understood that the population included in Lincoln county was going to lead to the necessity of some readjustment. It was in relation to that that the suggestion which had been made was made.

May I say further that I am glad to be reminded of the biblical quotation to which the hon. member for Lincoln has just referred, because in some of the arguments he has used he has offered proof of the arguments we have been making. He has been suggesting that there should be some relationship and association maintained in carrying out this readjustment. Every argument that he has made would suggest reasons for a reconsideration along the lines that we have been putting forward. It is quite true that historic records should be preserved. He has every reason for pride in the traditions of that county, and in such events as the battle of Queenston Heights. But of course, there were other historic events in Haldimand which apply to earlier days. It is with the thought in mind that those associations are worth preserving, and that there may be some possibility of some respect for those traditions in the adjustments that are made, that I still keep the suggestion before the minister who is accepting the responsibility for guiding this measure that consideration be given to the riding of Haldimand along the very lines referred to by the member for Lincoln in quoting what I have said earlier in this debate.

Mr. McIlraith: Just before we vote on this motion, I believe it is appropriate that some of the facts with respect to this proposed constituency be placed before the committee. In speaking the other night the present member for Haldimand addressed himself particularly to the subject matter of his own constituency in a way that, while I might differ with some of the minor points he was discussing, I thought did him a great deal of credit. I must say it was the one speech from the opposition party in this debate that I thought was relevant throughout and well done.

I can only recall my own remarks in that connection when I spoke about this county of Haldimand on the previous day. These counties, of course, have fine historical background. It is difficult in any committee when you are adding to a county or taking away from a county. There have been some misconceptions about this situation.

The fact is that Haldimand is the second smallest constituency in the province of Ontario. The fact is that it is an old county with a good road system, easily accessible. The fact is that its area is relatively small, approximately 490 square miles. What was not said by the hon. member for Eglinton in his remarks this afternoon was what happened when that former constituency of Brant-Wentworth—if I am correct I believe he used the term "amalgamated" in referring to the two constituencies.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think I used the word "amalgamated".

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, I think the point I wish to make is one with which you will agree. I understood you to say that the constituencies represented by the members for Brant-Wentworth and Haldimand were combined together. I think there is no difference between us—

Mr. Fleming: I said that the county of Brant, excluding the riding of Brantford, is to be united under this proposal with the county of Haldimand.

Mr. McIlraith: Just before I deal with that, may I say that a great deal has been said about the history of this constituency as opposed to the history of the county. This present constituency of Haldimand was created in 1903. It has a history as a constituency, although a very fine county history, only going back to 1903. It is rather of interest to note that prior to that time it had with it a part of the county of Welland. Now, that is the history of that constituency. What has been done?

Under this proposal the county of Welland has been divided in two, and I think all hon. members will agree that was a reasonable and proper thing to do. Turning to Brant-Wentworth, I should like to say that that constituency included the suburbs of Brantford and part of the corporation of the city of Hamilton, a part of the county of Wentworth and the main part of the county of Brant. What has happened is that in addition to the new constituency in Welland, another new constituency has been created in the Hamilton-Wentworth area.

Now, the difficulty in which the opposition are finding themselves, and which they have not explained to the house, is that the present member for Brant-Wentworth does not live in that part of his constituency which is now in Hamilton city.

Mr. Hees: What difference does that make?

Mr. McIlraith: The present member for Brant-Wentworth does not live in that part of his constituency which was put into Hamilton city.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I interrupt to say that this linking of Brant-Wentworth is foolish if you know the actual territory. About three square city blocks, which were part of the township of Ancaster, could scarcely be described as the city of Hamilton.

Mr. McIlraith: I was coming to that. It could scarcely be described as the city of Hamilton, but it is within the corporate limits of the city of Hamilton.

Mrs. Fairclough: For two years.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, in 1951.

Mr. Lennard: I might say that it was only two years ago that it was taken into the corporation of the city of Hamilton.

Mr. McIlraith: That is quite correct, and that is precisely what causes embarrassment to the opposition. The hon. member does not live in that part, so he cannot run in the new constituency. I think there is no difference; at least nothing so far has been said by the opposition about the internal lines—

Mr. Hees: Why cannot the hon. member run wherever he wants to?

Mr. McIlraith: That is precisely my point. I want to show how inconsistent your interjection is with the arguments you have advanced in the last three days. The internal boundaries of the city of Hamilton are not at issue, so far as I know, and they completely meet the wishes of the opposition. In so far as there were going to be three seats, I think the internal boundaries are agreeable, so nothing turns on that.

Now, this new constituency of Wentworth, when this Hamilton part was taken out which was in Brant, combines the rural part of Wentworth constituency and the Wentworth part of Brant-Wentworth into one constituency. The hon. member who represents Brant-Wentworth constituency must not intend to run in the rural part of the new constituency of Wentworth, otherwise there would be no case to be made there. In any event, the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth does not live in Wentworth county. The difficulty arises from the fact that he apparently lives in the Brant county part of his present constituency. He is free to stand for nomination wherever he wishes. That is the right of any citizen who is entitled to stand as a candidate. I point that out because the effect of the argument of the members of the opposition is to lead one to believe that two constituencies represented by members of the Conservative party in the house have been amalgamated. That is not the fact.

Mr. Hees: Yes, it is.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Broadview apparently knows all about this.

Mr. Hees: I know enough to follow simple facts.

Mr. McIlraith: One can judge what he knows from his conduct in the house. That is the way we ought to judge him, and it is the way he must be judged.

It is interesting to note that the population of the constituency of Brant-Wentworth that is in Brant county is less than half the population of the constituency. Not only that, but I would point out that the suburbs of the city of Brantford, the irregularly described piece of the suburbs, are added to Brantford. Had the hon. member lived in that area I presume he would seek nomination in the constituency of Brantford, though that again is entirely his business and certainly not mine. But I do point that out in order to illustrate the wrong impression that is being created by the arguments of the opposition.

Mr. Hees: Will the hon. member permit a question? Can he explain to us what difference it makes where a man lives, and where he seeks nomination? That is a perfectly proper question.

Mr. McIlraith: I shall be very glad to answer the question. I think it will help hon. members in assessing the nature of the question if I point out that the whole case of the opposition in respect to the addition of a part of Brant-Wentworth constituency to the second smallest constituency, Haldimand, in the province has been based on the fact that two constituencies represented by members of the opposition were amalgamated. That was the whole case made by every member of the opposition on this question, and I thank the hon. member for asking me the question, because it enables me to clarify the point.

Mr. Hees: What I asked the parliamentary assistant was, what bearing has the fact that a man lives in a certain place, on his seeking nomination in some other riding? The parliamentary assistant seems to be making a case out of that.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; that is another good question. Legally it has none, but it is usually considered advantageous if you live within the constituency in which you seek nomination.

Mr. Hees: Since when did members of the Liberal party begin to worry about our public relations?

Mr. McIlraith: In this case—

Mr. Hees: Don't bother about us.

Mr. McIlraith: The whole argument of the official opposition has been that two constituencies represented by members of the opposition party are going to be combined into one. Nothing of the sort has happened.

Mr. Hees: Well, of all the nonsense!

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we will have something to say about Toronto and the Yorks when we come to them. The hon. member may well have his opportunity to argue this afternoon.

The second important point about the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton who I must say, unlike his colleague from Broadview, did address himself specifically to the point, is that he did not deal with the problem of what constituency he proposed to eliminate from the schedule but he made quite clear—and I think properly so—what he would do in the immediate area of Haldimand. The effect of that is to add one member to the schedule. He did not say which constituency in the province he proposed to eliminate from the schedule, and of course that follows as a necessary action from what he is now arguing.

Mr. Lennard: Just to correct the impression that has been fostered in the last few minutes, I wish to say that when the last redistribution took place and four townships were removed from the county of Wentworth and put into the riding of Brant-Wentworth I was gerrymandered out of Wentworth county, because I have lived since the last election in the constituency of Brant-Wentworth. I do not live in Wentworth constituency, and I might add that I have never raised any argument about that; I have never complained about it.

Mr. McIlraith: I noticed that.

Mr. Lennard: Furthermore it might interest the hon. member to know that in the new redistribution scheme the hon. member for Hamilton East, as it is still called, does not live in his riding; he lives in the proposed riding of Hamilton South East.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Lennard: I do not think it is any argument at all, especially from the opposition standpoint. I never raised the question at any time during the past few years that I had been gerrymandered out of my own riding. I never gave it a thought.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I interrupt at this point—I hardly thought this question would arise—just to keep the record straight. My hon. friend will agree that at that time, before the change was made, he was informed that apparently the change would in fact move him out of his constituency and he agreed to do what he has now said he did, namely say nothing about it.

Mr. Lennard: I brought it up merely because it was brought up this afternoon; that is all.

Mr. Murphy: I may as well say what I have to say on this amendment instead of waiting for another amendment which I have, and on which I will repeat what I am going to say now. I think I will be in order, at least I am told I will be.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Lincoln. I do not think he surprised anybody in this house. He mentioned getting letters from certain areas in the county of Lincoln. It so happens that the areas from which he got the letters were the ones we proposed bringing into the county and making it Haldimand-Lincoln. I can understand his position, as can any other hon. member, in that he would like to retain the whole county. Maybe it is too bad for the committee and for the work of the committee that he was not a member of it. We might have had some principle carried forward on a fair and equitable basis.

He gives another reason why the two areas should not be combined. He has an erosion problem. Well, I think that problem is quite common today to all ridings on the great lakes. Haldimand also has an erosion problem.

In commenting upon the various ridings the hon. member who just took his seat spoke about Welland requiring two seats and Hamilton requiring an additional seat. We have never objected to that proposal because we thought it was fair. No member on the government side of the committee can say that we did not take a fair attitude all through the proceedings of the committee. I know it was a waste of time so far as we were concerned. We could have been doing something else in the house, or we could have gone fishing.

The hon. member spoke about the size of the riding. In the last few minutes he tried to justify the Brant-Wentworth and Brantford set-up. He said they should have been dislocated as they have been, or as it is proposed. I said the other day and I repeat that if he had left Wentworth as it would have been, taking out the part that was in Hamilton, it would still have a population of over 40,000, which is much bigger than the ridings some ministers represent in this house. The riding of Brant-Wentworth could have stayed the way it was, and it too would have been a great deal bigger than some of the ridings represented by ministers in this house.

There was no occasion to change Brantford at all. The reason for the change was that there were two Tory members, one from Hamilton and one from Brant-Wentworth. And let there be no mistake about it on the part of anybody; the one and only reason for the change was to eliminate one Tory member. Why would not the argument offered by the hon. member for Lincoln apply to the county of Huron? I say they were going to apply the old cleaver and butcher knife, sticking part of it into Bruce and another part of it into North Wellington, and putting part of Perth into it. If the principle the hon. member is so proud to expound had been followed we would have had Huron intact, and no part of it would have been taken to bolster up that little riding of Wellington North, which is several thousand less than the ridings under discussion in the Hamilton and Wentworth area.

Acting as a member of the committee has been an experience I shall long remember. I got to know you, Mr. Chairman, a little bit better. And may I say as a member of the opposition that we appreciate your fairness as chairman of the committee when you grace the chair. I wish I could say the same about all members on the redistribution committee. Somehow or another personalities show up in a different way when there are different responsibilities.

I would have been satisfied with the work of the committee if we had been able to approach the problem in a businesslike manner. But it was not approached in that way. It was approached in a small, political sense, with the idea of carving up Tory seats. What happened in Ontario has happened in other areas we are now discussing. I might not have fought so hard from the very beginning for the retention of Haldimand had it not been for the fact that hon. members of the House of Commons have a very high respect, as well they might, for the hon. member who now represents that constituency.

It seems to us in the opposition that we were up against a stone wall. I made no bones about it when I said at the beginning that we were going to fight for Haldimand because we were fighting for a principle, and we were also fighting for a marvellous representative in the House of Commons. I am sorry that the time wasted in committee did not have the results we had hoped. It seems to me that when the work of this session is completed we will not have very much to be proud of in this respect.

Mr. Catherwood: Mr. Chairman, following my remarks of Monday I am going to make only one or two brief observations at this stage of the debate. After listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln I think perhaps that had I been in his position I would have been tempted to express myself in a similar vein.

However, I do feel that the report of the committee has very considerable merit, and I still trust that even at this late stage in debate the committee will reconsider and possibly give support to the amendment. The hon. member for Lincoln referred to the lake shore erosion problem faced in his constituency. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that additional representations from the county of Lincoln would give greatly needed support to the people of that county in connection with that grave problem.

While this matter of erosion is of great importance on lake Erie, we realize that as it also affects lake Ontario shore line vitally every part of that section of the Niagara peninsula is being greatly affected, and I feel this matter is one of great and serious concern. Every possible added representation that can be secured from that section along lake Ontario should be made available and should be considered by the committee, because it is very definitely a matter of great importance to the people in that section of Ontario.

The suggestion that part of that area be associated with the county of Haldimand would result in its becoming an excellent joint rural constituency. As hon. members are aware, I have represented a rural constituency and know something about rural problems. While I am home during the summer months I find that my time is taken up with matters that affect agriculture. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Lincoln, who represents his riding well, must have terrific responsibilities when he is called upon to represent almost 90,000 people in that constituency. My view is that it just cannot possibly be done properly, because there are only 24 hours in a day and, with all due respect to the hon. member for Lincoln, I feel he cannot represent that riding with its large rural area as well as its large industrial population in the manner in which it should be represented.

I have said that I represent a rural riding. If I were fortunate enough to win the nomination and fortunate enough to be elected as candidate, upon contesting the constituency, I do feel that I could give to that rural section of Lincoln county very good service, because it is very similar to the situation with which I have been dealing in Haldimand. If, as I said before, I am given the privilege of representing that county, I believe I could do so properly, and could give the greater time that the representation of a rural constituency should have.

I cannot say a great deal more at this time, nor can I add greatly to the very able remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Eglinton, who has set this situation out so excellently. I would also refer gratefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton West and every hon. member who has spoken so favourably with respect to this proposed amendment. I believe this representation could be equally divided, that it is ideally located and ideally situated, and that for that reason it could become an ideal riding. I commend the report of the subcommittee to hon. members, in the hope that they will support the amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lincoln must take the responsibility for my being on my feet. In what I shall say I shall be very brief. I am sure that whatever else may have been said in this chamber during the last two or three days, we do feel that the committees had a very difficult task. In some of the cases which have come before us we realize the difficulties have been so great as to have been almost overwhelming.

Here, however, it seems to me we have a case where the alternative was so simple and so easy, so obvious and so fair, that I believe we should pause and have another look at it. If I had had any doubts about it, certainly my doubts would have been removed entirely by the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln. I thought he was a good lawyer with a very, very bad case. I listened to the reasons he gave for not doing this obvious thing, and I became more and more convinced that his reasons were quite worthless.

Let me remind hon. members that the situation is one in which we have, right next door to Haldimand, the constituency of Lincoln with a great excess of population. The hon. member for Lincoln suggested that at the next redistribution his constituency may be cut into two. Well, we will leave that for the future. At any rate there is no disputing the fact that there is in Lincoln, next door, additional population which could have been added to Haldimand and which then would have justified fully the continuation of this historic constituency.

What are the reasons given by the hon. member for Lincoln against doing the fair and obvious thing? Well, I find it difficult to follow his argument. First of all one would think that the boundary between Haldimand and Lincoln at the present time is like the Alps or the Rocky mountains, that one could hardly pass from one constituency to the other. We will omit all that. Second was the effect of erosion in lake Erie. That struck me as having no more to do with it than the flowers that bloom in the spring. Indeed I was left with the feeling that if the hon. member for Lincoln has to resort to this utterly unconvincing argument against the obvious justice of taking part of Lincoln and adding it to Haldimand, thereby preserving a historic riding, our sense of fairness and common sense is leaving us.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I make no apology at all for rising to speak on behalf of the hon. member for Haldimand, because I believe that when you speak on behalf of such an excellent member of parliament, it is time well spent. Nothing said this afternoon by the hon. member for Lincoln makes me believe that five townships in Lincoln cannot be just as well represented in this house by the hon. member for Haldimand as by himself, well though he may be representing them at the present time. The riding of Lincoln now has 90,000 people, which is too many for one member to properly represent, no matter how able he may be. I am not detracting at all from the hon. member for Lincoln, but I think he would be able to do a better job for 70,000 people if 20,000 were added to Haldimand.

Yesterday evening, the Minister of Agriculture referred in generous terms to both the former member for Haldimand, and the present member for Haldimand. He said they were men whom he had marvelled at. That was a most generous comment on his part, and one that was well justified by the present member for Haldimand. I believe that, with his ability to serve his constituents, which I have been able to observe during the past two years, being his roommate, he would be able to serve these additional five townships in an excellent manner. I think it is most important that we in this house do everything we can to see that really first-class members of parliament are not eliminated, as will be the case in connection with Haldimand.

We have put forward some sensible and practical suggestions for the retention of this seat. Granted, it is too small at the present time; but we have suggested adding five townships from Lincoln, which would then make the ridings of Lincoln and Haldimand a sensible size. I think the suggestions we have made are sensible and practical.

I hope this committee is not simply going to follow the routine of having these suggestions put forward, and then giving them no consideration whatsoever, as appears to be the situation now. Amendments are put forward, but they are not considered. Members stand up and the ridings are lopped off.

I would hope that, even at this late stage, when the riding of Haldimand comes up for consideration, the committee will restore the confidence of the people and increase their belief that fair play is still possible in this House of Commons.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with some of the points raised by the chairman of the Ontario subcommittee, the hon. member for Ottawa West. I shall base my position on this item squarely on the facts of the situation. I am not simply making an appeal to sentiment; I am dealing with the situation on the facts. The recommendation of the majority on that committee is going to work a great distortion in representation in the province of Ontario, not only in this case but in other areas within the province.

As the hon. member for Ottawa West has said, the effect of the proposal made by the official opposition in this respect would be to have one more seat in this particular area. Under the recommendation of the majority of the committee the representation in this area is to be narrowed down to three ridings whereas we propose four. That is quite right. The hon. member for Ottawa West says it will be necessary to eliminate a seat elsewhere. Of course that follows.

In committee we made several suggestions as to what could be done in that respect, suggestions that had much greater justice than what is proposed with respect to the narrowing of this area into three ridings.

Mr. Mutch: For the benefit of those who were not on the committee, would the hon. member like to tell us what were the alternative suggestions?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member will hear about them in due course. He will have the whole story. All he needs to do is to follow what I said before and also what will be said at a later stage and he will then see precisely what is suggested. These were discussed at some considerable length in the committee. The hon. member can get the whole story from the hon. member for Ottawa West who is sitting beside him.

Mr. Mutch: I think you would prefer to speak for yourself.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member will find out all he needs to know on any of these matters. I shall be happy indeed to discuss any of these questions with him.

I have always understood the purpose of redistribution to be to arrive at equalization in representation. If we accept the glaring inequalities that have been put forward, then what is the sense of going through the form of having redistribution? I always understood the purpose of redistribution was to take account of shifts in population during the previous decennial period, and eliminate consequent inequalities. I understood that to be the guiding purpose of redistribution, subject of course to the recognized fact that we take account of area and give weighted representation to the rural areas.

Here is the proposal by the majority of the committee, as supported by the hon. member for Lincoln. Lincoln will be left with 89,366 population; it is to be unchanged. It is proposed that Brant, that is the county of Brant outside the riding of Brantford, and the county of Haldimand be merged together, with a population in round figures of 49,000.

Mr. McIlraith: It is 45,000; you take off 3,000 for Brantford.

Mr. Fleming: That would leave 46,000. The figure the hon. member gave in the committee when adding the country of Brant to the county of Haldimand was 48,979, and from that was subtracted a small area alongside the city of Brantford which is now to be placed in the riding of Brantford.

Mr. McIlraith: The net figure is 45,000.

Mr. Fleming: We will not argue over a few hundred, as we have bigger fish to fry here. Wentworth will have a population of 54,000 under the proposal by the majority of the committee. Let me give those figures again so the committee and those interested in trying to see that justice is done, in trying to achieve some equality of representation in this house will have the details of the situation they are being asked to create. The figures are 89,000, 54,000 and 45,000.

What is the proposal of the opposition? We propose, as I have indicated before—I do not wish to repeat what I said—that five townships at the west end of Lincoln county should be joined to Haldimand, thereby reducing Lincoln to 70,000. That is quite enough for any one member to handle. The remainder of the riding would consist of rural townships as well as the important city of St. Catharines. Under the suggestion we make Wentworth riding would have a population of 48,000. Haldimand with these five townships from Lincoln would have a population of 43,000 and the riding of Brant would have a population of 37,000. Put them alongside each other, Mr. Chairman. There you have three rural ridings with proposed populations of 37,000, 43,000 and 48,000, and you have the remainder of the riding of Lincoln with a population of 70,000, something over half of which would be in the city of St. Catharines. I put it to the committee that that is a fair and equitable distribution of that area; but put that alongside what is proposed by the main committee, 89,000, 54,000 and 45,000.

An hon. Member: Bingo.

Mr. Fleming: Can anybody say that is a fair distribution of population where one riding would have twice the population of an adjoining riding, and where the riding with the population of 89,000 has a number of rural townships in it? In my submission, to state figures like that is in the estimation of sensible people to condemn completely what has been proposed by the government majority without regard whatever to the fact that the nub of what has been proposed by the government majority is to link together two ridings or counties which are represented at the present time by Progressive Conservative members of the house.

The hon. member for Lincoln said: "Our occupation is a little different in Lincoln, and we have no connection with Haldimand." The county of Haldimand does not disappear. The county of Haldimand has to go somewhere in this redistribution.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Fleming: What do the government members of the committee report? What do they propose? They propose that it be added to Brant county. I am here to tell you that the county of Haldimand has just as much in common with the county of Lincoln, just as much to connect it with the county of Lincoln, as it has in common with the county of Brant or to connect it with the county of Brant. That argument is not worth anything.

An hon. Member: In your opinion.

Mr. Fleming: It would be different if the county of Haldimand were being obliterated from the map, but that is not what is happening. It must go somewhere. The hon. member for Lincoln says it has nothing to do with them, so what is proposed instead is that every person living in the county of Lincoln should have the fraction of representation in the House of Commons of one over 89,366. That is what is proposed for the county of Lincoln; and the fear is expressed that if these five townships are included with Haldimand at this time to make a sensible riding it will neutralize the chances at the next decennial redistribution of having the riding of Lincoln cut in half.

Isn't that a fine argument for avoiding the drawing of a line down the county of Lincoln today, that ten years from now they may want a different line drawn through the county? We are told today that the drawing of any line now is unthinkable, and we are given as a reason why that line should not be drawn today that they will want a line drawn there ten years hence. To state such an argument and to repeat it is to expose the folly in it; but in the meantime it is put forward as an excuse for continuing the gross inequality in representation.

The area of which I am speaking now, in which we suggest there should be four seats and not three, is not over-represented in the House of Commons. It is said that in the next county Hamilton is to have an extra seat. That is true, because the population is there to require it. I have heard nobody question that, either in the Ontario subcommittee or the main committee. Then they turn a little farther south and east and say that Welland is now to have two members instead of one. Of course it should, because Welland has a population today of approximately 120,000. Why should it not have another member? That is not an excuse for denying representation in the particular area where the majority report proposes to narrow the representation from four to three members.

These other points are quite irrelevant. Welland stands on its own feet as being entitled by population to a new member. The county of Wentworth which includes the city of Hamilton is entitled to four members, three in Hamilton as proposed and one for the remaining part of the county of Wentworth, because it has the population to warrant an extra seat being created there. What on earth has that to do with what we are dealing with here in an adjoining area, where this distortion of representation in the house is to be perpetrated, and with it of course the effective elimination of a Conservative member from the House of Commons.

No argument has been put forward here that will stand up to the test of common sense, that will stand up to the test of principle, if the purpose of redistribution is to achieve some approach to equal representation in the House of Commons in relation to population. What does the recommendation of the majority do? It distorts inequalities in representation in the house, it enlarges differences in the populations of adjoining and comparable ridings, and this is the cloak that is cast over what is virtually the political assassination of a member of the opposition.

An hon. Member: Absurd.

Mr. Fleming: Has anybody over there anything to say?

Mr. Gardiner: We are not even listening to you.

Mr. Abbott: Louder.

Mr. Fleming: It may be a matter of merriment to the merry Minister of Finance and some of those yonder who look on perpetrations of this kind as a part of normal political warfare where the spoils go to the victor and the majority for the time being can perpetrate whatever it likes.

An hon. Member: For some time to come.

Mr. Fleming: I am telling you, Mr. Chairman, that this sort of thing cannot go on. This sort of thing cannot be supported by anyone who makes any pretence of belief in or subscription to principles in relation to the distribution of seats in the House of Commons. I am making the statement as flat as that—

An hon. Member: Pretty flat.

Mr. Fleming: —regardless of the merriment that the political assassination of a very distinguished member of the house may bring to hon. members opposite. If there are any other arguments that can be put forward on this subject I would be glad to hear them and deal with them. So far not one fact has been put forward to extenuate, excuse or palliate the crime that is being committed here today in the recommendation of the majority of the committee, or that will stand up to any test of common sense or principle. If things like this are going to be done in the name of redistribution, then it would be very much better not to attempt redistribution; because far from equalizing population in ridings what is being done is to distort and create further glaring inequalities.

On paragraph 5—Bruce.

The Chairman: Earlier in the debate the hon. member for Ottawa West gave notice of an amendment of which I have a copy. Is the hon. member moving that amendment now?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. I should like to read the amendment. I understand it is reasonably agreeable to the official opposition. The effect of it is to remove three townships in Huron county that were in the constituency of Bruce, as indicated in the schedule, from that constituency. The amendment reads as follows:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 5 (Bruce) by deleting therefrom the brackets, and the words "and that part of the county of Huron included in the townships of East Wawanosh, West Wawanosh and Ashfield."

I gave notice of that amendment when the bill was first called.

Mr. Cardiff: This deals with Bruce?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

On paragraph 6—Carleton.

Mr. McIlraith: I have an amendment that I think will be wholly agreeable to the leader of the opposition. It is indeed a pleasure to be at one with him for once.

Mr. Murphy: A very strange pleasure.

Mr. McIlraith: Because of a printer's error the word "and" was omitted and certain brackets have to be inserted. The amendment reads as follows:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 6 (Carleton) by inserting the word "and" before the words "the village of Rockcliffe Park" and by putting brackets around the words "excepting therefrom the township of Gloucester, the town of Eastview, the village of Rockcliffe Park."

The Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Paragraphs 7 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph 15—Glengarry-Prescott.

Mr. Major: Dealing with this, may I say that I am not happy and I feel that the people of both Prescott and Glengarry are not happy over the merging of Glengarry and Prescott as a county unit in the next representation in this house. I think it is unfortunate that the committee has seen fit to recommend that the counties of Glengarry and Prescott be joined as one county for future electoral purposes, and very briefly I would like to state some of the facts which should be considered before taking a decision.

May I recall that Glengarry—except for eight years 1917-1925—has been a single constituency since confederation. To do justice to its historic tradition, though it is not up to the required quota, I feel that it should be continued as a single constituency.

To realize how long the county has been settled, one has only to look at the records of the churches established at Williamstown and St. Raphael. The United Empire Loyalists who settled the front part of the county together with the Scots who settled the northern part have a great history, in fact too long for me to attempt to recall it at this time.

At St. Raphael, you find the oldest Roman Catholic church established in Upper Canada, and there you also find the settlement of highland Scots. These disbanded military men were guided by their chaplain who later became Bishop Macdonell. At St. Raphael stands a memorial erected to his memory by the federal government. If you look back about 100 years you will trace the first French Canadian families who settled in Glengarry.

May I mention that Glengarry's first member of parliament was Donald A. Macdonald, a brother of Sir John Sandfield Macdonald, the first premier of Ontario. From 1945 to 1949 Glengarry had the good fortune and honour to be represented by the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. You will recall that the men from Glengarry served and continue to serve their country well. The Glengarry Fencibles, the oldest military organization in Ontario, were always ready to serve when their country needed a strong arm, and Glengarry is now playing its full share in the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders. May I mention that you find Glengarry's sons all through Canada; and their home, Glengarry, should be continued as a single constituency.

I feel there should be something more than the application of a quotient when dealing with counties of such historical background, and a great deal of consideration should be given before merging Glengarry with the county of Prescott in such a way as to have a Liberal member disappear from the house.

Prescott has also been a single constituency since confederation. It extends from Point Fortune along the Quebec boundary to Wendover on the Ottawa river, some 30 miles from Ottawa. Its settlers are for the most part of French origin, and it equally has its pride and tradition. Its customs and interests are different from those of Glengarry inasmuch as Glengarry is united with Stormont and Dundas for hospitalization, social welfare, public health and its county road system.

The St. Lawrence development I feel will cause a great expansion which will have its effect, and I feel that the population of the area including Glengarry will be greatly increased. By joining Glengarry and Prescott at this time you will be creating a county with a population of over 43,000, larger than most other comparable rural ridings. If you envisage the proposed county starting on the southwest corner close to Cornwall, following the St. Lawrence river down to river Baudet, then following the Quebec boundary up to 30 miles distant from Ottawa, you can realize the area that will be covered. You can also realize the difficulty a member will have in trying to keep in contact with his electors and deal effectively with the many problems of a rural constituency.

Considering all this, Mr. Chairman, why not leave Glengarry and Prescott as they are for the present redistribution? Why should we not wait until after the St. Lawrence development to assess the population, rather than join these two counties now, when it might be necessary to separate them again at the next redistribution?

However, if the committee decides that it is in the best interests of representation and the country in general that the counties of Glengarry and Prescott be merged, I will abide by the decision. If the counties of Glengarry and Prescott are merged, I shall be very pleased to continue to work with them as I have in the past to further the interest of these historical counties.

Mr. McIlraith: I believe I should say a word on the merger of these two historic counties, Mr. Chairman. I promise the committee that I shall be very brief, not because I want to be brief on the subject but rather because of the good progress we appear to be now making in dealing with this bill. I think I ought to say to the hon. member for Glengarry and the hon. member for Prescott that, for my part, I found this the toughest political action I have had to take since being elected to the House of Commons some twelve years ago. The merger of these two seats was not without significance to me, not because of the political consequences but because of the fact that with the county of Glengarry I have had not only the closest personal association but a very close association through immediate ancestors.

Mr. Fleming: There is an amendment which I should like to introduce at this point because of the place the riding I propose will hold in the alphabetical order.

Mr. McIlraith: What item is it?

Mr. Fleming: I am proposing to include an item to be inserted immediately after item 14, and it will relate to the continuance of the riding of Frontenac-Addington. It would come in as an entirely new item 15. Perhaps I may read my amendment to the schedule now and discuss it afterward. The amendment reads:

That the schedule to Bill 393 be amended by inserting the following after item 14 on page 8 thereof and renumbering the subsequent items accordingly:

15. Frontenac-Addington consisting of
(a) the county of Frontenac excluding the city of Kingston; and
(b) that part of the county of Lennox and Addington contained in the townships of Camden, Sheffield, Denbigh, Abinger, Ashby, Effingham, Anglesea and Kaladar, and the village of Newburgh.

May I explain at once, Mr. Chairman, that this is the present riding of Frontenac-Addington, and the effect of the amendment is to retain that riding unchanged. When I say "unchanged", there is one very slight modification in that the city of Kingston—

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I just interrupt? I do not want to delay the hon. member's explanation, but I thought if it would be agreeable to the committee the chairman might read the amendment, and then we might postpone the discussion until we reach Hastings-Frontenac where the discussion could take place.

Mr. Fleming: I am agreeable to that, and I wish to make it clear that my amendment has nothing to do with item 15 as such, but is the insertion of a new item in the alphabetical arrangement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph 16, Grenville-Dundas, agreed to.

Paragraph 17, Grey-Bruce, agreed to.

Paragraph 18, Grey North, agreed to.

On paragraph 19—Halton.

Mr. Murphy: I have a suggested amendment here, and without debating or explaining it, I shall read it. This is what I had reference to in my speech the other day when I said I could repeat later what I said at that particular time. I move:

That the schedule to Bill 393 he amended by inserting the following immediately after item 18, and renumbering the subsequent items accordingly:

19. Haldimand-Lincoln consisting of the county of Haldimand and that part of the county of Lincoln contained in the townships of North Grimsby, South Grimsby, Caistor, Gainsborough and Clinton, and the village of Beamsville.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Murphy) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 59.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph 20—Hamilton East.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have a suggestion I should like to make with respect to the naming of Hamilton East. I spoke about this previously in private conversation. As members of the committee are aware, the constituency which bears the name of Hamilton East, and which formerly bore the name of Hamilton East, is now right in the centre of the three Hamilton constituencies. The Hamilton West riding, which I have the honour to represent, under this redistribution extends right to the western boundaries of the city of Hamilton. Hamilton South East extends to the southern and eastern boundaries of the city of Hamilton. The riding formerly described as Hamilton East is thus thrown into a central position. As it is proposed that one constituency shall be named Hamilton East and the other Hamilton South East, it would appear that there could well be a considerable confusion between those two constituencies. I would suggest for the consideration of the committee that this riding of Hamilton East be named Hamilton Centre. I am sure it would be conducive to greater clarity in all arrangements in the future, and I am sure the hon. member who now represents the constituency of Hamilton East would not object to the change.

Mr. Lennard: In that connection I might say that when Hamilton East was first named, Ottawa street was the eastern boundary of the city limits of Hamilton. The area lying beyond that was called Crown Point and was in the county of Wentworth. For many years the extension of the city of Hamilton was in the constituency of the county of Wentworth, and for some time since the naming of Hamilton East it has not been really the eastern part of Hamilton. I quite agree with the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and it would certainly be correctly named if it were called Hamilton Centre.

Mr. McIlraith: It is quite true, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Hamilton West put forward this suggestion, so it is not one brought forward as a surprise now. I admit that there were some difficulties about the names in the areas, but I think for once we have found boundary lines which are reasonably agreeable to the opposition. I think they are reasonably agreeable; but the historic constituency of Hamilton East, the present constituency, is not being changed as to boundary lines except for one very small corner. I have taken up the question of the change of name, and it does not seem to be agreeable to those concerned in that constituency. They seem to feel that they would like to retain the name the constituency now bears. For those reasons I wonder whether the hon. member would agree not to press her suggestion any further.

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course I would not press a suggestion which affects another member's constituency, especially in his absence. But I should like to point out that if that is not agreeable to the hon. member for Hamilton East, then possibly consideration could be given to renaming what is now described as Hamilton South East, because I am sure there will be considerable confusion. If that name could stand over and be considered at another time with respect to bringing in another suggestion I think it would aid in clarifying the description of the constituencies.

I might say that at the time I spoke of this matter to the hon. member for Ottawa West, there was some further confusion as to the section of the constituency of Wentworth which has now been added to Hamilton West. So long as any confusion existed as to whether or not that section which is now added to Hamilton West was to be added to Hamilton South East, it was impossible to select a name for the new constituency which would be properly descriptive of the boundaries of that riding. While I do not press my suggestion with regard to Hamilton East being renamed, I do suggest that item 21 should stand until such time as a suitable name might be suggested for it, to avoid confusion.

Mr. Lennard: I would repeat, the only sensible thing would be to rename what is now Hamilton East and call it Hamilton Centre. I have heard of stupid things being done; I have heard the word "stupid" used in this house. If that remains as it is I consider that it is a very stupid way of handling the proposition there in Hamilton.

Mr. Abbott: What's in a name?

The Chairman: Shall we carry paragraph 20?

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph 21—Hamilton South East.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the committee consider the suggestion I have made, that the name of this constituency should stand in abeyance until we have had an opportunity to consider a suitable name to suggest?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think we could let this one stand because I do not think we will complete the Ontario schedule until after the dinner hour.

Mr. Lennard: May I say a word at this time?

The Chairman: We cannot have it both ways. If it is to be debated, let us debate it.

Mr. Lennard: No, I am not debating anything.

The Chairman: If the paragraph is to stand the hon. member will have to wait until it is brought back before the committee.

Paragraph 21 stands.

Paragraph 22, Hamilton West, agreed to.

On paragraph 23—Hastings-Frontenac.

Mr. Fleming: This is the item pertaining to the proposed new riding of Hastings-Frontenac, and it is in connection with this item that it was suggested that the amendment I proposed to introduce following item 14 might be deferred for consideration.

There is in this area the riding of Kingston City which has a population of 36,870; there is also the riding of Frontenac-Addington, a riding very large in area, with a population of 36,221 according to the census figures, and that unquestionably is quite adequate for a riding of this very large area.

There was in my submission no reason for tampering with the historic riding of Frontenac-Addington. It has 26 townships and two islands. One would have thought that was quite enough, considering the large area, to warrant it being left alone with a population of 36,221. But what the majority on the committee have proposed, Mr. Chairman, is that the riding of Kingston City should be enlarged by the inclusion therein of three townships lying immediately north of the city, and two islands, Wolfe and Howe, lying immediately south of the city; and that the remaining 21 townships of the present riding of Frontenac-Addington be united with the present riding of Hastings-Peterborough, which is today the largest in the southern part of Ontario. There is no riding south of Parry Sound-Muskoka that can compare with it in size, and it has a population of 26,324. One would have thought there was not much occasion for interfering with the riding, considering the immense area it covers. But what the majority on the committee have done is to propose that 21 townships out of the present riding of Frontenac-Addington be added to the present 28 townships of the riding of Hastings-Peterborough to form the new riding of Hastings-Frontenac, consisting of 49 townships.

I realize that to members from western Canada 49 townships do not sound like a very excessive total. But to members from the older and settled parts of Ontario, as in this part of eastern Ontario, 49 townships represent a huge area, particularly when it is recalled that access to parts of this area is very difficult. What opposition members on the Ontario subcommittee and in the main committee proposed in this respect was that Frontenac-Addington be left alone; that there was no occasion for tampering with Hastings-Peterborough, but if a riding had to be found in that area we said that a more just and equitable result could be achieved by certain changes farther west. We indicated a proposal which would have achieved a much more equitable result, both in terms of area and population included in the ridings affected. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am moving this amendment which will have the effect of preserving the riding of Frontenac-Addington in its present form. The amendment I am presenting, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton West, is as follows:

That the schedule to Bill 393 be amended by inserting the following after item 14 on page 8 thereof and renumbering the subsequent items accordingly:

"15. Frontenac-Addington consisting of

(a) the county of Frontenac excluding the city of Kingston; and

(b) that part of the county of Lennox and Addington contained in the townships of Camden, Sheffield, Denbigh, Abinger, Ashby, Effingham, Anglesea and Kaladar, and the village of Newburgh."

Following the adoption of this amendment, with the support of all fair-minded members of the committee, I shall have a similar amendment which will have the effect of preserving the riding of Hastings-Peterborough without change.

This is the nub of the problem, and I sum up in these words: Is it fair and proper that a rural riding with a very large area, comprising three counties, the county of Frontenac and the united counties of Lennox and Addington, with a population of 36,221—ample, surely, to warrant its continuance as a riding, particularly in the light of the large area it embraces—should be carved up in the way that is proposed in the majority report? In the result the riding will be by far the largest in southern Ontario.

Mr. McIlraith: No, no.

Mr. Fleming: It is the largest riding, by far, in southern Ontario. It is larger than anything south of Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. McIlraith: No, no. Victoria is as large, Renfrew North is as large. Parry Sound-Muskoka is larger.

Mr. Fleming: By the time the majority get through with it, this will become an empire. This riding of Hastings-Frontenac now becomes a riding embracing most of the three counties I mentioned, a veritable empire. It consists of 49 townships, some of which are difficult of access. And, if you wish to have comparisons to test the fairness of creating a riding that size, I can give them. The proposed new riding would have a population of 43,741.

Mr. Dewar: How many square miles?

Mr. Fleming: To tell the truth I have lost track of that. It becomes a riding 80 miles wide east and west, and in the north and south dimensions it runs up to 80 miles—

Mr. Fraser: No, 110 miles.

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend says it is 110 miles. I say to my hon. friend from Saskatchewan that, in the old and settled part of Ontario, that is an empire. It cannot be compared with Saskatchewan standards, where you have townships by the hundreds.

Mr. Dewar: What is the population of that area?

Mr. Fleming: Which part?

Mr. Dewar: The part you are talking about.

Mr. Fleming: I have given the committee the population of Frontenac-Addington, which is 36,221. The population of the riding of Hastings-Peterborough is 26,324.

Mr. Dewar: Does the hon. member think that compares favourably with a population of 35,000 and an area of 110,000 square miles?

Mr. Fleming: I am giving my hon. friend comparisons. Let us keep our comparisons on a fair basis. I suggest a fair basis would be to take the adjoining riding, would it not? Then, if that is fair, let us take the adjoining riding. I look at the constituency of Renfrew South, a riding that lies immediately north of Frontenac-Addington and abuts on the east the riding of Hastings-Peterborough. I suggest the hon. member could not have anything closer for purposes of comparison, could he? That riding of Renfrew South is smaller than the riding of Frontenac-Addington, and it is considerably smaller than the riding of Hastings-Peterborough. By the time this new monstrosity of a riding is created, the largest in southern Ontario, it will be more than twice as large as Renfrew South. I hope my hon. friend gets the significance of that; it will be more than twice as large as Renfrew South.

Mr. McCann: You are just guessing.

Mr. Fleming: Now, what about population? The riding of Renfrew South, when this redistribution is carried out, will have a population of 31,439. Compare that. Here is a riding right alongside the new riding, and smaller than either of the ridings to be merged. It will be less than half the size of the proposed new riding of Hastings-Frontenac. While Renfrew South will have a population of something more than 31,000, the proposed new adjoining riding of Hastings-Frontenac will have a population of 43,000.

Does that commend itself to the sense of fairness and justice of any member of the house, regardless of party? Particularly, does it commend itself to the Prime Minister and his sense of fair play? I ask the Prime Minister if this jibes with the statement of principle he gave the house today, when we see a riding represented by one of his cabinet ministers having a population of 31,000, and right alongside of it a mammoth riding, more than twice the size of the minister's riding, with a population of over 43,000. Where is the principle there, I ask the Prime Minister. Where is the justice there? Where is the fair play there?

Now, behind it all—because we find something back of each of these carvings and butcherings of ridings; we have come to expect it now—is the fact that a riding which is represented today by a Progressive Conservative member, a riding that has been historically Conservative, is today being carved up. There you have the explanation of this monstrosity being perpetrated in the majority report. Where is the principle here? I press this amendment; and when the amendment is carried, with the support of all fair-minded members in the House of Commons, I shall have an amendment to offer with respect to the riding of Hastings-Peterborough, designed to retain that riding in its present form.

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 59.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Fleming: Then I have a further amendment.

The Chairman: Is this a second amendment to item 23, Hastings-Frontenac?

Mr. Fleming: Yes. The defeat of the first amendment does not particularly encourage me to expect success with the second. Nevertheless there may yet be some who will respond to this plea for fair-minded treatment. My appeal to the Prime Minister, and the principle he stated this morning, was not very successful in the presentation of my last amendment, because he and the seven other members of the cabinet who are in the house voted against it. But we shall continue to try.

My second amendment is:

That item 23 in the schedule to Bill 393 be stricken out and the following substituted therefor: "23. Hastings-Peterborough consisting of the county of Hastings and that part of the county of Peterborough included in the townships of Asphodel, Belmont, Methuen, Burleigh, Anstruther, Chandos and Dummer, including the villages of Havelock and Norwood."

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 61.

Mr. Fraser: I know something about this riding because it takes in the eastern section of Peterborough and part of Hastings county, Frontenac and Lennox and Addington. It is a tremendous riding, and I do not think it fair to place the representation on the shoulders of any one man. There are other ridings, perhaps in the north, that are larger; but this still is a tremendous riding. Except in the north the roads are fairly good, and even the northern roads are being brought into shape thanks to the help given by the Ontario government. However, it would be almost impossible for a member to cover the riding in one year, as there are many towns and villages throughout the riding. I submit that some consideration should be given to eliminating the Frontenac-Addington section.

There are 7,666 Peterborough people included in this riding, and in drafting the name of this riding no consideration was given to them. If the riding is going to remain as it is set out in the bill, then I suggest that the name should be Hastings-Frontenac-Peterborough, which would recognize those people. They do not want to lose their identity. As things are now they may be represented by a man who lives 90 miles away. I think the minister should consider eliminating some of the townships in the riding, and certainly he should consider adding "Peterborough" to the name so it would be Hastings-Frontenac-Peterborough.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I was under the impression that the name had been agreed to unanimously by the subcommittee, but I could be wrong. It was felt that Hastings-Frontenac represented the situation in the constituency better than any combination. If the hon. member would like us to consider the name, the committee might pass the item subject to the consideration of the name over the dinner hour.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I represent the largest riding in central Ontario and I know the tremendous job it is for one man to represent a large riding such as the one being created here. Perhaps I am a little jealous because this riding will be larger than the one I represent, and I prided myself on having the largest riding.

The area of this riding will be tremendous. This riding is somewhat similar to my own; that is, there are people scattered all over the riding. If the member representing this large riding were to start out on the first day of January to visit his riding he could not be home in time for Christmas. There is no doubt about it, this riding is too large. It could have been carved up differently. For instance, just south of the riding are the two small counties of Northumberland and Durham. These counties operate with one county council. Northumberland could have been carved to help bring up the population in Hastings-Peterborough and also bring up the population in Durham. I can quite see what is contemplated. It is the old procedure to eliminate Progressive Conservative members, because both Northumberland and Durham are represented by Liberal members and the committee would not consider carving either of those ridings though they are both small.

There are only six townships in Durham. For the benefit of western members may I say that some of the townships in Ontario are as large as thirteen miles by nine, whereas I understand that most of the western townships are only six miles square. In future debates hon. members should consider that fact.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that item 23 shall stand?

Mr. Fleming: There is a qualification; the proposal of the minister was that it should be carried but that it should stand as to the name only.

The Chairman: That could not be done. An item could not be carried subject to a change later on. If it is not the intention of the committee to carry the item, it would have to stand.

Mr. Fleming: I would be happy to have the item stand. I am not convinced that hon. members, knowing what is being done here, will wish to go through with it; and I would urge that this item be allowed to stand. I have proposed two amendments, both of which have been defeated. I asked the Prime Minister a question but he has not answered. He voted against both my amendments, and perhaps I should accept that as an answer to my question.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister is in his seat and has not chosen to give an express answer to my question I am going to repeat my question. I ask the Prime Minister if in the light of his statement of principle this morning in reference to redistribution he considers it fair, equitable and proper redistribution that the riding of Hastings-Peterborough and the great bulk of Frontenac-Addington be combined in this proposed riding to make it by far the largest riding in southern Ontario with a population of 43,741, while right next door is the riding of Renfrew South represented by the Minister of National Revenue with a population under this schedule of 31,439 and less than half the area of the proposed riding of Hastings-Frontenac?

Mr. Henderson: Before this item stands—

The Chairman: Order. Let us have some indication as to whether this item is to stand or be proceeded with.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I thought there was unanimous agreement that we would pass the item but allow the name to stand. If that is not so, if that is not within the rules of the committee, then let the item stand and we will call it first after the dinner recess.

Paragraph stands.

Paragraph 24, Hastings South, agreed to.

On paragraph 25—Huron-Perth.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not wish to reiterate anything I said the other night. I think I placed my case fairly before the house, and I want to thank the main committee for at least doing something to my riding that they previously would not do, by giving me back three municipalities. I have an amendment I wish to move. Am I allowed to speak on it before I move it? Is that proper?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: We in the county of Huron have already lost one member as the result of the redistribution that is being carried into effect. In view of the importance of some of the rural ridings that are being taken away, may I say that I do not think rural ridings should be discarded because of the fact that you want to boost representation from the cities. In the light of the importance of farmers in the economic life of the country I think the rural sections should have more representation in the House of Commons. Never in my time as a member, and for that matter never in the history of Canada as far as I can recall, have we been properly represented in the house. I do not think that is fair to agriculture. Many rural ridings are represented by doctors, lawyers and what have you from the larger centres in those ridings who perhaps represent them very well. I am not finding any fault, but when a redistribution takes place I cannot see the elimination of rural ridings for the sake of bolstering representation from the cities.

It is not very hard to represent 100,000 people in a city, but it is a difficult thing to represent half that number or less in the country. In most cases city ridings are not more than ten miles square. My riding as it now stands is 100 miles long and about 40 miles wide. If I am given the opportunity to represent the new riding in the future it will be at least 80 miles wide and more than 100 miles long. I have had requests from people who are going to be taken out of that riding and put into Wellington. They do not want to change, and for that reason I am making this plea this afternoon. I know it is going to be useless. After hearing representation after representation made in the house this afternoon for the purpose of trying to correct some of the injustices that have been created and having seen them turned down, I do not see any useful purpose in presenting this amendment, but I intend to do so anyway.

The Prime Minister did credit to himself this morning, but I do not think he has done credit to himself this afternoon. There was nobody who did not appreciate the speech the Prime Minister made this morning. I thought it was fair; and if the principles he laid down had been carried out the result would have been just. Nevertheless, this afternoon time after time we have brought forward amendments that would certainly have been an improvement over what has been done but they have been voted down unanimously by members on the other side of the house. I do not think there is anything further I need to say. I have presented my case. I have not said anything I said the other night. I am only doing this because I feel if you are going to eliminate one seat in Huron, then we are entitled to have the new constituency confined within the boundaries of Huron county. It is for that purpose that I move the following amendment:

That item 25 in the schedule to Bill 393 be stricken out and the following be substituted therefor: "25. Huron consisting of the county of Huron."

The Chairman: Those who are in favour of the amendment will please say "Yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Chairman: Those opposed will please say "Nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet to speak on the amendment when you called for the vote.

An hon. Member: No, it is too late.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to make a brief observation on what is involved in the amendment compared with what is proposed by the committee. I am not going to add anything to the well reasoned and moderate presentation of the case put forth by the hon. member for Huron North both today and on Monday evening. The report of the committee as set forth in the schedule would have involved the union of the present ridings of Huron North and Huron-Perth, but would have taken out of the new riding five townships at the north end which are now represented by the hon. member for Huron North. It would have added to the adjoining riding of Bruce the townships of Ashfield, West Wawanosh and East Wawanosh, and would have added to the present riding of Wellington North the townships of Morris and Grey. It would also have left as a part of the combined riding three townships and one town located within the county of Perth which are now a part of the riding of Huron-Perth. Notice was given at the opening of the debate in this committee of an amendment which would have the effect of leaving within the proposed new riding of Huron-Perth—

Mr. McIlraith: Huron.

Mr. Fleming: Huron—the three townships of Ashfield, West Wawanosh and East Wawanosh which it was proposed should be added to the riding of Bruce to the north. It is also proposed that two of the townships from the county of Perth be restored to the riding of Perth but that the township of Hibbert, which is not in the county of Huron but in the county of Perth, be left in this riding of Huron. There is going to be a riding to be called Huron, but it does not correspond precisely to the county of Huron. Even in the light of the amendments that are to be offered on the part of the government majority, it is proposed that two townships which are part of the county of Huron be taken out in order to eke out the inadequacy of population in another riding on the northeast, and that a township which belongs to the county of Perth should be put into the riding of Huron.

The very sensible proposal put forward by my colleague the hon. member for Huron North is that instead of doing that carpentry on the county of Huron to make a riding in Huron, there should be a riding of Huron consisting of the county of Huron. It is a very sensible proposal and, as one who was born in the county of Huron, I wish to give it my full and enthusiastic support.

Mr. Drew: I simply want to add this. Here is a case where there is a county which, if it is given its natural boundaries, will have a population that would approximate the number that is being taken as normal in the case of a rural constituency. It surely seems that if there are changes to be made elsewhere, that should not be a reason for breaking up a county which happens to have in its boundaries approximately the right number to conform to the general redistribution that is being made.

As the result of the attempt to use parts of Huron for bolstering the population elsewhere, there is an extraordinary separation of parts of Huron from the county; and the most extraordinary separation of all is the separation of Wingham from the county to which it naturally belongs. Having listened to the arguments of the member for Lincoln, which one can understand, I trust that the member for Lincoln will be supporting this amendment. It would certainly be surprisingly inconsistent to put forward the arguments that he put forward to maintain the population of approximately 90,000 within a single county, and then have him agree to the dismembering of a county which in its own boundaries has approximately the right number by the standard we have—

An hon. Member: Even more.

Mr. Drew: Yes, some 50,000 people; that is more than the number generally being given to rural constituencies. Now, Mr. Chairman, there have been sound arguments in regard to every one of these amendments that have been put forward; but I think of all amendments this is the one most difficult to dispose of. Here is a county standing within its natural boundaries with a population a little higher it is true, but nevertheless approximately the number that would be allocated to a rural constituency; and the only justification that can be given under the circumstances is that it is necessary to take parts of this county to bolster the population of others.

Mr. Chairman, there are other reasons and we know it. The other reasons are to take parts of this county that will help certain members in the adjoining counties. That is what they think; but my impression is that the people who are being dealt with in that way, as pawns in a political game, may not have the same opinion. However, I would hope, having regard to the sentiments expressed by the member for Lincoln in regard to the great desirability of maintaining county boundaries, sentiments we can understand even in the case of Lincoln with its 90,000, that we will hear the member for Lincoln supporting the amendment and voting for it as well.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think certain premises which have been described by the leader of the opposition are not correct. He speaks as though this were a dismemberment of the county of Huron by taking from it certain parts which are now in it in order to bolster adjoining ridings. He has omitted the point that the present county of Huron did have parts of the county of Perth added to it twenty years ago in order to maintain a representation of two members in the House of Commons. That part of the county of Perth which has been added to the county of Huron to maintain the representation consists of three townships, and those three townships are presently in the constituency of Huron-Perth.

When the redistribution subcommittee for Ontario came to consider this problem they were faced with these facts. It is true that the county of Huron as a unit would have 49,230 odd people. It is true that the county of Perth as a unit would have about 55,000 or 56,000 people. It is also true that every one in that area subscribes to the views that have been expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Huron North, that rural ridings should if at all possible be maintained in this house. For that reason the committee, and I should say a majority in the committee, felt that it would be better to retain seats in that area, as was done in 1933, by bolstering—if you will use that phrase. The result is that rather than lose two seats in that area, though it was urged upon us that we should—and I know that would not meet with the wishes of the hon. member for Huron North—it was decided to add to the constituency of Wellington North the area immediately adjacent to the county and which is readily accessible to it. Two townships and the town of Wingham were added to the constituency of Wellington North.

In the course of discussing this matter it should be borne in mind that the constituency of Huron North has at the moment some 26,000 people; that the constituency of Huron-Perth has over 30,000 people; and that while there was no general agreement in the subcommittee as to the minimum number which might be used for a constituency, I personally expressed the view that we ought to try to aim at least at 30,000. For that reason it was natural, I think, that we should try to spread the population around without offending too much the principle of county boundaries, about which I shall say something in a moment, and to bolster constituencies which were low.

The result is that the constituency of Wellington North with the addition which has been made to it from the county of Huron—an addition no greater, I may add, than was made to the county of Huron from the county of Perth 20 years ago—now has a population of 30,300 odd. The constituency of Huron as it is suggested here has a population of 43,000; and the constituency of Wellington South has a population of 43,500. I think that redistribution of the population offends no one in any way but preserves one additional seat from that part of rural Ontario.

On the subject of county boundaries, everyone in Ontario recognizes that as far as possible county boundaries should be observed for reasons with which all Ontario members will agree and which I need not describe. It was for that reason that consideration was given to the report after it had been made, and it was found that we were having the county of Huron put in parts of three ridings. That is why the chairman of the Ontario subcommittee moved an amendment, or gave notice of it Monday and I think he is going to move it now, making the changes mentioned; so that the county of Bruce will not take part of the county of Huron, and the county of Huron will be comprised in two constituencies, the county of Perth will be comprised in two constituencies, and the county of Wellington will be comprised in two constituencies.

Mr. Murphy: I would like to add a word before this is settled. This particular allocation would also involve ridings to the north, which would be Bruce, Grey North, and Grey-Bruce. There cannot be any question in the mind of anyone as to the saneness of the idea sponsored or proposed by the present member for Huron North. I was a member of the committee and it was suggested earlier, of course by the Liberals on the committee, that three townships should be added to the county of Bruce or to the riding of Bruce and two should go into this small riding of Wellington North which had a population of 24,463.

I still say, Mr. Chairman, that Bruce could have been bolstered without any need to mutilate Huron, by taking some of the adjoining townships of Grey North or Grey-Bruce, which would also leave a county riding immediately to the east. When objection was taken to the idea of these three townships being removed from that part of Bruce, and the two townships going into North Wellington, the Liberal members of the committee insisted that Huron accept the three townships that were already in that riding from the county of Perth. We tried to demonstrate the fairness of the idea of maintaining county boundaries in so far as possible, and in view of what the minister has just said there is only one reason for having mutilated Huron as is being done here.

I am going to be quite frank when I say this. They left the one township of Perth in the riding of Huron for nothing other than political reasons, as has been their purpose all through redistribution. I am satisfied in my own mind that the people in that particular township would have been glad to have the opportunity of associating themselves again with their own native county of Perth. Knowing that they are going to be put in the county of Huron, I expect they will be very happy to be represented by the sitting member for Huron North.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Redistribution

Amendment (Mr. Cardiff) negatived: Yeas, 25; nays, 67.

Mr. Cardiff: Before anything further is said, I want to thank the hon. member for Lincoln for his consistency.

Mr. McIlraith: I move:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 25 (Huron-Perth) to read "Huron consisting of that part of the county of Perth included in the township of Hibbert and that part of the county of Huron included in the townships of Hullett, McKillop, Stanley, Tuckersmith, Hay, Stephen, Usborne, Grey, Morris, Colborne, Goderich, Ashfield, East Wawanosh and West Wawanosh.

Mr. Fleming: I am not rising to say anything about the amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa West. If justice is not to be done in the way proposed by the hon. member for Huron North in his amendment, then it can be said that this amendment is an improvement over the report of the committee as embodied in the printed schedule.

I just wish to observe, Mr. Chairman, that in the official record of debates the names of those who voted against the amendment are not recorded. There were nine ministers in the house who voted on the last amendment, the Prime Minister and eight other ministers, and all voted against the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Huron North.

Mr. Fleming: On paragraph 28, Mr. Chairman; we have allowed paragraph 23 to stand, together with an amendment, and as I understand it that may have some bearing on 28. I would suggest that 28 might as well stand along with 23.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We stood 23 simply because of the name that was presented.

Mr. Fleming: The whole item is standing, though?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is true.

Mr. Fleming: When we come back at eight o'clock we do not wish to be told that because we have adopted 28 it is not possible then to entertain an amendment or any discussion on item 23 which is now standing. Would it not be better to allow it to stand?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The hon. member for Eglinton was never treated in that way in this house, and I do not suppose he will be treated in that way as long as this government is in office.

Mr. Drew: Is it not correct to say that if No. 28 is adopted the discussion on No. 23 becomes meaningless.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There will be no question whatever of any suggestion of trickery or anything like that. As it is now six o'clock, we shall let the item stand.

Mr. Fleming: There was no suggestion of trickery at all.

An hon. Member: You do not know what you said.

Mr. Fleming: I know what I said. There was no suggestion of trickery. I know the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. He and I were old friends long before either of us came to this house. I am not suggesting trickery, and what I said was a far cry from any suggestion of trickery. What I suggested was in keeping with the rules of the house, and was to keep the matter open for a full discussion on item 23 which is standing. I do not want a ruling to be brought forward that because 28 was adopted—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It stands.

Mr. Fleming: —that therefore the ambit of proper debate on 23 has been narrowed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It stands.

Paragraph 28 stands.

The Chairman: When the hon. member asked his question about 28, paragraph 29, Lambton-Kent, and paragraph 30, Lambton West, had been carried; is that the understanding of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: We shall now deal with the Ontario schedule, item 21, Hamilton South East.

Mr. McIlraith: I move that the name of the constituency be changed to Hamilton South, dropping the word "East" at the end of the name.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have no objection. I think it was a misnomer; I still think it is a misnomer. I believe both ridings are improperly named. Nevertheless, if that is the government's suggestion I cannot see anything we can do about it.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps we could reconsider and withdraw the amendment.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not care what you do about it. There is a mile and a half of Hamilton east of Ottawa street below the brow which is certainly not south.

The Chairman: Is the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. McIlraith: Let the amendment stand.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word on this also, because Hamilton South was carved out of the riding I represent at the moment. I regret losing a lot of loyal and faithful supporters, and I say that sincerely. I have had their support for many years. I might say in connection with the name that the suggestion was made by the hon. member for Hamilton West that this riding's name be changed to Hamilton-Barton. That was suggested because of the fact that this new riding of Hamilton South takes in the township of Barton which has been incorporated in the confines of the city of Hamilton. That township has been obliterated politically. There is a part of Saltfleet township in it that will retain the name, and I do feel that Hamilton-Barton would have been a better name to have called this riding, which is now Hamilton South. I merely repeat it is with regret on my part that I have to lose all these good people, but I realize that something had to be done in Hamilton. I think this plan is a good one. I have no complaints about that new riding, because I think it is probably the best plan that could have been arranged in the circumstances.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 23—Hastings-Frontenac.

The Chairman: This is another one that was laid over.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The only reason it stood over was this. The request was made that the constituency should be named Hastings-Peterborough-Frontenac. There is some difference of opinion on it. I personally have given some consideration to it, and this is my opinion. It is understandable that 7,600 residents of the county of Peterborough in that constituency would like to have their name perpetuated in the constituency's name. The fact is that in the province of Ontario we do not have riding names that run into three county names. I suggest that we leave this constituency as it is, Hastings-Frontenac, and that we name what is now Peterborough West just Peterborough.

Mr. Fraser: I am very glad the minister feels that the word "West" can be cut out of Peterborough West. It is just Peterborough, no west about it. It comprises the whole city, and I am quite satisfied.

Mr. Lennard: There is one word I wish to say at this time. The county of Addington loses its identity in the set-up. It is not mentioned in any riding name in eastern Ontario.

The Chairman: Shall the paragraph carry?

Mr. Fleming: On division.

Paragraph 31, Lanark, agreed to.

Paragraph 32, Leeds, agreed to.

Paragraph 33, Lincoln, agreed to.

Paragraph 34, London, agreed to.

On paragraph 35—Middlesex East.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Just before you pass this paragraph I should like to say that because of what has gone on in the last two or three days, this committee should be the retribution committee instead of the redistribution committee.

Coming back to Middlesex East, all I want to say about it is that I regret a part of the township of London is now being added to Middlesex West. Nevertheless it is part of the march of events, the shift of population. Back in 1947 the township of Biddulph was taken from Middlesex East and added to Middlesex West, and now part of the township of London. I mention that for the benefit of the committee. I want to say that about 22,000 people inside the incorporated city of London are and have been a part of Middlesex East for electoral purposes. No doubt by the time 1961 rolls around London will be entitled to two members.

While I regret the possible passing of another rural seat, it looks as though before too many years will have passed this will happen. Regardless of what changes are made now or at any future time, I have enjoyed representing the people of London township who now find themselves in Middlesex West, and I shall continue to serve them as well as I possibly can.

Mr. McIlraith: There is an amendment here involving a description of the road line. Perhaps I should read it:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item No. 35—

Middlesex East consisting of that part of the county of Middlesex contained in the townships of Dorchester North, Nissouri West, Westminster and that part of the township of London lying east of a line which may be described as follows: commencing at the intersection of the west boundary of lot sixteen with the north boundary of the township of London and then southerly along the west boundary of said lot and the west boundary of the tier of lots south thereof to its intersection with western (Old Proof line) road; thence southwesterly along western (Old Proof line) road to the western limit of the city of London at the intersection of Essex street and Platts lane; together with that part of the city of London lying east of a line described as commencing at the intersection of Cheapside street and Adelaide street; thence southerly along Adelaide street to Oxford street, thence easterly along Oxford street to the east boundary of Carling Heights; thence southerly along the said east boundary and its production southerly to its intersection with the production westerly of the south side of Middleton avenue; thence easterly along the said production westerly of the south side of Middleton avenue and the south side of Middleton avenue to Glasgow street; thence southerly along the west side of Glasgow street produced to Lorne avenue; thence easterly along the north side of Lorne avenue produced to Burbrook place; thence southerly along Burbrook place to Dundas street; thence easterly along Dundas street to its intersection with the production northerly of Swinyard street; thence southerly along the said production of Swinyard street, Swinyard street and its southerly production to Pine street; thence northwesterly along Pine street to Elm street; thence southerly along Elm street to Trafalgar street; thence westerly along Trafalgar street to Adelaide street; thence southerly along Adelaide street to the south branch of the river Thames; thence westerly along the river Thames downstream to its intersection with the northerly production of Beverly street; thence southerly along the said production and along Beverly street and Wellington road to the south boundary of the city.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Lennard: Is that the description of the boundary we discussed the other day?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is the description that was given to the hon. member for Eglinton on Monday, the precise document.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 36—Middlesex West.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a second amendment on the definition of the road, which is consequent upon the other one, and which I gave to the hon. member for Eglinton on Monday. The amendment reads:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item No. 36—Middlesex West consisting of the county of Middlesex (excluding the townships of Dorchester North, Nissouri West, Westminster and that part of the township of London lying east of a line which may be described as follows: Commencing at the intersection of the west boundary of lot sixteen with the north boundary of the township of London and then southerly along the west boundary of said lot and the west boundary of the tier of lots south thereof to its intersection with western (Old Proof line) road, thence southwesterly along western (Old Proof line) road to the western limit of the city of London at the intersection of Essex street and Platts lane.)

Mr. Murphy: Do I understand the hon. member to say that Perth is taking in only Fullerton?

Mr. McIlraith: No; Hibbert.

Mr. Murphy: As I understand it, Hibbert goes into Huron.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That is right. The motion is that Perth shall consist of the county of Perth, excepting therefrom the township of Hibbert, etc.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Murphy: On division.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Darroch: Mr. Chairman, as a little man from what was described this afternoon as a little riding, and who has taken up little time of the house, I wish to say a few words with respect to this constituency.

Let me state quite emphatically, after listening to suggestions as to what had taken place in Ontario caucuses that I never was in an Ontario Liberal caucus where redistribution was discussed. I would also bear out what was said by the hon. member for Ottawa West, that any time we did discuss this matter we were the only persons in his office. There have been some hints that what was said by the hon. member was not correct, and I wish to state at once that so far as I am concerned his statement was correct.

The problem confronting the committee in connection with this riding was that they had to consider the county of Huron with 49,280, Perth with 52,434 and Wellington with 66,930. I have no illusions whatsoever as to what would have happened to these counties if the redistribution had been carried out by a commission.

I have listened with interest to the many able speeches regarding having this work done by a commission, and perhaps what I shall now say will be somewhat out of order. I take this opportunity, however, to trespass slightly on the rules to the extent of commenting briefly on the speeches of the leader of the opposition and those of the distinguished and eloquent members from Eglinton and Greenwood, as well as their junior partner, the hon. member for Broadview. When they were speaking I could not help wondering what effect this bill would have on the activities of the premier of Ontario when the next redistribution in that province takes place.

Mr. Murphy: What has that to do with it?

Mr. Darroch: I listened with interest to what was said by my good friend and neighbour the hon. member for Huron North, and with nearly everything he said I am in complete agreement. With the exception of our being on different sides politically, the hon. member and I have many things in common. We are neighbours. Each of us has had the privilege of serving our respective municipalities on county councils. I can think of no way in which one can develop a greater pride for his county than through the associations he makes meeting fellow members of county councils.

I know the pride counties have in their history. Each county has something of which it is justly proud. I can remember that for years—and I believe it is still true—we prided ourselves in Wellington county on being the only county in Ontario with no debenture debt. All these are things that happen in the life of any municipality, of which the people are justly proud. The people of Ontario are jealous of their county boundaries, and they do not like to see them destroyed. I sympathize with the hon. member for Huron North when he objects to a part of the county of Huron being included in Wellington to make a new riding. While he may regret that that section of his county has been moved over, I can assure him that it is coming into a perfectly good home and his good friends there will suffer in no way from the move.

This subject of redistribution seems to be approached at times in a selfish manner. Speaker after speaker has referred to the riding he represents as "my riding." I do not think a riding belongs to anybody. We should consider the people making up that riding more than the individual member. I have enjoyed my association with certain members who by reason of redistribution may find it difficult to be members of the next parliament, and of course there may be others as well.

An hon. Member: From all parties.

Mr. Darroch: That is what I mean. Representation by population may be fair and justifiable in connection with urban representation, but when it comes to be applied to a province like Ontario it is absolutely out of date today. I think it belongs to the horse and buggy days. I agree with what the hon. member for Huron North said this afternoon, that rural Ontario could not expect to get the proper representation if we adopted the principle of representation by population. Factors other than boundary lines and population should be taken into consideration when dealing with this matter.

A riding similar to this was suggested a couple of months ago in an editorial in the Fergus News-Record. The editor of that paper is outstanding in the weekly newspaper field in this province. I do not know his politics, but he did suggest that the village of Fergus—it will soon be a town—would be much happier if it were included in Wellington North. He did not criticize the present representation, but he did suggest that they were rather overshadowed by being in the same riding with the city of Guelph.

This riding will be comprised of nine townships, four incorporated towns and four incorporated villages all lying north of highway 86. The rural population will be 16,936 with the urban population totalling 13,536. The charge of gerrymandering can hardly be made in connection with this riding. It might be interesting to note that the section of Huron North which is to be included in the proposed Wellington-Huron riding gave a Liberal majority in 1940 of 128; in 1945 it gave a Conservative majority of 311, and in 1949 it gave a Liberal majority of 23. I think it should be mentioned that the Liberal candidate in the 1949 election lived in Wingham. Like all towns, they were proud of their native son and gave him support regardless of his political affiliation.

I think the committee should be commended for giving another seat to rural Ontario. As I said before, I am quite sure that if it had been left to a judicial or other kind of committee which would have considered only representation by population or county boundaries, rural Ontario would have one less representative here at Ottawa. I do not know whether the new representative will be Liberal or Conservative, but on behalf of the farmers in that area I think I should thank the committee for having added another rural riding.

Mr. Hodgson: I listened to the hon. member for Wellington North eulogizing his constituency, and I do not blame him because it is a good agricultural district; but he seemed to be worrying about the redistribution that will be coming up in Ontario. I do not think he need worry about Mr. Frost and the province of Ontario. I think the last election showed that the people are quite satisfied with him. I believe Mr. Frost and his party are quite capable of looking after the province of Ontario. I feel satisfied that when the redistribution bill comes up in Ontario they will not wield the political axe with the dexterity that has been shown here but will continue good government.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 66—Wellington South.

Mr. McIlraith: I move:

That the schedule be amended with respect to item 66 (Wellington South) to read "consisting of the city of Guelph and that part of the county of Wellington contained in the townships of Puslinch, Eramosa, Guelph, Erin and Pilkington, including the village of Elora."

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up very much of the time of the committee, and I should now like to take a moment or two to discuss the riding of Wellington South. When redistribution occurs hon. members of the house face three principal results. The first, and possibly the most unpleasant, is to find that population has shifted from a riding so that it becomes necessary to eliminate it. The second is to have people added to your riding who may be of a different political faith. The third is to represent a riding where voters favourable to you are taken away. I sympathize with any hon. member who has had to face any of these rather unpleasant situations. I can say to them that members on this side of the house experience the same feelings when it happens to them. We can assess the results of these alterations just as clearly as members of the opposition, and with very much the same feelings. There is going to be a shift of between 8,000 and 10,000 people in the riding I represent. It is deemed necessary, and I really believe it is necessary, to give away the township of Pilkington, which includes the town of Fergus, in order to retain the rural riding of Wellington-Huron for the province. I am sorry to see my many friends from that historic township and the Scottish industrial centre of Fergus leaving the riding I represent. When I came to Wellington South in 1946 I did not know many of the people in the township of Pilkington or the village of Fergus. Since that time I have had the opportunity of serving them and by doing so many people have become friendly to me and I hope I have been friendly to them.

One cannot break such connections without regret whether you be a Liberal or a Conservative, and it is with regret that I view the loss of these people from Wellington South. A very large area is also being added to the riding. It includes the township of Erin, which is not nearly as densely populated. I am glad to say to these people that I shall be pleased to serve them just as well as it is humanly possible. Most of them will remember that they were in this riding at one time, and in returning to it I hope they will feel free to come and make their requests to me. If their requests are reasonable I will see that they are carried out.

Mr. Graydon: You are getting down to a good neighbourhood now.

Mr. Hosking: I am pleased to come near the county of Peel and the riding of my good friend.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 67—Wentworth.

Mr. Lennard: With respect to item 67, the riding of Wentworth, as we have reached this stage in our proceedings I wish to say that on behalf of the people of Wentworth I welcome back into the fold the people in the four townships of Beverly, Ancaster, Glanford and Binbrook. For the past several years these townships were not in my riding. As those members of the committee know who were here when the last redistribution bill was up for discussion, I objected to that very strenuously. Like the hon. member for Lincoln, I believe in maintaining county boundaries as far as possible; and I welcome these four townships back into the fold on behalf of the people of Wentworth. I am sure they are delighted to be back, and I am sure their friends and neighbours are delighted to have them.

In connection with that part of Wentworth riding which is now lost to us I merely say, as I said before on behalf of the people of Wentworth, that I regret losing many loyal supporters of our party and myself during the past few years who will now be in the new riding of Hamilton South and who were in that part of Wentworth riding which will now be in Hamilton West. They are a lot of good people.

Mr. Riley: Louder.

Mr. Lennard: Take the wool out of your ears and you will hear me all right.

Mr. Riley: What's that?

Mr. Lennard: That's you.

Mr. Riley: Take the potato out of your mouth.

Mr. Lennard: I repeat that I regret that these people have to leave us, but under the circumstances I realize that the best arrangement that could have been made in creating a new riding in the Hamilton area was made, and I am quite in agreement with it. However, I should like to say that I was not consulted too much with respect to these ridings. The new riding was practically carved out of my riding, and the plan was published in the Hamilton Spectator on May 14 last. I must say that I was not consulted in the matter. I see the hon. member for Ottawa West is anxious to rise. I agree that there was one alteration. There was a bit taken away from Hamilton East and put in that riding; but apart from that, the plan published in the Hamilton Spectator is the plan we have today. I merely repeat that so far as the new riding of Wentworth is concerned I feel it is an improvement on what we have had because we have now got back to county boundaries, and I am always in favour of maintaining county boundaries where it is possible to do so.

On the schedules—Quebec.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I have just consulted with the hon. members for Labelle and Roberval about trying to obtain the permission of the house to call the Quebec schedule as one item because there are only two very minor changes to be made in item 27 and item 39, I believe. I do not say we never had any discussions in the Quebec committee, but we kept the discussions within the family circle and everything was done with the full co-operation of the ministers from Quebec and the members from Quebec on both sides of the house. I say that because we have had the full co-operation of all members of the subcommittee including the members for Trois-Rivières, Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, St. Denis, Bellechasse and Portneuf. I think we should be allowed to bring in the schedule as one item.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that all the items for Quebec be called at once?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I would like to move:

That the schedule, with respect to the province of Quebec, be amended by deleting paragraph (c) at the end of the description of the electoral district "27. Longueuil" and by adding the said paragraph (c) at the end of the description of electoral district "39. Richelieu-Verchères."

I would also like to move:

That the schedule with respect to the province of Quebec be amended by substituting the words "Saint-Jacques" for the words "St. James" at the beginning of paragraph 72.

In the case of Trois-Rivières the name was not translated and we would ask that here the name be not translated into St. James.

Mr. Graydon: Is it going to be Saint-Jacques street?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is always Saint-Jacques street but you can call it St. James if you like.

Paragraph 4, Colchester-Hants, agreed to.

On paragraph 6—Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Fleming: I have an amendment on paragraph No. 6 Digby-Annapolis-Kings. The amendment is:

That the schedule to this act be amended by striking out paragraph 6 relating to Nova Scotia on page 45 and the following substituted therefor:

"6. Annapolis-Kings, consisting of the counties of Annapolis and Kings."

Mr. Chairman, in view of the discussion this matter has had already in the house I do not think I need to spend much time reviewing the aspects of the proposed amendment; but I will point out to the committee that the amendment does give an opportunity to effect equalization of representation in three adjoining ridings.

The report of the majority of the maritimes subcommittee and the main committee as embodied in the schedule will have the result that the riding of Queens-Lunenburg will have a population of 45,800; the riding of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare will have a population of 45,595 and the riding of Digby-Annapolis-Kings will have a population of 66,510. It cannot be said that that is equality of representation. The amendment if adopted will have the effect of equalizing representation among these three ridings, and Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted with the support of fair-minded members of the house, there will be a corresponding amendment in clauses 10 and 11 with the following object in view.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: There will be a riding of Queens-Lunenburg-Shelburne—that is to say with the municipality of Shelburne—with a total population of 53,619. The amendment to No. 11 will have the effect of creating a riding of Shelburne-Yarmouth with the inclusion of Barrington municipality, having a total population of 49,356. The adoption of the amendment now submitted will have the effect of continuing the present riding of Annapolis-Kings unchanged with a population of 54,930.

Mr. Chairman, if the purpose of redistribution is to effect equality of representation as between comparable ridings, the case for the amendment is overwhelming and unanswerable, whereas the best that can be said for the majority report as embodied in the schedule is that it will have the effect of creating such a disparity in representation as between the riding of Digby-Annapolis-Kings on the one hand and the ridings of Queens-Lunenburg and Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare on the other that the first named riding will have approximately 45 per cent more population than the two last named ridings, which are adjacent and comparable with it in every respect.

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 64.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, before the schedule carries I would like to say one word. I want to join with the statements of the minister and the hon. member from Antigonish-Guysborough who spoke this morning in paying tribute to the hon. member who represents Queens-Shelburne constituency at the present time. I want to associate myself entirely with everything that was said by those gentlemen with respect to the gentleman who has represented the constituency so well. I know that we all regret the fact that, due to physical condition and a very serious illness from which he is making recovery, it is impossible for him to be here at this time. When the minister suggested that it was the constituency of Queens-Shelburne which was really suffering the loss because they were being deprived of his services I think that was a fair statement; and I think the minister will also agree that because of his physical disabilities it would be improbable that he would embark upon political enterprise in the future. That is at least one of the factors that enters into the situation.

I want also to refer to one thing the minister said yesterday, to the effect that we were going back to the same system of redistribution which had been agreed upon in 1933. That, of course, is a factual statement, Mr. Chairman. We are going back to the redistribution of 1933.

I think it would be worth while if one looked at the figures for a moment to ascertain the situation in 1933 and the situation today. This morning I had an opportunity of consulting the census records, and found the census figures for 1931 on which that redistribution was based and the census figures for today. I find that in 1931 the constituency which was redistributed at that time, Annapolis-Kings and the Digby municipality, had a population of 49,447; today, it is 66,510. The minister was dealing with percentages yesterday, and that is a percentage increase of 34·5 per cent as between the proposed constituency now and the constituency as it was redistributed in 1931. As a matter of fact, the increase in Annapolis and Kings counties is almost twice as great as was the entire population of Digby municipality which was added at that time. If that situation had existed in 1931 no such redistribution would have taken place.

On the other hand, the proposed constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare has a population of 45,595, as compared with 41,572, or an increase of 4,000 and a percentage increase of 9·6 per cent. The constituency of Queens-Lunenburg has a population of 45,800 as compared with 42,286, an increase of 3,519 or a percentage increase of 8·3 per cent. You get a spread there between the largest and smallest constituencies, that is the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings which in the redistribution of 1931 was the largest constituency, as it is today, and the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, which was the smallest then as it is today. I believe the spread was only 7,875 then, whereas the spread now between those same constituencies is 20,915, or virtually 21,000. When one quotes those figures, Mr. Chairman, one can see why redistribution takes place. It is for the reason that places do not stand still and you get variations in population that we have redistribution. Otherwise, there would be no point in having it at all; and what has the redistribution of 1933 to do with the problems of today?

There was one reference made this morning by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough to which I should like to reply very briefly. I could not clearly hear the statements which were made from where I was sitting, but I caught part of them and I understood there was some reference to the fact that the committee did not agree on Annapolis-Kings being kept independent and unchanged, but that we had agreed on Digby-Annapolis-Kings remaining apparently the same as it was in 1931. Then the hon. member went on to say that I suggested that Queens-Shelburne be added to Lunenburg.

I have a long standing friendship with and a great regard for the present member for Digby-Yarmouth, but notwithstanding that I do not think I would be quite so foolish or shall I say stupid—a word which has apparently come into good usage—that I would have agreed to allow that member to reduce his constituency by adding Digby to Annapolis-Kings and to accept no additional territory at all. In other words, the constituency of Yarmouth would have been smaller after redistribution than it was before. Certainly that was not ever discussed by the committee. I think even to suggest such a thing shows how fallacious that argument is, because at that time of course there was no thought of Digby-Annapolis-Kings. The agreement was on Annapolis-Kings, that it would remain as such, but that some redistribution would be made with respect to Queens-Shelburne. Certainly we were not agreeing and no one would think of agreeing that the constituency of Digby-Yarmouth should be even smaller after redistribution than it was before.

I am not going over the figures and arguments that were used yesterday in regard to this matter, but I did want to mention those two matters that had been raised. This morning there was also some suggestion that I had commandeered or drafted someone from outside the province into the debate. I commandeered no one. The only ones from outside of the province who spoke were members of the committee. The member of another party, as well as the member for Royal, sat on the committee and they gave their recollections of what took place in that committee. Yesterday as I recall it, the minister said he was in Nova Scotia at the time and read about this in the press. How could it have gotten into the press, Mr. Chairman, if it did not happen? The press must have been reporting something which had been agreed upon, or which they thought was agreed upon, because I am sure the reporters for that paper—I presume the minister referred to the Halifax paper—are reliable. If a report was carried in that paper on this proposed decision whereby Annapolis-Kings was to be left alone, then that reporter must have had something to base that story upon. He certainly did not get it from me. Apparently after some weeks a change was made in that, but now that is a matter of history; and I simply wanted to refer to those things which were dealt with yesterday.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is not my intention to detain the house for any great length of time, but there are a few general remarks I should like to make on this item. This schedule provides, of course, as has been the case for a great number of years, for four seats for Prince Edward Island. In some parts of the country, there is objection to the fact that Prince Edward Island should have even four seats. As a matter of fact, it has those four seats not entirely by virtue of population but by virtue of the fact there is a protecting clause which provides that no province will have a lesser number of members in the House of Commons than it has senators.

In order to review the position very briefly, I should like to quote from a book by Norman Ward entitled "The Canadian House of Commons", at page 25. He speaks of the terms under which Prince Edward Island entered confederation, and I read:

> In 1873 the island became the seventh Canadian province, and though entitled to only five members, received six because the population had increased "by 15,000 or upwards since the year 1861." These six were not protected as were the seats of the two western provinces, and in due course the operation of the British North America Act—to the great dismay of the maritime members—reduced the island's six to three.

In commenting on that the author says that the western provinces, when they entered confederation, were granted a greater number of seats than they would have been entitled to on a population basis, and there was a protecting clause in their agreement which specified that their representation in this house should never fall below that original number. In that connection the author says:

> It is impossible to determine why Prince Edward Island's quota of seats was not protected.

That is all I have to say in that regard. But I do want to put on record the fact that if any change in the number of the representation in the province of Prince Edward Island should be made, that change ought to be upward. I am very pleased to see that no suggestion has been made that it should be further reduced. I am very pleased with that aspect of the situation. But I see that no change is made in the description of any of the three ridings. That brings up another point which I am a bit hesitant to speak about; nevertheless I feel constrained to express a point of view which is prevalent in the riding which I represent.

I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that there are four members in this house who represent dual ridings, three of whom are senior to me, and I respect their good judgment. I know that they too have agreed that the principle of dual ridings is at least acceptable. It is not my intention to try to change their views, or to object strenuously to the position which has been taken. Nevertheless I would not want the impression to be created that dual ridings are completely ideal, or even approach the ideal, because they have certain inherent disadvantages.

I should like to bring that to the attention of the house at the present time and express my wish that when the next redistribution comes around the program that was instituted a number of years ago might be completed, namely the program of doing away entirely with dual ridings. As all hon. members know, there was a time when there were a fairly large number of dual ridings. They have all been eliminated with the exception of the ridings of Halifax and Queens.

When Prince Edward Island joined confederation it had six seats in the House of Commons, but three ridings. There were three dual ridings. When the representation of Prince Edward Island dropped to five, five single ridings were created. After the census of 1901 the representation dropped to four, and the dual riding of Queens was created or re-created, leaving one dual riding in the province and two single ridings.

These dual ridings have certain inherent disadvantages. To begin with they are exceptions to the general rule, and their very existence creates considerable difficulty, I would imagine, for the officials who are responsible for carrying on an election, of course chiefly the electoral officers. They require, too, that a large number of exceptions to general principles be set down in the election act, which makes for difficulty of interpretation. In addition they create confusion in the minds of many voters because, as every hon. member will recognize, in a single constituency if there are three parties represented by candidates the voter has three choices. He may vote for any one of three men; but in a dual riding if three parties are represented, it means that there are six names on the ballot, and the voter has the choice of voting for any two, which gives him 120 combinations of ways he can vote. In addition to that, because the election act is not very clear on the point, he also has the opportunity of, if you like, exercising half his franchise. He can vote for one man and it is still a good ballot, which gives him 125 choices. I mention this because these difficulties—although they would not appear to be pertinent at the moment—would be eliminated if the dual riding was eliminated, because dual ridings create these exceptions.

Having said that, I think I have perhaps sufficiently pointed out that there is a large body of opinion in the riding which I represent, representative of all political parties, which feels very strongly that dual ridings should be done away with. I recognize that under the circumstances perhaps the most acceptable compromise has been arrived at, and perhaps the committee in dealing with the problem has done the best that could be hoped for; but I still feel there is a great deal of room for improvement, and if I were to compliment the committee on this I do not think I would be completely justified. I recognize that the chairman of the sub-committee that dealt with this, and also the chairman of the general committee, are men whom I can sincerely congratulate on many occasions. But if I were to congratulate them on this occasion for this effort I am afraid I would be something less than sincere.

The Chairman: We shall now deal with the province of Manitoba.

On the schedules—Manitoba.

On paragraph 1—Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let item No. 1 pass without again expressing very great regret that the government majority has seen fit to coalesce these two ridings of Brandon and Souris for the purpose of eliminating a riding now held by the Progressive Conservatives. The matter has had extended discussion during the past several days. I do not intend to repeat the arguments and criticisms and condemnation that have been properly levelled at the government for doing what they have done in this matter.

Mr. Bryce: As one of the members who have had their constituency removed from the map of Manitoba I have just a few remarks I would like to make at this time.

First I want to say how pleased I am that the committee has at least retained the name of Selkirk in the Manitoba schedule. In the redistribution previous to this that riding took a bad beating. In this redistribution it has been completely wiped out. I am convinced that no government, either provincial or federal, would dare remove the name Selkirk from the Red river valley, no matter what else they may do to it. And it gives me great pleasure to see the historical name of Selkirk retained, a name which will always be associated with the hardy Scottish pioneers who settled in the Red river valley.

Despite the fact that the people I have represented since coming to the House of Commons are now distributed amongst about seven different ridings, I am not complaining because I am convinced that the new boundaries that have been drawn for the riding of Selkirk will contain the same kind of people with the same high intelligence and the same keen desire for honest representation, and that when the next election rolls around they will use their intelligence and franchise to the end that the man who represents them will carry their banner with honour and dignity.

While I regret very much having the people I have represented since coming to the House of Commons allocated to other ridings, I am delighted to have had the privilege of representing them in this house for at least a few years. And I am certainly not taking the attitude that I am going to be obliged to run in a foreign country. I know the committee had a difficult job to do, and they did a first-class job on me. Nevertheless it was done in accordance with the rules of the game as they are now laid down, and somebody had to get hurt. But having been brought up on a diet of oatmeal, my shoulders are broad and I look to the future with confidence. I am thankful that God has granted me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, courage to change the things I can, and wisdom to know the difference.

Mr. Weir: Mr. Chairman, I did not wish to enter the debate at this time, and perhaps my doing so will not be very useful. But after listening to the hon. member for Eglinton express himself with respect to the redistribution in Manitoba I thought I should point out to him that he should have gone back a little further.

I happen to be one of those who got the axe in the last redistribution. While hon. members have been referring to certain constituencies in Manitoba in this redistribution, none of them apparently has seen fit to refer to the fact that the constituency of Macdonald completely disappeared at the time of the last redistribution, and was joined to another Liberal consituency.

As my hon. friend from Selkirk has said, that is part of the game and we accepted it at that time. I do not think any other course was open, just as there has been no other course open in the present instance. I could go further and say that, so far as I am personally concerned in this redistribution, I have lost territory that I had since 1930, and that as a result of this many of my closest and best friends have now been moved over to another constituency. So the argument as to how redistribution affects individuals in the house is not by any means all on one side.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, last night I took occasion to make my position clear with respect to several members in this party who were experiencing serious redistribution troubles. I wish now to say a word about the difficulties in which my very close friend in the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Selkirk, finds himself. He was very modest this evening when describing his position, I must say.

One of the things that have caused me most concern in connection with the redistribution now taking place has been the constituency of Selkirk. I took occasion to look into the position that the Manitoba subcommittee had arranged for him and found that when the explosion had cleared away, his constituency had been blown into seven pieces. He is now in the position of having his constituency represented by seven members, rather than by one as at present. It seems to me that to pick on the hon. member for Selkirk in this way, to apply the guillotine to him, is not fair.

Mr. Mutch: You are crying louder than he did.

Mr. Graydon: And I am not going to take any advice from across the way from any of the experts on guillotining, because it seems to me that if we must take advice it should come from quarters that have shown more equity and fairness.

This seems to have been the practice throughout the proceedings of the Manitoba subcommittee. The hon. member for Selkirk was as highly regarded as any member in any party; and certainly, so far as I am concerned, he stands high in my estimation. I would feel remiss in my duty tonight if I were to let this occasion pass, even though I belong to a different political party, without raising my voice in protest against this type of butchery of a riding into seven segments. I speak on behalf of a close personal friend who in my view did not get a square deal in the redistribution that has taken place.

Mr. Ward: Mr. Chairman, I am sure if the hon. member for Peel had known what he was talking about he would not have said anything on this issue. Had the hon. member for Eglinton known something about the history of Souris he would not have spoken as he did.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): They should stay in Ontario.

Mr. Ward: Going back a little, all hon. members will know that the constituency of Selkirk was created in 1947 out of a conglomeration of little patches here and there, little subdivisions of Winnipeg. At that time there was room for Selkirk, for that additional constituency. But up to now not one member of the official opposition has told us what we should do about the two seats that had to go. They have not taken that into consideration at all, and they took the very same stand with regard to Saskatchewan.

In the last thirty years I have taken part in three redistributions in the House of Commons. I believe the fairest and most equitable is the one now being made. It has been done without regard to partisanship and has been carried through on a basis of sheer logic. I will challenge anyone to prove the contrary.

Coming back to the constituency of Souris, I am sure that had the hon. member for Eglinton known that in 1947 there were only 23,000 people in that constituency he would have realized that it was the logical seat to eliminate at that time. It was the Liberals of that day who saved Souris; and yet no one on the opposition side of the house has said that, though some of them know it. I repeat that it was the Liberals who saved Souris in 1947.

The Liberals decided at that time that it should be saved, because the hon. member for Souris was the only Conservative member from Manitoba at that time. I know the Prime Minister expressed the desire that it be retained, and I know that one of the most distinguished and most capable members in the house gave up his seat in favour of that constituency.

We come now to 1952; and perhaps it will interest hon. members when I tell them that the hon. member for Souris told me that he expected his seat would go. He told me two or three months ago that he did not expect his seat would be saved. He said it was the smallest in Manitoba, and when two seats had to disappear it was only logical in his view that Souris, with only 25,000 in it, would be one of them. It was the easiest seat to dispose of because of its geographical location.

Taking the whole picture of Manitoba I would say that if one looks at the highways going up and down he will see that the job of redistribution was well done. And in this connection I wish to give the hon. member for St. Boniface great credit for the excellent job he did in dividing the seats in the province. As chairman of our group his actions were most logical.

While I am on my feet I should like to add a further word. We gain impressions from discussions that take place in the house. One of the impressions I have had during the days the redistribution discussion has been taking place is that the official opposition members must have lost confidence in themselves. In my own riding I gave up voluntarily—we did not wait to go before the committee—to the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa a strip 40 miles long and 6 miles wide, which is good for a Liberal majority of 300. That is almost as large an area as that which the hon. member for Lake Centre did so much talking about. I took an area almost the same size at the north end of my riding which had given a majority to the opposition party in the last election. I have no doubt that if I work hard enough I can get a substantial majority there.

I think hon. members opposite have been less than fair to the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I think he has been less than fair to himself in the deprecating attitude he has taken. There should be no doubt as to his ability to go out and win votes. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre could win any seat in Saskatchewan, and there was no need for all this ballyhoo simply because a little carving was done here or there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ward: Certainly it is all a matter of carving. Some four months ago a man in Saskatchewan, a good Conservative, told me that when distribution came up Lake Centre would be the seat that would have to go. I know the hon. member for Lake Centre knows this man. He said it was the logical seat to go. I think the hon. member is not fair with himself when he seems to think that he cannot go out and win that seat. Of course he can win it, just the same as the rest of us can win seats when we seem to be hurt in this redistribution.

It was apparent that two seats would have to go in Manitoba and three in Saskatchewan. Some of us in Manitoba got together before the committee met to see if we could decide on what would be the logical thing to do. I shall have to do some summerfallowing when I get back, just as the member for Lake Centre will have to do some summerfallowing.

Mr. Viau: Mr. Chairman, as chairman of the redistribution subcommittee in 1948 and this year I feel that I should give an explanation of what has happened in Manitoba. For the last few days members of the opposition have been talking about gerrymandering. We have heard the voice of the hon. member for Lake Centre, of the leader of the opposition, of the hon. member for Broadview and of other hon. members who have no knowledge whatsoever of the social, economic, political and racial questions involved in Manitoba. There was talk of gerrymandering in the province in 1948, and the present member for Portage-Neepawa represented the only seat that was then eliminated in Manitoba, which was a Liberal seat. In the redistribution of 1952 we are eliminating three seats in Manitoba; one Conservative, Souris; one C.C.F., Selkirk; and one Liberal, Norquay. The map will indicate how those three seats were eliminated.

A careful study was made of the rural and urban populations, the community of interests, and racial questions which are most important in Manitoba. It was found that the great urban area known as greater Winnipeg had to be used as the hub upon which the other ridings in Manitoba would be based. The subcommittee for Manitoba met and I asked representatives of the Conservative and C.C.F. parties to offer maps and suggestions. The hon. member for Souris presented a map and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre offered some suggestions. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was interested only in the greater Winnipeg area.

A careful study was made of the map presented by the hon. member for Souris, but he was concerned only with the western part of the province. In his map he had Souris, Brandon, Marquette, Dauphin, what was left of Portage-Neepawa and a corridor which extended from north to south that could be made into one riding. But he was not concerned with what happened to Provencher, St. Boniface, Springfield or the seats in the greater Winnipeg area.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre presented a map which dealt with the greater Winnipeg area. After taking those two maps into consideration we arrived at the boundaries which are now part of this schedule. A few weeks ago the hon. member for Selkirk stated in Winnipeg that this was the worst gerrymander the province of Manitoba had seen since confederation. That statement was greatly exaggerated. The proof of that is in what we see tonight. The hon. member for Souris, representing the Conservative party, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, representing the C.C.F. party, both left the capital last night. I do not think the gerrymander could have been that severe in Manitoba.

We have eliminated three seats, one represented by each party. Souris, which was the smallest, was amalgamated with Brandon. In that way we were able to save one more seat for the rural population of Manitoba. In the redistribution of 1948 Manitoba lost two rural seats; this year one urban seat and one rural seat are taken out. I feel that the job done by the subcommittee for Manitoba was a good job and the accusation of gerrymandering by members of the opposition and outsiders is most unfair.

Mr. Bryce: What will be the effect of that change?

Mr. Viau: In the schedule reference is made to Two Mile road and townships 15, 14 and 13 west of 3 west, that is the third west meridian. Then there is township 13 in range 1 and 2 west. That is two miles south of the northern boundary of range 13 in 1 and 2 west includes the town of Warren, which will now be part of Portage-Neepawa. It was always part of Portage-Neepawa in the past. This was discussed with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Mott: I was under the impression that it was necessary to move these amendments at the start. If not, I will move them when we come to the proper places.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Burnaby-Coquitlam is one of the new ridings that have been added. It is made up of an industrial area which contains many of the new oil refineries that are being built on the Pacific coast to take care of the oil from Alberta. Under this plan Burnaby has been subdivided and to it has been added Coquitlam, the industrial towns of Port Moody, Ioco, Fraser Mills and other industrial areas along Burrard inlet. They constitute a compact community united in many ways, and I think other members of the committee will agree that we were unanimous in suggesting this new riding of Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I have not taken any part in this debate so far.

An hon. Member: Why don't you keep it up?

Mr. Gibson: Probably I should have a vote of thanks from my friends in the house for not having done so. However, on looking back over the spectacle we have witnessed in the house for the last few days, I am particularly glad that I voted for the opposition amendment to set up a commission because I would hate to think that I had any part in providing fuel for that spectacle. During the debate a very old Chinese proverb has occurred to me concerning relaxation that I might commend to the consideration of the opposition party. However, I will not quote it at the moment.

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Gibson: There is a good old western proverb I might quote which I think is very applicable. " 'Tis music to the gambler's ears to hear the suckers howl". I have avoided taking part in any of the votes that have taken place today because I am not familiar with all the intricacies of dividing up Ontario and various other provinces. However, I will say from my knowledge of British Columbia that if the majority party in this house has been as fair in all the other provinces as they have been in my province, nobody here has any ground for complaint. In looking over what has been done in British Columbia, I think I can say that the Liberals have leaned over backward in making sure they will have ample opposition in the next parliament. Something has been said about gerrymandering taking place; but after listening to the hon. member for Dauphin I am very much inclined to think that probably it is not as important as some members think.

One is rather amused sometimes to hear members talking about large constituencies in various parts of Canada, particularly when I look across the house and see my good friend from Skeena and think of the tens of thousands of square miles he represents under the most adverse conditions. As a matter of fact I was very glad to agree when it was suggested to me, and I think it was with my concurrence that it was suggested to him, that I should probably make a small contribution toward sharing in the heavy task he must carry out by taking over some of the large coastal areas in his constituency. I have lost about 7,000 people from my constituency who were very accessible by Ontario standards, and have been given an area with many thousands of miles of coast line.

I would hesitate to try to judge, but it is possible that I have absorbed ten thousand miles of coast line that were formerly in the constituency of Skeena. The new district has a real community of interest with my own riding so far as the great fishing industry is concerned, and I am very happy to see this section added to my riding, while greatly regretting the loss of my good friends in the area from Departure bay to Englishman river. There is only one other comment I should like to make. I hope somebody will read these debates ten years from now, and I have no doubt they will because the same difficulty will probably arise at that time. I sincerely hope that by the time of the next redistribution the population of the riding of Comox-Alberni will have grown to such an extent that we will be justified in having the riding entirely on Vancouver island. I hope it will then be possible to create a riding on the coast of British Columbia which will embrace a part of the riding of Coast-Capilano, part of Comox-Alberni and part of the riding of Skeena, thus bringing about a most useful and efficient redistribution in that section of our province.

Mr. Adamson: The hon. member misquoted the Chinese proverb.

Mr. Gibson: It was a western proverb.

Mr. Adamson: The proverb is this: "It is pleasant to the surgeon's eye to see his patients bleed". It is amazing indeed to see that there is still blood in the patient.

Paragraph 6, Esquimalt-Saanich, agreed to.

Paragraph 7, Fraser Valley, agreed to.

On paragraph 8—Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: I cannot quite agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—

An hon. Member: We would not expect it.

Mr. Fulton: —that redistribution in British Columbia has been as perfect as he has described. I cannot agree with him all the way. I have expressed my differences of opinion with the majority of the subcommittee previously. I have said that in my view an extra riding in the city of Vancouver is not justified on the present population figures. However I do say, as I said then, that if that is to be the decision, then what has been done within the limits of that decision is as reasonably satisfactory as it could be made. I want to point out again, because it affects my own riding, that the result of that decision is that no adequate relief can be given to the constituencies in the interior of the province. Here I do agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he said that we sometimes feel we can sit back with a half smile at least, if not a full smile, when we hear those from other provinces discuss the size of their ridings, because the ridings in British Columbia, outside of the lower mainland area and the lower half of Vancouver island, are real empires, not pseudo empires.

What has happened as a result of the limitation imposed in British Columbia by the inclusion of this one riding within the city limits of Vancouver is that no adequate relief can be given to the problem of the excessive size of the ridings in the rest of the province.

All that it has been possible to do is juggle boundaries here and there with the result that for reasons previously discussed the district of Revelstoke, which if it is moved from its present riding of Kamloops to any other should go to the riding of Kootenay West where it has a community of geographic and economic interest, in order to equalize population and to make more equal, although it does not accomplish that result, the size of the new riding of Okanagan-Revelstoke, has been put into that riding. Thus it has been included in a portion of the Okanagan where in fact it has no community of geographic or economic interest. I just want to say that it has been a great pleasure for me to represent the historic district of Revelstoke within the boundaries of which is the mile post at Craigellachie where the last spike on the Canadian Pacific Railway was driven. It is a historic town in more ways than one, but it is of course most closely identified with railroading activity. It lies some 26 miles northwest of the north end of the Upper Arrow lake and on the Columbia river which flows into the Arrow lakes. To anyone who looks at the map of that country, with Revelstoke lying between the Monashee and Selkirk mountains in the Columbia river valley, where that river flows south after having rounded the big bend and resumed its southward flow which carries it on into the United States, it will be obvious that the community of interest, both geographic and economic, for Revelstoke lies in the Kootenay country through which the Columbia river then flows.

There is in addition the fact that at the present time the Celgar Corporation has applied for and received a forestry management licence which covers in the main all the timber areas of the Arrow lakes and adjacent districts extending away up the Columbia river past Revelstoke and up into the big bend. Their plant is going to be down in the vicinity of Castlegar; it is a huge pulp, paper and cellulose development. The fact that Revelstoke, in so far as the timber industry is concerned, lies within that area is further proof, if proof were needed, that if the district of Revelstoke is to be moved anywhere it should be moved into the Kootenay country.

I thought I should say these few words. My views were made known to the committee as well, but I did not carry the majority opinion of the committee, with the result that it is now impossible to bring about an adjustment in the interior which would both relieve the size of the ridings and make it possible for Revelstoke to go into the Kootenay country.

I simply want to express my regret that this was not done and that Revelstoke instead of going there is now included in the Okanagan. According to the expression of opinion of the people of that district they would much prefer to be included in the riding of Kootenay West, where they were prior to 1933.

Apart from that I do feel it is only fair to say that although I took a sharply different view of the principle, which should have been followed as I have said before, nevertheless once the decision was made—as it has been made—as to the general areas in which the new seats were to be located then I think that broadly speaking we have been able to arrive at a decision which was as reasonable as it could be. There is only the one further reservation which I mentioned before which is that I feel strongly that the constituency of Vancouver Centre is still too much of a pocket borough with a population of only some 48,000.

Paragraph 11, Nanaimo, agreed to.

On paragraph 12—New Westminster.

Mr. Mott: Mr. Chairman, as chairman for a short time of the British Columbia subcommittee I think I should rise at this time to say a few words. My reason for speaking is that you mentioned New Westminster, the riding I represent in British Columbia.

I would like to make a few remarks about the work of the British Columbia subcommittee of which I was chairman. Quite a lot of good work had been done, and I am one who felt very sorry that the chairman of the committee resigned part way along and we had to carry on without him. Nevertheless I would like to say at the outset in reply to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that the committee certainly did not bend over backwards, as far as I was concerned, to see that the opposition was well taken care of.

Mr. Fulton: You went as far as you could go along the other way.

Mr. Mott: I would also like to mention my own view regarding Revelstoke. That matter was brought up before the subcommittee and has also been brought before the house by the hon. member for Kamloops. To place Revelstoke in West Kootenay meant placing 54,000 or 55,000 in that constituency—I may be a thousand or so out in my figures but they are approximately correct—in order to make up a new constituency. To bring a new member into the interior it was necessary to take Revelstoke from the Kamloops area and place it in the new Okanagan-Revelstoke area. I have had very little protest regarding that, and I think the committee felt that by changing the name to Okanagan-Revelstoke it would give that historic name great national advertising. I know that many committees have had municipalities requesting that they use certain names, and we have heard much about names and historical interest and community interest. Any name attached to a constituency gets great national advertising across Canada. We felt that the people of Revelstoke, by having their name attached to the constituency of Okanagan-Revelstoke, would probably be more than satisfied by that change as opposed to going into Kootenay West where otherwise they probably should have gone. But to make up the proper number so we could have the other new member taken from the lower mainland and placed in the interior, it was necessary to do that. It was done before I became chairman of the committee, and I heartily endorsed the actions of those who had approved of this move.

British Columbia is a large province with an area of 365,000 square miles. I have been greatly interested in the remarks that have been made during the last two or three days concerning other provinces. I was born in Nova Scotia, and I know only too well Annapolis, Kings and Digby. I think even now I could from memory go through the counties of Nova Scotia. In fact I was married at Annapolis Royal. So I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments whether I thought they were right or wrong. However, coming from British Columbia, and as chairman of the subcommittee, I had all I could do and all I wished to do in looking after the British Columbia problems placed before me.

Let us look at British Columbia just for a few minutes. As I say, we have looked at the problems of the other provinces and have seen just how easy it was to arrange constituencies in Saskatchewan. The right hon. Minister of Agriculture said that there you can lie down on your stomach on the side of a gully and look across and you would not know the gully was there. In British Columbia you have to climb 9,000 feet to get over the mountains.

Let us take Kootenay East with 32,000, a very small constituency. Then let us take Skeena represented by Mr. Applewhaite and also Cariboo represented by Mr. Murray. There you have practically two-thirds of the area of British Columbia. It would be practically impossible to have equal representation on a population basis there, because you would have these two great areas right down to the Fraser valley with only about three members against some 19 members for the lower mainland area. Therefore, when we talk about redistribution, apparently there are some provinces that do not fit into the scheme of things as do other provinces.

I just want to close by saying that I have had the fullest co-operation from all the members from British Columbia, and especially from the ex-chairman upon whom I have had to call on many occasions. He has given me one hundred per cent co-operation, and I appreciate that because it is the first time I have had the honour of being chairman of the British Columbia subcommittee. At this time I do not want to leave out the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who represented the opposition and whom I also found very valuable. He was reasonable, and we appreciated his assistance very much. That is all I have to say at this time. We have done our best to meet the views of this house, and we can only say that we tried to do our best.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph 13—Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. Mott: I have an amendment to move, Mr. Chairman, in connection with Okanagan Boundary and Okanagan-Revelstoke. I mention the two at this time for the simple reason that we have had to straighten out the boundary of Okanagan Boundary, which also caused a change in the southern boundary of Okanagan-Revelstoke, so we can take the two of them together. These amendments which I am moving are seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops, and have been unanimously endorsed by all the members of the committee. These two amendments are lengthy, so I would ask the indulgence of the house to have them taken as read.

Mr. Fulton: I merely wish to confirm that these amendments have been discussed and agreed upon by the members of the subcommittee. They have been approved by the surveyor-general as representing the lines of the boundary which were agreed upon by the subcommittee, as pointed out by the member for New Westminster, the chairman of our subcommittee at that time. In addition I want to echo what he has said as to the propriety, under the circumstances, of including in the name of one of the new constituencies, namely the northern half of the old constituency of Yale, another historic riding of British Columbia, the name of Revelstoke.

I must say that I regret exceedingly seeing that name pass out of existence. It has had a long history in the area and a long history of distinguished representation. The one who represented it for the longest time within the memory of most of us in this house was Hon. Grote Stirling, who held it for this party until the by-election of 1947, occasioned by his resignation on account of ill health. It is a name which we regret to see passing out of existence, but it is a name which gradually, as a result of the successive redistributions, has come to be less and less meaningful as associated with the present area.

In the old days the riding embraced the whole of the southern interior, including what was then the central point of Yale, which is well down in the Fraser valley. Subsequent redistributions have moved the constituency easterly until now it has no relationship with the town of Yale so it was felt appropriate to abandon that name, though with regret, and use the name of Okanagan. The two ridings of Okanagan-Revelstoke and Okanagan Boundary represent, with the addition of Revelstoke, the old constituency of Yale.

I want to again echo what the chairman of our subcommittee said as to the propriety of adding the name of Revelstoke to the name of one of these new constituencies. It is a matter which I know will be agreeable to the residents of that district. On their behalf I want to thank both the present chairman and the former chairman of the subcommittee, who I know had the same idea.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I have two other amendments of which I gave notice on Monday.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Do I understand those amendments deal with another riding?

Mr. Boucher: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Hon. members have heard the amendment. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 7—Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Boucher: With regard to item No. 7, I also gave notice on Monday that I would move the following amendment:

That townships 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and 31, all in range 18, west of the second meridian, be deleted from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and added to Yorkton.

On Monday, I gave notice of a motion concerning an amendment with respect to Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. On Tuesday I indicated that I had another amendment relating to the same area of that constituency, and that I would move it in substitution for the former. I now beg leave to move:

That the east half of townships 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20, all in range 19, and that part of the east half of township 21, in range 19, lying south of the Qu'Appelle river, all west of the second meridian, be deleted from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, and be included in the constituency of Qu'Appelle.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the first amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member has also moved another amendment. Shall it carry?

Mr. Fleming: In my submission, Mr. Chairman, the second amendment does not go nearly as far as it should in the direction of trying to repair some of the injustice that has been done with respect to the riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. Even with the amendment which has been passed and with this amendment, and I believe another one that the hon. member for Rosthern intends to introduce, that riding will still have a population of 53,000, which makes it the largest in the province with one exception. I refer to the urban riding of Regina, and now the riding of Humboldt may possibly have 500 people more than this riding in view of these three changes that are in the process of being made. But, Mr. Chairman, my submission is that the amendment with respect to these particular townships named now before the committee does not go far enough. If all of the townships named, instead of just the east half of them, were included in the amendment it would have the effect of removing one of the very objectionable features of the way the boundaries of the riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre have been drawn.

Mention has been made more than once of the fact that these boundaries are drawn in such a way that a portion of the city of Regina is included in this riding, as well as the suburbs of Regina. If the entire townships named, instead of merely the east half of them, were included within the scope of the amendment it would have the effect of removing from the riding the portion of the city of Regina that is now within the riding, and it would also remove the east part of the suburbs of that city.

I am sure I do not need to dwell on the objectionable features which have already been threshed out in this debate of including in a riding like this a portion of the city of Regina. You have a city in it now, the city of Moose Jaw, and you have this huge rural area, difficult enough to represent by reason of the problem of access created by the fact that Last Mountain lake bisects the riding north and south. Therefore I move, Mr. Chairman:

That the schedule for Saskatchewan be amended as follows:

(1) That all of townships 16 to 21 inclusive in ranges 18 and 19, west of the second meridian, be removed from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and added to Qu'Appelle.

I am sure the genial member for Qu'Appelle will be very happy to welcome the west half of these townships into the riding of Qu'Appelle, as well as the east half. In doing so, something will be done to repair the maldistribution created by the Saskatchewan schedule, which makes the riding of Lake Centre much too large and much too populous in relation to other rural ridings in the province, and indeed all the ridings of the province.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Coldwell: This does go some distance, but it does not meet the objection I have; that is that a portion of the city of Regina has been placed outside the city of Regina. It seems to me that in considering amendments we should make Regina City a constituency bounded by the municipal boundaries of that city. It seems to me the logical thing is to include in Regina those parts of Regina that are now outside and which are proposed to be placed in Qu'Appelle. I certainly think that should be considered. It is the objection that I have taken throughout.

It does not seem to me logical or sensible to take part of a city out of the city and place it in a rural constituency, and certainly I do not think it is wise to place it in Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I can imagine that the people in the city of Regina who are to be in the constituency called Moose Jaw-Lake Centre will not relish that to any extent. I wanted to put my position before the committee.

Mr. McCusker: I just want to clarify what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said. I am sure he did not want to state what was wrong when he said this area has been taken out of Regina. It never was in Regina. Part of the area was in Moose Jaw constituency at the time of the last election, and the other part was in Qu'Appelle. If I am asked to retain the constituency within its old boundaries, with a slight change in the south part of the city to straighten out a jog in it, that leaves me with 66,500 people, in fact, more than that. That is the part of the city in which all the construction is going on. Houses are being built. In a very few years that part of the city will be out of all proportion to the surroundings on account of its increase in population. It is increasing very rapidly, more rapidly than anywhere else, and at the present time it is the largest constituency. I am merely suggesting that it remain as it was.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to say that while I appreciate that the constituency of Regina today contains some 56,000 people, I think the hon. gentleman said—

Mr. McCusker: I said 66,500.

Mr. Coldwell: That is the city proper?

Mr. McCusker: No, it is the old city.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right. We have constituencies in other parts of Canada with populations in excess of 90,000. So to put these voters in the city to which they belong, even if they happen to be living in an area which has been outside the city for election purposes before, I think is the logical thing to do. After all, there is a community of interest on the part of the people who live in the city, and I think they should have the opportunity of being represented by a member who represents the interests of the citizens of that city as a whole. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. Dewar: Before the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Eglinton passes, I think probably he should go back in the other direction. He asks that all the townships from 16 to 21 inclusive in ranges 18 and 19, west of the second meridian, be removed from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, and added to Qu'Appelle. If the hon. member will refer to paragraph 11 in the Saskatchewan schedule, which deals with Regina city, he will notice that already the city of Regina boundaries contain a portion of section 9 in township 17. If we were to follow through on the suggestion of the hon. member I would have between 12,000 and 15,000 people from the city of Regina. I realize that this would be quite in keeping with the consistent inconsistencies of the opposition. At the same time I must say they should go back and get their directions straight.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I feel sure we are indebted to some members supporting the government in the carving job they are doing for the advice they are giving us so freely. Indeed, there have been a couple of useful contributions this evening. One of them was by the occasionally independent member for Comox-Alberni, who gave us his definition of the procedure we are following when he said that it would be appropriate, in connection with the schedule, if he were to remind us of the saying, "'Tis music to the gambler's ears to hear the suckers howl." He will recall, of course, that that was a saying applied to what some hon. members will describe as a crap game, and it was applied specifically to a game with loaded dice. That is a very accurate description of what is taking place here. Apparently the only objection on the part of the hon. member who gave us this definition is that those whom he regards as suckers are howling.

The fact of the matter is that what he said indicates the attitude of a number of members supporting the government with respect to what is taking place. This is a game with loaded dice; and if any attempt is made to put the game on a sound level, then immediately there is objection on the ground that really those who are raising the questions about it do not know these particular constituencies.

No one needs to be personally acquainted with the details of any of these constituencies to know—and again I refer to what was said by the hon. member—that in the opinion of those who have done this job it has been done in accordance with the principle he enunciated, that a little carving now and then is relished by the best of men.

Here we have the carving done in the case of Regina. As has been pointed out, the whole city is well within the population limits of a number of other cities which are retaining their city boundaries. The marriage of Regina and Moose Jaw in this instance undoubtedly will be of interest to those who take part in that unusual ceremony. But the fact remains that, no matter what affinity of interest there may be in that area, it does seem to represent a strange combination of rural areas, and of one whole city and part of another city in a new constituency which has as its purpose the obvious desire to create as many favourable political opportunities for the carver as possible, and to limit as much as possible the opportunity of the present member for Lake Centre to return to the House of Commons.

When the hon. member who spoke a short time ago suggested that members of the Progressive Conservative party were depreciating their position, if I may use his expression, may I say that not one of us is depreciating in any way the ability of the hon. member for Lake Centre to win his way back into this house, no matter what racket is tried by the party in power in the house at this time.

But the fact that we are confident of his ability to deal with a situation of this kind should not in any way silence criticism of a method which is so utterly out of harmony with the lofty sentiments expressed in the house by the Prime Minister at the beginning of the discussion of this subject, and again in the house this afternoon. Those lofty sentiments fit very badly with the way in which his followers have carried out the task they have set themselves. And it is regrettable indeed that the Prime Minister has not seen fit to answer the repeated suggestion that he should indicate his own opinion as to the extent to which his followers are departing from the lofty principles he has enunciated here.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived: Yeas, 23; nays, 55.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Eglinton lost. The question is now on the amendment of the hon. member for Rosthern.

Amendment (Mr. Boucher) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the paragraph carry?

Mr. Fleming: I have a further amendment. The amendments with which we have latterly been dealing have related to the east boundary of the proposed new riding of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. The amendment I am about to introduce relates to the west boundary, where a substantial area west of the second and third meridians has been removed from what has been for some years the riding of Lake Centre. It is an area which, from the historic and economic standpoints, and in terms of interest and transportation, belongs with the balance of what is now to become Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. It is bisected by the Canadian National Railways. It belongs properly with the riding of Lake Centre rather than with that of Rosetown-Biggar, where it has been placed under the schedule. Therefore I move:

That the schedule for Saskatchewan be amended as follows:

"That townships 21 to 30 inclusive in range 28, west of the second meridian, and townships 22 to 30 inclusive in range 1, west of the third meridian, be removed from Rosetown-Biggar and added to Moose Jaw-Lake Centre."

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived: Yeas, 26; nays, 62.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph 4—Bow River.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to say a word about this constituency. I indicated very clearly the other day what I thought about the situation in the southern part of Alberta as it exists at the present time. I said at that time I thought this was one of the most unfair pieces of gerrymandering that had been created in the province. I was in hopes that those on the committee would have seen fit to rectify the mistake which had been made, but that has not been done and I wish to offer my objections.

Since this gerrymandering occurred an editorial appeared in the Albertan of Calgary, a Liberal newspaper, and I should like to read one or two paragraphs. It was in the issue of June 28 and reads:

Calgary North and Calgary South

The juggling of Calgary and southern Alberta federal constituency boundaries makes sense, in general, although it is disturbing that the parliamentary Liberals, who have no representation in southern Alberta and therefore know nothing about the region, forced the changes over the objections of the members who do know the region.

Those were almost the exact sentiments which I expressed in this house. The situation there was quite peculiar, in that no

Liberal members were involved. All the sitting members were agreed that there should be no change made in the southern part of Alberta. The editorial continues:

The new Bow River constituency will stretch from Drumheller to British Columbia. That makes it something of a geographical monstrosity.

In effect that is what I said. Anyone who looks at the map and sees that the constituency of Bow River goes from the British Columbia border to within 84 miles of the Saskatchewan border cannot help but realize that it is a monstrosity. How any fair-minded government could allow such a monstrosity to exist is beyond my apprehension.

Mr. Welbourn: How much of the west end of Bow River constituency is unsurveyed?

Mr. Johnston: I doubt if there is much that is unsurveyed. There is not a great deal of population west of lake Louise, but there is some at Field, which is getting pretty close to the boundary. There are families still living up in that area.

Mr. Welbourn: The hon. member has not answered my question.

Mr. Johnston: I have not the surveyor's map before me. If the hon. member had given me notice of his question or had even suggested it in the committee I would have been prepared to answer. Of course he never brought it up in the committee, and I do not suppose it ever crossed his mind on that occasion. I am sure there must have been many important things that never crossed his mind.

Mr. Welbourn: It was brought up in the committee.

Mr. Johnston: As the hon. member for Macleod says, the area is populated and those people are deserving of consideration and representation. I think this editorial in this Liberal paper was most fair in its criticism up to a certain point, and that is the point at which I take objection. I resent these words:

But the easternmost part of the city, which has been in Bow River, is rebel territory, populated by working people who feel they owe nothing to the old-line parties. Not since 1917 has the constituency gone to a Liberal or Conservative.

Just because people are intelligent enough to vote Social Credit does not mean they should be considered rebels. I think it is a credit to their intelligence that they have acted as they have; and that will be further demonstrated in the forthcoming election.

Mr. Welbourn: The hon. member can run there if he wants to.

Mr. Johnston: I am quite well aware of that fact. I may do that or I may not. It would not be for fear of not being elected. In order to give the committee an opportunity to once again express its fairness by way of correcting a grave error, I propose to move this amendment:

That the Alberta schedule as found on page 70 and following pages be amended as follows:
(a) Section 4, Bow River, to be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

At this point I want to say that all the amendment does is to reinstate the old boundaries of my constituency of Bow River. Then I propose to move that the old boundaries of Calgary East, Calgary West, Lethbridge, Macleod and Medicine Hat be reinstated. The effect will be to leave these constituencies exactly as they are. That will leave all the sitting members satisfied, it will leave all the people in southern Alberta satisfied, and it will correct a grave error. The amendment continues:

Bow River consisting of those portions of townships twenty-five (25) to twenty-seven (27) inclusive, in ranges fifteen (15) to seventeen (17) inclusive west of the fourth meridian, lying west of the left bank of Red Deer river; townships twenty-five (25) to twenty-nine (29) inclusive, in ranges eighteen (18) to twenty-nine (29) inclusive west of the fourth meridian; that portion of township thirty (30) in ranges twenty-one (21) to twenty-nine (29) inclusive west of the fourth meridian lying west of the left bank of Red Deer river; all townships twenty-five (25) to thirty (30) inclusive in range one (1) and all townships twenty-six (26) to thirty (30) inclusive in range two (2) west of the fifth meridian; those portions of townships twenty-one (21) to twenty-four (24) inclusive in ranges twenty-six (26) to twenty-nine (29) inclusive west of the fourth meridian lying north of Bow River and including such parts as are within the boundaries of the city of Calgary; all of sections twenty-five (25), twenty-six (26), thirty-five (35) and thirty-six (36) in township twenty-three (23) range one (1) west of the fifth meridian, including such parts of these sections as are within the city of Calgary, and those portions of sections twelve (12), thirteen (13), twenty-three (23) and twenty-four (24) in the same townships which lie east of Bow river; together with that portion of the city of Calgary lying east of a line which may be described as follows: commencing at the intersection of Sixth street E., with the north boundary of township twenty-three (23); thence northerly along the said Sixth street E. to its intersection with Twenty-fifth avenue S.E.; thence westerly along Twenty-fifth ave. S.E., to the Elbow river; thence northerly along the Elbow river to its intersection with Seventeenth ave. S.E.; thence westerly along Seventeenth ave. S.E., to its intersection with Fourth street E.; thence northerly along Fourth street E., and across Langevin bridge to the Edmonton trail; thence northerly and following the Edmonton trail to its intersection with Eighth ave. N.E.; thence easterly along Eighth ave. N.E. to its intersection with Sixth street E., thence northerly along Sixth street E. to the northern boundary of the city of Calgary.

That is the one dealing with Bow River. When we come to Calgary and the others I shall move amendments there, but I think it is your ruling that we shall deal with them one at a time, or shall I read the others?

The Chairman: Does this amendment affect only the constituency of Bow River?

Mr. Johnston: The amendment you have in your hand, Mr. Chairman, covers all the constituencies to which I referred a moment ago. If it is your desire I shall move them all at the same time and we can vote on them at one time.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member indicate once more what constituencies will be affected? Perhaps the committee might give unanimous consent to consider all these constituencies at one time.

Mr. Johnston: The constituencies affected are Bow River, Calgary North, Calgary South, Lethbridge, Macleod and Medicine Hat. Those are the constituencies that have been affected by the proposed redistribution; and if my amendment carries, as I hope it will, then the effect will be merely to restore the constituencies to their former position.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we shall consider together paragraph 4, Bow River, paragraph 5, Calgary North, paragraph 6, Calgary South, paragraph 11, Lethbridge, paragraph 12, Macleod and paragraph 13, Medicine Hat?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Johnston: The balance of the amendment reads as follows:

(b) Section 5, Calgary North, to be deleted and the following substituted therefor: Calgary East consisting of those portions of townships twenty (20) to twenty-three (23) inclusive between range twenty-six (26) west of the fourth meridian and range one (1) west of the fifth meridian inclusive, lying south and west of the left bank of Bow River excepting sections twenty-five (25), twenty-six (26), thirty-five (35), and thirty-six (36) in township twenty-three (23) range one (1) west of the fifth meridian; all townships twenty (20) to twenty-three (23) inclusive between the east boundary of range two (2) west of the fifth meridian and the west boundary of the province of Alberta; the Sarcee Indian reserve No. 145; together with that portion of the city of Calgary in township twenty-four (24) range one (1) west of the fifth meridian lying between and not included in the electoral districts of Bow River and Calgary West.

(d. Section 11, Lethbridge, to be deleted and the following substituted therefor: Lethbridge consisting of townships one (1) to ten (10) inclusive in ranges fifteen (15) to twenty-four (24) inclusive, excepting that portion of township seven (7) in range twenty-four (24) lying west of the left bank of Belly river; township eleven (11) ranges fifteen (15) to twenty-four (24) excepting those portions in range fifteen (15) and the east half of range sixteen (16) lying north of Old Man river; that portion of township twelve (12) in range sixteen (16) lying south of Old Man river; townships one (1) and two (2) in ranges twenty-five (25) to thirty (30) inclusive; townships three (3) and four (4) in ranges twenty-five (25) to twenty-seven (27) inclusive, and that portion of township three (3) range twenty-eight (28) lying east of the left bank of Belly river; together with the Blood Indian reserve No. 148; all the above mentioned townships and ranges being west of the fourth meridian.

(e) Section 12, Macleod, to be deleted and the following substituted therefor: Macleod consisting of all townships one (1) to nineteen (19) inclusive comprised between the fifth meridian and the west boundary of the province of Alberta; those portions of townships three (3) to eleven (11) inclusive in ranges twenty-five (25) to thirty (30) inclusive, and of township seven (7) in range twenty-four (24), west of the fourth meridian, lying west and north of the left bank of Belly river; townships twelve (12) to nineteen (19) inclusive in ranges twenty-six (26) to thirty (30) inclusive, west of the fourth meridian; together with those portions of townships twelve (12) to twenty-two (22) inclusive in ranges seventeen (17) to twenty-five (25) inclusive west of the fourth meridian, and of Blackfoot Indian reserve No. 146, lying south and west of the left bank of Bow River.

twenty-four (24) inclusive, in range sixteen (16) and of all those portions of Blackfoot Indian reserve No. 146 and of townships seventeen (17) to twenty-four (24) inclusive, in ranges seventeen (17) to twenty-five (25) inclusive, lying north of Bow river; all the said townships being west of the fourth meridian.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Before the question is put on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River I believe I should take part in this debate briefly, in order to say that I have a measure of praise for the work of the Alberta subcommittee on redistribution. The chairman of that subcommittee, the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, seemed fair and appeared to act in an impartial way in arriving at a decent and sensible distribution of the ridings in Alberta. The redistribution was not made primarily for the benefit of the members representing the ridings, but rather in the main for the benefit of the electors concerned. The chairman of the committee advises me that he had no direction whatever from any caucus of Alberta provincial Liberals.

The ridings of Edmonton East and Edmonton West were not redistributed into three ridings on a party basis. They were not gerrymandered in any way. It is a matter of concern to the hon. member for Edmonton West, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and myself that we will not be representing the electors residing south of the North Saskatchewan river in the city of Edmonton who are to be in the new riding of Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Johnston: On a point of order, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but the part of Alberta involved in my amendment has nothing to do with the northern section. I have made no reference whatever to the constituencies in the northern part of the province. My amendment deals only with the southern part. I have no objection whatever to the arrangement that was made in the northern part.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): In arriving at a basis of debate in connection with the point raised in the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River, I believe I should refer to the situation that exists in the whole province. I will conclude my remarks soon if I am allowed to continue and make my point. I was saying that the people south of the North Saskatchewan river in Edmonton will not be represented in the future by the hon. member for Edmonton West and myself. We are very concerned about that. These are good people. Being our constituents, we have endeavoured to serve their best interests in the House of Commons, and we are going to be very sorry to lose them.

However, time marches on and great developments are taking place in the west, particularly around Edmonton and Calgary. The important and growing community of Edmonton was compelled to seek a third voice in parliament for our wonderful city. We have done that, and the electors will decide in the future who will be their representatives, as they have decided in the past. As a member I have interested myself with respect to the redistribution as it will affect Edmonton, and I am satisfied with the creation of the riding of Edmonton-Strathcona.

I must say a word with regard to the autonomy of Calgary, which has been more surely established in community interest by now having two urban seats in that city. No member has a vested right in his riding, and my request to the committee was to do an impartial job in a manner that would bring credit and honour to them in fulfilling their responsibilities on that committee.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am happy with and concur in the recommendations of the committee as reflected in the schedules, and I will so vote and support the recommendations of the subcommittee as against the amendment now before us.

Mr. Low: Just one word about the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Bow River. I am supporting his request for this amendment, and I do so for a number of reasons which I think will be quite obvious. I am not trying to criticize the work of the committee; taking it by and large I think that in the north they have done a pretty fair job. In most cases I believe the individuals concerned or affected are ready to accept the result in good spirit. We do not think any member has a vested right to or ownership of any constituency.

We were prepared, Mr. Chairman, to allow one of the Social Credit seats in the north to be wiped out entirely. We said nothing about that because we felt that if someone had to lose a riding perhaps the party that had a majority of the ridings in the province might suffer the loss better than others, so we accepted the rearrangement in the north without much complaint. But when it came to southern Alberta, Mr. Chairman, as was just explained by the hon. member for Edmonton East, the principle guiding the committee seemed to be to try to place Calgary on a solidly urban basis.

If the committee had been guided by that principle entirely nobody would have had any complaint; but, Mr. Chairman, if you will look at the map you will see that they did not observe that principle entirely. The fact is that both north and south Calgary ridings have a suburban section added, which means that they juggled the constituency of Bow River and, as my hon. friend from Bow River says, made a rather grotesque picture of it. It looks like a quarter of chewed up dog beef hanging out of an upstairs window. There is no question about it. In an effort then to rectify what they had done, or at least make it a little more palatable, they confined the boundaries of the urban Calgary seats to an area north of the river and an area south of the river much smaller than before. But they then added a rural section to each of those seats.

The point I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman, is that when they did the juggling with respect to Bow River, and in order to see that they had two urban seats in Calgary, they had to go around and juggle the boundaries of three other constituencies: Macleod, Lethbridge and Medicine Hat. I mention, Mr. Chairman, that they did not improve the situation one particle for anybody. It might be argued that in ten years Calgary North and Calgary South might grow to encompass the suburban areas that have been added and be purely urban ridings, but in ten years we will probably be faced with another fiasco like this. Therefore there seems to be plenty of time to make that readjustment ten years from now if the growth of those areas does take place. I think we could very well leave those ridings as they were without in any way violating a principle which might have guided the committee in rearranging the boundaries. It is for that reason I suggest that we leave the five ridings in southern Alberta as they are.

I repeat once more that by and large the Alberta subcommittee did a good job. I am not complaining very much; I am not in any way embittered, and I am not going to try to carry on a long criticism here tonight. I just ask the committee to accept the statement that we are prepared to take what was done in the north but we do say that the five ridings that are needlessly affected in the south can carry on for another period just as well as they can carry on under the proposed rearrangement.

Amendment (Mr. Johnston) negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 65.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FLIGHTS OF AIRCRAFT A.O.P.-10,000—RESERVATION TO ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May we revert now to questions. This morning I said we were ready to make question No. 5 an order for return with a reservation that read as follows:

As a rule, Canadian air force records containing the detailed information requested by this question are preserved only for a period of one year. The information asked for can only be provided back to the 1st of July, 1951.

Since then I have asked the department for information concerning the matter, and here is what I was handed this evening.

The log books of aircraft in the Royal Canadian Air Force state the mileage, engine data and fuel consumption for each trip, but do not list passengers or freight carried. This has been the system employed for years in the R.C.A.F. In view of what I have said, it will be possible to produce answers to the first and second parts of this question, covering the period since January 1, 1951; but for the reasons given this morning it will not be possible to give the information requested in parts 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the question prior to July 1, 1951.

We have no objection to the question being made an order for return subject to the reservation I have made. Now, if it does not pass as an order for return with this reservation, I am afraid it will die on the order paper. This way, some answer would be given at the opening of the next session. It is a motion of the house, and the department would have to file a document concerning this question.

Mr. Drew: As the hon. member in whose name this question stands is not in the house, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to press the point; but if it could stand until the house meets in the morning it could be dealt with then.

BUSINESS FOR TOMORROW

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will be concluding the proceedings in this session, and perhaps adjourning tomorrow evening. There are about ninety items of estimates, a good many of which have been before committees, have been studied, considered and discussed. We would start off with the balance of the seven or eight items in agriculture. Before we do that, however, we would take up the third reading of this bill. It has been going fine, and we want to get it through.

Mr. Fleming: You are not going to let it stand until November 20?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think we could do that. Then we would proceed with post office following agriculture, and so on.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, July 3, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

FLIGHTS OF AIRCRAFT A.O.P.-10,000

Mr. Coyle:

1. On what occasions since January 1, 1951, has the C-5 aircraft bearing registration A.O.P.-10,000 been dispatched on flights outside of Canada?
2. What was the mileage, destination and route flown on each such flight?
3. Were passengers other than members of the Royal Canadian Air Force personnel carried on any such flight?
4. If so, what are the names of such passengers, and in each case, what was the status and reason for travel?
5. Were such passengers carried throughout the flight, and if not, between what points was each passenger carried?
6. Having regard to the number of passengers carried and the over-all cost per mile of operating the aircraft, what was the estimated cost of such trips for each passenger named?
7. What was paid by each of the passengers named for such flights?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, this question was under discussion yesterday. At that time the Minister of Public Works explained that if he were to give consent to its becoming an order for return it would be necessary to indicate a limitation imposed by the fact that, according to information he had received, records which would give the information requested in the latter part of the question—that is, numbers 3 to 7 inclusive—would have been destroyed, under the practice of the R.C.A.F. in relation to information of that kind.

Without in any way debating the answer given, I wonder if the minister is aware that there are circumstances which make it rather difficult to understand why that information would not be available in this particular case, because a question in the same form was on the order paper at the last session, and remained on the order paper at the time the last session closed on December 29, 1951. It had been on the order paper for a very considerable time.

I have asked the hon. member in whose name the question stood at that time, and he has explained to me that he understood—incorrectly, as it happens—that the question would be answered afterwards, although there had been no formal request that it become an order for return. For that reason the question was allowed to lapse at that time.

I am inclined to think that if, instead of accepting the general explanation in regard to practice, the Minister of Public Works would find out if there was not some information obtained at that time and now on file, he would probably find that all this information covering the period between January 1, 1951, the date mentioned in the question, and a period a year ago, or at such time as the records were destroyed, was available. I leave it in that position. If the minister says that it is subject to the limitation in relation to the practice of the R.C.A.F. I naturally, on behalf of the member who discussed the matter with him, would be called upon to accept that limitation, subject to any discussion of the practice as something independent of this question itself.

Subject to what I have said I accept the proposal on behalf of the hon. member in whose name the question stands that it stand as an order for return. I would ask the minister to refer to this subject again in view of the information I have given him about this same question having been on the order paper in the last session. I would hope probably that information might be available.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps I should say to the leader of the opposition that we shall be glad indeed to look further into the matter. I think it only fair to say that the R.C.A.F. does destroy passenger lists at the end of six months. I am told that the practice of the commercial airlines is to destroy passenger manifests every month so that the R.C.A.F. keep them for a much longer period. I shall be glad to see if any other information is available in accordance with the suggestion of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to enlarge this unduly, but there is an important point involved here. In the first place I understood the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to state yesterday that it was a year, but now the Minister of National Defence says it is six months.

Mr. Claxton: It is in respect of the period of six months, I beg your pardon.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Public Works indicated that it was a year; his words were:

The information asked for can only be provided back to the 1st of July, 1951.

That is what he said after having explained the procedure.

Mr. Claxton: That is quite right.

Mr. Drew: That simply leaves it in the way I have indicated. In view of the question having been asked earlier and the fact that it must have called for some action by the department at that time, with the probability that a file exists in relation to this particular matter, I would ask that it be reviewed on that basis.

PRIME MINISTER

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT TO INDIA, PAKISTAN AND CEYLON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I called the Prime Minister a few minutes before the house convened to give him notice. Around the end of May, Elmore Philpott of the Vancouver Sun reported an interview with the Prime Minister which indicated that he was making plans to visit India, Pakistan and Ceylon this coming fall. Would the Prime Minister care to indicate to the house whether he intends to make such a trip?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did see Mr. Philpott some weeks ago and I told him that if it were possible for me to accept invitations I had received to visit the capitals of commonwealth sister nations in Asia I would be very glad to do so. He had recently returned from the east and during the course of our conversation it was indicated that autumn would be the most comfortable time to visit those capitals. That is as far as it went. I am sorry that I have no plans at the present time for accepting that invitation at any early date.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that should the possibility of such a trip present itself the members of this house and the Canadian people would be most happy that the Prime Minister of Canada was able in that way to express the good will of Canada to the sister nations of the commonwealth whose close association with us is so important at this time.

Mr. St. Laurent: I can assure hon. members that such a trip would be most interesting personally and I feel it would be the kind of gesture that most Canadians would like to see made whenever the time was convenient to make it.

WHEAT

PEACE RIVER COUNTRY—REQUEST FOR FACILITIES FOR REMOVAL OF WHEAT IN STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a rather serious situation which exists in the Peace river country. I should like to ask him a question, but in order to do so I shall have to give some information. I hope Your Honour will be indulgent with me this morning because this may be the last opportunity I shall have to draw this matter to the attention of the minister.

There is in the Peace river country 10,500,000 bushels of wheat still in storage: 8,500,000 bushels in the elevators and 2 million bushels still in storage on the farm. They have only shipped 23,500,000 bushels from the Peace river country this year, which means that in the next two months, if they are to be ready for the next crop, over 5,000 carloads will have to be shipped out of that country if the farmers are to have any storage space available. Will the parliamentary assistant draw this matter to the attention of the wheat board and the transport controller to see if cars cannot be provided for that area?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to have the whole situation looked into and if anything should be done I will see that the necessary action is taken.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN CURRENT FISCAL YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question of which I have given rather brief notice. Could the Minister of Finance before the house adjourns give us any further indication of the course of government receipts and expenditures to date in the current fiscal year?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. I have made inquiries and I find that the statement of the comptroller of the treasury covering April and May will be published in this week's Canada

Gazette, which I understand will appear on Friday or Saturday. I would hope that the house might be adjourned before that time, but speaking generally I may say that the position of revenues and expenditures continues to be satisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister state whether the figures are made up on the same basis as they were a year ago, or whether any different principle is used? It might be useful to the public to have that information in calculating the size of the surplus.

Mr. Abbott: I think I indicated when my hon. friend asked me a question some time ago that we are endeavouring to pro-rate in the figures this year some charges such as annual debt charges, contributions to the superannuation fund and so on, which are paid intermittently through the year. However, similar adjustments will be made with respect to last year's figures so that a comparison of this year's figures with last year's figures will be a comparison of like with like.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and I will preface my question in the same way as did the leader of the Social Credit group. Some discussion took place the other night with regard to the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. Since that time I have received three or four communications from municipal authorities in central Saskatchewan asking whether the government would direct the commission to hold public meetings before a decision is arrived at so that full representations might be made as to the necessity and the feasibility of that project.

These municipal authorities have had no opportunity to make representations and they feel they should be entitled to do so. Would the Prime Minister, on behalf of the government, direct that public hearings be held so that a full presentation of the situation from their point of view may be made to the commission?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not like to undertake to give any directions to the commission in view of what I understand to be the facts. I will bring to their attention the remarks the hon. gentleman has made this morning, but I think these municipalities would be well advised to channel their requests through the provincial government of Saskatchewan to which I understand the commission has given an undertaking that if they wanted public hearings, public hearings would be arranged. I will bring the hon. gentleman's remarks to the attention of the commission together with the reply that I am making, and I think it might be in the interests of the municipal authorities who wish to have a public hearing to make that fact known to the government of Saskatchewan which I am sure will be disposed to do whatever would appear to be in the general interest of those making the representations.

CANADIAN PEACE CONGRESS

ACTIVITIES OF DR. ENDICOTT AND ASSOCIATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to refer to one subject which has been before the house at different times, and which it seems to me appropriate should be raised again in view of the fact that all members probably have seen the further distribution of material from the so-called Canadian peace congress. On June 25 the Minister of Justice, in response to questions that had been asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre on different occasions earlier in the session, gave an explanation as to the position of the government in connection with the possibility of prosecuting a man named Endicott. The question that had been asked on a number of occasions was whether the Department of Justice had reached a decision with respect to whether Endicott's actions constituted a breach under the Criminal Code either in its original form or in the form as amended last session.

I am prompted to direct the attention of the government to the explanation that was given in view of the further activities of this organization. In explaining the reason why the government had decided not to prosecute Endicott the Minister of Justice said that it might give publicity and might give Endicott and others the appearance of martyrs. He said it probably would not embarrass the communists if Endicott were prosecuted. Then he went on to explain that the freedom of speech which we all cherish and are all seeking to preserve, and which is being abused by Endicott and others associated with him, should be protected and held inviolate. That sounds like a very desirable course to follow but, Mr. Speaker, I suggest there is one aspect of this problem that has not been touched upon in any explanation given by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice, neither on the 25th nor again on the 27th of June when he referred to this matter, stated whether or not the Department of Justice had come to a conclusion whether there was or was not the appropriate basis for a prosecution to be launched under the terms of the Criminal Code.

I need not emphasize in this house that the hon. member for Lake Centre has been a most consistent exponent of the liberty of the individual and most certainly never implied that there should at any time be action taken which was not under the clearly stated criminal law of this country. However, the question has not been answered whether in the opinion of the government the conduct of Endicott and his associates does lay a foundation for a charge under the Criminal Code as amended or under its original provisions. The reason I mention the matter now is because within some measurable time we doubtless will be leaving this place until November, and I think the question should not be left in abeyance.

The explanation given by the Minister of Justice implies that an opinion may be held that a charge should be laid but that it would not be wise to lay it. It seems to me that the Department of Justice must decide whether, under the laws passed by this house, there is or is not ground for prosecution. If the laws are too severe they should be amended and ameliorated. If they are not severe enough they should be amended so that they will deal with offences in an appropriate manner. But if laws have been passed by the parliament of Canada then it is the duty of the Department of Justice to carry out its responsibility to see that the laws are observed. It is not in keeping with our judicial system that the Department of Justice shall adopt a course in applied psychology and try to determine what the effect will be of prosecution or otherwise.

The Minister of Justice has said that Endicott's abuses of our freedom have already brought him into sufficient contempt. The same thing may be said about a murderer. It brings him into contempt when it is known he has committed an offence that justifies prosecution. I come back to this matter for the reason that this morning I have received, as I feel sure all other hon. members have also received, a pledge for peace circulated by these traitors. I use the word "traitors" in the sense that they have been trying to destroy the spirit of our people for the defence of our own freedom. It is for the courts to say whether there has been an act of treachery justifying a penalty under our laws, and only the courts should decide that question. This is a pledge which people are asked to sign and doubtless they will collect these cards and announce at some future time that they have been signed by thousands. It will not make any difference how many sign them because they will use a figure that will be suitable to them in any event. This card with the dove of peace, issued by these people who are serving the Kremlin in an attempt to undermine the spirit of defence of our people, can only be regarded with contempt, but the question still remains whether that is enough and whether there is or is not ground for prosecution in the courts as a result of the course they are following. It seems to me that it is still for the Department of Justice to make a decision on that basis and not on what they anticipate the psychological reaction might be.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think the hon. gentleman forgets that the administration of justice and the enforcement of laws passed by parliament are in the first instance the responsibility of the attorneys general of the Canadian provinces. It is quite true that any citizen can lay a complaint. It is quite true that the officers of the Department of Justice could initiate a complaint, but the proceedings would thereafter be under the control of the provincial administrations. It is my submission that it is quite proper for the Department of Justice, before deciding whether it will do something that might be done by the attorneys general and which would regularly be done by the attorneys general of the provinces in the case of ordinary crimes, to consider whether or not the result of their laying a charge would be apt to produce benefits for the public generally. The hon. gentleman believes, as I do, in the accuracy of everything he has said about these people serving the interests of the Kremlin, but between believing that that is so and being able to produce legal evidence before the courts that it is so, to the extent which would bring about a conviction, there is quite a wide gap. I think the Department of Justice is wise in considering the probable results of the initiation, in quite an unexceptional manner, by the federal Department of Justice of prosecution for a crime against the peace, order and good government of the country which normally would be within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was very careful to say that nothing in their attitude or their statements at the present time can be construed as absolving Mr. Endicott or the others who print these appeals for peace. Each action is a separate incident and if and when it became advisable to prosecute them each one of those incidents would be taken into account.

Now, I do not think I can add anything to the statement that was made at that time beyond pointing out that if any attorney general is of a different opinion as to the desirability of prosecutions being instituted he has it within his jurisdiction to take action; and if any Canadian citizen felt that he should make a charge it is within his right under our system of laws to make that charge. The Department of Justice has in certain cases taken the initiative because it felt that not only had there been a violation of a statute but that it was an instance where it was in the public interest that the department should step in and start prosecution.

Here the department has not come to the conclusion that, under the whole of the circumstances, it was desirable that it should do so, but it has done nothing to prevent anyone else from so doing if anyone else is otherwise advised.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the leader of the opposition replies may I say there is nothing before the house at the present time. I did not interrupt the leader of the opposition before as I gathered it was the wish of the house that he should continue. If he would like to ask some questions I think I should allow him to do so but, unless there is unanimous consent of the house, I cannot allow debate on this subject at this time.

Mr. Drew: It was not with the thought of debate, it was simply to point out to the Prime Minister that I had not overlooked the responsibility of provincial attorneys general. After all, I have had occasion to consider their responsibilities from time to time.

I point out that at the time Gouzenko's evidence laid the foundation for charges against men who were serving the same master and for the same purpose the dominion government did not hesitate to take action. There is nothing to prevent the Department of Justice from acting in a matter of national concern, and I do believe this is a matter of national concern whether the decision is to proceed or not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the Prime Minister a question which has never been answered. It was not a question whether or not it is desirable to prosecute, but did the law officers of the crown give the opinion that, having regard to what Endicott has done, an offence could conceivably have been committed under any section of the treason and sedition laws as they are today? That was the question. It was not a question of policy or desirability, but is the law sufficient as it now exists to cover activities—I was going to say treasonable activities but it is not for me to judge—such as Endicott and those associated with him are today perpetrating in this country?

That was the question I asked the attorney general and that is the question I would like to ask the Prime Minister. What was the opinion of the law officers if all these facts were established? Would there or would there not be an offence?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what opinions the law officers may have given the Minister of Justice. I remember, as my hon. friend does, how the late beloved member of this house, Mr. Tommy Church, used to object to any legal opinion being given in the house by the Department of Justice.

Now, I can give my own opinion. I think, personally, that if what I believe to be true and what the hon. leader of the opposition believes to be true could be legally proved before the courts there is ample provision in the Criminal Code to warrant conviction.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albany M. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I be permitted to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Fisheries. I think I should say that not being accustomed to parliamentary procedure I have not given him the usual notice. My question is a general one, so perhaps he will entertain it.

I have read in several newspapers—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Robichaud: My question is: Are there any plans under consideration by the minister's department to come to the assistance of the fishermen of the province of New Brunswick who have suffered losses?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the province of New Brunswick has not made any claim for assistance. I suppose the hon. member is referring to storm damage, and we have had no submission from the province of New Brunswick asking for assistance.

REDISTRIBUTION

READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the third reading of Bill No. 393, to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, unless the government at this stage decides to reconsider its decision to proceed in any event with the pattern that has been adopted for redistribution of the representation of the people of Canada, then this represents the last stage in a gerrymandering procedure which has become a subject of criticism over many years. I need not enlarge upon the statements that have been made by myself and by other members of the opposition that no one party can be charged alone with the responsibility for following a course in regard to redistribution in past years which has done a great deal to bring this method into contempt. Nevertheless, there does come some time when it is desirable that we recognize the change of events and that we do progress with the experience of other jurisdictions before us to improve the methods by which our own democratic processes will work out to the best advantage of our people and in a manner that will give them the highest possible measure of confidence in the system which is intended to serve their best interests.

We have made proposals in regard to another method and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is appropriate for me to refer briefly to this again because I intend to introduce a motion which would have the effect of delaying the coming into force of this act for a period of six months. If that motion were accepted, instead of this being merely regarded as a device to dispose of the measure itself, it could become the procedure by which the other course still could be adopted and public confidence established in our system of representation of the people in the House of Commons.

Already, Mr. Speaker, there have been comments in the press right across Canada which indicate, in spite of what was said by the Minister of Finance yesterday, that people are not uninterested in this subject. When the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said that people are not interested in it he was reflecting a course which has been quite apparent, particularly on the part of the Minister of Finance. That of course has applied to other subjects as well. People are interested in it. I think it can be said that editorial comment generally reflects the degree of interest that there is in a subject, although we rarely have a uniform pattern of comment in the editorials of the newspapers of this country. That is the very natural expression of freedom of opinion and freedom of speech that we wish to preserve. But there has been considerable comment on this subject.

I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared yesterday in the Montreal Star. I refer to that editorial because that highly respected publication is not ordinarily regarded as being unduly critical of the present government, although it does show a commendable impartiality in its approach to public questions. In yesterday's edition of the Montreal Star there is an editorial which I quote for the reason that it supports the contention that I intend to place before the house this morning. The heading on the editorial is, "There is still time to redistribute fairly." I have no intention of reading the whole editorial, but I should like to read the beginning of it.

> Conservatives at Ottawa are staging a minor filibuster over the government's redistribution bill. Mr. Drew has asked again for the appointment of an independent commission to redraw constituency boundaries. From the government side comes no sign of agreement. Instead there is an evident determination to push through a bill already suspect.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I have ruled on previous occasions that it is not in order to read editorials in this house which reflect upon the proceedings of the house at the present time. Beauchesne's third edition, paragraph 266, reads:

> The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly, is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others . . .
> Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order.

I made the same ruling last year, and I think I should ask members of the house to observe it.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that there is a borderline in regard to quotations from the press in cases of this kind, and I do not intend to delay the discussion by entering into an argument on that point. I say that there is a borderline because the difference between press comment or an editorial or a report that states what may be regarded as facts, and one which may be regarded as reflecting, to use the word in the rule, on the proceedings of the house is sometimes a vague and uncertain area. I recognize that it may be difficult to determine that area. I do not want to delay the discussion of this subject by entering into an argument on this particular point today, because perhaps having indicated that there are editorial comments I could paraphrase the general effect of them without quoting anyone else's opinion for the purpose of supporting the arguments we have put forward.

It is sufficient to say that there has been a substantial expression of opinion outside of this house as well as in the house, and in conversation in the corridors, shall we say, that it would be desirable to get away from a method that has been subject to criticism by members on both sides of the house.

Yesterday the suggestion was left that if the members of the opposition had really read the debates in other legislative chambers we would not have been saying that this alternative system had proven satisfactory elsewhere. I quoted from the United Kingdom Hansard of 1948 to show that, far from there being criticism of the commission method, there was uniform approval of that method, and that it was the extent to which the government of the day in the United Kingdom had departed from the recommendations of the commission that criticism was directed to what the house was being called upon to approve. It has worked satisfactorily in Australia, in the opinion of those who are associated with the results of that course. It has worked satisfactorily in New Zealand, according to the statement of responsible men there. It has worked satisfactorily elsewhere.

The reason I refer to this again this morning is that I would hope, even at this late date, that the government might see fit to reconsider its position to avoid the suggestion that there has been what has been so properly described as a racket taking place in the form of legislative procedure. I have seen questions asked as to how this would work out. It is rather difficult to tell whether supporters of the government believe in another method. At times when legislation is not before the house, there always seems to be a uniform expression of opinion that another method would be desirable. During the present debate there have been those who have indicated an alternative method would be desirable, but that the time is not ripe. There have been those who have returned to the argument that the members of this house, as representatives of the people of Canada, can best determine what should be done.

In response to that argument, may I point out that there never has been any suggestion that the members of this house or that the parliament of Canada should abdicate its responsibility on anything that is entrusted to it. The British North America Act imposes responsibility upon parliament to carry out a redistribution of the representation of the people in the House of Commons every ten years after the decennial census. It would be improper, and highly improper, if we abdicated our responsibility, and placed that in the hands of some other body that has not been suggested. The question has been asked, what is suggested? What is suggested is this. Appoint an independent commission—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the house voted on that question during the present session. It would not be in order to revive that debate at this time on third reading. The rules with respect to third reading are much more strictly interpreted than on second reading. On third reading, the debate must be confined to the bill itself and not outside matters.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps it will simplify matters, Mr. Speaker, if I indicate that before I sit down I propose to move the usual motion that this bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read this day six months hence. I explain that I propose to move that motion so that I might still discuss the subject without it being suggested that I am still debating after the motion has been made.

When I refer to the alternative method, I am explaining why I suggest that this motion should not be regarded as merely a delaying process, but should be regarded as a procedure by which the government will be given an opportunity to consider the desirability of employing a method which has met with such satisfaction elsewhere. If Your Honour so rules, in the face of that resolution which, it seems to me, brings directly into issue the possibility of some alternative proceeding in the meantime, then of course I would leave the matter where it stands.

I had not intended to extend my argument on this point which relates to the reasons why I emphasize the desirability of delaying this bill's coming into force; I simply wanted to say that, under the proposals that have been made, the responsibility of parliament would remain, because any commission appointed by this parliament would report back to parliament itself, and parliament would then have the responsibility for accepting, in whole or in part, the recommendations that had been made and of acting or not acting upon those recommendations just as parliament does in connection with the report of any other commission which it may appoint.

I leave the matter there, Mr. Speaker, because that puts forward the point I wish to make, except that I confess that I would have liked to go into more detail in view of the suggestion I have seen that we have not clearly put forward exactly what it is that we are suggesting. I have been suggesting that, with the best judgment we can exercise and with the experience of other jurisdictions before us, we should devise a similar procedure best adapted to our own federal system and to our own particular requirements. I shall leave the matter there from that point of view but I wish to say something with regard to the effect of what has been done.

No matter who has been to blame in the past, we are again confronted with the criticism which has been raised on every occasion in the past when redistribution has taken place. From what was quoted both by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) and by myself during the debate yesterday, it is obvious that it is not only here in this House of Commons in Canada that strong and forceful terms are used to apply to the result of methods which do not seem to produce a result that is in the interests of the people generally. Nevertheless it is at all times the duty of members to direct the attention of this house to the possibility of improvement. If we were simply to say that we are following the course that has been followed on earlier occasions—that although it is true there has been criticism, the criticism has been directed to both sides and consequently nothing need be done—there would not be any necessity for debate and we would not have much improvement in this or any other case. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at the time that this measure was introduced, many of us had hoped that a different approach was going to be made to this subject on this occasion. Again yesterday afternoon the Prime Minister made a statement that would have produced a result different from the one we have before us; that is, if the principles he enunciated in that statement had in fact guided the majority of the redistribution committee or the provincial subcommittees.

By the result of majority decisions there has been barefaced gerrymandering under the act now before us. There has been gerrymandering in the very way that has been described on earlier occasions. In order to deny to sitting members the opportunity in the future to represent the people whom they have served in the past constituencies have been joined when that joining was not necessary. Under the definition given by the predecessor of the present Prime Minister, namely the late William Lyon Mackenzie King, the most obvious type of gerrymandering is the combining of two constituencies represented by members of the opposing party for the purpose of denying to one of them the right to return to the House of Commons after the next election.

Another form of gerrymandering described by the same gentleman was that which detaches from an existing riding areas which have been inclined to give constant support to the party in power, for the purpose of bolstering another riding with votes which may be counted upon or which the government may expect will follow the same course in the future.

Another form of gerrymandering is the taking of a constituency represented by a member of the opposing parties—and usually it is done in the case of the most prominent members of the opposing parties—and so distorting the boundaries of it that the organization of that constituency in a way that gives an interpretation of the wishes of the people becomes extremely difficult.

We have had the three types of gerrymandering in this case. We have had the first type of gerrymandering, that of the joining of seats, in a number of cases in order to deny to members now sitting in this house the opportunity of returning after the next election, because one of two members must give way to the other under the necessities of the result of this redistribution.

Then we have seen the detachment of townships and areas that appear to have followed a course that would suggest the likelihood that they would support the government and in that way bolster adjoining constituencies. Then we have seen the most abominable type of gerrymandering in the case of the constituency of Lake Centre for an obvious purpose. These acts of gerrymandering are there before us; and no protestations of high purpose will deny the result that is before our eyes.

This matter has been referred to in varying terms but one quotation that was read into the record yesterday from a speech of one of the greatest parliamentarians of our generation—I refer to Right Hon. Winston Churchill—emphasized the necessity at this particular time, no matter what may have occurred at any time in the past, of establishing public confidence in our system of representation of the people in the House of Commons. As he pointed out, this is a time to make sure that we do not in any way imitate the methods that we are criticizing so severely in those areas now behind the iron curtain. Abuse of government power is bad at any time, but it is particularly bad at a time when one of the great issues before us is to restrain the power of government. Freedom from excessive government power is really the fundamental issue between us and the dictatorships on the other side of the iron curtain. For that very reason, by every gesture we can make, by every practical demonstration that we can give of our own desire to see that the representation of the people is carried out in the most impartial manner possible, we should do what we can to inspire in the minds of our people confidence that representation by population is a reality as far as it can be carried forward under some accepted principles which recognize the difference between urban constituencies and rural constituencies in the concentration of population. But here, embedded in this act we are now asked to pass in its final stage, is every abuse that has ever been criticized in the past, and in some cases in the most iniquitous form. You cannot have an arbitrary equality of representation throughout the whole of Canada. There are geographical reasons; there are reasons of concentration of population, or otherwise. But there can be some clearly stated principles which would guide a redistribution committee of this House of Commons in reaching its decision.

How can it be said that there has been any principle guiding redistribution when you see urban constituencies in one case of around 40,000, and urban constituencies in another case of more than 90,000? How can one say that here is any principle applied when in one case we see a mixed rural and urban constituency with a little more than 30,000 and another mixed rural and urban constituency with approximately 90,000?

There has been no principle; there has been no guiding purpose apparent in the decisions reached as a result of the actions of the majority of the redistribution committee—except the old purpose of gerrymandering, to the advantage of the government.

Since this represents something that is not the privilege and prerogative of the members of parliament so much as it is the rights of the people themselves to proper representation in the House of Commons, I am about to move now an amendment for the purpose of providing an opportunity for further consideration of a method that would be more desirable. No harm will be done if there is delay in dealing with this measure, because we are going to meet again in November. Between now and that time steps can be taken to produce plans for redistribution which would be more satisfactory to the people of Canada, and effect some understandable principle which would at least give a pretence of representation by population in this country.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming):

That the motion be amended by deleting the word "now" and adding the words "this day six months" at the end of the question.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be very brief because I think practically everything that could possibly be said in this connection has already been said. The house in committee last night by an overwhelming voice decided that the schedule and the bill should remain substantially as it was when introduced.

I think however that the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is one that those of us who are critical of the schedule and the bill should support. I propose to vote for it when the vote is taken. I have held for a good many years that the method followed in carrying out redistribution by parliament is wrong, that unfortunately it means that members of the house are quite often called upon to think of their own prospects in subsequent elections rather than the representation of the people of Canada on a sound and proper basis.

When I look at the map of my own province of Saskatchewan I can only conclude that there has been something of a gerrymander. That is the word that has been used, and I find it a most convenient word to use at the moment. I feel particularly that the city of Regina, which was my home for a good many years, has been treated unfairly. It is true that the parts of the city that are now in Lake Centre were in Lake Centre or in Moose Jaw or in Qu'Appelle years ago.

But times have changed and the city has grown. About a year ago, if my memory serves me correctly, the boundaries of the city were enlarged, when a provincial act took into the city those heavily populated suburban areas that had been built up. It is a city which in thirty years has grown from 26,000 to about 72,000, I believe it is. Today, by this redistribution, some 5,000 or 6,000 Regina citizens, now included in the urban area of Regina as well as those in the newer suburbs, are being placed outside that city, in a constituency which will be dominated by another city, that of Moose Jaw.

To my mind that is indefensible. I do not believe the people of Moose Jaw will endeavour to gain any advantage over Regina, or to persuade their member, when elected, that he should fight for any advantage over the city of Regina; but I think it is most unwise to place a large number of citizens of Regina in a constituency that is either dominated by another city, or is substantially rural.

Last night I could not vote for the amendment offered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) to transfer that portion of the city of Regina and its suburbs, now included in Lake Centre, into the rural constituency of Qu'Appelle. I think that would have been equally wrong. My contention is that the limits of the city of Regina should be the limits of the constituency. There are 66,500 people now in that seat. By enlarging that number to 72,000, you still have a constituency much smaller than 17 city constituencies in Ontario, and substantially smaller than the constituencies in the city of Winnipeg.

I wish to make it clear that this is a mistake from every point of view. It is a mistake from the point of view of the satisfaction due to the people who reside in the city area taken away from the city of Regina, because while the area has not been heretofore in the constituency of Regina, it is now legally a part of the city of Regina. I think that is the worst mistake that has been made in Saskatchewan.

Then, the boundaries of my own constituency are greatly enlarged, so that when I return to that constituency I shall have an area to cover almost twice the extent of the original constituency which sent me to this House of Commons in 1935. I shall be happy to have the opportunity to run again for that constituency, if its electors desire that I should do so. I am happy that the name has been retained. In that respect I am glad that no change in name at least has been made, although the boundaries of the constituency have been greatly enlarged.

When I hear some of my maritime friends talking about coast line, I look at the map and see that my constituency is cut diagonally in two pieces by the Saskatchewan river, which is impassable in several instances for more than a hundred miles. How I am going to get across it, except by journeying down from Saskatoon to Regina or to Moose Jaw, I really do not know. But it will be done. I shall endeavour to serve the new part of the constituency as I have tried to serve the old part. I am told by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that all this is because it was decided to leave Rosetown-Biggar in the map of the province.

Mr. Gardiner: Not all of it.

Mr. Coldwell: That was a consideration which apparently I shared with the leaders of the other parties in this house.

Mr. Laing: What would have happened if Saskatchewan had lost five seats?

Mr. Coldwell: Then my constituency probably would have been still larger and in all probability the method of approach in the province of Saskatchewan would have had to be substantially different. Apart from the feeling that I have of disagreement with the manner in which this redistribution has been done, I think the people of Saskatchewan appreciate that we have lost only three constituencies instead of the five we might have lost. All of us from Saskatchewan are ready to express to members of the house from other parts of Canada the appreciation we feel of what was done in that regard.

But I think reconsideration should be given to this matter. I have held the view and have expressed it over and over again, both inside and outside the house, that redistribution should have been done by an impartial commission. I listened to Mr. Churchill's criticism of the bill in that house which was read into the record yesterday, but I remember that in that same debate the members of the government, of the Labour party, contended that the report of the commission was favourable to the Conservative opposition. As a matter of fact, an analysis of the results indicates that the contention of the government party was substantially correct because while the present Conservative government of Great Britain won a majority of the seats they succeeded in getting only a minority of the votes.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said yesterday, I presume that no matter what commission was set up, no matter what report was made, no matter what bill was introduced, opposition members probably would feel that they should criticize what had been done. In this case I think the opposition—I include all opposition groups—can be relieved of any suggestion that we have been doing this. I think with the redistribution that has been made so far as Saskatchewan is concerned as well as other provinces and other constituencies—I am thinking of Annapolis-Kings for one—there is legitimate criticism of what has happened. Be that as it may, I think we should support the motion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and give this matter further consideration. In the meantime the government should be asked again to set up a commission which this house and the country can regard as impartial.

Mr. Speaker: I have permitted the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to refer to the commission, but I think there has been sufficient reference to that subject on the motion for third reading. May I ask hon. members who are to speak to discuss only the matters contained in the bill.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are a few remarks I should like to make as the seconder of the motion now under debate. In what I have to say I propose to confine myself entirely to what happened yesterday and to make a general summation of the situation.

The redistribution bill which has now reached the stage of third reading cannot by any stretch of the imagination be said to provide a satisfactory redistribution. Even after three days of deliberation in the house we are still left with extraordinary extremes. The least populous constituency in Canada under this scheme will have a population of 9,999, while the most populous has a population of some 91,000. Even in Ontario there are extremes of a low population of 28,000, on the one hand, and a high population of 91,000, on the other.

There is ample evidence that the government has felt quite uneasy about what they are doing. In many respects that uneasiness has been reflected in the remarks by and actions of the government members. I do not believe that the government has any serious confidence in the redistribution that they are now on the point of finally perpetrating. The disorders that have occurred in the house, all this continual raucous shouting on the part of government supporters, have not successfully hidden from open view the fact that the government is conscious that it is doing a job of gerrymandering and perpetrating some serious injustices.

First I should like to deal briefly with a remark made yesterday by the chairman of the redistribution committee, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, which I quote from page 4089 of Hansard:

> Nevertheless I wish to assure hon. members that the question of a redistribution commission will be given the most serious consideration.

While that statement unhappily is belated, let us welcome it even at this time. But in welcoming it let us ask why that serious consideration that is now promised should not be given to this question right now. If the subject merits serious consideration, as is now apparently admitted, why does it not merit that serious consideration right now? There is no excuse in the face of what has happened, in the face of what was said yesterday, for deliberately pushing ahead and rushing this measure through. If the subject of an impartial redistribution commission is deserving of consideration following the census of 1961, then there is not a single answer that has been given that justifies its not being applied here and now in the light of the census of 1951.

My second observation relates to the extent of government responsibility in this matter. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was at great pains yesterday morning to try to shift responsibility for this gerrymandering from the shoulders of the government to the shoulders of the house. One can understand the alacrity shown by the Prime Minister to disavow any governmental responsibility for this botching of the job of redistribution to the advantage of the government. But when some of us said yesterday, "That kind of talk is not impressive in the face of the realities of the situation", no reply was made. We pointed out that this is a government bill standing in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It is a bill that has been supported in debate by all the ministers of the government who have spoken.

If there were any so naïve as to think that any great degree of independence would be shown by supporters of the house in the face of what the Prime Minister said yesterday, then of course the proof of the pudding will be in the eating. We shall judge them by their fruits. What were their fruits yesterday? There were nine divisions in the committee of the whole yesterday. Before any of those divisions occurred the Prime Minister said that he was going to ask all his members to vote, but not to do so with an eye to political advantage or disadvantage. As reported on page 4094 of Hansard he said:

> It is the responsibility of every one of us to attempt to get a fair redistribution under this system.

Then further on he said:

> I would ask all the hon. members who belong to the Liberal party not to examine these different boundaries in the light of what they may do for Liberal prospects, for Conservative prospects, for C.C.F. prospects or Social Credit prospects but in the light of what they feel is the proper thing in virtue of their responsibilities to the public generally as well as to their own constituents.

Then, further on he said:

> I said at the outset and I say now that I hope each member of the house, to whatever party he belongs, will endeavour in considering each one of these matters to render his verdict and his conception of what is fair and what is in the public interest.

Then he concluded on this rather personal note. He said, as found on page 4095:

> I think that when we reach each one of these individual cases—

Here he was speaking about those that had been singled out for special mention during the course of the debate as being flagrant cases of gerrymandering.

> —they should be looked at with great sincerity by every member of the house and the right conclusion reached.

At the conclusion of the same paragraph he said:

> I am going to take my stand on each one of these questions as it arises, not as the Prime Minister but as the member representing the constituency of Quebec East.

By their fruits ye shall know them, Mr. Speaker. What was the response of Liberal members of this house to this appeal of the Prime Minister phrased in such brave words? There was an opportunity given with respect to each of these situations, each of the individual cases that had been mentioned by the Prime Minister, and what was the result? In each one of those cases the government majority voted down the amendment introduced by the opposition. There were nine such amendments and in the nine votes a total of 555 votes were cast by government supporters. How many of them saw fit to show a measure of independence? One government supporter on one vote, the hon. member for Lincoln, decided to be consistent. The hon. member for Lincoln having firmly supported the ground that county boundaries should not be interfered with in the case of his own county felt obliged to maintain consistency by voting in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Huron North not to interfere with the boundaries of Huron county but to make Huron county the riding of Huron.

The proportion of independence shown by government supporters in the house, in view of the brave words of the Prime Minister, is one out of 555. Perhaps that proportion is a little higher than usual but I think it is a fair indication of how empty are words that profess to show independence, even independence from the government if you please, in the light of the hard realities of government discipline in the house.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if you could give us the figures for your party.

Mr. Fleming: The fact of the matter is every member of our party voted in favour of each of these amendments, but we were not included in the scope of these brave words of the Prime Minister's appeal. The Prime Minister was indicating to his followers that they were free to vote according to their views, and that is the way they exercised their freedom. That is a fine showing of independence on the part of government supporters. Therefore I will not need to spend very much time on this talk about Liberal members in the house being free to vote.

What about the Prime Minister himself in discharging what he referred to as his responsibility in connection with these individual cases? They are the individual cases concerning which votes were taken on amendments introduced by the opposition. The Prime Minister was present for the first five of these votes taken yesterday afternoon and he was not present for the four votes last evening, but in every one of the five votes when he was present he lined up eagerly with all the Liberal members in the house and all the government ministers to vote solidly against the opposition amendments.

So we see very clearly just how much independence the Prime Minister was prepared to show, whether as Prime Minister or as the member for Quebec East, in departing from the recommendations of the Liberal majority on the redistribution committee. We saw the Prime Minister voting to perpetrate these gerrymanders, these flagrant abuses of the redistribution process, and to perpetrate inequalities in representation in such cases as were discussed yesterday, the extermination of Haldimand and in the process the representation thereof by the present member. The Prime Minister was not in the house when the vote was taken with respect to Lake Centre but I suppose we may assume, in view of his unbroken record yesterday afternoon in voting five time against five opposition amendments to cure and eradicate these gerrymanders, that if he had been in the house last night when the other four votes were taken he would have voted in the same way. Every government minister who voted on every one of these nine amendments voted precisely in the same way. They voted against the opposition amendments to cure the injustices that were about to be perpetrated by the government majority.

Questions put to the Prime Minister before the taking of some of these votes remained unanswered. I might remind the house that before the vote was taken in connection with the changes in the riding of Frontenac-Addington and the riding of Hastings-Peterborough to create an empire in the new riding of Hastings-Frontenac—

Mr. McIlraith: It is the tenth in size in the province.

Mr. Fleming: —I put a question to the Prime Minister. I asked him whether it was the Prime Minister's conception of fairness that this riding of Hastings-Frontenac should be created in the way proposed by the government majority on the redistribution committee, having in it a population of over 43,000, while right next door is the riding of Renfrew South represented by the Minister of National Revenue with less than half the area and with a population of only 31,000. That question was not answered. The Prime Minister had several opportunities to answer it but he judiciously refrained from doing so. The Prime Minister then voted against our amendment.

We have had an opportunity to test the brave words uttered yesterday morning by the Prime Minister for the benefit of himself and his followers by what happened in the house yesterday afternoon. We shall judge those words in the light of the votes taken, in the light of such situations as the one I have just referred to where in effect favouritism has been shown to the Minister of National Revenue by throwing 49 townships into the huge riding of Hastings-Frontenac with a population about 35 per cent in excess of the much smaller riding of Renfrew South next door to it.

Some government supporters spoke to me at noon yesterday and said: "Now, you remember what the Prime Minister said this morning. We do not think you paid enough attention to it. You remember that he said that when we reached each of these individual cases that have been particularly mentioned they will be looked at with great sincerity and every member of the house will have the opportunity to reach the right conclusion and take the right vote on them." The suggestion was made to me that what we people in the opposition should do was to call off the fight then because the Prime Minister had said in effect that if we just waited until we reached the particular cases in the schedule everything was going to be all right and certain things were going to be done that would leave everybody happy. They said to me, "Why are you carrying on the fight"?

Mr. Rooney: Did you believe it?

Mr. Fleming: No, I did not. I have been dealing with the Liberals in this house too long to believe that. However, there was an opportunity to test the validity of that kind of cajolery, and we saw yesterday afternoon in the house when we came to each of these individual cases—

Mr. Martin: Don't break that desk.

Mr. Fleming: It is too bad the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not right here at my desk now.

Mr. Graydon: Better to break the desk than to break a promise.

Mr. Fleming: We had an opportunity yesterday to see just how much weight should be attached to the brave words of the Prime Minister—just wait until these individual cases are reached; everybody is going to be so independent; everybody is going to do the right thing; you can count on our members; they are all great fellows with independent minds and they are going to do the right thing in these cases. Well, you know how that went—one out of 555 government votes was independent—and the Prime Minister's was not that one.

Yes, the government yesterday gave not one inch in a single one of these most flagrant and disgraceful cases of gerrymandering. Not one inch did they give after all those beautiful words yesterday morning. Mr. Speaker, in the light of what has happened, in the light of the wish of hon. members that statements made in this house should be serious, would it not then have been very much better if the Prime Minister had not said anything at all yesterday morning?

Then, Mr. Speaker, we witnessed in the course of debate that exposure of that most cynical attitude on the part of the government which goes a long way to explain what they are doing in this callous manner. You will remember that I was venturing to put forward the argument that the public should have an ample opportunity of reviewing what is proposed with respect to constituency boundaries—because after all it is the public that is going to be affected by them in the vote—and that the matter should not be proceeded with hastily and should be allowed to stand for the present time, as there will be an opportunity later in this present session when the house reconvenes on the 20th November. Hansard records my remarks and certain interjections at page 4101 yesterday morning as follows. I am reported as saying:

> What could be fairer under those circumstances than that the public should have ample opportunity to review this matter and to make the views of the public known to members who are going to have to take the responsibility eventually of voting on the schedule and the bill.
> Mr. Abbott: The public do not care; it is only the members who care.
> Mr. Mutch: The hon. gentleman is overestimating public interest in what goes on here.
> Mr. Fleming: That is a most significant statement. The Minister of Finance says that the public does not care and the parliamentary assistant—
> Some hon. Members: No.
> Mr. Fleming: Yes, he did; he certainly did.
> Mr. McIlraith: No, he did not.

Mr. McIlraith: Finish it.

Mr. Fleming: The gentleman last referred to said that the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Bradley: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Fleming: I think the Minister of Finance will probably regret making this most lamentable interjection to the end of his political days.

An hon. Member: You hope!

Mr. Fleming: Nevertheless the statement was that the Minister of Finance did not say what he did say. We who were just a short distance removed from the Minister of Finance and directly facing him heard what he said and correctly repeated in the house what he did say, but we were told by the hon. member for Ottawa West who was sitting behind the minister and obviously did not hear what the minister said: "No, he did not". However, we become accustomed to those things.

So the discussion went merrily on.

Mr. McIlraith: Read the rest of it. It is of interest to the house.

Mr. Fleming: I am very happy to continue because it is the worst example of squirming and shilly-shallying that has been seen in this house for some time. How quickly the Minister of Finance repented him of his words! How quickly he showed his concern that he should have made such a blunder! How quickly he showed his regret that he should have joined the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in exposing the cynical mind of the government, because this remark, "the public do not care", as applied to redistribution, will deserve to rank in history with that equally cynical and blundering remark made a little over a year ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he said in this house: "If we wanted to get away with it who would stop us?"

An hon. Member: The Tories.

Mr. Fleming: These two remarks, Mr. Speaker, are of the same nature precisely. They are made of the same cloth; they are outpourings of the same mentality.

Here is a government which has convinced itself that it is absolute; that power belongs to it. It has long shown its contempt for the House of Commons and now it feels perfectly at liberty to show its contempt for the people. The people do not care, they say; and therefore in effect they say to themselves: Well, if we want to get away with it who is going to stop us? The people don't care; the opposition can't out-vote us; so we will go ahead and jolly well do what we like with this redistribution. We will put over such a gerrymander as will cut out of public life, if we can do so, some of the best men in the official opposition; and we will succeed in doing it and we will congratulate ourselves on having exercised our power.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Finance never said anything about a gerrymander as my hon. friend has stated.

Mr. Fleming: I did not say the Minister of Finance used the word "gerrymander". What I said was—

Mr. Martin: You do not know what you are saying.

Mr. Graydon: Yes, he does.

Mr. Lennard: A lot better than you do.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker, has not had anything to do so far in this debate, and it is just so hard for him to let a few pages of Hansard go by without the name of Mr. Martin on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mutch: You can understand his difficulty better than any of us. If it is true, you should know.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe that the house should now revert to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Fleming: I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare will profitably take to himself that well-merited rebuke.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. So that there will be no misunderstanding, the remark I made was directed to all hon. members. There is a rule that on third reading the only matters that can be discussed are those that are contained in the bill.

Mr. Graydon: We knew whom you meant.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I ask you if your remarks were not directed, as I am sure they were, to my hon. friend the loquacious member for Eglinton?

Mr. Speaker: My remarks were directed to no particular member.

Mr. Graydon: The minister is on the record at least.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: I will proceed to read what the Minister of Finance said in his later interjections when he tried strenuously to repair the damage done by his first and frank remark.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend takes himself too seriously—far too seriously.

Mr. Fleming: Well, Mr. Speaker, here we have another interjection in the face of what you have said, and I shall say this in view of the further interjection from the Minister of Finance.

The minister has said: Don't take yourself so seriously.

Mr. Abbott: Too seriously.

Mr. Fleming: Well, now we have it straight and we are this time in agreement as to what the minister has said.

I hope that I do not take myself unduly seriously—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: —but I do take seriously my responsibilities as a member of the house and I may say to my hon. and very good friend, the Minister of Finance, that in estimating the seriousness with which I should apply myself to my duties in the house I am not going to take him as my pattern.

Mr. Graydon: His estimates are always out.

Mr. Dickey: You could do a lot worse.

Mr. Fleming: I think this is a matter on which all members of parliament will need at some stage to take their responsibilities seriously; and when I say the Minister of Finance in his later interjections yesterday tried so desperately to repair the political damage done by his first and very frank statement, "The public do not care", I think you have an estimate of the extent and the nature of the blunder made by the Minister of Finance and his appreciation of it. It is like those budget blunders with which we are so familiar.

I then continue to quote from the record. After the hon. member for Ottawa West said, "No, he did not", the Hansard record shows that he did. I continue to quote:

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Finance said that the public does not care and members on this side of the house besides myself heard him say it right now.

Mr. Abbott: The public does not care about this discussion; it is only interested in the result.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Finance is trying to change it. The fact is that the minister said the public does not care and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs said that the public takes—words to this effect—very little interest in what goes on in the house.

Mr. Mutch: On a question of privilege, I said nothing of the sort. What I said was that the hon. member overestimated the attention the public paid to what he said.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Just compare that statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg South with what he actually said as reported in Hansard. This is his actual statement:

The hon. gentleman is overestimating public interest in what goes on here.

Mr. Mutch: And you were going on.

Mr. Fleming: It had nothing to do with me. We were discussing the whole question of redistribution, so the hon. member for Winnipeg South is in the company of the Minister of Finance in trying to retrieve his blunder. Then, the record proceeds:

Mr. Fleming: No, no.

Mr. Mutch: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fleming: That is not what the hon. member said. He said we overestimated the attention paid to what goes on in this house. He did not tie it down to me at all.

Mr. Mutch: You were doing the talking.

Mr. Fleming: He said we overestimated the interest of the public.

Mr. Mutch: Leave it to Hansard.

We shall leave it to Hansard, because Hansard records the remark as follows:

The hon. gentleman is overestimating public interest in what goes on here.

Mr. Mutch: And at the moment you were going on.

Mr. Fleming: Then, I continue to quote from the record:

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: In these two significant comments, you have what it seems to me is a very complete exposure of the attitude of the government in this matter. What could be more plain?

The Minister of Finance takes the attitude that the public does not care.

Mr. Abbott: No, Mr. Chairman. What I said was that members are more interested in their self-preservation than the public.

You will search Hansard through, and you will find no statement on the part of the Minister of Finance that members are more interested in their self-preservation than the public.

Mr. Abbott: You just read it.

Mr. Fleming: He attempts here to say that is what he said, but Hansard does not contain any such words. Hansard does record, however, these words of the Minister of Finance, "The public do not care".

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the final subject that I want—

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker? Who is this man Mr. Fleming who is referred to so often in the record?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, he is a native of the same county as the Minister of Agriculture, who voted yesterday here to approve of the political carpentry perpetrated on that county of Huron.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what we have—

Mr. Abbott: One went to Toronto and the other to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, and they both ended up here.

The final subject to which I wish to refer in these few brief remarks is the question of the time element. In what I had to say yesterday I urged that the public should be given an opportunity of understanding what is involved in the changes in the constituency boundaries proposed in the schedule to this bill. I said that could be accomplished in various ways. A conference had been proposed, but of course that constructive suggestion came to nought; it fell on deaf ears.

Then, there was another suggestion that this matter should be allowed to stand until a later stage. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, we are in the last hurried days of the session. This may be the last day of this session, and there is always a tendency at this stage of the session, natural perhaps, that matters should be rushed through. This is much too important a matter, not only for the present but for the future, to receive precipitate treatment.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: I venture to urge upon the house that nothing will be lost if the sovereign public is permitted to understand fully what is involved in this bill. That desirable purpose can be achieved if the government will permit the bill to stand. It would be very much better, of course, if in the meantime the government would refer this bill, indeed the whole question of redistribution generally, to a redistribution commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have intimated before that I intend to allow no discussion as to whether or not redistribution should be referred to a commission.

Mr. Fleming: I was not proposing to discuss the question of a commission. All I intended to say was that there is time to allow—I say no more than that—there is time between now and the reconvening of this house on November 20 to permit this matter to be reviewed by a commission. There is no argument on the basis of time against that being done. Even if the government does not see fit to use the services of such a body for that purpose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is continuing his argument, and I would ask him not to do so.

Mr. Fleming: —then, at least the government ought to allow this measure to stand until the house reassembles. What is going to be lost by doing that, by giving the public in all parts of the country an opportunity to know what will be the boundaries of the constituencies in which every member of the public will be casting his vote at the next general election? What harm can there be in it? The only reason that there could possibly be for denying that simple and obvious request for justice and fair play would be that the government realizes that this bill contains iniquitous provisions which will have the effect of gerrymandering, as we have said. They want to get this deed done as quickly as possible. You remember, Mr. Speaker, the words from Macbeth:

> If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well
> It were done quickly;

That, I think, is probably the mind of the government at the moment in trying to push this through. I asked my genial friend the Minister of Public Works last night just before adjournment, when he spoke of third reading of this bill:

> You are not going to let it stand until November 20?

The minister said, "I do not think we could do that."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): After listening to you, we have to go ahead now.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, that is simply the measure of perversity of the government mind.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member thinks I am perverse, he is quite wrong.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps I should withdraw the imputation that the government has a mind, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sinclair: Just say we are completely bored.

Mr. Fleming: Back of the haste in this matter is undoubtedly the hope of the government that the nefarious deed that they are proposing to perpetrate now will be forgotten between now and the next general election. If the view of the Minister of Finance is correct that the public does not care, it is easy enough for the government to conclude the public will forget. The longer you give the public to forget, so apparently runs government thinking, the less likely they are to recall such a nefarious and iniquitous thing as is being perpetrated in this bill. Mr. Speaker, there can be no argument whatever for pressing through right now in the last days of the session, when the house is under great pressure,—

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear; air pressure.

Mr. Fleming: —a measure of this kind which, of all kinds of measure, ought to have deliberate consideration in this house and throughout the country. The schedule to this bill reached this house in printed form only on Monday of this week, June 30, after indeed many members had gone home thinking that the session was practically ended. Surely this is no way for the House of Commons to discharge its supreme responsibility to the public. If the government will not accede to a simple and reasonable request that this bill be allowed to stand until the house reconvenes on November 20, then in the interests of justice and in deference to our duty to the public who are supreme, there is nothing that can be done now except to support the motion that this bill be given the six months' hoist.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, believing that the public are supreme, and lest they may be misled by some of the things they may read in Hansard of this morning, I thought I should put one or two facts on record. I can do so quickly.

An hon. Member: Hurry up!

Mr. McIlraith: The request is now being made by the official opposition to have me hurry up, their own members having taken none of the time this morning.

Mr. Martin: The old steamroller tactics.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to explain the question that has concerned the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), namely as to why government members voted against his stupid amendment of yesterday; and may I say that he is authority for the correct usage of the word "stupid". Otherwise, I would not have used it.

Mr. Fleming: On the contrary. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) is the source of the observation that it is quite parliamentary to refer to remarks as being stupid.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that it was the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who offered that observation in the house.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: In deference to the high opinion I have of him and his views, I adopted his suggestion.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I do not need to quote it to the hon. member, but a ruling on this question was given the other day and it was made clear that it was a proper adjective to use in reference to subject matter but not to persons. I was careful to use it in that way.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest that the word should be used as seldom as possible. Might I also express the hope that I will not hear it again.

Mr. McIlraith: Since the hon. member for Eglinton is a little bit sensitive on the subject I will ask permission to withdraw the word "stupid" as applied to his amendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. McIlraith: I will use no adjectives at all.

An hon. Member: You said it.

Mr. McIlraith: I shall merely let the facts speak for themselves. If I may, I should like to draw to the attention of the house the adjectives used by the hon. member for Eglinton. He spoke about the constituency of Hastings-Frontenac as a veritable empire, as a huge constituency, and he used many other adjectives.

Mr. Hodgson: Tell us about Renfrew South.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Victoria is a little bit agitated. May I say that it was interesting to note his agitation or lack of it when his own members were taking up so much time to say so little. The point I want to make is quite simple. As to the constituency of Hastings-Frontenac which was referred to as a veritable empire, I ought to tell the house that it is the tenth in size of all the constituencies in Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: We were talking about southern Ontario.

Mr. McIlraith: There are nine larger constituencies in Ontario; and those nine larger constituencies, with one exception, all have more population than has Hastings-Frontenac, and they are all represented in this House of Commons by Liberal members of parliament.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming: How does the proposed riding of Hastings-Frontenac rank in size with all the ridings in what we broadly call southern Ontario as the bill stands?

Mr. McIlraith: I will develop that point if the hon. member wants me to do so. I had hoped not to develop many of the members' questions or arguments. There are two constituencies about the same size, namely, Renfrew North, and Victoria represented by the hon. member who was interjecting earlier. Parry Sound is larger.

Mr. Fleming: Hastings-Frontenac is the largest.

Mr. McIlraith: I have statistics showing the precise number of square miles in all these cases if the hon. member wants that information.

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that it is the wish of the house that I should not go into those particulars. Hastings-Frontenac is the tenth in size. Eight of the nine constituencies that are larger in size have more population. All of the nine that are larger in size are represented by Liberal members.

Mr. Fleming: What about South Renfrew?

Mr. McIlraith: We proposed to put part of the constituency of Hastings in South Renfrew, and the opposition members opposed that proposal in committee.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will give the population of South Renfrew after the change has been made and compare it with the population in the riding of Hastings-Frontenac?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we are not in committee.

Mr. Fleming: Will he give comparisons with respect to the areas?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fleming: Is my question not going to be answered?

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the amendment will say "yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say "nay".

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Drew) which was negatived on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that when you leave the chair hon. members might wish to consider coming back at half past two instead of three o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: I would remind hon. members that the committee will resume its business at 2.30 p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

General—

420. Emergency shelter administration, $100,000.

The Chairman: We will first take up items 420 and 421, which are to be found at page 56 of the book of estimates, and also item 557 which is to be found at page 74. Hon. members will recall that these three items were referred earlier to the standing committee on banking and commerce and are now brought back before the committee of supply.

Mr. Fleming: I think it is a regret that many members of the house will share that the first debate in this present session on the subject of housing should be reached only on what may be the last day of the session. When the minister's estimates were called some weeks ago, in view of the fact that the banking and commerce committee was sitting under an order of the house reviewing the annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation it was agreed that these three items from the estimates should be added to the reference to the committee on banking and commerce. While that committee submitted its report to the house several weeks ago, this is the first time that the estimates of the minister have been called again.

I submit that a subject as important as housing is for all sections of this country is entitled to more time and attention in the house than has been given to it at the present session. At the same time I wish to commend the reference this year of the annual report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the banking and commerce committee. I believe this is the first time since Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was established that any report from that important organization has been referred to a committee of the house for study and review. Indeed, I believe this is the first occasion in the lifetime of the last two parliaments when any committee of the house has studied housing in any of its aspects.

In my view the banking and commerce committee conducted a very thorough review of the matters referred to it within the scope of the reference to the committee. The committee held many meetings, had extended discussions and an abundance of evidence from Mr. David Mansur, the very able president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I am satisfied that within its terms of reference the committee has done a very thorough piece of work. I had occasion more than once to urge that the committee should have broader terms of reference. The reference under the order of the house confined the committee to the annual report of the corporation, and it was the ruling of the chairman, and I believe the view of the majority of the members of the committee, that the committee was precluded from hearing other organizations interested in the subject of housing. The result was that we had no other witnesses before the committee than Mr. Mansur and on one occasion the minister himself.

The only other submissions that reached the committee were letters received from three organizations which have a very important stake in housing, namely, the National Housebuilders Association Incorporated, which wrote a letter dated June 4 to the chairman of the committee, the Canadian Construction Association, which wrote a short letter dated June 4 to the chairman of the committee, and the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association which wrote a letter dated June 11 to the chairman of the committee. There were some interesting matters mentioned in those letters but I am afraid no one can say that any extended consideration could be given to them under the circumstances, particularly when representatives from those important organizations were not called before the committee.

I do not say that these three organizations are the only ones which could have had interesting and valuable views to submit to the committee. Indeed, there are many organizations which, both from the point of view of the practical problems of construction and also from the point of view of the place of housing in any public policy, would have had much to contribute in assisting the committee. However, so far as the report of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is concerned it undoubtedly had a thorough review at the hands of the committee.

Opinions are divided, as we found in taking the evidence of Mr. Mansur, as to the extent of the housing problem in Canada today. The dominion bureau of statistics in its daily bulletin of June 4, in summarizing some interesting findings with reference to housing data from the 1951 census, opens its summary with this sentence:

> In June last year Canada's ten provinces had a total of 3,587,364 dwellings, of which 3,423,010 were occupied and the balance either under construction or unoccupied for various reasons . . .

Then follows in summarized form a review of the statistics province by province garnered in the course of the census. I think it is not unfair to say that there was some reluctance on the part of Mr. Mansur to put any exact figure on the shortage of housing in Canada today. He did take issue quite firmly with the estimate put on that shortage in 1944 in the report of the Curtis royal commission on housing. We were left at the conclusion of the hearings without any very definite estimate. Indeed, there are factors in the situation as portrayed by Mr. Mansur which from his point of view make it very difficult to put an estimate on the shortage of housing in Canada today.

However, Mr. Mansur did submit to the committee some interesting figures in regard to the development of housing needs in the years commencing with 1946, and the construction of houses to meet that need. In the year 1946 he estimated the net family formations at 107,500 and the number of new housing units at 67,194. In other words, he estimated in the year 1946 that we fell behind to the extent of 40,306 units. He estimated that in the year 1947 the net family formations in Canada were 75,400 and new housing units completed were 79,231. In other words, he estimated in the year 1947 that we did construct 3,831 houses in excess of the net family formations in that year. He estimated that in the year 1948 net family formations were at 83,000 and new housing units completed were 81,243, or a deficit of 1,757. For the year 1949 he estimated net family formations at 77,100 and new housing units completed were 91,655, or a surplus in that year over net family formations of 14,555 units. For the year 1950 he estimated net family formations at 73,500 and new housing units completed were 91,754 or a surplus of 18,254. In 1951 net family formations were 96,500, a very substantial increase, the largest in the country's history, I believe, with the exception of 1946. New housing units completed in 1951 were 84,810 or a deficit in the year 1951 of 11,690 units.

For the six-year period the totals estimated by Mr. Mansur are these: Net family formations, 513,000; new housing units completed 495,887 or a deficit in the six-year period of 17,113 units.

I pause to observe there, Mr. Chairman, that in this six-year period when unquestionably housing construction rose to the highest rate in the country's history we still fell behind the net family formations in Canada to the extent of 17,113 units according to this estimate. I stress, Mr. Chairman, that this is only an estimate but it can be taken I think as probably the closest estimate that is available in Canada for this period.

Now, sir, this means that over this six-year period we have not quite met the needs arising out of current family formations in Canada. From that one may deduce the fact that our housing position or the housing deficit in Canada at December 31, 1951, was slightly more than it was at December 31, 1945. We have not been given any firm figure, as I have indicated, of the housing deficit in Canada at December 31, 1945. When I raised the matter in committee and asked about the report on housing in Canada by the Curtis royal commission in 1944, Mr. Mansur disagreed with it and said that he was not prepared to accept the estimate put on the deficit by the Curtis royal commission. However, there is nothing in these figures and other available figures, Mr. Chairman, to indicate that housing is not still a very serious problem in Canada and the deficit in housing is substantial.

In saying that, I am taking account of the points raised by Mr. Mansur when he said that in his view, owing to certain conditions about which I shall say more shortly, other factors have entered into the effective demand for housing. To other economic factors he attributes the slackening of effective demand in certain quarters for housing—that is to say on the part of people who need and want housing but who under present conditions by reason of factors of cost and municipal taxes are not able to pay what is required to provide themselves with housing.

The next point I wish to dwell on for a moment is the extent of the financial stake which the country has already acquired in housing. Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that our housing legislation goes back to the year 1935 when the first Dominion Housing Act was enacted. You will remember that in the year 1936 that act, brought in by the Bennett government, was repealed and was replaced by a substitute act, and in 1944 parliament enacted the present act, the National Housing Act. Under the National Housing Act financial provision has been made by parliament in various respects to assist construction of housing in Canada. I am not going to weary the committee unduly with certain of these figures, but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that some reference should be made to them because they are impressive in relation to the financial stake which the country already has in housing. When I say "the country" I mean the federal government.

Just to choose a few figures on the five types of financial assistance provided by the National Housing Act I will give the following. Under section 7, on account of home-owner loans, the total appropriation by parliament to date aggregates $300 million against which commitments exceed $232 million. Under section 12, slum clearance, parliament has appropriated $20 million against which only $1,150,000 has yet been committed. Under section 13 on account of loans for rental housing, parliament has appropriated $150 million against which approximately $99 million has been committed. Under section 16, parliament has appropriated for experimental plumbing and heating equipment, $5 million against which nothing has been committed. Under section 27A parliament has appropriated $5 million for housing research and community planning, against which $1,700,000 in round figures has to date been committed. In total, Mr. Chairman, against an aggregate parliamentary appropriation of $480 million, the commitments to date total in round figures $333 million.

There has been within the past year and a half a startling decline in construction. It is evidenced not only in the completions but it is very strongly evidenced in starts. We of the official opposition levelled strong criticism against the government for the abandonment without any authority from parliament early in February 1951 of the provision made by parliament at the fall session of 1949 for the equivalent of second mortgage loans in addition to the loans provided under part I of the National Housing Act—what was commonly called the additional one-sixth loans. We have said that it is no mere coincidence that the evidence of decline in housing starts which occurred then coincided with this declaration of a new policy on the part of the government.

Now, there are many figures available, Mr. Chairman, exceedingly valuable in the information they contain, but I must pass on as swiftly as I can. I mention in passing that that situation continued into the spring of 1951 when housing starts compared with the year 1950 particularly showed a decline; and I will give you just the total percentage figures, Mr. Chairman, without worrying about the decimal figures: April 4 per cent; May 19 per cent; June 26 per cent; July 41 per cent; August 37 per cent; September 51 per cent; October 51 per cent; November 46 per cent; December 54 per cent. You see how startling are those figures of the reduction in the number of housing starts in the last months of 1951 as compared with the corresponding months of 1950.

Now, that decline continued into the year 1952. I am going to give you a comparison with 1951, but a comparison with the figures for 1950 would show a very much greater decline percentagewise. January 1952 showed a decline of 42 per cent in housing starts as compared with January 1951. February declined 29 per cent. Then, in March what might appear at first blush to be a reversal of the trend appeared and housing starts increased 4·6 per cent as compared with March, 1951. April, 1952, increased 2 per cent as compared with April, 1951. However, Mr. Mansur cautioned us against attaching too much importance as yet to what appeared to be a slight reversal of the trend in March and April, because he said there were certain additional factors which would account for at least a substantial portion of the increase.

Since the committee has risen, one learns with regret, from the daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics of June 27, that the May figures for starts show a sharp decline as compared with the month of May, 1951. The first paragraph of the report in the bulletin reads:

> Starts on the construction of new dwelling units showed a further sharp reduction in May as compared with the corresponding month last year, while completions were down only slightly. Starts totalled 7,121 units as compared with 11,699 a year earlier, and the completions numbered 5,325 units, compared with 5,688.

Then it proceeds:

> During the first five months of this year starts fell in number to 14,395 from 17,252 in the corresponding period of 1951, and completions declined to 18,391 units from 25,209. The number in various stages of construction at the end of May was down to 38,814 units from 51,090 a year earlier.
> There were declines in starts in all regions in May as compared with the corresponding month last year.

In my submission, Mr. Chairman, that is a report that may well cause concern, if not indeed alarm; that is a very startling rate of decline. I remind you, sir, that this decline is compared with the corresponding period in 1951 when a heavy decline had already set in as compared with the year 1950. If we compared these 1952 figures with the year 1950, we would see a most startling reduction, not only in starts but in the completion of houses in Canada. While we have no final figures today of the estimated shortage of housing, nevertheless it seems to me there is sufficient in these figures showing the decline in housing construction to emphasize beyond question that housing is still a very serious problem in Canada.

There is no longer a shortage of building materials. It is agreeable indeed, Mr. Chairman, to be assured by Mr. Mansur that there is today a plentiful supply of building materials of all kinds.

Housing costs are still a very difficult factor to contend with. It is estimated by Mr. Mansur that housing costs in 1952 are, and will continue to be, 5 per cent higher than in 1951.

In reference to something I just mentioned in passing a little earlier, I wish to say that we of the official opposition still contend, and the figures to which I have just referred abundantly corroborate and support our position, that the government acted unwisely and certainly without any parliamentary authority in February of 1951 in abandoning the provision made by parliament by way of the one-sixth additional loan. You can see the results, Mr. Chairman, in the figures I have given. In fairness, I wish to make it clear that I do not say that one factor alone accounted for the decline in construction that has occurred since. I do not do that at all. Nevertheless, it is a substantial factor. Mr. Mansur himself was prepared to agree it was a factor, although not prepared to commit himself as to the extent to which it, as a factor, is reflected in the figures to which I have made reference.

There are many builders in this country who would tell you, and they are people who are close to this problem, that the elimination without warning of that one-sixth additional loan provided under section 4 of the housing act did deal a very serious blow to all housing construction in the spring of 1951. The minister says we were faced, as the government thought, with a shortage of materials, and they were taking this step with a view to conserving materials as well as to holding back house construction at a time when the government thought it might have inflationary effects. The best that can be said for the government's calculation on that occasion is that it was a miscalculation. Houses that would have been built in 1951 were not built because the government, without any authority from parliament, chose to make a dead letter of the section of this act which parliament enacted seriously and hopefully in the fall session of 1949. It is admitted, indeed it could not be denied, that houses that are being built in 1952 which might have been built in 1951 are costing more today because of that postponement for a year.

The government did come along some time later, after they had realized the error they had made in February 1951, and they did make provision for increasing the percentage of loans under part I of the housing act to 80 per cent. They went a little further than that in the case of housing units for defence construction workers. There were conditions attached to the provisions for defence construction workers which, I think it is fair to say, substantially neutralized or at least subtracted from the help that might have been expected from the changes that were made late in 1951.

I must pass quickly to a subject which is becoming of increasing importance and increasing difficulty in connection with housing. It is the problem of municipal taxation. The areas of the most acute housing shortage today are in the larger municipalities where serviced land is becoming increasingly scarce, and in the suburbs of great metropolitan areas like Toronto the shortage of serviced land is exceedingly acute. It has become so acute that municipal governments in suburban municipalities have become so alarmed at the rising cost of municipal government—particularly the cost of servicing land for housing—that, in many cases, they are requiring the builder himself to provide the servicing of the land, at his own cost and entire present outlay before they will even grant him a building permit. That fact has created a serious situation.

Educational facilities become increasingly costly. Mr. Mansur has given what he regards as a conservative average estimate that it costs $25,000 to provide each new room in new schools in these areas where housing is being rapidly expanded and where the demand for housing is most acute today. The results are being felt more and more keenly every day as more municipalities, instead of welcoming and assisting housing, are in self-preservation putting these difficulties in the way of builders by insisting that the builders provide the services for the land; and those services, Mr. Chairman, as you well know, are becoming more costly every day. Therefore the housing problem in Canada cannot be grappled with effectively apart from some realistic approach to the problem of an inadequate municipal tax base. More provision must be made for municipal revenue if municipalities are to be expected to carry the responsibility and the load of providing municipal services, social services and educational services which the law requires them to provide today. If we want to help the housing problem in Canada, we cannot have a better slogan than this: Help the municipal governments!

Just in conclusion may I mention the subject of development schemes under section 35. This is a matter of great concern particularly in the larger urban areas where we have a great shortage of housing today and where there are many people who are unable to pay an economic rent. I should say that while section 35 had general support in the house, and was welcomed in all parts of the house, when enacted in the fall of 1949, perhaps the inherent difficulty in connection with the section is that it requires joint action at three levels of government, namely, federal, provincial and municipal. On that account, Mr. Chairman, almost inevitably the use of section 35 has been slow.

There are now evidences that different provinces are interesting themselves and that they are prepared, in partnership with the federal government, to put section 35 actively to work. In my own province of Ontario the government has shown a lively interest in this subject and has recently made an announcement of government policy. Whereas previously the standard proportion of distribution of costs among the federal, provincial and municipal governments was 75 per cent federal, 17½ per cent provincial and 7½ per cent municipal, it has been announced that the municipal government will assume the municipal share and bear the full 25 per cent where housing provided under these development schemes is used to accommodate persons who cannot pay an economic rent. Where that accommodation is made available to persons who are well able to pay an economic rent the provincial government has said—and I think rightly so—that the municipality should be expected to bear its 7½ per cent share. Mr. Chairman, one may look hopefully to the future for more active use being made of the provisions of section 35.

When this section 35 was introduced in the house in the fall session of 1949, some of us had some difficulty because, in the light of a statement then made by the Minister of Resources and Development, we felt that it was apparently not the intention of the government to put it to use in connection with redevelopment schemes; that is to say, not schemes where virgin land is taken for construction and housing schemes but cases where an existing built-up area—presumably one where slum conditions prevail or where substandard housing exists—should be acquired, cleared and then made available for the construction of new housing.

In its inquiry the committee encountered that problem and has made recommendations which the minister assured us have his support; they are to be found in the report. I do not delay now to read them. However, I express the hope that at the earliest opportunity in the next session the government will introduce to the National Housing Act amendments to give effect to those useful recommendations.

One must express regret that the situation was miscalculated by the government a year ago last February when the one-sixth additional loan was withdrawn, and that it was further miscalculated at about the same time when some important and much-needed government housing projects were stopped. I am thinking particularly of the veterans housing project at the Fraserview site in Vancouver. On that site it had been planned that 1,100 houses for veterans should be constructed but construction was stopped early in 1951. Six hundred houses were then completed and the other 500 were not proceeded with. At the end of the year, after ten valuable months had been lost, construction was resumed. The result has been not only the loss of ten valuable months but an increase in the cost of the same 500 houses which would have been carried to completion if the government had not intervened and stopped the work. The additional cost is $400,000. It seems to me that that is a heavy price to pay for a government error and miscalculation.

This problem is still one of serious proportions. While we have had a useful and comprehensive review in the committee, I think we can all again express our concern that there is today a serious shortage of housing in Canada and that there are evident conditions today which make it apparent that the need is not likely to be met unless help is given to the municipalities and a new drive is put behind our housing effort in Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I shall say only a few words because the hon. member for Eglinton has covered the matter thoroughly, it seems to me, and has brought to the attention of the committee some weaknesses that have come to light in connection with our housing plans. He put on the record figures which indicated that we had fallen behind in providing homes for family units already formed or in the process of being formed. There is also, of course, the other matter which makes this an important consideration, namely that houses become obsolete as time passes, and housing becomes poor in various areas of our cities and, indeed, in our rural communities. In the figures which he presented to us, and which were given officially before the committee, no consideration was given to obsolescence and to the necessity for slum clearance and the replacement of homes both in the cities and, may I add, in many of our rural areas. I say that because while we find bad housing conditions in our towns and cities, we often find very deplorable housing conditions in the rural areas of this country. I agree with the hon. member when he says it is becoming difficult for municipalities to provide the services that are necessary. I have in mind schools, as well as sanitary arrangements including the sewers, water supply and the like.

I know that even in some of the newer subdivisions in this city of Ottawa, while the city is providing water, no provision has been made for sewage disposal, with the result that the costs of individual home builders are greatly enhanced because septic tanks have to be installed—equipment which I would hope in a few years would no longer be necessary. There will be therefore a dead loss both to the persons who instal the septic tanks and to the economy in general.

Having said that, I wish to add this, that one of the deficiencies in connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and its operations, is the lack of adequate inspection of houses under construction. I know that that is the obligation of the lending institutions, but the lending institutions are providing very inadequate inspection.

Last year I had the opportunity of watching a home in this city in process of construction. Had the young couple who were to inhabit that home not watched the house every day, the results would have been disastrous. Some of the young people in that neighbourhood did not watch the building of their houses, with the result that there was a good deal of scamping and poor workmanship, and specified materials were not included in those homes for which they were paying, I think, excessive prices.

When young people have to pay $17,000 or $18,000 for a home that could have been built 25 years ago for $8,000, or $9,000—

Mr. Fraser: No, $6,000.

Mr. Coldwell: —they are entitled to expect at least that the specifications will be carried out. Let me say from personal observation that specifications are not always carried out. In one case I have in mind the people who entered into a contract to buy the house, and who had made the down payment, found it difficult even to find on the job the plans from which the contractor was working. It was only after insisting, day after day, that the plans be produced, and that certain things specified in the plans be done, that they had any success. As a matter of fact things were done that were not in the plans and, as a result, had to be undone, upon the insistence of those who were paying for the home. Drainage was bad and grading of the lots delayed unduly and so on.

I say when parliament is providing a plan of this description every effort should be made to see that proper inspections are made.

Young people cannot go to the additional expense of hiring architects to look after the building of these expensive homes. I use the term "expensive" in the relative sense, of course. They cannot do that; and the result is that in some instances contractors are getting away with nothing short of murder. I know that in the neighbourhood I have in mind at the moment those young people who did not watch the building of their homes had all sorts of trouble with the construction and the workmanship and failure to fulfil the contracts as they were intended to be fulfilled. I say all these contractors should be carefully supervised. I would even go to the extent of saying that some of them should not be permitted to take contracts at all for the building of homes, because certainly they have been victimizing large numbers of young couples who have found it necessary to secure homes under very difficult conditions.

That situation exists right in this city, and in other cities as well, as I happen to know. I say the time has come when the department should take a hand in the matter of inspection and supervision. Where a contractor has a poor record, as some of them have, the lending institutions should be told that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not stand behind contracts made by contractors of that kind.

Passing across Canada I have been told that this sort of thing has been happening in other places as well. I have been speaking from personal knowledge and personal observations of about a year ago when I have referred to what has taken place in Ottawa. I do not want to name any contractor, or put any name on the record of Hansard; but on more than one occasion last autumn I was tempted to do so while I watched the building of these homes, and saw what was being done.

I rise simply to emphasize that fact. I know hon. members do not wish to listen to a long speech at this time, nor do I wish to repeat everything that has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton. He said it well, and made a good summary of the evidence placed before the committee. I am not going to indulge in reiteration. But I did wish to drive home that one point, that we must have better supervision and inspection.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to support the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in what he has said about inspection, because I have had more than a dozen complaints in this connection brought to my attention. I believe that in respect of all these loans Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should have an inspector on the job, and he should be there not just once a month or once every two weeks, but often enough to check on all the details and to see that all the specifications are carried out. Because, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, in many cases these young people have not the opportunity or the knowledge to check on the specifications and blueprints.

I know of cases where grading called for in the specifications was not done. These young persons, after they move into their homes, try to have this done. Perhaps after two or three years they have to let it drop because the lending companies and the trades will not do it. Then, in many cases the plumbing in these homes is not done according to municipal specifications. These are things inspectors from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could check.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, while the committee was considering the excellent report of Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation I gained the impression that altogether too much stress is being placed upon making the loans safe for the lending companies, and altogether too little on the importance of providing homes for people at prices they can afford.

The farther we go in this era of high living costs, the more I become alarmed when I contemplate what is going to happen to this country if something is not done to remedy the housing situation. People who have to rent houses in ordinary communities are faced with costs utterly beyond their ability to pay out of the incomes they are able to obtain. People who attempt to build are confronted with costs which mean in the last analysis, for I would imagine 75 or 80 per cent of them, that after struggling for a number of years to try to pay for their homes they finally have to give them up. This means that in the result the lending institution, which in the last analysis is the state, appropriates the home.

That condition is quite unsound. I do not propose to multiply words at this time, but I would remind the minister and the government that it is physically possible in Canada to render available to every Canadian a home at a price he can afford to pay. If it is not financially possible then it is high time that something was done about the financial set-up of this country. It is not financially possible today for the vast majority of Canadians to acquire a home. I think I shall leave it there.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can let these items pass without a few comments upon the subject of housing in which the minister knows I am keenly interested. The hon. member for Eglinton has placed on the record statistics which show a deficit of 17,113 units in a specified time. I should like to make some comments with regard to the conditions which undoubtedly were not considered at the time those statistics were compiled. I refer to the units which are razed for various purposes, some because they are obsolete and others because they must be removed in order to provide for industrial growth. This is a problem which confronts industrial cities like Hamilton.

Of course, industry must grow, and in the main it must grow in the district where it is established. If in order to promote the growth of industry and to provide jobs for more workmen it is necessary to remove residential structures, then of course one cannot stand in the way of progress. But these only add to the figures which have been placed on the record by the hon. member for Eglinton.

I do not think there is any argument that one of the most stabilizing factors in our national economy is home ownership by the individual. That is a statement which has been made time and time again by responsible authorities, and I am sure we are all in complete agreement with it. If under our economy we prevent the ordinary workman from purchasing a home, then we work against not only the economy of our nation but the morale of our workers upon whom we must depend for our growth.

In that regard I think the statement made by the hon. member for Eglinton, but which was not elaborated, bears some examination. The hon. member made reference to municipal taxation. A great part of the heavy cost of new homes is due to the cost of servicing land which is carved out of areas formerly suburban or rural in character. When either by annexation or by agreement with adjoining municipalities a particular municipality seeks to make serviced land out of what has been unserviced land it immediately runs into extremely heavy costs. In this connection I can think of no better example than a project under way on the mountain in Hamilton where a trunk sewer costing several million dollars is being installed, a large proportion of the cost being borne by the taxpayers of Hamilton in order to provide services for land which within the past few years has been annexed to the city, some of it this year. This particular land could not be serviced in any form until the trunk sewer was put through.

In addition to the servicing cost which finds its way into the taxes paid by the home owner who benefits, a proportion of this cost must also be borne by the whole municipality. The result is that there is placed upon the real estate of the city the burden of paying part of the cost of providing services to new areas which are annexed to rapidly growing municipalities.

Until that situation can be rectified there is little hope of solving the housing situation in Canada. To me this constitutes the greatest deterrent to home ownership in this country

This problem can be solved only by following the suggestions which have been made repeatedly in this house by various members of the opposition that a dominion-provincial conference be called to discuss the general reallocation of tax revenues and to provide for returning to the municipalities at least some of the tax revenues which are charged directly against them.

In my opinion it is not equitable that a municipality should have to pay a tax upon the gasoline used in its vehicles operating within its own boundaries or that it should have to pay a sales tax on equipment and other things which it purchases for its own use and then in return receive nothing whatever from the federal government in the way of taxes on the premises or real estate within that municipality occupied by the government. It just does not add up.

A conference of the type I have mentioned could go into all these matters. I understand that some of these were discussed this week by Mr. D. C. Corbett at the meeting of the Canadian federation of municipalities which is being held in the west. All these factors contribute to the situation which prevents the ordinary workingman or wage earner from providing his family with a home.

In cities like Hamilton and many other places in which there has been a great influx of population within the last ten years you find families living in one or two rooms, in shared accommodation, under conditions which are a disgrace to people who want to raise their children to observe the religious and moral laws which have been handed down in this country from generation to generation. The conditions under which many of these people live practically prohibit the bringing up of children who will be healthy in mind as well as in body.

I strongly urge the minister to lend his support in convincing the cabinet to call a dominion-provincial conference which will deal with these aspects of this important problem so that people in our municipalities may be able once more to build their own homes and provide roofs over the heads of their children.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister wants to catch a plane at four o'clock and I am not going to start a debate at this time on the question of housing. I think the hon. member for Eglinton did a good job this afternoon in putting on the record the information on this subject which he had gathered in the banking and commerce committee. I think that information will provide a good basis for a real discussion of this matter at the next session. I never had any illusions about the National Housing Act providing homes for the average salary and wage earner in this country because the economic unit fixed by the act when it was enacted ruled out anyone earning less than $8,000 or $9,000 a year. I never had any illusions about that, and I am very glad it is beginning to get through to others in the house that the Sun Life Assurance Company and other institutions of that kind are not going to provide housing for the average income recipient in this country.

I want to say to the minister that there is one problem about which I wrote to him and spoke to him, and I am wondering if any thought has been given to it in the interim. I refer to the problem of those who built homes between 1947 and 1950. They applied for loans covering their homes based on the prevailing prices of lumber and materials at the time, but between the time of securing the loan and completing the building the inflation in the price of building materials shoved up the price of the housing unit by some $2,000 to $2,500. I am thinking of the type of case I brought to the attention of the minister, that of people with an income of about $50 a week who figured out their budget and could make their mortgage payments on the basis of the amount of the original loan. However, in completing their home they found that because of inflated prices they were in debt for a couple of thousand dollars to a lumber dealer. In the cases of which I have knowledge the lumber dealers are pressing for the payment of the additional money.

The people affected thought they could secure a supplementary loan to make up the difference through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the insurance companies, but as indicated by the hon. member for Eglinton that policy has been changed. These people are told to go to some other financial institution and take a second mortgage but that is impossible to that income group because it means adding about $50 a month to their mortgage cost and they are not able to handle it. There is a problem there. There may not be so many involved, but there are extenuating circumstances in the case of people in the lower income groups who tried to build homes. I should like to know whether the minister has got in touch with the insurance companies. These people are not averse to having an additional $2,000 added to the mortgage they already have with an insurance company but they do not want to have to go elsewhere and have to finance under new rates and all that kind of thing. Has the minister given that matter sympathetic consideration, and can that type of case expect some relief within a reasonable time?

Mr. Hosking: The problem of housing is one which I am sure gives the minister a great deal of concern. I do not believe there is any greater handicap so far as the development of the country is concerned than the situation which has arisen in municipalities on account of high taxes and the shortage of housing. It is a well known fact that the most efficient form of government we have is that of the local municipality. I feel the minister should give every consideration to the municipalities in order to see that they do not lose their autonomy. Great care should be taken to see that any form of help which may be devised by a dominion-provincial conference should not be in the form of grants donated to the municipalities. It is a very bad thing for municipalities to lose control of their sources of revenue. If we are going to have efficient government at the lower levels the municipalities must be responsible for their sources of revenue and should not be assisted by way of grants. They should be assisted by giving them a direct source of taxation. That must be given to them at some time in the near future as the result of a conference between the provinces and the dominion.

When the question of housing is being discussed between the provinces and the dominion I ask the minister to use his influence to see that this topic is thoroughly discussed and that some satisfactory arrangement is made whereby municipalities will not be under the thumb of the municipal boards of the provincial governments. If the city and county councils are under the thumb of the government which makes the grant, they have to spend the money granted and the money raised by their own taxes as they are directed by that government. I think all members will agree that this is not a form of taxation that was envisaged when the British North America Act was first devised. This practice is a derivation of one malpractice after another as a result of which the municipalities, on which this country is absolutely dependent, are under the thumb of the municipal board which is not responsible to the city or county. When the minister is dealing with the problem of housing, in which the municipalities and the provincial governments are so much involved, I would ask him to point out this matter to the provincial governments so that with the help of the dominion government there may be some readjustment made so far as remedying this abuse which has developed over the years.

Mr. Fulford: There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I refer to the almost insurmountable obstacle facing the smaller municipalities with respect to new housing development. I have special reference to my own town of Brockville. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation contemplated a development there for which they have the property. If they had proceeded with their plans it would have meant that about $700,000 would have been spent. Unfortunately the section of land involved is in the township and will have to be included within the town limits. That means the installation of public services such as sewers, water mains and hydro lines. The town authorities secured an engineer's report on the cost of installing these facilities, and it was found that they would cost more than the development contemplated by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I appeal to the minister to devise some method whereby municipalities can be assisted when they find it necessary to expand beyond their own boundaries in order to proceed with housing development. In the particular case about which I am speaking I know that the Brockville town council had no other alternative than to turn down the offer of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We are so desperately in need of houses there that I just do not know what the immediate future holds for the town. We have to have the houses, services must be supplied, and at the present time the municipality just cannot afford it.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, when the government abolished the one-sixth mortgage loan on February 5 of last year, the Minister of Resources and Development advised the house that the government was taking this step in order to conserve building materials which were needed for the defence program.

The situation today was described by Mr. Mansur, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, when he spoke before the banking and commerce committee on May 6 last, and I should like to quote his words as recorded at page 29 of the proceedings of the committee. He said:

> Early in 1951 there were some limitations upon new residential starts because of shortages of certain types of building materials. This difficulty no longer exists, and I do not believe that, except in very isolated instances, will the lack of building materials play any part in limiting the amount of new residential construction in 1952.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the reasons which the minister cited to justify the removal of the one-sixth mortgage loans have now disappeared. And yet the government refuses to restore this measure, which so greatly assists those who wish to buy a new house.

Now, because of the abolition of the one-sixth mortgage loan, it is generally agreed today that a man must earn at least $5,000 a year, for at least four years, in order to set aside the $2,000 or more which is now required as a down payment on a new house. That means that people with incomes of less than $5,000 a year are virtually excluded from buying a new house. This, I believe, defeats the purpose of any good housing legislation, which is to encourage people with low incomes to own their own homes.

I believe that good housing is an essential to sound and happy family life. In this regard, I would like to refer to the opinion expressed by the secretary of the Canadian Welfare Council's family welfare division, when speaking at a meeting of the Canadian Welfare Council in Ottawa on May 14 last. On that occasion she said:

> A lack of housing has become Canada's most acute social problem affecting family life. More cases of family quarrelling, desertions and juvenile delinquency have been traced to the housing scarcity than to any other cause. My estimate is based on field reports by Canadian welfare agencies. The housing problem already has been brought to the attention of the federal government, but so far, little has been done about it.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that we must do everything possible to encourage people to buy their own homes, because it is one of the best investments that we can possibly make in good citizenship. Unfortunately, however, the government's present housing regulations make it virtually impossible for a man with an income of less than $5,000 a year to buy a new house.

The maximum down payment which a workingman can lay aside, over a reasonable period, is about $1,000. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the government must take steps to see that a good minimum house can be obtained by making a down payment of $1,000. This investment in better housing for working people will, I believe, pay off many times over in the years ahead in healthier, happier and better citizens.

Now, another kind of housing which I believe is of prime importance to a great many people is good rental housing at a reasonable rent. The answer to that problem, I believe, is the low-rental housing project, in which the three levels of government participate.

My own city of Toronto has an excellent example of that kind of housing, in the Regent Park project. I believe that Toronto needs at least four more of these projects, and I hope, now that the province of Ontario has taken over the 7½ per cent of the cost formerly borne by the municipalities, that Toronto and many other centres will undertake projects of this kind on a large scale.

I hope that the city of Toronto will very soon be presenting plans to the Ontario government for several of these housing projects. I also hope that other provinces will follow the example of Ontario, in assuming the full 25 per cent of the cost formerly shared by the province and the municipality.

This relieving of the municipalities of their share of the cost should, I believe, make it easy for many centres to undertake these low-rental housing projects. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that they are the only answer to the housing problems of a very large number of Canadians.

The Chairman: Shall the items carry?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Before they do carry, Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say a word of appreciation to those who have taken part in the debate which I think has been of a high order and very constructive.

I agree with the hon. member for Eglinton in particular as to the value of the committee, and rather than reply in detail here today I would refer hon. members, and anyone else who wants to read a full and comprehensive report of the various aspects of the housing problem, to the proceedings of the committee wherein matters of detail and certain aspects of policy are dealt with. Answers were given to various questions which arose.

It is all very well to say that the level of loans should be increased and that the amount of the down payments should be decreased. However, the majority of houses are not built under the terms of the National Housing Act, and I can only speak for those that are built under its provisions.

I can say that we have had difficulty in persuading the lending institutions to go along as far as they have in making loans available and in reducing down payments. They feel that there is a limit beyond which the intrinsic value is just not there. I say in that same connection, having in mind the abolition of the one-sixth loan, this action was taken for reasons which were mentioned —that is shortage of materials and the fear that a great many houses would be started and not completed; and also we had in mind the great defence effort which was the first claim against materials and other resources. Subsequently a step was taken which had the effect of restoring the one-sixth, and that was to make available loans in the amount of 80 per cent of the agreed sale price.

Perhaps it might be appropriate if I were to quote an example.

Prior to February 6, 1951, under the additional loan technique a one and a half storey five-room house, selling for $10,000, would receive a loan of $8,166, calling for an equity or cash payment of $1,834. The same house financed under the present provisions would sell for $10,500. The loan would amount to $8,400 and the cash equity would be $2,100. Upon this comparison and similar ones that might be made I base the statement that we have substantially restored the provisions. You will note that while the agreed sale price has increased by $500 by reason of an overall increase in construction costs, the down payment required has gone up by an amount of $266 only, and the amount of the loan has increased by $234.

I do admit, of course, that under the statute as it reads today it is possible to make the one-sixth loan in addition to the higher 80 per cent loan. The clause is entirely permissive. There would, however, be reluctance on the part of the lending institutions to participate in higher loans if they had added to them an additional one-sixth. Moreover, loans of 80 per cent at present levels of costs are a sufficient burden for the ordinary home owner to carry without adding to that burden by an increase in the loan. This is particularly true in view of the very high level of municipal taxation prevailing today.

In specific reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I may say that we have given that matter most sympathetic consideration. We have talked to the lending institutions but, for the reasons I have mentioned, and owing to their views about intrinsic mortgage values, we have not yet been able to reach an agreement with them that a higher level of loans should have been made in the particular instance which the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Coldwell: What about the inspections?

Mr. Winters: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asks about the inspections. Responsibility for adequate inspection, under the terms of the National Housing Act, rests with the lending institution. The basic arrangement is between the builder as vendor on the one hand and the ultimate owner as purchaser on the other. The lending institution makes the inspections necessary to ensure that the mortgage money is being used to advantage.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say they do not make the inspections.

Mr. Winters: We have had the criticism that they do not make the inspections and I am inclined to agree that the criticism is valid in many instances. We have been speaking to the lending institutions and endeavouring to persuade them to improve their inspections. We have done what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested we should do, that is, under certain circumstances, we refuse to make loans to particular builders who are known to have bad records in building houses. We have that problem under consideration, and we are trying to work it out.

Mrs. Fairclough: In regard to the minister's statement that loans become inactive, let us say where there is a difference of more than 5 per cent between the builder's estimate and that of Central Mortgage and Housing or more than 3 per cent between that of the lending institution and Central Mortgage, I want to say there are a great many cases where the prospective home owner is faced with the necessity, if he is going to own a home, of taking on the difference himself in order to come within that provision.

Mr. Winters: Yes, there has to be an agreed sales price.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is a great deal of that.

Items agreed to.

The Chairman: We shall now take up items 255 and 256, the national film board. I might say that these items have been thoroughly studied by a committee.

National film board—

255. Administration, production and distribution of films and other visual materials, $2,804,131.

256. Acquisition of new equipment, $115,820.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to say a word in regard to this subject. I said before, and I say again, that I think it was a step in the right direction to set up a committee of the house to study the national film board's estimates. The report of that committee has been tabled, and I believe it is fair. It has been cut down considerably from what it was in the first place, but I believe it could have been cut a little more.

Mr. Winters: I think it is a very good report.

Mr. Fraser: I think it is a fair report. There have been comments in the press concerning a report that the committee sanctioned the moving of the national film board to Montreal. I do not think the committee did that. The committee only said that the premises now used by the national film board were inadequate for its purpose, and that the film board should be housed under one roof. Personally, I believe it would have been better for the film board to move to Peterborough instead of Montreal. We have a lot of culture there. We have the little theatre and a very noted playwright, Mr. Robertson Davies. We have scenery, and we have a music festival. I do not see why the Minister of Public Works did not suggest that move.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not even bring it to Hull.

Mr. Fraser: The committee investigating the national film board could not have made in 1949 the report it made this year, because the new director has tried to put a little management into that board which we certainly did not have before. It looks also as if the director, Mr. Irwin, has tried to carry out the Woods-Gordon management program. The recommendations of the Gordon firm have been carried out, and there is a statement to that effect on pages 35 and 36 of the committee's report. It might be a good idea to put that on the record, so that the members could see just what has been done.

There is one thing I regret, and that is that the committee did not call witnesses from the Canadian Commercial and Press Photographers Association or the Commercial Motion Picture Association. I believe that is something that should be done at our next meeting, if the committee is set up again next year. I hope that the minister will see to it that it is set up again next year. I think it is fair to the national film board to have such a committee. It gives the employees in the board a little build-up of morale, because they can see that nothing is hidden from the members. On May 8 I asked that the Commercial and Press Photographers Association as well as the Commercial Motion Picture Association be called before the committee. I was told that the steering committee would look into that, but the steering committee did not meet until the deliberations of the committee were completed, on June 20, at which time they studied the report.

The committee was also assured by the director that at the present time the board has not been out hunting up business at it was before. I feel this step creates better feeling amongst the commercial photographers. It was stated also that since 1950 the board has fewer employees engaged in distributing films, but with the excellent help of local film councils throughout Canada distribution has increased greatly. Even in foreign countries, where the national film board had offices which have been discontinued, distribution has gone up 15·9 per cent. We were told that revenues were gradually increasing since 1950 from the different activities of the board such as commercial 35 millimetre film, 16 millimetre film and also television. In 1950, when the present director took over, there were about twenty treasury officers in the board, whereas now there are only eight. The film board is looking after its own account, and evidently these treasury officers are doing a good job.

The board also has a better system of planning its work. Films are taken at the proper time, and arrangements are made ahead of time instead of running out on a job and finding it was the wrong time to take the film. The cost of showing film has been cut in half since 1947, from 7·4 per cent to about 4 per cent. The Matthew report said that the film board should continue to have films produced by private commercial companies. I hope the film board will continue to do that. The minority report attached to the Matthew report said that at least 50 per cent of the work should be done by private companies. This recommendation has not been followed out. Private companies should at least have an opportunity of competing with the national film board. Tenders should be called so that private industry would have a chance to compete. I think you would get cheaper films and better films, not just because they would be made by private companies but because these companies would be competing with each other. Every motion picture company has different methods. This would give the national film board a chance to see how these people do the work. It would also help the commercial corporations.

I was sorry that a letter covering the policy declaration adopted at the annual meeting of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which was held in Quebec city on October 30, 1951, was not placed before the committee, as this matter was not before the committee until our last meeting. But in that letter it is stated:

> The Canadian chamber of commerce generally endorses the minority report of the national film board of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, in which it is recommended that two or three members should be appointed to the board of the national film board as moderators, with the duty of examining objectively all plans of the board. The national film board should not extend its operations. The film act should be amended so that it is no longer necessary for departments of the federal government to secure their films through the national film board.

I am sorry there was no chance for this matter to be discussed in the committee.

There are just a couple of questions I should like to ask. One is this. What are the arrangements with regard to the showing of 16 mm. films in tourist hotels throughout the country? These films are shown for the entertainment of guests. I should like to know whether the hotel pays the full cost of travel and time of the operator and rent of the films, as some of the films have to be rented.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not know whether the minister is going to answer questions now or whether he prefers to have the general discussion and then answer the questions.

Mr. Winters: Let us have the general discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: I presume he wants general discussion first. I shall be brief. As a matter of fact I regret that I was unable to attend but a few of the meetings of the committee. I was one of those who were greatly interested in the setting up of this committee; and it is with regret that I am compelled to say that I was unable to be present at many of the meetings. From what I saw and learned, however, I think the national film board is continuing to render fine service to our country. I hope those services will be continued to the fullest possible extent.

I have been particularly interested in what one might call the creative work of employees of the national film board. We have seen some remarkable creative work in the animated pictures that are being shown, and in some of the interpretations of the social and economic progress that has been made in our country. I should like to see more of that kind of thing done. I should like to see not only documentary films but others; I should like to see the film board pay increasing attention to the interpretation of these social and economic developments in our country that are particularly Canadian. For example, a few years ago a fine film was done on the fishermen's co-operatives, the fisheries, and so on of the maritime coast. I think that is the kind of thing that, to some extent, the film board can do better than any other organization. My observation has been that the board employs a number of young people who are more or less devoting themselves to the work of the national film board, not altogether because of attractive conditions because in some instances, as we learned when we were on the committee, there are young men and women there who are doing remarkable jobs at some sacrifice financially. I am thinking of one young man who came across from Britain and who synchronizes words, music and pictures at a considerable financial sacrifice. I think these people should be encouraged to do the kind of job that was done in connection with the films on the coastal fisheries and the co-operatives.

Mr. Winters: "The Rising Tide".

Mr. Coldwell: Yes. In this country we have wonderful material. I was greatly interested in a film for restricted distribution, dealing with the treatment of mental disease in one of our hospitals. According to Dr. Menninger, for example, the well-known psychiatrist in the United States, in some respects Canada leads in the treatment of mental disease; and particularly, he says, the province of Saskatchewan. The minister smiles, but I am saying this quite seriously. I am not trying to take a rise out of any other province when I say that. That is fact, however. Where we have penal reform —and again I am referring to my own province—or an outstanding treatment of disease, whether it be tuberculosis, cancer or anything else, these things are worth recording, in my opinion. I am not taking any credit for the present government of Saskatchewan for the treatment of tuberculosis, that was started years ago by another administration of a different type, namely a former Liberal administration in the province. But where these things are done I think they are worth recording, not from the point of view of a province but from the point of view of interpreting to other parts of the world what Canada is doing and can do.

I should like to say this. I am glad the report contains a recommendation that suitable quarters should be provided. I do not know how the employees of the national film board work as efficiently as they do—and they work efficiently—under the conditions that exist on Sussex street. In order to safeguard our valuable films I think we should have places where they can be stored with safety, free from any danger of explosion or fire.

I do not want to prolong the discussion. I am glad indeed that the committee was set up. I think it was beneficial to the national film board to have the opportunity of telling before a parliamentary committee what is a good story, and of getting that story across to the country to some extent at least. I hope the work of the film board will be continued and expanded. I hope that nothing will be placed in the way of encouraging the national film board to do for our country the best possible job in this field.

Mr. Winters: In reply to the hon. member for Peterborough West, may I say that the motion pictures shown in summer camps and tourist hotels are on a loan basis from the national film board, and normally they are shown through projectors that are owned by the people who show the pictures. Resort owners also provide the projectionists in almost all cases. I also might say that in 1951 the tourist film audience in Canada totalled 769,000, which was up 20 per cent from the previous year.

I thank the hon. member for Peterborough West and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for what they have said about the film board and in particular about the proceedings of the committee, which I had the privilege of attending and which I thought was an especially good one.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister whether he can give us any information on a subject which I am sure is of interest to all the people of Canada—and which was referred to in the press about a month ago, I think,—concerning a documentary film depicting the part played by Canadian forces in the 1914-18 war? I confess immediately that I am not familiar with the details, only having read them in the press. My recollection of the statement made there was that this was a film compiled by the old government film bureau, as I believe it was called, made up of extracts from the best of the documentary films of many countries during that war, and that it was made available to branches of the Legion or any others who might be interested. We have been given to understand by press stories that practically every existing copy of the film had been worn out, that there was only one left, and that it was in bad shape. It was indicated that it had been found in the archives or the library of the film board. As I recall it, the question was asked whether an effort was to be made to rescreen that film and to preserve it in order to indicate to this and other countries the tremendous and valuable role played by Canadian forces in the first war. It appears that no other complete record exists.

Mr. Winters: I believe the picture in question is called "Lest We Forget". It is a stirring picture. I have seen it. The film board has done a considerable amount of work in rehabilitating the sound track, and it is going to be retained as an archival picture and can be reproduced by the film board.

Mr. Fulton: Will it be?

Mr. Winters: Yes, it will be.

Mr. Fraser: In 16-millimetre size?

Mr. Winters: It can be reproduced in 16-millimetre size. There is no immediate request for it at the moment, but it can be produced in that size.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a question concerning a project in British Columbia. The prairie farm rehabilitation administration has been asked to make a survey and recommendation regarding what is known as the fruitlands area adjacent to North Kamloops in British Columbia, which is in my own constituency. This area was developed previously by a private company, and that part of it which is not incorporated as a village has been taken over by the irrigation jurisdiction within the last three or four years.

They are faced with a difficult problem. The irrigation system requires a good deal of expenditure for purposes of rehabilitation, to put the area into shape in which the land could be serviced. These are extremely valuable agricultural lands, but at the moment the revenues available from them, particularly after the disastrous winter we had in 1948-49, which killed so many of the fruit trees, are not sufficient in any degree to meet either capital costs or the interest which would be required to meet payments on borrowed sums.

The prairie farm rehabilitation administration has been asked to conduct a survey and make a recommendation as to the best way of going about bringing the system up to date to serve the land as required. What is the present position of that survey?

Mr. Gardiner: There has been a preliminary engineering survey, and a report has been made to the British Columbia government. An economic survey of the area has been started, and when it is completed the report will be made in due course.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister in a position to say whether any recommendations have been made, and if so what they are?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it has not yet reached the stage of recommendations. The economic survey is being carried on now.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister awaiting a reply from the British Columbia government? Is action by some other party necessary, or is it just a matter of continuing the survey by this department?

Mr. Gardiner: I presume the hon. member has in mind the trees killed by frost. I think the final report made on that was that if payment were to be made it was considered to be a provincial responsibility. But there is no other report ready on the economic side of the matter.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the minister's answer, but I do not think it meets the point I had in mind. He said an initial report had been made to the British Columbia government, and that at this time an economic survey was going forward. Is it necessary to receive some proposal from the British Columbia government before anything further is done? In other words is the minister awaiting some further approach, or is it just a matter of waiting until the economic survey has been made?

Mr. Gardiner: Just a matter of waiting until the economic survey is completed. There is no understanding or misunderstanding as yet between the provincial government and this government.

Item agreed to.

48. Land protection and reclamation; clearing and settlement of new lands under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $250,000.

Mr. Quelch: To what area does this refer?

Mr. Gardiner: To all Canada, really; but most of the work has been done in New Brunswick and Manitoba.

Mr. Coldwell: Does that include the Carrot river valley?

Mr. Gardiner: Nothing is being spent out of this vote in the Carrot river valley. But it is under a vote of this kind that something might be done, if it were done.

Mr. Coldwell: Is something being done there in the way of P.F.R.A. survey?

Mr. Gardiner: There were P.F.R.A. surveys made, but they were made under the P.F.R.A. vote.

Mr. Coldwell: Not under this vote?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Item agreed to.

49. Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, $1,655,520.

Mr. Gillis: I notice an increase of $446,720. What progress is being made in the rehabilitation of the marshlands of the maritimes, and how extensive are they? When does the minister think the project might be completed?

Mr. Gardiner: First class progress is being made. The reason for the increased vote is that the engineering is done, and we can get the work completed now. It is possible to have it completed, and therefore we have asked for more money.

Mr. Weir: I have had the opportunity of seeing some of the development under way in the maritime provinces, and I think it is a very commendable piece of work. The crops that are growing on the area, with a little drainage protection, were splendid crops, of both oats and hay. I commend this type of work, and commend the efforts of the minister.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Nowlan: The minister said the increase was for engineering services—

Mr. Gardiner: No, the increase is for construction. The engineering was done last year.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the minister give a break-down of what works will be constructed this year? Would he also comment on the suggestion made on the work being done up and down the Annapolis river? As he knows, repairs have been going on for a distance of about 25 or 30 miles on both sides of the river. A suggestion has been made that a dam should be built across the river at Annapolis, or at some other point, to cut out the necessity for these long dikelands. Has any survey been made?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. I understand the project and have been over it personally. As a matter of fact I think it deserves considerable attention because the possibilities of building a dam could be beyond anything one could anticipate without seeing it completed. We have been hopeful that in due course we can get around to doing it that way. I must say that the engineering is not completed to the point where I can give any further report. This is something we are interested in and we hope it can be brought through to completion. I have a list of the other projects which are under way and perhaps it could be placed on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: There is definite engineering work in progress with respect to the dam, is there not?

Mr. Gardiner: There is definite work being done.

Mr. Nowlan: Has the minister any idea when that will be completed so he will be able to arrive at a decision?

Mr. Gardiner: It cannot be completed this year; it will run into next year.

Mr. McLure: What work is being done in Prince Edward Island in connection with this vote?

Mr. Gardiner: The work on the Johnston river was completed at a total expenditure of $19,325.66.

Mr. McLure: Anything further this year?

Mr. Gardiner: The province still has the drainage to do and will be making any further expenditures that are made. Our expenditures are completed.

Item agreed to.

50. Assiniboine river—diking and cut-off, $50,000.

Mr. Weir: This work is being done in an effort to control the flooding of the Assiniboine river. Incidentally this is linked with the observations made by the hon. member for Greenwood in connection with flood protection work in the city of Winnipeg. The Assiniboine river drains a very large area. I am not going to try to put all the details on record at the present time, but such rivers as the White Sand river, the Shell river, the Qu'Appelle river rising away in Saskatchewan, the Birdtail river, the Minnedosa river and the Souris river all flow into the Assiniboine. Those waters are all concentrated at Winnipeg where they join the Red river.

Heretofore this river has been considered a navigable stream and for that reason under the jurisdiction of the federal government. What is being attempted here is to prevent it getting out of bounds and flooding the country. I am keeping in mind what the hon. member for Greenwood said a couple of weeks ago. If this river should break out of its south bank with extensive flooding and meet the La Salle, and then go down through the Brunkild country to meet the Red above Winnipeg; if it got out of control it would aggravate extensively the flood condition that might apply to the city of Winnipeg. That is why we are so anxious and interested in having some measure of control on this river.

We are waiting at the present time for the survey that was instituted by the international joint commission having in mind the possibility of diverting this river across to the lake. I do not know whether that is feasible, but I would like to ask the minister whether any surveys have been made on the other rivers, some of which I have mentioned, which are further upstream from the Assiniboine. Have some control works or dams been built there which would relieve to some extent the flood hazards in the narrow channel where this river flows through the flat country toward Winnipeg?

This particular vote is earmarked for diking and cut-off. This cut-off is an innovation and some people have a question mark in their minds about it. This river is quite crooked and in order to overcome some of the hazards of flooding, particularly to stop the jamming of ice, attempts have been made to cut off the bends and thereby enable the water to run away a little more freely. It has worked quite well in most cases.

The project which was undertaken last year in co-operation with the municipality of Portage la Prairie proved most useful and has worked exceptionally well. I might go even farther and say that the acquiring of the necessary land was undertaken by the municipality, and I think the whole thing will work out quite well. Unfortunately the proposals for this year so far have not been so encouraging. The $50,000 in this vote has been considered by the municipalities concerned, and I think they are going to use most of it for diking purposes. They still have other worthy projects in mind that would help to alleviate this situation; and I hope when the minister gets his program more under way he will see his way clear to give further assistance in this regard.

Mr. Bryce: I am glad to join with the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa in what he has said about this river because after it leaves his constituency it runs into mine. I think the hon. member is to be congratulated upon the work he has done in this connection. He was able to get the engineers and the different municipalities together, along with myself. Now that the minister has been good enough to provide for this advance I think they are all of one mind as to what they are going to do. Previous to that I do not think anyone really knew where he was going. Now with the P.F.R.A. the whole thing is under the one engineer and things are going much better.

But I think we should proceed cautiously because the first thing we know we will have Winnipeg on our necks for allowing the water to move down too quickly. I do not think the hon. member has sufficiently stressed the seriousness of the situation. If this river should break its banks and run into the La Salle we will have one of the worst conditions we have ever had.

I have represented this constituency for only three or four years and cannot speak with the experience of a man raised in the district. But I know how serious the situation could be, and I thank the minister for setting aside $50,000 for this work, whether it is spent on diking or cut-offs according to what the engineers decide is proper. When money gets a little more plentiful in the future I hope the government will be able to provide a bigger vote.

Mr. Weir: We will wait for the report.

Item agreed to.

51. To provide for administrative expenses, Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, $92,700.

Mr. Charlton: I am not going to take much time, but I should like to ask the minister what products are now being held by the floor prices administration board, the quantities of each, and the total amount of money that has been spent by the board to date.

Mr. Gardiner: We have about 15 million pounds of 1952 butter, the value of the 1952 butter paid for being $5,774,391.79. We have paid for canned pork amounting to $21,238,277.58, Wiltshire sides amounting to $5,192,386.22, and beef amounting to $9,526,750.83. That is a total of $41,731,806.42.

Mr. Charlton: That is the total amount of money spent on the products the minister has mentioned?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the investment in the stocks now.

Mr. Charlton: To date?

Mr. Gardiner: At this time.

Mr. Charlton: What is the total amount of money that has been spent up to now?

Mr. Gardiner: I think I reported this to the house on a previous occasion this session. The net cost of the operations of the board from the beginning has been a little over $10 million. That does not involve any net cost in connection with these products about which I have just been speaking. They may involve something more.

Mr. Charlton: The minister gave us the number of pounds of butter but not the number of pounds of pork, Wiltshire sides or beef. He just gave us the value.

Mr. Gardiner: There are 37 million pounds of canned pork, 15 million pounds of Wiltshire sides, and 33,900,000 pounds of beef that have been bought, but some of it has been shipped. About 20 million pounds have been shipped.

Mr. Charlton: I believe the minister mentioned on his estimates the other night that the price of the canned pork was 63 cents and that it has now come down to 62·8. I wonder how the minister arrived at that figure?

Mr. Gardiner: It was 63·8 at first and now it is down to 61·8.

Mr. Charlton: It started at 63·8, came down to 62·8 and now it is 61·8. How does the minister arrive at these figures, with pork being purchased at $25 a hundred dressed weight?

Mr. Gardiner: The original figure was 63·8 but the cost at which it is going in now is 61·8, or 2 cents lower.

Mr. Charlton: The minister has not answered the question yet. With pork selling at $25 a hundred dressed weight how is the figure of 61·8 a pound in the can arrived at?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that the lower cost is due to the fact that there is a larger volume passing through. It is the increased volume which makes possible a decrease of 2 cents in the cost when it goes into the can. There is no difference in the price of the pork. Twenty-six cents has been the floor price all the way through, and it has actually been coming in at 26 cents. I do not think there is any other market in which you can get more than that price, and we are getting it at that price.

Mr. Charlton: The minister has not answered the question yet. What I asked the minister was how the price of 61·8 cents was arrived at in view of the fact that pork is being purchased at 26 cents a pound dressed weight.

Mr. Gardiner: I have already put that on the record three times this session, but I will put it on again. The pork is 26 cents a pound to start with. When you trim off the fat and take out the bone it doubles the price, or did at the beginning, to 52 cents. Half the pork you buy at 26 cents is bone and fat, and by the time you trim that off and get it down to what you are going to put in the can you are only putting in half of the weight of the hog.

Therefore if you pay 26 cents for the hog it costs you 52 cents for the pork you put in the can. At the beginning it cost approximately 12 cents a pound to put it into tins and that made it 64 cents, or 63·8 cents.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think there are very many butchers who will believe—

Mr. Gardiner: Believe it or not, it is true.

Mr. Charlton: —that half a dressed hog is bone and fat unless they are heavy hogs. Select hogs will not dress out that way. I can say that advisedly.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the fact, anyway.

Mr. Charlton: Not on grade A or B-1 hogs.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend seems to be an expert on everything. When did he start butchering? As a matter of fact that is what the packing plants tell us. Those are the facts and that is all I can give him. I am not going to change their figures even to satisfy him.

Mr. Darroch: I want to say I am very pleased that this item provides for the continuation of operations under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. So far as agriculture is concerned, I think it has probably been the most beneficial legislation that has ever been passed by the parliament of Canada. The application of the act on different occasions and to different branches of agriculture has done two things. First, it has cushioned the loss. We know perfectly well that at no time were support prices established under which there would be a profit to the producer, but I think probably the majority of producers realized why it was so done. As I say, it did cushion the loss. In other words the producer of the commodity was assured that he was not going to lose his shirt.

In my riding we produce mostly cream, hogs and beef. The farmers are not particularly producers of specialized crops. I think we have what are the best farmers in the country, the fellows who go along and produce a little of everything. They have received a great deal of benefit from the application of the act. For instance, let me start with cream, or butter, which is almost the same thing because cream becomes butter. Last year when the cream producers asked for a support price of 63 cents a pound for butter under this act the minister in his wisdom suggested that perhaps it would be better if they would take 58 cents a pound for two years. The wisdom of this counsel has been quite evident, and I am quite sure that had the price not been established last year the price of cream would be down at least ten cents. It has done something else as far as the butter industry is concerned. It has meant that there was a market for some of the surplus milk that we had on hand as a result of the embargo caused by foot-and-mouth disease. As I say, this branch of the industry has been benefited.

Then we go on to the hog branch of the industry. I was rather interested a moment ago to hear the exchange between the minister and the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth. I think the hon. member is forgetting that when you can pork you do not can the bones, just the meat. A dressed hog contains the head and bones and the rest of the carcass but only the meat goes into the cans, not the bones. I think that would explain the suggestion of the right hon. minister that 50 per cent of the weight of the carcass goes into canned meat with the result that not 26 cents but 52 cents is the cost of the meat for canning.

This support price for hogs came at a time when we had an unusually large hog population in the country. Whether that was again caused by the difficulties incurred through foot-and-mouth disease I do not know; but I am quite sure that the 26-cent price offered or established by the department prior to the embargo was not set up to show a profit to the feeder, but it meant that he would be at least getting his costs back. With the advent or whatever you like to call it of the foot-and-mouth disease this 26-cent price was very welcome to the hog producer, I am sure. It maintained the confidence of the trade. I noticed in my own community that young pigs which were then going begging for $4 or $5 are now selling for $10 and $11, thereby establishing the fact that farmers feel they can go ahead and stay in the hog business with reasonable assurance that they will have a market.

Then we come to the beef situation. I know that cattle feeders lost money this winter. The fact of the matter is that the prices at which they bought their feeder cattle last fall were perhaps a little over-optimistic. Even at that time I could not see anything in the foreseeable future to indicate that they were going to make money on cattle that they had put in the stable at 33 to 35 cents a pound. Before the difficulties with foot-and-mouth disease the cattle market was beginning to decline; and I guess something happened last January which perhaps has not happened within the lifetime of most of us here. For a week or two, probably not over a week, prices for cattle in Canada were higher than in the United States and, as a result, for the first time in a long while cattle were shipped from the Chicago market to Canada. In fact I think the first six loads of cattle shipped from Chicago came to the city of Ottawa.

So I say even before we had foot-and-mouth disease there was difficulty on the horizon for the cattle feeders. I attended several meetings and we had various suggestions as to what the support price for beef cattle should be. In most cases the farmers with whom I talked agreed that they were going to take a loss on their cattle. Most of the reasonable ones agreed that as citizens of the country and belonging to one industry in the country, they should expect to absorb some of the loss the nation was suffering as the result of the foot-and-mouth disease. I think that was one of the reasons the Canadian Federation of Agriculture suggested the price of 25 cents a pound for cattle. I was on the platform not so long ago with one of the field men for the federation of agriculture, and he complimented the government for giving the price they asked for beef, 25 cents a pound.

I know there has been some discussion as to how this was arrived at and why there was a price of 25 cents. My understanding, of course, was that the 25 cents per pound was arrived at by suggesting a price of 47 cents a pound on a 53 per cent dressed carcass which gives you something like $24.91, and with the credit that comes from dressing the animal it makes it approximately 25 cents per pound. For an animal that is dressed progressively higher the figure would be also higher, figured back to the live weight.

As a result of this it was decided that what we call good cattle would sell in Toronto for approximately 27½ cents a pound. I know there was some delay in getting the arrangements completed by the department with the packers and there were some people who during that period shipped their cattle and took a loss greater than they would have taken if they had waited for two weeks.

I happened to be on the Toronto market on Monday, May 12 or 13—May 12 I think it was—when the first cattle were sold at 27½ cents. Those cattle were fairly heavy steers that dressed probably 58 per cent; but the point is that within 15 minutes after that one load of cattle was sold for that price, I saw a load of butcher cattle sold for 26 cents which would have had an awful time bringing 24½ cents the week before.

Mr. Low: What would the butchers dress up to?

Mr. Darroch: They were lighter. They would dress at less than 700 pounds. The original stipulation was that they were just to take carcasses 700 pounds and over. The butcher cattle would probably dress up to 52 or 53 per cent. They were decent cattle, just underweight—what they call heavy cattle; cattle around 900 to 950 pounds live weight.

That is something, sir, that has always puzzled me with respect to the price of livestock. Every time there is a suggestion that prices are going to be lowered they drop very quickly. Of course I know people are prone to become just a little bit panicky, and probably they think things are going to go down so they shoot out a few more than they ordinarily would. That is another feature that is not good for this type of market. It does seem to me peculiar, however, that once the government or the department steps in and establishes a floor price or offers to buy at a support price, then invariably the price starts to go up and they hardly ever have to buy. I have some ideas why that happens but I do not think I should state them here; and I think men who have been in the livestock business have an idea too.

As a result of all this, from the 12th of May good cattle have never sold for less than 25 cents a pound. In fact the price has been as high as 29 cents per pound. This week they are back up a little; but I say the introduction of support provided for under this item has been of untold benefit to the agricultural industry, at least in the province of Ontario; and I would think if it is good for Ontario it is good for the rest of the country.

I believe, sir, the minister and his department have not always been free from criticism, on the one hand by the producers who feel they have not been getting enough, and on the other by the consumers who feel that the prices are too high and that by establishing the support price the government is arbitrarily setting a price whereby the cost of living is going to be sustained.

I was interested in picking up a paper in Toronto on the day I referred to, May 12. It was the Toronto Globe and Mail, which to all outward appearances at least is the official organ of the Conservative party in our province. Under the heading "Selling beef at a loss"—and I am not going to take time to read it all—there are one or two paragraphs which are rather pertinent, I think. Under this heading, and after taking a few biffs and bangs telling how much this is costing the country, it goes on to say this:

> But the sole reason for the subsidy is that Canada's official floor price of twenty-five cents a pound makes our price the highest in the world.

They take in a lot of territory.

> The subsidy enables agriculture minister Gardiner to maintain this high-price plateau in the domestic market and at the same time get off the hook for having caused unused surpluses of beef to accumulate here. From his point of view it seems to be quite beside the point that the so-called surplus is an artificial one. It was caused by the arbitrary high price level which he has imposed on Canadian consumers.

Canadian producers thus continue to get a price slightly higher than that in the United States, and avoid the rational course of permitting beef to find an economic level in terms of both world and domestic markets. In these circumstances there is neither economic sense nor justice to Canadians in this new excuse for a subsidy to be paid out of taxation.

It is rather interesting to read this article, just to see how far from the facts it really is. To prove it is wrong, I read the first statement:

But the sole reason for the subsidy is that Canada's official floor price of twenty-five cents a pound makes our price the highest in the world.

There are two editions of the Globe and Mail each day, so on Monday night I bought another copy of the Globe and Mail and on the market page of that publication dated May 13 I find this market report, "Steers go higher as floor prices adjusted here." It reads:

Steer prices jumped $1 to $2 here yesterday following the Ontario stockyards cattle price adjustment to the Department of Agriculture's floor price program. The market was strong to $1 higher on cows and bulls. The estimated hold-over is 2,000 cattle.

Choice steers sold from $26-$27.50, with good steers at $25-$26 and medium steers at $23-$24.50.

In the morning this paper had said our prices were the highest in the world, and that was the price at which steers were being sold on the market on May 12. On the same page but lower down the newspaper quoted the Chicago livestock market report. On the Chicago market on May 12 the price of prime steers was $35-$37.50 and choice steers $34-$34.75. Those who are engaged in the cattle business would agree that choice steers here would be sold as good steers on the Chicago market, which would mean that they would be sold at $34-$34.75 as compared with $26-$27.50 on the Toronto market.

I am suggesting that the minister and his department have done a good job. I think the wisdom of the application of this price support program is self-evident. The best proof of that, I suggest, would be an article I read not long ago in one of the farm journals which compared prices in the United States and Canada. In the United States with its high support prices and large surpluses as a result of those high prices, their costs were immeasurably higher than ours. In spite of all this, in 1951 the Canadian farmer received a little better than 12 per cent of our national income, while our cousins in the United States were receiving a little over 6 per cent.

Mr. Bryce: Can the minister tell us which item provides for any loss that may take place as a result of the exchange of meat between the United States, New Zealand, Great Britain and Canada. Is that under the support act, or is it under some other act?

Mr. Gardiner: It is not in any of these estimates yet. It will come in next year's supplementaries.

Mr. Bryce: Does it come under this support act?

Mr. Gardiner: It will come under the prices support act.

Mr. MacKenzie: Before the item passes, I should like to make inquiries about eggs. Has the department purchased any eggs, and if so has there been any loss?

Mr. Gardiner: We have not been required to buy any eggs in the two and a half or almost two and three-quarter years past. This year we did find it necessary to buy some eggs in the Saskatchewan area, the reason being that there was no cold storage for the eggs in that area. Eggs had to be sent from there to either Winnipeg or Calgary. The government did purchase some eggs in Saskatchewan at 30 cents, starting in May and continuing down to the present time.

Mr. MacKenzie: There has been no loss?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no loss. A few of them have been sold, but not at a loss. We are not in a position to say there will not be any loss, but there has been none to date.

Mr. Hosking: I realize the minister himself deserves a great deal of credit for the arrangement he made for disposing of our beef. I am certain that many members of our agricultural communities pay him the tribute he deserves. I would imagine, however, that some of the staff who were closely connected with these negotiations had an important part to play in the exchange which sent our beef to Britain when it was shut out of the United States market. This eliminated a glut on our own market. I think this is the proper time to pay tribute to the members of the staff who took part in the negotiating of that agreement.

Having said that, I should like to suggest to the minister that he keep an eye on the facts that the debate in this house must have called to his attention in the past few days, showing that rural areas in this country are rapidly becoming depopulated. This could have far-reaching effects on the economy of this country. My riding is made up of two sections, rural and urban. I should like to call to the minister's attention the fact that the good work he has done in applying support prices to agricultural commodities has enabled farmers and those who are interested in producing food for people to buy to feel that they have made a good investment and that they should continue to make an investment in agriculture. This policy assures the farmers that a temporary situation which may arise, such as the foot-and-mouth disease or anything else, which disturbs the economy of agriculture, will not break them.

By doing this you not only give stability to the agricultural industry; you give stability to the market. I am referring to the market in which urban people buy. If we have no floor price under an agricultural product, then because of that lack of floor price the return to the farmer drops so low that it is no longer profitable for a farmer to produce that commodity, then it is obvious that as time progresses there will be a shortage of that commodity. When that shortage occurs we have these very high prices to which the urban people object.

Referring back to the situation which has been brought to the minister's attention so clearly by the debates in this house within the last week, I would say it is most important that he not allow the rural areas to become depopulated, thus causing our agricultural production to drop off. If that happened the people who live in the cities would have to pay exorbitant prices for food in the years to come. I think the members of the department who have done so well in disposing of the surplus beef should look with pleasure on their performance, but should keep in mind the fact that they must give stability to the members of the agricultural community in this country if the urban people are going to have goods to buy at reasonable prices. I would commend the minister for his efforts in the past.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to correct the statement I made a moment ago that there were no losses on eggs. There was a loss of $1,866.24 a year ago.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I wanted to ask the minister what other farm products, if any, are being supported by the Agricultural Prices Support Act at the moment?

Mr. Gardiner: Butter, eggs, pork and beef. I gave the figures a little while ago. I put them on Hansard.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

[Mr. Hosking.]

Mr. Charlton: No. It is rather unfortunate that the minister is getting a little bit touchy these days. The statement I made a few moments ago was that I doubted whether a dressed grade A or grade B-1 hog having the bone and fat removed would take 50 per cent of that carcass. I still say that. I am glad to hear that both the members for Wellington are so well satisfied with conditions as they exist today. After hearing the hon. member for Wellington North, I make the suggestion that with the head, hocks and fat cut off and the bone taken out, it probably would be 50 per cent. What do you do? Do you give that head and the hocks to the packer? I mean, do they get that for nothing? It is understandable, of course, if they do not count the weight of the head and do not count the weight of the hocks. But the head and the hocks are valuable products.

Mr. Gardiner: They are sold, and that is all figured in: the dressing percentage, the cost of preparation and all credits. The credits, of course, take in the payment we get for the head that goes into head cheese and for the feet that go into feet, hocks and so on. But the actual position is that the canned pork amounts to from 78 to 82 pounds. There is a little bit of variation, but it is about half. The average hog will dress out at 155 pounds. Some will dress a little bit more than that and some a little bit less in the top grade. But the canned pork coming out of that average of 155 pounds runs from 78 to 82 pounds. The amount that goes into Wiltshires is 120 pounds and the amonut that goes into cuts would be 90. But the canned pork is what we are talking about and that is 78 to 82 pounds out of 155 pounds, which is not very far from half of it. It will depend somewhat on the amount that is trimmed off with the head, with the feet, the amount trimmed off with the fat and the amount taken out in bone.

Mr. Charlton: That is the amount that goes into the can?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the amount that goes into the can.

Mr. Charlton: What happens to the money that is collected for the feet and hocks?

Mr. Gardiner: In figuring the cost of the canned pork, the other is credited to the cost.

Mr. Charlton: When the minister made his statement, or when he answered the question I asked him with regard to the value at 26 cents a pound he said you could double that figure to get the price.

Mr. Gardiner: That is approximately correct.

Mr. Charlton: The minister said you could double it?

Mr. Gardiner: Approximately, yes.

Mr. Charlton: Well, according to my mathematics twice 26 is 52.

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly.

Mr. Charlton: All right. The minister said 52 cents could be added right away to that canned pork.

Mr. Gardiner: I still say that.

Mr. Charlton: Then I say what happens to the head cheese made from the head, the jowl, or the piece of bacon—or what they call bacon—off the jowl, the fat that is rendered out of the head and neck, the hocks that are quite valuable—they are hard enough to get, goodness knows—and the pickled pigs' feet? Where does the price of these products come in?

Mr. Gardiner: If we go into the whole detail of it, the costs of preparation, including the cost of the tin, run up to about 15 cents. If you went into the whole thing it would take a lot more accounting than I have given. I simply say this. The amount you get out of a hog that you put into the can is approximately half the weight of the hog; and if the hog costs you 26 cents, then that which goes in costs 52. But the whole accounting is done by taking all you get back by way of credit and charging it up against the cost of preparation and the other costs in connection with the canning of the hogs. That works out at a net difference of 12 cents, roughly speaking. It has got down; when we got greater volume, it got down to 10 cents. It was approximately 12 cents to start with and it has worked down to 10 cents, through the volume, of a difference in the net between the actual return and the actual cost of putting the pork in cans.

Mr. Charlton: I suggest that had the minister made that statement at the beginning, we might have avoided all this argument we have had because he has now admitted that it is not 50 per cent at all.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not make that statement.

Mr. Nowlan: Before the item carries I should like to make one passing comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Wellington North. I am not prepared to discuss with him the intricacies of the packing business but I should like to suggest to him that I hope he is more accurate in his information on that subject than he was upon the political and journalistic set-up in this province. When he stated that the Globe and Mail was the official publication of the Conservative party in this province, I presume that if someone suggested that, we will say, the Winnipeg Free Press was the official publication of the Liberal party in Manitoba, that statement might sometimes be repudiated by his party and might sometimes be repudiated by that paper. Certainly there is no official publication for the Conservative party in this province. I merely want to keep the record straight.

Mr. Darroch: I stand corrected, Mr. Chairman; but I still maintain that it tries to be.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Have any commodity groups asked for support for their products in the past year, other than those mentioned?

Mr. Gardiner: Assistance was asked for cranberries and for lambs. Those who produce lambs in Alberta asked for some assistance during the time the foot-and-mouth disease difficulties were being experienced. The cheese people also asked for assistance and later changed over to the plan that is now operating as between the Ontario producers and the provincial government. We have guaranteed their accounts under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act of 1949. But there is no floor price there. That is a guarantee against loss in handling the product the way they are handling it. I understand that poultry producers have asked for it within the last week.

Item agreed to.

52. To provide for a contribution to the federated women's institutes of Canada to help defray the costs of the international conference of the associated country women of the world to be held in Canada in 1953, $10,000.

Mr. Coldwell: This is a small item, but will the minister explain what it is for?

Mr. Gardiner: It is for the federated women's organization. They are having a world convention here next year, and we are putting up this amount to help them in defraying expenses.

Mr. Catherwood: This is one item to which I think all hon. members can give their unqualified approval. If there is any organization, particularly in rural Canada, that is doing fine work it is the federated women's institutes of Canada. I think this item to help defray the costs of their convention is a recognition of the splendid services they have rendered, and I am pleased to see it in the estimates.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to go along with what has been said by the hon. member for Haldimand and to say a word with regard to the founder of the women's institutes namely, Mrs. Adelaide Hoodless. It is quite commonly known across the country that Mrs. Hoodless founded the women's institute at Stoney Creek. One thing that is not quite so commonly known is the fact that she attended the same public school that I attended, namely S.S. No. 6, South Dumfries, but not at the same time. The cairn erected to her memory is within one and one-half miles of my home and also her birthplace. I think the credit should go where it rightly belongs, namely to the county of Brant.

Mr. Darroch: I should like to express my support of this item which provides money for the federated women's institutes. I should be afraid to go home without supporting it, because my better half happens to be a member of the federated board in Ontario.

Mr. Fraser: I am very glad the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth mentioned Adelaide Hoodless. I happen to know her owing to the fact that she is my better half's aunt.

Mr. Abbott: Carried unanimously.

Mr. Fraser: As the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth said, she founded the first institute at Stoney Creek. That first institute was founded behind a blacksmith shop there, and has spread not only throughout Canada but throughout the British empire and other countries.

Item agreed to.

Central experimental farm, including research and co-ordinating divisions for the experimental farms service—

664. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—further amount required, $4,000.

Mr. Lennard: What is being done in connection with experimentation with hogs out there? As I pointed out last year, they have had those lop-eared Landrace hogs for about fifteen years. No two of them look alike. They are the greatest conglomeration of hogs I ever saw in my life. I should like to know what progress is being made in the experiments that have been going on out there.

Mr. Gardiner: We dropped the experiments on the Landrace hogs after it had been demonstrated to our satisfaction at least that nothing was to be gained by changing over from the Yorkshire to the other type.

Mr. Lennard: During the last few years have they acquired any large English whites, and are any experiments being conducted?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they are being brought in for breeding purposes. They are a larger, heavier type, and are being brought in from time to time.

Mr. Lennard: Has there been any report that in any respect they are superior to the Yorkshire?

Mr. Gardiner: They are really a type of Yorkshire. I had personal experience with the shipment donated to Manitoba in connection with the Winnipeg floods. A number of the large whites were sold at a sale at Brandon. Those who bought the hogs have had good results from crossing them with ours. The idea was to add greater strength to the hog and to remove some of the weaknesses of our hogs that were probably becoming a little inbred, in a sense. This new stock brought in was helpful.

Mr. Lennard: My experience has been that crossing a large English white boar with our ordinary Yorkshire sow brings about a quicker maturity, by several weeks. We have found a great improvement through using the large English white boar.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they are stronger and heavier.

Mr. McLure: It would be better if the minister were to recommend Prince Edward Island bacon hogs as the best in the world, as he said at one time.

Mr. Gardiner: They are very good.

Item agreed to.

Production service—
Health of animals—

666. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act—further amount required, $130,000.

Mr. Lennard: What if any advance has been made in protecting hogs from rhinitis?

Mr. Gardiner: It is under study in our laboratory here, and also at Lethbridge. No definite result has been obtained to the present time.

Mr. Lennard: There is an article in the Farmers Magazine of June which deals with rhinitis. I shall not take the time to read it, but I recommend it. That article sets out what the state of Kansas is doing, and the Canadian authorities might give some study to it, if they have not already done so. As we know, rhinitis is prevalent in Canada, and is something that should be given closer attention than we are giving it. Too many farmers are careless about it. I have seen it in Ontario, and I should like to know what is being done to isolate this disease.

Mr. Gardiner: There is an exchange of information as between what is being done in Kansas and what we are doing. We have the benefit of the experiments they are carrying on, and they have the benefit of ours. My information is that we have not yet accomplished anything in trying to discover ways and means of preventing the development of the disease, at least nothing that is considered satisfactory. We will have to continue with the customary work.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): What formula was used in the settlement for the loss of animals in Oxford county from trypanosomiasis.

Mr. Gardiner: The market value was the basis of settlement.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): At the time of slaughter?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, at the time they were destroyed.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Was the same formula used in the west?

Mr. Gardiner: In this instance there were not the same quarantine restrictions as in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease, but the basic settlement was the same. We started out with the market value and then added to that because, even up to the present time, these people have not been allowed to bring in more stock. We think we gave reasonable consideration to those facts.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Were the owners satisfied with the settlement?

Mr. Gardiner: We understand that is so. An answer was filed yesterday to a question which set out the objections which were raised by two or three.

Mr. Lennard: What advance has been made in connection with the study of vaccines or preventive measures in the case of an outbreak of swine fever?

Mr. Gardiner: Is the hon. member referring to hog cholera?

Mr. Lennard: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: We do not know of any in Canada at the moment.

Mr. Lennard: I know that.

Mr. Gardiner: The plan that is followed is to stamp it out whenever it does come across the line. We have restrictions at the border all the time which do not permit the shipment of live hogs into Canada. That is because they have hog cholera on the other side of the line. Whenever it comes across we quarantine it and go to work to wipe out the hogs that have the disease.

Mr. Lennard: How is that done?

Mr. Gardiner: We destroy the animal, as we did with foot-and-mouth disease. We kill the hogs and compensate the owners.

Mr. Lennard: Has any experimentation been carried on with a British preparation called crystal violet hog vaccine?

Mr. Gardiner: We do not do much experimenting with hog cholera, as the United States are dealing with it all the time and we get all the information from them with regard to ways and means of handling it. When it does cross the line we handle it in that way.

Mr. Lennard: What way is that?

Mr. Gardiner: We get rid of the animals. In so far as preventive measures are concerned, little of that is done in this country. We get all the information from the other side. If we had an epidemic, if it were more widespread, then perhaps we could adopt better measures.

Mr. Lennard: You do not like them to use vaccine?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Lennard: I understand that crystal violet is supposed not to convey the disease to other animals.

Mr. Gardiner: We have avoided using vaccines for the reason just suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Lennard: I was wondering if any tests had been made of this crystal violet vaccine, which is recommended in a pamphlet issued by the British ministry of agriculture and fisheries.

Mr. Gardiner: In order to test it you would have to have cases of the disease. I can assure my hon. friend that I shall have the officials check this matter to see if anything can be gained.

Item agreed to.

667. To provide for payment of compensation to owners of animals and poultry affected with diseases coming under the operation of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered under circumstances unprovided for under the above act and regulations thereunder, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, and to authorize payment from vote 25 of the main estimates, 1952-53, of compensation in conformity with the terms of the act for the control and extirpation of foot-and-mouth disease, $75,398.

Mr. Nowlan: I notice that a substantial part of this vote is in connection with compensation for poultry flocks destroyed in Nova Scotia as a result of having contracted Newcastle disease. The hon. member for Cumberland and I both have referred to this before. On what basis is compensation paid? Is it a statutory amount, or by agreement?

Mr. Gardiner: In so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, it was on the basis of individual losses. I think I put everything on the record the other night when we were discussing the item in the main estimates, with the exception of the total amount paid. A special arrangement was made in each case in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: Are there any outstanding claims in the province?

Mr. Gardiner: The officials tell me they do not know of any case at the present time.

Mr. Murphy: The first outbreak of Newcastle disease occurred in Lambton, and I am just wondering if those who suffered this calamity in other places in Canada received better treatment than did the person involved in this first outbreak. On what basis is settlement made?

Mr. Gardiner: Prior to 1947 Newcastle disease was not reportable under our contagious diseases act and therefore we were not liable for payment. In 1947 it was brought under the act, and since that time payments have been made on the same basis as for other contagious diseases, namely the value of the stock which is slaughtered as agreed upon at the time.

Mr. Murphy: That does not answer my question. In this case the man was required to have his henhouses or brooder houses torn down and destroyed. I do not think it is fair for anyone to have to suffer a loss like that. As I say, I believe this was the first case and the department had to strain a point in order to cover it. Is compensation paid for equipment in the way of brooder and henhouses?

Mr. Gardiner: We compensate for the eggs and birds but we require a man to clean up his own property.

Mr. Murphy: There would be no compensation for brooder and henhouses that were destroyed?

Mr. Gardiner: We do not require a man to destroy them; we require that they be disinfected.

Mr. Murphy: They were destroyed in that instance.

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gardiner: That must have been before 1947.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Murphy: If the hon. member for Lambton-Kent will keep his seat for a moment it will be better. I know we are both involved in this matter.

Mr. MacKenzie: I was trying to help the hon. member, that is all.

Mr. Murphy: I know you would like to do what some Grits did in the committee I have just finished sitting on.

Mr. Gardiner: There were no chickens there.

Mr. Murphy: No, but there were a lot of eggs laid ahead of time. People in the hatchery business buy expensive chickens. I think the hon. member for Lambton-Kent will bear me out when I say that in this particular case the compensation allowed was far short of the cost of the birds.

Mr. MacKenzie: The hon. member for Lambton West has tried to interject a little politics into this matter, and that is just as far from my mind as it possibly could be. This happened in 1948 and it concerned the Hay hatcheries. It was the first outbreak of Newcastle disease in Canada. I am sure the officials will recall that.

Mr. Murphy: I want to ask the minister if fairer consideration is being given those who suffer losses from this disease?

Mr. Gardiner: We do not appear to have any record of that case. I think I can say that as a result of the experience gained in British Columbia and Nova Scotia more effective assistance is being given than was given previously. I do not think we would be in a position to go back and start to deal with the other cases over again because it might be rather difficult to even establish that it is any better now compared with the conditions that existed then.

Mr. Murphy: Will the minister tell the committee whether shippers of chickens to the other side will still be obliged to have these crates disinfected before they come back into this country? I think the hon. member for Lambton-Kent will agree with me that it is from that point that the disease came into Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the returned crates all have to be disinfected when coming back.

Mr. Argue: There is one matter I should like to draw to the attention of the minister on this item. I have a communication from Mr. Selmar Locken, secretary of the local lodge of the farmers' union at Ratcliffe, Saskatchewan. As the minister knows, Ratcliffe is south of Weyburn, within a few miles of the United States boundary. I am told that the United States border patrolmen informed farmers living alongside the United States boundary a few days that if any of their cattle happened to stray across the boundary the border patrolmen had orders from the United States department of agriculture to shoot them on sight. I was asked to bring the matter to the attention of the minister in order to find out whether the Canadian government has had any consultation with the United States department of agriculture with respect to this instruction issued to the United States border patrolmen; and if Canadian cattle happen to stay across the boundary and are shot, will any compensation be paid to the owners of these cattle?

It was pointed out in this letter that even though farmers may use the greatest possible care in keeping their cattle within their fences, nevertheless the fences may become broken because of a severe storm or for some other reason and cattle may happen to wander across the line. I am asking the minister now whether this matter has been brought to his attention, and if a number of cattle along that boundary should be shot whether any compensation will be paid to the farmers. As the minister well knows, this is the buffer zone. It is not the quarantine zone, and these cattle are perfectly healthy. I think Americans are unduly concerned about a few head of cattle that may stray out of their pasture into the United States for an hour or two, but in any event if United States patrolmen slaughter Canadian cattle owned by farmers along the boundary will those farmers have some claim for compensation?

Mr. Gardiner: We have had no knowledge of any such thing. No report of that kind has been made to us. All I can say is that we will check at once to find whether that is the case and have the whole matter looked into. If that were the case I think we would probably have to put on a patrol rather than give any undertaking to compensate at the present time. I am afraid if we were to give an undertaking to compensate, particularly on the same basis as we have compensated others, there might be a lot of them go across the boundary. I should like to check into the whole matter before saying anything more about it.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his assurance that he will have the matter checked. If Canadian patrolmen are stationed along the boundary to see that cattle do not get into the United States I am sure that will be a perfectly satisfactory arrangement. I should also like to ask the minister whether the department has give any consideration to building a proper game fence along the boundary to prevent livestock straying across now and in the months to come.

Mr. Gardiner: No. Up to the present time I do not think we have given any consideration to building a fence along the boundary line.

Mr. Argue: A game fence.

Mr. Gardiner: A game fence to keep animals from going across.

Mr. Argue: To keep ours at home.

Mr. Gardiner: We have not undertaken that.

Mr. Laing: I should like to say a word on the whole matter of compensation, because I am surprised to see the basis of compensation and the rates paid in Canada subjected to any criticism at all. I think they are the most generous of any country in the world concerning which I have been able to obtain information.

Mr. Argue: I did not criticize them.

Mr. Laing: I am dealing more with the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton West. I have here the amounts payable for Newcastle disease in British Columbia, and I think they are definitely generous. They went up as high as $8.90 in the case of a pedigreed turkey. Of course those are breeding turkeys. They went up as high as $3 for a capon. They were all of that nature. Payments were made of the nature of 17 cents for day-old unsexed chicks, 32 cents for sexed pullets, and so on. Payments were made on a pretty generous basis, and I should like to remind the committee that a number of the people whose flocks were wiped out in British Columbia received amounts in excess of $25,000. I think that is a pretty fair indication of the way these people were treated in Canada.

Federally in the United States not a five-cent piece is paid by way of compensation for Newcastle disease. Some of the states may have certain arrangements, but federally there is no compensation at all. They tell me that they are living down there with the disease at a cost to the industry of 20 per cent. It costs 20 per cent more in the production of both meat and eggs in order to live with the disease and treat it the way it has been treated there. I believe we have been paying on tuberculosis in cattle since 1911, and the whole history of compensation under this provision for disease in Canada has been quite generous. I think it has been well administered and I should like to hear the odd word of approbation instead of constant criticism.

Mr. Charlton: I know the hon. member would want to be fair to the hon. member for Lambton West. I am sure the minister admitted that the compensation paid at the present time is much better than the compensation paid in 1948. I do not think the hon. member for Lambton West was criticizing the amount paid now, but was criticizing the fact that the amount paid now is so much greater—

Mr. Laing: Was he praising it?

Mr. Charlton: —than that paid in 1948.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

670. Freight assistance on western feed grains—further amount required, $11,250,000.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad to see this item included in the estimates again. The minister has heard me make this comment before, and I am not going to take more than thirty seconds of the committee's time to say it again now. I think, and I am sure many others think, the time has arrived for this to be a matter of permanent government policy rather than to be included in the supplementary estimates on a hand to mouth basis. When I raised the matter last year the minister was away from the house, but he probably looked in his Hansard and saw that the distinguished gentleman sitting alongside him, his parliamentary assistant, was reported at page 4878 of Hansard of last year as agreeing with that view and saying he would refer it to the minister or the government. I am not sure whether he did, but I think this to be a very opportune time for the minister, in exchange for this way of providing for the matter in a vote, to undertake to see that in future it is dealt with on a permanent basis.

Mr. Gardiner: The matter has been placed before the government every year by me as minister, and has been accepted annually. It has not been thought advisable to put it in any other form than it is now, but as I said the other day when we were discussing the matter the fact that it has gone on year by year and has not been changed is fair inducement for us to think that probably it is pretty well established. However, none of these things are necessarily absolutely permanent. If I might be permitted to do so, I should like to put on the record a table showing the total tonnage for each province, the total amount of money involved, and what that amounts to per ton by way of freight.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the minister shall have leave to put the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: The table is as follows:

TOTAL TONNAGE ON WHICH FREIGHT ASSISTANCE HAS BEEN PAID AND THE AMOUNT OF MONEY PAID IN CLAIMS FROM OCTOBER 1941 TO MAY 31st, 1952

—	Total Tons	Total amount of money	Average rate per ton over this period
		$ cts.	$ cts.
Ontario	12,288,280	59,366,552 00	4 83
Quebec	11,104,913	66,628,569 38	6 00
New Brunswick	1,286,769	10,626,980 25	8 27
Nova Scotia	1,548,375	14,026,644 80	9 06
Prince Edward Island	430,508	3,899,545 45	9 06
British Columbia	2,580 906	16,687,616 15	6 47
Newfoundland	44,069	895,992 67	20 33
GRAND TOTALS FOR THE PERIOD	29,283,820	172,131,900 70	5 88

Mr. Nowlan: May I say that the opinion in the east is that no amount voted by parliament or spent by this department is better spent than this item.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Charlton.]

Special—

673. Land protection and reclamation; clearing and settlement of new lands under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Charlton: Item No. 48 in the old estimates was the same, and I see that $100,000 was chopped off this year in the regular estimates but it is added here.

Mr. Gardiner: It will be noted that in the general estimates the item was cut from $350,000 to $250,000, but when it came to the supplementaries we thought there should be an equal amount this year and this was put into the estimates. Whether or not it will all be used has not been determined.

Mr. Charlton: Is this assistance to land clearing in the west?

Mr. Gardiner: Not necessarily in the west; it is anywhere in Canada.

Mr. Charlton: But most of it is spent in the west?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, we spent $100,000 in Ontario down around lake Erie a couple of years ago.

Mr. Charlton: This is interesting. On lake Erie?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, Erieau, I think it is called. It is south of Chatham, anyway, and there is an area there, as I recall it, where they have about 1,500 acres very intensively operated for the production of vegetables.

There is a dike alongside which protects the area from the lake. As a matter of fact, I think the land is below lake level a little and there has been a dike there for years. People had actually built their summer homes on the dike and the waves coming in from lake Erie were washing away the dike. Some of the houses had even been undermined.

The provincial government and the farmers had been carrying on, and the farmers had been taxed so much an acre. The provincial government was putting up a certain amount for a number of years, but they found the process pretty slow and they applied to us for some help. We put up dollar for dollar with the province for one year and completed it. I understand that if it had not been completed the washing away that has taken place in some other areas along the lake is small compared to what would have happened in that district. It was just a speed-up, and we used $100,000 on that occasion.

Item agreed to.

675. To provide for price adjustment on overweight hogs, $100,000.

Mr. Argue: I would like to have an explanation from the minister of the formula that is being used for price adjustment, and to ask how producers can obtain price adjustments.

Mr. Gardiner: That has to do with the request we made to farmers at the time the foot-and-mouth disease hit first, to hold their hogs off the market until they were further instructed. Three weeks prior to the 19th April we said that the 19th April would be the last date on which the adjustment would be paid. This $100,000 was to take care of extra payments on account thereof.

Mr. Argue: To whom is the money paid?

Mr. Gardiner: The money went to the hog producers through the packing houses that bought the hogs.

Mr. Argue: Has this anything to do with a man who sold his hogs for 14 cents a pound and feels that he has a price adjustment coming to him? Or is this something else?

Mr. Gardiner: The only hogs upon which payment was made were hogs that did go overweight which otherwise would have been A or B. It did not apply to the so-called extra heavyweight hogs because they were probably overweight before.

Mr. Argue: Have the farmers been issued their cheques?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. The other man you have just spoken of has been taken care of by the packing houses in many cases. Where farmers were paid only 14 cents and should have been paid 18 or 19, under the arrangement we made for canning the pork the packing houses in many cases should have made adjustments and in many cases they have done so. I do not think every farmer who was entitled to it made application, but many of them who did received the adjustment.

Mr. Argue: This is not for hogs that are graded extra heavy with the price quoted at 14 cents a pound.

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. Argue: Those farmers cannot hope to receive anything more.

Mr. Gardiner: I would not say that. I have a letter on my desk today from a farmers' union which says a certain farmer did get an adjustment but another did not, and they want to know how the one farmer did get it. The only reply I could give was to write whatever packing house he delivered the hogs to, and probably there will be some adjustment. If there is not he should write to us, and we will take it up.

Mr. Argue: What adjustment is given?

Mr. Gardiner: The case mentioned here was 4 cents a pound. Apparently the farmer received 15 cents or 14 cents and they later put it up 4 cents.

Mr. Bryce: Was that discontinued after the 19th April?

Mr. Gardiner: The provision referred to in the estimates was, but the other matter has nothing to do with this. It is between the farmer and the packing plant.

Mr. Bryce: The farmer can claim yet?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

311. Departmental administration, $1,118,455.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question. Has the postal department considered denying the royal Canadian postal facilities to communist Endicott and his communist peace friends?

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Would you repeat your question?

Mr. Fraser: I wonder whether the Post Office Department has considered denying the royal Canadian postal facilities to communist Endicott—the one they call "doctor", though I do not know why—and his communist peace friends who are continually sending through the mails peace literature. I wonder if the minister wants to answer now, or whether he would like me to ask a couple more questions.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Chairman, there is no possibility of the department uncovering the matter. If it is in a sealed envelope, I am sorry to answer that we cannot do anything. Where we can find obscenity and things like that we do act.

Mr. Fraser: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think some of these letters are going through unsealed. Members of parliament have received unsealed letters containing Endicott literature. I should not say it is literature, because it is not; it is just trash. Then there are letters from this peace union which are also unsealed. Members of parliament are receiving them, as do other people throughout the country. There should be some regulation, and I imagine there is, to prevent that stuff going through.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Chairman, we will be happy to do whatever can be done in such cases. If there is a contentious matter we refer it to the Department of Justice to decide; or in other cases we refer the items to the attorney general of the province for action.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I just want to finish out a couple more questions. Since the department put in the one mail a day system in residential districts across Canada there has been great dissatisfaction among the postal carriers owing to the fact that it does not mean one postal delivery a day to them but two postal deliveries; and in some cases these men have to make between four and six hundred calls a day. There are one or two routes in Peterborough on which the postmen have to make 600 calls a day. There is a feeling amongst postal delivery men that their pay is not in line with the pay received by policemen or firemen in the various municipalities in which they are working. The postmen feel, too, that since the office workers in the post office receive overtime pay they should also get overtime pay. Is the department doing anything in regard to that?

In the United States postal workers receive what is called special service pay after ten years of service. Is the department considering any such recognition here.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I think it is only fair to say that all questions of salary come under the civil service commission. So far as the overtime question is concerned, it is actually under a national joint council survey.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask a question of the minister.

Mr. Fraser: The minister never answered the question concerning the possibility of having two deliveries a day.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Perhaps I might make a statement on that question. I think it will be immediately apparent to almost anyone that it is impossible to give as good a delivery service on a one delivery per day basis as it was formerly on a minimum of two deliveries a day; therefore, from the standpoint of service to the public, the Post Office Department looks forward to the day when conditions will be such that it will be appropriate to reinstate the minimum two deliveries per day.

On the other hand, I think I should mention that there have been many expressions of opinion from patrons who are now receiving one delivery a day that this service is adequate. I must admit that these expressions of opinion are from private individuals, and are not from business concerns who happen to have located in residential sections and therefore are only receiving the one delivery a day. The department fully realizes the disabilities which these business concerns might conceivably suffer and we have therefore, whenever circumstances have permitted, made a special study of these cases with a view to making such rearrangements as the circumstances permit to improve the service. Today we receive very few complaints indeed, and this in itself I think is an indication that the department has been able to overcome some of the disadvantages which were brought to our attention immediately the change was made from two deliveries to one delivery. We are not contemplating any change in the one delivery system at the present time but, as I indicated above, we have not ruled out the possibility of reinstating two deliveries when conditions are favourable.

At this point I might mention that to re-establish two deliveries under present circumstances would involve an additional expenditure of over $3 million yearly.

Mr. Fraser: Owing to the fact that there is only one delivery a day, the post office is losing money. I know of cases where mail is coming from Montreal to Peterborough via express. It was never carried that way before. Mail is passing between other towns and villages via express instead of postal delivery so the people to whom the mail is addressed will receive immediate delivery instead of having to wait until the next day.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): It is possible, in some classes of mail, that we have had to meet some new competition. I believe that over all we really did economize only to a reasonable amount. Last year our revenues were $122,266,674, compared with $105,533,994 for the year before.

Mr. Coldwell: I have a point connected with economy. The department has been economizing, and the member for Peterborough West has raised one phase of that economy which has been irritating some people. I believe the department is entirely overlooking the inconveniences that are caused in many country places by the economies that have been put into effect in the rural areas. I know of cases where postmasters in the small places, who are putting in what happens to be almost a full day and providing the premises, are getting as little as $85 or less a month. That however, is not the point I intended to make.

I have before me a complaint from one of my constituents that a small office in the province of Saskatchewan—I might as well name it, the hamlet of Surbiton—has had a change of status. This is a farming area, a good community, but where unfortunately for me so far as the territorial extent of my constituency goes the farms have been largely consolidated and the population has become depleted in the past two or three decades. Last January the status of this office was changed from an accounting office to a non-accounting office, and that curtails the service automatically.

In the non-accounting offices the postmaster cannot issue money orders for more than $15, and so far as postal notes are concerned he is restricted as to numbers and denomination, etc. Such an office is not allowed to issue radio licences. In those areas the greatest inconvenience is caused to patrons of the post office during the winter months of the year when it is difficult to go long distances by automobile. In that period, as in other periods, if a person wishes to send a mail order or remit money through the post office in an amount exceeding $15 he has to ask the postmaster at the local post office to send to an accounting office for the money order. It may be that there are only one, two or three trains a week, and consequently you can understand the tremendous inconvenience that is caused under the circumstances.

I believe the department does not really understand the extent of the inconvenience in the rural districts of provinces that are somewhat sparsely settled like the province of Saskatchewan where, as I say, you have consolidated farms and great distances between farms. Many of these people are quite well to do, particularly in the area I am discussing. At times they are unable to get to an accounting office, and so are unable to get a postal note or money order for more than $15 in order to get supplies they need from the cities of Saskatoon, Regina or some other place.

I am bringing this to the attention of the postmaster, because I believe this is a false economy. It is always false economy when lack of service of this description causes great inconvenience to post office patrons. After all, the post office is, to a large extent, a public service. We know it sometimes operates at a deficit, but those who live in the cities have all the conveniences and are asking, as the hon. member for Peterborough West did, for more conveniences. I say some consideration should be given to the people who live in the rural areas and are obliged to do their business at these non-accounting offices.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I may say to my hon. friend that it all depends on circumstances and the demand in the locality. When we are asked to give authority to issue money orders in large amounts, we investigate each case and accordingly grant the authority to write money orders for greater amounts where the circumstances justify, and the postmaster is competent to undertake the accounting.

Mr. Coldwell: I am going to ask the minister to investigate this particular case at Surbiton.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. Coldwell: There are a number of other cases. I did not take a note of one that was given to me in the southern part of the province when I was there. I could not tell you the name of the village or hamlet. There are other cases, however. They may not be brought to the attention of the minister as I have brought this one to his attention at the present time. Perhaps by the very fact that he says something might be done if cases are brought to his attention, those who read Hansard or who read the newspapers will be enabled to bring other cases to his attention.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I shall be pleased to have those cases investigated.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, I also have a case of false economy to bring to the attention of the minister, but I shall wait until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: We were considering item 311.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I had given the Postmaster General notice that I had another economy measure to discuss with him after eight o'clock. This has to do with the service given by the Post Office Department at Furness post office, located on the Saskatchewan side of the fourth meridian. About 20 years ago two or three small country post offices were closed in order that the residents of this district might have rural mail service. A man by the name of W. A. McLeod was giving good service, though receiving only $500 a year. This service was given twice a week over a 24-mile route, serving 31 householders. He had a four-year contract which expired on March 31, 1951. On March 30 service was suspended because Mr. McLeod refused to renew his contract at the old rate of $500.

During the debate last session the Postmaster General told us that the average increase was 17 per cent. Mr. McLeod put in a tender at $600, just slightly more than the 17 per cent increase, and indicated that he would not do the work for any less. That, I might add, is not a very big wage anywhere. In the midst of its economy drive, headed by the former Postmaster General, the Post Office Department would not increase the amount from $500. After the residents were without mail service for nearly three months they got in touch with me and asked me to see the officials here in Ottawa. I got busy, starting away down the line, and continuing until I reached the deputy postmaster general. I was not able to get any increase for some considerable time. Finally they said they would have to do something about it, and offered to raise the amount to $600. By that time the man who had been carrying on —and he is not a young man any more— had found other work to do. They were unable to get anyone else to tender. The postmaster at Furness offered to do the work for $600 per year until such time as he could not do it by motorcar. The department decided that was not satisfactory. The result has been that those people have been without mail service of any kind. They do their business in Lloydminster, a town more than 20 miles away from most of those people.

I feel they are entitled to at least rural mail service, even though it costs a little more than $600 a year. I believe the amount would have to be increased before anyone could be secured to do the work. While people in other parts of the country are enjoying daily mail service—and even complaining about that, with their mail delivered to their doors—those people away out in the country, the pioneers, have been without mail service for more than a year. They received their last mail a year ago last March.

Possibly the former Postmaster General was sent to the bench so we might have someone else heading the administration of the department. We now have a new man there. He is a good-natured looking fellow, and always has a smile. I do not know that he will always be able to say that he can grant requests made, but I would ask him to take this matter under advisement.

Mr. Abbott: I hope not; it would be hard on the treasury.

Mr. Fair: Let me remind the Minister of Finance that when he and the Minister of National Revenue want to levy taxes against the farmers in that section of the country, they see to it that those taxes are paid, and that they pay interest on the amount of unpaid taxes. So perhaps the Minister of Finance should reconsider his objections.

I have had a number of letters in the last few months from rural mail couriers who are asking that something be done for them. I know they are operating under the tender system. As I have explained to many of them, if they tender too low it is their own fault. But here was an instance of a man who had tendered at a reasonable rate but who will not receive the contract. He becomes fed up with the department, and will not work for it any longer because in the meantime he has obtained something else to do that is paying better wages.

I believe that on the whole, when we compare their pay to that received by other people in the post office as well as in other departments, the rural couriers are doing their job too cheaply. These men who go out in all kinds of weather, both winter and summer, are deserving of much better pay and better consideration than they are now receiving. The prices of the cars they have to buy to give the service have increased, as have also all other expenses. This should be taken into consideration when contracts are being let.

I hope the Postmaster General will give the people in the area to which I have referred the service to which they are entitled, because they are still Canadians, even though they are away out in Alberta.

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Chairman, I wish at the outset to congratulate the Prime Minister upon the very fine choice he made as Postmaster General. I know that once the minister becomes familiar with his department—and he will soon do that—he will do credit to that portfolio.

I do not wish to be critical at this late stage in the session, but I wish to say a word on behalf of the rural mail couriers. They are a group of men and women—because they are not all men; many of them in my own constituency are ladies—who go out in all kinds of weather to carry the queen's mail up and down the concessions and side roads, carrying letters and papers to the farmers living there. They give this service every day, winter and summer, good weather and bad, hot or cold. I do not know of any finer group of men and women anywhere giving service to the people of Canada. But I do not think the government is fair in the wages or salaries it pays these people. This is one group of government servants not being paid what they deserve. Someone may say, "Well, what about the tender system? It may have its imperfections, but these persons have taken the jobs on a tender basis. The only way they could receive more money would be to throw up their contracts, and re-tender".

I do not think this is good enough. When a man is giving good service in other branches of government employment, I know an effort is made to raise his pay. This is done, too, in private business. We try to give them what they deserve. The same does not hold true in connection with rural mail couriers. They are allowed to continue year after year, four-year term after four-year term, without any change. I know some in my own riding who have been giving service for more than thirty years, and in all that time have received only one increase in pay.

I know it has been said that a committee will be set up at the next session to reconsider the whole system, but that is not good enough. We want these people to get a salary increase and we would like to see them get it now. There are certain ways of doing it. One would be to provide a supplementary payment as was done in 1948. I think the government and the Postmaster General should take this matter under consideration to see if something cannot be done to assist these noble government employees.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that in these last few hours of the session the Postmaster General will realize that some of the usual amenities fall by the wayside, but on behalf of the official opposition I have pleasure in congratulating him upon his appointment to the office he now holds and wishing him every success. There are a few things I should like to bring up this evening on these estimates, some of which have been mentioned already by my colleagues.

In particular I should like to refer to a matter which was mentioned briefly this afternoon by the hon. member for Peterborough West; that is, the reversion to two deliveries of mail a day in urban centres. This is a matter which claimed our attention last year and on which many of us spoke. The claim was made by the Post Office Department that economy was made possible by reducing this service, but I find on looking at the estimates that whereas the department budgeted last year for $97 million its actual expenditure was in excess of that figure. I hope the minister will have figures at hand to show the real results of this move.

I realize full well that the matter of one a day, two a day, three a day or four a day delivery is of concern only to urban municipalities and consequently has little relation to the over-all picture. I do know that in adopting this new delivery plan a great deal of overtime was necessary, as well as the employment of additional inside staff to do the extra sorting required. When the minister comes to answer questions I should like him to indicate what was paid out last year for overtime and for the employment of additional inside staff.

The hon. member for Peterborough West asked a question which was answered, but as I did not hear the answer I shall have to read it in Hansard tomorrow. I do hope that consideration is being given to the reinstatement of two a day delivery for residential walks in urban centres. This is a matter of concern to all people in business or in the professions in our growing municipalities. I do not think I can do better than describe a situation which exists in Hamilton in what is currently regarded by the Post Office Department as a residential walk.

Within that walk there is a club which possibly could do with one delivery a day. Next door to that club is the Bell Telephone Company. Next door to the Bell Telephone Company is a well-known restaurant above which are a number of professional offices. Next door again is a hotel which also contains many shops and professional offices. Around the corner and down the side street is the head office of one of the largest canneries in the Dominion of Canada. Down the back street is the Y.M.C.A. and a stockbroker's office, as well as several other business offices. I think I have given enough information to indicate the character of this so-called residential walk.

Within the past six months it was necessary for me to move my office from a location which was serviced with three a day delivery. I moved only three and a half blocks and have one a day delivery at 8.30 in the morning. This means that mail from Toronto, Montreal, Chicago or New York does not reach me until twenty-four hours later. I know a similar situation exists in the business and professional offices located in the block in which my office is located, and which is only three and a half blocks from the centre of the city of Hamilton.

During the past few years, with the shortage of building materials and so on, many people have moved out of their uptown offices into what was formerly residential accommodation which had been converted into office space because of its central location. I suppose the answer to this complaint will be that these persons could go to the central post office, which in this case is only six blocks away, rent a post office box and collect their mail. We would be glad to do that, but unfortunately the central post office has no boxes for sale. All of that type of accommodation is taken up. One is faced with the situation that unless his clients and customers and other correspondents use special delivery in each case, his mail will be delayed by twenty-four hours.

I have had numerous letters from people in Hamilton which I do not propose to read into the record at this stage, but they prove that mail for delivery within the city of Hamilton has taken as much as three days when the distance involved was only half a mile.

I am sure the Postmaster General will be the first to say that a situation like this cannot be condoned in a department which pretty well pays its own way. Within a short time we have had an increase in rates. We all realize that costs have increased, and I am sure the businessmen of this country consider that postage is the least of their expenses. I am sure also that they would be willing to pay more for post office service if they could obtain it. But when one is stymied at every point, when one cannot receive mail which he knows is in transit either by applying at the central post office or by having it delivered at his premises, it is indeed a cause for some concern. So I ask the Postmaster General to tell us what is contemplated, and I hope he will say it is not going to be very long until at least two a day delivery is reinstated on residential walks within municipalities.

With this in mind I think I should read into the record a rather amusing commentary which appeared in a local newspaper. It is headed, "Those were the days", and reads as follows:

> Maddened businessmen impatiently awaiting letters which travel from city to city across Canada with all the speed of a pony express are wondering just how much progress there has been in the past sixty years. In April, 1892, the postmaster for Hamilton was pleased to announce an extra afternoon delivery of mail in the downtown area. This made not two, not three, but four deliveries of mail daily. Local mail received at the general post office by 2 p.m. was promised delivery the same day. Today it can easily take a letter two or three days to travel three blocks in the city. To secure any reasonable guarantee of early delivery a letter must have a 10-cent special delivery stamp attached. For householders there is only one delivery a day, sometimes late in the afternoon. Looking back at 1892, it looks as though at least in one department the clock has been turned back a very long way.

I realize that all departments of the government have great problems in these days of rising costs and demands for economy, but in a department which has consistently had considerable revenue flowing into it, as well as expenses out of it, it seems to me there is very little reason for curtailing a service which after all keeps the business, industrial, commercial and professional life in this country flowing. I hope the minister has taken all this into consideration and will give us a favourable answer. I hope he will reinstate if not three at least two deliveries a day on the residential walks many of which now service commercial and professional enterprises within municipalities.

There is one other matter of which I wish to speak, and it is one that has been brought up in the house on many occasions. I refer to the problem of charges on food parcels to the United Kingdom. I do not think there is an hon. member in the house who is not aware of the explanations that have been given on former occasions. We have been told many times that one of the mail problems is the reluctance of the post office department of the United Kingdom to make any reasonable concessions in the matter of postal rates in their country. However, we live in a country of plenty and there are a great many people in Canada who have friends and relatives in the old land. They are worried about them. They would like to help them out if only to the extent of one food parcel a month, but when they take their parcels to a post office they find all too frequently that the cost of the postage on the parcel exceeds the cost of the food contained therein. They are quite willing to buy the food and send it to their friends and relatives in the old land, but they cannot see why the government of Canada should not go along with them at least part of the way in some sort of alleviation of the added expense of postal charges.

I have here a letter which has come to me within the current month. Again I shall not read it into the record because it is the old story. Why can we not have lower postal rates on food parcels to Great Britain? As my second main question I ask the Postmaster General whether his department cannot consider some concessions in postal rates on food parcels to the old country without regard to the fact that the United Kingdom cannot accede to any request that may be made by this government for collaboration in that respect.

In an effort to co-operate with the Postmaster General's department and with the house in general I shall only make these two requests. In the first instance I ask that two a day delivery at least be reinstated on residential walks throughout the country, and in the second place I ask that serious reconsideration be given the postal rates on food parcels to Great Britain.

Mr. MacKenzie: Mr. Chairman, I quite appreciate that at this time of the session any long drawn out remarks would be very unpopular. As a matter of fact I am very glad the Minister of Public Works has left, because he was giving me a rather frowning look a few minutes ago, and I do not want to be diverted from the few observations I should like to make. I quite agree with those who have spoken that across the board economy should be practised in all government departments; but do not forget that the Post Office Department goes hand in hand with the development and progress of our great dominion. I think it is one of the last departments where we should make any drastic cuts in service in order to practise economy, because to me that would be false economy.

I suppose this question has come up every time the estimates of the Post Office Department have come before the house. I want to speak for a moment about rural mail delivery and the rural set-up as we have it in this country. Rural mail delivery was established in Canada some 44 years ago. That is a long time ago. The riding of Lambton-Kent which I have the honour to represent has some 80 rural mail services. There are in Canada approximately 5,200 rural mail routes with about 7,500 side services, which means that we have all told around 12,700 rural mail routes and side services throughout Canada. These couriers travel approximately 120,000 miles a day and deliver mail to approximately 375,000 boxes throughout the dominion, so they render quite a service and the work they do is quite extensive.

As hon. members will recall, last year the Post Office Act was amended so the postal department could adjust salaries paid under rural mail contracts that were less than $1,000 per annum. To me that was not a forward step. To me that did not solve the problems of rural mail delivery at all. As a matter of fact I am inclined to think it rather complicated the situation because at the moment there is a certain amount of discrimination. The person who is receiving under $1,000 gets his salary adjusted but the person who is receiving over $1,000 must throw the route open to public tender; and under the Post Office Act it is emphasized so often by the officials that the lowest tender must be accepted provided the party is reliable and furnishes good bondsmen.

The service was started under a public tender system and the tender is for a contract for a full year. I do not know of any other branch of the post office service that operates under a public tender system. There is no other branch having to do with Her Majesty's mail that I know of that employs the contract system. Don't forget that the janitors and caretakers in the post offices do not tender for their positions. Their jobs are set up for them and the positions are awarded through the civil service commission. There is a mail courier in Watford, Ontario, who has delivered mail for some 42 years. I would think that is something of a record. During those 42 years of service he has never to my knowledge had a public tender called because he had established himself and could not afford to take the chance of throwing the route open to public tender. He did get a small adjustment when the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act was inaugurated during 1947 and 1948. A small adjustment was made then, but since that time no adjustment has been made. I would say, too, that in the suburban areas where the contracts are made for four years initially, the number of boxes may have been comparatively small but boxes may since have been established all along the line and the carrier may have twice as many boxes to serve. There is no way around that.

Again I say the system of public tender is wrong. I quite appreciate that the post office officials, efficient as they may be, feel that it is a difficult job to set up a system where public tender is not necessary; but I wonder what the deputy postmaster general or some of the senior officials, who get a fair salary as the public accounts will show, would think if they were asked to put in a public tender to compete for their jobs. You would say, and they would say, that would not be fair at all. Of course it is not fair, but at the same time that is the system they have followed throughout the years with respect to these carriers. I would say that there are a lot of injustices in the present set-up.

Under the present Post Office Act there are no regulations which say that rural mail service can be extended on this spur or that spur. It is left entirely to the discretion of one or two men in the Post Office Department, and I do not think that is a fair way of doing it.

I am quite pleased that the Postmaster General has stated that he is willing to set up a committee to study this problem and report to the house, as a possible method of getting away from the public tender system. Well, that is all right I quite agree; but it is nothing new. That has been suggested for many years. The fact is that it has never been approved and although it is a good idea it would be so slow in operation that I do not think it worth while at the present time.

So I would say to the Post Office Department that they should re-establish the system in force in the postal service during 1947 and 1948. They then gave the rural mail carriers and those handling the mail some degree of equality of pay across the board. I think that could be done again; but this system you have now, the $1,000 plan, gets away from the idea entirely and you have the same inequalities of pay that you had before. I would entreat the Post Office Department to re-enact the Mail Contracts Supplemental Payments Act again to take care of the injustices that do exist in the post office service, and specifically among rural mail carriers, until such time as you have a committee set up which can bring in something that will be fair, equitable and just to a body of men and women who do give good service in this country, and who are not used as fairly as other post office employees.

[Mr. MacKenzie.]

Mr. Hosking: I take part in this debate because I think it would be advantageous to the minister, who is assuming a new portfolio, to hear and learn some of the problems that confront his department as they are known to members who live in various sections of the country which are serviced by his department.

I would like to congratulate him at the outset on his announcement that at the next session a committee will be set up to look into the service given and the operation of his department. I believe he will obtain much information from that committee which will make it easier for him to give the service that his department is capable of giving. I think we as members should appreciate the fact that he has made this announcement. However, I think it would be wise at this time to state a few of the principles upon which his department has grown.

The postal department has always been very proud of its record and of the tradition that "the mail must go through". As long as I can remember I have always understood that there was nothing more important than Her Majesty's or His Majesty's mail, and that the mail must go through. That feeling is built upon tradition, and is one which most of the employees of the department fulfil at all times.

I cannot help but feel that in the last year it has been greatly jeopardized. In fact I do not think I would be very far wrong in suggesting that the instigation of the one delivery a day gave all employees across the board a feeling that it did not matter if the mail did not go through. To me that is one of the serious objections to this one delivery a day. If that change has broken down the high spirit, the integrity, and the strong feeling of urgency all employees should have that the mail must be delivered, that they must get it out, that it is not theirs, that they are handling it for the Queen and it must go out; if the feeling that they need not bother delivering the mail today has permeated those delivering the mail, then I think we have done a great disservice to this country.

I live in a city that is affected by this one delivery a day in the residential areas, and I hope this minister will make every effort to re-instil into his staff that wonderful spirit, the esprit de corps that they had, the thought that they have an important job which they must do and which they must not leave unfinished. If he can do that he will be worthy of the gratitude of the citizens of this country. I am quite confident that he is able to do that, but the job is not easy.

Speaking of the rural mail carriers I would suggest that efficiency is very important in the government, but I do not believe there is any more efficient way to operate our rural carriers than on the tender system. I would point this out to the minister, and to ask him for some action, if possible, during this year. I would have no complaint about the tender system if the cost of living were not rising; but just imagine a person who tendered for a mail route four years ago and today is operating at that same tender price, when we all know that the cost of his gasoline, of his automobile and of his own time has practically doubled. Now he is in a position where he is not adequately paid, and the only way he can have any adequate readjustment is by asking to have his route put up for tender.

Everyone knows there are many mail carriers, and I would point this out if I may. In my riding the best rural mail carriers are those who have been doing the job for some time. For some reason or other they are better regarded by the people they serve. Perhaps it is because they operated in a different era than those who are starting today. But I am quite confident that they give the best service, and they are the ones who have to put their jobs up for tender, not because they want more money for doing the job but in order to cover the increased costs of operation and of their living.

I would ask the minister, therefore, to give every consideration to these people, and to find some means of giving better treatment to the employee who is most conscientious, the one who has operated for years and years and about whom the members of parliament hear no complaints whatever. Some way should be found of adjusting the salaries of these employees in order to balance up the increased cost of living. If the minister could do that he would be doing a service to all the people who enjoy the benefits of our wonderful mail service in this country.

Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that my deskmate, the hon. member for Kent, who is absent through illness, has asked me to say that he has exactly the same feelings as those I have expressed tonight.

Mr. McLure: At the outset I might say, Mr. Chairman, that on Monday, June 9, when the Postmaster General introduced his estimates, I was anxious to congratulate him on being appointed to this high position in the cabinet. Let me say to him that we may be criticizing his department, but I want him to understand that my criticisms will be directed against the department and not against him because he is a new man on the job. A year from now, if we all come back, we might then direct our criticisms against the Postmaster General. I would say to the Postmaster General that the best slogan for him to adopt would be to be like the postage stamp; if it is to be of any use, it must stick to its job. The Postmaster General must do the same. Some postmasters general took too active a part in politics, especially in by-elections, but they are not with us now so we had better leave them alone.

With reference to the postal department, I do want to say that it serves more people and comes in contact with more people than possibly all the other departments put together. It is a great manufacturing department. It is the one department that manufactures a little article called a stamp; no one really knows the cost of it, but I am told that it is about 1/100th of a cent. This department sells some stamps for 1 cent, some for 2 cents, some for 3 cents and a huge number of them at 4 cents. Then they sell some more costing 5 cents, 10 cents and as high as 20 cents. It is for that reason I call the department a great manufacturing department, and that is where the profits come from.

For years I have been interested in this department, because there was always a surplus of $10 million, $12 million and sometimes as high as $13 million. All of a sudden this huge profit disappeared and became a deficit of over $1 million. I do not think that should have happened. After having the benefit of increasing the rates by 50 per cent, the department shows a decline from a profit of $10 million or $13 million to a deficit. It is very difficult for me to understand how that could take place. I am not going to deal with many generalities, because I have too many problems nearer and dearer to me than the generalities of the postal department. I see the Minister of Public Works putting on his glasses to get another look at me.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I have nothing but the highest praise for the great postal system of this young Canada of ours. We have a post office in Charlottetown—I am not speaking of the building; that will come later—that is exceptionally well run. I doubt if any province has a post office of the same size with the same number of employees that is giving any greater service to the people. Right from the postmaster and the inspector down to the mail carriers and the stamp vendor—about whom I shall have a few words to say later on—all give good service.

I believe the department has not dealt properly with our province because it has not been made a postal zone the same as the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Why should we as a province, with all the rights of any other province, be tied to the Saint John post office? Here we have a post office which is just as good in the way it is set up and the men who are employed as the Saint John or Halifax post offices. At the same time we do not enjoy the authority to conduct our own business.

Let us look at the set-up. First of all the department at Ottawa sets up a regional controller with a head office in Moncton. He takes charge of the maritime area including the Magdalen islands. Under him is Mr. W. R. Ingram, district director of postal services at Saint John, New Brunswick. He has control over New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen islands. There is a separate district director at Halifax for the province of Nova Scotia. Formerly Prince Edward Island was able to conduct its own business, but the department at Ottawa abolished our district. Now what happens? We have a very capable post office inspector at Charlottetown, Mr. Coyle. We also have a postmaster, Mr. Connolly. Both are good men. We shall suppose, and I have known of such cases, someone from a rural section comes in with some trouble, or perhaps to obtain some article he requires. He goes in to see the postmaster at Charlottetown who says, "You need that, and we will get it for you". He must then go through to the post office inspector, but that is right next door to him in Charlottetown. Then they must go through to Mr. Ingram in Saint John, New Brunswick. Well, it depends on the time of day when they get through to him by telephone or telegraph. He may be out. Then when they get through to him he cannot decide it. He has to go through to Mr. W. C. McEachern, the regional director at Moncton. It may perhaps be his day off and he may be out golfing. Then Mr. McEachern cannot act. He must go back to Ottawa. Instead of our doing our own business, by the time it gets back to Ottawa it may be a week end; they do not work Saturdays or Sundays, and on Monday they are still playing golf.

It takes from seven to ten days for this little item to be settled, when it could be settled in ten minutes by our own inspector or our own post office man. I want to say again that the department here had no right to abolish the district director and take away from the province of Prince Edward Island, and from the city of Charlottetown in particular, the right to run its own business with regard to postal matters.

I put this matter up to the Postmaster General last year, but he is now gone; nothing was done about it. It was never mentioned, it probably never came up for consideration.

So much for the postal department. I now want to deal for a few minutes with another matter. When the Postmaster General was introducing his estimates the other night he made a statement that came close to the hearts of many on this side of the house—because we have been pleading for it ever since 1945—when he announced that it was his intention at the next session to set up a parliamentary committee to study the problems of the rural mail couriers. This announcement was received with rejoicing by most of us.

I am rather surprised at what has happened tonight. When I turn back to other occasions when a number of us were speaking on this particular subject, we find that there was complete silence on the other side of the house. But tonight we find two or three of them wanting to get on the bandwagon. We are glad to have their assistance; and when the time comes for the Postmaster General to set up this committee I am sure it will be able to lay down a plan that will do away with the discrimination that exists today and that will give these mail couriers the treatment they deserve. They are among the finest people we have employed in any way. They are faithful. Let us deal with them as they deserve to be dealt with. I am sure a committee will assist the Postmaster General.

For the benefit of the Postmaster General in view of the decision he has already made, namely that he is going to set up this committee, I just want to give an idea of some of the discrimination that exists in the mail routes. I am going to deal only with the district I know, namely my own constituency of Queens.

In this constituency the couriers have different routes to travel. As I said, I am going to deal only with those I know. I am going to take them from the standpoint of the distances travelled and the services being rendered. I just want to show the Postmaster General what discrimination exists. For instance, I have before me contracts for six miles, and in those contracts I find a difference of $100 for doing the same work, travelling the same distance, over the same conditions of roads and giving the same service. All of them give good service; but even in a distance of six miles, here is $100 of a difference. Then we go to the distance of eight miles, and we find there a difference of $120, for the same class of work, giving the same service. Then when you move along to the distance of nine miles, and the figure is still going up—we find a $150 difference in the contracts. Then coming to the contracts for ten miles, I find there is a difference of $250 a year between contracts covering ten miles. Let us go a little bit further and go to the 13-mile limit. Here are contracts of men driving 13 miles, over practically the same kind of roads—most of them dirt roads, as we say—both of them having the same conditions in the winter and the same conditions in the summer. Here we find a difference of $310 in two or three contracts.

That is not so bad. We now come to the worst ones. We first come to the contracts with regard to 14 miles. Here we find a difference of $360. You can take these and follow the thing along, but let us go to the case of a man driving 15 miles. Here is a difference of $690 on a mail contract. One contractor drives 15·2 miles. He serves 48 boxes and gets $875 making six trips a week. Another contractor drives 15 miles; the distance is a little bit less. He serves 46 boxes, two boxes less, and receives $1,565. He was shrewder in getting his contract through. That man, at $1,565, is not getting one nickel too much; but the other poor fellow is being gypped by the department to the tune of $690 a year and probably does not know it. I am not mentioning any names here because the department can easily turn them up and find out exactly who they are.

The same thing goes on with respect to contractors driving 16 miles. I am not going to tire you with too many of these but there is a $260 difference there. With respect to those driving 16 miles over a fair road, there is a difference in their contracts of $510. That is discrimination of the worst kind. Whether it is due to patronage, whether it is due to political influence or to the system of tendering I leave it to the department to judge.

Then we come to another case. that of a man driving 17 3/10 miles daily. He serves only 28 boxes and receives $930. His neighbour, on the next mail route, drives only 17 miles, serves 12 boxes more than the first man, and receives $1,440, or a difference of $510. These routes are within a few miles of each other.

For the benefit of the department, and so these facts will be on record, I should like to set out a few more cases. This refers to one man driving 18 miles. As a matter of fact there are four of these in Prince Edward Island, and there is a difference in their contracts of $600.

Let us take another case. One of these men drives 21 miles. As a matter of fact I think the actual distance is 21 2/10. I know the route very well because I have been over it lots of times. This man serves 42 boxes and receives $1,140. He makes six trips a week, and must travel over a bad road in the spring. The other courier drives 21 1/2 miles and serves 76 boxes, and for this receives $1,760, or nearly $600 more; and he does less work.

Then let us go on to another case. The first of these mail couriers drives 22 1/2 miles, serves 51 boxes and receives $1,200, while his neighbour who drives four miles less gets $360 a year more.

That is your tender system for you! The worst of it is that the tender system is not entirely to blame. I think the department here in Ottawa is to blame for a good deal of it.

Then we find a much greater discrepancy when we deal with longer routes. I have in mind one man who drives 27 miles and another who drives 28. There is a great difference here, both in the service given and the number of boxes served. The man serving the greater number of boxes—I believe he serves 73—receives $1,440, while the other man who serves a lesser number and drives a shorter distance receives $2,200. As I said a moment ago, the man who is receiving $2,200 is not getting a nickle too much. I could go on to give the facts respecting others who drive 30 or 35 miles, but I believe the information I have given is sufficient to indicate to the minister that there is great discrimination here.

I have a further criticism to make of the Post Office Department. Only a short time ago a contract was up for tender. This was in connection with a 15-mile route. The man who had held the job threw up the tender because he said he could not make it pay at that price, and he had no help on his farm. I believe the amount received was $1,550. This man went to his neighbour, who had plenty of help, and the neighbour said, "Yes, I will take it off your hands, if I can get it." The department said, "No, you cannot have it; we have to call for tenders." Tenders were called for and, in order to be sure he would get it, this man put in a tender for $1,525, and felt sure he would get it. He received no notice that his tender had not been accepted. However, a short time later he received notification to this effect: "No; we are going to get someone else to tender." They called for tenders over again; and in doing this I believe they were acting outside the law, because they went to another district and brought in a man from there. I have always thought that was against post office regulations. How this man who got the tender knew what the other man had tendered, I do not know. However the second man tendered at $1,200 and, naturally, he got the contract.

If the Post Office Department here in Ottawa would look into these cases and not try to save $10 or $15 a month on these poor mail couriers I believe it would be much better. They should ask themselves this question, "Has this man who is tendering given us good service?" If that were done I think we would get down to a basis under which these men would be properly paid, and when they meet one another one would not say to the other, "I am driving the same distance you are, but you are receiving $500 a year more than I." Yet in the face of this discouragement these men are as honest as the sun. Throughout the length and breadth of this country we hear of very few cases of mail couriers getting into serious trouble.

I have spoken on behalf of the mail couriers because I feel sure the new Postmaster General will give us an opportunity to take up this matter. I have confidence that hon. members will put a plan before the department that will be workable and fair, and do away with this discrimination.

I have one further point to discuss, and then I believe I shall have finished. Some time ago I discussed with the department the superannuation of personnel of the naval or air forces serving in the Korean theatre of war. The question has been asked whether their military service would count on their superannuation, and in this connection I have received several letters from the department. The deputy postmaster general wrote me on March 24, and still the question is not settled. I believe that with the assistance of his deputy minister the Postmaster General will soon have the matter disposed of. I understand treasury board is blocking the efforts being made. Those who enlisted in the Korean force should receive a square deal in respect of their superannuation, and a decision as to who should pay it.

Then I have one further point to raise, about which I have spoken before and received a partial promise. I refer to the stamp vendor in the post office at Charlottetown. This person has been there for 52 years, under agreement with the Post Office Department that a 2 per cent commission would be paid on all sales in the post office and on all stamps sold in the Charlottetown area. He was able to make a fair living on that 2 per cent, but then the department put in these meter machines which take away 50 per cent of his revenue. They are wonderful machines for business; I have no objection to them, but this man should be compensated when they are used.

Mr. Gibson: Is there any other deal like that for vending postage stamps?

Mr. McLure: I could not tell my hon. friend.

Mr. Gibson: Perhaps the Postmaster General will tell us later.

Mr. McLure: This man has had this contract with the department for 52 years, during which he has given wonderful service. He must work from eight o'clock in the morning until eight at night, though I understood recently they were going to cut off twenty-five or thirty minutes from the day, no rest period, no meal hour, as he had to employ somebody to sell while he was out.

If you figure this up on the basis of the eight-hour day worked by others you find that this man has given 76 years of service. He is now around 80 years of age and the department tells him that he must get out. But they cannot turn him out because he has given good service. Before I left home I said to him, "Don't let them push you out, whatever you do; if you can just make ends meet, go ahead and stay there".

If the law enters into this matter this man should be able to sue the department. He should be able to get a fiat, as the hon. member for Lake Centre would say. There is not a judge in the land who would not say he should be paid for the business the meter machines have taken away. I am sure the Postmaster General would agree with that. When he looks into the matter I hope he will say to himself, "If I were in that position I would not stand for it; I would try to get back at the government so I would get a rate under my contract which would give the return it gave before I had these machines as competition". He applied to the department and asked that he be given 3 per cent on his sales, which would just about equal what he was losing because of the meter machines.

There are many other things that could be taken up with the minister, but as the hour is late and we are all anxious to see the session close I conclude by asking the Postmaster General and his officials to take notice of what I have said in regard to our post office. They must not forget that we just want back the right we obtained under the agreement of 1873 when we joined the Dominion of Canada. We did not join as a bloc of land; we went into the dominion as a self-governing colony. We had a good government, too. The only mistake we made was to go into union without having a better contract. The contract we entered into has never been fully lived up to. Let us go back to first principles and treat Prince Edward Island as a postal unit as it was before this division occurred.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on behalf of the rural mail carriers of Canada whom I believe are the most poorly paid of any people in the government service. These contracts are let by tender, usually for three years, and these people must travel every working day in the year with the exception of statutory holidays. They do not get three weeks holidays with pay as do others in the service. As the previous hon. member said, if they want to take a day off they must get someone else to take their place.

Quite often these men can do no other work. The nature of the rural carrier's work is not such that he starts at seven in the morning and finishes at noon; he generally starts in the forenoon and finishes some time in the afternoon. There is not enough time left in the day to permit him to engage in any other work and the result is that this is his only income. I would appreciate if the minister would give this matter his full consideration.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I want to join with others in the pleas that have been made on behalf of the rural mail carriers. Those of us who live on the prairies and have seen the rural mail carriers driving week in and week out along prairie roads, whether it be hot or whether it be sub-zero weather, realize that the inadequacy of their remuneration constitutes a scandal as far as parliament is concerned.

This is my 21st session of parliament; and back over the years, with the exception of special sessions, hon. members have joined together from all sides of the house to make a plea on behalf of the rural mail carriers. Yet so far nothing satisfactory has been done for them. As the hon. member for Queens said a few moments ago, the contract system sets one man against another. They underbid, particularly when times are bad. When times are good it is quite often difficult to get people to do this job at all.

There are two kinds of mail carriers. There are those who drive through the country to deliver mail at the boxes along the way, or who convey mail from depots to points not served by mail. Then there are those who take the mail from the depot to the post office. In my travels I have run across cases of postmasters who receive pitiful pay and commissions but who in turn provide premises for the post office. Sometimes they are quite unable to make ends meet. Then someone else would be given the contract to carry the mail from the post office to the station. They are also unable to exist on the amount of pay for that service, whereas if the postmaster in some of these places also carried the mail from the station to the post office and received the remuneration for that as well he would at least be getting a little more than he is receiving now. I am not suggesting that men who have been carrying the mail from the trains to the post offices should suddenly be removed from these positions, but I do say that as opportunities arise the Post Office Department should consider consolidating these two services, which might well be a single service performed by one individual, and paying more adequately therefor.

I want to join, as I have joined on numerous occasions in the past, with those on all sides of the house in expressing the hope that if a committee is established and the matter is gone into thoroughly it may be possible to devise a plan. I know it is a very difficult problem because distances, conditions and so on differ, but I think we can devise something better than cutthroat competition under the tender system which often means that the person who gets the contract performs the service for very inadequate remuneration.

I join with others in making a plea for better conditions for the rural mail carriers, and may I also say for those who carry the mail in the cities. I know that in the cities the hours are sometimes long. The men go on duty early in the morning to sort the mail for the various districts and their own areas, and sometimes it is well on toward evening before their work is done. I think we should try as far as possible to work out satisfactory conditions for those who are employed in carrying the mail, whether it is in rural or urban areas.

(Translation):

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, if parliamentary procedure allows a new member of parliament to offer his congratulations to a new Postmaster General, I wish to do so with all my heart. Mr. Minister, the congratulations I extend to you this evening are not the result of a general formula. These are fraternal congratulations I bring to you, for they come from your Acadian cousins. Although they did not know you personally, they had heard a lot about you. It is therefore with pleasure, Mr. Minister, that I bring to you, on behalf of my compatriots, a fraternal message and that I extend to you the congratulations of my fellow citizens from New Brunswick.

Mr. Chairman, it is fortunate, at least in so far as the affairs of my county are concerned, that a new minister should head the important Post Office Department. As I anticipate friendly relations and sincere co-operation between the new Postmaster General and the new member for Gloucester, I believe I can also anticipate effective results.

Tonight, I want to submit to the Postmaster General three specific and concrete cases concerning Gloucester county.

First, Mr. Chairman, there is the case of the post office at Petit Rocher, in Gloucester county. May I draw the Postmaster General's attention to the fact that Petit Rocher is one of our large Acadian parishes on the shores of Chaleur bay, some twelve miles from Bathurst. On June 18 last, I placed a motion on the order paper, requesting a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports, and petitions sent to the department in connection with the opening of a central post office at Petit Rocher. I have not yet received that information.

As I know that district very well, I take the liberty of drawing to the minister's attention the fact that for the past several years the people of Petit Rocher, at the initiative of the parish priest, the chamber of commerce, industrialists and merchants, have been requesting that something be done to remedy the unfortunate situation prevailing in that village. The post office is located at one end of Petit Rocher, while the church, the rectory, the station and the wharf, near which stand a lobster-packing factory and a cold storage, stores, the co-operative, the office of the credit union, in one word the very centre of the village, located within a radius of approximately half a mile, is far away from the post office. The result is that the people are asking for, and rightly so, the establishment of a central post office in the centre of the village of Petit Rocher. Therefore, as the representative of those people, I beg the new Postmaster General to receive their request with sympathy and I do hope that he will give his immediate attention to this matter which has been kept in abeyance for years in the department's files. I thank the minister in advance for his kind attention.

The second matter I want to bring to the attention of the minister is in connection with the post office at Shippegan. In January last, this post office was declared vacant and applicants were sought to fill the post.

I have here in my hand the civil service commission's requisition, dated January 25, 1952.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): You mean a competition?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, a competition. On March 3, 1952, certain people interested in this competition were advised that it had been cancelled. Now—and I hope I am in order in doing this—I would like to ask the hon. minister whether he is in a position to give me all the details concerning the post office at Shippegan.

First of all, what were the reasons for advertising a competition for appointment of an employee in that post office? Second, why was this competition cancelled? Third, what is the present status of the present post office attendant at Shippegan?

In brief, I would like the hon. minister to tell me if the policy of his department consists in retaining the services of an assistant to the postmaster of a large rural community like Lameque on Shippegan island, whose people have been demanding that their postmaster be given an assistant.

Mr. Chairman, those are the three questions I wanted to put to the Postmaster General. I hope that he will provide me, before it is too late, with the information I require.

(Text):

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I do want to take just a minute or two to add my voice to those who have spoken on behalf of the rural mail couriers. As I travel through the great north country I hear a great many complaints about the contract system of tenders, and I have received a good many suggestions. Many of the mail couriers feel that it would be wiser if in the office of the divisional inspector some committee might be set up to assist the inspector to consider each mail route on its merits and allot some definite charge per mile for the carrying of the mail on those specific routes. The charges would have to be adjusted or reviewed from time to time; but it does seem possible that a committee might be used by the inspector in his central office to make some satisfactory arrangement without having to resort to the tender system which, as has already been shown, militates against the faithful people throughout the country who have done a good job for so long. I just ask the minister if he will not consider having some arrangement adopted whereby the tenders can be done away with and a better system set up to recompense the people who carry the mail.

I also just want to take this opportunity of telling the minister that I congratulate him on his succession to this very important position. I like the attitude with which he has started out on his career, and I am sure it will be a long and enjoyable one.

Mr. Darroch: With much that has been said about rural mail couriers I am entirely in agreement, but I do not know just how the department would get around the tender system. I suppose stated rates per mile could be worked out, but I imagine if they were changed and no tenders called we would hear charges of political interference and patronage. I certainly would not want to see the matter given to the civil service commission because it would not be very long before they would be demanding that a person have a couple of years in a recognized university before they could apply for the job.

The hon. member for Wellington South expresses what I think is a good idea as far as rural mail couriers are concerned and I think there is another matter that concerns people in rural communities with respect to mail delivery. It is that there should be a realignment of rural mail routes. Most of the present rural mail routes were laid out in the days of the horse and buggy and before the day of the plowed road. I think consideration will have to be given to rearranging a majority of the routes.

I want to say this for the department, that any time I have asked them to put an extension on a route I have been fairly successful—

An hon. Member: You have been lucky.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You must be persuasive.

Mr. Darroch: It must be my approach.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Darroch: On one occasion recently I was asked: Do you think we should give rural delivery to every farmer? I said "yes", and I still think that. I certainly would not agree with the hon. member for Wellington South and the fair and hon. member for Hamilton West on their suggestions to the minister that he inaugurate twice a day deliveries in the cities. Before I could agree to that I would suggest that rural mail routes would have to be rearranged. I think people in towns and villages of 1,000 population and over have a right to one delivery a day before their city cousins go back to two a day. I use the figure of 1,000 and over because those of you who know the conditions in rural Ontario, and I suppose they are general throughout the country, know that in urban municipalities of 1,000 and over quite a number of people probably have to go a mile to the post office and a mile back for their mail. I think before people in the cities are granted delivery twice a day these people have a right to some consideration, and I would urge the minister to give this his consideration. Perhaps something can be done about it by the time another session rolls around.

If people want special delivery they should be willing to pay for it. I think these special delivery rates are quite reasonable for the service given.

There is another matter that is peculiar to the district from which I come and about which I would like to make a few suggestions to the minister. It is proposed to have a change in the rail service from Palmerston to Kincardine and from Palmerston to Southampton. This of course will mean a change in the method of mail delivery. I believe the proposal is to carry the mail on trucks. We know they did that for a period during the railway strike, and I think probably as a result of that experience the department are prone to believe that it would be more economic and satisfactory to deliver mail to that district that way than to use the trains. But I would point out to the department that there is one very peculiar thing about our district. It is that we have a lot of bad weather and bad roads.

At the time mail was delivered on trucks—and I quite agree a fairly good service was given though only first-class mail was delivered—it took place in September under ideal weather conditions. Those conditions will only prevail for six or seven months of the year. I do not think I am wrong in saying there are at least five months of bad weather in our part of the country. I also believe they took a traffic and weather census this winter, and as a result of that census they found the roads were open for a great majority of the days. Again I would point out to the department that it was an exceptionally favourable winter for that type of census. From my own experience, and I have spent over fifty winters in that district, too many of which I have vivid recollections, I am sure we cannot expect to have weather like we had this winter every year.

I would suggest to the minister that perhaps his department should join with the municipalities in their protests to the transport board against the C.N.R. discontinuing this service. I am quite satisfied that mail delivery will not be as satisfactory as it is under the present set-up. As I think I properly pointed out on a previous occasion, we are putting the service on rubber and gas both of which might become scarce at any time and be needed for something perhaps more in the interests of the country than this particular job. We are still going to have the rails there; they are going to continue giving freight service; and I suggest to the department that perhaps they should give this further consideration before acquiescing to the suggestion of the railroads on this change in the mail service.

Mr. Green: When the minister answers the various questions that have been raised I would be very grateful if he would let the committee know what progress has been made in arranging for postmen in the cities to work a forty-hour week and get extra pay for their overtime. I know that in Vancouver there has been a great deal of difficulty about this problem, and I believe the system adopted was to allow a man who works overtime to have time off on a later day. However, that did not work out very well either, because I know some of them had to wait many weeks in order to get this extra time off. It does seem to me a wiser way of handling the situation would be to provide for overtime pay where men are required to work extra hours. I hope the minister will deal with that point, and also the question of putting the postal staff on a forty-hour week.

Mr. Larson: I know the minister has had the salaries paid to rural mail carriers brought to his attention from many quarters. They are not satisfactory. The whole problem is that costs are going up, and it seems difficult to get mail carriers to serve the routes that have been in operation for some time. I appreciate that it would be rather difficult to settle this matter, but I am pleased to hear that the minister has decided to set up a committee to look into the question.

Mr. Fulford: I do want to congratulate the minister upon his appointment. At the outset I want to say how pleased I am that this year there has been no campaign to abolish the small village post office. I have had that worry in past years, but during 1952 there has been no such campaign and I trust the Postmaster General has been somewhat responsible for that.

I should like to say a word in commendation of Mr. George Herring, who was recently superannuated from the position of director of communications. I always found Mr. Herring most co-operative, most attentive and most reasonable. While I am on the subject I should like to say a word about Mr. L. J. Mills, who I believe is on loan from the treasury branch of the Post Office Department. I have found him almost equally attentive. I say "almost" because Mr. Herring had the job for so long and knew the ropes so well it is hard for anyone to take his place, especially on a temporary basis.

I should like also to join with those who have spoken about the predicament of the rural mail carriers. When I say "predicament" I mean it in its literal sense. It is a terrible system, and one that should be rectified as soon as possible. I have been hearing about it ever since I have been a member, and I hope I do not have to hear about this abominable system very much longer. We all hope some system will be devised which will be equitable to the rural mail carriers.

In conclusion I should like to say a word about a system which has been inaugurated by the civil service commission; that is the system of bringing outsiders to class I and II post offices. I think it is a bad thing for a man to have to move from one community to another as postmaster. When a man tries the civil service examinations and passes them, then goes into postal service in one post office, he should remain in that particular post office. His final reward for efficiency ought to be the postmastership there. I certainly do not agree that a man should be moved from one community to another and given that position.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to raise my voice with respect to postal facilities in my own area. I suggest the minister should inform the committee concerning the situation at Streetsville, Ontario. It is a rapidly growing community in the county of Peel and, as the minister and his predecessor know, representations have been made by myself and others locally for a new post office. I understand those representations have now been considered, and that some move is to be made with respect to improved postal facilities. First I should like the minister to indicate to the committee at the appropriate time the type of improvement in the postal service that the patrons of that post office may expect in the near future.

May I also make representations to the minister in connection with the postal facilities in the county town of my constituency. The town of Brampton has had the same post office since about 1890, if my recollection of its history is correct, though I am afraid I cannot remember personally that far back. Since that time the town has grown, during the last few years particularly because of the rapid expansion in industrial developments and business generally in that part of Canada. The postal facilities there need improvement. The post office building in Brampton also houses the customs and excise branches of the Department of National Revenue. All these departments are finding the accommodation rather cramped. The need for a new public building in Brampton is very great.

I am going to ask the minister if he will take into consideration the representations that have been made, and which I am making again now, for a new public building, either for the post office itself or one to house the post office and the offices of national revenue. If the minister looks into the situation he will find this is not an improper request to make. The population of the town has almost doubled in the last fifteen years, and the post office facilities are not capable of great expansion. For that reason I believe he will find that a new public building would be in the interests of the departments involved as well as the interests of those whom a public building would serve. Will the minister, at the appropriate time, answer the question as to whether or not there is some possibility of a new building in the near future to give improved postal facilities to that town? I should be pleased indeed if he could give full particulars about what is proposed with respect to these facilities, and the moves that have been made up to date in that connection.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I shall detain the committee for only a moment. Along with many others, I want to extend my congratulations to the Postmaster General. I am sure his appointment has met with the approval of all members of the house, and we all feel he is going to be very co-operative in the discharge of his duties.

There are just one or two things I want to mention. The tender system has been discussed, so I shall not say any more about it. I should like to say a word about the rural delivery of mail. Today I received a letter from the department concerning applications for the extension of two mail routes. I wonder how the member for Wellington North was so successful. I think I shall have to have a little talk with him. In the one case the applicant lived two-tenths of a mile from the route, and he was too near. The other two people on another road lived seven-tenths of a mile away and they were too far. You might be able to tell that to some people but not to me.

I hope that situation will be reviewed. While the basis of delivery may be two to the mile, or whatever it is in Ontario, I understand that in some other provinces they do not need to have as many. In this day and age of fast transportation, let us try to profit by it. Someone said the rural mail routes were established during the horse and buggy days. With modern transportation let us now try to extend rural mail service to as many people as possible. Let us not be too rigid about the rules. In suburban areas and in those areas around the cities that are growing fast, there is probably some difficulty. In some areas sidewalks are not down and they are finding some difficulty in getting mail delivery. I hope action can be speeded up in some cases. I think that is all I need to say at this time. I hope that the minister will co-operate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to repeat anything that has been said with regard to rural mail couriers. Since coming to the House of Commons I have heard this story over and over again. Indeed, if you read the debates year by year on the post office estimates, you will find that they are almost prototypes and complete repetitions of those in previous years with regard to the demand that something be done toward providing a system that is fair to the mail couriers in place of the present obsolete system which in so many cases denies fairness and justice.

I rise not for the purpose of joining in the demand that something be done in this regard, because I have practically given up hope that anything will be done inasmuch as the mail couriers have not many votes. That fact apparently is one of the reasons why over the years nothing effective has been done to meet their demands. I rose for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the minister the situation in the city of Prince Albert, which is a city of some 17,000 and which I think has the worst air mail service of any city in Canada. It serves the northern part of Saskatchewan, including that new area being opened up in the uranium fields and also the other basic metal fields. Yet within the last few months the air mail service has been reduced to a minimum. Indeed at the present time the air mail service consists of only 14 mails for every 24 days.

Since I came into the house I received a letter which was written by the Prince Albert board of trade and which requests reconsideration of a situation that is a denial of fairness to a city the size of Prince Albert. In this letter it is stated that during the period from May 25 to June 21 the total number of air mails into Prince Albert was only 14. Canadian Pacific Air Lines operate into Prince Albert and have a daily service, except for Sundays, in and out. This letter from the Prince Albert board of trade states in part as follows:

> . . . we feel that postal officials themselves will now agree that for a city of this size serving a large territory in this province, the above calibre of service cannot be termed adequate.

Apparently the hon. member for Prince Albert had taken this matter up, for the letter states:

> . . . the board of trade would appreciate every effort being made to convince authorities that the previous service should be reinstated immediately in order that businessmen in this city and citizens generally may enjoy similar postal service prevailing in all Canadian cities and many centres of smaller population and less importance.

I know what the situation is in Prince Albert. That is my home. The mail service is totally inexcusable. The air mail service, which consists of 14 air mails delivered during the period of about a month, denies that communication without which business cannot be properly done today. The letter goes on to state:

> . . . the expansion of this city during recent years and the expansion of the territory which it is serving, does not coincide with the reasoning of the post office department that mail service need not include full-fledged air mail service.

I make this appeal to the minister. I realize what the general answer is, namely that there is a saving in expenditure. That is true; but surely there should not be a saving effected at the expense of reasonable service for a city the size of Prince Albert which serves a vast area east, west and north; and the northern section in particular reaches about 400 miles north of Prince Albert. I ask the minister to reconsider the decision made some two or three months ago to reduce that air mail service, and to reinstate that ordinary mail service which all of us today, almost everywhere in Canada, have the right to expect, in particular those living in cities serving a large area such as Prince Albert.

There is one other matter I want to mention also. Various members have extended their felicitations to the minister. I did that personally and most sincerely. Since he has been minister it has been possible to approach him or his department and be assured of reasonable consideration of reasonable requests. That is something worthy of mention. When matters are brought to his attention, I have found that they are not shelved for future consideration, but that one receives a reply that the matter is being considered. One does not always expect the consideration to be favourable, but one does appreciate the situation when there is a minister who gives an immediate reply and who not only promises to look into the matter, but does so.

I point out to him this fact. Under the law, with respect to the appointment of postmasters there is a soldier preference or a service preference. I have received information—and I have offered the most strenuous objection on more than one occasion—that where appointments of postmasters have been made, in cases where those qualified were living in the neighbourhood, for some reason or another appointments were made outside of the preference. I impress upon the minister that if he is to receive from members of the house co-operation equal to that which we find we are going to receive from him, the soldier or service consideration that assures the appointment of servicemen must be maintained.

With those few remarks I am going to resume my seat. I join with the previous members in again repeating the request that something be done for the mail couriers, and also once again repeating what has been said on earlier occasions that, after all, the Post Office Department is one department where profit should not be the sole consideration. Profit is not the reason for the setting up of the Post Office Department; it is service. And it is in that spirit that I ask for consideration for the city of Prince Albert and the area served by it.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the situation with respect to my home town of Dugald. I would point out that 25 years ago we had a better mail service than we have today. At this time we receive our letters Friday morning, and do not receive anything further until the following Monday. When the minister goes to the west I hope he will spend a couple of days in Winnipeg, and that he will get back for us the service we had 25 years ago. It would certainly be appreciated.

Mr. Drew: I should like to refer to one subject raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West, who made reference to the use of the mails by the Canadian peace congress. In response to that statement the Postmaster General explained that it was difficult to determine what was inside an envelope, or to take action in regard to anything that might be handled in a sealed envelope.

I wish to refer to this because the regulation which would govern a case of this kind has been discussed in the house at some length on earlier occasions. It arose earlier, not in connection with the use of the mails for communist propaganda; the discussions on the occasions to which I refer related to a denial of the use of the mails to certain organizations and individuals, either in connection with stock-selling activities, lotteries or things of that kind.

Because of the answer by the minister this evening I should like to refer back to what was said at that time. There are two regulations which have a direct bearing on this matter. Although they are now numbered 347 and 348, at the time this subject was under discussion they were numbered 204 and 205.

When this was being discussed and some question was raised as to the propriety of denying use of the mails to individuals in connection with lotteries and activities of that kind, and particularly the directions given affecting individuals who might be associated with such lotteries, the Minister of Justice, as reported at page 2335 of Hansard for May 9, 1950, said:

> The statute calls on the Postmaster General to refuse the use of the mails to persons whom he reasonably suspects of using the post office facilities to defraud the public. The only question is whether the Postmaster General had reasonable grounds for his suspicion. From the facts when they are disclosed I think you will have to agree that the Postmaster General did have good grounds for his suspicion.

The regulation to which I refer covered fraud in connection with the handling of securities or lotteries, or other matters of the kind; the section 205, which is now 348, contains this provision—and I am omitting the words that relate to other subjects—

> It is forbidden to post for delivery or transmission by or through post any publication, matter or thing of a seditious, disloyal or scurrilous character.

The remarks of the Minister of Justice, therefore, will apply with equal force to anything that could be described as seditious, disloyal or scurrilous. Then the Minister of Justice, as reported at page 2337 of the same date, had this to say:

> The point which the Postmaster General must decide is the simple one of whether or not there are good grounds for suspecting that postal privileges under the Postmaster General are being abused.

The subject under discussion then was the denial to a number of organizations of the use of the mails. I should like to quote from what I said on May 16, 1950, as reported at page 2528 of Hansard. At that time I was discussing the monthly supplements of the Canada official postal guide which contained the names of the organizations and individuals against whom orders had been made by the Postmaster General.

> I see just on these two pages in front of me in this single supplement the names of branches of the Legion, of a religious order, of a teachers' organization, of an insurance company, of a labour organization, of a curling club and of an athletic committee—and the names of a number of individuals. Then under these orders are these words:
> "Registered letters are not to be accepted addressed to the above, and all mail addressed to or coming from the above is to be intercepted and sent specially by first mail to the administration branch (for the dead letter office)."

I submit that if it is appropriate for the Postmaster General to issue orders against branches of the Legion, religious orders, teachers' organizations, insurance companies, labour organizations and groups of that kind, whose activities in the ordinary course of events are not only lawful but highly commendable, because they may infringe some of the provisions of these regulations, then it just is not within the bounds of common sense that orders should not be made restricting the use of the mails for seditious and disloyal material of the kind to which we have referred earlier today.

Here I have only a few of the things that have come in recently from this disloyal organization known as the Canadian peace congress. I do not wish to appear to be obsessed with the activities of this one organization. I have, however, indicated my own belief that under proper legal provisions and fully in accordance with our conception of impartial justice steps should be taken to deal with people whose one purpose is to undermine the spirit of our people in their efforts to resist communist aggression, whether from the military point of view or through propaganda within our own country.

No more disloyal, seditious and scurrilous publication has been circulated through the mails of Canada than this publication I hold in my hand under the title "I Accuse" which claims to have been prepared by this man Endicott. Nor is it confined to things of this kind alone. As is known generally to members of the house, this shameless man, this man who uses our very broad freedom to try to undermine the efforts that are being made by Canada, along with the other free nations, to take a stand against communist aggression, not long ago attempted to create the impression that certain nuns, some of whom were Canadians, had been responsible for the death of Chinese children. That vile slander, issued first by the Chinese communists and repeated by these jackals for the communists, is the kind of thing that is going unchecked and is being distributed.

The Minister of Justice made it clear that it is not the intention of the Department of Justice to take action under the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to treason and sedition, but the same Minister of Justice has made it abundantly clear that he believes it is not only competent for the Postmaster General to act under sections 347 and 348 of the postal regulations, it is the duty of the Postmaster General to act if he has reasonable grounds for believing that any organization or individual is using the postal services for the distribution of disloyal or seditious or scurrilous material.

What can young Canadians in uniform in Korea at this time think of a situation of this nature? What can they think of our tolerance of these carefully calculated efforts to undermine their confidence in what they are doing? Many of these young men in the battle line have died and others have been grievously wounded in the defence of this and all other free countries against this vile doctrine and the aggression which is carried on in its name. How can we tell them that it is appropriate for the postal regulations to deny to Legion branches the use of the mails where perhaps with complete sincerity but not in strict conformity with the law they may be conducting lotteries, and at the same time these people who are serving only one master, the master against whom these men are fighting on the field of battle, are permitted to use our mails at the general expense of the public of Canada to distribute their disloyal, seditious and scurrilous propaganda.

I know that the Postmaster General was not the Postmaster General at the time this subject came up earlier for discussion. I wish in all sincerity to join with those who have complimented him upon his elevation to this office. I agree with what has been said about the indication he has given of his desire to deal with the problems that are placed before him; but may I say that if in the light of the decisions already announced in this house by the Minister of Justice, to whose opinions he referred on an earlier occasion, it is correct—and I make that qualification—for the Postmaster General to act in accordance with the opinion of the Minister of Justice in relation to a relatively unimportant activity, then the time is long overdue for vigorous and positive action to prevent the use of our mails for these seditious purposes.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Chairman, I want personally to express my sincere appreciation for the kind expressions that have been uttered about the Postmaster General and the department. I can assure all hon. members that I shall do my best to give the information requested and to solve the problems which come before me. I will not have time to deal fully with all the questions that have been asked, and which I think can be divided into two parts.

Reference has been made to the rural mail couriers. I would refer hon. members to the declaration I made previously that a committee would be set up at the next session. I know there are problems created by having these contracts let by tender. In that way a contractor selects his price but once he has the contract it is possible that complications may arise. A departmental committee has already made many suggestions which I shall be glad to place before the committee so they may be studied by the members. I only hope, as has been suggested already, that a proper scheme satisfactory to all will be worked out.

I shall try to answer some of these specific questions as briefly as possible. I do not know all the details of the case referred to by the hon. member for Battle River, but I shall look into the matter and advise him. The hon. member for Hamilton West asked a few questions and made a few suggestions. I would direct her attention to the fact that the economies that were effected were offset by the extra payments that had to be made in connection with railways and mail contracts. We have also had two increases in the salaries of postal employees, and additional services are being provided.

An hon. member wanted figures about overtime that had been paid. The payments in 1951-52 for this purpose amounted to $1,981,700 and the estimate for 1952-53 is $2,100,000.

Reference was made to the rates on gift parcels to Great Britain, and in this connection I would refer the hon. member to a statement which was given on April 3, 1952, which appears in Hansard of that date. I shall not repeat that statement tonight. I might say that Great Britain asked that the higher rates be made effective in October, 1951, but we were able to persuade them not to increase the rates until after the Christmas season. These rates are based on arrangements between both countries; we made concessions and they made concessions. When Great Britain decided to do away with these concessions we inevitably had to let them do what they wanted to do, and that is why the only success we had was in delaying this change in rates for a few months.

So far as this point is concerned, I think I should probably give this further information. Parcel rates are based on the following three factors: first, cost of handling in Canada; second, cost of sea conveyance; third, terminal payment for delivery in Great Britain. Domestic parcel rates in Canada were increased in the summer of 1951. These basic increases are reflected in the rates on parcels to Great Britain and other countries. Payment for sea conveyance is determined by the steamship company. The terminal charges paid the British post office for handling and delivery of parcels after they have reached a British port are fixed by the British post office.

Effective April 1, 1949, arrangements were made with the steamship companies and the British postal administration for the acceptance of reduced charges for gift parcels. It was therefore possible to offer cheaper postage rates. In the fall of 1951 the British post office advised that the cost of handling and delivery had so increased that it was not only necessary to increase normal parcel post rates but also to abolish the preferential rates which hitherto applied to gift parcels. The special sea conveyance rates which had been charged for gift parcels were withdrawn on April 1, 1951, and when the reduced British terminal charges were also withdrawn it became necessary to increase the parcel post rates to Great Britain. This was made effective from January 1, 1952.

I think it is only fair to say that because of the circumstances the authorities in Great Britain found it necessary to cancel the arrangements they had with us at the time and that is why they as well as we had to make other arrangements.

Mr. Lennard: Carried.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I am ready.

Mr. Lennard: I thought you were going to sit down.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I just wanted to give the information requested. The hon. member for Queens talked about a deficit.

An hon. Member: He is not here.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I might say that although it may appear there was a deficit in 1950-51 we did not have a deficit because we had paid increased rates to the railway companies which applied not only for that year but for previous years. I think I can conclude by saying that I will take into consideration all the questions that have been put to me tonight. The hon. member for Peel raised one question, but I will send him the information he asked for. I know he will be satisfied. So far as the questions asked by the hon. member for Gloucester are concerned, I will write giving him the information he has requested. I may tell him, as well as all other hon. members, that I will do my best to satisfy them in answering their questions and will try to solve their problems as best I can.

Mrs. Fairclough: With respect to the matter of overseas parcels, I can well understand that the United Kingdom government could not make concessions in the matter of postage because of the very limited number of their own citizens who would benefit by the receipt of these parcels. However, I do not think that is an argument that applies here in Canada, where so many of our citizens have interests in the old land. Therefore I would urge the Postmaster General to take this matter into consideration and pursue it still further.

Item agreed to.

313. Transportation—movement of mail by land, air and water, including administration, $40,542,048.

Mr. Applewhaite: This item refers to the transportation of mail, and according to the particulars some $9,500,000 is for transportation by air. Under ordinary circumstances I would have liked to speak on this item at considerable length, but I shall show more mercy to the house than has been shown by several hon. members during the past couple of weeks. However, I am going to take time to say with respect to air mail services on the west coast that I and the people on the coast have great reason to express appreciation not only to the Postmaster General but to his deputy for the consideration, sympathy and understanding that have been shown. In brief my plea at this moment is that the Postmaster General give serious and, if I may say so, prompt consideration to the installation of airmail service to these points particularly, Ocean Falls, Kemano and Kitimat on the Pacific coast which are not now receiving that service though they are served by regular twice a week air service. The development in that area and the need for increased service would justify me even at this stage of the session in talking about it for ten or fifteen minutes, but I am not going to do so. I am merely going to leave that request with the Postmaster General because I feel sure if he will investigate, even in the most cursory manner, the increased needs that have arisen in those areas he will find that this plea is very well founded, and at the same time—

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Applewhaite: The hon. gentlemen opposite who mutter "carried" might well have remembered over the past weeks that there were other matters to come before the house besides those in which they took such a long drawn out interest. I propose to finish my remarks, and if they suggest that I am taking longer than I am entitled to I shall say what I had originally intended to say. Before the interruption I was on the point of saying that I wished to add to my recommendation to the Postmaster General that at the same time and in connection therewith there might well be considered the provision of an air-mail system east and west between Prince George and Prince Rupert, a distance of some 488 miles, where there are now four or five usable airfields.

Mrs. Fairclough: Before we leave this item I think it might be well if we asked the Postmaster General if he has the answer to the question asked by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I will be glad to refer my hon. friend to the statement I made before dinner. I might also add that if it is possible to find out where the document he mentioned is printed it would be possible to refer the matter to the authorities of the province where it is printed and action might be taken by them with respect to it. When items are in sealed envelopes the department can do nothing. The postal department is against censorship. As much as I might like to open an envelope addressed to the hon. member for Hamilton West and learn all her secrets, the fact is that it just is not done. It is most unfortunate, but it may happen that questionable documents are in sealed envelopes and they cannot be opened just to satisfy the curiosity of the Postmaster General or anyone else.

However, if it is brought to the attention of the Postmaster General that something is obscene or against the law respecting fraud or lotteries, then under section 7 of the Post Office Act, which reads as follows, action might be taken:

7. (1) Whenever the Postmaster General believes on reasonable grounds that any person

(a) is, by means of the mails (i) committing or attempting to commit an offence, or (ii) aiding, counselling or procuring any person to commit an offence, or (b) with intent to commit an offence, is using the mails for the purpose of accomplishing his object, the Postmaster General may make an interim order . . .

[Mr. Applewhaite.]

First it must be established that an offence has been committed or is about to be committed and as long as the proper legal authorities do not feel that an offence has been committed or is about to be committed the Postmaster General cannot act. Again I refer my hon. friend to what I said before dinner. We want to do our utmost to protect the public but at the same time we cannot violate the sanctity of the mail. We must protect the secrecy of communication of individuals using the mails.

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, in the first place I would like to assure the Postmaster General that so far as it is within her power the secrets of the member for Hamilton West do not pass through the mails. In the second place I might say that action has been taken, as the Postmaster General well knows, on many occasions, some of which have been cited by the leader of the opposition. It must be that the department has taken steps to discover what was contained in the covers which passed through the Post Office Department.

At this stage I do not propose to carry this matter any further, but I would ask the Postmaster General to take it under serious advisement. After all, the matter has been drawn to his attention not only now but on former occasions. I would ask him to take it under advisement and act accordingly.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I may say to my hon. friend that the way we find out that mail has been used for these purposes is because some of the letters reach the dead letter office on account of insufficient or incorrect address and we then open them. That is the only way we find out. We do not open letters when they are in the ordinary channels of distribution.

Mr. Gibson: I am sorry that I cannot spend a little more time in congratulating my very good friend the Postmaster General on his appointment, and also to express my appreciation to him and his officials for all they have done for me. I have always received very courteous and competent service from them.

The whole history of his department is one of development in transportation. It goes all the way from the smoke signal to the pony express, and then we reach the railway stage, trucks and finally aeroplanes. I think we are on the air service branch now. As the minister realizes Canada is very proud to have all-up mail service from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia. But it is unfortunate that when it reaches Victoria, British Columbia, it does something like the communist party does; it dives underground when it gets there.

We have settlements in my riding with 125 people employed, with planes landing there every day and planes passing over there every day, yet they have a mail service every eight days by steamer. I was looking up some figures from the dominion bureau of statistics the other day and, although I do not suppose the Postmaster General has had time to look up all these things during his short tenure of office, it seems to me the government has some chosen instruments for the carriage of air mail in Canada, and I know he will be interested in the figures. From the civil aviation statistics of the dominion bureau of statistics I found that 18 per cent of the revenue of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines comes from your department. Maritime Central Airways receive 11·2 per cent from your department. I then come to Trans-Canada Air Lines. Of course this really is a chosen instrument, and I appreciate why that should be so; but they get 15·4 per cent of their revenue from your department. Central Northern gets 8·1 per cent; Rimouski Air Lines—and I know your parliamentary assistant knows this line well—gets 5·6 per cent and they all appear to be chosen instruments.

However when we get out to the Queen Charlotte Airlines, the third largest air line in Canada, they are something like the plumber's monkey wrench and seem to be forgotten. Despite the fact that they are the third largest air line in Canada they only receive 1 per cent of their revenue from the Post Office Department. That is all you pay them for the carriage of air mail. I am particularly interested here, not in the company although it is a useful and worth-while company which serves my constituency; I am interested more particularly because they are the only people who can carry air mail in my riding.

I appreciate the consideration the minister has given this problem. I have presented it to him and I know he is giving it very careful consideration now. I think the mail service by air to the Comox airport is very well justified; but I would be particularly grateful if the minister would go into this matter and see if there are any further possibilities. We have planes landing there three times a day and everybody says: Where is the air mail? They look across the river at Powell River and see the smoke from the plant over there where they get two air mail services a day and they say: What is the matter with us? Is there something wrong with us? Do we smell bad, or have we the wrong member representing us?

Mr. Casselman: That is the answer.

Mr. Gibson: I am quite convinced that my good friend the Postmaster General would not let them have any misapprehension about that despite what the hon. member says, and I think I can count on him looking into this and giving it very serious consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

302. General administration, $2,105,832.

Mr. McCann: I think perhaps that if I made a brief explanatory statement with reference to the division of customs and excise it might make it unnecessary to ask a lot of questions which would otherwise be asked. This will only take two or three minutes.

The estimates now before the house are intended to cover operations of the customs and excise division of the Department of National Revenue, which consists of some 215 customs-excise ports, approximately 145 outports and other offices, as well as the central administration.

This division administers the customs tariff, the Customs Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act, and portions of some forty other acts. The ports and outports are responsible for the examination and appraisal of imported goods; the assessment and collection of duties and taxes payable thereon; the assessment and collection of excise duty, excise taxes and sales taxes on domestic goods; the supervision of customs bonded warehouses and of licensed excise establishments, and the administration of the laws mentioned above and regulations made thereunder.

Through headquarters and the ports special branches are staffed to carry out audits, inspections, investigations, drawbacks and refunds.

During the last year the department collected, by way of revenue, $1,476 million, an increase of $250 million over the previous year. The estimate of revenue for 1952-53, as projected by the Minister of Finance, will be in the neighbourhood of $1,495 million. The expected increase for this year has already been reflected in the revenue for April and May, and the indications are that the customs and excise division will again see an increase in the volume of business.

International traffic appears to be continuing on the upswing, especially in the fields of trucking and tourist travel. Foreign vehicles entering Canada on travellers' vehicle permits in the month of April totalled 96,400, an increase of 12 per cent over the previous year, and a new record for the month. Traffic has been heavier in all parts of the country, with the largest gains occurring in Ontario and Quebec. The four-month total from January to April is actually 9 per cent higher than it was for the corresponding period last year.

This year's estimates provide for an increase over last year of $1,999,153. The larger part, in fact 95 per cent of this increase, or in other words $1,914,126, is required to cover the adjustments in salary occasioned by the general increase applicable to all government employees, and for the addition of sufficient positions to bring us up to the same strength as last year.

Apart from the need for additional seasonal officers, provision is being made for an essential increase in the excise tax audit staff and the customs appraisers. Both these branches are now overworked. An increase of 25 auditors is essential, both for protection of the revenue and for better service to the taxpayers by more frequent audits. Excise tax auditors average an annual recovery of some $20,000 per auditor, and assist the taxpayers in a fuller understanding of the tax regulations. Seven new customs appraisers will be added to the department to cope with the problem of investigation of foreign values, about which I spoke to the house in the course of discussion of the customs tariff bill.

Other votes which show an increase over last year relate to overtime and office and housing accommodation. Overtime, it will be noted, this year shows an apparent increase of $100,000 over last year. Actually the amount we are working for is $80,000 less than the amount we were required to expend last year. A substantial portion of overtime results from special services to the public and is recouped from persons so served. The moneys thus repaid to the government are placed in the consolidated revenue fund, and heretofore have not been credited against the departmental expenditures.

The department's estimate of amounts recovered is in the neighbourhood of $300,000 annually; therefore in the preparation of these estimates the amount of $300,000 has been deducted from the over-all vote for ports, outports and preventive stations so that, in effect, the department is seeking $500,000 for overtime payments, expecting that the balance of its requirements will be obtained from those to whom special services are rendered. The vote covering construction and the acquisition of land this year shows an increase over last year of $243,450. In this connection I would like to say that the projects envisaged for the coming year are projects which have been regularly deferred until they are now of some urgency. There still remains a long list of other such projects which, although desirable, must be deferred still further. It should be remembered that all during the war and the period that followed a close check has been kept on construction, despite the fact that the volume of business and the local demands for service have greatly increased throughout these years.

I shall be pleased to answer any questions that may arise in connection with any of these estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not propose to take the time of the committee in making any general remarks, and shall confine myself to plunging at once into questions. The minister has given us a broad picture of the situation, with figures that are relevant. I should like to ask him whether it will suit him, on this item or on item 306, to deal with one question which I think exercises the mind of the public a good deal, namely the question of smuggling and enforcement. I am anxious to get a certain amount of detailed information about that. Some time ago the question was taken up with the Department of Justice, and we had a sort of general assertion from the Minister of Justice that the situation was improving, which was not as convincing as it might have been. I should like the minister to give us a considerable amount of detail. We have only about fifteen minutes left this evening, and if he would prefer to deal with that first thing in the morning I would be prepared to leave it until then.

If that is his wish, I should like to turn now to one or two other questions. Perhaps the minister would indicate his preference now. Shall we proceed immediately with the question of smuggling, or would the minister prefer to leave that until the first thing in the morning?

Mr. McCann: I think probably we might proceed in the regular way, Mr. Chairman. The practice that has been followed under the first item, general administration, is that almost any questions may be asked.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am now asking a question, but I am in doubt as to whether the minister wants to proceed—

Mr. McCann: I am satisfied to have you go ahead with any questions you desire to ask.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): First of all I should like to know what the minister considers was the loss to the treasury last year from smuggling operations. He will recall what the Minister of Finance said in his speech on April 8, as recorded at page 1258 of Hansard:

> In the case of cigarettes only I had forecast an increase of $21 million and I experienced a decline of $1 million. There are of course a number of reasons for this decline.

There is also a statement which I shall read from a publication with which I am not very familiar, but which evidently went into this matter. It is the March 8 edition of Weekend picture magazine. I shall read from it quite briefly. This purports to give a picture of the smuggling situation:

> When the federal government raised the tax on a package of cigarettes to 25·2 cents last April (the U.S. federal tax is eight cents) and the cigarette manufacturers followed up with price increases to bring the cost of a package of cigarettes to 42 cents (46 cents with provincial tax in Quebec), the petty smuggler faded into the background along the border as the big operators gradually went into the business. The men who became rich in prohibition days and those who wished to emulate them saw their opportunity. They could buy a carton of cigarettes in Maryland, where there is no state tax, for as little as $1.59 from distributors. This same carton brought from $3 to $3.50 on the Canadian black market—as much as 120 per cent profit. Buyers were easy to find, for the same number of Canadian cigarettes cost $4.20 in most provinces and $4.60 in Quebec.
> Some idea of the quantities being moved surreptitiously into Canada may be gained from the fact that an R.C.M.P. patrol seized a cache of 970,000 cigarettes in a new three-ton truck on a farm near Coaticook last December 15. On the Canadian black market such a load is worth $14,550.

There is a lot more here I could read, but I do not want to lengthen these proceedings an unnecessary moment. I do want, however, to get from the minister what he considers the most significant facts. First of all I want to know the number of prosecutions and seizures which were being made prior to the change in the tax on April 8 last, and whether the minister has reason to think the situation has improved very greatly. Some opinions I have heard, though I cannot profess to have verified them, seem to indicate that the change is not nearly as great as one might expect.

I should like the minister to begin by telling us what he considers the loss to have been, in so far as he is informed; and second, the course of the prosecutions and police activity up until the time the tax was changed and since.

Mr. McCann: I shall admit, Mr. Chairman, that the matter of smuggling, particularly of cigarettes, has been a problem which has engaged the attention of the officials of the department, and given them considerable anxiety. If we go back a few years, I can give the total number of seizures. For the year 1951 there were 7,061. If we go back to 1945, we find that there were 2,697 seizures. It has gone up gradually, and in 1946 there were 4,482; in 1947, 4,835; 1948, 5,207; 1949, 5,655; 1950, 6,530; and in 1951, 7,061.

However, we find that the peak was reached in the month of September, when there were 731 seizures, and that declined until December of 1951, when it was reduced to 644. I think perhaps it might be interesting if I gave you something specific with reference to the seizure of cigarettes; that is, cigarettes seized by police and the ports in the years 1949, 1950 and 1951. Perhaps the last few months would interest you, or give you a comparison with a year ago. In June of 1951 there were 1,241,284 cigarettes seized. The peak, as I said, was reached at the first of this year, in January of 1952, when the number was 1,889,290; and it has been gradually going down since January. If you take the month of May, the seizures were then 1,139,160.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is the number of cigarettes. How many seizures were there?

Mr. McCann: How many what?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has given the total seized, as I understand it.

Mr. McCann: Yes. Then I was giving you specifically the figures for cigarettes. I think that is what you wanted. I believe this might help to clear up the situation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister give the number of seizures in May of this year?

Mr. McCann: May of last year?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No; May of this year.

Mr. McCann: Yes. Of cigarettes, 1,139,160.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is the number of cigarettes seized?

Mr. McCann: That is the number of cigarettes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes; but what was the number of seizures?

Mr. McCann: The number of seizures? In May, 1951, it was 600 and in May, 1952, it was 707.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then do I understand that actually the number of seizures in May of 1952 was worse than in 1951, although the tax had been reduced in April?

We would not expect that results would appear immediately perhaps; but it is certainly disconcerting to find the situation was worse this last May than it was a year ago.

Mr. McCann: In May, 1952 the number was 707; but the peak in 1951 was in September of that year when there were 731 seizures.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I point out to the minister that that peak of September, 1951, if I have the figures down correctly, was 731 seizures whereas in May of 1952 we have 770. In other words the situation is worse.

Mr. McCann: I hope the hon. gentleman will understand that is 731 seizures of everything.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When did we shift over from cigarettes?

Mr. McCann: I wanted to give you specifically the number of cigarettes, but I have not the information here as to the number of seizures of cigarettes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask this question. After all, if we are going to have any real appreciation of what is going on we must have comparable figures. I think it is clear that what we need are comparable figures running right through in order to show whether this thing is getting better or worse. It is not merely a matter of the money lost; it is the whole unpleasant disregard of law. What I mean is this. Once people get into the habit of disobeying one law, they can easily extend the habit. May I now suggest that this item might stand until the morning.

Mr. McCann: If the hon. member will give me an opportunity to answer the rest of his question, perhaps he would have the information. He asked a question with reference to the money.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I always like the minister better when he is good tempered. Do not let him and me fall out with each other. What we are actually finding is that the minister was giving figures that were not comparable, and I do not think they were getting us anywhere. If he has other comparable figures that he wants to give us, I should be glad to have them. But I am suggesting that, at the moment, we are comparing things that are not comparable. If the minister wants to go on, I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. McCann: I think perhaps if I were to give this statement it might help to clarify the situation. It has to do both with cigarettes and tobacco.

Although it is somewhat early as yet to assess the effect of the recent lowering of the tax on cigarettes—and I think that is the information the hon. member wanted—it can be reported that there has been a falling off in the quantities of cigarettes seized since the budget. Cigarettes seized during the month of May amount to 1,139,000. This is some 360,000 less than the number seized in the previous month—that would be April—and almost 1 million less than the peak reached in November last.

A further indication that the situation has improved is perhaps evidenced by the increase in the production of Canadian cigarettes which, for the month of April, shows an increase of 100 million over April of last year—the figures are 1,523 million compared with 1,438 million—and the May figures which show an increase over the corresponding month of last year of 284 million.

The revenue figures for cigarettes present a similar comparative picture for the month of May, and show an increase this year of $927,000. The amount collected in May of this year also exceeds the revenue collected in May of 1950 by over half a million dollars.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that both customs and excise?

Mr. McCann: No. There is not much customs collected on cigarettes; it is excise tax and excise duty. I was giving the comparative figures. The amount collected in May of this year exceeds that collected in May of 1950 by half a million dollars, the figures being $15,359,000 as compared with $14,855,000 a year ago.

The production figures for cut tobacco are perhaps even more impressive, the months of April and May showing an increase over the same period last year of 1,162,000 pounds. That is the production of cut tobacco.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Those production figures have their own interest, but you would need to know a great deal about them in order to know what their real bearing is on smuggling. The mere fact that we are producing a great deal more than we were producing before might mean that there was an arrears of production and that they were speeding up. I come back to this point. I want to know the number of seizures. To me it is not of great importance, if the number of seizures is going up, that the actual average amount seized is less. I do not regard that fact as of great importance. That perhaps means that they are not operating on quite as large a scale, but still they are operating. I see that it is now eleven o'clock. I would therefore suggest that in the morning the minister might give us a list of the seizures running back over a good many months, say over the last eighteen months.

Mr. McCann: Does the hon. member mean seizures of everything, including cars, cigarettes and jewelry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Either of everything or of cigarettes. I started with cigarettes. If the minister will give us comparative figures, and if those relating to cigarettes are most convenient, I suggest he give us the figures for cigarettes. It will be quite satisfactory to me if we can get a figure carried through that is comparable so we can form an estimate of what is going on.

Item stands.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 4, 1952

The house met at ten o'clock.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED INVITATION BY CANADA TO COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since it would appear likely that this will be the last day we will meet before the adjournment until November, and in view of the reported statements by the Prime Minister of Australia in regard to the desirability of holding a commonwealth conference, as well as another statement from London, I wonder if the Prime Minister could not give some assurance that Canada will consider extending an invitation, having regard to the fact that Canada's position is a peculiarly favourable one to indicate a willingness to explore this possibility.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not think there is any probability of Canada taking the initiative in the near future. The hon. member knows that these stories are not without some background, but I am not at liberty to discuss any details at this moment. I think any initiative taken by Canada at this time might be a serious embarrassment to those who have already taken initiative to bring about this kind of conference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Arising out of the reply to the leader of the opposition just made by the Prime Minister, is it not a fact that departmental officials are now gathering information preparatory to a conference to be held in November? Is there not something like that going ahead at the very moment?

Mr. St. Laurent: There is information being gathered for the purpose of making it available to those who are considering the calling of a conference at a not too distant date. The Canadian government has expressed its desire to co-operate to the fullest possible extent and to make whatever information can be gathered here available for consideration in that connection.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to enlarge this matter because we must not extend it into a debate, but in view of what has been said and the desire we all have that everything be done to advance a meeting of this kind I would most earnestly hope that Canada, with its peculiarly favourable position in relation to the commonwealth and the United States, will consider giving every possible lead in this direction that can be given.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

302. General administration, $2,105,832.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): When we had a discussion last night with reference to this matter the hon. member for Greenwood asked several questions which I will attempt to answer at this time. As reported at page 4227 of Hansard for July 3, he said:

> First of all I should like to know what the minister considers was the loss to the treasury last year from smuggling operations. He will recall what the Minister of Finance said . . .

The only answer I can give to that question is that nobody knows with any degree of accuracy what that loss was. It can only be an estimate and I would hesitate to make any estimate of what the loss has been in dollars and cents. The hon. member also said:

> I do want, however, to get from the minister what he considers the most significant facts. First of all I want to know the number of prosecutions and seizures which were being made prior to the change in the tax on April 8 last, and whether the minister has reason to think the situation has improved very greatly. Some opinions I have heard, though I cannot profess to have verified them, seem to indicate that the change is not nearly as great as one might expect.

I will give the hon. member the information with reference to seizures and perhaps that will suffice to answer the question. Cigarettes seized in the fiscal year 1951-52 amounted to 14,375,891. As against that from April 1, 1952, to May 31, 1952, cigarettes seized amounted to 2,633,932. With respect to prosecutions, for the fiscal year 1951-52 completed prosecutions numbered 508 and those convicted numbered 498. From April 1, 1952, to May 31, 1952, there were 122 completed prosecutions and 117 convictions. The number of motor vehicles forfeited for carrying smuggled goods in the fiscal year 1951-52 was 152, and from April 1, 1952, to May 31, 1952, the number was 27. In that period there were 41 cases still pending.

I think perhaps I should put on the record the answer to the question of the hon. gentleman as to cigarettes seized by both police and ports for the years 1951 and 1952. I shall give first the 1952 seizures for the months of January to May inclusive. The figures are as follows:

1952	No. seized
January	1,889,290
February	1,470,019
March	1,060,025
April	1,494,772
May	1,139,160

I think the figures for the last six months of 1951 indicate the trend. They are as follows:

1951	No. seized
July	873,980
August	960,674
September	734,747
October	1,323,645
November	2,048,838
December	1,521,594

In the whole year 1951 there were 11,080,291 cigarettes seized. The trend of the figures through July, August, September and October and reaching a high point in November indicates to me personally that smugglers of course always operate under cover if they can. In November the hours of darkness are longer which makes it easier for the smuggler to carry on his operations. Of course I think there is always going to be smuggling of cigarettes as long as there is a differential between the price at which they can be purchased in the United States and the price at which they are on sale in Canada. I will not deny that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could I ask the minister a question? Before the minister makes his general observations, I am wondering if he is going to give me the figure I asked for particularly last night. That was not the number of cigarettes seized but the number of seizures, that is to say, the number of cases of law-breaking. I said last night that seemed to me the most indicative figure. It is that figure that I should like to get particularly, and all the more because I notice that the prosecutions—and I would be interested to know why—seem to be only a small fraction of what I understand to be the number of seizures.

Mr. McCann: We can give those figures. I think perhaps the most recent ones might be given first. In 1952 the total number of seizures in January was 559.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is this for cigarettes?

Mr. McCann: This is all seizures.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I said last night that as long as we get a comparable figure we can carry the thing right through. Last night the minister gave me some figures for cigarettes and then said later that they were the figures for everything. What I am interested in is getting a comparable figure that can be carried right through.

Mr. McCann: I doubt if it is possible to give a comparable figure. I say that for the reason that so far as a great many seizures are concerned there might be one carton of cigarettes, a pair of boots, a tire in a trunk and something else. You could not put that down merely as a seizure of cigarettes, but it is a seizure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As long as we get a comparable figure I think that is the best that can be done, but I should like a comparable figure throughout.

Mr. McCann: We will give comparable figures for all seizures for the first six months of 1952. They are as follows:

1952	All seizures
January	559
February	609
March	641
April	660
May	707
June	648

Would the hon. member like the figures for 1951?

Starting in January the total number of seizures were: January, 426; February, 421; March, 457; April, 514; May, 600; June, 617; July, 587; August, 680; September, 731; October, 697; November, 687; December, 644. I can give you the totals in 1951 of cigarettes involved—the number of cigarettes that were seized.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On the figures the minister has given, as I took them down, the figures for 1952 show no lessening. The figures for 1952 run along practically parallel with those of 1951. I do not want to labour this and spend a lot of time on it but the minister says there is a peak from which we are receding.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I think that might be explained by the fact that there is an extra effort and more vigilance on the part of the police in making seizures—and on the part of the department too.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One other question. If I took the figures down correctly the number of prosecutions for 1951-52 was only 508.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Less than the seizures for one month.

Mr. McCann: Of course, the explanation is that there is not a prosecution in every case.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is certainly clear but I do want to know just the basis, if the minister can indicate it, on which we prosecute such a small number. There is probably some reason that I do not know of, but I would like to know it, and I would like to know also whether the minister thinks the deterrents are strong enough; because the picture one gets is disturbing. I read an estimate, and the figure is probably just plucked out of the atmosphere, but the estimate was that the police are only getting about five per cent. No doubt that is somebody's guess but there is a great deal going on which is not caught.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, for the hon. gentleman's information, we prosecute the people whom we classify as commercial smugglers—those are the people who are definitely known to be in the business; but there is not a prosecution of the odd person who comes along and has a few cigarettes. The cigarettes may be confiscated and that is probably the end of it. If people wish to pay duty and penalty on them, well and good; that is done and that ends the case. If they do not, the cigarettes are confiscated and distributed to veterans' hospitals throughout the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In other words, you distinguish between professionals and enthusiastic amateurs. I am not going to comment further at the moment but I would like to ask a question on this. Just what does the minister consider to be the experience of his department as to the adequacy of the deterrents? This thing is keeping on and it is an ugly business. Has the minister any view to express?

Mr. McCann: I think that the deterrents have been in a measure fairly effective in that they are helping to stop the big smuggling. Seizures have been made where a truck is seized and on it there is a load of cigarettes worth anywhere from $10,000 to $15,000. Now, we are not finding as much of that because when that truck is seized with $14,000 or $15,000 of cigarettes, and those concerned have to pay a fine, if there is a deterrent at all that is it. I think it is having its effect.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister will recall I think the representations of the tobacco industry particularly last year as to the damage they were suffering. Is there any indication from them of their feeling about the present situation, whether it has improved, and if so, how much?

Mr. McCann: I might say that we have not had protest from the industry to the same extent this year. There were other factors in the lessened production figures last year and I refer particularly to the strike in the Imperial Tobacco Company. I do not think that the manufacturers of cigarettes are suffering very much because all indications are that the total number of domestic cigarettes, Canadian cigarettes made and entered for consumption, is on the increase. For instance, in May of this year consumption was 1,750,711,685 while the consumption in February was only 1,098,023,345. One of the factors entering into that increase is that the budget in April reduced the tax to a degree at least and consumption has increased. Although I do not know that the hon. member for Greenwood appreciated or caught my point, I said last night that there was a great increase in the use of manufactured tobacco. It indicated that an awful lot of people, instead of using and buying tailor-made cigarettes, were making their own. Lately, in the last year or two at least, there has not been a tax on cigarette papers and a lot of people have found it more economical to manufacture their own cigarettes. But, on the whole, there has been an increase in the consumption of tailor-made cigarettes, and I think I can say that there has been less protest from the Canadian manufacturers of cigarettes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have just one more question on this point. Who is responsible for the border patrol? Has the department an enforcement branch of its own or does it call in the R.C.M.P. and direct the R.C.M.P., or vice versa? Who is responsible? Also, to what extent has the patrol force been increased?

Mr. McCann: Since 1932 the R.C.M.P. have been doing the patrol work for the Department of National Revenue.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yesterday, I believe, the minister when referring to the increased estimates said that $1,900,000 odd was for salaries—increased salaries. I wonder if he would tell us whether this amount is attributable to raises in salaries or whether it is additions to staff; and possibly he would also comment on the policy of the department with respect to the dismissal of some employees and their replacement with auditors who have degrees?

Mr. McCann: Well, Mr. Chairman, as I stated last night the estimates provide for an increase over last year of $1,999,153 and the larger part, 95 per cent of the $1,999,153, is required to cover adjustments in salaries occasioned by the general increase that was applicable to all government employees. In addition, with respect to the second part of the hon. member's question, part of that sum represents an increase in positions sufficient to bring us up to the same strength we had a year ago. Of course, we are always trying to improve the calibre of the staff but there have not been any releases for the purpose mentioned.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the minister state the over-all wage and salary roll of the department?

Mr. McCann: There has been an increase of 118 in the salary quota. As of May 31, 1951, we had 4,886 permanents; 1,291 temporaries; and then we have what we call a seasonal staff. The hon. member will understand that in the busy part of the summer we need extra staff. There were 274 of those. This made a total of 6,451. For May 31, 1952, the permanents totalled 5,115. There have been a couple of hundred made permanent, so the temporaries are less, 1,205; seasonal staff is less, 249. This give us a total of 6,569, which is an over-all increase of 118 over the staff of a year ago.

Mrs. Fairclough: What is the amount of the total wage roll for the department?

Mr. McCann: We provide for $21,608,037; that is the total amount for wages.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then the increase in wages is almost 10 per cent over last year?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I think he has already been approached on this matter, and it relates to the sales tax imposed on church furniture. In the case of which I am aware, the donor of a gift to a church found that the furniture was marked "sales tax included". Upon making application he found that he had no claim for a rebate of this amount. In the very same church, another donor who had given a stained glass window found that there was no sales tax on those. It seems odd that one type of gift to a church is subject to sales tax and another is not, particularly when they both are classed as gifts to a place of worship.

Mr. McCann: Church furnishings and church pews are not exempt from sales tax. If the stained glass windows in this instance were a donation from abroad, we give a remission because usually they are erected as memorials. For instance, if an organ were erected in a church and had a plaque on it that it was a memorial to those of that congregation who lost their lives in the war, then we make a remission of sales tax.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would that apply to such things as a reredos, an altar or something of that nature which was given as a memorial? Are they exempt from sales tax?

Mr. McCann: No, the exemption has not been extended that far. I presume the hon. member is familiar with the Excise Tax Act, schedule III, in which there are five pages of articles which are exempt from sales tax. A lot of the material that goes into the church —the stone, cement and many other things, the glass for windows—that is exempt from sales tax.

Mrs. Fairclough: It seems to me like splitting hairs. I believe that if any of the equipment that goes into a church is exempt, that exemption might very well be extended to cover all the equipment of the church. I do not mean things like portable chairs and so on, but I mean the actual fixtures of the church. I cannot see where the department gains anything by splitting them into classifications and allowing exemption to one group and not another.

Mr. McCann: That is the policy as I have outlined it. I want to indicate to the hon. member that this department is only administrative. If the law is changed and gives further exemptions we shall be very happy to administer the law as indicated in any changes that would be made.

Mrs. Fairclough: I respectfully suggest that the minister, being the present custodian of policy let us say for the department, should suggest to his colleagues that the law be changed in that respect.

Mr. McCann: That is the rather anomalous and perhaps unhappy situation: we are not policy makers.

Mrs. Fairclough: If you cannot make changes in it, who can?

Mr. McCann: We will bring your suggestions to the Department of Finance to see what can be done about them.

Mr. Coldwell: I think it is rather odd that a stained glass window as a memorial could be exempt, and we will say a statue in a church or, we will say a reredos, would be taxed. It does not seem to me to be proper. In one instance you have a picture or an image or a reredos containing a number of images, and in one instance sales tax is not imposed while in the other instance it is. It does not seem to me to be sensible.

Mr. McCann: Well, it is as it is; that is the best answer I can give you.

Mr. Lennard: Did I understand the minister correctly when he said that if a pulpit were erected with a plaque on it saying that it was donated in memory of the men who had fallen in one of the great wars, that was tax free, but if a similar pulpit were erected as a memorial to some private individual or family, it would be taxed?

Mr. McCann: I was not speaking about pulpits or altars, but about organs.

Mr. Lennard: I am asking about the other.

Mr. McCann: The exemption is for memorials or monuments, and those are exempt under the Excise Tax Act. It must be memorials or monuments erected to members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the service of their country. If an altar or pulpit were erected as a memorial, and it were so indicated, that would be given consideration for exemption and it might qualify.

Mr. Coldwell: A memorial to members of the armed forces?

Mr. McCann: That is what it says, a memorial or monument erected to any members of the armed forces who lost their lives in the service of their country.

Mr. Coldwell: That narrows it.

Mr. Lennard: In other words, it does not apply to a memorial put up to private individuals?

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question about the temporary employees. I noticed the minister gave a figure of 1,291 for temporaries. Then, he said that this represented a reduction of, I think, around 200 in the temporary staff. I understand that the temporary staff is not entitled to be on the pension plan. Is that correct?

Mr. McCann: Yes; there was a reduction in temporaries this year, from 1,291 a year ago to 1,205; that would be a difference of 86.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My second question is this. Having regard to my understanding that these people may not be on the pension plan, I would be interested to know just what the situation is with regard to this 1,291. For example, I would be interested in knowing how many of them have been years in the service. In other words, those who are not temporary in any real sense. Secondly, I would be interested to know what wastage there is. How big a problem is this 1,291? Have we got 1,291 people most of whom have been in the government service for a long time, who would like to be under the pension plan and who cannot be? Or have we got 1,291 who are turning over fairly rapidly or where there is a great deal of wastage?

Mr. McCann: As a matter of policy, 10 per cent of our staff outside of ports are temporary. An employee comes into the service and, after certain years of service and satisfaction, he is put on the permanent force. Let me indicate to the hon. member that in May, 1951, we had 4,886 permanents and that number has been increased in a year to 5,115. That is an increase of 229 in a year. I think that is a fair increase from temporary employment or from temporaries to permanents, within that time, relative to the number employed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would not want to argue against that statement. It is progress. But I am still left without an answer to my question. Let us take into consideration this number of 1,291. First of all, will the minister say exactly what their position is with regard to pension rights? I may not have stated it quite accurately. In the second place, will he say, for example, how many of those 1,291 have been in the service, let us say, five years?

Mr. McCann: I am giving the information that we have not many who remain temporaries very long. As the hon. member will understand, the temporary pays into the retirement fund. Then when he becomes a permanent, he pays into the superannuation fund and he gets credit, of course, for the money he has put into the retirement fund. The retirement fund applies to temporaries and the superannuation fund applies to permanents. I am told that there are few of our employees whom it takes longer than one, two or three years to be transferred from the temporary force to the permanent force.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That situation sounds fairly satisfactory, but let me ask one further question. When an employee is transferred from the temporary force to the permanent force, as the minister has pointed out, he has had deductions from his salary even during his period as a temporary. Then he becomes permanent and goes under the ordinary civil service plan. Is he in exactly the same position as that in which he would have been if he had been permanent from the time he began to make his payments?

Mr. McCann: With regard to superannuation, he is in exactly the same position because he gets that credit.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Lennard: I have a matter that I wish to draw to the attention of the minister. If my understanding is correct, a Canadian who visits the United States for a period longer than 48 hours is allowed to bring back every four months certain things to the value of $100. Is that right?

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Lennard: I had this personal experience myself. A few months ago I visited the United States for ten days, came back and had $19 worth of goods to declare. I was not going over there on a spending spree. I declared that $19 worth of goods, and was immediately told that I would not be able to bring any more goods in from the United States until the four-months period was up. I do not think this is fair. If that is the policy, it encourages people who visit the United States to go the limit. In my case, as I say, I was on no spending spree. I declared this $19 worth of goods that I brought back, and I was immediately told that I would not be able to bring in any more goods tax-free for a four-months period. Is that the policy?

Mr. McCann: The hon. gentleman understands the situation correctly and was given the correct information. It would be an impossible administrative and bookkeeping job if the situation were otherwise. I think I know what the hon. member has in mind. He brought in $19 worth of goods. I think it is his opinion that on another occasion he ought to be able to bring in $131 worth of goods or at least the difference between—

Mr. Lennard: Is the limit $150 or $100.

Mr. McCann: $100. The hon. member thinks he should be able to bring in the other $81 worth?

Mr. Lennard: That is right.

Mr. McCann: That would not be in accordance with the law.

Mr. Lennard: I am merely stating that I consider the strict law as being extremely unfair.

Mr. McCann: I see what the hon. member means.

Mr. Lennard: It encourages people to go the limit and to fill the car full.

Mr. McCann: That is a matter that can be given consideration. I do not know whether any change will be made.

Mr. Drew: I want to raise a matter that I had hoped I might be raising before this time, but this seems to be the only time when I can present it. I do so in the hope that the situation may be given consideration. I am dealing with a particular application that was made for service with this department. Sometimes it is only by dealing with individual cases that it is possible to make an argument for reconsideration of the general policy. I am mentioning the case of a veteran of the last war by the name of Paul Flewwelling who served with the Royal Canadian Air Force and won the D.F.C. After four years' service with the R.C.A.F., in the bomber command, he returned to Canada. Like a great many other air force veterans he found that he could not become attached here and he went to Britain in 1947 to serve with the R.A.F. He returned in 1951, being unable to get a long term appointment with the R.A.F., in spite of the fact that he had been an instructor and had a high standing as a flying officer with the R.C.A.F. He then applied for a position with the department of customs and excise in Saint John. He wrote the civil service examinations in Saint John in December of 1951. He was informed that he had passed those examinations, but in January of this year he was told by the selection board that he could not get the position in any event because he had not been in the country for one year. He was informed by letter that he had passed the examinations but he was told orally that he could not get the appointment in any event for this reason.

This young man was born sixteen miles from Saint John. They have property there, and during the time that he was in England his wife held that property at all times while he was serving. I raise this point, and I shall be happy to give this young man's address and any other details to the minister or to anyone in the department because it seems to me that this represents one of those cases where regulations made for one purpose produce a result that was never intended. I feel sure that when there is a provision that someone will not be allowed to serve because he has not been in the country a year, it is obviously intended to apply to those who are strangers to Canada, and who are coming to Canada. Of course it is appropriate that persons should spend some time here, which would indicate that they were fitting into our general pattern of life, before they should be taken into the civil service and have to do with matters where they accept some responsibility in relation to the public. I feel, however, that that provision never could have been intended to apply to a young man who was born here and who spent all his life here except for the period that he served in forces that were associated with ours in a common cause.

I raise this now for two reasons: one, to deal with this as a specific case, and the other to use that specific case to express the hope that there will be a re-examination of some of these provisions so that any cases that are affected by service which really is in the common cause and within the empire shall not deprive anyone of an opportunity for appointment to which he would have been entitled had he remained in Canada at the time, or in a Canadian uniform. This simply happened to be a case where, not being able to serve in a Canadian uniform in that branch of the service for which he was qualified, he joined the Royal Air Force and served in what after all is a common cause.

Mr. McCann: I thank the leader of the opposition for bringing this particular case to our attention. The one year in the country regulation is not a regulation of the Department of National Revenue. That is a civil service regulation. From what the leader of the opposition says, I think he would be the exact type of man that we should like to have in our service, and I may say that there is no department of government, proportionate to the number of employees, that has more veterans within its service than we have. We have found them eminently satisfactory. They are well received by people coming into this country, and they carry on their duties very efficiently. What I will do is bring to the attention of the civil service commission and my colleagues this apparent anomaly, with a view to having it corrected.

Mr. Drew: I wish to express my appreciation of the assurance given by the minister, and simply to leave it. I was giving this specific example as an illustration of what had happened. Recognizing that it is a general problem, I hope that by bringing this forward it may be possible to have the general service regulations recognize that many young men have gone out of Canada with no thought of leaving Canada but simply of making use of the training that they had received in what they regarded at all times as a common cause within the commonwealth.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Before the item carries I want to return for a moment to the question of temporary and permanent employees. The reason I do that is that it has been brought to my attention in one particular instance that a man had served 22 years and was still on the temporary list. This was not in the minister's department, but in one of the departments of government. How many employees in the Department of National Revenue have been on a temporary basis for 15 years and 20 years?

Mr. McCann: The answer to that is absolutely none. It may have been some other department of government.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes.

Mr. McCann: There is nobody in our service who has been on the temporary list for 15 years or 20 years.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The reason I mentioned that was that I felt that it was very unjust treatment of any faithful civil servant.

Mr. Lennard: I have a question in connection with the international bridge at Niagara Falls. Are the quarters occupied by the customs officials there owned by the bridge authority and rented by the department?

Mr. McCann: As with most other bridges of that type, the accommodations are owned by the bridge authority and are supplied free of charge to the Department of National Revenue. We send our officers there to do the work at the point of entry.

Mr. Lennard: Therefore you would not have much control? I happened to drift into the office at a time when it was raining quite a shower, and the roof was leaking terribly. They had to move several desks. I said: "You need umbrellas in here." They said: "There is not much we can do about this. The roof has been leaking for months, but they will not fix it." In the circumstances, I cannot see that you can do very much about it.

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—

307. General administration, $1,537,200.

Mr. McCann: No; that is a separate department. Will you call the supplementaries for customs and excise on page 11.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We shall now call item 732 of the supplementary estimates on page 11.

Customs and excise divisions—

Ports, outports and preventive stations—

732. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment—further amount required, $66,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: I notice that the details of this item on page 37 do not give any location. Is this merely in anticipation of general demand, or is there anything specific in mind in asking for this?

Mr. McCann: I am afraid I was not listening attentively.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is this a contingency item?

Mr. McCann: It turns out that we require a little extra money for this.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister just say a word as to the position with regard to collection of taxes at the moment. I know it is pretty well up. Perhaps he can tell us exactly where it stands.

Mr. McCann: That is under 307? Yes.

I want to make a short statement with reference to the taxation division. I think it will give information that will be beneficial. When presenting the estimates of the taxation division—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Do I understand that item 732 is carried?

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—

307. General administration, $1,537,200.

Mr. McCann: When presenting the estimates of the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue, I have made it a practice to make a short statement mentioning points that may be of particular interest to hon. members with regard to the operation of the taxation division.

At page 44 of the estimates will be found the total amount required for the operation of the division, which is $23,432,212. This compares with the amount of $25,472,294 provided in the estimates for 1951-52 and represents a reduction of $2,040,082. Also on page 44 will be found the estimate for the operation of the income tax appeal board amounting to $119,693 which is an increase of $22,074.

The principal reduction is in the estimate provided for salaries, although there are reductions in other items. The total provided for salaries this year is $20,143,432; this compares with a total of $22,040,694 provided for in the 1951-52 estimates and represents a reduction of $1,897,262.

The total staff of the division as at the end of May 1951 was 6,944 people and as at the 1st May, 1952, 6,355, of which number 433 persons represent casual help hired about the beginning of March for the three or four month peak period which occurs each year around the statutory filing date. The actual number of persons with the division at the present time is somewhat short of the number required and a limited number of employees with the requisite qualifications are being engaged through the civil service commission. The total staff required by the division for all district offices as well as at head office should be closer to 7,500 than the present number. However, in conformity with the division's policy of restricting the personnel engaged to those whose qualifications are best suited to the work, it is unlikely that this figure will be reached for some time. The average monthly salary of all persons employed by the division at 1st May, 1952, was $252 as compared with $242 a year ago.

The next item to which I would like to refer is travelling expenses. The estimate for this year provides for a total of $700,000 which is $92,000 less than the estimate for last year. The department, in co-operation with the office of the comptroller of the treasury, scrutinize the travelling expenses very carefully and ensure that such are incurred only where warranted. Hon. members will appreciate that in the work of the division the part represented by the examination of records in the field is very important. For this reason it is essential that officials of the division do a good deal of their work in the field.

The third largest item in the estimates this year is for postage in the district offices. This item is $600,000 as compared to $650,000 provided for 1951-52.

The next item to which I would like to refer is for office stationery and supplies. The total amount provided in this year's estimates is $568,180 as compared to $719,500 for last year. This represents a reduction of $151,320. Every effort will be made to further reduce these costs and to ensure that they are kept to the essential minimum.

A closely related item for which an increased estimate is provided is office machine equipment. The amount this year is $142,500 as opposed to $35,000 last year. The increase in this item is occasioned by the acquisition of modern accounting machines and reproducing equipment which will be used in dealing with the accounts of employers deducting the tax at source from their employees. The revised procedure which has been developed effects substantial staff economies throughout the district offices and, in addition, achieves a more efficient bookkeeping system which should be of assistance to employers in their dealings with the district offices. The highest order of efficiency and service is warranted in accounting by the division for the taxes deducted by employers when one considers that through this source of revenue alone something like $800 million in taxes is collected. The revised system has been installed and is operating in several district offices.

Another related item for which there is a slight reduction is public forms. The amount submitted this year is $427,000 as against $440,000 provided for last year. A tremendous volume of public forms are required to be printed for this division and constant efforts are being made in co-operation with the queen's printer to effect economies. The wastage remains high and variations in the methods of distribution are being tried with some slight success. The wastage is caused by two general factors: first, the need for providing complete and adequate distribution; second, the natural inclination of the individual taxpayer to provide himself with extra copies of the forms. This is a difficult matter, as the primary requisite is the service to which the public is entitled.

An excellent illustration of the economies that have been effected by improved methods and procedures within the taxation division is provided by a comparison of the total estimate for all items relating to printing, stationery and office equipment for each of the last four fiscal years:

1949-50	$1,610,000
1950-51	1,605,000
1951-52	1,254,500
1952-53	1,197,380

The item for law costs is in total $230,000 as compared with $253,000 provided last year. The reduction is applicable to the vote for district offices which is $35,000 less than the amount provided last year. The saving achieved in this vote results from arrangements made with the R.C.M.P. who have undertaken a substantial part of the work in connection with prosecutions.

On the other hand, the vote for law costs under general administration which relates to the head office part of this work indicates an increase of $60,000 in this year's estimates, as against $48,000 provided last year. This increase is attributable to the number of appeals which are processed through the head office of the division as well as the exchequer court cases and collection matters.

I should like to make a brief comment about three of the other items. Advertising: this amount has been increased to $42,000 from $27,000 and is due in part to the opening of additional district offices as well as a small expansion in the scope of this program. As a matter of interest to hon. members, the "file early campaign" this year was most successful. Throughout the divisions, approximately twice as many returns were filed in February and early in March as in previous years.

Armoured car service has been increased to $20,000 from $13,000 owing to the opening of additional district offices and increased rates.

The item for $75,000 for acquisition of housing accommodation which is provided this year relates to the moving of the headquarters for the Yukon district office from Dawson to Whitehorse. There are other government departments also being moved to Whitehorse and this amount represents the cost of accommodation being provided for the taxation division.

With respect to the income tax appeal board, the following figures illustrate the work dealt with by this board during each calendar year since its inception in 1949. The number of appeals received in 1949 was 122, disposed of, 55. In 1950, received, 423; disposed of, 299. In 1951, received, 469; disposed of, 443. To April 30, 1952, received, 81; disposed of, 108. The foregoing indicates that at April 30 there were 190 appeals being dealt with. Hon. members may have noted with respect to salaries of members of the board the provision for an additional member. It is felt that the work of the board will be expedited by the appointment of an additional member.

I should like to conclude this statement with a brief reference to certain points in connection with the present position of the work of the division.

As at 1st May, 1952, there was an inventory of individual returns of 128,049; at the same date in 1951, the inventory of individual returns was 133,075. The number of returns processed from 1st January, 1952, to 1st May, 1952, was 2,247,966 as compared with 1,707,276 processed during the same period in 1951.

With respect to corporation returns, the inventory of returns as at 1st May, 1952, was 14,184; as at 1st May, 1951, this inventory was 19,369.

The number of corporation returns received from May 1, 1951, to 1st May, 1952, was 61,718 as compared with 59,105 for the same period ending in 1951.

With respect to the individual income tax returns filed this spring, 1,481,000 refund applications had been forwarded to the comptroller of the treasury by 21st May. As of the same date, 1,328,000 refund cheques had been issued.

The collection of outstanding taxes also indicates some improvement as illustrated by the following figures:

At April 15, 1952, there were 127,949 accounts outstanding amounting to $46,648,577. As at the same date in 1951, there were 153,636 accounts outstanding amounting to $58,120,949.

The over-all administrative costs of operating the division as related to $100 revenue received for the fiscal period ending March 31, 1952, was 99 cents. As at the same period in 1951, this cost was $1.62.

Last year when speaking about the estimates, I indicated to hon. members that certain additional district offices would be opened during the forthcoming year. I am pleased to be able to report that offices are now fully operating in Kitchener, Sudbury, Victoria and Windsor. At St. Catharines a district office has been opened and should be in full operation very shortly. It is not planned to open further district offices this year.

I trust that the foregoing comments will be of assistance to hon. members in considering these estimates and shall be glad to provide any further information that may be desired. The total collections last year were $2,204,046,302.14.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I imagine it would be convenient under this general administration item to ask the minister for some information about the work of the income tax appeal board. In particular, I would like to know how many appeals have been dealt with, how many are pending and what length of time is involved.

Mr. McCann: Perhaps the hon. member missed what I said in giving my statement. With respect to the income tax appeal board, the following figures illustrate the work dealt with by this board during each calendar year since its inception in 1949. The number of appeals received in 1949 was 122, disposed of, 55. In 1950, received, 423; disposed of, 299. In 1951, received, 469; disposed of, 443. To April 30, 1952, received, 81; disposed of, 108. The foregoing indicates that at April 30 there were 190 appeals to be dealt with.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What about the length of time?

Mr. McCann: The average length of time taken to dispose of a case is three months.

Mrs. Fairclough: With reference to the figures the minister has given, when he says that in 1949 there were so many appeals and in 1950 there were so many, does that mean appeals lodged in those years or does that mean the appeals are for those taxation years?

Mr. McCann: They were lodged, and that was the first year the appeal board was set up.

Mrs. Fairclough: The appeals may have been for 1946, 1947 or 1948?

Mr. McCann: They could well have been.

Mr. Fair: On many occasions in the past I have brought to the attention of the house the question of taxation as it applies to farmers. We had intended to have quite a discussion but because the estimates of the Department of National Revenue have not been brought in until this late date it will have to be postponed until another time.

[Mr. McCann.]

There is, however, a new brand of confiscation that has been imposed on farmers, and I have a letter concerning a particular case which was written by the lady concerned on the same date this session opened. I believe we discussed this matter to some extent at the time the budget resolutions were before the house. At that time I took up with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance the question of bachelors not being able to receive an exemption for wages paid to housekeepers. At that time the parliamentary assistant thought it was quite a joke and he said that perhaps the farmer should marry the housekeeper. However, if some of the farmers concerned had attempted to pick a wife for the parliamentary assistant perhaps he would not have thought it was quite so much of a joke.

I think this matter deserves consideration because after all farmers are natural people. Every bachelor farmer has his work to do on his farm and I think he is entitled to exemption for the wages paid to a housekeeper, but up to the present time that has been denied. I believe that farmers are as much entitled to lead a natural life in every sense of the word as anybody else, but in the light of the circumstances which I intend to relate in a moment it will be apparent that they are not supposed to live that way.

The case I am concerned with at the present time has to do with a farmer and his wife. Apparently they did the natural thing some years ago and were married legally. The farmer was a man of small means. In my case when I came to this country I had $50 and when I got married I was in debt to the tune of a few thousand dollars. In this case the farmer's wife had owned some cattle before her marriage, and after they were married they naturally put their herds together and went to work as many of us did on our farms in the earlier days, and as I expect is being done at the present time. After some time the lady's herd of cattle increased, as did her husband's, and they were able to purchase a half section of land. However, the time came when ill health and general conditions compelled them to reduce their herds. They did so and apparently placed the proceeds of the sale in the bank in the husband's name but the wife had a power of attorney.

In 1948 a government annuity contract was purchased to yield the wife $100 a month as soon as she reached the age of 60, and I might say that in a very short time she will have reached that age. That policy cost them $13,268.76. The purchase was made out of the proceeds of the sale of their basic livestock herd on which the income tax department had been satisfied so far as income tax was concerned. It was their money to do with as they pleased. If they had had a joint account, as many farmers and their wives do, and the lady had signed the cheque in payment for the annuity I do not suppose any trouble would have arisen in connection with the matter. However, because the husband signed the cheque we find that after a little while they received a notice of assessment from the taxation division at Edmonton indicating that they owed gift tax amounting to $1,184.63. The gift tax was assessed because the farmer had signed the cheque for the purchase of the annuity.

I do not believe they had any ulterior motive because they have not got very much property, but it was pointed out to them by the taxation division at Edmonton that it was one method of evading succession duty. At the time they purchased the annuity they were advised by the annuity office in Edmonton that there would be no tax on the transaction simply because they had already paid income tax on the amount received from the sale of their basic herd. However, they were assessed the sum of $1,184.63 and that amount has been confiscated from them in the Russian manner. That is not the way to increase production in this country. They and many other farmers have curtailed their production drastically because of the taxation methods employed. I believe such methods should not be tolerated by this or any other government.

Earlier in the session I took the matter up with the minister and had most courteous replies from him but we did not get a refund of the amount. I believe a refund with interest should have been made long before now. The amount should never have been collected to begin with. The result is that the annuity contract has cost these people $14,453.39 for an annuity of $100 per month. The policy is only guaranteed for ten years. The lady says that because of the state of her health she doubts very much whether she will reach the age of 70 but if she does she will have collected $12,000. It appears to me that there is something wrong. It would seem that there is a penalty because people live a natural life.

I am not accusing the minister of dishonesty, far from it. I have known him since 1935 and I have a lot of respect for him. However, I also know the farmers of the west, having lived there since 1914, almost forty years. I know the struggle that many young people have had in order to make a living, and now when they have reached a certain age and their health is broken simply because of the conditions under which they have had to live, in what is a semi-arid part of the province along the south line of my constituency, they are treated in this way by the Department of National Revenue. I feel that it is not good enough and I am asking now that, without further delay, the Department of National Revenue refund those people the amount of $1,184.63 plus 6 per cent interest; because that is the amount the government would have charged them had they not paid their income tax.

I do not want to take up any more time—

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fair: —but I do believe that in the interest of justice all round—and the farmers have not had any too much justice in the past either in the prices they have been allowed for their production or in these matters—the department should straighten this out.

Mr. Low: This appears to be one of those cases where a strict application of the law does result in gross injustice. There is a remedy and the treasury board have the remedy in their hands. It is, by treasury board minute, to remit that gift tax and then bring into this house an amendment which would make it abundantly clear that no such gross injustice should be perpetrated again. I think the Department of National Revenue ought to ask for such a remission order so that these folks will not have to pay $14,453.39 for a ten-year annuity of $100 per month. It is only worth $12,000 now. Those folks would have been better off to have kept their cash.

Mr. McCann: They are paying for the annuity—it is not $12,000 cash.

Mr. Low: On top of the payment for the annuity they have had to pay this gift tax of over $1,100 which is the thing we are talking about. I think it is iniquitous. I am not blaming the minister but I think it is one of those cases where strict application of the law will result in injustice. I do not see that there is any other interpretation which can be placed on it and I know that the minister himself would not want that to continue.

Mr. McCann: I do not think there is much use discussing the individual case at this time. There has been a lot of correspondence on it and I suggest that this is exactly the type of case for which the income tax appeal board was set up. For the small sum of $15 an appeal can be made to that board and if the case goes favourably to the appellant the fee is refunded.

Mr. Low: Do you not think that at this time it would be wise to consider changing the act? That would make such injustices as this impossible in the future, and this is likely to happen to a number of people.

Mr. McCann: In answer to that question I say again that we are only an administrative department and if changes are to be made representations might well be made to my colleague the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Low: I notice your colleague the Minister of Finance is listening now.

Mr. Abbott: These matters are always considered.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister whether it is too late to lodge an appeal now against this iniquitous practice?

Mr. McCann: We will have to look into the matter to see whether it comes within the regulations that are set up regarding appeals. There is a time limit but I cannot say offhand what that time limit is.

Mr. Fair: Would the minister please let me know?

Mr. McCann: Yes, we can do that.

Mrs. Fairclough: There are two or three things I should like to mention to the minister at this time. In the first instance I would like to ask him when he is replying to give us some information about when we may expect the regulations regarding deferred capital cost allowance will be withdrawn. At the time those regulations were put into effect there were some restrictions on building, and supplies were not available. It was thought advisable to curtail investment in both building and equipment, but as conditions have eased somewhat, and as this particular regulation causes a considerable amount of difficulty from the standpoint of both accounting in the various establishments concerned and, I am sure, within the department itself, I hope that serious consideration will be given to withdrawing those regulations within the course of the current year.

The minister spoke a few moments ago about the time limit for the making of appeals. In that regard I might say that the government treats the taxpayer in a manner entirely different from that in which he is allowed to act himself. I have particular regard to investigations which have been made within the last couple of years. The main complaint I have had was from a professional man, a doctor, and I will use his case to illustrate.

In this instance the officials went into his office and went back not for one year or two years or three years but for ten years. I am sure that the minister himself would have difficulty remembering details of operations in his office ten years ago. I know that I would myself. I do not think I can remember matters of administration within my office three years ago. If anyone asked me, unless I had a complete record on paper I am sure I could not answer any questions. I believe a busy professional man suffers considerable injustice when investigations are conducted over such a long period. I realize that during the war with the added work in the department and the difficulty of obtaining staff there was a backlog of work and examinations of returns were not completed for sometimes four or five years. But at the present time I think it is pretty well caught up—or that is the information I have; and I do not believe it is right that there should be no time limit on these investigations. If the department has not caught up with the taxpayer within four or five years it does not seem fair that they should go back for that length of time unless there is quite a bit of evidence of failure to report income. Where a man has reported right along and has paid his tax it does not seem proper to me that the department, merely for the sake of checking his records, should go back ten years. In the particular case to which I have reference, when the investigation was over there had not been anything to speak of, and it does not seem proper.

Earlier in this session I spoke with regard to the method employed in the department for computing dependents' allowance with particular reference to children who are eligible for family allowances and those who are not. At that time I put a case on the record where a child did not qualify by reason of residence until December, and the parent of that child was only permitted to charge a $150 exemption. If my memory serves me well, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance at that time took up the question and said: Well, in any event, in the year in which the allowance ceased, that is the year in which the child became 16 years of age, the guardian or parent would benefit to the extent of being allowed the full $400 exemption despite the fact that the child was eligible for only a portion of the year.

In that case, peculiarly enough, they only received family allowance for two months—December in the one year and January in the next. I became interested in this case and wrote back to find out whether or not they did receive any allowance at all for December and I found that while they were required to deduct only $150 for this dependent they did not even receive family allowances in the December in which the child qualified. In the following month, January of the following year, they received a cheque for two months—for December in the one year and for January of the next year—and that was the end of it. They received the one cheque for the two months and it prohibited the taxpayer from claiming the full allowance of $400 for that child for one year. Of course, he could claim it in the next year.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that there should be some sense to these things. Under normal conditions the parents would not even have applied for family allowance because it was apparent they could only receive it for two months. But even if they had not applied, the rules were still applicable to that case because the child was eligible within that month of December, and whether or not they received the family allowance they failed to receive the full allowance for that dependent. To my mind, this is wrong. I quite understand that a parent might well calculate that in three or four years it would be to his advantage not to have the family allowance but to claim the $400 dependent's allowance rather than the $150. I know what that would mean to the department, and that is one of the reasons this regulation was put into effect, because of the difficulties of administration.

Where a child coming into the country is sixteen years of age, it seems to me to be wrong that the parents are not permitted to claim the full amount of $400. In this case it meant quite a sizeable difference in tax. I had it calculated—I believe he had three children—and the difference in the tax amounted to some $123 which he was forced to remit in addition to what he had already paid. I believe that is a matter which should be given some consideration by the department.

Another matter which I brought up in the house a couple of weeks ago concerns the deduction of dues paid by professional engineers to their society in Ontario. I believe the minister will recall that I asked that question, and the answer was that the matter would be given consideration. I should like to know whether or not that has been done.

There is a rather technical matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. It arises out of the current policy of the federal income tax department in attempting to tax what is usually called the reserve for unredeemed tickets of dairy, bakery and other businesses using tickets as a payment convenience for themselves and their customers. In some cases these amounts for unredeemed tickets have been set up on the company's books as reserves. I admit that the term "reserve" is really a misnomer when applied to all these tickets. This term may be the chief cause of the present trouble. It may be that a more acceptable accounting practice would be to credit the proceeds of tickets sold to an account named "liability for unredeemed tickets" or "customers' deposits on future sales." Then, when the goods or services were delivered and some tickets redeemed, they could enter the amount of the goods delivered as a sale, with a consequent reduction in the aforesaid liability account.

In computing taxable income, it is stated in the Income Tax Act, section 12 (1) (e), that no deduction from taxable income shall be allowed in respect of an amount transferred or credited to a reserve, contingent account, or sinking fund except as expressly permitted by this part. It can be argued that if the sales of tickets are not credited to income in the first place, it is not necessary to claim them as deductions. Moreover, if the proceeds of tickets are credited to a liability account not called by the term "reserve", it can be contended that the above subsection of the act does not apply to it.

I think it might be well to consider the relationship of this problem to some other industries, because some businesses require deposits on account of a customer's order for goods before they will proceed to work on or supply goods. For instance, in the case of a big machine ordered, a manufacturer may require a large deposit to help finance the cost of manufacture or to guard against a substantial loss if the customer does not accept delivery when the machine is completed. A rental may be prepaid, let us say, over a period of a year or a retaining fee received for work to be done in the succeeding year or a customer's accidentally overpaid balance may be left to apply on account of the next periodic purchase. All the foregoing represent payment received in advance of goods or privileges to be delivered, and the income tax department does not require them to be assessed as taxable income. They can be set up on the company's or individual's books and claimed as deferred. It does not require contractors to pay on profits until the contracts are completed. Why then does it require dairies and bakeries, transportation companies and so on, to pay on receipts for which they have not yet bought the goods to make delivery? I claim, Mr. Chairman, this is discrimination.

A very important point to be considered is that a real liability for a cash refund on tickets does exist. I have never heard of any dairy or bakery, and I am sure the minister has not either, which has refused to return cash on demand for any tickets presented to it. Just recently in Hamilton, as a matter of fact within the last couple of months when the Hamilton street railway issued new tickets at an increased rate it advertised particulars of, and actually carried out, a redemption of the old unused tickets in the hands of customers. The drivers for dairies and bakeries carry cash and tickets on the same basis, and they are equivalent in value, and equivalent to each other in making their returns at the end of the day when accounting for the day's sales. In practice, all the time they are giving cash on demand for tickets. Whether or not there is a legal liability to redeem in cash, so far as I know this practice has been followed in winding up or bankruptcy proceedings.

Businesses with a liability for outstanding tickets appearing on their financial statements, Mr. Chairman, are approached by the income tax assessors in the first place, and asked if they will accept an assessment on their ticket liability account. If so, they are offered the proposition that the full balance of the said liability may be added to the taxable income of the enterprise for the year 1949, or else may be spread over the years 1949 to 1951 in any reasonable proportion which can be substantiated by figures submitted by the taxpayer. If the taxpayer will not accept this proposition or indicates that he will appeal on principle to the appeal board, which he has a legal right to do, then the department will withdraw its proposition and assess the ticket liability account on the basis of increases in it for the full period from six years prior to the date of the last assessment to the present time. It will also charge interest—there again we have a contentious point, Mr. Chairman—on those reopened assessments of prior years. This reopening of these old assessments often goes back to 1944 or 1943 affecting periods when the 75 per cent and 100 per cent excess profits taxes were in force, and resulting in very large additional bills for income and excess profits taxes. In those years the taxpayer had no inkling of any such treatment by the income tax department, and frequently the assessments are staggering to their financial position. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the whole approach indicates strong-arm methods, with the use of a particularly heavy club to discourage appeals.

In closing these few remarks on this contentious subject I would ask the minister, in the first place, whether he will give consideration to this point and take whatever appropriate action may be necessary to revise the act in this regard. In the second place, I should like to ask him a personal question. During the course of my remarks someone was kind enough to send me some street-car tickets. May I apply them on my income tax?

Mr. McCann: All of the matters brought to our attention by the hon. member for Hamilton West have to do with policy, and I am glad that my colleague the Minister of Finance has been here. There are just one or two things I might say with reference to the assessment going back of over a period such as that which the hon. member claims. There is a six-year limitation with reference to re-assessment unless there are indications that correct returns have not been made.

Mrs. Fairclough: They took ten years in this one office.

Mr. McCann: I have a long file on the matter myself. The gentleman in question is a friend of mine of many years' standing. I could name him if I wanted to.

With reference to the dues of engineers, that is a matter that would require a change in the law. As to the matter of reserve for tickets, that is, as I say, a policy question and is before the courts at the present time.

With reference to the matter of deferred depreciation, I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement on that matter a short time ago.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: No. Following up the minister's remark that the matter of dues for professional engineers would require a change in the act—

Mr. Abbott: I have already advised that that matter will be considered prior to the next budget. I made that answer to the question here about two months ago.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister answered it two months ago, certainly; but surely it does not take two months to decide whether the dues that a professional engineer pays to his association are any different from those which are paid to a union by a worker.

Mr. Abbott: What I meant was that it would require a budgetary change, and that I have indicated publicly that we will consider it with a great many other budgetary matters prior to the introduction of the next budget.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—
International shortwave broadcasting service—

54. Maintenance and operation including authority to credit to the appropriation revenue from rental of facilities in Radio Canada building to an amount of $140,000 and to re-expend it for the purposes of the international service, $1,982,675.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister going to say something about the C.B.C.?

Mr. McCann: Yes. This item 54 has to do with the maintenance and operation including authority to credit to the appropriation revenue certain amounts of money for the international shortwave broadcasting service.

Canada's shortwave service continues its work of interpreting Canada and its policies to the world. This is an increasingly important work. Canada is bearing its share in the mutual defence efforts of the free world to deter aggression. Canada is also bearing its share in the positive and intelligent presentation of the free world's position in the current struggle for the minds of men.

The work of this service in the world arena has great psychological, political and economic significance. It is a source of solid encouragement to all men who continue to believe in the democratic way of life; and there are many listeners—perhaps more than we may at times imagine—who do so under the most adverse circumstances. It is an untrammelled source of information that respects no frontiers, recognizes no iron curtains. With a twist of the listener's finger, it can fill a hall, hush to a whisper or be silent at a sound on the stairs. It is a source of fact —hard, uncompromising fact—for those who have no other access to fact, access otherwise only to distortion and perversion. And is it not truth which shall make men free? It is a source for knowledge of democratic processes and democratic achievement. And is not Canada a great source of inspiration for us here? Further, by developing a wider knowledge of our country and its resources, its economic and industrial potential and its business world, it serves as a means of conditioning for trade development markets such as Latin America which Canadians are now just beginning to exploit. Canada's economic growth is dependent on a healthy and expanding multilateral trade. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce recently has said:

> Canada puts forth an effort to trade with every country in the world . . . It is because we have that flexibility of outlook that . . . we have been able to maintain an expanding level of trade and thus keep Canada prosperous.

The work of the international service daily grows more intensive and more complex. Even closer liaison has been established with the Department of External Affairs in the day-to-day policy administration and with B.B.C. and "The Voice of America" in the development of program services. The Canadian missions abroad are being given fuller information on the transmissions to the individual countries and are proving increasingly helpful in the information and guidance they are providing to the service.

The monthly program schedule of the service, which is sent out to listeners only on request, now has a circulation of over 100,000 copies. Mail response in the year 1951 was close to 40,000 letters from all parts of the world, with the greatest number coming from Europe where our transmissions are most heavily concentrated.

The relay of Canadian programs on the national services of other countries, whether direct or by disc, continues to expand. Canadian programs including the Canadian musical transcription service are aired by the broadcasting organizations of all the western European countries to which our service is transmitted and by twenty-seven Latin American stations in fourteen of the Latin American republics.

While it remains impossible to expand the language service, particularly to satellite countries, with the current limited transmitter facilities, greater opportunities for specialization have been effected for the various language units, and the projected Ukrainian service went on the air on the 1st of July of this year. All this is being done within an operating budget that remains relatively the same as in the previous fiscal year. This is achieved by a general reduction of freelance services and a limited increase in staff appointments. This results in a more efficient use of the funds available and a more effective preparation and control of program material. The disc relay service of domestic C.B.C. programs for the Canadian forces serving in Korea was extended at the end of 1951 to our forces serving in Germany. Canadian news and sports reviews are transmitted daily as well by international service to the forces in Germany, and arrangements are proceeding at the present time for similar transmissions to Korea.

In accordance with the announcement of the Prime Minister, the Canadian ambassador in Rome, Mr. Jean Desy, was seconded to the post of director general of international service and assumed his duties in that post on January 1 of this year.

I think that statement attempts to cover some of the services of the international short wave broadcasting service and the item here, of which the details are given on page 127, outlines the expenditures for the international service this year. The total amount is $1,982,000 as compared with $1,709,000 a year ago. I think hon. members will appreciate the fact that fees for performers, salaries and general expenses in connection with running services of this kind have increased somewhat over the years and are probably in keeping with the increase there has been in the cost of services of this kind in other fields.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has confined himself in the main to the international shortwave. I suppose that is because the larger figure is a statutory one.

Mr. McCann: If you will excuse me just a moment, I might say that, with reference to the statutory item, the best answers to any questions that might be put in connection with it are contained in the C.B.C. annual report, which I tabled just two or three days ago. I shall be glad to attempt to answer any questions with reference to the operations of the C.B.C., but the hon. member for Greenwood will recall that just last fall a committee investigated all of the matters connected with C.B.C., and at that time a sort of preview was given of what the activities were and what the financial statement was likely to be.

I see some press comments with reference to an operating surplus. If you will recall, the amount of money that was paid to the C.B.C. was paid very late in the year, and the fact is the money that was appropriated was for both capital expenditure and operating expenditure. It shows an operating surplus, but as a matter of fact the corporation has not had the time, up to the end of the fiscal year, to spend the money that they intended to spend for extensions and betterments.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have no doubt the minister's explanation is that we may take it for granted that when they have time they will certainly spend it.

Mr. McCann: I quite agree.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask one technical question in connection with the shortwave, lest I forget it. Then I have some more general questions. Has the government ever given consideration to the establishment of additional shortwave transmitters in the maritimes, and possibly on the west coast as well, in order to increase the listening audience to "The Voice of Canada"? I realize this is not international shortwave, but I want to get this question asked for fear there may be a chance of my forgetting it. Have I made it clear?

Mr. McCann: I think I understand the question. Of course, that is a matter for the corporation and not for the government at this time; but we felt that the capital costs that we have in the shortwave at Sackville, which is supposed to be one of the finest in the world, just about meets the requirements and the services that we want to give, and at the moment we are not prepared to make further extensions on the west coast or anywhere else with reference to the shortwave system.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make one or two general observations, bearing in mind what the minister said a few moments ago, that it is a short time since last autumn. I want to recall the fact that we are in favour of the public control of radio broadcasting. The questions we raise and have raised are merely about the fact that the commission is still left as a competitor in business and as a judicial body, but I am not going to dwell on that. I just want to register it. I also want to recall that we deprecated the grant for a period of years, for the reason given that it was a thing which might get into politics. Therefore we wanted to take it out of politics and not to have the grant for a period of years. The argument put up at the time by the government did not seem to me very convincing. Many people here would like to see it taken out of politics. Perhaps the Minister of Finance would like to see his department carried on in that way. However, what I am coming to is this. I want to ask the minister two questions. First of all, in the report of the commission it says in broad general terms—this is the 1951-52 report—

> The corporation will use the balance of its income to carry out to the fullest possible extent the recommendations of the royal commission. Improvements and extensions of service embodied in these recommendations were under active consideration at the close of the present fiscal year.

And so on. The minister will remember that in the report of the C.B.C. there were certain broad suggestions made last December. They are contained in sections 9, 11, 20 and 21 of the third report of the radio broadcasting committee. Perhaps the minister can say something in general on that. In particular, I want to draw attention to one of the important recommendations which were made by the commission and to ask what has been happening in connection with it.

The minister will recall that the Massey commission, in commenting on the commercial broadcasting of the C.B.C., said at page 291:

We therefore recommend:

h. That the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation refuse all commercial programs not acceptable in content and that they consider the possibility of eliminating some of the less desirable commercial programs now carried, and of replacing them by programs more appropriate to Canadian listeners.

I should like the minister to tell us what progress has been made along that line in particular. I should like to know what the income from commercial broadcasting has been since the making of this recommendation. In other words, will the minister tell us what progress has been made, and what the evidence of it is, toward carrying out this recommendation.

Mr. McCann: I have not the report of the committee on broadcasting of last year before me, to which reference was made and specifically to recommendations 9, 11, 20 and 21. With reference to the other question having to do with the implementation of the recommendations of the Massey commission, I am informed by the officers that progress is being made in that line in reducing the commercial programs, and that some of the United States commercial programs that have formerly been carried in this country, when the contracts expire, are not being renewed. We are doing everything, at least the corporation is doing everything they can with reference to implementing the recommendations that were made by the Massey commission. Of course, as the hon. member for Greenwood will understand, that all takes time, just as well as it takes time to implement the positive suggestions and recommendations of the commission. As far as the commercial revenue of the C.B.C. goes, the budget of this year is $200,000 less for commercial programs than it was a year ago. The revenue that they expect to get will come down, they say, by $200,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister give me the figures for last year and this year so that we will get the relative importance of the $200,000?

Mr. McCann: That will pretty well be found in the statement of business in the annual report. In the annual report at page 46 they show income and expenditures from April 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952. For commercial broadcasting it was $2,456,431.92. But the budget for this year is $200,000 less than that, which is approximately 10 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask one supplementary question? This is a technical question having to do with the question I asked the minister a moment or two ago. I notice that in section 9 of the report there is a recommendation as follows:

The committee feels that with increased resources the corporation should take further steps to improve its coverage in outlying areas not receiving service and to equalize service in different parts of Canada.

I had intended commenting on the surplus, but the minister anticipated me. But I do point out—I have not the reference here—that it was one of the recommendations of the Massey commission and it certainly carried into the report of the committee. I am wondering when the minister gave such a firm answer a few minutes ago if anything further is contemplated.

Mr. McCann: May I correct the hon. gentleman. I understood that he was asking with reference to stations on the west coast for shortwave broadcasting.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I may have misled the minister.

Mr. McCann: If the hon. member will pardon the interruption, I can answer that now. The matter of extensions is being dealt with from day to day with a view to giving coverage to those parts of the country which did not formerly have it, for instance on the west coast and in districts like Kenora and Fort William, by means of what is called in the business booster transmitters. Considerable work is being done and the only thing that stopped us from doing this work in former years was the lack of funds. Now that funds are available these services will be extended as soon as booster transmitters become available. We aim to give coverage ultimately to all the people of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps I did mislead the minister, but I would like to ask my question again to be sure just what the answer is and so there will be no possibility of misunderstanding. Has the government given consideration to the establishment of additional shortwave transmitters in the maritimes, and possibly on the west coast as well, in order to increase the listening audience of "The Voice of Canada"?

Mr. McCann: The answer I gave to that is correct. Consideration has been given, but no positive policy has been determined with reference to having a shortwave system on the west coast which would transmit to Japan and countries in that area, nor are we making additional expenditures for shortwave facilities in the maritimes. By certain adjustments to our shortwave station in the maritimes we can probably get a greater coverage than we presently have, but not by means of new stations.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, after what the hon. member for Greenwood has said, I would like to ask to what extent the broadcasting corporation is endeavouring to minimize commercial advertising on private stations. One of their obligations is to supervise broadcasting generally in Canada and they have certain regulations regarding the content of the programs of private stations and spot announcements and advertising.

I listen to the radio quite frequently and I admit that it is usually to the C.B.C. stations because I think their programs on the whole are superior and so free from this continuous advertising of all kinds of things, some of which may be good for you and some of which may upset your stomach or digestion or ruin your health generally.

I am wondering to what extent the broadcasting corporation is carrying out its obligation to see that the content of programs does not include a superabundance of advertising, as some do. I listen to some stations and I hear one spot announcement after the other, advertising all kinds of things. Not only are the programs spoiled, but I think I can say without hesitation that the people of Canada are fed up with the kind of high pressure advertising carried by many of these stations. I do not believe that the broadcasting corporation is carrying out its obligations under the act in this regard.

I just wanted to add that, when some criticism is made of the amount of advertising on the C.B.C. stations, I should like to see it cut out altogether on all stations, but I realize that that is idealistic and impractical under the form of broadcasting we have in our country.

I doubt very much if the broadcasting corporation is carrying out its obligations in another field, that of insisting upon the private stations using more live and local talent. There is the odd program in the country, like the fine one entitled "Singing Stars of Tomorrow." This is put on by a private company and is rendering great service to the country; but generally speaking I do not think the private stations are carrying out their obligations. After all, they are given a monopoly for the use of an airwave that belongs to the people of Canada and it was never intended that that should be used purely for private profit and gain. Again I ask the minister to tell me to what extent the broadcasting corporation is carrying out its duties under the act in seeing that we have less of objectionable and frequent advertising.

Mr. McCann: The suggestions of the hon. gentleman would be pretty hard to put into effect. The C.B.C. are applying the existing regulations which are constantly under review, but I cannot hold out much hope at the moment that there will be any drastic changes in the immediate future. Attempts will be made to improve programs on private stations and have them more in conformity with what we think a more idealistic system should be.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I realize that this is not an occasion when there should be an extended discussion of government policy with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. One reason which limits our consideration of this subject to some extent is the decision to make annual payments under a statutory provision. I think that that is absolutely wrong, but nevertheless that practice has been adopted and it cannot be changed by discussion of the estimates at this time.

One point was raised by the minister to which I should like to refer, that is the function of the private station. I do not think that we are giving this system of combined public and private broadcasting a chance to operate on a basis which will produce real efficiency. I do not think that that can be done until the private stations are placed in a position of real competitive opportunity with the public stations.

If we believe in a dual system with competition then we should make it a really competitive system. The private stations should have the same rights to set up networks as the public stations. The private stations should be able to have the advantages of network arrangements for programs that the public stations have. Until that is done I am satisfied that talent in this country is not going to have the opportunity it should have through the advantage of a competitive system.

I can see many reasons in this country why there should be a public organization making it possible for programs to be carried into areas which otherwise would not be covered. I would point out that it was the Conservative party that carried it into effect. There can be no argument that our policy has always been that there should be public service of this kind. But I do believe that there should be a separation of the supervising and administrative body known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the actual operation, which has become so largely a commercial operation. I shall leave it at that, but I do not wish to leave any suggestion by my silence at this point that I believe we are getting anything like the service we should be getting for the money that is being expended to maintain the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think it has invaded fields that it was never intended to occupy. It has multiplied commercial operations which are not the function of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I would hope that between now and next session there will be a real review of what the policy is with respect to the functions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and that we will have a discussion, with some opportunity to carry it on as a general debate, with regard to the relationship of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations of this country.

I do want to speak about one aspect of the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation about which I do not think enough has been said and with respect to which I do not think there is as yet any clearly defined policy. I think we have the most backward approach to television of any country with facilities comparable to those we now possess.

Mr. McCann: By way of explanation, there is an item covering television. I intend to make a statement with reference to policy, and I think the matter might be discussed better after that statement is made.

Mr. Drew: Since the minister is making that statement I will defer my remarks until later.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to add one comment. I have not read the report of the C.B.C. through but as far as I can see on casual perusal it consists almost wholly of giving a detailed account of what they have done, which of course is interesting. However, to my mind it underlines the great undesirability of having given it a grant for several years so that it does not have to come back each year and, so to speak, sell itself again to the house. The only reference I can find as to general policy is on the first page. I have already read it. It is to the effect that the corporation will use the balance of its income to carry out to the fullest possible extent the recommendations of the royal commission.

Subject to being corrected by someone who has read the report more carefully than I have, that is the sum total of the reference. I have also found no reference whatever to the report of the committee of this house which had a dozen or fifteen meetings and produced a very careful report. Again I am not going to dwell on it except to say that from what the minister has said I would still doubt whether the corporation has really taken very seriously the recommendation of the commission with respect to cutting down their amount of commercial broadcasting. I realize, as the minister has said, that you cannot do it overnight because you have contracts, but I think when this comes up next year we will be entitled to hold the commission to a very strict accounting on this point.

Mr. Drew: I am deferring my comments about television but I wish to refer to one subject which I simply place before the minister for consideration. As far as the news reports of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are concerned, I think that on the whole they may be regarded as excellent. I think they compare favourably with any news broadcasts by any broadcasting system anywhere in the world. But I wish to raise very vigorous objection to the propapanda broadcasts that go out under the guise of impartial comments. They are balanced slightly to the extent that every now and then a slightly objective statement may be made, but on Sundays particularly the so-called impartial observers go far beyond ordinary observations and in a great number of cases make slanted broadcasts which misinterpret the actual passage of events.

I shall not extend my remarks now, but any careful examination of the discussions that take place over the radio on the various Sunday broadcasts will leave little doubt in the minds of most people that some of those who take part in such broadcasts have no desire to follow an objective approach but in many cases carry out the same pattern that they follow when they are dealing with public affairs in their other activities which they carry on when they are not engaged in the service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. At a time when people who seek to discuss public affairs are placed under very severe limitations as to their opportunity to discuss them over the radio, at a time when members of parliament are placed under definite limitations, I think it is entirely wrong that those who have expressed such clear political slants should be given such encouragement at public expense to express their views along a straight propaganda line.

Item agreed to.

Loans, investments and advances—

819. Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine and to be applied in payment of expenditures to cover capital costs of television installations and to support the development of the service. Such loans, with interest, shall be a charge on the revenues of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation next after the charge imposed under the provisions of section 17 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, $2,000,000.

Mr. McCann: This item covers a further loan of $2 million to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to support the development of its television service and to provide for some additional capital expenditures. Members will recall that two and a half years ago, when we made the first loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for television development I said that we had to envisage considerable further financing for the Montreal and the Toronto projects. At that time a loan of $4,500,000 for television was made to the C.B.C., followed by a further loan of $1,500,000 in 1950. This total of $6 million already loaned will cover the capital cost of the production centre stations at Montreal and Toronto, and in addition will provide funds to cover other expenditures up to the time of going on the air with regular service.

The corporation expects to be providing regular service for the Montreal and Toronto projects early in September of this year. Through the years the national television service will be supported by the licence fees from those to whom it is available and by additional commercial revenue. The amount and the details of television licence fees are now under consideration and are expected to be announced prior to the inauguration of the regular service.

As I said when the subject first came up in the house, it will be necessary to provide loans to the corporation not only to cover capital installations but also to help to provide service during initial periods when the number of television viewers is building up. These loans are made on a businesslike basis to the corporation. Full interest rates are charged on them and the corporation will have to repay them in the future. As long as this system is maintained no tax money from individuals in Canada to whom the service is not available will be used to provide television service in other areas.

This loan of $2 million will also make it possible for the corporation to begin construction of a television station in the Ottawa area. It will be remembered that the last special committee of the house on broadcasting was told by representatives of the C.B.C. that the corporation would like to proceed as soon as possible with the construction simultaneously of television stations in seven other areas in addition to Montreal and Toronto. They said that a capital cost of some $7 million would be involved. Loans for capital funds needed have to be provided by the government. The government has carefully considered these proposals and has decided that funds should be provided at the present moment to start only the station for the Ottawa area. By late next spring the network between Montreal and Toronto already should be passing through Ottawa and the operation of a station here will be particularly economical, more so than in any other area. The government is therefore, for the present, authorizing the start of this project.

We believe there is a sound basis in the national interest for a much wider plan covering nationally-owned television facilities in other parts of the country starting, for obvious reasons of economy, in those most heavily populated. We believe that before asking parliament to authorize the necessary loans it would be wise to wait until after the television service of the corporation has started, and it is possible for the public to get a better idea of what Canadian television service will be. A much wider development of nationally-owned facilities would meet the principles of the Massey commission report, and will give Canadian life and Canadian talent a chance to develop through this new medium. A plan for wider expansion in the western, central and maritime provinces has been by no means rejected, but we think it wise to give the matter further study, in which some knowledge of what the C.B.C. can do at the Montreal and Toronto centres will be of great assistance. Canada will shortly be producing her own television and I think it will be possible to make more sure decisions about the future after the service has started.

Mr. Chairman, I think that outlines as briefly as we could put it the policy of the government with reference to the further development of television. New stations will be opened in Montreal and Toronto in September, and the advances that there have been in television development make it possible by a relay system developed by the Bell Telephone Company to transmit those programs from Montreal and Toronto. It makes it very easy to develop a station here in Ottawa where we expect to spend something in the neighbourhood of $800,000 for a station which will contain a transmitter and which will also have some origination programs.

As far as policy goes that is the extent of the development proposed until the public have had an opportunity of seeing what the development in Montreal and Toronto produces and how well they are satisfied with it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is one point in regard to the development of television by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which it seems to me does call for a careful re-examination by the government, and ultimately by the members of this house. I place it before the government at the moment in the hope that there may be reconsideration of this subject.

It seems to me that many of the arguments that can be made to support the spending of a substantial amount of public revenue on the maintenance of ordinary radio broadcasting cannot be made to apply in the same way to television. The minister has indicated that in a short time television will be available in Toronto and Montreal and fairly soon, as a result of a new system developed by the Bell Telephone Company, in Ottawa as well. That is not going to make television available generally throughout Canada.

I think it will be agreed that one of the fundamental ideas behind the set-up of a publicly-owned operating system, as distinguished from a supervisory body, was that it would make it possible to carry radio into every part of Canada and that the ordinary economic factors which might limit the availability of radio in distant areas, if it were carried out entirely by private stations, would be overcome. This does not apply at the present stage to television. Out of public funds contributed by the taxpayers of the whole of Canada television is going to be made available in Toronto, Montreal, and later in Ottawa. The minister has gone so far as to say that the expansion of television facilities in the west and in the maritimes has by no means been rejected. That is not a very optimistic expression of hope that in these areas there will be television.

The fact remains that private stations now operating ordinary radio have sought the right to provide television in areas which have no chance of getting television at an early date or at any reasonably early date if this present policy is adopted. Whatever arguments there may be in favour of the public operation of ordinary broadcasting, it seems to me that wisdom, economy and common sense would suggest that applications by private radio stations to operate television stations should be granted where those stations are ready to carry out the experimental work and to provide programs that otherwise will not be available for years.

Either this is a great modern means of communicating ideas or it is not. Most people think that it is. Most people think that although it is in its early stages it is a tremendously powerful means of influencing people's thoughts and of giving educational possibilities to people by this new and remarkable device. In many parts of Canada, for years to come, television broadcasts are going to be available only from the United States unless the policy is changed. That means that through subtle propaganda to a very considerable extent ideas of life in the United States are going to be permeating or are going to become parts of the thoughts of our people at a time that we are supporting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation particularly for the purpose of developing Canadian thinking along Canadian lines.

I am not criticizing the fact that television broadcasts in the United States have a very definite propaganda flavour in support of what is done by the United States. It would be unnatural if it were otherwise. I think that in every country these great media of communication naturally extol the virtues of their own country and place before the people of their own country the developments that are taking place and the achievements of which they have every reason to be proud. For a long time Canadians will be seeing more of achievement in the United States than they will of achievement in Canada at a time when some of the most challenging things are being done in Canada which should be the inspiration of every young Canadian.

When private radio stations are ready to provide television broadcasts over widespread areas which under present policies will not be serviced by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I think it is wrong to deny them that opportunity. By the use of moving picture films and other devices new stations can give television broadcasts in areas that will not otherwise be served and those television broadcasts would be broadcasts with a definite Canadian flavour.

I leave it there. I do not know how it is possible to justify in the minds of the taxpayers of the maritimes, of the prairie provinces, of the distant north and, yes, of a considerable part of Ontario and Quebec as well, the thought that their money shall be collected for the purpose of supplying television broadcasts to these favoured areas while the opportunity to have the television broadcasts that they know they could have from private stations is denied under a policy which I must confess I simply cannot understand.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say a word? I think most of the arguments the leader of the opposition used in favour of permitting private television broadcasting should be used in the opposite direction. As a matter of fact, the production of television programs is very expensive. I have no doubt that films and other programs that would be used by private stations, because they would be relatively cheaper, would be largely United States productions. As a matter of fact, when we speak of films I regret exceedingly that we are so dependent upon Hollywood and the United States for the production of films. From my observations of what has been done in radio, the private stations very largely rely on programs that originate in the United States or upon recordings that come almost exclusively from that country and have a distinctly American flavour.

The hon. member says that this is a great medium of public propaganda, and so it is. I do not think it is safe, in the days in which we live, to allow all the propaganda facilities to be in the hands of private stations or private interests. The House of Commons approved of the establishment of the so-called Massey commission. This commission investigated the matter of television very thoroughly, and we understood when the report was formulated and placed before the house that the probability was that this report would guide parliament and the broadcasting corporation as well as other cultural organizations in the country for a period of at least ten years.

I agree with the hon. member that we should not deny to the other parts of Canada the television facilities that will be available to Montreal and Toronto in the near future. But nonetheless, I think that while we expect the corporation to push ahead with television as rapidly as possible to serve as many communities as possible in Canada, we should bear in mind always that these very important facilities should be used as a means of the encouragement of Canadian education and of Canadian culture. I do not think we could do that if we relied on private stations indulging in commercial advertising. I do not think the United States programs give a good understanding or view of the American way of life. My viewing of television programs in the United States leads me to believe that they are quite inadequate, and often of a very low type, advertising all kinds of things that at least I would not want to see brought into my own home. I think that we should do everything we can to avoid the repetition of what has happened in the United States.

We might take some cognizance of what has been done under the B.B.C. in the United Kingdom. I have no doubt that if television facilities were placed in the hands of private organizations, in order to make them pay for this very expensive means of entertainment or communication, they would endeavour to use all the hours they could so that the advertising revenue would pay for the facilities. In other words, they would have to operate their television stations most of the day in order to make ends meet. In the United Kingdom there are only certain hours when television is available, and that is because the kind of programs that they are using in the United Kingdom are of quite a different type, in many instances, from the kind of programs we see in the United States. We have the Massey report. The Massey commission went into this matter thoroughly, and investigated the systems in various countries. They made very definite recommendations for our guidance. I think we would do well to follow out the recommendations made by the Massey commission as much as possible, and at the same time encourage the broadcasting corporation by providing the necessary finances to establish television across the country. We should enable them to provide all Canadians, as rapidly as possible, with the opportunity to view television. I do think that we should be careful lest we permit the prostitution of this great new educational facility by the hucksters who advertise their wares over the radio to the annoyance of a large number of people.

Mr. Laing: I should like to say a few words on this matter, because I think there is much to be said on both sides. I think that the government is to be commended for their cautious approach to television. I am aware that there are many educationists in Canada today who want no part of television. I have heard some of them come out and say that after a few generations of television our children will have, like Cyclops, but one eye. I do not think that is any solution. I do not think that we can turn back the clock. I think the only cure for the situation is to provide better programs.

I believe the government is to be commended for being cautious by reason of the cost of bringing television to the Canadian people. I do not think they have convinced the Canadian people adequately or made them aware of the difficulties standing in the way of television for everyone. I think a better job could be done in that line. I commend the minister for making progress in respect to Montreal and Toronto, and I think the entire house will accept his explanation as to why Ottawa was thought of as the third point of development. But I want to draw his attention to what is going on in Vancouver today. Anyone who has read the Massey report would be very apprehensive if he took a look at Vancouver because the invasion is on there today. We have many hundreds of sets which are picking up programs that are beamed from Seattle and from a relay station now located in Bellingham, which is only sixty miles away.

There was a suggestion out there that it should not have been impossible for private stations and the corporation to work together to bring into Vancouver, probably at an earlier date than the corporation could otherwise have done, television programs. I do not share all the misgivings concerning private stations, under proper agreements, that are held by the hon. member who just spoke. But I will agree with him that the product of the invasion from the United States at the present time is, in fairly large part, a pretty shoddy performance.

Just in summing up, I think the minister should acquaint the Canadian people, by some publicity, with the magnitude of the problem and the great extent to which we are trying today to bring distinctly Canadian television programs to the Canadian people. In that regard, I do not think we have done a particularly good job. I think there would be, if it were properly explained, a tendency on the part of the Canadian people to wait.

We have been very fortunate, I am told, in being cautious in that we have avoided the fantastic mists which have been created in the United States owing to the blocking of certain wave lengths. There is much commendation due to the department.

I would ask the minister to give the Vancouver area his early attention. We are there drawing programs which probably could not be available to, let us say, a city like Winnipeg. The United States cities are close by us and the invasion is on. There are many hundreds of aerials. I do not have the figure for the minister. Probably he was given a copy of that able cartoon by Norris in the Vancouver Sun, showing the leader of the Boy Scout troop out with his boys. He said, "We will never get lost because there are enough television aerials in the area, and thanks to the C.B.C. they all point south." That is the situation in Vancouver. Norris' cartoon was inspired by the fact that there are, I would say, probably thousands in that general area. It is an area in which television could well be developed. We have high hills which provide for excellent pick-up. The pick-up from Seattle and I think from Bellingham—although I would not be sure of that—is very good in Vancouver. The American invasion is on and it is something which I think we should do our best to repel.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There are two questions I should like to ask. One is on item 819, $2 million.

Mr. McCann: That is the one we are now discussing.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes. If I understood the minister correctly, more money is going to be required. Can he give the committee any idea as to how much more it is anticipated will be required for this purpose?

Mr. McCann: In future years?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes; for television work.

Mr. McCann: I could not at the moment hazard a guess at that figure. When I spoke on this matter when the policy of television first came under review, I particularly reminded the house that it was going to be costly. I want to thank the hon. members who have taken part in this debate on television. I think they clearly understand the policy.

With reference to the matter brought to our attention by the hon. member for Vancouver South, I think I can assure him that television will be in Vancouver. At what date, I just do not know nor does anybody else.

The leader of the opposition dealt principally with the matter of private stations being licensed. We are attempting to carry out the recommendations of the Massey commission. I would respectfully call his attention to one of the recommendations which says:

> That no private television broadcasting stations be licensed until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has available national television programs and that all private stations be required to serve as outlets for national programs.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why these applications cannot be dealt with at the present time, namely the shortage of steel. It became the policy of the government a year ago that no further licences either for sound broadcasting or for television would be considered until that situation was clarified.

With reference to the policy which I have stated, it is Montreal, Toronto and continue in Ottawa next year. Personally, I should like to have seen it extended. I should like to have seen it extended in western Ontario into the Hamilton, London, Windsor area and east as far as Quebec; because if we made that extension we would be able to give service to at least 50 per cent of the people of Canada. I have to include in the policy which we considered those areas that I have mentioned, and in addition Vancouver and Winnipeg. If the policy were followed of having a station in each of the provinces throughout Canada we would be able to service something in the neighbourhood of 75 per cent of the population. I think we can look forward with hope that technological advances and new techniques will make it possible at some time that there might be a complete coverage of the whole of Canada in a system which has national outlets in each of the provinces, in combination with a system of private stations which will be perhaps duplicating in some cities but which in other cities will be one national system having transmitter stations.

I can only say that this is a loan which will be repaid with interest and the C.B.C. are optimistic enough to believe that their revenue, from the licence fees when they are set up and from commercial programs, will be such that this will be a self-liquidating loan.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Chairman. There are two points I wish to mention which have been raised in the discussion. First of all, I must say that I hope no impression has been conveyed that the Massey report is regarded as sacrosanct.

Mr. McCann: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: After all, there are in it many excellent recommendations and there are in it many recommendations with which I think there may be considerable disagreement. I do not think there is by any manner of means uniform agreement with regard to the recommendations in connection with the procedure by which television will be carried out. What I particularly wish to refer to is a comment that was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in connection with the use of films. He spoke of the fact that if we were extending the operation of television and were using films, we would be simply increasing, shall we say, the United States content of the program because of our dependence on United States films. I think we are over-emphasizing our dependence on United States films when we speak of the type of film that would be broadcast over television.

Mr. Coldwell: Have we enough of them?

Mr. Drew: What television is mainly using is film for news broadcasts. We have excellent moving picture reporters in this country who take moving pictures of events. We are not in any way dependent upon the United States for portrayals of life in Canada by moving picture films. Just a few days ago I saw a film that perhaps many hon. members saw much earlier. I saw a picture on Newfoundland produced by Crawley Films here in Ottawa. It is as fine a documentary film as I have ever seen. It is a film that every Canadian should see. It is the kind of film that over television would be producing a really educational program.

There are many other films produced by public and private agencies in Canada. We would be in no way dependent upon United States films. On the contrary, if we made more television stations available we would help to build up a Canadian moving picture industry on a scale that we have not yet been able to contemplate. For that reason I suggest that the two go hand in hand, and that the handling of television may well provide the first real opportunity we have had to extend the moving picture activity in this country in the way that I hope it can be developed, in the interests of an effective portrayal of the life of the Canadian people.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I wish to thank the minister for the rather full report he gave in answer to my question with regard to what was likely to be done and how much would be required to continue developing television. We in western Ontario are in a position similar to that described by the hon. member for Vancouver South. We are close to United States cities, and there is a considerable amount of television being seen and used in western Ontario. I was wondering whether the minister would care to suggest how soon we could expect Canadian television to be relayed to London and western Ontario points.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Low: I am inclined to agree that the minister and his department will have some trouble with remote parts of Canada, as the leader of the opposition has said, if our efforts toward television are directed to the large cities. I am sure some arrangement will have to be worked out between the C.B.C. and the private stations. I do not see any way out of it. As the leader of the opposition has said, I do believe sufficient films will be made available to make it possible for these Canadian private stations to give service to other parts of Canada. I feel quite sure the minister himself is convinced that a form of agreement between the C.B.C. and private stations can be worked out and I am quite sure he realizes that that agreement could lay down some fairly specific regulations so that the private stations would not be giving the kind of thing that we get from across the line so often.

I am convinced that the only way we will ever satisfy the people throughout the country and be fair to them is to give them the advantage as soon as possible of some television facilities outside of those large areas.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to prolong the discussion. May I just point this out. Those of us who were on the committee looking into the operation of the national film board got some idea of the time it takes to make a single film which would be broadcast and probably occupy half an hour of television time. It takes weeks. The leader of the opposition mentioned the Crawley film, which is an excellent film. I understood it took a very long period of time to make. The point I am making is this. There would not be a sufficient number of films of the type that the leader of the opposition had in mind to fill the time that would be necessary in order that the private stations could get the revenue that would compensate them for the facilities and for those activities.

Those are considerations that we must always keep in mind in discussing this. I quite agree with the leader of the opposition that there are very excellent reporters, camera men, who can operate a camera at sports events; but when you think of the sports events that are likely to be televised, again that would only occupy a relatively very small amount of television time. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again today? I wish to move a motion with the consent of the house.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

819. Loans, investments and advances—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

Mr. McCann: I just want to reply to the hon. member for Middlesex East. I cannot give him a positive answer as to when people in the London district are likely to receive television programs. That will depend entirely upon government policy with reference to extension into that area; and, second, when parliament will vote the money to carry on that extension.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

57. Departmental administration, $244,046.

The Deputy Chairman: For the convenience of hon. members may I point out that the votes will be found commencing at page 9 of the blue book of estimates and the details at page 130.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): During the time the committee was reviewing the immigration bill I had intended to say something on immigration, but at that time I thought possibly my remarks might be confined to the bill. There are some other things I wanted to say, but I have refrained until now from saying them on the floor of the house.

I was one of the committee that reviewed the act clause by clause, and I must say that I cannot see any great number of flaws in it. If I were going to disagree with any at all, possibly it would be that part which requires the transportation companies to assume the cost of deportation of undesirables.

What I have to say then has to do not particularly with the act but with its administration. During my years as a member I have had something to do with nearly all the departments of government at one time or another. While all the problems that I have referred to the department of immigration have received courteous attention, the results in every case have been negative.

Never once have I been able to get any good results. There has been delay, procrastination and excuses right down the line. I mention this because I was brought up to play ball, and I will play ball with any department, but I am not going to field all the foul balls all the time.

I am going to mention one case in particular. This case went on over quite a long period of time, and the department told me finally that there were a good number of reasons why this immigrant could not come to this country. Three weeks after the immigrant landed I was still being told by the department that he could not come here.

I have documentary proof to back up the cases I am going to cite. There is a feeling throughout the country of dissatisfaction with the operations of this department. There is a certain amount of speculation upon whom will fall the mantle of leadership and on a good many occasions the name of the minister has been mentioned favourably.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the leadership of the Liberal party is in the very best hands and there are a great many people in Canada who hope that it remains that way.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Nevertheless if the minister is going to be judged upon the operations of the department of immigration I am afraid that he is losing favour with a certain number of people. I mention this for his own good; I do not care how he looks at it.

Ordinarily I do not take up a great deal of the time of the committee and this being the last day of the session probably I should apologize, but there are a few cases to which I should like to refer. I have the case of a farmer who wanted to bring out a farmer from his native country. This farmer went back to his native land on a visit and saw this other man. Yet a year and a half later he is still there. One excuse after another has been offered, but he has not been able to come.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): What country?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Switzerland. I have under my hand a circular put out by the deputy minister of labour. I do not think this was sent to members of parliament as I think it came to my home. It is addressed to Canadian employers and reads in part as follows:

> —one thousand farm workers and 500 other classes, and some farm couples. There are also married couples who would be suitable for farm work and a few families with agricultural backgrounds.
> [Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

On January 5 I wrote to the department in connection with a farmer who wanted a married couple with three, four or five children of public school age or older. Up to date he has not been able to secure that couple. I was told that they were not available so I went to the trouble of advertising in a German newspaper and I have here twelve applications from suitable families who are anxious and willing to come. There has been nothing but excuses from the department; they were not able to get them. I think that is the complete answer. These families are available if they want to find them. This farmer has a good brick house, a garden, cattle and everything they would need and he operates one of the finest farms in the country. Yet this family was not available.

I have another case here where an application was made early in June 1949, and the negotiations went on—you can see the thickness of the file—until some time in September, 1951. I mentioned this case in committee. At that time I received a letter from a Liberal lawyer saying that I would not need to take any more action in the case because he was taking it up. In December of that same year the immigrant, who had been refused admission because of tuberculosis, was admitted to the country. I can give the name and all the details. Apparently that was the best cure for tuberculosis that could be found, and it was certainly the quickest.

These are things that get under my skin and the public generally do not like them. I would be the first to object to anyone being admitted to the country who could not meet the health requirements. Early in the session I asked question No. 16 on the order paper which had to deal with the number of immigrants coming to this country who had been admitted to hospital because of tuberculosis. I should like to quote the questions I asked and the answers given by the minister as reported on page 348 of Hansard of March 12, as follows:

> Mr. White (Middlesex East):
> 1. How many immigrants who came to Canada during the past two years have been hospitalized because of tuberculosis, in the following groups (a) immigrants from commonwealth countries; (b) displaced persons; (c) all others?
> 2. How many in each of these groups were discovered to have the disease within six months of coming to Canada?
>
> Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):
> 1. Cases reported to Department of Citizenship and Immigration (a) 4; (b) 2; (c) 8; total 14.
> 2. (a) 3; (b) 1; (c) 4; total 8.

I realize that that may be a correct reply as far as the department is concerned, but it does not give a true picture of what happened because probably many cases are hospitalized and not reported to the department. To back up that statement I have here in my hand a statement from a very reliable authority that has had to do with some of these cases. I should like to indicate some of the things that I think should be done in order to see that persons coming to Canada are properly examined as far as tuberculosis is concerned.

There should be a most thorough study made of X-rays of the chest. The X-ray film should be at least four inches by five inches, and preferably fourteen inches by seventeen inches. Any suggested lesion in the film should delay the individual coming to Canada until such time as it is felt that there is absolutely no evidence of activity. A miniature film of the chest should be taken within a month following the individual's arrival in Canada. This should be kept for record purposes in a suitable film library. A repeat X-ray of the chest should be taken six months after arrival and possibly a third eighteen months after arrival. These X-rays need be only of the miniature variety. Too often immigrants coming to Canada are lost track of and are not followed up with repeat X-ray films of the chest as they should be. In the case of children, it might be well to have them tuberculin skin tested shortly after arrival in Canada.

While I am dealing with immigration, there is one question that has been mentioned many times before to which I should like to refer. Dominion bureau of statistics figures reveal that during the past ten years 591,000 odd immigrants came to Canada, and that in the same period some 486,000 people left Canada, so that we actually had a net gain of one out of each six who came here.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): What years did you quote?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): These are figures released by the dominion bureau of statistics, and they show that although 591,000 immigrants entered Canada during the last ten years 486,000 people left during the same period.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): What ten years is that?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The ten years previous to 1951.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Whose figures are you quoting?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): These are figures that the leader of the opposition used in a speech at Toronto recently.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I thought you were quoting D.B.S. figures.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): They were dominion bureau of statistics figures that he quoted.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I should like to see them.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I think Canadians generally feel that with our vast areas we need more people of the right class. After all, as soon as an immigrant comes to this country he is immediately in the market for all the goods and services that he can purchase. I have said before that it would be far better to have these people in Canada producing wealth of one kind and another than to have them in Europe or elsewhere and have to give food and other things to them. As soon as they come here they become self-supporting and more. With all our great natural resources we can certainly absorb a great number of them. When they come here they become consumers, producers and taxpayers; they will likely have to pay sales tax on the very first item they purchase. They will be consumers of some of the surplus food products that the farmers of Canada are finding it difficult to dispose of at the present time.

One of the difficulties in securing the type of immigrant that we desire is the fact that many people in Europe who would like to come here have a stake in their homeland. They have investments there. They are the ones who would make good citizens here but because of the inconvertibility of exchange they are not able to bring very much of their resources to this country. Consequently they hesitate to leave their homeland where they already have a stake. I wonder if it would not be good policy on the part of the government to make long term loans to such people taking as collateral 25 per cent, 50 per cent, 75 per cent or whatever you like of their holdings in their homeland. Over a period of years it is quite possible that we would accumulate investments in other countries which would be quite an asset to us, especially if our dollar continues to rise. That would enable immigrants to come to this country who have demonstrated a certain amount of ability in their homeland.

I know very well that there are a good many in the British isles and elsewhere who would come here if they were able to bring a good portion of their wealth with them and invest it here. I think it is rather discouraging to many Canadians that the bulk of the emigrants from the United Kingdom are going to Australia, New Zealand and other places rather than to Canada. From the experience I have had in my constituency and elsewhere I do not believe there is anything, with the exception of the cost of living and taxation, that is of more concern to people generally than the question of immigration. In view of what I have said to the minister I hope he will revise his plans and adopt some of the suggestions I have made. I must confess that all the dealings I have had with the department have been discouraging.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I am sorry to hear my hon. friend say what he has said. Of course I am at a slight disadvantage. He has not done me the favour of referring these particular cases to me either by name or by any other means so that I could identify them. I want to point out to the committee, however, that as he himself admits it is undesirable to admit to this country people suffering from tuberculosis or similar diseases. He cited one case that he said had been before the department for over two years. I take it during that time my hon. friend was seeking to convince the government that they ought to admit that particular immigrant because he did not have tuberculosis, and on pure speculation I would also think that during that time it would be safe to say that the department was writing to my hon. friend and saying that we were taking other X-rays of that particular person and hoping that the results would be more favourable in the future, as has turned out to be the case in the end. Would that be correct?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That is about correct.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Then I suggest my hon. friend was not being entirely fair with the committee in his comments. He also raised the question of obtaining a farm family with a specific number of children. I am sorry that we have not been able to produce a farm family according to those specifications. We do our best, as I think my hon. friend knows. I think he will also agree with me that in the main the farm workers in Ontario are of Dutch and German origin, and that the choice of those who are to be Dutch immigrants lies largely with the Netherlands government as a result of our agreement. Of course we have an interest in their health and other matters. At the same time I must express surprise and disappointment that in the matter of five months we were not able to find a family with the specified number of children for that particular farmer, and if he will again refer the matter to me I shall be delighted to see what I can do, even in the short time we have.

My hon. friend raised two other points. One was that a greater proportion of the immigration should be from the United Kingdom. He may have been present in the house when I said a little over a month ago that immigration from the United Kingdom was a greater proportion of the total this year. I would ask leave to table a statement of the immigration for the first five months which will indicate that during that time immigration from the United Kingdom rose something in the order of 75 or 80 per cent over the comparable period of 1951. It also indicates that immigration from France rose over 100 per cent, and that immigration from the north European countries is generally up and immigration from other areas generally down.

Finally, my hon. friend referred to some 590,000 immigrants having entered this country and over 480,000 having left. I can only say that I am not aware of the dominion bureau of statistics ever having issued figures of that kind. If he will give me the reference I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, there is a matter I wish to refer to, and it is this. My mind goes back to April of 1949. There had been a conference of commonwealth prime ministers and I recollect that the Prime Minister of Canada made a statement following the decision of India and the commonwealth countries for her to remain within the commonwealth as an independent republic and he said:

> Everyone will rejoice in the fact that, notwithstanding the exercise by the people of India of their right to determine the form of their domestic government, it has been found possible to have India remain a member of the commonwealth and to continue for the peace of the world the association of those nations whose traditions give them the same concept of a proper way of living and of democratic processes designed to further the welfare of the men and women of their respective nations.

That of course was the comment made on the announcement from London in April of 1949 of the association of India with the commonwealth. The declaration read this way:

> Accordingly, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon hereby declare that they remain united as free—

And I want to draw attention to the next words.

> —and equal members of the commonwealth of nations, freely co-operating in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress.

That evoked statements by the leader of the opposition, myself, and others in the house expressing our approval both of the statement and of what was involved. I am rising this afternoon to say, as briefly as I can, that while there may be some equality among the component parts of the commonwealth as countries Canada is not according to the citizens of all the commonwealth countries associated with her equal status as individuals when it comes to immigration. I think it is a matter of some concern that considerable dissatisfaction has been created among persons of commonwealth origin because they have not been granted the same privilege of bringing their relatives to Canada as has been granted to persons of European origin living in Canada. I think that is a matter that should be carefully considered by the department and by the house.

After all the world is undergoing very great changes and I think that one of the vital matters that we have to consider within the commonwealth is the great value of the association of Pakistan, India and Ceylon with our commonwealth countries. As long as we continue to exercise any discrimination against persons of origins within other commonwealth countries so long shall we be endangering that association.

Now I know that the people of those countries, and particularly of India, realize that there are difficulties in opening wide the gates of immigration into this country, and consequently there is an arrangement between India and Canada regarding a quota system as applied to our fellow commonwealth citizens from India. I do not think that there is a quota imposed by India against Canadians who wish to reside in India. I am not sure of that but I think I am right in saying it.

On the occasion to which I refer I said:

> We are now associated with a great people differing in creed, in colour and in all that guides the long evolution of a race and determines its characteristics. I hope that this will enable us in our country, and those in the countries associated with us, to end forever every vestige of racial and religious discrimination and intolerance among the people of this commonwealth.

I feel that has not been carried out and that the vestiges remain through the fact that our fellow citizens of commonwealth origin are denied the privilege of bringing their relatives to Canada, as do their fellow citizens of European origins. That is a matter of great concern to all of us and particularly, of course, to the proud people of India who have set up their independent republic but have remained associated with us in the commonwealth.

The restriction is imposed by order in council P.C. 2743 under the authority, of course, of the Immigration Act, which provides:

> the provisions hereinbefore set out shall not apply to immigrants of any Asiatic race.

I am not going into that generally this morning though I hold the view that this discrimination is dangerous and also that P.C. 2115 is dangerous. We are living in a world today when we are on trial as democratic countries and our opponents in their propaganda use every possible means to show that we are giving lip service to freedom, equality and democracy but that we are not fulfilling our obligations in those respects within the borders of our own country.

I want to say to the minister, apart altogether from the reference to Asiatic persons and persons of Asiatic origin in general, that particular consideration should be given to this matter of restricting the entry into Canada of relatives of those who are already happily and usefully settled in our country.

I do not want to discuss the two points involved this morning but what I want to do is focus the attention of the minister and the house on this one disability, the disability imposed upon residents of Canada, of India and commonwealth origin—a disability imposed so that they may not bring into the country their close relatives except under a quota system not imposed on those of European origin. That is the point I want to bring home to the minister and I ask for reconsideration in order to remove the dissatisfaction that is quite properly felt by our compatriots of Indian origin.

Mr. Low: I would like to follow up what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I want to say at the outset that I believe the minister is doing a good job. He has begun to get hold of this whole department and is doing in my judgment an excellent job.

I am not in favour of an open-door policy at all. I believe a wisely selective and executed policy is best for our country; but at the same time I do believe that since these Indian people have come to Canada and have been granted citizenship and are proving themselves to be good citizens, and also since they have become partners in the commonwealth and are associated with the other parts of the commonwealth on a satisfactory basis, there remains no good reason why the restrictions and provisos of P.C. 2743 should continue to apply to them. I believe that the East Indian Canadian citizens should be allowed to bring their relatives on the same basis as members of any other racial group who come to Canada under the quota.

I agree with the minister that a quota should be continued on some negotiated basis, whatever it may be. Certainly I believe we should give very careful consideration indeed to placing—

Mr. Coldwell: Would you include relatives and friends in the quota?

Mr. Low: Yes. As a matter of fact, I think wherever the quota is applied the East Indian people already here should be allowed to name the greater part of those who do come. I believe that would solve the situation. I think they would be happy under that sort of agreement. There should be some sort of quota, but the major portion of those who come in the future ought to be nominated by the people who are already here.

I hope the minister will remove this restriction against the East Indian people. I do not consider for one moment that the East Indian people should be lumped in with the Asiatic races as they are now under the immigration law.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Lest there be any misunderstanding of this point I should like to say a word about it. I do not want to take any time, and I appreciate what hon. members have said. I think they may be overlooking what the practice is. In that connection, may I point out that it was the present government that negotiated the agreement with these countries which set the quota over and above that which existed up to the end of 1950. At that time a very limited number in the close relative classes could be admitted from India. In the settlement of the arrangement that 150 additional might come from that country, certain additional agreements were made. Those agreements were that preference would be given to what may be termed close relatives, though not as close as I think the hon. member would lead us to believe. Under P.C. 2115 the wife and unmarried children under certain conditions may come into the country. Then when he speaks of close relatives he may be thinking perhaps of grandchildren, brothers and sisters.

Now those persons obtain preference in the 150 quota, and to be precise we set aside I think it was 50 of the 150 for that group. To go further, I might say there were not 50 applicants, so anybody in Canada of East Indian origin who has applied for a close relative in the group the hon. members have been mentioning, and who has had his application refused, has been refused on some ground other than the quota. There was more than ample room for all the close relatives group that have been mentioned.

Mr. Low: I appreciate that, but is it not true that the proviso to P.C. 2743 states that the provision hereinbefore set out shall not apply to immigrants of any Asiatic race, and that that still applies to the East Indian people? What I would suggest is that whatever may be the arrangement with respect to quota, it would be advisable to remove the people of East Indian origin from the terms of the restrictive order in council.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I may say that P.C. 2743 was repealed two years ago. The hon. member is probably referring to P.C. 2856.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Drew: I want to add my comment on this subject. I have deferred my comments because I intended to include them in the general remarks I propose to make later. Since this matter has been raised, I wish to emphasize that I do not think it is satisfactory that any arrangement for immigration into Canada for residents of India, Pakistan or Ceylon should simply be bulked in any order in council that applies to immigration from Asia.

The member for Rosetown-Biggar has pointed out that at the time we welcomed the new association with India, Pakistan and Ceylon which was established some little time ago, I expressed my pleasure that this step had been taken. At that time I indicated my own belief that by every means within our power we should demonstrate our desire to show that we recognize this partnership and regard India, Pakistan and Ceylon as belonging to a great world partnership. Anything less than that would be inclined to impair what may easily be one of the most important international relationships that now exist. I do not want to repeat the arguments I have made over and over again that there can be few things more important today than seeking to strengthen the bonds of friendship between the free nations of the British commonwealth.

There can be few experiments with greater influence on the future than the joining in a friendly arrangement of this kind of the great free nations of Asia with the nations of North America and Europe. When we hear the figures mentioned, it seems that they are strangely small in comparison with the tremendous populations of these great countries. It seems that they are inconsistent with our desire to express that friendship in practical terms. Nevertheless, those are details that could be worked out. I do urge that in whatever we do we bear in mind that any gesture which demonstrates our desire to recognize our association with India, Pakistan and Ceylon as a real, permanent partnership of free nations within the commonwealth, can be of immense advantage to the whole world.

I simply close my remarks in relation to this particular point by saying I should like the government to consider the importance and advantage of having any arrangements with those three nations of the commonwealth embraced in a separate order in council and a separate agreement. Under no circumstances should they simply be bulked with the general population of Asia, as they have been in the past.

Mr. Coldwell: That is precisely the point we are all trying to make to the minister. As a matter of fact, some commonwealth countries are subject to certain regulations regarding immigration. I think these still stand. The classes of persons admissible under the order in council are, first, the husband or wife, the son, daughter, brother or sister, together with husband or wife or unmarried child; father or mother; the orphaned nephew or niece under 21 years of age of any person legally resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relative. The term "orphaned" in this connection means a person bereaved of both parents. Another class of person is a woman intending to get married, so long as the man is able to maintain his intended wife.

Where the discrimination comes in is that that seems applicable to all the commonwealth countries. We are all free and equal for purposes of immigration, and we are grouped together as persons born in or naturalized within commonwealth countries; but under another order in council, P.C. 2115, we prohibit the entry of those of any Asiatic race, except of course under the agreement that has been referred to. There is the discrimination which is irksome, and I think is understandably disliked by our fellow citizens in India and the east.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I add to what has been said by pointing out that the agreement with this country specifically excludes P.C. 2115. It sets out an agreement for migration from that country. That has removed the discrimination my hon. friend has spoken about.

Mr. Coldwell: Only to a limited extent.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Perhaps so.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to ask the minister to give consideration to some temporary officers in his department who have been in the service for many years and who are still temporary. I have in my constituency a few of these men who have been working in the immigration department for probably five or six years. They own their homes and have been doing a good job. They still do not know what is going to happen; they seem to be uneasy about the future. They have approached me a couple of times. I should like to place this request before the minister and ask him if he would consider increasing the number of permanent employees in his department by a reasonable number. I think there are now some 60 or 65 permanent. I would suggest that he might bring the figure up to 75, in cases where the trend in the port is on the increase and the officers in question are perfectly satisfactory to the department.

The other question I should like to ask is with regard to the combined work of immigration and customs. In some ports apparently it has not proved to be as satisfactory as had been expected. Does the minister think that work will be carried on in the future, or have there been any changes? In some instances commercial officials have been attended by some of the immigration inspectors and some by customs and immigration inspectors. This procedure has not proven to be fully satisfactory, and I was wondering whether the minister would give us an idea as to how this procedure has worked out in the last year or so.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I can assure the hon. member that there is an increase in the permanent establishment from 70 to 85. I shall look into the other question.

Mr. Roberge: Thank you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the minister going to make a general statement on immigration policy? I had hoped to catch the chairman's eye earlier but I am raising the question now.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I had one ready, Mr. Chairman, but the hon. member for Middlesex East intervened first in the debate and we have been proceeding from that point.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister make the statement now?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think so.

Mr. Chairman, in presenting the annual report on immigration I should like to deal with the many things which occurred before and during the year 1951 which gave rise to the largest and most successful immigrant year since the war. Before doing so, however, it would be just as well for me to re-state the policy of immigration to which I have referred on every occasion that I have presented a report to the house. That policy is to admit to Canada in numbers not exceeding the absorptive capacity of our country and without altering the fundamental character of our people, such persons as are likely to contribute to our national life.

This department was created in January 1950, though, of course, it was a combination of branches of government already at that time functioning. When the first estimates were presented in this house, many members said that the government was not doing much about immigration, that we had no plan for immigration; that they were quite dissatisfied with the reduction in the number of immigrants from 1948, when there were 125,000 admitted, to 1949 when there were about 90,000 admitted. During the debates in the spring of 1950, while no figure was placed upon the numbers who might come in, many stated that 90,000 was not sufficient. I think this was in keeping with the opinion of nearly all members of the house who spoke in the debates, at the end of the war, about immigration. There had been almost unanimous approval for the admission to Canada of people from Europe, especially those persons who had a claim upon our charity by reason of the unfortunate plight in which they found themselves. In addition, everyone recognized that Canada could only grow substantially if it grew by taking immigrants as well as by natural growth. And it was generally agreed that Canada should grow in numbers so as to be able to develop our great resources. The debates of 1945-6-7-8 show clearly that parliament was almost unanimous in its belief that immigration as a policy was desirable. Believing as we did that immigration could assist in the building of our country and people, we undertook throughout 1950 every step which we thought was in the interests of the Canadian people to stimulate immigration, without at the same time imposing upon the Canadian taxpayer any expense which was not justified.

As we saw it in the fall and winter of 1950-51, there was an unsatisfied demand for almost every form of labour in Canada. As well there was a demand for farm settlers because of the regularly changing population on the farm. In addition, there were complaints that the re-armament program was not progressing fast enough. So it became known abroad that Canada was accepting immigrants and large numbers made arrangements to come to what they were sure was the country of the future.

I am satisfied that everything which could have been done last year to stimulate immigration was done; and I am satisfied, sir, that those who came here were not only welcome, they were actually needed.

May I have consent to table a statement for the calendar year 1951 as well as the five months' statement for this year that I mentioned earlier?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The statements are as follows:

As this year began it became evident that there were less demands for immigration as the needs were being met.

When the supplementary estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration were being considered I gave the house certain undertakings that at the appropriate time I would deal with certain matters.

On several occasions during the discussion of the supplementary estimates the matter of farm workers was raised and concern was expressed over the fact that a proportion of those people who secured admission to Canada because they represented themselves as farm labourers were not staying on the farm for their allotted period.

The fact is that a very large majority of those who come to Canada as farm workers have remained on the farm for their allotted period and, indeed, many have remained well beyond it and are still on the land even though they came to Canada three and four years ago.

[Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).]

We hear, of course, about the man who does not live up to his obligations. We hear nothing much about the thousands who do and the result has been that the small percentage of defaulting farm workers stand out in unfortunate contrast to the others.

One of the objects of the Canadian immigration policy is to build up Canadian agriculture. We are doing that and in proof of that statement I would put on the record the achievement of just one racial group, those from the Netherlands. It is true those from the Netherlands are, perhaps, a little different from the average farm labourer. Their roots are perhaps a little more deeply in the soil. They move as a family unit in many cases and the selection is made with the co-operation of Netherlands authorities.

However, from the inception of the movement from Holland, up until March 30, 1952, a total of about fifteen thousand Dutch families had come forward to Canada. Of these more than 4,500 families are now farming on their own account, either as farm owners or farm tenants. Many thousands more are still employed on the farms of Canadians, learning Canadian methods, saving their money and planning for the time when they will have farms of their own.

It would, of course, be possible to take steps which would ensure that the man who says he is coming to Canada as a farm worker remains a farm worker. We could even hold the possibility of deportation over his head, as indeed is done in some countries. However, it is my opinion that the Canadian people would be entirely opposed to any such practice. It would be contrary to the whole Canadian belief in freedom of the individual.

It is much better, I believe, to ensure through our selection that the farm labourer who comes to Canada comes from a farming background in his homeland, and is of a type most likely to make a lifetime career out of farming in Canada.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was anxious to know whether in our planning we took into account the jobs available and the areas in which they were available, and whether consideration was given to the countries from which immigrants are selected. The answer in both cases is "yes". First of all I want to make it clear that no policy of immigration can be operated on a stop and go basis. We cannot possibly develop that policy on a plan that calls for one specific immigrant for one specific opportunity. We must be prepared to have faith in our country and the opportunity it will offer to those prepared to work. This means that if we believe in Canada's future, if we believe ours is a developing country, we must be prepared to bring in some people, knowing that when they are on the ground Canada will have a place for them.

In regard to the question of planning and the countries of selection, I wish to assure the house that every effort is being made to increase the number of immigrants from the United Kingdom and France, and I am glad to report that during the fiscal year 1951-52 a total of 36,000 immigrants of English, Scottish, Irish and Welsh origin came to Canada, as compared with 15,429 in the previous fiscal year. From France we received 6,666 as compared with 1,845. We also had a large intake of people from the northern European countries which in the past have contributed a good type of immigrant, who have readily become integrated into the Canadian communities in which they have made their homes. I think every debate on immigration has indicated that it is the desire of this house that we should have a substantial number from northern Europe.

Earlier in the session there were some questions about the assisted passage scheme. The assisted passage plan was suspended last October but has again been in operation since the supplementary estimates were passed.

Under this plan the government advanced to the immigrant a substantial portion of his fare to Canada, provided that he was entering an occupation in Canada where there was definite need of his services. The advance is considered a loan and is recoverable in monthly instalments over a maximum period of two years.

As at the end of May a total of 16,255 had come to Canada under the assisted passage plan, and $2,746,006 had been advanced in fares. So far the record of repayment has been good, and it is anticipated that by the end of July a total in excess of $1 million will have been repaid.

There are two other matters on which I promised information to the house. The first of these concerns those whose establishment in Canada is delayed through no fault of their own, who become indigent as a result of sickness or accident. We have been in communication with all provincial governments in regard to these people and have offered to assume, under some circumstances, half the costs of hospitalization and welfare expended on their behalf. An agreement to this effect has been signed with the province of Ontario and negotiations are continuing with the other nine provinces. I should like to table a copy of that agreement.

The other matter concerns the issuing of fraudulent visas. Earlier in the session I gave the house all the information I felt I could give at the time in view of the investigation which was then going on. I am still somewhat limited in the information I can provide on this matter, but I can report that the investigation by officers of the R.C.M.P. has now been virtually completed. Agents of the Department of Justice have before them the report of the R.C.M.P. and in addition a total of more than 1,200 exhibits which are being carefully studied.

I believe I have completed my undertakings which I gave to hon. members, but I should like to say a word about the quality of the immigrants coming to Canada. A few weeks ago in this house a return was made which indicated that in the past two years a total of 193 new industries had been established in Canada through investment of foreign capital. Not all these were immigrant industries, of course, but a significant percentage of them were.

It is true that in the years immediately following world war II a substantial percentage of our immigrants were displaced persons, but that percentage has been decreasing and more and more of those coming to Canada have come from a background of employment and the home. Last year only 22 per cent were in the displaced person category. The remainder were people who came to Canada voluntarily because they saw here a developing country, a country with an expanding economy which offered opportunity to those who would work. These people do not arrive here penniless. True, the money they can bring is restricted by currency regulations, but in the calendar year 1951 they brought to Canada more than $60 million in new capital. They brought in other capital, but they also brought skills and all of them and their dependents were consumers from the moment of their arrival here. That, I suggest, is an important aspect of immigration.

Indications for 1952 are that the intake may not reach the 1951 figure. Because of the improved situation in regard to shipping we have been able to move to Canada in the first five months of the year a total of 82,000 persons, but it is expected as well that the figures will decline beginning this month, and it is not the intention of the government to admit certain workers after the end of October.

Substantially higher are the figures for British immigration which totalled 18,665 for the first five months of this year as compared with 10,599 for the first five months of 1951, and indeed a figure which exceeds our total British immigration in the calendar year 1950 by over 5,000. The figures from France are also up, with 2,426 arriving in the first five months of 1952 as compared with 1,747 in the same five months a year ago. The figures for other countries, while greater, are not so in proportion. It would appear that this year there will be a greater percentage from the United Kingdom and northern Europe and a smaller percentage from the other countries. For example, for the first five months 23 per cent of all immigrants were from the United Kingdom as compared with 17½ per cent in 1951; 38 per cent were from northern Europe as compared with 34 per cent in 1951; and 39 per cent were from other countries as compared with 48½ per cent in 1951.

I should like to place on Hansard for the benefit of all hon. members a summary of those persons who are admissible to Canada, made up according to the countries of origin and indicating the occupations, the close relative groups and the like, so that hon. members may know precisely who is admissible from what particular country. In particular I should point out that in the past the countries of Turkey, Syria, Lebanon and Iran have been dealt with as if they were under P.C. 2115. This statement indicates that they shall not be so dealt with in the future.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The minister in his statement referred to a number of documents. Do I understand that the committee has agreed to the tabling of the documents?

(A) Husband or wife and unmarried children under 21 years of age of Canadian citizens, and other unmarried children in accordance with statement made in the House of Commons last June.

12. All others:
As in paragraph 1 (B) (i) above.

Mr. Laing: I wish to devote a very few minutes to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Substantially I want to compliment the minister on what I think has been a very excellent job done for the Canadian people. Oh, there have been complaints. I remember in Vancouver last winter when for a very short time we had 200 or 300 people who had to be accommodated in an immigration shed, and there were complaints from labour and from other people too that we were bringing people here who could not be accommodated. I hope we will balance this off against the very substantial and infinitely greater number of cases of people who have come to this country in the last two or three years, have become admirably established and have made a great contribution to Canada in their new skills, their new outlook and their old background, if I may say so.

There has been a great deal of success. We hear very little of the success. We hear a great deal of the odd failure. I want to suggest to the minister, in line with the remark of the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, that we should probably pay a little more attention in a practical way to settling farm immigrants. I think the majority of those people, coming from the northern part of Europe and being independent people, would prefer to work on their own farms as soon as they possibly could after coming here instead of working for someone else.

I have the idea that is a field in which the federal administration could work with the provinces by way of modest loans in setting up farm population on some of our newer land. In the northern half of British Columbia we have vast areas of splendid land which could be opened up, but in many instances these people are coming over with inadequate sums of money.

There are those who say people are not coming in fast enough, that we need people quickly and so on, but we should bear in mind that many countries in Europe are not anxious to lose their people and have set up regulations pertaining to the export of money and so on as a bar to their leaving.

I think in the main we have done a good job. I want to compliment the minister upon his action with regard to one or two minority groups which by and large we have looked upon in the past if not as being undesirable, at least as being difficult to work into the fabric of Canadian life. I refer first to the Chinese who came to Canada in the early part of the century in great numbers. Then we adopted a closed door policy against them. In recent years the minister and his department has given attention to bringing over some of the close relatives of these people.

I want to say a word on behalf of another group of people who are part of the brotherhood within the commonwealth of nations, the East Indians. We have at the present time in British Columbia approximately 2,000 East Indians. I remember distinctly in 1913 when a boat arrived in Vancouver with a great number of East Indians aboard who were seeking entry into Canada. Entry was refused and the ship remained in harbour for many weeks, and finally had to return these people to India. Out of that incident arose a disruption of relations between peoples who were together at that time under the British crown, and it did not do us any good across the years.

The recent proposal announced by the minister is to bring in 150 East Indians a year. This is a small number, but it will do something to help cure an old sore. We are finding now, both in the case of the East Indians and the Chinese, that these people have become well educated. Our East Indians have improved their lot in British Columbia, where many of them are now mill owners. I have in mind one who is No. 2 air pilot for the Canadian Pacific Air Lines and is going to fly the Pacific when they inaugurate their schedule.

I want to compliment whoever may have been responsible—probably it was the civil service—for the appointment of an East Indian to the bureau of statistics here in Ottawa. This man is a graduate of the University of British Columbia and is admirably versed in mathematics. We should bear in mind that although Canada is small in population, it is rapidly achieving a foremost position among the nations of the world because of our resources and the integrity of the people. A spirit of open-mindedness with regard to immigration from various countries of the world will do much to add to our stature, but we should bring in only the best people. Again I repeat that the minister has done an admirable job for us in this matter of immigration to our country.

Mr. Gibson: I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Vancouver South and others have said with regard to this question of allowing more East Indians to enter Canada. I trust that the minister will give serious consideration to this problem.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I would feel backward if I did not speak on this matter. In recent years we have been gratified by the action taken to allow Canadians of Chinese descent to bring their relatives to Canada, especially in view of the situation in the continental part of China. East Indians and Pakistanis who live in British Columbia are in an even more special position in that they are British subjects as well as Canadian citizens. I think it is quite in order when they propose that they should be afforded the same opportunity that is given to Canadians of Chinese origin to bring in their close relatives, both for the sake of good relations between Canada and Pakistan and India and relations within the province of British Columbia itself.

There was a time in British Columbia when oriental people, Japanese, Chinese and East Indians—we referred to them as Hindus—were regarded as being most indigestible, as peoples we could not possibly assimilate. That was probably true of the first generation who came to this country as low-grade labour to work on the railroads. But those of us who have gone through school in British Columbia have seen the great change which has taken place. These young Canadians who are of a little different stock from our own have fitted into the life of the province. I think the same facilities should be provided for the admission of relatives of these Canadians who are of either Indian or Pakistani stock that are afforded to those of Chinese stock.

[Mr. Laing.]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I do not think the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was in the chamber when I said that the agreement we had negotiated with the governments of India and Pakistan provided for the admission to Canada not only of close relatives described as being the wife, husband or unmarried children under 21 years of age of a Canadian citizen, but in addition 150 others. Under the arrangements between the two governments, administratively we are giving preference in the 150 to other close relatives, such as brothers, sisters and the like.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a word or two. The minister's statement certainly added something to the situation, but I must confess that the chief impression I got was that there was an agreement under which Canada would admit a certain number of people in each group. The minister indicated that there was a general feeling in favour of greater immigration, but I got only the most general impression as to any policy which is to be followed or any set of principles which is to be adopted. However, I am not going to plunge into that further at this time.

I have in mind a few questions I should like to ask on administration matters. One feels that there is overlapping between the Department of Labour and the department of immigration. Inevitably some of those who are admitted eventually become public charges, and the best information I can get indicates that there is overlapping there. Those in need are able to get help from both labour and immigration; sometimes they are able to get it also from welfare groups, ethnic societies and individual sponsors. I do not think the minister will disagree with me when I say that from one point of view there is what you might call a partnership between the departments, but from another point of view there is overlapping.

Then another question comes to my mind. In this assisted passage scheme I understand the assistance is given to the worker but not to his wife and children. That leaves him with a tremendous task on his hands when he arrives here, because he has to pay back his own passage, support his family while they are in Europe, and get the money to bring them out. These are some of the questions in my mind, and perhaps the minister would deal with them and one or two others that I should like to ask later.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I suppose it would be true to say that there is overlapping in the sense that the Department of Labour and the department of immigration, both abroad and here, interest themselves in the immigrant. However, it has been found by experience since the war that there are separate functions for each department, both tending to aid the immigrant in becoming settled in Canada. For example, before this department as such was set up the Department of Labour administered the movement of people under IRO. They continued to do that until the end of last year, when IRO ceased to function. To that extent it might have been desirable that there should be a division of responsibility. The purpose of the overlapping both here and abroad is very simple. We desire to have the best possible information as to opportunities in Canada, and in addition we want to have the best possible judgment as to the suitability of the applicants abroad. Labour can be of assistance in that regard.

When the immigrant comes to this country he may be placed by labour if he happens to be one of these refugees under IRO; and if he happens to be placed by immigration and in due course finds himself out of employment, naturally he is entitled to the assistance of the national employment service, and of the placement service of our own department. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that the two departments each contribute something to the choice of the immigrant and to the settlement of the immigrant in this country.

With respect to the assisted passage scheme, I agree that we do not extend it to the dependents of a worker; and that is a debatable point. It may not be desirable on social grounds to separate the head of the family from the dependents for any length of time, and an argument can be made that if we advance money to bring forward the head of the family we could also advance money for the dependents. That of course would not apply in the case of a single immigrant. The purpose of the assisted passage scheme originally was to provide the means of bringing to Canada some person who was needed here, having in mind as well that the chances would be that he could probably make a go of it and find the means of bringing forward his family.

I agree if the family is large and if the immigrant happens to go to British Columbia, it will cost a great deal of money to bring his wife and children forward. That is one of the weaknesses of the assisted passage scheme but I think it is one of the weaknesses that must be accepted with the desire to bring the person in the first place.

Mr. Churchill: In the first instance I should like to thank the minister for answering the question I asked him on March 28 with regard to the policy of the department. His statement was not quite as comprehensive as I hoped it would be, but he has assisted in our understanding of the problem. I think the subject of immigration requires greater understanding on the part of the Canadian people. I believe there is a wide diversity of opinion with regard to the benefits or otherwise of immigration. We tend to look back to the period of the early years of this century when immigrants came into our country in very large numbers and were largely bent on taking up farm lands, particularly in western Canada. We consider there was considerable success attached to that great movement of people. At the present time it is not possible to absorb people into Canada on that scale and with that intention, as it was in those earlier years. The subject of immigration has become somewhat more complicated and deserves very careful attention.

With the growing industrialization of our country and the trend toward urbanization there is no question but that the immigrant is not as easily placed as he was in the first twenty years of this century. That is why I have been wondering about our immigration policy. Let me put this question to the minister. Over a period of years what increase in the population of Canada can be attributed to immigration? Has the minister at his disposal information that will indicate to us the relationship between immigration, natural increase and loss of population to the United States and other countries? Would we be further ahead in putting more emphasis on attempting to retain the natural increase of our country rather than putting our efforts into drawing immigrants into Canada? There is no question but that there is a serious loss of people each year to the United States and elsewhere.

It is on these grounds that I say there is perhaps a lack of understanding throughout Canada as to immigration. Is it as valuable as we have sometimes thought it to be? I do not suggest for one minute that we have not received immense contributions from immigrant people. After all, we ourselves are either immigrants or the descendants of immigrants, and the country has benefited from those who have come here in the past and from those who are coming at the present time. But is our emphasis perhaps wrongly placed? I should like to have the minister's comments on that problem. One of the reasons I raise it is that checking in the Canada Year Book for 1951 I noticed according to paragraph 13 on page 152, which deals with presumed permanent movement of population between Canada and the United States for the years ending June 30, 1940 to 1949, that over that period we appear to have lost to the United States 131,742 persons. That is our net loss to that country.

The figures there appear to indicate that not only do our native born depart to the United States but also many people who have not established themselves as permanent residents, immigrants who have entered our country just as a stopping place before going elsewhere. When we are spending several millions of dollars on immigration, are we aware of the fact that we are losing many of our immigrants and perhaps many of our native born who, with a somewhat different emphasis with respect to our economy, might be retained within the country?

I have a number of problems I should like to take up with the minister. I do not propose to use too much of the time of the house, but I think this department requires careful study for our own information and for the information of the people of Canada. I should like to draw the minister's attention to an article which I presume he has already seen, and perhaps has answered, though I did not see the answer in the press. This article is dated April 26, 1952, and appeared in the Globe and Mail. It has reference to a meeting of the school of social work of the University of Toronto and the Toronto welfare council. The subject dealt with was immigration. From my knowledge of the situation in Winnipeg, and from my experience with the Winnipeg welfare council, I would say that the problems discussed in this article are perhaps the same in western Canada as they are in Ontario. I would like to quote just one or two passages here and perhaps the minister will make some comment. The article starts off as follows:

> Prospective newcomers should be given a start in basic English before they arrive in Canada and the process of integrating them into the Canadian way of life needs a major overhauling. These were two of the views expressed last night at a conference on new immigrants, held under the auspices of the school of social work of the University of Toronto, and the Toronto welfare council.

Then further on: Professor C. D. Hendry, who is director of the social work school, dealt with the problems facing the services. This is the statement made by Professor Hendry:

> The public as a whole, he said, seemed to lack clarity, conviction and certainty as to how many immigrants can be absorbed. He described public policy on immigration as: "Cautious, conservative but essentially constructive." Dealing with specific attitudes, he found unawareness, lack of information, and apathy prevailed in some quarters, while in others there was fear that job security of Canadians was threatened by the immigrants.

[Mr. Churchill.]

He goes on to say, and these are his exact words as given in quotation marks in the paper; speaking of agency officials—

> "I regret to say some are cold and even harsh in their treatment of new citizens."

Dr. Hendry has some further comments along that line and then Professor Wolfgang Friedmann, of the school of law, University of Toronto, and again I am quoting from the newspaper, said:

> Many things could be done before the immigrants arrive in Canada. A common bond united all agencies which dealt with one or another of the problems of immigrants; a common desire to meet the challenge offered by the arrival in Canada of 200,000 newcomers annually.

Then Stephen Davidovitch, adviser, citizenship branch, Ontario department of education, said:

> —the lot of the present-day immigrant was infinitely better than that of the immigrant of 50 years ago. Generally speaking, the public agreed that the immigrant should be helped but not mollycoddled.

I think we are in agreement with that.

> An association composed of representatives of ethnic groups, to meet the immigrant and advise him on such matters as housing and jobs, would be a distinct advancement, he felt. Such a body might also make loans to newcomers and in this way prevent them from being fleeced by tricksters. . . Education of the newcomer, particularly in English, was stressed by the speaker as a prime necessity.

Miss Florence Philpott, executive secretary, Toronto welfare council, said:

> A great deal of commendable work had been done. She stressed the lack of integrated, co-ordinated program.
> After reviewing the existing services available to immigrants, Miss Philpott remarked that far too few of them availed themselves of their use. The fact that many of the agencies had not informed the immigrants of the existence of these services was not surprising, Miss Philpott said. She doubted whether these agencies knew the services existed, either.

What I am wondering about, Mr. Chairman, is the amount of co-operation that exists between this department and the various provincial governments on whom apparently the final responsibility rests when the immigrants are admitted. In experience, a great deal of the work in connection with immigrants seems to fall upon voluntary organizations and welfare services. To what extent the department has a plan with regard to aiding immigrants on arrival, in conjunction with the province, as suggested in that article, is a question on which I would like to hear some comment from the minister.

I will stop at that point, though I have some other questions to take up later.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I can briefly remark that I did not see the particular article; but the hon. member will appreciate that there were officers of this department of government at that meeting and they made a report to us. I should also add that this year we are granting to the gentlemen he has mentioned, or at any rate to the department he has mentioned, the sum of $2,500 for study of this particular problem. That is not to suggest that it has not been studied before by ourselves, but it is merely to obtain views of the kind that have been read today, of persons who look at us from the outside.

We recognize that one can always do more for an immigrant than is being done and that there will be immigrants who will have great difficulty in becoming settled. Those are the ones you will hear about at a meeting of social workers. I do say there has been a minimum of difficulty to this moment in settling those people and, I think, a minimum of difficulty in having them accepted into the Canadian community.

Mr. Churchill: I was hoping the minister would say something about my earlier question regarding emigration, but he may do that later on. I would suggest at this point that the question of education enters into this immigrant problem, in that a considerable proportion of immigrants are, I presume, juvenile and individuals of school age. Perhaps the minister could give us some figures that would indicate the number of school age who entered the country last year.

I would point out to him and to the dominion government that the bringing in of immigrant children, desirable as they are, adds a further burden to the municipalities who are concerned with the educational problem. A friend of mine in the city of Winnipeg who is interested in this matter has suggested to me that the number of immigrant children added to the Winnipeg school rolls as of last September 1 would represent the equivalent of perhaps ten classrooms. I have not had the opportunity of checking his figures, but it does seem that something like that might very well happen. If you bring in several thousand children, even at the rate of crowded classrooms of 40 students, obviously you have to supply something rather extensive in the way of accommodation. This burden I am sure is falling upon the cities, and certainly it has done so in the case of Winnipeg, because we have received a fair proportion of immigrant families. I am not sure that this particular problem has been faced or whether anything useful can be done about it; but on other occasions when I have been talking about federal aid for education this was in our minds. A dominion policy that brings in people of school age should also, as a corollary, provide some assistance to the municipalities that are faced with the heavy financial burden of providing for their education. Unless the education of our immigrants is carried on, certainly that of the immigrant children, they will not become effective Canadian citizens. At the same time, along with that goes night classes for adult immigrants. Upon whom does that burden fall? Is there some assistance from the dominion government for that purpose?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Well, to answer the question first asked, during 1951 the number of children up to 14 years of age admitted was 39,474. My other figures run from 15 to 19, so not all of those could be considered to be of school age, but I shall add them anyway; 13,268.

With respect to the cost of education, of course it goes without saying that when they come here they are entitled to education at the expense of the public. If the hon. member feels that the city of Winnipeg is not prepared to accept this as a charge upon the city, he will say so. Up to this moment we have had no protest from the city of Winnipeg with respect to the education of the children of immigrants.

On the other point as to the cost of education for adults in night classes, this department does supply a very large number of textbooks for use in those schools. There is another item which my friend may come to later which indicates that last year we spent $116,000 on providing those to any provincial governments that asked for them, and I think all did ask for them.

Mr. Churchill: I would not want the minister to leave the impression, which he may not have intended, that Winnipeg is not ready and well able to receive all the immigrants who come. It is a friendly city, I would have you know, and we welcome those who come to us. We try to look after them. I was attempting to point out that an extra burden is placed upon the municipalities throughout Canada because of the policy of the dominion government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask the minister one question. In those cases to which he referred, of immigrants who for one reason or another, were temporarily unable to look after themselves, from what public sources does the money come to look after them?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is under vote 63.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister say that all the money for that comes out of his department? My understanding was the contrary.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That applies to immigrants under the department of immigration. The Department of Labour has a vote which they apply to immigrants brought forward by that department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does that mean that certain immigrants would be maintained by one department and certain ones by another? You may have people, let us say at Ajax, some being maintained by one department and some by another. Would they not be in separate compartments?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): At Ajax there are both immigrants who came here through this department and those who came sponsored by the labour department under IRO.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does that not create difficulties in having these people mixed and receiving aid from two separate departments?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): No, it has not so far as I know.

Mr. Drew: Before we pass this item, I want to suggest that perhaps what is happening this afternoon indicates the advantage to any important department of holding its estimates off until the last moment. This subject is being discussed in an atmosphere of complacency that is wholly out of line with the sentiments of the people of this country generally toward the administration of this department. It has already been said today, and I feel sure it is true, that next to the burden of taxation and the high cost of living there is no single subject about which there is as much dissatisfaction as there is in regard to our over-all policy of immigration.

But there is one subject to which I wish to refer before this passes from discussion in this house into the wider discussion that undoubtedly will be carried on in the press and in public, as it has been so vigorously for some months. I refer to the implications of the disclosure of corruption and fraud amongst various officials attached to this department. I refer once again to an article that has been referred to before, the article in Maclean's magazine of March 15 of this year under the title, "How racketeers sold entry into Canada." I would also refer to an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of February 21 of this year under the heading "Immigration by fraud," referring to disclosures that there had been fraud in connection with illegal entry into Canada of an undisclosed number of persons through the activities of an agent of this department at Karlsruhe, Germany. The article in Maclean's magazine of March 15 referred to the activities of government officials in connection with immigration from Italy. The statements were unequivocal; they were positive. This article by one of the best known writers in this country contains this positive statement at the top:

> Corrupt Canadian government officials and unscrupulous travel agencies have extorted thousands of dollars to smuggle Italian immigrants into Canada.

The minister has simply referred to this by indicating that an inquiry has advanced to the stage where it may be hoped that it can be closed at an early date. I suggest that this indicates something of a nature that calls for the most thoroughgoing investigation, and not merely an investigation of a possible breach of trust or criminal action. The Maclean's article on the one hand, and the Ottawa Journal editorial on the other, I merely choose as examples of the many editorials and public statements that have been made indicating widespread concern about something that may by no manner of means be confined to the known cases which have been indicated in this way. It is not usual that it is only the known cases that emerge in the way these did before there were any investigations, so far as we are aware.

In connnection with the Maclean's article to which I have referred, it speaks of a widespread organization, describes the methods by which an agency named in this article had been carrying on activities; and it describes how a man, named, obtained false declarations that certain people were getting certain farmers to work for them. This article also refers to the information which had been obtained that similar activities had been carried on in Germany.

There are two angles to a disclosure of this kind. The first is the breach of trust by the officials. The second is the fact that if these people, as citizens of Canada, were obtaining money by false pretences and had broken their trust, then criminal prosecutions should follow. Third, and extremely important, there is the situation that is produced by the activities of these people in connection with immigration itself. On the one hand there would appear to have been a substantial entry into Canada of immigrants who should not have come. On the other hand it would appear that many immigrants who could have come in any event were paying sums of money to these officials in the mistaken idea that this was necessary in order to enter Canada.

It is not just enough to be told what action has been taken in relation to the officials.

It is also necessary to know what is going to be done with regard to the immigrants. As to these immigrants who paid money unnecessarily to these men who have broken their trust and are probably also guilty of criminal offences, certainly if it is humanly possible that money should be obtained, and paid back to the immigrants. It may not be possible. Most certainly it is an unfortunate thing if their innocent paying of this money means that there is no way by which they can recover.

But the other side of this picture is that those who have obtained entry into Canada by fraud may well have come here for purposes of which we are only too well aware at this time. Therefore any conduct of this nature, in breaking the immigration laws of Canada at such a time as this, should be looked upon with particular concern. I would hope that the investigations that are taking place will be completed soon; that prompt action will be taken to deal with every single case disclosed; that a complete and comprehensive public statement will be made with regard to every aspect of this situation as disclosed in part by the earlier information which was made public in the manner I have described, so the real concern in the minds of the people of Canada may be allayed at least in some measure and there may be an assurance that the laxity which permitted fraud of this nature will be checked so that in future the immigration laws and such immigration policy as may exist will in fact be enforced by the officials of the department.

Just before I close these remarks may I say that no remark I have made is to be taken as a reflection on the regular officials of the department here who, I know, give that kind of service one would expect. But here are disclosures of fraud on the part of people who in some way were permitted to have an influence upon the entry into Canada of immigrants, and it is a situation which calls for action of a nature which will reassure the public with regard to the procedure that is being followed.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, may I assure the leader of the opposition that when the information came to the ears of this department that there were any irregularities at all, we began the investigation some time before any publicity appeared about it. In fact it was the action taken by this department in connection with certain legal matters which drew it to the attention of the public.

There are several problems involved, as he has said. First, what action is to be taken with respect to the immigration officer who permitted himself to be found breaking his trust? Second, what is to be done with respect to that person who induced him to do so? Third, what is to be done with respect to others who knowingly, and perhaps not knowingly, contributed to the activities of this group?

I must say that I personally have been disappointed at the progress which has been made in going through the many matters involved. When I say I was disappointed, I mean that I was disappointed only in the length of time it has taken, but not in the work that has been done. When I discussed this matter as late as Tuesday night of this week with some of the officials of the Department of Justice, I fully appreciated the time that was required to go thoroughly into the whole question as it may affect all the persons concerned in Canada and abroad. Just as soon as we have come to a conclusion as to the extent of the activity and the means to take to bring before the courts those who have broken our laws, we shall do so; and at the same time, within the rules which apply when matters are before the courts, we shall give as much information as possible to the public.

I want to thank the leader of the opposition for his reference to the officials of the department. I knew he would say what he has said when he remembered that he had not done so previously. I think the use of the headline in the one article was misleading, as I pointed out to the hon. member for Kamloops at one time this session. It is commonly understood that the term "officials", when related to the civil service, means a particular group of people. I want to assure the committee that no official I know of is concerned in this matter.

Mr. Blackmore: Perhaps the minister has already given the information that I should like to have him give me; I have not been here all during the discussion. Has he any facilities through which he is able to keep in touch with these immigrants and to find out whether or not they are being taken advantage of by the people who are employing them? Is there any agency to which they can apply in case they feel that they have sustained an injustice at the hands of Canadian people?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We have a settlement officer in the city of Edmonton in my hon. friend's province. Not only is he obliged to find places for immigrants, but he is obliged to keep in contact with them, and to be of assistance to the immigrant should he need assistance in any difficulty he may have with his employer or with anyone else.

Mr. Blackmore: Is there a particular man in the province who does this work?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Yes; and more than one in some of the larger provinces.

Mr. Blackmore: By what means would a person in my constituency in southern Alberta be able to get in touch with that man in Edmonton? Is he told who that man is, and is he given his name and more or less made acquainted with him so he would feel certain that his petition would be heard?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): In many many cases the settlement officer is the one who meets the immigrant and directs him to the place to which he is to go. Of course that does not occur in every case, but the immigrant is informed of the fact that we have these officers, and of their location, though he may possibly forget and misplace the paper at a later time.

Mr. Drew: There is one point I wish to refer to briefly; I am speaking particularly of education for adult immigrants. There can be no doubt about the ordinary educational facilities being available to those of the ordinary education age. It is extremely important that adult immigrants have an opportunity for education which not only gives them the advantage of the two official languages of Canada but also gives them information with regard to our form of democracy and with regard to many things about our country which are of importance. The textbooks that are being supplied by the department in that respect are very good and are being used to great advantage. I believe more could be done through an extension of the co-operation between the department and the departments of education of the provinces than is being done at the moment. On this occasion I am not raising this critically, because we are dealing with a relatively new field. I simply put this forward and leave the thought as something I should like to have considered by the department.

More and more we recognize the advantage of visual instruction. I would hope that a conference between some representative or representatives of the department and representatives of departments of education in the provinces would consider the possibility of arranging for a type of visual education which could be produced by the national film board and would become generally available across the country. Certain films are available now, but these films are not of the type I have in mind. Films which illustrate in a pictorial form certain types of our system of national, provincial and educational government, certain types of our own characteristic Canadian way of doing things in different parts of the country, would all be very helpful in connection with these programs.

In offering this suggestion may I pay my personal tribute to some of these voluntary organizations which, along with the organizations set up by the provincial governments, are doing a magnificent job at this time in giving educational training to the immigrants. I do not propose to pick them out, because in some cases they are religious organizations, in some cases they are under particular racial groups, and under various public service activities. But a splendid job is being done which deserves the commendation of hon. members and the people of Canada. I am only suggesting that with the experience already behind us, it would be desirable that we extend the facilities for visual education and assist education in every way we can through the opportunities we now have.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I agree that one of the best means of education is the visual method and, as the leader of the opposition has indicated, we have films; but at one time or another there has been some criticism, not criticism of the films we have but merely, as my hon. friend has said, a request for other and perhaps better films. I want to assure him that in the citizenship branch we are doing what we can to provide these, and we shall take under advisement the recommendation he has made.

I do want to join with him in again expressing my thanks to all the organizations which contribute to this work. I have said repeatedly that we could not function in providing the immigrant with an easy means of entry into Canadian life without them. In fact I have gone farther and said that if they did not do it I do not know who would, unless the government did it. But I think it is recognized that it is not desirable that we should provide all the means, because those means are provided by voluntary organizations on the spot, by zealous workers who know local circumstances and who, because of their interest in these people and their interest in the Canadian people as a whole, have volunteered their help. It is a most remarkable work, and I think it is having most remarkable results.

Mr. Fulton: I want to refer briefly to a subject already discussed, not for the purpose of reopening it but simply to indicate that I support the proposal which was placed before the minister. Unfortunately another engagement prevented me from being here when the matter was first raised. I refer to the question of allowing Canadians of East Indian origin to bring into the country their relatives from India. The proposal, which has been set forth in detail in a brief submitted by the Khalsa Diwan society of Vancouver, is that the Indian people be treated for this purpose not along with the general classification of persons of Asiatic race, but that they be regarded as what in fact they are, members of the commonwealth, so the restriction applicable at the present time under the provisions of P.C. 2743 would not apply with respect to Canadian citizens of East Indian origin who are anxious to bring their relatives into Canada.

As I say, this matter has been discussed previously; and it is for the purpose of indicating that I too support the suggestions which have been made to the minister that I bring it up at this time. I do so particularly because I have some knowledge of the splendid contribution the East Indians are making to the social and economic life of Canada. We have a quite substantial group of them in Kamloops. They are engaged very successfully in farming, lumbering and all other types of activities which contribute in a very real way to the economic as well as the social welfare of our part of the country.

Just as a final illustration I should like to say that recently I had occasion to submit to the minister an application for the inclusion in the current quota of some relatives of one of those East Indians who lives in Kamloops. The application was supported by a group of prominent citizens who signed a letter to the effect that they supported the application. It was remarkable to see who signed that letter. There was the past mayor of Kamloops, the present mayor, the bank managers, prominent citizens in every walk of life, social and business in that city and district. I think that indicates the very high regard in which these people are held in the communities where they are settled and where they are good Canadians.

I do hope the minister and his officials will find it possible to discontinue the restrictions on the applications from those of East Indian origin who are Canadian citizens for the admission of their relatives to Canada. I regret I was not here when it was discussed, and that it is necessary to go back to the subject, but I want to make it clear that I support the recommendations made.

682. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $147,237.

Mr. Coldwell: What is happening in regard to the Indians who are being put off the reserves? I have had several inquiries from Saskatchewan, and some complaints. I believe the band makes the decision. Is the decision the band makes subject to appeal?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I will delay the committee only one minute to answer my hon. friend. The Indian Act, which came into force in September, provided that Indians might appeal against the omission from the band list of any name, or against the inclusion on the band list of any name. That appeal must have been registered within six months of September 4. All the appeals are now in. The procedure set out in the act provided that the appeal would be heard by the registrar, who is a departmental official. There then would be an appeal from his decision to a county or district court judge. No action has been taken as yet because we have just been accumulating information.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

B—Civil defence (formerly under Department of National Defence)—

294. To provide for the civil defence program and to authorize total commitments against future years in the amount of $575,000, $6,508,839.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this item was before the committee on June 6 and has been standing since. At that time the hon. member for Calgary East raised the point that although a larger amount is being asked for this year, $6,508,839 as compared with $4,196,202 last year, only $844,851 was spent. Certain explanations were given. In fact an attempt was made to rather chide the hon. member for raising the question by pointing out that, on the one hand, arguments were made in favour of economy and, on the other hand, when money was not spent questions were raised about that. The discussion ended at that stage.

Although we have reached this stage in the session I do not think the matter should be left in that position. We are asked to consider an appropriation of $6,508,839 for civil defence. What was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary East was that although $4,196,202 was provided last year, only $844,851 was spent. In doing that he was naturally raising the question why there should be an increased appropriation asked for this year.

The very fact that an attempt was made to divert attention from the question asked by suggesting that there was a surprising contrast in a request for economy, on the one hand, and then questions raised as to why the whole amount was not spent indicates the measure of unreality with which we are dealing with this subject.

Civil defence is as important as it is described from time to time by the minister or by those attached to the department, or it is not. Generally speaking there does not seem to be any measure of urgency that is in keeping with the statements that are made from time to time. We seem to be proceeding with this at a rather leisurely pace which is wholly inconsistent with the statements that are made about the seriousness of world affairs. The day before yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke in Winnipeg and, according to a Canadian Press dispatch, said:

> The free world must be prepared for an increase in tension in Europe.
> The possibility of accidentally "slipping" into a third world war will increase in the next two or three months until German ratification is decided one way or another.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs was emphasizing the urgency of the situation which might develop within the next few months, yet we are told that to a substantial extent the difficulty in proceeding with civil defence is that there are no agreements with some of the provinces. So far as I have been able to ascertain agreements have been made with only two provinces, Ontario and Alberta. This covers only part of the problem.

Under these agreements payments will be made by the dominion government for part of the civil defence activities and for certain responsibilities that would arise. For instance, in the case of the agreement with Ontario there is an undertaking in connection with the extremely important question of uniformity of hose couplings so that fire equipment from one community may be used in another, which proved to be of such immense value in the United Kingdom and other countries which were bombed during the last war.

The minister who is responsible for this activity quoted a statement by Sir John Hodsoll, appearing in the Montreal Star of May 9, who had visited this country to inquire into civil defence activities, as he had in the United States. He was reported to have expressed his approval of what he found in Canada. I am not aware of how much of Canada Sir John Hodsoll saw, but it is just possible that he may have been beguiled by some of this most effective propaganda that emanates from the department of the minister who is responsible for this particular task.

Nevertheless we are not as much concerned with what may be said by somebody from outside Canada about what is happening here as we are with what we know is actually taking place in Canada. We know that no effective civil defence organization is in existence across this country at this time. We know that if, to use the considered terms of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, we should slip into another war within the next two or three months we would not be ready to deal with the problems that would arise in the case of attack.

I hope no one will suggest that I am being an alarmist when I speak in these terms. I am referring to the statement of the minister for external affairs that such a possibility exists. If it does exist, then we should be considering this subject with the sense of urgency that is related to a statement of that kind by the minister responsible for our external affairs. We should know to what extent steps have been taken or should be taken to deal with first aid, with firefighting, with the designation of target areas, with the setting up of reception areas, with mutual aid to communities, and matters of that kind. We should know to what extent these arrangements are known to those who will be responsible for carrying them out. We should also know something of what has been done in regard to the establishment of emergency hospitals, emergency transportation and engineering services. We also should know something about the organization that would integrate the activities of the dominion, provincial and municipal services that would be brought together. I am not going to go into the field of civil defence, because that is a very broad field indeed. However, one thing that is clear is that there cannot be an effective civil defence organization under the plans now contemplated until there are agreements with the provinces. The necessity for those agreements is indicated by the very fact that there are agreements now with Ontario and Alberta covering only a limited part of this problem, it is true, but still covering some part of it.

The minister has already indicated certain difficulties that will exist until these agreements are completed. Either this is something real or it is not. If it is something real, then we need an organization that can go into operation right away. If it is not real then we should not be asked to vote more than $6 million for this particular task, remembering that the $6 million is only a limited part of the over-all cost of the civil defence organization that would be set up through the activities of the dominion, provincial and municipal organizations. If this is something that is important, if there is in fact a danger and that danger should become a reality, is it going to be any answer to anybody in this country who suffers as a result to say that we did not have an agreement with your province, we were not able to convince them that civil defence was really a provincial problem?

Civil defence and the assurance of civil defence surely must be a national responsibility. Surely it can be no answer, in the event that a situation should arise calling for civil defence, to say, "oh, we did not achieve any agreements". Actually some of the provincial governments, and perhaps all of them, do not believe it is their responsibility. Some of them have made a move toward entering into agreements or have entered into agreements because they feel that something must be done in any event, but surely civil defence is a part of the whole problem of defence. Surely if civil defence is necessary, whatever steps are necessary to assure civil defence should be taken. Surely this extra burden imposed because of world conditions, over which no provincial government and no municipal authority can have any control, should not be added to the already heavy burden of the provincial and municipal governments.

At a time when municipal councils are having all the difficulties they can handle it does not seem reasonable that this new burden, wholly unrelated to the ordinary municipal tasks, should be added to what has already been thrown upon them. I suggest that no matter what may have happened before, no matter what may have been regarded as adequate under the circumstances, if the government really thinks the Secretary of State for External Affairs is correctly interpreting the situation when he predicts that the next two or three months are going to be as critical as any months that lie ahead of us, months within which, to use his words, "there is a possibility of slipping into war", we should be doing more than we are doing now to tackle this problem with a sense of urgency and reality.

I do wish to say that the officer in charge of civil defence, Major General Worthington, is an officer whose experience, energy and adaptability to new conditions command the confidence of all who know him and undoubtedly should command the confidence of all Canadians. I cannot imagine any officer in Canada who could more effectively perform that task on the basis of his record in the different military and other duties that he has undertaken. But this problem relates to a fundamental decision as to whether there is urgency and necessity for civil defence. If there is, then I suggest that an acceptance of the responsibility by the dominion government calls for action to meet any situation which may arise in keeping with the possibilities, remote as we hope they are, that have been pictured within the past few days by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. No one wishes to be an alarmist, but there would be no reason for the organization of civil defence at all unless it were against the possibility of just such a situation as is contemplated by the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In the light of that statement, in the light of world events related to it, and having regard to the vital importance of civil defence in the preservation of our whole economy and the confidence of our people, I feel that the problem should be tackled with a sense of reality that does not yet seem to have emerged.

Let me point out one of the things which should be in the mind of every one of us. We have heard a great deal in the past few days about the bombing of the power plants on the Yalu river. I am not going to enter into the controversy relating to that bombing. I should imagine that most young Canadians in Korea will have very definite views as to the desirability of permitting electricity from that source to be used to assist the communists in their efforts to build up their military strength. Nevertheless I think that having regard to the importance of these targets and the extent to which it was clear that they were given a No. 1 priority, we should remember that in this country a higher percentage of industry is based upon electrical power than in any other great industrial country in the world.

In every area which would be open to an attack of that kind, part of the general morale of our people would be related to the plans which might be made in keeping with the knowledge of that simple fact. I know we have not time for an extended debate on this subject. I am putting my views forward at this time with the hope that they may be given consideration, particularly in the light of the assessment of world affairs made only two days ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Martin: As the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, there is not time for the kind of discussion which he and I would like to have on this important matter. I can only say that generally speaking I agree with what he has said. That does not mean to say that in all particulars as to the division of responsibility he and I would be in full accord, but generally speaking I want him to know that in a general way I agree with what he has said.

The policy we pursue is one of decentralization. That is the practice followed in the United Kingdom where they have had perhaps the greatest experience in civil defence. It is also the practice being followed in the United States, a country comparable for our present purpose in governmental structure to our own. As the leader of the opposition knows, so far as financial responsibility is concerned, even during the war the municipal organizations and local governments in the United Kingdom continued to bear a very heavy portion of the cost of civil defence. There were co-ordinating plans issued and general direction given by the central government, but the purchase of civil defence equipment, the stockpiling of material and the like in the United Kingdom were done, as we are doing it, on a share for share basis. We do regard this matter as important. It is difficult, I may say frankly, to determine the full extent to which we should go; and in this matter we are guided not only by our own appreciations of the temper of the world at this time but also by the consultative arrangements we have with the ten provinces who with the federal government constitute the civil defence committee of this country.

We met with all the provinces about six weeks ago in this building and reviewed what had been done and what it was proposed to do during the ensuing year. I would not say that we were in agreement on all counts, but the following quotation from the Edmonton Journal of May 7, in which the minister in charge of civil defence for the province of Alberta expressed his view of the conference, sets out, I think, better than anything I can say the measure of understanding between ourselves and the provinces. Mr. Gerhart is reported to have said:

> Although differences of opinion still exist between the federal and the Alberta governments "better understanding than ever before" of the problems of civil defence was shown at the Ottawa meetings. The minister was hopeful that existing problems now slowing defence co-ordination could be cleared up soon.

Our conception of the problem is this. If a civil defence organization has to be employed, civil defence cannot be done here in Ottawa or in any provincial capital alone, but on the local level. Civil defence is essentially a local matter; it is comparable to the role of the good citizen coming to the aid of his neighbour through voluntary action; and if you have not developed an adequate local organization nothing that is done at the centre will be fully effective. Proceeding on that principle the provinces and ourselves have arrived at a division of responsibility somewhat as follows. We are responsible for certain phases of activity, notably training and the provision of training equipment. The provinces are responsible for setting up their provincial civil defence organizations and, through them in most communities under their jurisdiction, a civil defence organization with a civil defence director at the head.

Every community in Canada of any size now has a civil defence director; they come directly, in the scheme of organization, under the minister of civil defence for the provinces; for instance, in the province of Ontario, the provincial secretary. At the centre we are responsible for the training of the individuals whose job it is to carry on the training schools and to build up the local organizations. For instance, at our local school at the Connaught Ranges here in Ottawa we have in the past year and a half trained some 1,600 people. We have brought these individuals from all parts of Canada, paid their expenses while here, their travelling expenses, and so on. Those men and women have gone back to their local communities and have either taken jobs as civil defence co-ordinators or have fitted themselves into the local organization in one way or another.

This is an impressive record. I think that training is a basic requirement, because unless you have people who have some conception of what civil defence is all about you cannot carry on the effort at the local level.

In addition the federal government has the responsibility for publication of manuals, production of displays and films that are being used to train leaders and to bring home to the people the desirability of taking part in the civil defence organization. We have undertaken, and we have carried out this undertaking, to give to the provinces and through them to the municipalities concerned all kinds of training equipment including, for instance, such things as coveralls, helmets, respirators, stirrup pumps and certain kinds of other material. Those are outright grants or gifts, purchased by us and given to the provinces for the purpose of building up their local organizations.

In addition we have entered into an arrangement with the St. John Ambulance Corps for the training of civil defence workers in first aid. As the leader of the opposition has said, this is an important phase of civil defence training. Normally the St. John Ambulance Corps would train about 55,000 people a year in first aid activity. We hope that in the ensuing period they will be able to train some 132,000 people in first aid. We are paying them on an agreed basis to carry on that work.

In addition we have established here our own advance warning communication system, independent of the armed forces, and independent of the normal systems of communication utilized by the civil arm of government. We have established an advance warning communication system that will be for the exclusive use of the civil defence organization. When I discussed this particular matter in the house before, I indicated that I could not go into details and the hon. member for Nanaimo was kind enough to take advantage of the invitation I then issued to discuss privately with me the particulars of that system.

In addition to our responsibility for the things I have been talking about in a general way, equipment for training, maintaining, and our responsibility for manuals, films and so on, we will now enter into a matching arrangement in respect of certain phases of the program which a year ago we were not prepared to recognize as a federal responsibility. This matching arrangement will provide that the federal government will pay 50 per cent of any project in which a province wishes to participate. We discussed this matter at the conference six weeks ago and we have great expectations that certain undertakings, which we consider in the long term to be matters of special interest to the provinces but have an indirect civil defence value, may be carried out.

I wish to indicate now that I would not want to say or to have anyone say that if this country were subjected to an attack such as the hon. gentleman has envisaged, we would have an adequate civil defence organization. I would be the last man to claim that. This is not the case, nor is it the case with Sweden, the United States, the United Kingdom or any other country where obviously there must be a very intimate interest in this problem at this time. What I want the country to know, and what I am sure my hon. friend would want me to say, is that there is a very considerable amount of civil defence activity going on in Canada. Every city that we conceive to be of possible significance as a target area has a civil defence director. We estimate now that there would be about 60,000 civil defence workers in Canada. Cities like Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Montreal, Windsor, and Halifax are well organized. In the city of Winnipeg they have about 3,500 workers; in the city of Montreal they have about 8,500 workers; and the budget of the city of Montreal for civil defence is something like $200,000 for the ensuing year.

These general observations will give, as I want them to give, ample evidence that this matter is being taken seriously. We are not at the point where one can say that we have a civil defence organization that by any stretch of the imagination will take care of the needs that might conceivably arise. I do not suppose any nation will ever be able to claim that; because in the kind of warfare that we must envisage, if it should ever come, as the leader of the opposition has said and I do not disagree, we have to realize the inevitability of a certain amount of risk.

I want the house and the leader of the opposition to know that the general plans of the provinces and ourselves are now sufficiently developed to justify what Sir John Hodsoll said, namely that on a comparative basis civil defence preparations in this country are comparable with those of any other country. Sir John Hodsoll has had the opportunity of sitting in on the meetings with the ten provinces. He has visited the entire country. As a matter of fact, he has been visiting again this week with the mayors of our country, along with General Worthington, at the mayors' conference in Calgary.

I want to thank the leader of the opposition for the well deserved tribute he paid to the civil defence director in Canada, who is carrying on this very difficult task with singular success.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is it the general practice to divorce civil defence from the war or defence departments?

Mr. Martin: We are following the practice of the United Kingdom and the United States. In the United Kingdom, it is under the home office.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is a question I want to ask in this connection. Is the position of assistant chief of committees vacant? If so, what steps are being taken to fill it?

Mr. Speaker: The position is vacant. It is a permanent position, and the appointment will be made by the civil service commission.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

116. Departmental administration, including the former administration of the Farmers Creditors Arrangement Act, 1943, and the administration of the Municipal Grants Act, and the custody of paid cheques formerly administered by the auditor general's office, $1,643,396.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I have three questions I should like to ask the minister. The first one deals with the taxation agreements with provincial governments. I should like to know first what amount the province of Quebec would have obtained from the federal treasury by signing a taxation agreement this year. My second question is, what amount does the province of Quebec estimate it will collect in the same fields of taxation this year? My third question is, how does this estimate compare with the amount reported by the Quebec treasurer as having been collected in the same fields of taxation last year?

Mr. Abbott: In answer to the hon. member's first question, were Quebec under an agreement with the federal government, our estimates would indicate that in the past fiscal year, that is 1951-52, Quebec would have received a payment including statutory subsidies of $90,358,000. In his budget speech of January 9 this year the provincial treasurer for the province of Quebec, Mr. Onesime Gagnon, estimated the collections from taxation, corporation and succession duties and the federal subsidy would total $88,896,000. In the previous fiscal year Mr. Gagnon estimated that his receipts from those resources would be $89,646,000. He shows a somewhat higher estimate for receipts from succession duties in that period. If Quebec were to enter into an agreement under the amended proposals, which are now before the provinces for the coming fiscal year, 1952-53, on the basis of our present estimates the payment to Quebec, including statutory subsidies, would be $115,003,725.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have all been delighted at this instance of dominion-provincial co-operation.

Mr. Abbott: I have no complaint, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say something about the over-all organization of the department, particularly having regard to the number in it and the number of temporary employees?

Mr. Abbott: Does the hon. member want to know how many employees we have?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Abbott: The total employees in the department for the current year, that is 1952-53, are 4,886 as against 5,088 last year, a decrease of 202.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister give us a breakdown under the main headings?

Mr. Abbott: Most of this information, as the hon. member is aware, is contained in the details of the estimates at page 175. It shows the breakdown between permanents and temporaries.

[Mr. Langlois (Gaspe).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister said 4,000—

Mr. Abbott: That is the total employees in the department, yes. If the hon. member will look at the details on page 177, he will see a further breakdown of the 4,000 odd employees.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister say a word as to the temporaries? I asked a similar question this morning of the Department of National Revenue. What is the trend with regard to temporaries? What would you say as to the number of temporaries with years of service?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that, broadly speaking, we are making as many temporary civil servants permanent as the civil service machinery will permit. As the hon. member knows, in all departments the practice is, broadly speaking, to have a quota of permanents and temporaries. In the normal turnover of the service, as permanent civil servants retire we try to keep the appointments up to our quota.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, but I am interested in taking this one step further. I want to know what the trend is. Your department has increased in number very substantially—

Mr. Abbott: Decreased.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Last year, but increased over the years. I am anxious to know what the broad picture of the temporaries is; that is, let us say how many have you with over five years of service?

Mr. Abbott: I think I probably could have got that information for the hon. member had he mentioned he wanted a breakdown. It is the sort of thing which takes a little time to get out. I shall make a note of it and drop the hon. member a line.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We shall not keep the deputy of the governor general waiting for that.

Mrs. Fairclough: The figures which the minister has given us indicate a reduction of 202 in the staff. The wartime prices and trade board having been closed, and 265 employees having thus been eliminated from the staff, it would look as though, instead of a reduction of 202, there is an increase of 63 in the regular staff.

Mr. Abbott: That is right. The total decrease is accounted for by the elimination of the wartime prices and trade board. The increases are principally in the office of the comptroller of the treasury, with regard to old age pensions and the like.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I feel that the general situation which obtains in the world at the present time requires that we should make some study of the financial affairs of our nation. I should therefore like to make a few remarks. I do not expect the minister to take the time to make any comment upon what I have to say unless he so desires this afternoon.

I realize that we have not as much time at our disposal as we should like to have. It is a most regrettable thing that the estimates of the Department of Finance, the most important estimates in the nation, should have to come in at the time these are coming in. I am not implying that there is any fault on the part of the minister, but that fact does not in any way detract from the importance of these estimates. The balance wheel of the whole economy of the nation is its finance department.

I do not have nearly so much feeling of concern about the minister's department since the passing of the bill recently by which the Bank of Canada Act was amended so as to make it practically certain that no gold entered into the consideration of Canada's money. I have contended for 17 years in the House of Commons that the only real backing of money is, and ought to be, goods and services, quite regardless of the amount of gold we may or may not have.

On June 26 I laid down four principles which, in my judgment, are essential in a realistic financial system. On that occasion I defined a realistic financial system as one which could make what is physically possible, financially possible. As soon as one realizes that the justification for finance is physical reality in respect of goods, then one understands my principle that whatever is physically possible, it ought to be possible to make financially possible. I therefore once more lay down the four principles essential for a realistic financial system, namely, a system that could make what is physically possible financially possible.

The first principle is that the value of money depends upon goods and services, a statement which was tacitly agreed to, by the passage of the bill, by the Department of Finance. The second is that debt-free money, under certain circumstances, can be created by a state soundly, and used safely in the conduct of the financial and economic affairs of the nation. The third one is that granted adequate production, the use of debt-free money in establishing and maintaining stabilized prices throughout the nation is entirely feasible. The fourth principle is that the use of debt-free money to supply purchasing power to consumers in order to enable them to buy the production of a nation is completely sound and should be so recognized.

In connection with this fourth principle, may I lay down a certain modification. On June 26 I was contemplating only the financing of the consumption of goods and services within the nation. It also is true, in connection with a realistic financial system, that debt-free money can be created by a state for the financing of consumption outside that state, under suitable circumstances. I have illustrated that fact several times already this year by referring to what occurred in world war I when the finance department printed $50 million worth of bills, and purchased $50 million worth of wheat and lent it to Great Britain for a number of years. In that case the debt-free money mechanism was used to finance consumption outside the nation.

To sum up, not only can this debt-free money be used to produce markets within the nation but it can be used to produce markets to finance consumption outside the nation. This modification is of the utmost importance in the particular age in which we live. I hope to elaborate on that matter to a certain extent in the remarks which I shall make, and I hope they will not be unduly long.

There are two kinds of export markets that we need to finance. First of all, there is the market in which we are going to deliver goods—sell them if you wish to call it that—to nations which do not have the wherewithal to pay us, as for example the hundreds of millions of people who today dwell in Asia who have no means whatsoever whereby to repay us in goods, services or in any other form whatsoever. These people constitute an excellent market if we can only determine the means whereby to furnish them with purchasing power.

Then we have the class of market found in a nation which is able to return to us goods which we, for some reason or other, are unable to accept. We would find an example of that sort of market in Great Britain. Great Britain can consume almost unlimited quantities of our surplus production, but when she comes to send us textiles or other British production in order to repay us, then for reasons which we consider good, we do not feel that it is advisable to accept those goods and to allow them to come into competition with our own production in our own country and thus to distort our own economy. We therefore find that we have two kinds of export markets in which to finance the consumption of our surplus production.

I maintain that this principle of financing export markets is of major importance in the world as we see it around us today. In fact, I think there is no other possible democratically safe solution to the problem of distribution in the world, as it is at present constituted, at least in the years in which we are now living.

Among the strangest things that I have encountered during the days that have been going by are speeches like the one that was recently given by Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, down in eastern Canada in which he condemned trade curbs. Knowing Mr. Towers as I know him, I find myself completely astounded that such a speech as that should have emanated from him at all. Our Minister of Finance has been down in the United States giving the people there a lecture about the necessity of loosening up their trade restrictions and of allowing our goods to come into their economy. Knowing the minister as I know him, I can hardly imagine that, without some high motive or other, he would make such remarks as that in a neighbouring country. I understand that our Secretary of State for External Affairs has gone down to the United States and said the same kind of thing to the American people, indicating that they should loosen up their restrictions and allow our goods to come into their economy, in competition with their own goods.

The United States are simply not going to do that! The sooner we recognize that fact, the sooner we shall be ready to look to something else. It is just utterly foolish for us to expect the United States to allow Canadian goods like cheese, and other things that we want to send to the United States, to go in there when they do not need those goods.

I think I will quote a few passages from a good article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 2, 1952. It is called "The Paradox of U.S. Trade Bars", by Michael L. Hoffman, New York Times Service. From it I read as follows:

> Geneva.
> It was an essential part of the Marshall plan that Europe should earn its way by increasing production and selling abroad more of what its farms and factories produce.

And further in the article I read:

> The United States said it would not use quotas to restrict imports and objected to other countries doing so except in emergencies to protect their monetary reserves. The United States said it would simplify its customs laws, which often exclude goods for capricious reasons.
> By 1951 Europe had increased sales to the United States by about 30 per cent. All of Europe's exports to the United States, however, still amounted to a paltry $100 million a month—1/230 of our monthly national income.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

And further on:

> After five years of promises by the administration, congress still has not passed any customs simplification law. The United States has not joined the ITO. Unilaterally and in violation of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, the United States slapped quotas on imports of cheese, milk products and casein, thus at one blow crippling the major dollar-earning industries in Italy, Denmark, The Netherlands, Norway and New Zealand.
> Since mid-1950 the axe has fallen on fur-felt hat bodies, almonds and cheese. In the form of hearings under the so-called "escape clause" in the American reciprocal trade law—which authorizes the tariff commission to raise duties if it finds that the domestic manufacturer has been seriously injured by competition—the axe is now hanging over motorcycles, bicycles, wines, pottery, "blue cheese," tobacco, pipes and wood screws.

The article goes on:

> The feeling in Europe is this: If, under one kind of escape clause or another, United States producers are to be guaranteed that any product which proves itself marketable in the United States behind a protective wall high enough to overcome the difference in European and American costs, Europe will never be able to earn enough dollars to enable it to enter fully into a trading community with the United States based on a principle of non-discrimination.
> From the European point of view the root of the problem is the American belief that it is right and necessary to exclude products of "cheap labour". If products of labour that is "cheap" in dollar terms (meaning that it would be cheap if it were in the United States) are to be kept out, Europe does not have a chance.

And I might say not only does Europe not have a chance, but neither does any other country in the world. This is a most revealing article, a most frank and honest statement of the situation exactly as it is in the year of our Lord, 1952, the year we happen to be living in. If there is anyone reckless enough, in the face of an article like that and in the face of the realities that support that article, to imagine for one minute that the United States is going to loosen up her trade restrictions to permit enough goods to come in from the outside to obtain dollars which the nations need with which to buy United States produce, all I can say is that he is far more of an optimist and probably more of an unrealist than really should be running at large nowadays.

May I just give a few more bits of evidence to indicate the small possibility that the United States will contemplate bringing in goods from abroad. The United States wants to sell goods. She does not want to buy unless it be raw materials. When she is able to sell the goods she is able to produce she is able to give markets to her own producers; she is able to give jobs to her own people. Above all other things, the object of the United States today is to find jobs for her people. Roosevelt said in a broadcast in October, 1944: "I mean to find jobs for 60 million Americans by tripling our exports abroad."

Notice he did not say a word about imports, and he did not mean a word about imports. Neither have said or meant the realistic men who have succeeded him in office in the United States.

Here is some more evidence of the growing self-sufficiency of the United States. The United States self-sufficiency is the major single factor in the world today. I am citing some information that I gathered in the December, 1949, issue of the Reader's Digest. This article has to do with the scarcity of United States dollars. It deals with the various commodities which the United States used to import, but which in recent years she has learned to manufacture substitutes for, or to manufacture herself. The first one of importance is cryolite. It used to be bought from Greenland, a colony of Denmark, which country used to use the American dollars from cryolite to buy United States machines. The United States in world war II manufactured synthetically her cryolite. It has almost displaced the Greenland product. Since before world war I the United States have developed synthetic sodium nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals, Alabama and Hopewell, Virginia, nitrate identical with that coming from Chile which used to provide the United States with nitrogen fertilizer. For Chile's sake only, the United States agrees not to operate some government plants. Any moment the United States may decide to manufacture all the nitrates she needs.

Before 1913 the United States bought 26,000 tons of dyes a year, making herself only 3,000 tons. By 1923 nine-tenths of the United States consumption was United States made, with 18 million pounds over for export. By 1939 the United States was making 1,000 different kinds of dyes with production equal to Germany's. By the end of world war II she had captured all of Germany's dye secrets. This was one of the difficulties that stood in the way of Germany in her attempts to recover industrially. It stands in her way today in any attempt to recapture her markets.

Let us take rubber. In 1940 the United States purchased 1·8 billion pounds of crude rubber. Four years later she was making 2 billion pounds of synthetic rubber. In 1939 the United States imported from India 95 per cent of all the mica she used. Today United States makes its own mica by a formula seized from Germany—one more difficulty for Germany. The United States used to import all of its camphor from Formosa. In 1933 the United States began making camphor from turpentine, and now she makes more than she can use. Another difficulty for China, you see. Thirty-five years ago all the United States optical glass and instruments came from Germany, France and England. They are now all produced in the United States. Cigarette papers used to come from France made by her from linen rags by a secret process. Now they are all made in the United States by a secret process from flax fibre, and $10 million of United States dollars are therefore denied to France.

As regards silk, between 80 million pounds and 90 million pounds a year used to come from Japan. Nearly $500 million a year was the cost. It is now made in the United States as nylon from coal, air and water. Soybeans used to come from Manchuria. Now United States farmers produce over 200 million bushels a year. Her sugar could now all be produced from sugar beets in America, whereas Americans used to import a very great deal from abroad.

Figs used to come from abroad. Now in the southwestern states over 60 million pounds of figs are produced in a year. Dates, prior to 1920, all came from North Africa and the Middle East, but now the United States produces around 20 million pounds yearly in the deserts of southern California and Arizona. Tungsten used to be imported from China or Bolivia but the United States is now using molybdenum, of which they have a whole mountain in Colorado. She now produces her own. Shellac used to come from India but now it is made from synthetic resin and corn glutens. Jute for burlap used to come from India. Now the United States has a substitute made from long-fibre spruce. And so the list goes on.

It is quite obvious that the United States is becoming more and more self-sufficient and will continue to become more and more self-sufficient as her knowledge of scientific techniques increases and the inventive genius of her people evolves new substances made from the things they already have. In the face of this fact, and others which I could adduce to bring us up to date, how can any realistic individual persuade himself into imagining that the United States is ever again under normal conditions going to be to any great extent a market for any outside nation?

The question is: What are we going to do about this situation? Here are the realities that face us. What are we going to do about them? We certainly cannot rely on trade where we have to depend upon the United States as being a partner in that trade. At the same time, we can rely upon having United States competition pressing into our very vitals in every market of the world including our own. Once more I ask: What are we going to do about it? I do not expect the minister to answer this question, but I am asking the question for those who read Hansard and the other members of the house to answer. If you were the Minister of Finance, what would you do about that? You cannot go on as we have done. It is just absurd, because you face a situation utterly new.

What is the United States herself going to do about it? We cannot solve her problems, but I will venture to say that if the United States used her constitutional power to have congress create money debt-free as Lincoln did to represent the surplus goods which she has to sell in the world and she sent those created dollars away to the nations within whose borders she desired to sell her products she would have no difficulty whatsoever in disposing of her surpluses and her producers would be just as well off as though they had received the money of that particular nation in return for what had been sent abroad.

This is a point of extreme importance. Those who have not read "The United States in the World Economy", an official United States document published in 1943 and which is available in our library, will do well to read it and find out how the United States financed her exports abroad between 1918 and 1928 by loans to the nations which would be the prospective buyers of her goods. We know also how under the Marshall plan the United States has financed the consumption of her goods abroad. We know that she has now another act, the name of which I never can recall, under which she is sending abroad great sums of money with which the people who receive that money will buy United States goods. Thus the United States is already established and is carrying on quite successfully a method of financing the consumption of her goods by sending money abroad to buy those goods.

Surely that indicates the line along which the solution lies. No nation would be able to tax its people for enough money to lend abroad for people to buy its goods. No nation could afford to go into debt to get money to send abroad. But nations like the United States and Canada certainly could create money debt-free in so far as they had surplus goods and send that money abroad.

There is one further aspect of this matter to which I think we should give some attention. Those who have read the Economic Review, a periodical issued by the United Kingdom information office in Ottawa, will have been impressed by an article in the current issue entitled, "Trade, not Aid." The British do not want aid from abroad. All they want is trade. But we cannot trade with them nor can the United States because when either of us takes their goods into our economy they compete with our own and put our own producers out of business, throwing a lot of our people into the unemployed lists. No realistic administration could tolerate that sort of thing.

What are we going to do for Britain to let her have trade and not aid? Why not say to Britain, "Prepare us all the goods that you feel you would like to send us to buy goods from Canada that you might desire, and we will accept ownership of those goods in Britain." We would not promise to let them come into Canada to compete with our own producers, but we would accept the goods to cancel off the debt. If we deliver a million dollars worth of goods to Great Britain and they produce and deliver for us a million dollars worth of goods, we would accept ownership of those goods in Britain. Where they go from there would be another matter.

We are a partner in the Colombo plan. What we are doing under that plan is just small change, but the plan is a fine idea. We could be distributing goods and services to the various members of the commonwealth for the benefit and blessing of the people of the commonwealth. Why not take that million dollars worth of goods which Britain would have produced and delivered to us to pay for a million dollars worth of products of various kinds that she has obtained from us, and have them distributed under the Colombo plan?

If we create a million dollars worth of debt-free money in Canada and buy a million dollars worth of our own cheese for example in Canada, the dollars which the producers receive would be just as good as solid gold or the money they would get if the cheese were sold in the best market in the world. If we sent Britain a million dollars worth of cheese or let her have a million debt-free dollars to buy cheese, that cheese would be delivered to Britain which would bless Britain. Then if we enabled her to produce a million dollars worth of textiles or other goods to pay for that cheese and have those goods come into our possession in Britain, we would have been repaid. Then we could say to Britain, we wish you to send those goods to Sierra Leone or South Africa or Ceylon or India, or any other part of the empire. By doing that we should greatly bless the recipients of those goods and greatly bless Britain because we should have enabled her to maintain her prosperity and self-respect.

Can anyone find anything wrong with that device or suggestion? Now, the United States could similarly accept payment for as many exports as she might see fit to produce and export for the next fifteen or twenty years, and even beyond that. This illustrates the value that could accrue to us in these perilous times in which we are living by the use of the debt-free money device to finance the consumption of our goods abroad.

There is one more step which I have suggested in times past and which I am going to suggest once more for the minister's serious consideration. I am quite heartened by the move he has made in respect of the Bank of Canada. I feel that the minister and his department are progressing right along. All they have to do is grow a little faster and we shall make still more progress. May I suggest then once more what I have suggested already. Why not let Britain be the distributing centre? There are no people on the face of the earth who know more about the goods which the various parts of the empire and in fact the world itself produce or need. Why not let Britain use the great knowledge and experience she has of trade channels, and those extensive trade connections which she has built up over the centuries to distribute these goods in accordance with the needs of the commonwealth and then the needs of people outside the commonwealth? Why not let Britain use the pound sterling when she begins to distribute these goods? As far as I have been able to find, no monetary unit has been more successful than the pound sterling backed by British production in the hands of Great Britain during the last half century. Why not let her expand the pound sterling and by means of the pound sterling bring in the things from other countries that they can supply her and return to them the goods they need from her own supply, these supplies being greatly augmented and supplemented by imports from everywhere and contributions from Canada and other members of the commonwealth? Let Britain, greatly strengthened by all of this, distribute goods abroad.

I submit that the suggestion I have made this afternoon constitutes the answer to an extremely important situation facing the world at the present time. Before taking my seat I wish to read certain quotations from a speech of the Prime Minister, who has been making some forward-looking speeches recently. I notice he is here in the chamber and has been paying close attention to what I am saying. I think it was in Montreal—he will correct me if I am wrong—that he made a speech indicating the great things that were ahead of this country by reason of the discovery of atomic energy. Let me say to the Prime Minister that while that speech was full of vision and understanding it will not do a bit of good to increase our productive capacity through atomic energy if we cannot sell our goods. The Prime Minister will understand that fully. The world will only be worse off as the result of discovery of atomic energy if it increases its productive capacity without learning how to distribute. I wish to read one or two passages from a speech the Prime Minister delivered on January 22, 1952, at the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in Montreal. There are a number of passages in the speech which would reward consideration, but I am only going to quote two. He said:

> I doubt if we can ever hope for the secure peace in the world which we all want so much as long as great numbers of people are barely able to eke out an existence bordering on, or in many cases below, the subsistence level.

Further on he says:

> I realize of course that there are serious problems of distribution as you were reminded by your president this morning.

The Prime Minister had nothing to say about what might be the solution to those problems. That is the thing the world wants. What is your solution? Further on the Prime Minister used these words:

> It has been ably stated that "never before has the close relationship between food and peace, food and justice, and food and human happiness been so widely accepted."

These words do the Prime Minister great honour. May I submit to him that if he equips himself so that one year from the date on which he delivered that speech he can go before that same organization and tell it how to distribute these goods he will be the outstanding man of the world and the world will recognize him as such. I submit what I have said this afternoon may give the Prime Minister something to think about as he prepares to deliver such a speech.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to raise a point with the minister that could involve a lot of time but as far as I am concerned I am going to do it briefly. It is a very simple question. We are members of the Bretton Woods agreement. We have subscribed and we are also interested in the world bank. I am not one of those who join the hue and cry against Bretton Woods at all, but I am concerned about their position. They seem to be drifting into the position of someone who is on the sidelines watching what is going on rather than taking part, and I would be glad if the minister would say a word or two as to what he feels the position is there.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I can quite agree that we are in a position on the sidelines. We have been forced, as the result of circumstances with which the hon. member is thoroughly familiar, to notify the fund, and we did so in September of 1950, that we were no longer able to maintain a fixed parity for our currency unit. We indicated at that time that so far as we could see there was no prospect of our being able to do so in the immediate future. That action was not taken because of reasons which were peculiar to ourselves but because of the very abnormal conditions which existed in the world, the great multiplicity of exchange controls, quantitative restrictions on trade and the like. We expressed the hope and the intention that as soon as it was possible for us to do so we would live up to our obligations under the agreement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We are still members, and the only point I want to make is this. One realizes very well the multiplicity of reasons that have to a very considerable extent frustrated the expectations of seven or eight years ago. I read Mr. Ilsley's speech of December, 1945, just the other day. Among other things he pointed out the advantage of the organization in providing a meeting place where views could be exchanged. However, I should like to pass this on to the minister. It seems to me at the moment that the situation is so full of difficulty that one does wish that somehow they could adopt a more positive attitude. For example, all they had to say to Great Britain in her difficulties was to suggest that she should do away with her restrictions. I do not suppose there is anyone in this house who would like to see restrictions done away with more than I would, but that did not seem to me to be very practical advice, and one just wonders whether they are sitting in an ivory tower.

Mr. Abbott: Certainly conditions are not such as were envisaged when the international monetary fund was created. As to doing away with restrictions and whether or not it is practical to do so, it is perhaps a case of which comes first, the chicken or the egg.

Mr. Bryce: I have one question to ask the minister, and perhaps he would allow me to ask it now. Can he tell me when his department will be paying claims to people who lost relatives in the sinking of the Athenia in the first days of the war?

Mr. Abbott: I could answer in a general way. There are a number of claims filed now for interim compensation, as my hon. friend knows, under the policy announced by the Prime Minister. These claims are being considered currently by treasury board. At each meeting a number of them come forward for decision as to whether they are within the conditions which permit interim payment to be made pending final determination as to what the amount of the payment should be.

Mr. Bryce: That pretty well answers my question. This lady lost her daughter in the sinking of the boat, but I do not think she has asked for interim payment.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will send the name to my office I will see what the status of the claim is.

Mr. Bryce: I will do that.

Item agreed to.

Administration of various acts and costs of special functions—

124. Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation—adjustment payments in respect of subsidies previously paid, and costs of administration, $30,500.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question about the commodity prices stabilization corporation. As I understand it, this is a sort of hangover from the wartime prices and trade board and is the mechanism for dealing with subsidies?

Mr. Abbott: Correct. It only performs one function now. We have to keep it in existence to settle various outstanding claims in connection with subsidies. The staff is down to a minimum and there is a very small appropriation. There are some disputed claims still outstanding. It is not functioning as a continuing organization, of course.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then one would hope that perhaps the $30,000 it is going to cost this year will disappear by next year.

Mr. Abbott: I would hope so. I think it is very likely.

Item agreed to.

Payments to municipalities—

Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property—

127. To provide for payments to municipalities in accordance with the Municipal Grants Act; and to provide for payments to municipalities under order in council of July 19, 1950, P.C. 3456, in respect of the cost of medical and hospital services and supplies furnished to federal employees and other persons specified therein, $2,360,800.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I have a word on this item, concerning payments to municipalities. Is that situation now working out I will not say to the full satisfaction of the municipalities, but is it on a complete basis? The other thing I want to know is about crown corporations. They are paying income tax, but do they pay their full taxes in all municipalities as well? I refer to real estate taxes.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend will recall the policy there was enunciated previously.

Crown companies are expected to arrange with municipalities for the payment of municipal taxes in the same way that other industrial concerns frequently make arrangements for the payment of their taxes. The basis on which they are supposed to do it is a fair tax payment on normal commercial principles, and those are being made.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They are treated the same as any ordinary private or commercial corporations?

Mr. Abbott: That is right; that is the principle.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They are given no higher negotiating basis?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think this might be a place to ask one further question and it is: To what extent is the government's interest bill being affected by the rise in interest rates? Is it beginning to add substantially to our interest bill as yet?

Mr. Abbott: Not substantially, but it is beginning to show up.

Payments to municipalities—

695. To provide grants in lieu of taxes under regulations approved by the governor in council to rural municipalities that do not qualify under the Municipal Grants Act, but which incur substantial increased expenses or loss of tax revenue by reason of the existence within their borders of federal property, $100,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would like to ask a word of explanation about this. Is it an arrangement which has been made in general?

Mr. Abbott: These are cases which have arisen where certain municipalities cannot claim under the Municipal Grants Act because they do not provide any material service to the crown properties. There are large camps in certain areas in Canada which are completely self-contained and which are taken out of municipalities. Those camps have their own fire services, water services, and so on; yet in some cases some loss is suffered by the rural municipality. After consideration we felt that we could make provision for them. There are not too many, perhaps there are 20 or 25 municipalities of that kind in Canada. When the regulations are prepared we can and should make some adjustment for that class of municipality. The regulations of course will be carried out as soon as they are enacted.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

686. Representation abroad—operational—including payment of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff appointed as directed by the governor general in council, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Coldwell: As this will be the last opportunity, I would just like to ask a question regarding the representations Canada has made regarding the Yalu river bombing. I perhaps might also ask a question here about the speech made by a Yugoslav whose name I have not before me at the moment, but the minister indicated that the matter was under consideration. Was his visa cancelled and was he ordered to leave the country?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to inform myself on that; I do not know.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps the answer can be given to me privately.

Mr. Abbott: I will see to that.

Mr. Coldwell: What about the Yalu river bombing? I think that has disturbed Canadians more than anything else has for a long time. It has also disturbed people in other NATO countries. I have followed the British debates rather closely, and I wondered whether our Department of External Affairs had received any assurance that in future consultations will be had before anything of that sort is done. As a matter of fact, I think people felt a great deal of misgiving when MacArthur was nearing those targets. When they were bombed the other day there was consternation lest the war should spread into Asia—the last thing anyone in the world wants to see today—and result in a global war.

Mr. Abbott: I would certainly share that view, but I am not informed of what communications have been passed with respect to the matter. I feel sure there have been some, but since my hon. friend's remarks are on the record I will see that they are brought to the attention of the minister himself. He will be back next week, and it may be that he himself might feel that he would want to issue a statement.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

811. Airways and airports—operation and maintenance—airway and airport traffic control—further amount required, $33,800.

Mr. Low: Before this passes I wonder if the Minister of Finance would draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport a matter which I think is of very great importance. My attention was called to it just a day or two ago by a short editorial which appeared in the June 5 edition of the Herald-Tribune of the town of Grande Prairie. The heading is "Let's Be Consistent":

By a near-miracle, a youthful Sexsmith pilot escaped death last week when his plane catapulted to earth as he was attempting a landing on a farm field on the edge of Grande Prairie.

Soon after the accident, Department of Transport officials were on the scene to investigate.

It doubtless won't appear in the findings but the fact is the Department of Transport is fundamentally to blame for the circumstances which set the stage for last week's accident.

Why did the group of Grande Prairie and district men owning the Aeronca figuring in the crash find it necessary to base their plane in a farm field in the first place?

The reason, pure and simple, is that the rates the Department of Transport charges for hangar space or even parking space at its airports places a heavy additional financial burden on owners of private light aircraft.

At the Grande Prairie airport, which is controlled by the Department of Transport, it costs a light aircraft owner $10 or $11 a month to park his plane outside the hangar. Rental for space inside the hangar ranges between $25 and $30 monthly.

It is costly enough to operate and maintain a light aircraft.

It is nonsense for the Department of Transport, by its rental scale, to drive these light planes from properly-equipped airports to hazardous, makeshift landing strips in country fields.

The policy is all the more nonsensical when one considers that, in Grande Prairie's case, hangars at the airport are standing idle and empty except for the rare occasion when one or two visiting light planes are placed in storage overnight.

A policy which is at once discouraging private flying and making it more hazardous is all the more difficult to understand alongside the federal government's avowed intention to do everything possible to train young pilots. The importance the government places on training air-minded young Canadians as pilots is pointed up by its policy of making a $100 grant to every man who obtains his private pilot's licence at an approved flying school.

In the interests of consistency, as well as for the welfare of Canadian aviation, the government should review a policy which is driving private pilots to country fields and setting the stage for accidents with the near tragic consequences of the mishap here.

That is the end of the short editorial. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that a young pilot hit a power line and his plane crashed. It is the greatest miracle that he was not killed. This matter has been found of such interest generally that I notice the October, 1951, edition of the magazine Aircraft contains certain letters to the editor complaining about the same situation. I am not going to take time to read this particular letter over the signature of J. H. Dalen of Grande Prairie. I shall just point out these one or two facts. Mr. Dalen points out that the hangar at Grande Prairie airport is never heated, the water and lights are turned off, the roof leaks causing the formation of ice on aircraft parked inside during a spring thaw; the doors are never closed which results in snow blowing in and covering 90 per cent of the floor space. Then he goes on to suggest that these small private planes are required to pay excessive charges. As a consequence they find parking space in farmers' fields some distance from the airport.

In the same magazine, Aircraft, I find an editorial on page 106 that refers to the same situation. I know something about the hangar at Grande Prairie airport. I would ask the Minister of Transport to investigate that matter and see if it would not be possible to do two things: First, to have the hangar put into good shape, repair the roof and see that the doors are made tight and are properly hanging on their hinges; second, to see if it would not be possible to arrive at a more moderate scale of rental for private planes when they are parked in the hangar of an airport.

Mr. Abbott: I shall see that the hon. member's comments are brought to the attention of the minister and his officials.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not wish to dwell upon this unduly, but here are estimates totalling $4·5 million which we are asked to pass in a breath. Looking over the main portion of them, it looks to me as though they are for construction of one type or another. We have had some experience in the past with estimates which have been put through for construction and the construction never materialized. I deplore the fact that these estimates were not considered at the time the main estimates for the Department of Transport were considered. While it is not the time, at this late hour, to debate the matter, I cannot let them pass without raising an objection.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I can explain to the hon. member that construction estimates are considered with the main estimates, and we try to keep those as tight as possible. When I say "we" I am referring to the Minister of Finance and the treasury board. Sometimes construction programs go forward far more rapidly than had been anticipated, and that accounts for the major portion of the supplementary items here. In other cases some degree of urgency develops after the main estimates are prepared in February.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister will understand that it was not about the amount but rather the manner in which these items are brought in at the very last, when the membership of the house is depleted, that I was complaining. Such large amounts should be given more careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1953, the sums of $2,363,584,922.60 and $82,732,188, respectively, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 394, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1953.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

THE LATE JOSEPH HENRY HARRIS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the last meeting of this house one of its most esteemed members has passed away. I refer of course to the former member for Toronto Danforth.

It was with deep regret, shared by all of us regardless of party affiliations, that we learned of the death on October 25 of Mr. Joseph H. Harris, familiarly known to his many friends on parliament hill, in Toronto and, indeed, in many other parts of Canada, as Joe Harris. He had been unable, owing to ill health, to attend the last session of parliament, but most of us had hoped with some justification, in view of the reports we received from time to time from members of his family that he was recovering, that he would be able to be with us during the forthcoming session. We will miss him as will his political associates in particular and those he represented so long and so well in parliament.

Born of one of the original families of the Danforth district in 1888, he received his education at Pickering College and the University of Toronto from which he graduated in 1911 with the degree of bachelor of applied science. Ten years later, at the early age of 33, he was elected to parliament in the general election of 1921. Ever since, for thirty-one years, he has successively represented the Toronto east end ridings of East York, Scarborough and Danforth in this house.

In point of continuous service he was a veteran of parliament, being junior only to the Hon. C. G. Power who was first elected in 1917. To have remained so long in the House of Commons necessarily reflects the kind of service Mr. Harris always sought to give and succeeded in giving to all his constituents and to the country.

He of course naturally pressed for federal projects that would bring benefit to those he represented, but his work as a member of the war expenditures committee, for example, during the last war, and his active interest in the welfare of our veterans, are but examples of his concern for Canada as a whole. To the debates of the house and its committees he brought the vigorous mind and expression of a successful businessman and an active supporter of good causes.

The late J. H. Harris

As president of W. Harris and Company Limited and vice-president of the Harris Coal Company Limited, he exercised leadership in the industrial and commercial development of east Toronto. He was also president of Dominion Glues Limited of Kitchener and of Canadian Organic Developments Limited of London, England.

Whether in this house or as a prominent industrialist, Mr. Harris was ever active in promoting the welfare of that part of Canada where he was born and spent his life. One of his most constructive achievements has its monument in the Toronto East General hospital which he helped to build and where he passed away. For the last twenty years he was chairman of the board of managers of that hospital, and we all know that he worked unstintingly for its progress. Only three years ago he played the foremost part in raising funds for a new addition which, I think quite fittingly, bears his name.

His country, his city, his constituents, his party and all of us here have suffered a real loss in the death of Joe Harris. His whole life was dedicated to the service of his fellows regardless of religion or politics. This likeable, sincere and kindly man will long be missed but he has left a legacy of good works which will keep his memory alive for many years to come. I am sure that I can speak for all in saying to Mrs. Harris and other members of the family that the sincere sympathy of all members of this house goes out to them in full measure.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is with a very deep feeling of personal loss that I join with the Prime Minister in expressing our regret at the death of a very dear friend of every member of this house and the hope that the members of his family will gain some measure of comfort from the knowledge that he lives in the thoughts of those who worked with him day by day in this sphere of activity for so many years.

As has already been said so well, Joe Harris, as we all knew him, was a lovable, earnest and kindly soul who served his constituency continuously over a long span of years during which time he sat in this house because of the personal attention and service that he gave to all people in that constituency regardless of their political affiliations. He was one to whom responsibility as an elected member immediately embraced all those who were citizens of the community he served.

Joe Harris displayed great courage in the past few years. To an extent that is well known to many members, he suffered very greatly, and it was only by immense effort that he was able to attend the sessions as regularly and as faithfully as he did. There was hope that he might be cured of the disease which had afflicted him for some time but that hope proved to be unfulfilled, and as has been pointed out he died recently in the hospital which is so much indebted to him for the efforts that he put forth.

As everyone who has known Joe Harris for some years will attest, he was a man of very deep convictions and great faith in his own country. That was natural in a man who, by his own hard work, thrift and industry, had built for himself an important and successful place in the industrial community of Canada. He had made a great contribution to the development of the industry with which he was associated and in making that contribution had achieved very great personal success. At no time did that success in any way diminish his deep personal interest in the daily lives of every one of the people in the constituency which he had served since he was a young man.

He had deep loyalty. To him Canada was at all times his first interest and the first concern in his thoughts in the things that he did here. It was of the people of Canada that he was thinking when he presented his views on so many occasions. At the same time he was a man to whom the relationship of the Dominion of Canada, the crown and the commonwealth was a strongly living and abiding reality. He cherished those ancient loyalties which were the foundation of his great hopes of the future.

He had seen within his life tremendous developments take place in this country, and no one spoke with greater confidence of the years ahead and of the opportunities for youth in Canada in the coming years than did Joe Harris. He served his constituency well; he served his province well; and he served the Dominion of Canada well at all times in his public service.

The Toronto East General hospital stands as a permanent memorial and in a good many ways also stands as an example of the part that men and women can play in building this society of ours in Canada. There is no greater thing any man can do than ease the suffering and restore the health of those with whom he is closely associated. Throughout long years as chairman of the board of management of the Toronto East General hospital Joe Harris played a great role in extending the most effective possible service to those with whom he lived day by day. That hospital will be a memorial to Joe Harris' memory as long as it stands.

I should think that in the light of those services which he has performed no more fitting epitaph could be placed over the name of Joe Harris than the simple words: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we of this group wish to associate ourselves with the thoughts expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

Joe Harris was an esteemed member of this house and we too deeply regret his passing. We join in the tribute that has been paid to his memory and to the service that he has rendered to his community and to the nation. Likewise we wish to join with all members of this house in expressing our deepest sympathy in this their time of bereavement to his widow, to the children and to all to whom he was near and dear.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the tributes that have been paid to the late member for Danforth this morning in my judgment have been richly deserved.

I feel that I am speaking for all of the members of my group when I say we held Joe Harris in very high regard. We did so because we recognized him as a high-minded, sincere, honourable gentleman, a good member who served his constituency and Canada as a whole very well. He was a vigorous personality, and this house will miss him and the contributions he has so often made and could have continued to make for a good many years had not this illness intervened. I wish to join all members of this house in mourning the loss of a good member, an honourable gentleman, and to express our sympathies to those who have been left to mourn his passing.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, coming from a riding that adjoins that of Mr. Harris I should like to add just a word.

Reference has been fittingly made to his great public service here, to his service to charitable institutions in Toronto and elsewhere, and there is just one thing I should like to add. As somewhat of a stranger to what we call in Toronto the area east of the Don, I found very quickly that the name of Joe Harris was a household word. The Harris family had been known there for many years, but Joe, by his readiness to serve everybody, carried the name to fresh heights. It was almost pathetic to see the confidence that anyone in that area who had any trouble of any kind felt, that it could be solved if only he could get to Joe Harris and have him take it in hand.

With others who have spoken previously I hope the recollection of what he was, added to the sympathy which we all wish to express, will avail much to his sorrowing family.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the years I have been in the House of Commons there have been many occasions when I should have liked to say a word regarding a departed member as we have performed this solemn function year by year. This is one occasion, however, when I feel the house will agree that it is proper for me to say a word.

My mind goes back fifty years when in the one-room Plains Road school in east Toronto, in which there were twenty-seven pupils in all grades, my late father being the teacher, I met Joe Harris. Of that group in that school four subsequently became members of the House of Commons: the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin), Joe Harris and myself.

Fifty years is a long while in one's life. Joe Harris in the House of Commons was the same Joe that I and the other serving members of that group knew so many years ago. Of him it could be said: He was a friend of the people.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spoke of the memorial words that might be most fittingly applied to him. I think of an occasion during the early days of the war when the picnic in East York was taking place and there was a procession to the site of that picnic. Three little coloured boys stood up on the street corner on Danforth, and together they used these words: "Three cheers for Joe, the man we know and love." That was the tribute of the people of his constituency throughout the years.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the representatives of the other parties in extending to his widow and other members of the family my deepest sympathy. Joe Harris was a man whom members of this house without regard to party admired and esteemed, and of whom it can be said that the Toronto East General hospital to which the Prime Minister referred is his monument. Those who may come after will be able to say, as was said of Sir Christopher Wren, "If you would see his monument, look about you."

Changes in the Ministry

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I add this brief word, Mr. Speaker. In the death of our late colleague, Mr. Joseph Harris, the weight of toil in the public service has taken its toll. We have this morning heard fitting tribute expressed to his public service, to his industry and success in business, and to his concern for the welfare of his fellow citizens. Half of his life was spent in the public service of Canada in this House of Commons, a rare record. As one who valued him as a personal friend and loyal comrade, I would say that as long as unstinting public service is appreciated and recognized by Canadians the name of Joseph Harris will be cherished in grateful memory.

Mr. G. J. Tustin (Prince Edward-Lennox): I should like to take a minute to add a few words, since I knew Joe Harris longer than anyone in this house. I can remember that the first day I attended public school, Joe Harris called for me and we went to school together. We were in the same class throughout the whole of public school, and left public school on the same day. Since that time we have always been friends. For many years we were neighbours. Mr. Harris was born on the south side of the concession road and I was born on the north side, almost directly opposite.

I think every member of this house will agree with what has been said this morning about Joseph Harris. He was a brilliant scholar in his younger days. He continued his education, attaining a master of science degree, and used his scientific knowledge to improve the products of the firm with which he was connected. I believe everyone will agree he was a successful manufacturer and industrialist. As a tribute to his judgment I think it can be said that not once in his long business career did a strike ever take place in his plant, and he had a considerable number of employees.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with those who preceded me in extending our sincere sympathy to Mrs. Harris and the members of the family.

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGES—MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to mention at this time the changes that have taken place in the ministry since the adjournment of the house last July. Hon. R. W. Mayhew was appointed ambassador and minister plenipotentiary of Canada in Japan. Hon. James Sinclair was appointed Minister of Fisheries on October 15. On the same day Hon. Ralph O. Campney was appointed Solicitor General.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I should like to table the relative orders in council dealing with those appointments, and to add that Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Campney, before taking the oaths of office as ministers of the crown, resigned as parliamentary assistants to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) respectively.

ORDERS FOR RETURNS

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has been tabling certain reports, I think it appropriate at this time that I should point out that eighteen orders for returns, adopted by this house, are outstanding as yet. I wonder if it is the intention to table those this morning?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have not ascertained whether there are eighteen, but I know a number are going to be tabled immediately.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether the Minister of Justice is going to table at this time any document under the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I think that it would be preferable that that should be tabled in the new parliament in order that it may be discussed there if hon. members wish to do so. It has already been made public.

Mr. Knowles: The new session, I hope.

Mr. Garson: Yes; the new session.

Mr. Drew: Before you conclude the business of the session, Mr. Speaker, might I point out that even with the returns that have been tabled, this still leaves ten orders for returns not tabled. I would ask the government what they propose to do with regard to them, so we shall not conclude this session without knowledge as to the status of those orders for returns which were passed by this house and which the government is therefore under an obligation to place before us.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we hope to have those orders tabled in the near future. Seeing that we shall be sitting continuously from this afternoon on, I do not think there will be much delay.

Mr. Drew: In order that we may understand the position, I would point out that what has been said should go much further than that. I think that the minister who has just spoken should undertake that the orders for returns now outstanding will be accepted as orders for returns, and that the house will receive them.

Mr. Abbott: They have to be.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The government has never refused to follow an order of the house; and in this instance we are sure we will not refuse to do so.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Canada is now free of the scourge and my government is sparing no efforts to bring about the resumption of normal exports of livestock and meat within a reasonable period.

Provision has been made for the development of the industrial and scientific uses of atomic energy through a new crown company known as Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited.

You have approved legislation to enable the Canadian National Railways to construct a branch line between Terrace and Kitimat in British Columbia to assist in the industrial development of that province.

The War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, has been revised to increase allowances and permissible income. The date of the expiration of the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, has been extended and benefits under the Veterans Insurance Act and the Pension Act have been increased.

You have approved a bill to authorize the federal government to enter into new tax rental agreements with the provinces and agreements thereunder have been made with the governments of nine provinces.

The British North America Act has been amended for the first time in Canada. The amendment altered the rules for the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons and a measure providing for the readjustment under the new rules has also been enacted.

You have approved a program to enable Canadian scholars, selected by the Royal Society of Canada, to continue their education abroad.

You have approved amendments to the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code to give effect to recommendations of the MacQuarrie committee on combines legislation.

The Immigration Act has been completely revised.

Legislation respecting the currency, mint and exchange fund has been consolidated in one statute.

You enacted measures respecting the revision of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways, the zoning of airports and the marine and aviation war risks insurance and the reinsurance agreements. Your approval was given to a convention for the promotion of safety on the great lakes.

Amendments have been made to the Canada Grain Act; the Cold Storage Act; the Canadian Farm Loan Act; the Northwest Territories Act; the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947; and the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for all essential services, as well as for our national defence and the meeting of our obligations under the United Nations charter and the North Atlantic treaty.

During the present session, in addition to income and other tax adjustments, it was found possible to remove certain commodity taxes entirely and to make substantial reductions in taxes on other commodities.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence continue to bless our country and the efforts of peace-loving peoples to maintain the rule of law among nations.

This concluded the sixth session of the twenty-first parliament.
