MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSAL FOR LONG SERVICE PENSION PLAN FOR MEMBERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the rather unusual course of giving notice orally of a motion I propose to have placed on the order paper in my name. The motion reads as follows:

That the subject of a pension plan for members of parliament after long service based on contributions by all members be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

From time to time over the last few years the question of making some contributory pension provision for members of parliament has been discussed among members of all parties. It was felt that a pension plan would be in the public interest if it removed, to some degree, the feeling that a long period of service in the House of Commons necessarily prevents many members from making adequate provision for their later years, particularly as there have been conspicuous cases of former members left in a position of great hardship.

A plan suggested by a group of private members is that contributions would be made by all members on the same scale as those required under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The benefits in this case would be at rates and subject to conditions designed to make and keep the pension plan actuarially sound.

I was approached by a number of members and asked whether the government would be prepared to sponsor such a pension plan. My attitude was that, in a matter which concerned all political parties and the position of parliament generally, I would not be prepared to ask my colleagues to take any initiative unless I was in a position to say that the leaders of all parties opposite felt that the establishment of a long service pension plan was something which was not merely in the present interest of members of parliament themselves, but was also in the public interest, because it would help to make it possible to attract well qualified men and women to parliament, and particularly to encourage those with experience in parliament to remain in public life.

I have consulted the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the C.C.F. group and the Social Credit group and I am authorized by each one of them to state that he considers such a pension plan would be a contribution to the strengthening of our parliamentary institutions.

Since the matter is of equal interest to members of all parties, the government felt that rather than bring in a bill with specific terms it would be preferable to ask the banking and commerce committee to consider the subject matter and to make such recommendations for legislation as commended themselves to the committee after a study of the pension plans already in existence in a number of commonwealth countries and the United States and the plan under discussion by a number of members of this house.

Of course, any bill would have to be preceded by a resolution and the necessary constitutional recommendation to the house from the Governor General; but I can say now that a proposal reasonable in itself and which all parties felt was genuinely in the public interest would not be apt to encounter objections from the government.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would this apply to the Senate as well as the House of Commons?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government is not recommending any specific plan; it is referring the matter to the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting certain employees of the House of Commons tabled on June 11, 1952, be approved.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

EUROPEAN DEFENCE COMMUNITY—APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic treaty, signed at Paris on May 27, 1952, extending the guarantees of article 5 of the treaty to the European defence community, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I reported to the house on May 27, representatives of the member countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization signed on that day in Paris a protocol which extended to the newly formed European defence community the guarantees under article 5 of the North Atlantic treaty. It is this protocol which is of immediate concern to us today and for which I am to ask the approval of parliament. I submit that possibly no more important subject will be discussed by the house during this session than the one which we are considering today. The protocol has already appeared as an appendix to Hansard and I am sure all hon. members are familiar with it. Article I of the protocol reads as follows:

An armed attack (i) on the territory of any of the members of the European defence community in Europe or in the area described in article 6 (i) of the North Atlantic treaty, or (ii) on the forces, vessels or aircraft of the European defence community when in the area described in article 6 (ii) of the said treaty, shall be considered an attack against all the parties to the North Atlantic treaty, within the meaning of article 5 of the said treaty, and article 5 shall apply accordingly.

Article II of the protocol reads as follows:

The present protocol shall enter into force as soon as each of the parties has notified the government of the United States of America of its acceptance and the council of the European defence community has notified the North Atlantic council of the entry into force of the treaty setting up the European defence community . . .

At the beginning I should like to emphasize that whatever action is taken by the government in respect of ratification of this protocol, the protocol does not come into effect until it is ratified by all the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Therefore even if action were taken at an early date by the government of Canada the protocol itself would not be effective until it had been ratified by all the members and until the European defence community treaty was also in effect.

The reason that we are asking for consideration of this matter now at the end of this session is to make sure that, if the protocol commends itself to the house, we will not be in the position of holding up its coming into effect. I believe that if the protocol commends itself to parliament and if the government decides to ratify it, it might be desirable to postpone the deposit of our ratification for a time until we see how other governments, possibly even more immediately concerned than we are, act with regard to it.

It is true that the acceptance and the coming into effect of this protocol do extend the obligations which Canada has undertaken under the North Atlantic treaty to the Federal Republic of Germany. That of course is a very important development indeed. As hon. members know, the proposed European defence community includes only one member which is not already a signatory to the North Atlantic treaty, and that is the Federal Republic of Germany. But though the protocol does represent an extension of our obligations, I suggest that the extension is more theoretical than real because in the North Atlantic treaty there is an article, article 6, which provides that the guarantee of mutual assistance shall come into effect when an armed attack is made on the forces, the vessels or the aircraft of any of the parties when in or over these territories or any other area in Europe in which occupation forces of any of the parties were stationed on the date when the treaty came into effect.

That means that we are already under obligation to come to the assistance of the NATO forces stationed in Western Germany. If this protocol comes into effect it will extend that obligation from an attack on forces of occupation in Germany to an attack on Western Germany itself. It is a further step, and I think a valuable step, in the development and the reaffirmation of collective security and collective action which is the best preventive of war in the present circumstances. I think the hon. members of the house, in view of the importance of this matter, would wish me to set this protocol and its implications, especially its implications for Canada, in the wider framework of a statement which I shall keep as short as possible on the European situation with special reference to Germany.

It is, I am sure, clear to all of us that over the continent of Europe today hangs the threat of aggression the driving force of which is a compound of Russian imperialism and communist ideology. Even with that threat facing us, it is not easy to banish memories of the appalling results of German armed might in the service of a totalitarian regime. There are few European countries today in which the material and spiritual wounds of the second world war have had time to heal completely.

National economies, which with the help of the Marshall plan and other assistance have been gradually returning to something like normal conditions after the destruction of war, have had once more to shoulder the added burden of large-scale rearmament. It is heartening, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to see that in spite of these trials of the body and spirit men have been found who realize that the battles of the past should not determine the policy of the future and who realize also the urgent necessity of uniting Europe—of uniting Europe for peace on the only basis on which this can be done.

I need hardly remind the house that in any scheme for European integration the position of Germany is of central importance. This is abundantly evident from the efforts which have been made and are still being made by the western nations to secure the support—and by the Soviet bloc to secure the submission—of the Germans. Germany lies in the very heart of Europe and it is not surprising that western policy in general, and indeed United States policy in particular, regards German participation as essential to the effective defence of Europe. This I suggest should be the easier now that the long feud between France and Germany has lost much of its reality in a world where the important divisions are no longer inter-European—and the old-fashioned balance of power concepts are based on larger than national considerations.

So, the nations of Europe which are still free to choose—and they are not all free to choose—are realizing, in spite of neutralist sentiment in certain countries and certain quarters, how important it is for their survival that they unite as Europeans in the face of this common menace and common danger. This process of European integration seems often painfully slow to those of us who watch it from across the Atlantic ocean. To the Europeans themselves I often suspect it must seem immoderately hasty.

It is not my purpose to recount all of the steps taken in recent years toward the unification of Europe. They are well known to all of us but it is perhaps not always realized that there have been so many. Because the urgent necessity of avoiding a third world war has filled the minds of free men, particularly in North America, we have underestimated the enormous strides which have been taken in the last few years towards the solution of complex European problems, many of which have persisted throughout generations.

This progress has been made in spite of deep-rooted, understandable nationalist feelings and traditions and serious political difficulties such as the legitimate desire of some nations to retain their economic and political association with countries outside Europe. It follows, I think, from these considerations that the integration of Europe will be a gradual process achieved through the creation of supranational authorities with limited but definite powers in certain specific fields—such as the coal and steel authority under the Schuman plan and the Benelux convention. This functional approach has proved to be more acceptable to the nations concerned than the theoretical approach of those who want to establish a formal federation at once. European unity then, I suggest, must grow and not be imposed. It must be a voluntary and constructive union—not anything like a shotgun marriage.

The European defence community treaty by associating the Federal Republic of Germany with the defence of Europe is one far-reaching step toward this more closely integrated Europe. The E.D.C. treaty, like the Schuman plan, is the result of a bold idea for the solution of a major European problem—the return of Germany to the community of free and democratic nations. It takes its place in a complex of agreements all of which show this same trend toward Europeans coming together.

As so often in the past, it was on this occasion the keen and imaginative political intelligence of the French leaders which gave birth to many of the ideas which have helped to create this more closely united Europe.

Nobody would deny that at the present time the necessities of defence and economic recovery are the most compelling incentives toward this unity; but beyond the community of interests in military and economic matters there are amongst these free European states a common culture and common traditions which cannot be overlooked by a group of nations for which individual and moral values are at least as important as material ones.

Germany then as I see it is the key to the solution of these European problems. Because of her geographical location and the size and the industry of her population, Germany—even a divided Germany—is likely to be a vital factor for better or for worse in European politics for many years to come. The events of a few weeks ago in Paris and Bonn, and the repercussion of these events in points as far distant as Berlin and Tokyo, have outlined the importance which the communist world attaches to what is often referred to in the press and elsewhere as the struggle for Germany. Two blows in that struggle were struck for the west in Bonn and Paris on May 26 and May 27 last.

The first of these blows was the signing on May 26 in Bonn by the foreign ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States and France on the one hand, and by the chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany on the other, of an agreement which comprised a convention on relations between the three powers and the Federal Republic of Germany, three related conventions and a number of accompanying instruments.

Hon. members will, I am sure, agree that it is not necessary for me to explain in detail all these various documents, some of which are highly technical and all of which have now been made public. But I would like to say a few things on the convention and the general rules which we know familiarly as the peace contract with the Federal Republic of Germany.

These contractual agreements which were freely negotiated and not imposed replace the occupation statute; they abolish the allied high commission, and they bring the Federal Republic of Germany into the family of free nations. They provide for the stationing of foreign forces in Germany to assist in the defence of the west and for the reservation by the former occupying powers of their rights in Berlin and over matters affecting Germany as a whole, in particular the problems of unification and the eventual peace treaty which of course are not solved by this peace contract. These restrictions on the complete freedom of the Federal Republic of Germany were made necessary by the peculiar nature of the problem of according to the federal republic rights over its external and domestic affairs while preserving the means of conducting negotiations with the Soviet union on German unification and on the final peace settlement. Article 4, section 4, of the peace contract is important and I would like to read it and one or two of the other more important sections.

Article 4 reads:

> The federal republic will participate in the European defence community in order to contribute to the common defence of the free world.

Article 5 provides for the proclamation by the three western powers of a state of emergency in the federal republic, should the federal republic and the European defence community be unable to deal with the situation which is created by an attack on the federal republic or Berlin, subversion of the liberal democratic basic order, a serious disturbance of public order or a grave threat of any of these events.

Article 7 is very important. Its first section states the agreement of the three powers and the federal republic that the essential aim of their common policy is a peace settlement for the whole of Germany, freely negotiated between Germany and her former enemies. It also defers all frontier questions to an eventual peace settlement. In the light of the recent Soviet notes on unification and a peace treaty, I need hardly underline the capital importance of these declarations. If the intention of this article, which I have just read, is that a unified Germany will have the rights and be bound by the obligations conferred on the federal republic by this agreement and by the European defence community treaty, then this article is in effect the expression of a hope that a unified Germany would continue to throw in its lot with the west.

I am aware that sceptics will point out that in the event of unification and peace treaty discussions, there will be a new partner to any agreement, namely the Soviet union, which would not necessarily—that I know is an understatement—subscribe to the present accords. Moreover, an all-German government would not be the same as the government of the federal republic at the present time and might, therefore, insist that the contractual agreements would have to be re-negotiated. This important possibility, which is very much in our minds, is perhaps foreshadowed by article 10 which provides for the review of the terms of the convention on relations and the related conventions:

> (a) upon the request of any of (the signatory states), in the event of the unification of Germany or the creation of a European federation; or

(b) upon the occurrence of any other event which all of the signatory states recognize to be of a similarly fundamental character.

So much, Mr. Speaker, for the peace contract. The second important event, as I have already indicated, was the signing in Paris on May 27 of the treaty establishing a European defence community. By the provisions of this treaty the governments of France, Italy, Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg and the Federal Republic of Germany have agreed to set up a European army, purely defensive in character, which will be under the operational command of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization commander. Within the framework of the North Atlantic treaty, this new treaty seeks to ensure the security of the states which have signed it. I do not intend today to go into detail about the European defence community arrangements, because I know they will be familiar to most hon. members as they have already been made public.

The signing of these two sets of agreements is, I think, a tribute to the sense of political reality and the spirit of reasonable compromise shown by the statesmen and their expert advisers, who have brought the negotiations to a successful conclusion after many months of difficult and delicate discussions. It would, however, be rash to express any easy optimism on the final results, merely because these arrangements have been signed. Both the agreements I have mentioned will have to be ratified by the governments whose representatives signed them, and the road to ratification may not be a short or an easy one. There is as yet no European army except on paper, and there are stiff political struggles ahead both on the international plane and within the countries which are members of the European defence community, before these arrangements will be of any effect on the international plane. The activities of the Soviet union and its communist agents in other countries on the subject of Germany and the recent agreements bear witness by their scope and violence to the growing strength of western defence, and the impression this strength and unity has already made, as well as to the vital importance which the Soviet union attaches to the coming into effect of these arrangements.

There has been, as hon. members know, a lively exchange of diplomatic notes between the Soviet government and the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France. In their first note on March 10 of this year, the Russians put forward a draft peace treaty which was obviously designed to appeal to all shades of opinion in Germany, and to delay the conclusion of the contractual agreements and the European defence community treaty. That latter design, of course, was not achieved. These Russian proposals concerned reunification, the withdrawal of occupying forces, the rehabilitation of ex-nazis —many of whom are now joining the Eastern German army—the abolition of all trade restrictions on Germany, the granting to Germany of national—not international—defence forces, and the granting to Germany of permission to produce armaments on a large scale. In other words, in these Russian proposals there was something for nearly every German. On the other hand, under the same proposals, the reunified Germany was not to be free to enter into alliances, and its territory was not to include the former German territories east of the Oder-Neisse line. Finally, a four-power conference was to meet at once to settle all these questions.

In their replies to these Soviet proposals the three western governments have taken what I think to be the sensible line, that while the door must not be shut on negotiations with the Soviet union on this matter, there can be no question of a four-power conference—of which the allies already have had some unhappy experiences—until the Soviet proposals have been subjected to searching inquiry and until their real meaning can be ascertained. With this in mind the three governments have concentrated, in dealing with this problem, on the basic question of free elections throughout Germany, and the consequent formation of an all-German government, free both before and after the peace treaty to enter into associations compatible with the principles and purposes of the United Nations. The insistence of the three western powers, in dealing with these, and subsequent Russian proposals, has been on unity with freedom and peace with security. I believe that is a sound attitude to adopt.

Nevertheless, no matter how insincere the Soviet proposals may seem to us, they have a dangerous appeal to German nationalism since they appear on the surface to offer a definite program of unification which cannot fail to attract Germans to whom unification, I suppose, stands above almost everything else at the present time. For this reason, I venture to express the hope that too much time will not elapse between the receipt of Soviet notes on Germany and the dispatch of the western replies. The longer the interval, the greater the chances which the Soviet proposals, however specious they are, will have to work on public opinion in Germany and elsewhere. I think it would be unwise—I am sure the house will agree with this statement—and indeed unnecessary to allow the Soviet union to win propaganda victories in this field. I think the west should also be prepared to counter Soviet offers in a positive way and not spend too much effort on pointing out the hollowness and the insincerity of those offers.

To most Germans the desire for unification goes extremely deep, and it is a desire that is going to be achieved by one means or another. But I believe that more and more Germans will realize that a neutral Germany would be in grave danger of becoming an enlarged East Germany, and that their best hope for an eventual peaceful unification of their country lies in the integration of the federal republic and ultimately of all Germany with the western defence system. This grave step, however—and it is a grave step—may seem to many observers to involve risks and to involve also the protracted division of Germany. There is no doubt that in lining up behind this policy we are taking a calculated risk, to use that somewhat shopworn but still serviceable phrase.

What are the alternatives to it? Should we suspend any consideration of Germany's association with the west? Should we suspend such things as the European defence treaty and this peace contract until a scheme for unification and a peace treaty has been worked out with the Russians and their friends, on the basis they have put forward, which includes a national German army, the pardoning of all nazis, and German neutrality, with all foreign troops withdrawn—the Russian troops presumably to Poland and at least some of the western troops presumably across the Atlantic. Should we support that proposal as an alternative to the proposals which we have before us today? That alternative has commanded some support in circles which are certainly not allied with communism. Quite apart from the danger of a neutral Germany, with complete control of its own forces and rearming in its own way without restriction, and quite apart from the danger of that kind of Germany working with the east, if we followed that course it would also wreck the patient and intelligent work of the North Atlantic countries and the Adenauer government, and it would lay Germany open to uncertainty, confusion and, I suggest, danger.

The policy now proposed frees Germany but includes her in the European system. Her rearmament will be defensive and international; and I hope that both this defensive and this international character of German rearmament will be stressed. I hope also that our policy of rearmament within the European defence community will not be taken to mean that we are going to be inflexible in our approach to the larger and ultimate problem of a unified Germany with a peace treaty to which the U.S.S.R. must subscribe, because inflexibility and negotiation in matters of this kind are incompatible. The western aim has been—and should, I suggest, continue to be—a slackening of world tension followed by a reasoned, calm and firm endeavour to end the cold war. Our hope remains, as it must, that eventually we may enter upon an era of peace for which men everywhere so ardently long; and they include millions of men in the Soviet union itself.

The agreements signed at Bonn and Paris and the western replies to the Soviet notes have shown the Soviet union that the period of fear is over and that the west now stands firm against the encroachments of the police state.

There will be difficulties ahead, especially during the period when ratification is being discussed. But it should not be beyond the capacity of western statesmen to overcome those difficulties. I believe that there is now a real prospect of European integration not merely on a continental basis but within the developing North Atlantic community—a community which is not designed to be exclusive in character or to replace the United Nations but rather to ensure that the magnificent vision of the United Nations is not destroyed from within.

I am not blind—nor do I think any of us are—to the danger of a restored and a rearmed Germany, but I believe that within the European defence community this restoration and this rearmament can be brought to serve not the ends of totalitarian aggression—which it has served in the past—but the ends of peace in Europe and in the world. It is in that hope, Mr. Speaker, that I submit for the approval of this house the North Atlantic treaty protocol which is before us.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, with what the minister said a few moments ago with respect to the vital importance of the debate in which we are now engaged I am in entire agreement. There have been few issues with which this parliament has had to deal which have required as much study and have given as much anxiety and concern as has this problem of our ratification of the present NATO protocol. It is proper that Canadians should give every possible consideration and study to this matter. In a sense we are at a turning point in history because these agreements, which are of such a complicated and multiple character, have an important bearing upon what happens not only in Europe but in other parts of the world in the days that lie ahead.

I must say that as I am speaking now I have a feeling of heavier responsibility with respect to the position taken in connection with this protocol than I have had on almost any other occasion on which I have spoken in this House of Commons. This matter cannot be approached from the point of view that we are dealing with an unimportant subject matter. This parliament is the first to make its voice heard not only within the four corners of this chamber but across Canada and the world with respect to this new approach in connection with European peace and stability. Because we are the first to deal with this matter, it becomes of the utmost importance to approach it with the calmest kind of judgment and the best common sense that we can summon to our command. In our approach to the NATO protocol we must remember that within the confines of Germany herself Canadian troops are stationed at the present time. For that reason the situation is of vital interest to the people of Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have always been one of those who have leaned very heavily toward the idea of Canada speaking with a united voice as far as possible where great international issues are concerned. On this occasion I hope that we shall be able to follow that kind of policy and to show the world that we are united on this very important matter.

Without any further delay I want to indicate in the first instance that the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative party, supports the government stand on the NATO protocol and will give it full support in the house. Having said that, I want to make what I hope will be some pointed observations respecting the situation which surrounds the ratification procedure and the substance of the proposals themselves.

Perhaps hon. members have received with the compliments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) a rather thick booklet of 328 pages—at least I have received one—issued as a message from the President of the United States. In this booklet is contained in compact form information that is available to any country, and for that reason Canada has taken proper advantage of the message itself. Within those 328 pages will be found the convention on the relations between the three powers and the Federal Republic of Germany, signed at Bonn, May 26, 1952, together with related documents which are of a highly technical nature.

I mention this to raise a matter that I have raised before in this house. We have in parliament a standing committee on external affairs. I am not attempting to be unduly critical of the fact that in this instance this protocol and the related agreements, complicated as they are, are not to be sent to the external affairs committee for detailed consideration. I know it is getting toward the end of a very busy session; I know that perhaps the atmosphere and the mood of the house generally may not be conducive to the kind of study that might normally be made of very complicated documents such as these. But I do think that our system of dealing with peace treaties and protocols of this kind is open to very serious criticism. If our external affairs committee is to function in its full sense then these are the subjects with which that committee should be dealing.

When the Japanese peace treaty was approved by parliament I brought the question before the house; I bring the question up again. I do it, not so much to seek this remedy at this time as to call upon the government to adopt a new, a more up to date and modernized approach to the procedure that parliament is to use when approving and ratifying international agreements and treaties in the future. Under a change of the rules, or under whatever may be necessary to effect it, it should be possible to see that when we have a resolution such as this, where there is no opportunity in committee of the whole to question the minister or to find out the facts, and where it is almost a question of "yes" or "no" and pro forma speeches made by those on this side of the house and by the minister, it is sent to the committee on external affairs. To deal with it otherwise is not good enough when it comes to educating and informing the Canadian people of just what these vast commitments mean to them in their everyday lives.

It seems to me that we cannot afford at any time to take any steps other than those which will give the fullest information to the people of Canada on these agreements. It is not enough to say that the Canadian people should read Hansard and that this knowledge should be in their possession. Perhaps that is true, but we in parliament ought to be able to dissect, to analyse and to place that analysis before the Canadian people so that from the questions and answers that come out in committee they may be able to assess for themselves just exactly where this country stands with respect to the various commitments under these agreements.

These agreements commit Canada very heavily. We are not objecting to them, nor do the Canadian people object to them, but I can say now that having in mind the far future, perhaps even the immediate future, when it becomes a question of Canadian public opinion being behind many of these things, we ought to take time by the forelock and make sure that as far as this parliament is concerned there is no jot or tittle of evidence with respect to these agreements that is not made abundantly clear to the Canadian people as a whole. I think that ought to commend itself as a policy to every member of the House of Commons.

In making that suggestion I believe we ought to remember the mistakes that we have made in the past, and we ought to benefit by those mistakes and go forward in the new era with a new procedure in these international matters. It has always occurred to me that in the house we give great attention to and focus great concern on many domestic matters, but on questions of international gatherings we do not show the same concern. Make no mistake about it, there are over 100 conferences to which Canadians go. There are many matters discussed in these conferences and decisions arrived at by the representatives of this country which hardly ever see the light of day except to those in the parliament of Canada who may be interested in these technical international topics.

I think the time has come when in view of the major part that Canada is taking in international affairs parliament and the people of Canada must be given a freer and fuller and more abundant opportunity of seeing exactly what we are doing in every phase of world activity today. That I think is something that we ought to consider at this time as being important.

I wish now, if I may, to deal with the protocol and its relevant circumstances. I was interested in the minister's approach to the problem and the issues which this protocol arouses. In the main I think I can say that we agree with most of the comments and observations which he made. In taking our position, or in assessing the position that Canada should take on the NATO protocol, I think we have to consider that there are some lessons that we may learn from similar events that have occurred in other parts of the globe.

I am satisfied that any evidence of hesitancy, any suggestion of delay, anything that looks as though this country or the free powers were taking a little more time in some of these deliberations than normally might be the case, always impresses those who are looking for chinks in our armour and a sense of indifference on the part of the free front. I have no doubt in my mind that we would not have had a crossing of the 38th parallel in Korea had those behind the iron and bamboo curtains been told in no uncertain terms that if that crossing was made or if aggression of that kind occurred there would be a certain rallying of the free powers to see that it was stopped. But instead of that there was hesitancy, there was uncertainty, there was a somewhat chaotic approach to that particular section of the Orient. It was an invitation which was accepted by the Soviet and those who were under its direct or indirect control to take the step that they did.

I have always looked upon the Berlin blockade as being a test set up by the Soviet to find out whether we were united to the extent that we said we were. I have always felt that if we had not met that test as we did, if we had not called the bluff of the Soviet in Berlin, we would be faced with almost chaotic, if not dangerous, conditions in Europe far beyond the conditions which we now face, dangerous though they may be.

I think those are lessons that we in this parliament should consider because they will go a long way to educating us as to how we must deal with the people in the Kremlin who have control of Soviet policy. I have had a humble experience, but it has been broadening, in attending international conferences from time to time. I have formed the inevitable conclusion, which I think I must apply to the present protocol, that the Soviet is not really anxious for agreement, that it is not really anxious for the settlement of issues because any agreement and any settlement means that imperial communism cannot thrive or grow to best advantage. It thrives and has its most fertile ground in those conditions where people cannot reach agreement, where people are differing in their view, where there is uncertainty and chaos.

I have felt, and I think many of those who have attended international conferences have felt, that after all the Soviet is taking the position which perhaps it is expected it would, that if the people do not think that it pays them to settle, then it is pretty hard to get them into an agreement of any kind. The most difficult person with whom to form an agreement is the man who thinks it would not pay him to make an agreement. I think this is at the root of much of the western difficulty with the Soviet in the effort to settle international disputes generally.

If we are going to continue the discussions which started some years ago, when an attempt was made, and a very earnest attempt, by the western powers to arrive at a peace treaty for a unified Germany, I would remind the house that while the Soviet talks long and loud about the desirability of having another big four conference, those of us—I fancy this would include most members of the house—who have read the history of those days just after the last war will realize that many insurmountable difficulties were encountered by the free powers at the time in trying to arrive at an agreement for unifying, and making peace with, Germany as a whole. We realize that they did not want a peace treaty. What they want now is another opportunity to come before the world with the deceptive idea that they are trying to find a settlement of world issues. They want a new and important forum from which they can pour forth their propaganda in an effort to divide and distract the opinions of the peoples in democracies generally.

I have no doubt that with those experiences before them the United States, Britain and France have hesitated, as they should hesitate, to give the Soviet another opportunity of spreading across the world that kind of talk and that kind of deception under the guise of wanting another German peace treaty. I think in this country we ought to be careful in taking any stand that would indicate that we have any hesitancy. That is one reason why we have been supporting so fully the government's position with respect to this NATO protocol.

I know it may be said that in a sense this country is putting the cart before the horse by dealing with this matter before the agreement between the occupying powers and Germany may have been concluded and before the European defence community agreement may have been ratified. That may be; but I believe that in view of the fact that parliament is about to prorogue shortly we ought not to be in the position of adding fuel to a fire that seems to have been kindled in certain parts of Europe and elsewhere by even those who perhaps mean well but whose position I think is wrongly taken at this time.

For that reason I think it would be a black eye to Canada to delay in any way our ratification, particularly in view of the fact that parliament may not meet for many months to come. I am quite sure that we would not want to come back to a special session to deal with this matter alone. I think perhaps in dealing with the question of the ratification of this NATO proposal we have to bear in mind one particular thing; that is the importance I think of our first of all having unity among the free powers and, secondly, indicating to that part of the world which is behind the iron curtain that we have that unity and that we have the strength necessary to carry out our defence of the peace at this time.

First of all it is important that we have unity. Second, it is important that our unity be supported by strength. Viscount Alexander of Tunis, whom I regard as one of the great military men and statesmen of the free world today, a man who has the faculty of being able to put his points of view in simple, clear and understandable terms, has come about as close as possible to the position which I think the parliament of Canada should take with respect to the NATO protocol. In yesterday's newspapers a report appeared of what defence minister Earl Alexander of Britain had to say at Seoul in Korea. He dealt first with the question of whether or not he believed a third world war was in the offing. The report reads as follows:

> Of the possibility of another major war Alexander said at a press conference: "No, no . . . We are no nearer to it than a little while ago. There is only one way to prevent it. That's for the United Nations to get together and resist aggression and let the other side know that's what they're doing."

From these few words I think this country might very well take its policy with respect to this and other matters having to do with the very important question of the peace of the world today. With regard to the situation in East and West Germany, it is very interesting indeed to hear the Soviets, with their honeyed words, attempting to attract the German people at this time, but in the Potsdam declaration, which was one of the basic documents in respect of proposals for peace and the unification of Germany, one finds certain words which I think go to the root of some of the difficulties with which NATO and the occupying forces in Europe are faced at this critical time. Among other things the Potsdam declaration contained the following:

> So far as is practicable there shall be uniformity of treatment of the German population throughout Germany.

In other words, pending a peace treaty to unify the country there was to be similarity and uniformity of treatment of all Germans. But that did not happen and because it did not happen the Soviets must bear a very heavy responsibility so far as the present situation is concerned. While the occupation troops of the three occupying powers were attempting to carry out the policy of the Potsdam declaration in West Germany the Soviets were at the same time re-arming East Germany. It is all very well to say that they were not arming in divisions or in ordinary troop formations but they were arming in a more subtle and deceptive way. They were arming under the guise of creating security police or constabulary in that part of the world.

In addition, not only were they doing that but they were also attempting to cement into East Germany the most insidious network of communism in all its political, social and economic forms. Was that treating Germany uniformly in accordance with the Potsdam declaration? Of course not. The result is that the present situation has been aggravated by virtue of such action. I might also say with respect to East Germany, which is the Soviet area of occupation, that all through this period of jelling, if you like to call it that, when East and West Germany were becoming almost separate entities for the reasons I have just mentioned, it has been more difficult to bring about unification of the two countries. It seems to me that is a rather unfortunate situation but it perhaps was inevitable because of the line drawn between two worlds, so to speak, cutting through Germany itself. In that connection I was interested to see what the Soviets have now offered the German people. As the minister said a few minutes ago, a Soviet union note of March 10 called for a four-power conference to draft a German treaty. That in itself would seem enough to put us suspiciously on guard against falling into any new scheme for calling a four-power conference. The Soviets do not call for four-power conferences either for the purpose of helping us or to settle outstanding issues. They have another reason for suggesting four-power conferences, and I think that in itself should cause us to stop, look and listen.

They have called for an all-German government expressing the will of the German people, and they attach a draft treaty to their note. The minister mentioned the treaty a few moments ago and I shall not attempt to elaborate upon it at the moment because he has done so quite fully. However, it does appear on the face of it as though it is the last straw thrown out by the Soviets not only for the purpose of getting the Germans into their camp but to see if they cannot disturb the minds of people in Germany and elsewhere. Under their draft treaty Germany is to be a unified state. The occupying forces are to be withdrawn inside of one year from the date of signature of the treaty, but while they suggest that the occupation forces should be withdrawn nowhere is there any provision for the withdrawal of Soviet Russia's fifth column forces from any corner of East or West Germany.

It is all very well to talk about withdrawing occupation troops but, as the minister said, while our troops might withdraw across the Atlantic in some instances and the Soviet troops might withdraw into Poland, the troops of ideological communism will commence their offensive the minute the other troops have left. After all the dealings we have had with communist Russia in the past, if we are innocent enough to believe that Russia is going to leave Germany alone under the guise of a unified independent Germany, then I say that we are far more gullible as a people, as a parliament and as a government than I thought we ever could be. That is the important factor that we cannot disregard at this time. One of the things that struck me about the eleven clauses of the Russian draft treaty is that they call of course for the rehabilitation of nazism in Germany. That is what it means because it not only gives the right to those nazi generals, colonels and others who took part in the nazi movement an opportunity now to militarily rehabilitate themselves; but after all the things that the Soviets have said up and down the highways and byways of the world about nazism and the resurgence of nazism, then in this kind of declaration and this kind of draft treaty they reverse themselves and seek the very thing which they have condemned all through these years. That indicates the hollowness of the ring that this kind of treaty really has.

May I say this when we are speaking about nazi resurgence? Do not forget that after the downfall of the Kaiser in 1918 there were something like 40,000 officers of the then German army still in Germany. As opposed to 40,000 there are now, I am reliably informed, 400,000 officers who formerly served with Hitler. Those are the things that should of course put us on guard.

It seems to me that the American approach, the American answer to the Russian note on the draft treaty was a fair one. They went back again to the position taken by the United Nations where the United Nations indicated that a commission under the United Nations should be set up to ascertain whether it is possible to have free elections in both East and West Germany. That seems to me to answer the question whether the matter should be proceeded with so far as an all-out unification of Germany is concerned. Up to the present time the stumbling block has been the Soviets. They have refused to allow an independent commission to make a survey in East Germany. Why? Because they know what will be found. They know ahead of time what is there. They know that there is a network of sovietism and communism saddled now upon East Germany. They are not taking any chance on somebody coming in and seeing what is being done there. They are going to see to it that they stick out for a unified Germany on another basis, and I am suspicious that the other basis means a unified Germany under a united Soviet empire.

That is the thing which disturbs me but still at the moment the words and phraseology have an appeal. Words, Mr. Speaker, are one thing, but the background of the people who have uttered them is another. We know the background and for that reason I think our suspicions at this time are well founded.

Now I want to say that of course there is no use attempting to gainsay the fact that there are risks and dangers in connection with the course that is being taken; but on balance—balancing the risks on one side and the dangers on the other with the fact that we are now pushing up very close to the fringe of danger, the border of the Soviet empire itself, with all the implications that may have—I for one believe that it is better for us to have the dividing line at the Elbe if we cannot get it farther east and include East Germany at this time. The hope is that East Germany will some day become part of a unified Germany and be friendly with us, but at this stage it is better to have the dividing line between that part of the iron curtain and ourselves at the Elbe rather than at the Rhine or somewhere farther west.

That is a risk that must be taken but I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether the risk is as great as perhaps some people believe it to be. The Soviets have run a gigantic bluff since the end of the last war. They have not been so courageous when it came right down to a critical point. They have always been pretty good at having somebody friendly with them do the dirty work—whether it was Korea, Indo-China, or some other country. The Soviets themselves have been pretty careful not to get their fingers burnt in something that might be close to a hot war. I am satisfied that the dangers have been somewhat overestimated. I am one of those who believe, and I think the minister agrees with me because he said this not so long ago, that a very intensive cold war will be waged. It may go on for three, four, five or six months but in the end it seems to me it will collapse and that we shall come out of this if we simply hold our heads and hew closely to the line that we have taken—and show these people behind the iron curtain that we mean business; that we do not mean war but that we mean that everybody in the world from now on is going to 'keep the peace or else'. I think we have got to take the position that after all peace is what we want and we are prepared to defend that peace to the last ditch.

I want to say this too. There is no reason why this country or any other country should be necessarily provocative. I think that if there is anything which would be a great sin for us now it would be if we were unduly provocative. People who are following a charted course towards peace have no need to provoke anybody. All we want to do in the free world is to mind our own business and to ask other people to mind theirs. In that spirit we hope there will grow up an era of better understanding between the east and the west.

In connection with a divided Germany from a German point of view their attitude is readily understood. They are Germans and they are proud of it. The nationalistic feeling in that country is of course one that we must take into consideration. Until East and West Germany come together again there will always be that pull or that desire to be together—and that is only natural. Nevertheless if we were to say to West Germany: Well, we are going to leave you now to work out your own solutions with East Germany as a unified nation, I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that would only mean throwing West Germany to the wolves. In view of the critical international position I do not think that this country or any other country would want to have anything of that kind done. If we do not do our best to bring West Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization I am satisfied that not only would it have a serious effect on the German people but there would be incalculable consequences for the other units of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Europe and elsewhere.

Do not let us mistake this. While great stress is laid upon the strength of other nations within the North Atlantic community, and there are very strong nations within that community, let us recall that West Germany with her population of nearly 50 million is now in the position of being almost the top nation in strength in that community. Her position with respect to industrialization, and her general economic position, of course are not always fully known. True, she has taken on a very heavy burden for defence under the North Atlantic protocol. We must remember that today West Germany's exports, according to the latest figures I have received, have increased no less than sixfold within the last three years. Her economy is now by way of being the healthiest in all Europe. Some economists have indicated that she is today on a par with or better than either Britain or France economically. In any event, she is in a preferred competitive position.

Three years of intense rebuilding have brought her a larger productive capacity industrially than she had before the war. I am told that she is 50 per cent above the pre-war level, and that has been achieved by an increase of 18 per cent in 1951 alone, which is to be followed by an estimated 15 per cent in the present year. All this indicates, I believe, that the position of West Germany is one which must be assessed in relation to her great strength and her vital importance, if I may say so, to the success of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the defence of Europe. I only wanted to mention the West German situation as a further buttressing of the support that we intend to give to this protocol itself.

I should like to make one or two references, if I may, to our own situation with respect to the revival of West Germany. A few minutes ago I mentioned that she had undertaken, under the NATO obligation, a heavy burden with respect to financing defence. Nevertheless, it does give Germany the opportunity, as one British newspaper said, of rebuilding her army at bargain prices. It is likely that United States money will go into that, and only maintenance charges will be made against the Federal Republic of West Germany. The resurgence of West Germany economically, of course, will have repercussions in many parts of the world. It is a risk which Canada takes herself. West Germany is now selling goods to the extent of $4 billion annually. After having seen the devastation of Germany following the last war, one wonders at the skill, imagination and initiative of that great people in being able to come back as they have. Not very long ago the London Economist indicated that West Germany would shortly be making a bid for the position of the third greatest trading nation in the world, following the United States and Great Britain. This means increased competition for us all. The competition which Germany will be able to provide under the North Atlantic treaty set-up, and on her own, is something that we ought to carefully consider.

These remarks and observations are not being made to weaken in any way the support that Canada may give to the admission of Germany to this protocol, but for the simple reason of seeing to it that we in Canada learn the full facts while the matter is under consideration, rather than learning about them at a later date. I think it is important that when the minister makes his reply he give the house some information as to what Canadians may expect concerning bilateral trade agreements, for instance, that may now be in effect between the Federal German Republic and East Germany. Whatever may be the outcome of our arrangements, and the arrangements with other nations, to bring West Germany into the fold of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we have to face one physical fact, and that is that you have a border between East and West Germany on both sides of which are German people; on both sides are people whose family connections and business connections are well known. Perhaps on one side you have a balance of industry as against a balance of agriculture and rural communities on the other. We must remember that is not the ordinary kind of border; that is not the kind of border between two nations who have been traditionally opposed to each other. I believe, therefore, that we ought to be told by the government just what trade relationships exist between East and West Germany, and whether or not those are going to be continued if this ratification takes place.

Do not forget there is a very big market for German production in Russia, in the east and in China. For that reason I believe it is important that we know where the production of West Germany is going in the days that lie ahead. I believe it is also important, too, so to arrange our set-up in bringing West Germany in that we show them that they are on our side, that we aid them economically and that they do not have to depend on trading to the east for their sustenance and for carrying the burdens of NATO. Moreover, I think the government ought to indicate what safeguards there are. This is not meant as a reflection upon the West German people; far from it. But if that frontier between East and West Germany is to be a fluid kind of frontier, then of course the question of strategic materials coming from the free world to positions behind the iron curtain becomes a very important factor to this and other countries. I have no doubt that problem will be solved, and that it will not cause any grave complications in our relationships with West Germany or West Germany's relationships with NATO in general.

I think it is important, while we are dealing with these matters, that we have a clear conception of the practical implications of all these commitments that Canada undertakes. With the consent of parliament and with the consent of the Canadian people—let us not make any mistake about that—we are building up for Canada a huge area of commitments abroad. Frankly I may say that I do not know what else we can do if we are to try to see that peace is maintained and preserved in our time. It is a risk and it is a great burden financially; but it is a burden and a risk that were not imposed upon us by ourselves; we had no choice in the matter. We must bear that fact in mind. We have moved from one commitment internationally to another until we now have a network of obligations that is of a vast character; it is by far the most extensive and intensive network of obligations and commitments internationally that Canada has ever had, and much more than she ever dreamed of fifteen years ago; but then we did not dream that we would have the kind of world to live in that we have today. Because of that fact these commitments of course have become necessary.

The last point I want to make in connection with these commitments and obligations is this. This government and we in this parliament will make a grievous error—the results of which will be reflected upon them and upon us and upon the Canadian people in general—if, while this vast network is being instituted and established, they and we do not tell the people of Canada exactly what we are doing, why we are doing it and what would be the alternative if we refused to do it. Those are the things that are bothering the public today. Those are the things about which the public may perhaps be less informed than we in parliament could make them. Therein, in my opinion, lie the germs of certain dangers in this country which may become greater as the period of intense activity is prolonged. We may as well face, frankly and openly, the fact that our resources of perseverance, resolution and determination are going to be called upon to an extent beyond anything the people of this country have ever experienced before, in order to carry on during this critical time of what we call the cold war.

I have said before, and I say it again, that it is difficult for democratic governments and parliaments when they are trying to superimpose, upon a normal basis of the peacetime economy, a vast defence preparedness program costing not millions but billions of dollars annually, to do it without that support which during war is known as wartime mass psychology. That is something which, thank God, we have not in Canada today. Having in mind those two important features, I think our present situation calls for a greater measure of taking into the complete confidence of the government and of parliament Canadians in every walk of life and calls for telling them in plain, unvarnished, understandable language exactly what is being done, why we are doing it, the cost to each one of them in the process, and the alternatives that we would face were a different policy to be pursued by this country in its quest and search for peace.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced we have a heavy responsibility with respect to our international affairs. I think the situation has become more critical than ever of recent times. At this vital stage of the proceedings when we, and those powers associated with us, are trying with every bit of diplomatic skill which can be summoned to their aid to see whether the ship of peace cannot be kept sailing in untroubled waters, I hope that we in this parliament, regardless of where we sit, will take our responsibilities seriously to the point where we will back up those who are with us, without too much carping criticism of those in other lands who are trying to carry the heavy burden and responsibility of saving the peace. So far as it is possible, let us try to march together, arm in arm, in measured tread, not towards war but towards a great adventure, that of saving the peace of the world in our time.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that anyone who rises to discuss this protocol and the implications attached to it must be conscious of some responsibility. In introducing the resolution approving of the protocol this morning, the minister said that this was probably the most important matter which would come before the house at this session or at this time. I agree with him in that respect. I would say that I think it is the most gravely important matter that we have had before parliament this session or that we are likely to have before parliament for a considerable time.

I want to say at once that, in view of the world situation, defence agreements among the anti-totalitarian nations of the world are essential. I noted that the minister said—and in this I think he was expressing a word of caution—that the ratification of the protocol would not be followed immediately by its deposit with the United States government, as is required. In other words, to that extent Canada will follow a wait-and-see policy. Personally I think that procedure is wise. This protocol in effect extends our obligations under the North Atlantic treaty. It brings into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, as it were, under the European defence plan, contingents of troops and other forces which will be raised in Western Germany. As the minister pointed out, the protocol states:

> The present protocol shall remain in force for so long as the North Atlantic treaty and the treaty setting up the European defence community remain in force and the parties to the latter treaty continue to give, in respect of themselves and the European defence forces, guarantees to the parties to the North Atlantic treaty equivalent to the guarantees contained in the present protocol.

In other words, the defence forces which are mentioned as included in this protocol are, as the minister stated, in existence only on paper as yet. But it is an important consideration when we are discussing the protocol.

May I just remark in passing, Mr. Speaker, something that I have remarked before, namely that we are today considering what the minister says—and in this I agree with him—is probably the most important document that will come before this parliament this session. And yet when we look around the house we see a slim attendance. At the moment there are 33 members occupying seats. When the spokesman for the official opposition began his speech there were not many more, and there were not many more when the minister himself was on his feet introducing the resolution and discussing what he himself says is one of the most important documents to come before this parliament.

As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said, and as the minister himself said, this matter has arisen a short time after the appalling results of German armed might under nazi leadership had been understood and felt by the people of Europe and of the world. It was only seven years ago last month that the war ended in the surrender of Germany to the allied nations. I agree that seven years later the nazi militarists are still a danger both in Western Germany and in the eastern zone. In fact, one of the remarkable statements that have come out of the Soviet union was the statement that they were prepared to see a united Germany with a German army officered, indeed fashioned, by officers who officered the nazi army under Hitler. That I think is a very revealing statement that we of the western nations cannot overlook.

Any proposal for the rearmament of Germany does involve grave risks to the rest of the world, and we would be completely opposed to any suggested rearmament of Germany which might be considered to be in the nature of a separate or independent rearmament of Germany. The only manner in which German troops can possibly be integrated into the European defence community, as we see it, is as a part of the forces of the community and under the control of the western democratic countries through their general staff and through their high officers. I say that is the only manner in which we should as a country consent to any proposal for the rearmament of Germany. But having said that, we have to consider the proposed ratification of this protocol in Canada in the light of the political atmosphere in western Europe, and when that is viewed in its proper perspective one realizes that the proposal to ratify at the moment, before the situation in western Europe has been clarified, may be, in the words of the minister on another occasion, both premature and unwise.

Our people want peace. Indeed the people of all the nations want peace, and consequently we should ask ourselves whether the ratification of this protocol and the subsequent acceptance of the proposed peace treaty with Germany does really make for peace in the world. Recently we have seen powerful political parties in western Europe —and indeed within the last week the government of France, one of the countries occupying a very vital position in connection with European defence—urging that before ratification of this protocol and the acceptance of the peace treaty, a further attempt at a settlement of the German problem should be made in the hope that understanding may lead to removal of this fear of war which overhangs the people of Europe at the present time.

One of the questions we have to ask ourselves is, does the ratification of this protocol at the present time improve the possibilities of reaching such an understanding, or does it actually make understanding more difficult? Before we approve of this protocol in this house we must satisfy ourselves as to the answer to that question. The minister said that the road to ratification of the peace treaty will be difficult and it will be dangerous.

I think the Russians have won something of a propaganda victory in the last four or five months. Their proposals are obviously unacceptable to us in the democratic countries, but when these proposals were made did the western allies make counter-proposals that were in any way likely to be equally acceptable to Western Germany, or was their reply somewhat inept? I am inclined to think that their reply was inept—and someone suggests that that is an understatement. We have the best cause in the world, and we have done the worst propaganda job in connection with it. We have always allowed the Russians to take the initiative, and indeed they are taking the initiative today in connection with germ warfare in another field when we might, when they made the charge, have taken the initiative and asked for a meeting by the security council of the United Nations where that question could have been examined. Now the Russians have proposed it, and again we lose the battle of propaganda, and I think we to some extent lost out in connection with proposals for the solution of the German problem.

What then is the situation in western Europe? Mr. Speaker, since it is one o'clock may I discuss that phase of what I am going to say when the house resumes after lunch.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking this morning I perhaps was a little unfair to members of the house when I said that there were only 33 in their seats. That was the number present, but I was not aware that several important committees were sitting. Something like 60 per cent of the members of the house are on those committees. Consequently I should like to put the matter right because I do not like to be unfair to my colleagues.

At the conclusion of my remarks this morning I said that I thought we had to consider the state of public opinion in the NATO countries generally and particularly those in western Europe, as well as some of those which may not be included in the NATO organization. First, we have to pay some attention to the state of public opinion in Germany because if we ratify and deposit this protocol and it is followed by the signing or ratification of a peace treaty we want to be sure that we have achieved something of a permanent nature.

I have been following the reports emanating from Bonn and other places with a good deal of interest and also with some misgiving. For example, I notice that last week the treaty system that will rearm a sovereign West Germany within the framework of the Atlantic alliance has been challenged in the courts as to the right of the government to enter into such an agreement. We have been told that there is in Germany a steady increase in public support to induce the chancellor, Mr. Adenauer, in the words of his minister for all-German affairs, and I quote:

> To demonstrate the government's willingness to take the responsibility for the reunification of Germany.

In other words, the feeling is growing in Germany, and I believe it is a majority opinion, that prior to anything else in the way of rearmament or otherwise being done, the reunification of Germany should be considered an essential factor. As a matter of fact the German chancellor is faced with something of a rebellion in his own party, as is indicated to some extent by the quotation I have just made.

The social democratic party, which is the strongest opposition in that country, is certainly opposed to these steps being taken until the unification of Germany has been discussed and indeed until free elections have been achieved.

Not only is there misgiving and grave opposition to what is being done in Germany; we find a somewhat similar situation in France. The French government is not a socialist government; it is a coalition government. We read in a dispatch from Paris in the New York Times of Thursday, June 12, that the French cabinet instructed its foreign minister, Mr. Schuman, to urge an early conference between the Soviet union and the big three western powers. That was to be confined to two questions: first, the conditions of a free election in Germany, and the circumstances under which the unification of Germany would be effective. Although it has not been confirmed, it was assumed that the note from the British foreign secretary, Mr. Anthony Eden, favoured a four-power conference in reply to the latest Soviet note. According to this news dispatch from Paris, Mr. Schuman was urged to support that view if Mr. Eden expressed it. As I say, the reference to Mr. Eden was not confirmed from London.

The same dispatch in the New York Times says that there is a strong feeling among officials in France that no government should risk appearing reluctant to negotiate with the Soviet union in view of the fear in Europe of greater tension as a result of the signature of the treaties linking West Germany with the western coalition. It goes on to say that even Mr. Schuman pointed out recently that there would be time to negotiate before the treaties were ratified and that there is a disposition in France to put off ratification to perhaps the end of the year and to press for negotiations with the Soviet union again this summer. It adds that ratification by the French parliament might well be vitally affected by the belief or lack of belief that the western powers had made a genuine effort to discuss the German problem with Moscow.

I think all this underlines something that the minister of external affairs said this morning. He said that if this house ratifies the protocol, at the conclusion of this debate the instrument will not be deposited with the United States but will be held until there has been a clarification of the general position in western Europe. I think that that is a wise provision. In fact, had the minister not said that this morning I would have been inclined —in fact I would have done it—to move an amendment to delete the last part of the resolution before us and to substitute words to that effect. In view of the statement made by the minister of external affairs I believe that the moving of such an amendment is unnecessary because the instrument will not be deposited until there has been a further clarification of the position overseas. So much for the French situation at the present time. The dispatch to which I have referred, and a similar one by Drew Middleton from Bonn appeared in the Sunday New York Times of June 15, indicate the same kind of French and German opinion.

Then we have had recent statements made in Great Britain. At the moment I am looking at a most comprehensive statement issued by the British Labour party, which after all in the recent elections last October polled the largest popular vote and may within a measurable period of time once more become the government of the United Kingdom. The British Labour party issued a statement on April 30 which does not reject, as we do not reject, the possibility of conditional German rearmament, but in confirming its agreement on this point it lays down certain conditions which I should like to place on the record. They are four in number and may be summarized as follows:

(a) No effective German rearmament so long as the Atlantic forces in Europe are not well organized and equipped.

(b) Western nations other than Germany—in particular France—to be given priority for deliveries of American arms.

(c) The integration of German troops in an international army.

(d) No German rearmament so long as the Germans themselves do not wish to rearm.

I think the latter is a very important proviso because if we are going to have successful integration and support of German troops under an international army of defence then the German people must support what is being done or it will fail. More than a year ago Mr. Clement Attlee, who it will be remembered was at that time prime minister of Great Britain, had already referred to the first three of these conditions, and I understand that the fourth was recently attached after a long discussion at the national executive meeting of the Labour party of Britain. I have a longer statement which I do not intend to read now because I may not have time but which underlines and elucidates the position taken, the four points that they made, and particularly their support for the demand of France for greater aid from the United States. The official statement of the social democratic party in Germany is also something of which I think we should take some cognizance. The party's policy was stated on the 27th of April by its vice-chairman, Erich Ollenhauer, and was reported as follows:

(a) Ollenhauer pleaded for priority to be given to the Soviet proposals for German reunion and a German peace treaty, and for all other questions to be postponed until a coherent effort had been made to reach four-power agreement on Germany.

(b) The first object of German foreign policy, he said, should be to test the sincerity of these Russian proposals.

As a matter of fact I think there is an obligation on all of us to test the sincerity of these proposals. In our hearts we may believe them to be insincere but we are engaged in a cold war, a war of words, a war of ideas, and we have to make it abundantly clear that we have tested the sincerity of all proposals emanating from the other side before we reject them if we are to obtain support for our cause throughout the world. It goes on:

This could be done by proving whether or not there were genuine possibilities of free all-German elections. Should such possibilities not exist, every German must be satisfied that every possible effort had been made by the western powers and the Federal German Republic.

(c) The signing of the contractual agreements, and the integration of West Germany in the defence system would at least make German reunion more difficult and might prevent it altogether. German participation in a European army could scarcely be interpreted as a friendly gesture by the Soviet union. The whole present conception of European integration was, moreover, basically false.

(d) Instead, the western powers should give the Soviet union a "timetable" for negotiations on German unity. This would prevent deliberate attempts to protract four-power talks and so sabotage western plans. Such questions as the Oder-Neisse line should not be brought up for a moment; they would only prejudice chances of arranging all-German elections. No alternative western policy should be applied to Germany until it was clear that such elections could not be held.

Apparently that is the official position of the official opposition party in Germany which, with the increased support it has received in the country over the last number of months, may within the next thirteen or fourteen months when the federal elections are due become the government of Germany in any event, and if elections are held sooner might become the government much earlier.

I think we should also pay some attention to the Scandinavian countries which are not a part of NATO, though in association with it. The international secretary of the Swedish social democratic party, Kaj Bjorh, in an article which he has written, has this to say:

(a) The question of German rearmament should be postponed if possible until the question of German unity is solved. Otherwise an extremely dangerous explosive situation will develop in the centre of Europe. This recommendation is in line with the German social democrats' present policy even though that policy has partly a different motivation.

I would comment here that the Swedish foreign minister, Osten Unden, made a proposal in the United Nations that the four big powers should take up negotiations on the question of free elections throughout Germany and report back to the United Nations within one month. This proposal was made last winter during the interval between the Rome and Lisbon meetings of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. One could continue to quote not only the social democrats but the other party which is associated with Adenauer. They are the free democrats who are in a coalition with the Christian democratic union party in Germany. Dr. Karl Pfleiderer of the free democrats has expressed his doubt as to the wisdom of implementing the treaties in a hurry. He actually assailed

Dr. Adenauer for having told the bundestag that the treaties must be ratified soon to suit the convenience of the United States. Here is a direct quote from Dr. Pfleiderer:

> I do not know whether the West German government realizes that public opinion disagrees with it. We are indignant about this attempt to link one of the weightiest decisions on our future with the election campaign in a foreign state.

He was referring to the election in the United States. Many Europeans believe that the haste and pressure coming from the United States is to some extent due to the political situation in that country. I might add that I have seen several articles lately in which it has been indicated that the democratic parties of western Europe are quite alarmed at the choice of General MacArthur as keynoter at the Republican national convention. They fear the election of Mr. Taft on that account, perhaps unfairly, but nevertheless there have been some outspoken comments regarding that particular matter. Dr. Pfleiderer goes on to say that the Germans wanted every aspect of reunification explored thoroughly before the treaties were ratified. He added that "the Germans want reunification and peace, not war".

One could go on with a number of similar statements. I think our own position has been pretty well stated in the official statement which the C.C.F. national executive released to the press on May 25. I should like to put it on the record. It reads as follows:

> The C.C.F. regrets that the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Western Germany are persisting in their determination to sign the German peace pact at this time. The signing of this pact may well mean an end to all hopes for the unification of Germany and, therefore, enables the communists to exploit German nationalism for their own ends. Furthermore, the evidence is clear that large sections of the German people, probably the majority, are opposed to it and it is doubtful whether the pact will be ratified even by the present Bonn parliament.
> The national executive of the C.C.F. fully supports the position taken by the national executive of the British Labour party and other socialist parties in Europe. We urge the governments concerned to reconsider even at this late date. An attempt must be made first at four-power negotiations for the unification of Germany and for free elections. To refuse even to attempt such negotiations is to bear the responsibility for the permanent division of Germany. Sooner or later this will almost certainly alienate the support of the people even in Western Germany and may well make the whole scheme of west European integration a hollow shell. In any event, such a final act as a peace pact should not be pushed through against the will of the people of Western Germany. It should, therefore, wait until new elections have been held there, in which the German people may declare themselves on an issue which means so much to their future and to the future of peace.

I think the note I would like to emphasize in that statement is the note that is struck in statements from all the western European democratic parties—that we must beware lest the haste that has been shown plays directly into the hands of the communists in western Europe. If we try to force on western Europe policies that will not be supported by the vast majority of the people of western European countries, we are playing directly into the hands of Russia and the communist parties of both eastern and western Europe.

I repeat again that such rearmament or, shall I say, such co-operation in the defence of western Europe as may be desirable and must be achieved should be on the basis of the integration of such German forces as are necessary under the allied general staff divorced from a German general staff, and as far as possible under the leadership of the western democratic nations. Unless that is done we shall be building up in Western Germany an armed force—and this I am certain is what France really feels—which one day may co-operate with the force that is being raised and has been raised in Eastern Germany; and once again France, Europe and the world generally will be faced with the accomplished fact of a strong German army threatening the peace of Europe and of the world.

We are on the horns of a dilemma, it is true, because we are threatened with aggression across the world from behind the iron curtain. I know they profess they are defending peace and are desirous of maintaining the peace of the world, but I wish I could see more evidence of their desire to co-operate with the peace-loving peoples of the world to bring about in the world conditions which will lay the foundations of permanent peace.

This morning, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) in discussing German rearmament pointed out something which I know is in the minds of many people, and that is the tremendous improvement in the industrial and economic situation in that country. Indeed that is largely due to the fact that they have not had to dissipate their efforts in raising armies, building air forces and navies, and to provide armaments for the forces they raise. As long as that condition continues they are of course at an advantage and we are at a disadvantage. To some extent I think that the idea of allowing Germany to engage in the production of arms—indeed not only allowing her but pressing her to do so—may be motivated in some quarters from the point of view that it will relieve other industrial nations to some extent in that field and at the same time cause Germany to engage in the production of armaments to the disadvantage of the industrial production which has proceeded apace in that country over the last few years.

I welcome the statement made by the minister this morning that the instrument of ratification will not be deposited until there has been some clarification in the European countries, and particularly in the countries associated with us in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I think it is vital that that should be the case. Indeed, I suppose the Secretary of State for External Affairs presses for the ratification of this protocol today, towards the end of the present session, because possibly parliament will not meet again until sometime after Christmas or if we meet before then it will be very late in the fall of the year. We do not anticipate that meeting but it would be some months away and consequently I suppose he desires the expression of ratification by this parliament in order that when other nations, and a sufficient number of them, are ready to deposit their instruments of ratification Canada will be in a position to deposit with them.

I do not think we should be the first to deposit. I do not think that we should be the first to deposit largely because we are a North American nation. I think in this respect we should let our European friends come to decisions and give a lead in the deposit of the instruments of ratification. As I understand it, what we are doing is ratifying a protocol, an instrument, which may or may not be deposited at Washington, and it will only be deposited when we feel that the conditions among the nations associated with us in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization permit us to do so without any reservation and indeed without taking the first step.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have said all I wanted to say on the matter. We hope this will promote confidence and peaceful negotiation in Europe. We approach the problem with some misgiving in that regard because we realize as other democratic people realize, particularly those in western Europe, that the proposals may deepen the gulf that separates the west from the east and may make it still more difficult to arrive at an international understanding and the foundations of world peace. I think no one questions the necessity, as long as the situation in Europe and indeed across the world remains as it is, of organizing our forces to resist totalitarianism—totalitarianism in any form—in order that we may preserve the freedoms that we value and protect the freely elected parliamentary institutions under which we live.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take too much time this afternoon in the discussion of the protocol that is before us but I do feel that it is essential that I say something on behalf of the group which I lead in this house.

I have followed with great interest the statement that was made this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the speeches that have been made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). While I find myself in agreement with much that has been said I feel also that there are warnings that have to be uttered, and it is my intention to utter one or two of those warnings in the course of the few minutes that I shall speak this afternoon.

In making his statement this morning the minister stressed the importance of the protocol. I believe he said that it was, if not the most important, one of the most important matters to come before parliament at this session. He also stressed the gravity of the world situation. I can quite understand the anxiety any minister would feel about finding, if possible, a balance of power arrangement or treaty under which peace could best be assured, or at least under which we would have the very best chance to beat back any aggressor who might wish to take the chance of attacking us; that is understandable. When one does take a thorough look at the whole world situation, it is a situation that fills one with disquietude and anxiety, so every effort will have to be made to see to it that the western nations are made strong so that they can have some feeling of security. I am the last person in the world who would want to say or do anything that would jeopardize our chance of making the nations of the world strong or of jeopardizing the chances for peace, so I hope I will be able to be moderate in all that I say today, realizing as I do my responsibility as a member of this house.

In his opening statement the minister said that the protocol under discussion does indeed extend Canada's obligations under the North Atlantic treaty. If we ratify this protocol, then our guarantees given under the North Atlantic treaty are extended not only to the armies, the air force, the navy of Western Germany, but also to the territory of the Republic of Germany. In my judgment this makes the protocol one of extreme importance. I believe that today Germany occupies the most dangerous, and at the same time the most potentially explosive position in the world. For months past I think the world has realized that. While the focus of world attention has been on Korea and the Far East, world students have consistently told us to keep an eye on western Europe, particularly Germany. That being so, Mr. Speaker, any decision which involves Canada in obligations or guarantees towards Germany is a decision which ought not to be made hastily, and certainly not without the fullest possible measure of inquiry into every detail of our undertaking as well as into all the implications of that undertaking.

I feel sure the minister must know that neither the timing of his resolution nor the form in which it is presented before us now permits of the thorough investigation and discussion by members of parliament which such a gravely important document requires. One is led to ask, of course, why the protocol was not referred to the external affairs committee. I realize that it has not been in existence very long, but I believe it has been in existence long enough to allow it to have been presented to that committee for thorough discussion and investigation. I believe that one could be excused for asking why, at the present time, there is no opportunity to consider the protocol in the committee of the whole, where by a process of question and answer the members of the house could ascertain just what we are doing and at the same time let the people of Canada know exactly the type of contract to which we are binding them.

The form of the resolution which places the protocol before the house today does not permit of that kind of discussion. I think it is a pity. I am asking in all seriousness why it was not introduced in a different form. Surely, that could have been done. We would at least have had the satisfaction, when we had completed the discussion, of feeling that we had found out all that there was to be found out in the course of our questions and answers. Only then would we be in possession of sufficient knowledge to enable us to make a choice as to whether or not we would commit Canada to the protocol.

The minister says that he believes, dangerous as the situation may be after we have committed ourselves to the protocol, that under the circumstances it is the best preventive of war. The minister, of course, is in possession of a lot more information than are the members of the house. He has the advantage of advisers who doubtless are ready to advise him on that particular score, but we in the house are not in the possession of these things. It seems to me that before we do commit ourselves to such a proposition as the protocol we ought to know a great deal more about it.

Much has been said today, Mr. Speaker, about the rearmament of Germany. I want to say a word on that topic. To my mind the rearmament of Germany is fraught with the gravest possible consequences to the whole world. Under the present circumstances it may be necessary to rearm the German people if we are to prevent war with the Soviet bloc. On the surface, it does appear to be so, but what will be the long-range result of rearming the German people? That is a question to which I think we ought to give the most careful consideration.

I have always felt that the defeat of German arms in world war II did not put an end to that country's ambitions, and consequently Germany will try it again. Of that I am sincerely convinced, and particularly if the western powers continue to insist upon terms in peace treaties which impose upon Germany such things as trade restrictions and the gold standards which are involved in the most-favoured-nation trade clauses and in Bretton Woods. I think everyone who has read anything at all during the past few months must have come to the conclusion that Germany has made a most remarkable recovery since the end of the war. I know that when I travelled in Germany in 1948, even that soon after the close of the war, there was evidence everywhere of recovery. Labour was at peace. There where no strikes. The people had an inclination to get down to hard work without complaints. Everywhere there was determination to bring Germany back just as quickly as possible to a position of strength.

Down through the Ruhr valley, where a few months before those seas of smoke stacks had been without smoke, in 1948 they were belching smoke and the whole area was a hive of activity. In recent months there have been reports in various publications, notably a February issue of Life magazine, containing the whole story of the remarkable recovery of Germany. These publications have carried detailed stories about what has been happening in Germany. I want to say right here, Mr. Speaker, that these reports have filled me with foreboding, because as soon as Germany brings herself back to a position of real strength in her industrial capacity, such as she had during the war, then the rest of the world has to begin to fear, particularly under the type of trading arrangements that we have been following in the past few decades. In one way I am glad to see Germany coming back and making the remarkable recovery that she is making. But, Mr. Speaker, it looks to me as though the recovery of Germany is going to complicate matters now. I say that with sincerity, and I believe the minister realizes that it is so.

It does seem insane for us to take a position of restriction in trade treaties and in such things as Bretton Woods, and to be imposing these things upon a conquered country at a time like this when the world is in desperate need of goods of all kinds. Surely we should welcome the effort of any country to go all-out in order to produce goods and services for the people of the world. That is particularly so now when 1,200 million people in this world go to bed hungry almost every night of the year and when those 1,200 million people in what we call the underprivileged an underdeveloped areas of the world are looking to the west for assistance by way of the things that we can produce and send to them.

It looks to me as though we should welcome the efforts of countries like Germany to produce all-out and to make their production available to the world. If we are ever going to convince Germany and other countries of this world that their productive enterprise is welcome, that we must give encouragement everywhere to all-out production and to see that that production is distributed equitably throughout the world it is necessary for us to institute a new idea of decent treatment between peoples and nations. We cannot do it by imposing upon them restrictive trade treaties. I am just afraid, Mr. Speaker, that that is one of the things involved in this whole question of Germany.

We are today talking about the peace treaty, the unification of Germany and rearmament in relation to this protocol. I want to impress upon the members of this house that if the rearmament of Germany is to be accomplished without grave danger to the rest of the world, it will have to be done under a relationship that will bring home to the people of Germany the idea that the western powers are going to treat them decently, and that they will be given a decent opportunity to produce and to distribute the goods that they can produce so that the peoples of the world can have them. Unless that is done, we are just going to push such countries as Germany right back into the position in which they were prior to world war II when they felt that they simply had to break out and resort to arms in an effort to breathe.

I am just as satisfied as I am that I stand here of the fact that one of the reasons why Germany went to war in 1939 was that she felt she simply could not continue to operate under the restrictions in trade which were being imposed on her. I am not trying to excuse for one moment what Germany did. I have always been prepared to join with those who set out to put down aggression and any unwarranted armed conflict of any kind anywhere. I think we must learn to understand; and to understand, it is necessary for us to get at the root of things. In my judgment, one of the things that are complicating the present European situation is the fear that Germany will once again dominate the whole of Europe in the matter of productive potential, particularly in industry.

The United States and other countries of the world have been sending into Europe large sums of money and large gifts of equipment, material and food to help those countries to bring themselves back and to get into a position in which they can take care of their own needs. Now that the United States and the other "have" countries have at least partially accomplished their objective, they then turn right around, put up high tariffs and impose trade restrictions upon them so that they cannot get rid of their goods. What kind of a paradoxical situation is that, Mr. Speaker? It is that paradox which must be solved if we are ever to achieve peace in this world. Surely in a world of potential abundance it is unthinkable to allow want, frustration, deprivation and fear of the future to continue to exist amongst at least half the population of the world. I mention that matter because it is involved in this whole question of what to do about Germany in the future.

I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he said that rearmament of Germany must be carried on under the strictest possible supervision. I do not know how long that supervision can last. That is one of the imponderables. At the present time it would be quite possible to see that what German troops are raised, armed and equipped should be officered by North Atlantic Treaty Organization officers; but that does not mean to say that they will be able to continue to officer them and to control them in the years ahead. We do not know for how long that will be possible. So, Mr. Speaker, what I said earlier I must emphasize once more, namely that we should not rush into the ratification of a protocol of this nature until we have given it much more study than we have been able to give it thus far. There are too many dangers involved.

In the course of his speech this morning, the minister laid some emphasis on the development of a united Europe. In the course of his statement he mentioned the functional integration of Europe; that is, he stressed the functional approach rather than the formal federation approach. I would be much more impressed by the minister's statement wherein he said European unity—that is, the full integration of Europe—should grow and not be imposed, if the facts of history did not definitely indicate that the integration is being forced and has actually been planned and forced for many years.

Anybody who has a knowledge of the facts of history must realize that the present sordid world situation did not just happen. It did not. These things do not just happen. These things that make up the present sordid world situation are the results of policies of men. That being so, for the life of me I cannot understand how anybody could possibly say that the integration of Europe is not being forced. It is being forced. War and the fear of war have been used for a long time to force that integration. I have some fairly strong feelings of suspicion about the whole matter. I have watched the moves ever since I was old enough to start to watch them. Back in 1917, Mr. Speaker, we did not worry too much about communism; but when we saw communism rise, we began to worry. And by the way, Mr. Speaker, it rose in Germany; it was cradled in Germany; it was nourished in Germany. The communist cells were developed in Germany and spread elsewhere. When, back in 1917 and 1918, we saw an opportunity of nipping communism in the bud and saw that it was deliberately bypassed, some of us began to wonder what was up. And when we saw it spread from Germany, by way of what I think was a deliberate conspiracy, into Russia, sponsored by German interests and German money, to make possible the revolution, and make possible communist control of Russia, and nothing was done to prevent it—in fact everything was done to enhance the move, Mr. Speaker—some of us were filled with foreboding. We have seen these things develop step by step toward the point where today some say that the only possible cure for it is the full federation of Europe.

I do not know whether that could possibly be a cure. I am quite prepared to admit that balance of power arrangement amongst all the free nations of the world is essential at this time. It may even be that integration of European economies under what the minister is pleased to call the functional approach is necessary. It may be, but, as I said to begin this part of my talk, I would be a whole lot more impressed by the minister's statement if the facts of history did not indicate quite definitely that the integration of Europe is being forced and has been forced and has been planned for a long time. It needs a lot of study and a lot more of consideration than we have been able to give it up to this time.

The minister informed us today that the road to ratification of the peace treaty with Germany and of this protocol itself is likely to be a difficult one. I understand that Canada is the first country to take action on the protocol. That may or may not be true.

Mr. Pearson: We have not taken any action yet.

Mr. Low: But we are in the process of taking some action now. It is before us for ratification. As I understand it, what we are doing here is putting the seal of approval of the people on it so that at any time it is deposited with the United States of America, and when the other contractees to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization have done likewise, then it becomes a binding contract. Well, we are taking action.

It seems almost a chronic fault, in my judgment, of the Liberal government to want to rush headlong into international commitments, to be the first in the water without knowing how deep the water is or how treacherous the currents may be in the swimming pool. We have made terrible mistakes in the past through such unwise haste. I have often wondered how long this government will make Canada the guinea pig, or the cat's paw to snatch the first hot chestnut out of the fire. How long are they going to continue to make Canada the guinea pig or that cat's paw?

Like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I say let us first see what some of these other nations are going to do. Give them the chance to act first. I recall quite well that when the Bretton Woods matter came up in the house in 1945 one of the things which we Social Crediters placed before the house was that Russia had continued to press for that thing with such undue and indecent haste that we were suspicious of it. We said: Let us just take a look and see what Russia is going to do about it before we plunge headlong into it. Let us take a look at what its implications are. You remember, Mr. Speaker, how some of us were called a bunch of fools because we attempted to get those facts before the people, to hold it up long enough to study the whole situation, all the implications of Bretton Woods. I just refresh your memory, Mr. Speaker, that after Russia had succeeded in getting the rest of the nations into it, they backed out and have never come into the scheme. We succeeded in putting a millstone around our necks right here in Canada and so did the other nations that allowed themselves to be imposed upon in the same manner. Therefore I say, let us be pretty careful about how we jump into these things. If the minister insists, of course, that this protocol must be ratified by us quickly and without ample opportunity to inquire into the full meaning and implications of it, then the only thing I can say to him is that he will have to take the dreadful responsibility alone, as without a full knowledge of the facts and possibilities involved in it, I am not in conscience joining my group with him in committing Canada to the extended obligations to which this treaty binds us.

If he feels it is essential that the house put its seal of approval on the protocol now, then I warn him that before Canada deposits her ratification with the United States we must make mighty sure that we know every detail of the obligations the Canadian people will have to assume as a consequence of it; and furthermore, as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) expressed himself this morning, the Canadian people ought to be made fully aware of just what they are getting into. With that warning, Mr. Speaker, I shall simply have to throw this responsibility right back on the minister's doorstep, as I do not feel that I can commit my group to the support of it at this time, knowing as little about it as we do.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I welcome this opportunity to take part briefly in this debate on the resolution which is before the house. In the resolution it is stated that one of the objects is to permit the closer association of the countries of western Europe. It was my privilege last December to attend the Council of Europe in Strasbourg where the whole question of a greater unity of the European countries was discussed at very considerable length.

I was pleased to hear the minister state that he considered the so-called functional approach was more acceptable at the present time. When I was speaking in the house on March 11 of this year in the throne speech debate I also mentioned that I considered the functional approach was the only practical approach to this problem at the present time. Briefly the functional approach is that of the setting up of specialized authorities to ensure European co-operation in certain definite and specific fields in which there is a very definite prospect of a solution being found to specific problems. Opposed to that idea is the rather more speedy solution advanced by certain statesmen in France and Italy for the federal approach. The congressmen from the United States who attended the consultative assembly last year seemed to be rather anxious that the federal approach should be adopted. But my impression, which apparently is the same as that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is that the functional approach is the only practical one at the present time, and that we must move slowly in this matter.

The countries of Europe have century-old traditions behind them. They are not all bad; it is not all a question of national hatreds. There is much national pride in the development of their national cultures and so forth. It is upon those particular aspects of the gradual development in Europe that emphasis is laid. These countries are hesitant about abandoning all that their forefathers have created. They are proud of their national traditions, and they do not consider the work of their fathers as being that of fools and liars. There is an old quotation that when a land forgets its legends, when it sees fears in the past, it is a sign of its decay. Europe is not decaying at the present time.

The minister went on to refer to Germany as being the key to Europe at the present time. I could not agree more with any statement. I certainly do believe that Germany is the key to Europe at the present time. While I was there I heard many statesmen indicate the importance of German unification being brought about. Statesmen from West Germany repeatedly emphasized the goal of German unification. I heard it said that this was an imperative necessity. But those statesmen of West Germany were not prepared to sacrifice the West German republic to soviet Russia in order to bring about unification. They wanted unification brought about along democratic lines rather than along communist lines. The impression I got was that the statesmen of West Germany would rather wait for proper unification to be brought about through democratic processes than to have unification brought about by the communist approach. As the minister said, Russia could withdraw behind Poland and the occupational forces of the United States, France and Great Britain could be withdrawn behind the Rhine, but that would be paramount to handing over Germany to communism. It would create a vacuum in which communism certainly would flourish.

There is no question about the determination of the Germans to eventually have a unified Germany. I heard evidence that some 10 million or 12 million East Germans had been expelled from their country and sent into West Germany. I shall never forget what one statesman of the West German republic said. He told me that their places had been taken in East Germany by Poles and Mongols. You could feel the pent-up determination of that man to one day see those Poles and Mongols removed from the farms of East Germany and those expellees who were living in West Germany returned to the eastern provinces of their country. We must not be led away by the fact that at the present moment West Germany is anxious to work with the other countries of the North Atlantic treaty, with the western powers, and is prepared to forget unification. They are anxious for unification, but they want the democratic approach to that unification.

Reference has been made to the growth of trade in West Germany. I saw evidence of the way in which new plants have sprung up all through the Ruhr valley from the rubble of factories which were destroyed. No one travelling in that country can help but be impressed by the resilience of the German people. Those people have to live by trade; they have to find markets in the world in which they can sell their manufactured goods.

Reference was made to the possibility of having free elections in Germany. In my opinion it will be difficult to bring about the unification of Germany until free elections can be held in all parts of Germany and in the various sections of Berlin. Evidence was given before a committee of the United Nations in Paris to the effect that at the present time free elections could not be held in East Germany. It was said that that could not be done until the Russian authorities were prepared to allow the leaders of parties other than the communist party to come into East Germany and announce their policies on the public platform. That cannot be done at the present time. Although there are small groups keeping alive democratic ideas in East Germany, the meetings of those groups must be held in secret or they must come into West Germany or western Berlin in order to discuss these matters.

There are two questions regarding this protocol which I should like to have answered. I notice in article I reference is made to the territory of any of the members of the European defence community in Europe. It then goes on to say that an attack on the territory of any member shall be considered an attack against all the parties to the North Atlantic treaty and require necessary action.

I am rather interested in knowing the position at the present time in respect to Turkey. Turkey is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, but in the main she is an Asiatic power. Any threat to Turkish territory might well be through an Asiatic approach to that land which is most vulnerable in that direction. We know that for some five hundred years Turkey has exercised dominion over many Arabian countries. We know that there are communist satellite states on her eastern border. Would an attack on Turkey developing from Asia be considered as excluded from the provisions of this protocol, or are we to be committed to going to Turkey's assistance if an attack should come through Asia? Are we concerned only with the European portion of Turkey? This article states definitely "in Europe". That is one point which I would ask the minister to clear up.

When the minister was referring to Western Germany and our responsibilities to Western Germany he made no reference to Berlin. Berlin of course is entirely separate from Western Germany. It is in a peculiar situation in that it is surrounded by Russian-occupied zones. I would ask the minister to advise the house what our obligations are with respect to the western sector of Berlin where we have very definite connections but quite different from those with regard to Western Germany. I think it is somewhat ambiguous to leave the situation as it is at the present moment.

There was one other remark in the minister's speech that I wanted to mention. He referred to the reorganization of the German army and the supplying of the German forces with armament which he said was defensive. While the intention may be that the armament should be used defensively I think it would be giving a false impression if the statement were let stand that the Germans were only being allowed to rearm with armament of a purely defensive nature. Otherwise one might consider that the sole armament with which the German forces would be equipped might be anti-aircraft artillery and that sort of thing. From published reports, however, we know that the German component of the European army will have such formations as panzer divisions; and while panzer divisions may be used entirely defensively nobody could possibly say that they are defensive armament. I wanted to raise that point.

I think we must also realize the fact that Germany has no army at the present time and has not had for a period of seven years. Armies cannot be created overnight even though there is a core of officers who saw active service seven years ago. It is going to take some time before a reorganized German army can be ready to take the field or can be effective in any way. Personally I feel that the immediate danger of the next two or three years so far as the possibility of a Russian advance through Europe is concerned outweighs for the time being at least the dangers which might be foreseen in the creation of a German army.

I do not think Germany has any thought of embarking upon another Franco-Prussian war or of initiating operations against France or any other European country. At the present time her feelings are far more hostile toward Russia than toward any other European country. Therefore I feel there is no reason for delay in approving this protocol because such delay might be misinterpreted to mean that Canada was not anxious to carry out all her commitments under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or from the point of view of the general desire to maintain the peace of the world. If we have wise statesmanship over the years I think we can ward off the fear that in the far distant future Germany might have aggressive designs against other European countries.

If we always keep before us the objective of the resolution, namely the ensuring of closer association of the countries of western Europe, then we can avoid that danger. We need not cherish the suspicions that exist at the present time because if there is closer association between the countries of western Europe, which can be brought about by wise statesmanship, the danger of future wars will recede.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, sitting here today as one who is not a member of the external affairs committee but as one who is deeply interested in the subject before the house, it seems to me that hon. members are showing great discretion in the discussion of this matter. I wish to support the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in the attitude they have taken in favour of the resolution, though I think I can understand the motives at the back of the minds of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in urging upon the minister that every precaution should be taken to see that we are not the first to deposit ratification. As the old saying goes, be not the last the old coat to take off nor yet the first the new one to put on. They do not want to see us rush to deposit ratification.

I listened to the hon. member for Peace River speak of the fears in his mind of the danger of a reorganized Germany. He was, I think, following somewhat in the footsteps of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who spoke about the nazis. It seems to me that these hon. members are not cognizant of the great change that has taken place in Western Germany and in Europe generally since the war. Fascism was overthrown not so much by war as by the will of the people concerned. The people did not want fascism. They did not want a tyranny over them. The people in post-war Germany did not want a tyranny over them. We have in both Italy and Germany today Christian democratic governments with which the western nations can easily work in harmony. It is because of the presence in Germany today of a Christian democratic government with a Christian prime minister that we are being asked to support the resolution.

I think we must recognize that Germany stands in the front line if there is any danger from Russia, and I am sure the hon. member for Peace River will recognize that the danger from Russia is greater than the danger from Germany at the present time. I do not think anybody can deny that. We know that the professed aim of the Russian government is world domination, as was the professed aim of Hitler and nazi Germany fifteen years ago. Russia came out of the war far greater and far stronger than Germany ever was. Russia gained far more territory than Hitler ever had in mind to gain. Therefore Russia is the real enemy, and it seems to me that the hon. member, looking at the reality of the situation and recognizing that however distasteful it may be to link up with a former enemy—not only link up but guarantee protection—will see this is the only thing we can do. We have to choose one way or the other. As the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) says, we cannot leave the centre of Europe a vacuum. If we do the power of Russia will spread into Germany; and if we permitted German intelligence, manpower and industrial power to be added to the present power of Russia, then Russia would be invincible. If the power of Japan could be added to the power of China and Russia you would have the same situation in the east.

It is fortunate for the western countries that these European countries have the common culture and common traditions about which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) speaks. They have a common Christian culture. It is fortunate for us today, too, that we have both Japan and Germany on the side of the western democracies, adopting the principles that we advocate as the most suitable form of government. Some hon. members may remember that nearly three years ago I said that we should have both Japan and Germany on our side. It is a blessing from the Almighty for which we ought to be thankful that these two nations are on our side and not with the Russians. The nazi government was a pagan government; the Russian government is a pagan government, and therefore, directly opposed to our traditions, the cultural ideas in our western democracies, and to our form of government which comes from respect for the individual, something which does not exist in Russia.

Germany is, as I say, in the first line of defence. If there is to be an attack Germany must meet it. To do so she must have forces. It is impossible for the Americans, the Canadians and other smaller countries to defend a great country like Germany from the powerful forces which we are told Russia could mobilize in a very short time. As the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has said, there is no German army in existence today. There is really nothing for the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) to fear. What we have to fear is what everybody is fearing; that the Russians may feel they are in a position to attack and conquer. Fortunately the organization that has taken place in the last year or two under the leadership of General Eisenhower and the United Nations seems to have put them off that idea. Let us hope this protocol will be speedily ratified by all the nations so Germany will be reorganized and become part of the common defence of Europe and the western democracies as soon as possible.

Germany has made a remarkable recovery, similar to the recovery made by Japan. It is really remarkable to notice how these two countries have come up from defeat and the results of the severe bombing attacks they received, which practically destroyed a high percentage of their industrial capacity. German industry is now in such a position that people who attended the international trade fair in Toronto the other day were full of admiration for the German exhibit which they said was the best at the show.

What we have to decide today is whether we are going to support Germany entering into the European defence community and joining us in a defence contract against possible communist imperialist aggression. That is the problem in a nutshell, and it seems to me it is very simple. There is only one decision we can make. The hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar do not wish us to make the decision right away. They say let us wait; let us see what the other countries are going to do. Well, it is either right or wrong, and it seems to me to be right so the sooner we do it the better. Let us who claim credit for having initiated the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and all the good things that have come from that organization, go ahead. Why should we hesitate to be the first to approve this protocol?

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a brief word.

It seems to me this situation is terribly clear, terribly simple and terribly important. What is the situation? The situation as I see it is that we and other nations have banded ourselves together in the hope that we may still have time to become strong enough to deter the Russians from attacking us. Now we are asked to take an action the aim of which I suppose, if you analyse it accurately, is to do the best we can to get Germany on our side rather than the other side. I suppose that if Germany is attacked today we are bound to defend her. We have troops in Germany; our own brigade is there.

Now, let us not fool ourselves that the Germans have come to love us. Of course they have not come to love us. The question is whether West Germany will find it in her interests to be on our side rather than the other side. We know that they hate communism, or we believe that they hate communism; nevertheless those who had to make this decision—Acheson, Eden, and Schuman —did not find it easy, I am sure. They found it terribly difficult, and I think all the evidence shows that. Nevertheless, having calculated the risk these men—able men whom we trust—with all the information available decided to take the course which has been decided upon.

We are now asked to authorize our government to go ahead. We are not asking it to rush in tomorrow, but I deprecate more than I can say the idea that we should hang back and let the European countries go first. Where would we be if the United States had done that for the last year or two?

As I said, I do not think we should tell the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) that he should rush off and mail this protocol today or do whatever is necessary by way of depositing it, but it seems to me most unfortunate that anything should be said in this house which can be used to show there is hesitation. We are committed now, and the time for hesitation has long gone by as far as I can see. It would seem to me unfortunate beyond words if anything said in this country could be used, as it will be used in Russia, to show that our people are half-hearted, that they have been ready to talk but that when the issue comes they are not ready to act. That can be used in the German bundestag where this is being fought out at the moment.

I have, myself, the greatest admiration for Adenauer. I do not know whether he hates or loves us, but he is a stout fellow trying to get this thing through. He is not having an easy time. It seems to me that any word of hesitation in this house is going to be surely magnified and used by the opponents of this measure in the West German parliament. We are not acting in any spirit of chauvinism; we have had enough war, and we know what it is like. It is not a very thrilling adventure, and it will be worse the next time; but we are doing our best, and for goodness sake do not let us face both ways.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members will agree we have had a good discussion which is worthy of the importance of this matter. I have a few words to say in concluding the discussion because I think the house would expect me to try to deal with some of the points that have been raised.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to one or two specific points raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). He wanted to know what the position of Turkey would be under these NATO guarantees and the European defence community guarantee. He was worried about the use of the word "Europe" in the article of the protocol referring to that guarantee. If he had read a little further in that article he would have seen that the guarantee extends to the territory of any of the members of the European defence community in Europe or any area described in article 6(1) of the North Atlantic treaty. That reciprocal guarantee is also in the European defence community treaty.

If he were then to turn to article 6(1) of the North Atlantic treaty, an article which was modified by the admission of Turkey and Greece, he would discover a guarantee in that treaty which now extends to the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America, to the Algerian departments of France and to the territory of Turkey. Those words were added when Turkey joined the North Atlantic pact, so it is quite clear the guarantee we extend to those countries extends to their whole metropolitan area. The reason the word "Europe" was used in the first place was to exclude from the guarantee the colonial territories of some of the signatory powers.

Then the hon. member wanted to know what the situation was in regard to Berlin, and that is a very important point. I do not think I mentioned this morning that Berlin is not included in the territory covered by the peace contract. There are references, however, to Berlin in the contract and in certain supplementary exchanges which will be found attached to the contract. The interest of the three western powers in Berlin was affirmed in September, 1950, in a tripartite security guarantee which they gave at that time. This guarantee was later reaffirmed at a North Atlantic council meeting, and again on the signature of the European defence community treaty in Paris on May 27, in the following terms:

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

They—

That is the three governments.

—therefore reaffirm that they will treat any attack against Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon their forces and themselves.

I believe it is quite clear now that any attack on Berlin from any quarter would call into effect the guarantee so far as the three main guarantors are concerned; that is recognized in the exchanges that have recently taken place.

Mr. Low: Is the guarantee limited to the three?

Mr. Pearson: We have accepted ours, of course, under the original treaty. The effect of an attack on the occupying powers in Germany, including Berlin, would be an attack on those powers, so we are included to that extent.

Mr. Graydon: It is not affected by this legislation now?

Mr. Pearson: Any obligation we may have in respect of Berlin, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, is not affected by this particular peace contract.

Mr. Graydon: Only by the original guarantee.

Mr. Pearson: By the original guarantee, and by our association with the tripartite declaration of 1950.

One other point was raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo. He called my attention to the fact that I had given the impression that the German contingent of the European defence forces would be allowed to use defensive armaments only. If I gave that impression it was wrong because, as he pointed out, the defensive use of weapons is one thing but a defensive weapon is another. The German contingent with the European defence forces, if and when they are constituted, would of course be armed with the same weapons as the other contingents of that army.

If I may revert to some of the more general observations that were made, I should like to say a word first about the very interesting and constructive statement of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). He made a plea, which was echoed by other speakers, that we should tell the people what we are doing in connection with foreign affairs, a plea which he has made before in this house and one to which no hon. member would wish to take exception. I agree that we should tell the people what we are doing in matters of this kind which are so important to them and to their destiny. I believe that, by and large, this government has done its best to make the public aware of not only what it is doing but also why it is trying to do certain things in the field of external relations.

I believe there was an implied criticism, and I am not quarrelling with it, on the part of the member for Peel and more specifically on the part of the member for Peace River (Mr. Low), that a protocol document so important as this, with such far-reaching consequences for peace or war, should have been referred for detailed discussion to the standing committee on external affairs. The hon. member referred to this aspect of the question several times and to the fact that we were now ratifying this protocol. The constitutional position, of course, is clear. Ratification is the action of the government; but it has become the constitutional practice, and it is a good practice, that that executive action of the government should not be discharged until the legislature has had a chance to express its approval or disapproval. What we are doing today is giving the legislature a chance to express its opinion. But with all respect, I do not feel that we are rushing this parliament into approval or disapproval, as the hon. member for Peace River rather indicated.

I have before me the transcript of the hearings of the standing committee on external affairs. In so far as the members of that committee are concerned—and I appreciate that does not include all the membership of the house—there were three meetings this session, at which I was present, which were devoted to a general discussion of international affairs. During that general discussion a good deal of time was devoted to NATO. This protocol which we have before us was also referred to by me in speeches in this house. I mentioned it when I came back from the North Atlantic council meeting in Lisbon, and indeed the whole matter was made public some weeks ago, before we had these hearings in the standing committee on external affairs. An opportunity was given, therefore, at that time for as exhaustive an examination as any member of the standing committee on external affairs desired to make, by addressing questions to me and to the officials of the department who would be familiar with all the details of the agreements. There is certainly no desire on the part of the government, however, to rush parliament into approval or disapproval of this treaty or indeed to rush into executive action if approval is given.

I was quite interested in the concluding observation of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I agree that we should not necessarily hang back in doing a good deed, if this is a good deed, and that we should certainly do nothing by our inaction or our hesitancy—if we feel that this is a good move in principle—to give those who are opposed to it the argument that we are lukewarm and therefore there is no reason for them to be any warmer. Nevertheless I think it is a matter of timing, and that it would be quite appropriate for the government, if the house approves of this protocol, to postpone the deposit of its ratification until we see how the situation works out in other countries which are just as deeply concerned with this matter as we are. If there had been a possibility of considering this matter a month or two from now, a discussion of this protocol at that time might have been more realistic in the light of developments in other parts of the world. I for one would have welcomed the postponement of such a discussion. But, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), if we do not take action now we might find ourselves later in the position of being the only member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or the European defence community, which had not taken steps to bring this protocol into effect. I think that is a responsibility no hon. member of this house who favours this protocol would wish to take. So the actual act of ratification—that is the deposit of the instrument of ratification—in accord with appropriate constitutional practice, will be performed by the government in the light of circumstances if this house approves of the protocol itself.

To get back to the speech made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), may I say that he made what to me were some extremely interesting general observations on the line we should follow in respect of the communist attitude toward the German and other related problems. He laid down as a policy, which has been supported in other parts of the house and in other free countries, that we should not be hesitant about a protocol of this kind or about any aspect of policy in resisting communist aggression if we think that is the right policy. As he put it, I think he said we should lay down a line which cannot be crossed with impunity by any communist aggressor. Later in his statement he said we should make sure that everybody is going to keep the peace. In other words, nobody is to be permitted to cross that line. He said it should be made quite clear to a potential aggressor that if he tries to do so he will be met with the necessary strength to throw him back.

I must say that extremely decisive and definite policy has its attractions, but it also has its difficulties and indeed its dangers; because when you start on a policy of that kind—that we must lay down a line and let a potential aggressor know that if he crosses that line there will be trouble—you are at once faced with an argument as to where that line should be and what exactly would be the type of action to be taken if the aggressor did cross the line, in the event that there is agreement on lines all over the world.

My own feeling, Mr. Speaker, is that while there are vital sectors of the front which if they are attacked must be defended, and where the attack must be met at once by collective and armed resistance, we would be getting ourselves into a great deal of trouble if we tried to extend and define those vital sectors, by agreement at this time, all over the world.

In supporting his view the hon. member for Peel suggested that in recent years we were in danger of falling victim to what he called a gigantic bluff on the part of communist imperialists. I think there is some truth in that suggestion, because naturally an aggressor of that kind would try to bluff in order to get his way inasmuch as it is sometimes cheaper to bluff than it is to fight. At the same time it is bluffing for extremely high stakes; and before we organize armed reaction against what we consider to be bluff, we had better be extremely certain that it is bluff; and we had better be certain in our own minds that, if it is not bluff, it is something we should accept as the gauge of battle. These questions are not easy to solve and they are not always easy even to define.

The hon. member for Peel asked me some questions about Germany's financial contribution to defence under the European defence community treaty. He was also preoccupied, as I am sure we all are, with the trade position between East Germany and West Germany. As to the first question, in the agreements we talked about this morning there are clauses which provide that Germany will make its proper contribution, in financial terms, to western defence; and that contribution at present has been established by agreement with the federal republic at 850 million deutsche marks a month—and that is a substantial figure—which will be provided under a formula which for the time being at least has been determined.

Mr. Graydon: What is that amount in dollars?

Mr. Pearson: It would be something between $2 billion and $3 billion, I think, for the first year. I am not sure of the exact figure.

Mr. Graydon: That is per year?

Mr. Pearson: That would be at the rate of 850 million deutsche marks per month until further arrangements have been made for the future. That is to be divided between a contribution for the upkeep of NATO forces on German territory and the building up of German forces for the European defence community.

As to trade questions, since May, 1948, the economic exploitation by the Soviet union of the east zone of Germany has become somewhat less thorough that it was previously, and that area is now developing along the normal lines of a Soviet satellite state. Trade between East Germany and the eastern European countries is increasing. In 1951 some 85 per cent of East Germany's trade was said to be with the Soviet bloc. On May 6 of this year the East and West German authorities signed a new agreement for an exchange of goods to the value of about $25 million. West Germany was to deliver steel, iron, metal products and chemicals in exchange for agricultural products, timber, fuels and textiles.

On the question of strategic materials—and some of these materials would seem to be quite strategic—there is general agreement among the free countries of the world not to export such materials to the U.S.S.R. and its satellites where these might increase the Soviet war potential. But that understanding in the case of a country like Western Germany must be considered in relation to the essential requirements of trade between the two parts of Germany, if West Germany is to remain stable and prosperous. It should also be considered in relation to the provisions of the United States mutual assistance act against the export of certain commodities to communist countries by countries receiving military, financial or economic aid from the United States.

Mr. Graydon: If I may, I should like to ask the minister a question. I am sorry to interrupt him and I do so only because this subject is extremely interesting. From the standpoint of the free powers and from the point of view of trade and the strategic movement of materials, is the border line between East Germany and West Germany now regarded as the line separating the iron curtain countries from the free powers?

Mr. Pearson: I would think it would probably be reasonable to conclude that this sinister but mythical iron curtain lies along the line between East and West Germany, with an island of freedom and democracy in west Berlin.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in his statement made some references to trade and economic questions. He warned us against the reimposition of trade restrictions on Germany as a result of these agreements. He suggested that one of the reasons —and I do not want to misinterpret what he said—Germany had to break out in aggressive warfare in 1939 was on account of these trade restrictions, and that we should be extremely careful not to reimpose them on Germany at this time. All I have to say in regard to that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is that if I am correct in my recollection there was no other country in Europe in 1939 which imposed tighter and more exclusive trade restrictions on itself and its neighbours than nazi Germany. I would echo the hope that that kind of trade restriction policy, which is always associated with the name of Herr Schacht, should not be restored or reimposed on Germany or indeed on any other country.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who views this protocol and its implications and the developments which surround it with mixed feelings, as indeed I suppose most of us do, felt that in the discussion of these instruments and in the length of time the west has taken to bring them to signature, the Russians have exploited the situation to win a propaganda victory. I am not so sure of that, Mr. Speaker, because I have studied these exchanges, as hon. members have, and at least one Russian note has made it clear beyond doubt to the Germans and to the rest of us that the Russian price of German unity is a restored and rearmed Germany, with few restrictions on the use of its arms, and free except in respect of the right to join the west in a system of collective defence.

Mr. Coldwell: They have played up to the nationalism of the Germans.

Mr. Pearson: They have played up to the nationalism of the Germans, but they have made it quite clear to the Germans that the price of unification is a price that includes not only nationalism but a restriction on the German right to make arrangements with the friendly and democratic west. And far more important than this in unmasking the Russian aims, these Russian notes have made it quite clear to the Germans that the Oder-Neisse boundary remains. That is another price which the Germans would have to pay for the Russian type of unification, whereas in the exchanges between Adenauer and the west on these matters the three western powers have always been careful to make clear that the permanent boundaries of Germany should be among the matters reserved for final consideration and decision at the general peace conference.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said we should never be reluctant to negotiate with the Russians over Germany, or indeed over any other matter; that we on the western side, because we distrust their intentions and doubt their sincerity, should not refuse to discuss Germany with them. Up to a point I find myself in agreement with that position, as indeed I think the foreign ministers of other countries do. But it is one thing to agree to negotiate with the Russians on an agenda which is clear and practical, and which has previously been determined so that if you could not obtain results you could at least break off. It is something else to meet the Russians and to become involved in long propaganda discussions which on the Russian side would be used for the purpose of delaying ratification which I think now is probably the cardinal objective of their foreign policy.

Mr. Graydon: They want to get us on international tanglefoot.

Mr. Pearson: Possibly the western powers are wise in looking with some caution on these invitations to discussions. Nevertheless, having said that I should add as I said before that I hope it will be possible to press ahead with ratification and at the same time not refuse any reasonable and practicable offer for discussion.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar emphasized that there were a great many sections of opinion in Germany and outside Germany who were worried about these agreements, and he felt that we should be very careful not to go ahead with them until we knew what the Germans themselves wished. I agree, but that is what we are trying to find out from now on. We are trying to find out what the Germans, the French, the British and the Americans, and indeed all the peoples concerned, do wish—especially the Germans. That is the purpose for instance of submitting these documents to the West German parliament for ratification.

When we talk about what the Germans wish, all we know now is that the government which is in control of Western Germany as a result of free elections has agreed to this policy, and that all the steps along the road to the signature of these treaties by the West Germans have been taken after discussion with Chancellor Adenauer and his government who do represent at the present time the West German people. If he loses their support and the parliament refuses to ratify these agreements, then everything is off and we have to start all over again. There is nothing that I can see to suggest that these documents have been forced upon a reluctant people, because every single legislature concerned with every single document has to ratify it, and if one is unable to ratify any single document, then we must try to find a new approach to this vital problem of the association of Germany with western defence.

Mr. Graydon: I understand there are 47 separate ratifications.

Mr. Pearson: There will be a great many, and I think there is not much likelihood of any government being rushed into an action which it does not desire to take as a result of pressure from outside, or indeed pressure from minorities inside.

There is not much more I can add now to what has already been said, Mr. Speaker. I was very interested and impressed by the observations of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) when he said, "We are not entering into this arrangement because we expect the Germans or anybody else to love us as a result of it." We must not fool ourselves in that respect. As a matter of fact, a few years ago a wise editor said: "Don't try to make your neighbour love you; it will only make him uncomfortable. Try to win his respect." I suggest that the best basis for developing the association of North Atlantic countries with Germany is the basis of mutual respect, and I think it is fair to say it is on that basis that these documents, including this protocol, have been negotiated. I agree that we need not force this situation, but I agree also that we should take advantage of it and this is the time to do so.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said that he would not be able to take the responsibility of approving this protocol because he did not feel that sufficient time had been given to consider it, and that he would leave that responsibility to me. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is not any personal responsibility of mine; it is the responsibility of the government, and indeed it is the responsibility of parliament to accept or reject this resolution. But if it were my personal responsibility I would be very glad indeed to take it on this occasion because I think that, with all its risks, with all its difficulties, and with all its uncertainties this is a move toward peace, especially peace in Europe, and a peace in a Europe with which will be associated the free democracies across the Atlantic. Therefore if I were forced into that position I would not be reluctant to take this responsibility. But I would not be happy, as a Canadian, to take any responsibility for defeating a move so important, as I see it, to our own safety and to peace as the building up of the European defence community, including those two old opponents, France and Germany, and the association of that community with the strongest deterrent we now have to prevent aggression, namely the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Motion (Mr. Pearson) agreed to.

WAR RISKS INSURANCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF MARINE AND AVIATION ACCOUNT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 336, respecting marine and aviation war risks insurance and reinsurance agreements.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the parliamentary assistant going to make a statement?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is little I can add to the statement made by the minister on the resolution stage. This bill is intended to provide stand-by legislation so that ships, cargoes and aircraft can secure war risk insurance in the case of hostilities or even apprehended hostilities. The United Kingdom and United States governments have similiar legislation on their statute books.

This is a reinsurance scheme. The ship owners themselves have formed a mutual insurance company, the incorporation of which is now before the Senate. They will provide the needed skilled administration, and then the federal government will reinsure the risk. During the resolution stage the minister was asked a number of questions and perhaps this would be the best time to answer them.

First of all the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) asked about the rates. The minister at the time said the rate was not an accurate estimate of the losses because during the war, when losses from submarines were very high, the United Kingdom government which ran the pool at that time for British shipping of all descriptions deliberately held down the rate so the Germans would not get encouragement because of that. The rate fluctuated from 3 per cent up to as high as 7 per cent.

The hon. member for Greenwood also asked for figures on the actual amount of reinsurance which was undertaken by the British government during the war. At that time our Canadian firms took out such reinsurance through the British pools and through the British government. I have a table here; I can either place it on Hansard or give the net results. As far as ships were concerned, the net result was a profit, if you want to call it that—the United Kingdom ministry of transport describes it as total net premium revenue for ships—of £75 million; and on cargoes, £36 million. On the whole scheme they were £111 million to the good. Unfortunately they could not provide us with a breakdown of those figures as they affected Canadian shipping.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand it was said in the previous debate that the margin in connection with ships was sufficient to pay the losses on property in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sinclair: That is not so. The property losses were covered by an entirely different insurance plan, as was done in this country. The next inquiry by the hon. member for Greenwood was about the United States scheme. Congress has now authorized the secretary of commerce to offer insurance or reinsurance against war risks for United States vessels. The arrangements are still under discussion with the shipping group which will form these pools.

The hon. member also asked the reaction of the private marine insurance firms to this scheme. Here in Canada we have three principal marine underwriters. The president of each of these companies has been informally advised of this reinsurance proposal in connection with the shipping sector and each has expressed himself as recognizing the necessity and desirability of this development. Of course no private insurance company will take war risks of this type. It was felt that the location of these facilities in Canada would be a help in the settlement of losses to Canadian ship owners. This scheme has been approved not only by the ship owners but by the Canadian maritime commission.

The minister was asked why we did not continue as partners in the British pool instead of going on with our own plans in the event of hostilities. I think there are three principal reasons for that at this time. First, by running such a pool of government insurance here in Canada it will permit the valuations placed on ships to be more in line with Canadian values. There was some trouble with Canadian owners during the last war in connection with settlements because the United Kingdom valuation of ships was quite a bit lower than Canadian valuations. That is certainly true today.

The second problem, and hon. members will realize that it is quite serious, is raised by the fact that Canadian ship owners would expect settlement in dollars. If they were working with a United Kingdom pool they might have some difficulty since the major part of its resources would be in sterling.

Third, Canadian ship owners themselves felt it was preferable to have the pool and reinsurance handled here in Canada close to their own head offices. The marine insurance people also agree with that because some of the claims made may be due to private insurance risks and settlement will be easier if both the war risk insurance and private insurance are a Canadian settlement.

One hon. member asked the connection between ship insurance and cargo insurance. This insurance does not relate only to cargoes carried in Canadian ships. In the end the cargo insurance may be the bigger field. A Canadian shipper may send cargo in a Belgian bottom and while the ship itself would not be insured, under this plan, the cargo could be.

Then the minister was asked what the aggregate liability will be. The ship owners who have so far signified that they would like to participate in this pool have shipping assets totalling at the present time $115 million.

Then it was asked: Why is an insurance scheme desirable since many other war risks are not insured? An insurance scheme is desirable because the premiums are accepted as a proper component of freight and cargo rates; and as Canadian ships will be used by shippers of other countries as well as by Canadians, an insurance scheme is a mechanism whereby the users of the Canadian fleet will bear the full cost of operating the fleet in wartime including the cost of losses by enemy action.

It was asked: Will the scheme be self-supporting? Our scheme is based very closely on the British scheme and, as I have said, they had a net revenue in the end of £111 million. It is planned to have a quarterly adjustment of the premium, as was done with the British scheme during the last war.

The minister mentioned the advantage of a reinsurance scheme as compared to direct government insurance, in that it would not require the setting up of any new bureau of government. The ship owners themselves, through their mutual insurance co-operative, are providing the skilled management which is necessary for marine insurance. Therefore the arrangement is beneficial both to the government and to the ship owners.

It will be noted that in the bill power is also given to enter into direct insurance arrangements despite the fact that reinsurance was found to be the best practice. That is intended to give authority, if it should be necessary, in connection with aircraft. Aircraft constitute a new field which was not covered during the last war by either the British or United States governments. If hon. members look back they will remember that international air lines were not developed to the extent they are now; as a matter of fact they were barely developed. There is a difference between shipping and air transport. If hostilities should break out in Europe and four or five T.C.A. aircraft were there, they could be back in Canada the next morning. However, if Canadian ships were in Europe at the outbreak of hostilities they would be caught in those harbours without any insurance protection.

I think I have covered the principal points raised during the resolution stage. If it is desired I could place this little table from the United Kingdom ministry of transport on Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the parliamentary assistant have permission to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The table follows:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Subject to one question I shall raise before I take my seat I think the parliamentary assistant, expanding what the minister said when we were at the resolution stage, has made very clear the need for some measure of this kind. He has explained that in the last war we relied on the facilities of Great Britain, and I think he has made clear the advantages which will accrue from being able to deal with the matter ourselves here at home. He has given certain interesting facts, and in particular has indicated the necessity of a measure of this kind by telling us that the private underwriters are not prepared to bear the risks of war. Of course it is perfectly clear that if war comes we must have immediately available some method of insurance whereby our ships can go to sea. He has given us a satisfactory reference to the attitude of the ship owners. On all that it seems that what the house has before it is prima facie satisfactory.

My objection to this legislation, and it goes to the whole root of the matter, is that this is not legislation at all but is merely permission to the government to legislate. What I mean is that we just have a couple of omnibus clauses—I will read them in a moment—which give the governor in council the power to do anything in connection with this whole area of our business life. I have tried to examine the corresponding British act. I have tried to follow the British legislation in the time available, and I have here the act of 1939. Subject to what the parliamentary assistant may say later, so far as I can discover their legislation, while it has been amended, is still outstanding; and compared with the measure now before us their act, while it does not go into a great deal of detail, does set out certain rights of the parties with very much more particularity than is the case here.

Indeed, this measure goes beyond what it seems to me we ordinarily find even in measures which give a great deal of power to the government; because I have noticed that the governor in council, in addition to being empowered to do various other things, is empowered in section 4 to define a lot of things. My recollection is that even in legislation which gives a great deal of power to the governor in council the tendency has been to have a pretty broad section defining certain things, which in itself is some safeguard. I shall now read the operative parts of sections 3 and 4, which I think really are the gist of the bill. The other clauses refer to dealing with money that comes into the minister's hands, to audit, to laying copies of agreements before parliament and so on, but the two operative sections are 3 and 4. Section 3 reads as follows:

> The minister may enter into an agreement, in such form and containing such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the regulations or otherwise approved by the governor in council, with any person or association of persons for the insurance or reinsurance by him against any or all war risks of (a) aircraft; (b) vessels; or (c) cargo.

I shall not read all of section 4 but it reads in part as follows:

> The governor in council may make regulations for carrying the purposes and provisions of this act into effect and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations . . .

And so on. I do not think I need to read the details because I think what I have read gives enough to underline the point I am making, namely that, as I said a moment ago, this is not really legislation at all. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that it merely says to the governor in council: You go off and make any legislation you like. There are a few definitions of war risks, minister—they had to define him—and certain other things, and then we come to the two sections which, as I say, give the whole power to the governor in council which, practically speaking, means to the minister.

I am not going to labour the point. The point is there and is clear. It seems to me it is a most regrettable kind of legislation, and we are getting a great deal of it. I can understand the attraction of it. It is so easy to draw. I am sure it must be the delight of the draftsmen simply to say that the governor in council can make regulations and give ample power to the ministers. At this rate we will really get our legislation so abbreviated that it can all be put into a clause or two. Therefore, having made this point clearly, although perhaps not as fully as I might have done, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to make an observation. It is quite clear from our experience with the reference of legislation to committees that legislation is in better form in most cases when it comes back to the house. Here is one case where a committee is likely to be very helpful in making recommendations as to the kind of legislation that parliament should adopt in a somewhat new field. What has been said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is quite sound. After all the bill is an enabling measure. It does very little more than confer powers on the governor in council. We are not in wartime now. We want to provide for situations that, unhappily, may arise unexpectedly, but surely we are not in such a position that we need to pass blank cheque legislation of this kind. I urge the government to give serious consideration to the suggestion embodied in the amendment. I think my colleague has made a most helpful suggestion.

Mr. Sinclair: With respect to the observations made about the legislation conferring great powers on the cabinet to make regulations, if this were the type of bill that applied to the people of Canada by some compulsion such criticism would have some point, but it must be remembered that the bill is drawn up at the request of the ship owners themselves.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a question?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will there not be compulsion on ship owners?

Mr. Sinclair: No. Whether or not ship owners decide to join the pool is entirely a matter of decision for them. In the last war there were some ship owners who did not insure. They took a chance, although it was a very big chance. There is no compulsion on the ship owners at all. The Canadian Shipowners Mutual Insurance Company, the bill concerning which is now before the Senate, is a co-operative association to which they may or may not belong according to their desire. If the ship owners find that the government's terms are too onerous they can protest or withdraw. The government certainly does not intend to lose the taxpayers' money under this measure. The British record shows that they will not from that point of view.

The other thing is that stand-by legislation such as this, which is put on the statute books to be ready for use in case of need at the outbreak of hostilities, because of its very nature cannot be very specific. We do not know under what circumstances—we hope never—hostilities may break out. Let me direct the hon. member's attention to one clause. He mentioned the British act of 1939. Section 2 (f) (iii) of the bill covers a ship registered in any country designated by the governor in council, whether or not it is owned, chartered or otherwise controlled by a Canadian. One might say that these are extraordinarily wide powers because we can cover any ship whether or not it is owned or chartered by a Canadian. That is the consequence of the unexpected experience the British had at the outbreak of the last war with respect to the collapse of Norway. With the Norwegian merchant marine on the high seas the British took it over. Some of us can remember Churchill's famous declaration to the British people that if by any chance the island should fall they would fight on in the dominions across the seas, which would also involve such a transfer.

There is certainly no objection whatsoever to the bill going to the banking and commerce committee after second reading when the principle of the bill has been approved. That committee is sitting tomorrow, and we will gladly refer the bill to it.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would it not be wise to have this go to the banking and commerce committee so we could have the advantage of recommendations from that committee before the principle is dealt with? It does not seem to me that anything would be delayed by referring it now to the banking and commerce committee. Many of the questions could be answered very simply by that process.

It has been explained that this bill is actually being presented at the request of the ship owners, and that being the case it would be very easy to place before the committee the recommendations upon which such a bill was prepared. There would be an opportunity to question some of those who are pressing for a bill of this kind.

Before I finish what I have to say I would simply ask, now that the minister is here, if it could not be agreed that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) knows, it is a very exceptional move to refer the principle of a bill to the banking and commerce committee. The usual practice is to refer the bill after second reading. The principle of this bill is that the government will provide enabling legislation to permit these clubs or associations of owners to obtain war risk insurance. I see no reason why there should be any departure from the generally accepted rule that the house should decide on the principle of the bill, and I would be quite happy to have it referred to the banking and commerce committee at that stage. However, it is only in the most exceptional circumstances that the house refers the subject matter of a bill to the committee. The government must take the responsibility for bringing in the bill and recommending the principle on which it is based.

I would suggest that unless there is some reason produced now which has not so far been produced, we should give the bill second reading. I understand that my parliamentary assistant has advised the house that we would be very happy to have the details of the bill referred to the banking and commerce committee where the maritime officials and others can appear and explain its provisions.

Mr. Drew: Before the minister came in the point that had been under discussion was the nature of this bill, not merely in so far as it applies to war risks as a principle, but also the principle of dealing with a measure of this kind by provision for such legislation by order in council. If it is clearly understood that the only principle that is accepted in giving this bill second reading is the principle of the adoption of a measure dealing with war risk insurance and that the form of the bill both in regard to the actual wording and the method by which it is to be put into effect—that is by order in council or a more complete statutory provision—remains open, there would be no objection to giving it second reading.

Mr. Abbott: The principle of the bill is that we are setting up machinery for war risk insurance. As to how wide the terms are, that is a matter for the banking and commerce committee to consider and make recommendations upon. I should think they would be quite free to do so.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the light of the statement by the minister I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the amendment be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Amendment withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 279, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

He said: Perhaps I should make a brief statement with respect to this bill; and before explaining in detail the specific purposes of the bill perhaps it would be helpful if I were first to say a word about the industrial development bank itself and the record of its operations to date.

The house will recall that this bank was established under the authority of the Industrial Development Bank Act, which was passed on August 15, 1944. Section 34 of that act provided for its coming into force by proclamation, and the section empowering the bank to make loans and investments was not proclaimed in force until November 1, 1944. The bank has therefore been operating for a little over seven years.

The purpose parliament had in mind in setting up the bank was to fill what was believed to be a gap in the Canadian financial system. As everyone knows we have a highly efficient banking system, but it is designed primarily to supply short-term commercial credit rather than credit for a long or even intermediate term. Furthermore, while it is possible for many industrial enterprises to obtain intermediate or long-term credit from other types of financial institutions, such as insurance companies or by floating bond or stock issues in the public market, there are other enterprises which because of their small size or because they have not a long record of satisfactory earnings or are not well known find it difficult and unduly expensive if not quite impossible to tap these sources of capital funds.

It was therefore to help fill this gap and make it possible particularly for small and moderate-sized enterprises to obtain funds needed to get under way or to finance expansion, that the bank was set up. To provide it with efficient management, it was established as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. It was given an authorized capital of $25 million to be subscribed by the Bank of Canada, and was also given the power to raise further funds up to three times the amount of its capital and reserve by the sale of bonds or debentures either to the Bank of Canada or otherwise.

Its president is the governor of the Bank of Canada, and it has a board of directors and an executive committee of the same membership as the board of directors and executive committee of the Bank of Canada. Its general manager is Mr. S. R. Noble, a former assistant general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada, and a man of long experience in the commercial banking field.

Under the act the bank is given power to extend financial assistance, in the form of loan or guarantee or purchase of stock, bonds or debentures, etc., to persons engaged in, or about to engage in, industrial enterprises in Canada: (1) if, in the opinion of the bank, the amount of capital invested or to be invested by the owners is such as to afford the bank reasonable protection; and (2) if, in the opinion of the bank, the credit would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions. An industrial enterprise is defined to mean a business in which the manufacture, processing or refrigeration of goods, wares and merchandise or the building, alteration or repair of ships or vessels or the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on.

There were some in 1944 who were sceptical of the need of such an institution and doubtful whether it would serve any useful purpose. There were others who were worried about the dangers of a state institution of this type making unsound loans and incurring heavy losses. It was realized, of course, that the type of lending activity which was envisaged would necessarily be attended with something more than the normal commercial measure of risk, but it was believed that it would be possible to maintain the bank on a self-supporting basis.

What has been the record during these past few years? Personally I think it is a record in which we have every reason to take pride. That record has, in my opinion, demonstrated the need for such an institution and has shown that the bank has been able to perform a very important public function and conduct itself on a self-supporting basis. There are, no doubt, questions of detail which may better be answered in committee, but perhaps I may illustrate the general conclusions I have just stated by reference to a few statistical facts.

Since the start of its operations and up to March 31, 1952, the bank has authorized 995 loans, investments or guarantees for a total amount of $75,322,971. As at March 31, last, there were 569 current authorizations for a net amount of $41,160,509. Total disbursements on loans and investments at March 31 amounted to $55,062,206, of which there had been paid back something over $13 million, leaving approximately $32 million still outstanding.

Of the current authorizations at March 31, last, 18 were for amounts of $5,000 and under; 241 for amounts from $5,001 to $25,000; 111 for amounts from $25,001 to $50,000; 98 for amounts from $50,001 to $100,000; 60 for amounts from $100,001 to $200,000, and 41 for amounts in excess of $200,000.

With the consent of the house, I would like to place on Hansard some tables giving the facts I have just summarized in somewhat greater detail and also giving a classification of loans, investments and guarantees by provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have consent to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

A great deal of additional information is given in the annual reports of the bank, which are made available to members of the house and which give full information in regard to losses experienced. I would call the attention of hon. members to the annual financial statements of the bank contained in these annual reports, and particularly to the statements of profit and loss. The last annual statement, for the year ending September 30, 1951 for instance, shows a balance of income after expenses for that year transferred to reserve fund amounting to $663,333, a total reserve for losses at the end of the year of $400,000, and a total reserve fund of $2,081,273. I might add that the bank in its operations has received excellent co-operation from the chartered banks.

I come now to the specific purposes of the present bill. The first purpose of the new bill is to give the industrial development bank authority to make loans or otherwise extend financial assistance to commercial air services operating in Canada in the same manner and subject to all the other conditions under which the bank now assists industrial enterprises. Apart from Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines, there are nearly 100 air transport companies using multi-engine planes or, at least, large single engine planes, in the operation of regular air line service in Canada. These companies provide a useful and in most cases essential commercial service in the transportation of persons and cargo in areas where other methods of transportation are either very slow or non-existent. After world war II the number and scope of operation of these companies expanded greatly. The companies were assisted in this expansion by being able to purchase a large number of war surplus aircraft at relatively low prices. For the first few years they were engaged in establishing their bases and ground facilities, inaugurating services and working up business in new territories.

The air transport board now reports that the need of these companies to replace old equipment and augment their holdings of first class modern aircraft has today become quite urgent, that substantial cash resources are required for this purpose, and that efforts to obtain such financing from banks, insurance companies and other private investors have in general proved fruitless. It is clearly in the national interest that companies which have been providing efficient services of the type I have mentioned should be able to continue operating their services with safe, high grade, up-to-date aircraft and engines. We are therefore seeking authority in the first amendment to this bill to enable the industrial development bank to provide long term or medium term credit which is not readily available from other sources.

Turning to the second purpose of the bill, I might remind the house that when the bill was first introduced in 1944 it contained no provision limiting the size of loans or the number of loans of any particular magnitude which the bank might make, though of course there was a provision limiting the aggregate liabilities of the bank to three times the aggregate amount of the paid-up capital and reserve fund. However, because of the fear of some members that on this basis the bank might have insufficient resources to make all the small loans that should be made, the bill was amended in the course of its progress through the house to include a provision limiting to $15 million the aggregate financial assistance that could be extended to borrowers in individual amounts exceeding $200,000. At the second session of parliament in 1949, after the need had become apparent, the limitation on such loans was increased from $15 million to $25 million. The bank has once more practically reached the new limit, the net outstanding authorizations in accounts over $200,000 being approximately $22 million. Authorizations for amounts under $200,000 total approximately $19 million. The number of accounts in this latter category is 528 compared with 41 in amounts over $200,000.

Having in mind that the potential lending authority of the bank is approximately $100 million, it seems clear that the amounts available for small borrowers will be ample to supply the demand for the foreseeable future, even if there is a substantial increase in the lending limit for accounts in excess of $200,000. The high level of natural resources development which has been under way for some years, and the financing of industries highly essential to the defence program, have both played their part in the increase in the bank's loans in individual amounts exceeding $200,000, and for the future there will be the probable necessity, as a result of the first amendment I have just outlined, of making some additional loans in this category to finance commercial air services. I believe it would be unfortunate if as a result of having reached its $25 million limit the bank found it impossible to give needed assistance to worthy Canadian industrial enterprises seeking intermediate or long term capital funds in this dynamic period of Canada's economic development. It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that we are introducing a bill to provide for the two amendments to which I have referred.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say at this stage. There may be some questions we shall want to ask later. I think the minister is quite justified in saying that the bank has filled a need, and consequently I judge by the record that it has been prudently operated. I have no doubt the management of the bank, judging by the amount they set aside for reserves, have been reminding themselves they have been operating all these years in a boom, and that booms do not go on forever. I am not saying that in any sense of criticism of the management of the bank; it is rather to endorse it. So far as I am concerned, I think that the other questions I have can wait until we are in the committee, so I leave it at that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Limitation on commitments exceeding $200,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are one or two questions of detail I should like to ask the minister. What is the staff of the bank, how many officers are there and how many loans were actually made last year?

Mr. Abbott: I think most of the information is in the annual report if the hon. member will give me a moment to find it. There is a great deal of detail in the annual report which the hon. member may not have had an opportunity of looking at. There is a breakdown giving the loans year by year. I do not know that I have information on the number of employees in the bank. I do not think that information is in the report.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My reason for asking the question was that the information was not in the report.

Mr. Abbott: The table which I put on Hansard today shows a breakdown of current authorizations as at March 31, 1952, and they were as follows:

Amount of Loan	Number
$5,000 and under	18
$5,001 to $25,000	241
$25,001 to $50,000	111
$50,001 to $100,000	98
$100,001 to $200,000	60
Over $200,000	41

These loans total $49 million, as is shown on the table. I shall have to get the data as to how many of those were authorized during the current fiscal year, but of course that information is readily available.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would not like to delay matters for that.

Mr. Abbott: The table which I prepared and placed on Hansard I thought would give a great deal of the detailed information which the members of the house might want. Anything it does not contain, I shall be glad to get.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One notes how little in percentage or in numbers of the loans went to comparatively large borrowers. That is to say, from the point of view of the operation of a bank $200,000 is not a very large loan, but I wonder if the minister could say what the management has found with regard to the small loans as against the large loans. I take it from the words "industrial development" they are all business loans, even the smallest of them, which were given to various types of businesses. Can anything be said, and is there anything to be gathered from it, as to the assistance this actually is to small businesses? The minister may reply that, relatively, it is all small inasmuch as even $200,000 is not a big loan as business goes, but I would ask the minister if there is any information available concerning just how far it is being made use of by the really small businesses. The number of loans to small people is perhaps not as large as one might have expected.

While I am on my feet I might digress for a moment to speak about the decision to make loans available to air enterprises, the reasons for which I can understand and which I applaud. The management may find that it is easier to make losses there than it has been in other cases. To come back to my first question, can the minister say anything as to the performance of the bank and the results they have found in the really small cases, by which I mean under $25,000 or a good deal less than that?

Mr. Abbott: I have no detailed breakdown. From discussions with the chairman of the bank I know that the experience of the bank over the last seven years has been exceptionally good. Of course, as my hon. friend pointed out, the bank has been operating in relatively prosperous times. Naturally with several hundred smaller loans the losses in numbers there have been greater than they have in the somewhat larger loans. But so far no serious losses have been sustained by the bank.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister what interpretation is put on the words "commercial air service"? Does it include every form of air service that is for hire, whether it be passengers, freight, express or mail? Is every form included? For instance, is this broad enough to include Trans-Canada Air Lines or Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Mr. Abbott: It would be broad enough to cover those, but of course it is not contemplated to make advances to those concerns. This is the language which was recommended by the air transport board from whom the first suggestion came that it might be desirable to look at the Industrial Development Bank Act to see whether financial assistance might be made available or whether loans might be made available through that bank to meet this real need of the smaller commercial cargo and passenger transport lines. The larger lines have no difficulty in arranging their financial requirements. In the case of Trans-Canada Air Lines they do not need to go to the industrial development bank.

Mr. Fleming: They come here.

Mr. Abbott: They finance as in the case of the Canadian National Railways under the bill we shall be considering a little bit later. But the situation is difficult for small commercial air lines, and this is to meet that need. The loans here will have to meet the test of being business loans, but it is to cover a field in which at present loans are not available from other sources.

Mr. Fleming: It represents something of a new departure, as I understand it. Hitherto when the industrial development bank has been making loans and taking security, in practically every case it has been on the security of real estate plus equipment. In the case of loans now made enabling a commercial air service to purchase planes, it means taking a different type of security. In view of this experience will there be any real estate to take a mortgage on? It will be equipment and a chattel mortgage in practically every case.

Mr. Abbott: It may take some form of bond issue or debenture, on the security of the planes, which would be covered by insurance of course. That would be the usual requirement there.

Mr. Fleming: My other question relates to a later subsection as much as to this one. In the proposed increase from $25 million to $50 million proposed in subsection 2 of section 15 of the act, how much of that sum is it expected or estimated will now be required for the purpose of making loans to cover air services and how much to enterprises within the scope of the act?

Mr. Abbott: So far as I am aware, Mr. Chairman, no estimate has been made as to what would be required for any particular type of enterprise. But as I indicated in my statement, we are so near the limit—authorizations are now close to $22 million—that it is quite clear that if two or three desirable loans came along it might develop that it would be impossible to make those loans without the amendment which is proposed here. But so far as I am aware no attempt has been made to estimate how much should be in ordinary industrial enterprises and how much in loans to commercial aircraft companies.

Mr. Fleming: How did the government arrive at the figure of $50 million in shaping this amendment?

Mr. Abbott: The government did not arrive at it at all. That was suggested by the banking and commerce committee when the bill was first before it in 1944. As I pointed out, originally there was no limitation. Then in the banking and commerce committee, when the present bill was under discussion, there was some suggestion that if no limit was placed on the amount, having regard to the original purpose of the bill to cover cases of small, limited-size enterprises, there might not be enough money for them. Therefore a limitation was put in. In the event it has been proved, of course, that there has been ample.

Mr. Fleming: That is the $25 million.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: It was $15 million first. Then it was increased in 1949 to $25 million. Now the suggestion is that it be increased to $50 million.

Mr. Fleming: I wondered how you happened to arrive at $50 million.

Mr. Abbott: I can say frankly that it seemed to me that was all we probably should need; at least, it is all we could possibly contemplate in the immediate future. We increased it from $15 million to $25 million two or three years ago; and we are now up to the limit. It seemed to me that it would be just as well to increase it to $50 million because it is quite clear that there is no real prospect of a shortage of funds available for the small and medium sized loans.

Mr. Low: That will only go about as far as the $25 million anyway.

Mr. Abbott: No comment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister give any indication as to what is contemplated with regard to raising whatever extra money is necessary? My recollection is that liabilities now are practically all in the form of capital stock. Is that correct? There is a small amount of debentures.

Mr. Abbott: Capital stock and loans from the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is proposed as the means for raising further money? Will there be any disposition to spread it out by issuing debentures and getting it from the public?

Mr. Abbott: Under the terms of the bank charter it is certainly possible to do that; but up to the present time it has not been considered advisable to do it. There is no reason why it could not be done. The moneys have been available from the parent company, that is the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Like the hon. member for Greenwood I was interested in hearing from the minister how the bank was serving smaller industries and smaller businesses. I rose particularly to ask this question. If I heard the minister correctly, I think he said the purpose of the bank was to provide funds for industry and commerce and things of that type that normally might not be able to get that type of credit from the private banks.

Mr. Abbott: Not from the private banks; from private financial institutions generally.

Mr. Herridge: From private financial institutions generally. The question I wanted to ask is this. Is it the policy of the bank to make to any industry, for the purpose of expanding plant, loans from the funds of the bank if the industry is already borrowing money from private banks?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, yes. It is normal practice for borrowers who borrow from the industrial development bank to have obtained their ordinary commercial current banking requirements from the commercial banks. The type of loan which the industrial development bank makes is the medium or long term loan, a loan say for five, ten or even fifteen years. The loans which the ordinary commercial enterprises get from the commercial banks are loans which in the ordinary course would be paid off within six months or a year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I suppose it is asking the minister to venture into the realm of prophecy to ask how much new money they will need; but I am coming back to the question I asked a moment ago. I take it that at a certain point, as to the raising of new money, if it is taken even from the Bank of Canada, indirectly in the end, it comes back from the taxpayer. While that raises other questions that I am not going into now, I should be interested to know whether the minister would see any objection in principle to the bank availing itself of the opportunity of getting a considerable amount of money by borrowing. I should be interested to know whether the minister sees any objection in principle to that procedure. In the case of the ordinary commercial bank I think there would be objection. I would not think it was a sound thing for a commercial bank to get money which it borrowed in that way. I would think it ought to have capital at risk. But with a bank of this nature it does not seem to me that point arises. My point is this. Does the minister see any objection in principle to the bank availing itself much more liberally than it has of the right to issue debentures, because I think there is about a million out.

Mr. Abbott: Personally I see no objection to the principle at all. I think it would be a question of business judgment. If the management of the bank believed they could borrow this money; if the Bank of Canada was willing to lend that money to its subsidiary at a certain rate—I will not mention the rate—and if it were going to cost them 1½ per cent or 2 per cent more to get it from the public, the management of the bank might well feel that they should borrow at a lower rate. But directly answering my hon. friend's question, I would see no objection in principle whatsoever. In fact it might even be desirable in certain circumstances.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That raises this question. Is there any information available as to the rate the bank does charge? Is it a flat rate, or does it vary more or less with the rates of the commercial banks, or does it not?

Mr. Abbott: The interest rates would be related to going commercial rates. The rates, for obvious reasons, are slightly higher in the case of the smaller loans because of the expense of servicing them, and they are slightly lower in the case of the larger loans. I do not know that I have available, or whether it would be proper to indicate, the exact rates that are being charged.

Mr. Low: And the general type of security?

Mr. Abbott: And the general type of security.

Mr. Laing: As a British Columbian I want to congratulate the minister on introducing this amendment to the Industrial Development Bank Act. We in British Columbia think this is a most important amendment, having to do with commercial air services. We are particularly interested in this aspect for this reason. We have quite a number of commercial air firms in the province of British Columbia whose experience has been identical with that mentioned by the minister based on the report from the air transport board. They came into the picture after the war. Some of them were organized by young men who had returned from overseas. They bought up surplus planes. They have given an excellent and an expanding service in the province of British Columbia, and are doing so at the present time. They are vital to the many great undertakings along our coast both from the point of view of air freight and the transport of workmen to various points along the coast. They now find that their equipment is wearing out and they are in a difficult financial position because of the fact, as the minister has explained, that they find it difficult to obtain financial assistance from the ordinary sources.

This is a most important amendment that the minister has suggested. It will be of great benefit to us in the province of British Columbia. I see the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) in his seat. I know he will agree with me, and I should like him to say a word, if he feels like it, because this is most important for us in British Columbia where these firms have done a magnificent job.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Abbott: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Speaker: I have already expressed my opinion on the right of the hon. member to say "by leave".

Mr. Knowles: It is correct to say that Your Honour expressed an opinion on it. But you did not rule on the point, did you, sir?

Mr. Speaker: I have expressed my opinion; that is all that I said.

Mr. Knowles: I will reserve my speech until you do reach the point of making a ruling.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, June 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the first thing I want to say in continuing the discussion of section 1 of this bill is by way of congratulation to the sponsor. According to page 18 of today's order paper it would appear that the sponsor of this bill is in perhaps a unique position in the history of private bills in this house. Not only is his bill the first on the order paper; it is the only item appearing there. I have tried for many years to have bills or resolutions in which I was interested come to the top of the list, and I think on only one occasion a resolution of mine came up for discussion; and although it may have been at the top of the list, it was not the only one on the list. I think the hon. member for Kindersley deserves our hearty congratulations upon having arrived in this unique position.

When I spoke on Friday night on this clause I was discussing some of the reasons some of us are opposed to this bill and feel that the group of gentlemen seeking incorporation for the purpose of transporting gas from Alberta to Winnipeg and thence south into the United States should not be granted a charter. The main reason I think a charter should not be granted is that if a charter is granted and the company incorporated and gas exported in the manner indicated, it is a certainty that Alberta natural gas will never reach Ontario and Quebec.

I think there are other reasons which should occur to all hon. members of this committee why this charter should not be granted at the present time. These reasons emerge from the latest decision of the board of transport commissioners with respect to an application by another company, Westcoast Transmission Limited. Your Honour is probably as familiar as I or any other member with the reasons for the decision given by the board in that case. It will be remembered that the board said that although they favoured the application of Westcoast Transmission Limited over the application of any other company seeking to export Alberta gas to British Columbia and the Pacific northwest, nevertheless they felt that before they could give approval to the application—in case you are uneasy, Mr. Chairman, that this is sub judice, may I say that the board has handed down its decision—they felt it was necessary to conduct an independent inquiry into the question of the gas reserves available in Alberta.

The Chairman: If I am uneasy about anything it is about the fact that the last time the hon. member spoke for 38 minutes, and he has spoken tonight for more than 2 minutes.

Mr. Fulton: Your Honour is keeping better track of my time than I am, and I shall conclude my remarks immediately by saying that if the board of transport commissioners felt that before they could give final approval to an application to export gas they should reserve their decision because there was a question as to whether there were sufficient gas reserves to export to the Pacific northwest, then there must surely be the same question with respect to an application to export gas to the east.

Another main reason hon. members, particularly those from western Canada, should be opposed to this application is the fact that the Financial Post of June 14, published in Toronto—I know this will interest the hon. member for Fraser Valley—contains an editorial condemning the efforts of those who are opposed to this application. We in western Canada have always said that if the Financial Post was opposed to anything, that was a good thing to favour. If the Financial Post is opposed to the efforts of those of us who seek to prevent this company getting a charter I am reinforced, if I needed any reinforcement, in my decision to continue the present course which is unalterably in opposition to the application presently before the committee.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, on a previous occasion you stated that this bill had been under consideration in the committee for about eight hours, and I imagine at least another hour has been added since then. It is an important measure, being one of a series of applications that have been made to the house during the past three years dealing with a natural product of the province of Alberta which is likely to bring that province great prosperity.

Hon. members may wonder why I am interested, coming as I do from a province where we cannot expect ever to have a pipe line. Unless they invent some new way of transporting natural gas we shall never have any of it down there from Alberta. But we believe that what is going to make Alberta prosperous is going to make the rest of the country prosperous, and we hope to benefit indirectly. Everyone in the house and in the country is interested in seeing that the best possible solution is found for the transportation of natural gas from the locations where it may be discovered.

This bill was first introduced in the other place; it came to this house about March 13 and was then sent to the committee. I happened to be a member of the committee that dealt with that subject, but I was able to attend only one meeting. On account of the Easter vacation and not getting back in time I was not able to attend the other two meetings which were held immediately after the recess.

The bill before us is brought in by a firm of solicitors representing five gentlemen from the city of Regina, three solicitors and two businessmen, who are seeking incorporation by means of a statute. In other words they are looking for concessions from the government which are not available to ordinary persons without the sanction of parliament. They are desirous of getting authority to transport natural gas from the province of Alberta to the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan at the present time, and if other resources are discovered in the adjoining province of Saskatchewan they want the authority to transport the gas from there to the United States. Their intention was disclosed at the first meeting of the committee I attended, when it was stated that they wished to have authority to transport gas or oil through the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and outside Canada.

At this point I should like to draw attention to a statement by the hon. member for Springfield the other evening, when he praised the hon. member for Fort William for introducing an amendment in the committee which he thought would preserve the natural gas for Canada. The amendment, as read by the hon. member for Springfield, is as follows:

> That paragraph (a) of clause 6 be amended by inserting after the word "lines" in line 23 thereof the words: Provided that the main pipe line or lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil shall be located entirely within Canada.

The hon. member for Springfield approved of this amendment, which was debated at some length in the standing committee and which has no merit whatsoever because the main line must be in Canada even if the gas is going to be sold across the border in the United States. It was practically admitted in the committee by the sponsor of the bill that the gas would be brought as far as Winnipeg and from there down to the United States border where a connection would be made with the line of a United States company sponsored by the same people who are behind this legislation. Therefore I think the hon. member for Springfield was wrong in the praise he gave the hon. member for Fort William for introducing that amendment which in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of many members of the committee, has no effect so far as the route to be followed in the transportation of the gas is concerned.

The principal witness before the standing committee was a Mr. Herring of the Fish Engineering Corporation of Houston, Texas. This gentleman is undoubtedly a very clever engineer and was an excellent witness before the committee. He told us that his company was interested in building the line and that they had a lot of experience. Mr. Herring said, as found at page 12 of the report of the proceedings of the committee:

> We have been very active in the Alberta gas picture, both with this company and with the Prairie Company, as mentioned by Mr. Green—and may I pause to qualify our company one step further. We as a company have built three of the major gas pipe lines in the United States, including the transcontinental gas pipeline system from the Mexican border to New York City; the line from Texas to Chicago; and Mr. Fish, president of the company, built, as vice-president of the company, the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company, which is the largest operating company of its kind in the field today.

It seemed to me that this man was very experienced and well qualified to construct a line, and certainly knew a great deal more about the business than most members of the committee. But there was a gentleman who was a member of the committee, the hon. member for Calgary West, who showed his great knowledge in the examination of this witness. It was not surprising that the hon.

member for Calgary West and the witness from the Fish Engineering Corporation should get into a private discussion that eventually bored the rest of the members of the committee. I think the discussion became too technical for most hon. members, and eventually the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine suggested that enough evidence had been produced and that we should not have any more witnesses. As a result the committee then finished its work very promptly.

As hon. members know, this is only the first in a series of steps that may take years in order to obtain the right to transport gas from the province of Alberta. It might be worth while to draw attention to the peculiar fact that the principal resources of this country apart from wheat—and I suppose you might even say it of wheat—are located at considerable distances from the markets they are supposed to serve. Wheat has to be brought long distances to get to the best markets. The iron ore mines of Newfoundland and the new iron ore mines in the Ungava on the Quebec-Labrador boundary are both long distances from the markets where the product sells best. For many years Newfoundland sold its ore in Germany, Rotterdam and the United States, its nearest market being in the province of Nova Scotia.

Similarly, the coal fields of Nova Scotia and Alberta are long distances from the markets. Although the province of Alberta is certainly blessed by its discoveries of oil and gas the province is sparsely populated and the neighbouring provinces have no very large cities. Therefore it is necessary for companies to be formed with huge amounts of capital to transport gas and oil to places where they can be sold profitably. It costs enormous amounts of money to build pipe lines to transport gas or oil to the markets. After this bill has passed this house the company has to be formed, and in this respect it is worth noting that the sponsor—I do not mean the hon. member for Kindersley but Mr. Herring, I think it was, or Mr. MacTavish, the solicitor—stated in the committee that up to the present time they had only spent $25,000. In other words they have not really spent any money on exploration or anything of that kind. In fact Mr. Herring told us that it was not their function to engage in exploration. What they proposed to do was merely buy the gas from Pincher Creek or some other area where gas is plentiful, and then transport it. Therefore they had not spent very much money and would not proceed to spend money until they had secured a charter and could make a contract with somebody who had gas to sell.

After they have their company formed they then have to make application to the Alberta gas and petroleum conservation board. It may be a long time before that application could be heard, and it is very unlikely that it would be granted. In this respect I should like to draw the attention of members of the committee to the Financial Post of April 26 where an account is given of the application of the Westcoast Transmission Company for the right to export gas from the northern section of the province of Alberta and the Peace river district across the Rocky mountains to Vancouver and thence to the northwest part of the United States. That company has been incorporated for a couple of years, and it is only now that it has secured permission from the Alberta board. But that permission was not the final step, because they then had to make an application to the board of transport commissioners, and it was only yesterday morning that the judgment of the board of transport commissioners was published in the Ottawa Citizen. Judgment was given on Saturday, and it was stated that the board of transport commissioners gave conditional approval—mark that, "conditional approval"—to the Canadian section of a proposed $111,240,000 pipe line to carry the first natural gas into southern British Columbia and the United States Pacific northwest.

This report goes on to say:

> Final approval of the application by Westcoast Transmission Company Limited of Calgary depends on an independent check by the board of the adequacy of the company's available gas reserves in the Peace river areas of British Columbia and Alberta.

The board had under consideration three applications from other companies to build natural gas pipe lines in western Canada, but shelved the other two applications.

That was the experience of the Westcoast Transmission Company after getting permission from the Alberta government. They had to appear before the board of transport commissioners, and the board of transport commissioners gave them only conditional approval. It must be remembered that the Alberta government, though believing there is a great quantity of natural gas in the province, is still not willing to allow export except by Westcoast Transmission.

In his evidence Mr. Herring said he was only going to build a small pipe line. His evidence was to the effect that he would only build a small pipe line because he did not think the province of Alberta had sufficient reserves to justify a large line. The pipe line he proposed to build was a 16-inch line and a larger pipe line might be as big as 24 inches.

The reserves of natural gas in the province of Alberta have increased very considerably following the intensive search for gas and oil that has been going on during the past five or six years. The story of the discovery of oil and gas in Alberta is one of the most fascinating stories of industrial enterprise in the history of the world. It is only five or six years ago that this oil was discovered in the Leduc area. I see the hon. member for Fraser Valley is shaking his head. I do not know whether he is shaking his head at what I have said or—

Mr. Cruickshank: Pardon me; it was because of some foolish remark by one of my neighbours here.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If it was in reference to the statement I made, I might say I was aware of the earlier discoveries and the work that has taken place in the Turner valley section of southern Alberta.

Mr. Harkness: Still one of the major fields in Alberta.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, but nothing compared to the discovery in 1946 in the Leduc area.

Mr. Harkness: Oh, yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): However, the oil and gas companies in the United States and of course our own Imperial Oil Company became tremendously interested and have carried on intensive investigation and exploration ever since. It is certain that the grant of permission by the Alberta natural gas conservation board to the Westcoast Transmission Company to transport gas from the northern part of Alberta will bring about more intensive search up there, because that is the area which is said by the Alberta government to be best protected as far as reserves are concerned. Companies will probably carry on more work there than in other parts of the province.

Reserves three years ago were supposed to be 1½ trillion cubic feet. By now the figure has risen to 6·8 trillion cubic feet; yet the Alberta government does not feel satisfied that it has sufficient reserves in all parts of the province to provide for industrial development which they feel might outstrip discoveries of gas during the next thirty years. Mr. Herring of the Fish corporation stated that he did not think they would be justified in giving permission for a large pipe line to be brought to Ontario and Quebec if they only had the amount of reserves they said they had; but it seems to me that Mr. Herring in saying that was putting a spoke in the application of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, which has already been incorporated and which is prepared at an expenditure of $220 million to build a pipe line from the province of Alberta through the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, across the head of the lakes, down to Toronto, Montreal, and even Quebec.

The chief argument that has taken place in connection with this application seems to me to be based upon whether it is preferable to have that great company put in a large pipe line which would be sufficient to supply the needs of the central provinces where the great industrial centres are situated, or to give this applicant the right to transport gas to the two neighbouring provinces where there are no such great enterprises as now exist in Ontario and Quebec. I think the house will have to make up its mind which it prefers.

What other companies are interested in this transportation of gas? In addition to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines there is also Western Pipe Lines which, according to the April 26 edition of the Financial Post, would draw gas from Pincher Creek and other southern Alberta fields and pipe it eastward to Saskatchewan and Manitoba communities and then southward from Winnipeg to tie in with large indicated markets in northern Minnesota, which is the same idea that is contained in the bill before us.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is a subsidiary of Canadian Delhi Oil Limited, who are backed by Delhi Oil interests in Texas. They plan a $220 million pipe line from Alberta across the prairies. This proposition would use some 385 million cubic feet of gas daily. This would be the longest natural gas pipe line in the world, running more than 2,000 miles over an all-Canadian route. Canadian Delhi is busy proving up gas fields, and has had considerable success this summer. The line would likely take gas from Pakowki lake and/or Pincher Creek fields if there was a surplus, and from Princess and Cessford fields at the eastern edge of Alberta.

However, that company was refused permission to carry gas from Alberta because the government of the province did not consider there were sufficient reserves. Before the board of transport commissioners on Saturday the applications of these two companies I have just mentioned—Western Pipe Lines and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines—to carry gas eastward from the Pincher Creek field were adjourned indefinitely. The board indicated that the applications could be reopened if Alberta reversed a recent decision and permitted the companies to export gas from the province. The report went on to say that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines planned a pipe line to Ontario and Quebec. Western Pipe Lines proposed to pipe Alberta gas to Winnipeg, Minneapolis and St. Paul, which was an extension of what had been said earlier about bringing it into Minnesota only. Mr. Justice John D. Kearney, chief commissioner, said the board would hold up final approval of the Westcoast application until the board investigates whether gas reserves in the Peace river area are adequate. He noted that the board and the United States power commission have a "common concern" in the adequacy of reserves, and indicated that a co-operative survey could be made.

Westcoast Transmission is sponsored by Pacific Petroleums of Calgary, which has promised to supply half of its natural gas. The company has claimed that the Peace river gas fields, almost equally divided between British Columbia and Alberta, hold 2·2 trillion cubic feet of gas reserves with another trillion of probable reserve. This is supposed to allow for the demands of the market for over twenty years. It will be seen, therefore, that with this and other companies interested in obtaining permission to export gas, the gas will not be obtainable from Alberta, which has said "We have not sufficient reserves to permit any more gas to be exported. We will allow this gas to be exported from the northern part of our province because there is very little industry up there at the present time, and we feel there are sufficient reserves in that area to supply its needs for a long time to come. In the southern part of the province, however, we have not sufficient reserves; therefore we are not going to allow any export."

We have to consider as a committee, therefore, what is the purpose of granting this company the right to transport gas when there is little likelihood, according to these judgments, that the company will be able to obtain permission to transport the gas. On the other hand, it might be said, what harm is there in letting the company go ahead? A few years ago the politicians in Ottawa and Alberta would have been tumbling over each other if there was a company in sight looking for the right to develop, at its own expense, the natural resources of a province. We have reached such a stage in this country today, however, that we are very choosy about whom we want to develop our resources. We think this company is not in the best position to develop those resources. There are other companies in the field with prior rights, and they are in a position to do it. There is no need for this company.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether there should be any arbitrary limit put on the number of companies that might be allowed the right to export gas from the province. When you look at the reality of the situation, with the Alberta gas and petroleum conservation board being so particular about granting permits, is there any likelihood of that board giving this company permission when there have been two other companies in the field ahead of it who have made application?

There was another argument used in this debate, and I do not know whether or not I would be considered out of order in talking about it. It concerns the fact this company made no secret of its intention to transport gas outside of Canada. The other company, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, intends to follow an all-Canadian route from the province of Alberta about 2,000 miles across Canada. This company, therefore, should have preference over one whose avowed intention is to transport gas to the United States border and sell it in that country. One may look at that whichever way one likes, but there is no doubt from what we have heard here and in the committee that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are very anxious to get what natural gas they can. It has been said that an exchange could be arranged by having gas from Canada taken into the northwestern and central United States in exchange for gas which would come through Detroit or Buffalo into Quebec and Ontario. Some mention has been made of that possibility. Are we to say that this company should be favoured on that account?

It seems to me reasonable that if some exchange of that sort could be arranged it would be desirable, because we might save the tremendous expense of bringing gas such great distances across the country. This company, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, seems to be in a position to finance such a project once it obtains permission to get gas. I do not know how other hon. members feel, but it seems to me that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company offers the better proposition. While no great harm can be done by granting permission for the incorporation of this company, it hardly seems likely that such a company would receive consideration from the Alberta conservation board or from the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: I have gained the impression from the hon. member's remarks that he has the impression that the Alberta conservation board's action is more or less arbitrary. The board's concern is that no uneconomic development should take place. It would be a most unfortunate state of affairs if too many companies obtained the right to carry gas from Alberta, thereby destroying or impoverishing the supply so that all these companies would lose heavily.

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Blackmore: I am coming to it. It is not in the best interests of the companies themselves for too many companies to get permission to export gas. They would be depleting the source of supply, and eventually they would be losing money.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the hon. member permit a question? I am wondering what your question was.

Mr. Blackmore: I was leading up to the question. Is the hon. member aware that it might not be in the interests of the companies themselves, the province of Alberta or the country as a whole if too many companies obtain permission to export gas?

Mr. Stick: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception rises on a point of order.

Mr. Stick: May I ask who has the floor, because I cannot listen to two gentlemen at the one time?

The Chairman: I believe the hon. member for Lethbridge has asked his question.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I understand the hon. member for Lethbridge is asking me if I do not think the Alberta government is considering that it might not be in the interests of the province or the country to have too many applications granted. I do not know whether the hon. member is referring to applications to parliament or applications to the conservation board of Alberta?

Mr. Blackmore: The reference is to the Alberta conservation board. The hon. member has used the word "choosy". I think perhaps "choosy" was not fortunately chosen. "Choosy" would seem to indicate that the board was discriminating, but it is a question of using the resources which are available and not permitting any uneconomic developments until there is an assured supply.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Well, Mr. Chairman, I have read a good deal on this subject during the past week or so; I have followed the proceedings of the committee, and I am aware of the attitude of the Alberta government. It seems to me they are extremely cautious. Certainly the province is prosperous at the present time as a result of the tremendous flow of capital into it arising out of these discoveries and the subsidiary industries that have been established. They can afford, therefore, to pick and choose between applicants. I am not so sure that the province is considering to any great extent the interests of the particular corporations or companies that are making these applications. I am inclined to believe they are thinking only of the best interests of the province; and indirectly, I suppose that would be the best interests of the country. But certainly I do not suppose they are greatly concerned with the effect upon the fortunes of the company of any refusal they might give.

No; this is a business proposition. The people from the city of Regina who are making this application are lawyers and businessmen who are certainly well aware of the chances they are taking when they ask to have this company incorporated. In the present state of development of the oil and gas business in the province of Alberta, and the probability that it will spread to a considerable extent into the province of Saskatchewan, they feel they would be justified in forming this company. Personally I think they deserve a certain amount of credit. As I said before I am sure the House of Commons, a few years ago, would not have considered turning down a proposition such as this. But now that there are so many other companies in the field the house can be eclectic; that is the word I would use instead of "choosy".

(Translation):

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to speak at any length on the bill now before us. I am sure that hon. members, having heard that preliminary statement, will be glad to know that I intend to be brief.

However, it is fitting that some members from the eastern provinces should make known their views during the discussion on such a bill, because of the great problem which is at stake, namely, the way Canada may dispose of her natural resources.

I know very well, Mr. Chairman, that, in making these remarks, I stand very close to breaking the rule of the committee of the whole on what it is permitted or forbidden to say. For this reason, I wish to revert immediately to the subject matter of the bill.

In short, we have here a group of persons seeking to form a company to dispose of natural resources, in this case oil and gas. According to the request set out in the bill, the use of these resources would be restricted at least as far as Canada is concerned, to three provinces. It would seem, according to the wording of the bill that the surplus will be used outside Canada. That is exactly what we oppose. Of course in saying "we" I am possibly being a little too forward as far as expressing the opinion of the other Quebec members is concerned, but for my part I do submit that this should not be allowed.

Speaking of natural resources I must say that we from Quebec have been especially blessed by Providence in this regard. This is not said in a boastful way since we are obviously not responsible for this. We have mineral resources which have already been developed or which are in the process of so being since the last year or two especially. We possess immense forest resources. Our potential electric power is equal to more than half that of the whole country. We do know something about it.

The present Quebec government, as well as the preceding administrations, have always tried to put these resources to the best possible use. That is why we readily understand and are quite willing to admit that the other provinces, in the western part of Canada, also have immense natural resources which they have been developing to their advantage, particularly in the past five or six years.

We of the eastern provinces are very pleased to see the tremendous wealth lying in store under the earth of the three prairie provinces and we understand that they should be somewhat anxious to keep these tremendous riches first of all for themselves, which is quite normal. We know very well that the Alberta conservation board—to which reference was made a moment ago—is following the matter very closely and is making sure that these riches are not wasted or improperly developed. It sees to it in particular that they are developed first of all in the interests of its own province.

This board will obviously benefit from the experience gained elsewhere in the United States, for instance where monumental errors were committed in the disposal of natural resources.

As a matter of fact, a citizen of Alberta told me recently that development of natural gas must not be too intensive because in certain cases at least the gas exerts a certain underground pressure on the oil-sheets located nearby and in certains places, no system of pumping is necessary, precisely because of that pressure on the oil. I am told that this condition is nowhere to be found in the United States. Mechanical pumping systems have therefore been installed everywhere.

I understand the Alberta conservation board will endeavour to avoid the evils that might follow the passing of certain bills in this house.

Of course, that conservation board does all it possibly can to restrict the distribution of such assets to the province or even to the neighbouring provinces in order to attract new industries. That is perfectly normal, that is as it should be, because up to now the western provinces have not been as fortunate as the eastern provinces in that field and we must admit that they have the right to keep their assets for themselves with a view to attracting new industries.

I am even told that around Regina industries are being organized, and that some are even in operation, thanks to that natural gas. But the surplus which these provinces cannot use must be shipped somewhere else, and this is where we disagree with some hon. members both from the government benches and the opposition benches who have already taken part in this discussion.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) said Friday, among other things, as reported on page 3221 of Hansard:

> But surely, for the good of Canada, we cannot afford at this time to hold back industry in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Any attempt to conduct a filibuster on this bill would have the effect of creating a monopoly for other pipe line companies which have already been granted charters, and would thereby prevent the company now making application from competing. It would have the effect of eliminating from the field what might very well be a most competent company and one highly capable of carrying on this great enterprise, which would result in placing natural gas at the disposal of the people of Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Mr. Chairman, I find very little to criticize in that statement by the hon. member for Springfield, except to say that I do not think I am attempting to conduct a filibuster on this bill when I participate in this debate; on the contrary.

Furthermore, I would strongly oppose any attempt to prevent the provinces situated alongside Alberta from being the first to avail themselves of the tremendous advantages that these natural resources offer.

I feel that we, the people of Quebec, would act and indeed do act in exactly the same way. We endeavour to develop the resources at our disposal for our benefit and the benefit of our close neighbours. The same thing is happening in the west and I repeat that as far as the present bill is concerned I do not in the least intend to conduct a filibuster or to prevent the western provinces from being the first to take advantage of these immense resources.

It might seem strange that we of the province of Quebec who have inexhaustible waterpower resources at our disposal should ask the western provinces to supply us with natural gas, while it is being alleged in certain circles that electricity substitutes favourably for gas. It is true, I think, in a very great number of cases, but there necessarily exist certain sectors of our economy where gas is better than electricity.

We find proof of this in and around the city of Quebec, where there is such a large supply of electricity that some is left over, and where people nowadays use propane gas, imported from the United States.

As a passing remark, I would like to point out the case of a young man who used to live in my constituency. He is building today, near the town of Levis, a warehouse for storing propane gas, which is to be distributed in that district. It does seem to prove that in spite of our abundant waterpower resources, we sometimes find it more advantageous to use natural gas.

However, the natural gas that we use in the province of Quebec—I speak of Quebec because it is the region with which I am most familiar—is extremely expensive. I have been told that the owner of an average house, well built, well insulated, has spent, over a period of two years, between $250 and $300 to heat his house with propane gas. On the other hand, someone from Alberta recently told me that it was possible in that province to heat an ordinary home for something like $75, $80 or $90 a year. That means a tremendous difference.

Of course, I understand that the transportation of natural gas from the west to the eastern provinces would considerably increase the cost of that gas, but I doubt that this could increase it to the point where it would cost something like $300 to heat a home in our part of the country, whereas it only costs $80 to $90 in Alberta.

It may have slipped our minds that in the United States there are something like 315,000 miles of pipe line, of distribution lines, which supply about 20 per cent of all the heating fuel in the United States. This means that considered solely for heating purposes, gas is an extremely important asset. Consequently, I believe it is our duty to be careful, and very wary, when the question arises of passing legislation under which the eastern provinces may or may not benefit from this enormous wealth, which the western provinces are now enjoying.

I hope I would not be out of order in quoting a very brief excerpt from Le Soleil, of Quebec, dated June 12, 1952. It is an editorial which approves categorically, emphatically, if I may use that word, the position taken in this house by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) on this very matter. At the end of the editorial, we find the following:

> The government will undoubtedly step in before it is too late and expound clearly a national policy regarding the use of Alberta's gas, which is an essential source of energy to the industrial development of Canada at large.

In concluding, I again wish to assert clearly my position on this matter. I repeat that I have no intention of blocking or of killing this bill. On the contrary, I would like to see many members from the east express their views, so that we may know what they think of the problem we are now considering.

As far as I am concerned, I wanted to assert my position, because I think that we have here a vital problem, the solution of which could bear on the settlement of very difficult conditions.

I say once again that the western provinces are now developing immense natural resources and we from the east hope that these resources will be developed wisely. Without wishing to side with any government or political group, I am of the opinion that the province of Alberta is now privileged in having a sound administration and in enjoying a measure of very intelligent protection regarding the utilization of these immense natural resources. It seems to me, however, that we should not authorize any measure likely to deprive the east of these immense resources, and, on the same basis, it seems to me that the eastern provinces, which are also blessed with considerable natural resources, should, as far as possible, make these resources available to the western provinces before exporting them or authorizing our neighbours to make use of them to the prejudice of our people.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume its business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORIZATION TO MAKE CAPITAL EXPENDITURES IN 1952

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1952 not exceeding $154,755,280 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1953; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of securities, not including any securities issued to secure temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance, outstanding at any time shall not exceed $202,405,280; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $202,405,280 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the parliamentary assistant going to make a statement?

Mr. Sinclair: In view of the debate last night I do not know whether I would be in order to make my statement now or in committee. I am in the hands of the house.

Mr. McLure: It is all right any time.

Mr. Sinclair: We will have it in committee, in that case.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, this is the annual resolution which paves the way for the introduction of the Canadian National financing bill. Perhaps I could make a short statement and then be ready to answer questions. The bill to be founded on this resolution is divided into four specific parts. The first part is similar to that of previous years and is to authorize Canadian National Railways to incur capital expenditures up to $154,755,280. The second part is to authorize the railway company to acquire additional working capital in an amount not exceeding $15 million. Provision was made last year for additional working capital of $20 million. The third part authorizes the railway company to make capital expenditures prior to July 1, 1953, to discharge obligations incurred under this act which become due and payable after January 1, 1953. That is to take care of the six months lapse between the end of their calendar year and July 1.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is there any specific amount?

Mr. Sinclair: No. I am putting a table on Hansard. Those are the capital expenditures authorized by this bill but which do not become due until after the calendar year ends. We cannot say what the amount is, but the total amount will be within the $50 million I have specified. While this section is new it does not involve any new principle, as the law officers of the crown have ruled that the authority contained in the annual financing and guarantee acts does not expire at the end of the calendar year. It was felt that it would be more desirable to disclose this to parliament by specifically referring to it.

The last part provides for the railway company to enter into contracts for new equipment in the amount of $123,130,710. This provision was first introduced last year when the company was authorized to place orders for $111,512,920. It will be noted that none of this equipment is expected to be delivered in 1952.

To summarize, parliament is being asked to approve financing either by way of direct loan from the government or by way of the issue of securities guaranteed by the government in the amount of $202,405,280. For the convenience of hon. members who will want to study this before second reading I have a table here which perhaps the committee will agree should be placed on Hansard. It is not too long, but perhaps it is too long to read.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The table follows:

Additions and betterments (excluding new equipment)—
Ordered prior to 1952 (re-vote)	$23,014,271
Ordered and to be paid in 1952	27,363,257
		$ 50,377,528
Branch line construction Sherridon-Lynn Lake		7,800,000
New equipment—
Ordered prior to 1952	$93,647,760
Ordered and to be paid in 1952	2,413,092
		96,060,852
Acquisition of securities		516,900
Acquisition of additional working capital		15,000,000
Payment for equipment ordered but delivered in period January 1 to July 1, 1953		50,000,000
Total		$219,755,280
Less amounts available from depreciation reserves and debt discount amortization		17,350,000

It will be noted from the above that we are including in this legislation amounts that were authorized by previous financing and guarantee acts. In other words the legislation to be founded on this resolution will be the sole authority for the financing of the railway company up to July 1, 1953. This is an interesting point because last year in the meetings of the committee on railways, canals and shipping owned and operated by the government the chairman, the hon. member for Halton, suggested that it would be desirable to have all commitment authority in one bill rather than to have outstanding commitments from earlier bills. During the debate last year the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out the difficulty which arises when we attempt to apply parliamentary control to an ordinary commercial company whose operations are continuous. This suggestion has been incorporated in the bill and all commitment authority will be covered by this bill. The earlier commitment authorities authorized by the bills of last year and 1949 are now included in this bill and from now on the total commitment authority will be in the bill of the year.

The usual authority is provided for the making of temporary loans to the railway company and Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet operating deficits up to June 30, 1953. While the capital revision act of this year contemplates that the railway will not have any deficits in the future, it sometimes happens in the early months of the calendar year that deficits do occur. In the case of an ordinary commercial company it would finance these by bank loans; in this case we are prepared to extend these temporary advances as we have in the past.

Loans by the government to the railway company made under previous financing and guarantee acts were outstanding at May 31, as follows:

1949 Act	1,656,463.45
1950 Act	6,911,989.10
1951 Act	66,333,939.82
1951 Act (No. 2)	21,448,924.37
	$102,237,883.07

Advances under the first three of these acts and part of the fourth will be converted either into preferred stock or the $100 million twenty-year obligation referred to in the capital revision act. The budget of the national company has already been referred to the committee on government-owned railways and has been scrutinized by that committee. I am happy to have with me my colleague the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport, who is on that committee and who can answer much better than I questions of detail as far as the real use of these sums is concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In view of the statement which has been tabled, perhaps the detailed figures can be gone into more adequately when we have had time to study it. I understand that it is proposed to try to make each year more or less self-contained.

Mr. Sinclair: The bill for each year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is rather a qualification of that, that while you are cutting off what is behind you are also stepping forward into the coming year. That is to say, you are making certain provisions to carry you into the first six months of 1953. I am not going to comment further until I see the figures. There is one figure, however, which if I have it right, puzzles me. I understood the parliamentary assistant to give a figure of $154 million as capital expenditures.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And additional working capital, $15 million.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And then for equipment, part running into the next year, $123 million.

Mr. Sinclair: All of it to be paid ahead.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That gives a total of $292 million, which of course is much bigger than $202 million. I take it that that carries it into 1953.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a commitment authority.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We may have more to say about that when we have seen the figures. What is the policy with regard to equipment? There was a time when bonds were sold to provide a great deal of the money required for equipment. My recollection is that when the matter was up a year ago it was stated that some was to be raised that way and some by straight assistance by the government.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a matter of market conditions. If the market will handle equipment trust bonds, then the money is raised that way. Otherwise it is obtained from the government. When the bill is before the house I shall have a statement on the financing of equipment for you.

Mr. Knowles: I take it from what has been said that the policy from here on will be that there will be no left-over commitments from previous bills that are not included in the current bill.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Benidickson: This year; and other bills will have what we ordinarily would call a revote.

Mr. Knowles: It is getting to be like some items we have in the estimates both in terms of revotes and in terms of advance commitments. Perhaps that leads to another question that I had intended to put with reference to the provision for contracts in the first six months of 1953. With respect to that may I point out that from the way it now reads apparently we are covering eighteen months in this bill. Will it always be an eighteen months provision or once we have made this transition will it be twelve months?

Mr. Sinclair: That arises because of the fact that the railway operates on a calendar year and the financing bill passed by parliament usually does not come up until May or June, so there is a lag of four or five months in which there are no financing powers. Therefore there is authority in the bill for a six months period so that equipment which has been ordered, the contracts for which have been entered into during the fiscal year and on which payment does not come until after the beginning of the next year, will be covered. That will take us up to July 1 this year, by which time I hope the bill will be through. That of course does not apply to this year but next year the same situation will occur, and in the bill there is a limit put on how much they can carry forward. A top limit of $50 million is put on the carry-over of contracts that have been entered into in the calendar year but as to which demand for payment was made after the end of the calendar year.

Mr. Knowles: That provision will be included in the bill?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In other words it is comparable to the commitment authority that appears in certain estimates. I should also like to ask the parliamentary assistant for a further word by way of explaining the relationship between this measure and the bill that was before us a short while ago with respect to the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways. Will there continue to be bills of this kind in future years even after the other act comes into full operation?

Mr. Sinclair: I would expect so because as the railway expands it is going to need more capital, and parliament is the source of capital for the national company.

Mr. Knowles: By way of loans.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, loans. One thing we hope will disappear is the temporary advances we make to cover operating deficits during the course of the year. If at the end of the year they have a deficit then that is of course included in the financing bill for the next year, but if the capital revision places the railway on a basis where it is unlikely to have continuing deficits then this part will at least be greatly lowered if not eliminated.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: That is the point I was hoping the parliamentary assistant would deal with. We dared to believe that the other bill would make it possible for the C.N.R. no longer to have deficits arising from its top-heavy and unfair capital structure. If that is the case the providing of money to meet those deficits should no longer be necessary.

Mr. Sinclair: That of course is the statement made by the Minister of Transport. As far as I am concerned, provision is made here for the advance of moneys to the company for temporary deficits in the same way a commercial company would turn to the banks for temporary advances.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think it was made quite clear that this measure would still be a necessity even after the adjustment in capitalization because, as we will see when we come to the other bill, it did not go far enough to cover all the need for capital adjustment. Without going into details now, when the bill comes forward and we are examining these figures further I wish the parliamentary assistant would have regard to the statements made on pages 128 and 129 of the committee evidence. Perhaps my question follows somewhat along the line of that asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The committee that studied the recapitalization bill was given what it is true is only an estimate of what might be required by way of additional authorization for capital expenditure. I confess these figures are somewhat higher than I had hoped, and when the bill is before us I think we should be prepared to scrutinize them closely and try to relate them first of all to what was said in the committee last April; and second, to what was said to the other committee a couple of weeks ago.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1952, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TAX AGREEMENTS

COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES IN LIEU OF CERTAIN TAXES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to authorize (a) the Minister of Finance, on behalf of the government of Canada, to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces to provide inter alia, subject to terms and conditions to be agreed upon, that in consideration of the said governments agreeing not to levy income tax, corporation income tax, corporation tax or succession duties for a period of five years or any lesser period the government of Canada will pay compensation to the said government; and (b) the Minister of Finance to pay to the government of each province one-half of the income tax collected from corporations whose main business is the distribution to or generation for distribution to the public, of electrical energy, gas or steam in respect of income of the corporations derived from the said distribution or generation in that province during the period commencing on January 1, 1952, and ending on December 31, 1956.

Mr. Fraser: Is the minister making a statement?

Mr. Abbott: I have a very brief statement. I thought I might make it in committee.

Mr. Knowles: Without prejudice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Without prejudice.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, the bill to be based on this resolution seeks authority to authorize the governor in council to enter into tax rental agreements with those provinces which may wish to participate in such agreements. At a later stage I would expect to make a more detailed explanation of the provisions of the bill, but perhaps all I need to say at the present time is that the bill will be in practically the same form as the bill which was passed by the house in 1947. The only differences of any substance will be the provision of different guaranteed minimum payments for the various provinces, a different method of calculating the adjusted payment in relation to the minimum, and the consequential changes which result from the decision to eliminate the 5 per cent provincial income taxes.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the subject now before us involves a great deal more than merely the form of a statute. Hon. members should realize what the statement the minister has just made means. The adoption of this bill in no way disposes of the fundamental problem which it has been drafted to meet. The minister has just said that this measure will be in practically the same form as that which was introduced in 1947. In 1947 it was explained that the bill was practically in the same form as that which had been introduced in 1942. This is the third stage of what was intended and declared to be only a temporary expedient for the purpose of the war, when it was originally brought forward in 1942.

I intend to recall the circumstances under which this situation arose because the adoption of this bill at this time in no way disposes of a problem which must be faced unless our whole federal system is to be threatened. There was a time when members of this government were not so casual in their attitude towards the constitution. There was a time when members of this government felt impelled to explain their position when they introduced a measure that made very real changes in the normal relationship between the dominion and the provincial governments in the tax fields available to the governments of this country. I will quote from the words used in this house in 1940.

These were the words of the minister of finance at that time, Hon. J. L. Ralston; and an agreement of this nature was not yet before the house. Nevertheless the whole question of dominion and provincial taxes was under consideration. I would like to quote the words simply to indicate the attitude of the minister of finance at that time. In discussing the necessity for raising taxes and what that might mean he said:

This means that unless we are prepared to be entirely arbitrary and unfair and to set up schedules of rates which when added to the rates imposed by other taxing authorities would be nothing short of fantastic, the dominion must, in fixing its schedule of rates, take cognizance of the highest schedule of rates effective in any province. This is but an instance of the chaotic situation in the fiscal systems of Canada to which the Sirois report has drawn attention and which, I regret to say, appears to be getting worse rather than better.

The following year Hon. J. L. Ilsley was minister of finance. At that time in his budget speech he explained that it was intended to place before the provincial governments a proposal that they should vacate certain tax fields which had traditionally been regarded as those fields available to them. In doing so he made it perfectly clear that this was something he was only proposing because of the emergency of the war, and that it was the intention of the government as soon as the war was over to take the appropriate steps to return the provinces to their taxing position with their powers undiminished.

Because we must bring our minds back to this problem, no matter what is done in regard to the measure before the house, I wish to recall the words of the minister of finance in 1941; and I am quoting from Hansard of April 29, 1941, as reported at page 2345. In explaining that it was intended to place the proposals before the provinces for the vacation of the tax fields, the minister of finance said:

> . . . it is proposed, therefore, as a temporary expedient for the duration of the war only to ask the provinces to vacate these two tax fields.

Surely those words are clear enough. It was for the duration of the war only. He went further, so there might be no doubt about his intention, and said:

> I should like to emphasize that this is not an attempt to get the provinces out of these tax fields permanently.

Later in the same speech he said:

> I should like to emphasize that no province is being forced to accept this offer and any province which does accept will have the right to withdraw from the plan at the end of any year subject to reasonable notice. Furthermore, the arrangement with the provinces will be discontinued and the dominion will cease making the payments which are contemplated in the proposal and will agree to reduce its taxes in these two fields proportionately, within one complete fiscal year after the termination of the war.
> The plan which I have outlined for alleviating the present difficulties is by no means perfect and is not intended to be more than a temporary wartime expedient.

What we now have before us for the second time since the end of hostilities is a return in form for all practical purposes, with nothing more than the figures altered, of an agreement which according to the clear and repeated declaration of the minister of finance in 1941 was not intended to be more than a temporary wartime expedient.

I have some personal recollection of the discussions which took place prior to the original acceptance of these agreements by the provinces in March of 1942. It was emphasized at that time that the war emergency made it desirable to centralize in the hands of the dominion government a measure of authority which the dominion government did not wish to be regarded as more than a temporary measure, but which they suggested was advisable in view of the fact that there was such a centralization of authority to meet the unusual tests and strains of war.

I am speaking there of what I heard at that time in the way of arguments presented in support of these agreements. I heard the arguments put forward by the dominion government. I was in the Ontario legislature when that province accepted these agreements. The arguments of the dominion government and the arguments accepted by Ontario and the other provinces of Canada at that time all related to a measure of centralization which no one suggested was desirable—in fact it was clearly indicated it was not desirable in peacetime—so that the unusual concentration of power demanded by the test of war could be met in that way. So far as I can recall all the provinces accepted those agreements in the belief that they were performing a patriotic duty in turning over the tax fields which had been traditionally theirs.

It is no answer today to the suggestion that this is an undesirable invasion of the taxing powers of the provinces, Mr. Chairman, to say that the British North America Act clearly leaves it open to the dominion government to occupy any tax field. The very fact that from the time of confederation until 1917 the dominion government had never at any time entered these tax fields had, by precedent, created an understanding that these were the tax fields from which the provinces should draw their main sources of revenue to carry out the administrative responsibilities imposed upon them by our constitution. So clearly was that principle recognized that when, during the first world war, an income tax was imposed for the first time by the dominion government the finance minister at that time, Sir Thomas White, pointed out that they were entering this field with great regret. He made it clear that he regarded this as a provincial field of taxation, and reassured the provinces that they would vacate this provincial field of taxation as soon as possible after that war. The principle was embedded in the very argument that was made in favour of the entry into that field by the dominion government for the first time.

The arguments that were put forward in 1941 in support of this course were arguments that in no way changed the right of the dominion government to enter the fields, but they nevertheless did very clearly accept the established position of the provincial governments in that field. No words could more clearly state the acceptance of that proposition than the words of the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, as minister of finance, who made it clear that the rights of the provinces in that field were to be returned undiminished. In order that they might understand how that was to be done he used these words, which I submit are not open to any misinterpretation. I read from Hansard for April 29, 1941 as recorded at page 2345:

> . . . the arrangements with the provinces will be discontinued and the dominion will cease making the payments which are contemplated in the proposal and will agree to reduce its taxes in these two fields proportionately, within one complete fiscal year after the termination of the war.

If that undertaking had been carried out, it would have been fulfilled in 1946. This is 1952, and no attempt has ever been made to carry it out. On the contrary, when any argument has been presented that there was some obligation on the part of this government to carry out its solemn undertaking made at the time these agreements were originally entered into, that argument has been branded as an attempt to read this government a lecture on its constitutional obligations. Either the undertaking given by the minister of finance in 1941 was given in good faith or it was not. I prefer to believe it was made in good faith. If it was made in good faith, it has been the obligation of this government at all times to carry out that undertaking and then seek arrangements with the provinces without this club over their heads, and without the suggestion that they were creating difficulties from the point of view of dominion-provincial relations if they did not immediately submit to any proposals put forward.

I am well aware of the fact that there was a dominion-provincial conference in 1945, and that it met on different occasions. I would recall that when the proposals which were ultimately embedded in the agreements of 1947 were put forward, they were not put forward as proposals for discussion. The conference was adjourned on motion of the dominion government in May, 1946. Then in this house the Minister of Finance announced that these were the terms that the provinces would be allowed to accept. It was that or nothing else and, subject to certain subsequent revisions, those became the terms entered into by seven of the nine provinces and later with modifications by eight of the ten provinces after the union with Newfoundland.

It will not serve any useful purpose at this time to oppose the measure now before the house. It is obvious that those provinces which accepted the agreements must continue this arrangement until some other can be made. Nevertheless this is an opportunity to emphasize reasons why steps should be taken to re-examine the whole tax structure of this country in the hope of establishing a position in which the legislative and administrative jurisdiction and responsibilities of the provinces will go hand in hand with the powers of taxation under their own control, which powers should be adequate for the purpose of carrying out the obligations our constitution imposes upon them. One of the difficulties facing those provinces which have entered into the agreements is that since those agreements were originally entered into there has been an increasing concentration of taxation in the hands of the dominion government, to a point where both provincial governments and municipal councils find themselves with a very limited part of the tax dollar available to them.

This is not a subject I am presenting to this government for the first time, nor is it a subject I alone have drawn to the attention of this government. The government is well aware that at a recent meeting of the mayors' association of Canada one of the main subjects before them for discussion was the difficulty of carrying out their municipal obligations with the limited part of the tax dollar now available to them. Right across Canada the provincial legislatures have been discussing their difficulties in meeting their responsibilities because of the limited portion of the tax dollar available to them. Without giving comparative figures again, may I simply recall that approximately 72 cents of every tax dollar is now paid into the dominion treasury; that 16 cents of every tax dollar is paid to the provincial treasuries, and that 12 cents of every tax dollar is paid to the municipalities. That concentration of taxing power is going on all the time at an accelerating rate. If the present course continues, no matter what agreements may be made the tax dollars will be so greatly absorbed by the dominion government that both the provinces and the municipalities, which have their extremely heavy responsibilities to carry out on behalf of the people, will have great difficulty in fulfilling their tasks without imposing an unduly heavy burden upon the people.

I recall the words of Hon. J. L. Ralston in 1940, when he told the House of Commons that it was the responsibility of the dominion government to recognize the level of taxation in the lower legislative jurisdictions and, in determining what taxes would be imposed here, to have regard to the taxes they were called upon to impose. The reverse is the case today. The dominion government imposes the taxes without regard to what taxes must be imposed elsewhere, and then leaves to the others scramble for what they can obtain.

Either we believe in the federal system or we do not. No one in the House of Commons or outside of it needs to become hysterical or to suggest that we are treading on sacred ground if anyone should assert the proposition that he believes in unitary government in this country. That argument has been made before and it will be made again. There are those who sincerely believe that Canada would be better off with a single government. I must confess that in the conduct of this government at no time have I seen any evidence that they do not believe they can do everything better than anyone else in this country, whether they assert their belief in a unitary government or not. Nevertheless there are those who sincerely believe that a unitary government would be the best system for this country. There are those who believe the contrary.

In presenting my arguments, I present them from the point of view of one who believes that the continuing strength and unity of Canada depends upon the extent to which we adhere to the idea of confederation, and the extent that we not only express our belief in the federal system but also give positive evidence that we are prepared to make that federal system work by assuring to the provinces the measure of taxing independence they should have in relation to their legislative and administrative responsibility. Anything else places some measure of control over the provincial governments.

This government may think it is in a better position to exercise judgment in regard to important matters than are some of the provincial governments. If that is their opinion, most certainly they are free to assert it; and anyone should accept that opinion as an expression of individual belief or the collective belief of this government.

Mr. Abbott: Only it has never asserted that.

Mr. Drew: But it is not consistent with the concept of the federal system. The Minister of Finance has just said "But it has never been asserted." That is perfectly true; it has never been asserted; yet the course that is followed is one that is only consistent with the belief that we should work toward a unitary government in this country.

The predecessor of this agreement, similar in form and in general intent, was brought forward as a temporary expedient in time of war. There was never any suggestion that it would not centralize authority. It was agreed that it would do so. It was agreed that centralization was necessary during the years of war. The years of war have passed and the centralization continues. I suggest that more than lip service should be given to the principles of confederation, and that this government should take appropriate steps to show that when the undertaking was given in 1941 that the status of the provinces would be returned to them unimpaired, the government really intended to carry out the undertaking which was the condition precedent to the acceptance of that agreement which is now being renewed with certain amendments. The agreement is before us.

Mr. Abbott: Not yet.

Mr. Drew: I assume that eight of the ten provinces have indicated their willingness to continue that agreement. This is the time for the government to assure us that steps will be taken to examine our whole system of taxation in Canada so there may be a clear allocation of taxing powers which will give to the dominion government its clear field of taxation and to the provincial governments their clear fields of taxation. Then the provincial governments, under whose jurisdiction the municipal councils operate and tax, will have their tax fields made available to them.

Without going back over the arguments which have been made and without debating this agreement in itself, may I say that this would be the opportunity for the government to indicate that it has paid attention to the requests of the provincial governments and the municipalities, and that it will take the appropriate steps to explore the various possible methods of taxation so that proposals may be submitted to the ten provincial governments for consideration in the hope of ending the confusion which has been emphasized over and over again in this country. It was emphasized by Hon. J. L. Ralston in 1940 when he referred to the Sirois report. It has been emphasized over and over again. Instead of muttering comments which I cannot hear clearly across the floor of the chamber, I would hope that the Minister of Finance would pay some attention to this subject and would give us some assurances that the solemn undertaking, put forward by this government as a condition it would fulfil if the provinces accepted the agreement, is to be carried out and that this government intends to take appropriate steps to bring our federal system back to the underlying principles which were accepted in 1867.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to us most unfortunate, indeed it is almost a tragedy, that we have not yet reached a proper and nation-wide basis for taxation agreements as between the federal and provincial governments. The importance of this problem in our federal system, and its importance to the welfare of the people of Canada, cannot be overstated. Nevertheless I disagree, and I disagree profoundly, with the basis upon which the leader of the opposition would like to see that agreement reached.

Every time I hear speeches of the kind to which we have just listened, whether it be on the question of the British North America Act or whether it be on financial arrangements between the provinces and the dominion, it seems to me there are some people in this country who think of Canada as a group of ten little kingdoms in conflict with some overriding body to which they have surrendered some authority with great reluctance. That is not our view of Canada. Our view of Canada is that it is a nation of people, of Canadian people, who have chosen a form of government. Perhaps it was chosen by our forefathers but we share in that decision, and in that sense we today can say that we have chosen the federal system. We have chosen it because we are a far-flung nation. We are a nation of many different strains, of different economic and other interests; and it seems to us in our nation desirable that there should be a division of the functions of government as between the central government and local governments. But having made that decision we feel as Canadians—and I think this view is the view of Canadians generally—that each of those governments, both the central one and the local ones, has important functions to perform.

When one talks about the sanctity of the federal system, about doing things to keep that federal system alive and functioning, he should bear in mind the responsibilities of both these levels of government. It is not a defence of the federal system just to stand up time and again and insist that certain functions and rights should be restored or given to the provinces. It is a proper defence of the federal system to remind us of the functions and the rights and the responsibilities of the provincial governments, but at the same time to remind us of the functions and the rights and responsibilities of the central government.

Both these levels of government, as I see it, have an overriding responsibility; and that is not just to quarrel with each other, to vie for position. It is their overriding responsibility to serve as best they can the interests and the welfare of the people of Canada.

In my view this issue was grappled with very thoroughly and wisely by the Rowell-Sirois commission. A lot has happened since then. The picture in degree at any rate has altered tremendously because of the war and the economic developments that have taken place since; but it seems to me that the pith and substance of what the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended still holds true, namely that we have somehow to rethink and recast our financial set-up in this country so that the wealth that is created across this broad land is not channelled into two or three areas where there can be great prosperity at the expense of other parts of the country, but rather that that wealth is made available for the highest possible standard of living and as nearly as possible equality of opportunity throughout the country.

The system we were labouring under prior to the war did not facilitate that sort of arrangement or that sort of distribution of the wealth created by our people. The system we were working under prior to the war enabled people in certain parts of the country to make wealth out of the labours of people in other parts of the country and yet, in the nature of things, to escape the taxation that should go with the wealth they were thus drawing to themselves.

The recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission, if I understand them at all, were directed to the idea that arrangements should be made so the nation's wealth could best serve the interests of all Canadians. Accordingly the Rowell-Sirois commission felt that in terms of taxation authority the position of the central government of the Canadian people should be strengthened. I plead with the members of this house to think in those terms, not to think of ten provincial governments and ten provincial cabinets, as it were, vying with the cabinet down here for prestige and power and authority. That is not the problem. The problem is: what is the best way that government—government in its entirety—in this country under the federal system can serve the interests of the Canadian people. I am satisfied that the heart of what the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended is correct; that if we are going to serve the interests of the Canadian people in the best possible way it is desirable that so far as the taxation of the wealth of the people for redistribution in terms of improved social security, and government projects of one kind and another is concerned, it must be strengthened at the level of the central government.

I agree that that having been done and there still being functions which the provincial governments, which are in closer proximity to the people, can perform better because of that very promixity, they must be in a financial position to perform them. All the provincial governments must be in that position, not just two or three or four of them depending upon their geographical location or how the wealth of this country gets channelled; and if they are all going to be in that position we have to think in terms not of our loyalty to provincial governments in various parts of the country but of our loyalty to Canada as a whole.

In my view it is a tragedy that conditions, some of which were beyond our control —I refer to the outbreak of the war—and some of which were internal, prevented the implementation in some form or other of the pith and substance of the Rowell-Sirois recommendations. The war came, and the desirability that what had been drawn to our attention by the Rowell-Sirois commission be done became a necessity and so we had the wartime taxation agreements.

Then came the 1945 dominion-provincial conference and the proposals made at that conference by the federal government. I am not going to take time to rehash the whole story of what happened at that conference, how it broke up, who broke it up and why. Neither is it my function to come to the defence of the federal government, although these days they do seem to need somebody to help them out. They are in a bad way on a good many fronts.

It seems to me that the proposals put forward in the green books of 1945—I have one of them here on my desk—were at least in keeping with the spirit of the Rowell-Sirois recommendations. Again I think it was a tragedy that a basis for agreement was not found. I am not suggesting that it was a tragedy because the nine provincial governments who were there on that occasion did not accept the dominion government's proposals precisely as they were put forward —naturally in a conference you need considerable give and take and compromise— but I do think it was tragedy that some basis for agreement was not worked out. It was a tragedy that those who were there on all sides seemed to think of themselves as the heads of little kingdoms which were warring with each other, instead of realizing that they represented two aspects of the federal system of government which the people of Canada chose long ago and have confirmed many times since.

However, that conference was abortive. The proposals to some extent were put on the shelf. We have been able to get some of them off the shelf and put on the statute books, and I refer in particular to the proposal regarding universal old age pensions. It took a long time, from 1945 up to this year, before it was made effective; but at least we seem to have gotten over the barrier we faced for many years, namely that none of these proposals could be implemented because the taxation arrangements were not accepted.

Even though we have made some headway in getting one of these proposals implemented, the fact remains that we still have to solve the basic problem of taxation in this country in line with the general principle laid down by the Rowell-Sirois commission, namely that we are one country, that we are all Canadians, that we produce a great deal of wealth and somehow it should be possible to arrange for the distribution of that wealth so as to provide some equality of health and living standards, and some equality of opportunity among our people.

To get down to cases, what I dislike about the proposal of the leader of the opposition, what I dislike about the kind of taxation authority that he wants the individual provinces to have, is that it would take us back, to a lesser or greater degree depending on its exact terms, to the situation we had before the war under which the people of certain provinces whose great wealth which had been channelled there because of the nature of our economy were able to escape paying taxes that should be paid in connection with the making of that wealth. In the other provinces from which wealth has been drained away the taxation problem is insuperable under a situation of that kind.

I see no threat to our federal system through strengthening the taxation authority at the centre and having with it some proposals such as were made in 1945, subsidy proposals, proposals that the provincial treasuries should have sufficient money to carry out their obligations. On the other hand I see a threat to our federal system, I see a threat to Canada, I see a threat to Canadian unity, I see a threat to the well-being of the Canadian people if we go back to the disunity which inevitably grows out of the kind of set-up we had prior to the war and which I think is involved in the proposals made by the leader of the opposition.

I hope that we shall not go back in that direction. I am sorry that the measure now before us in the name of the Minister of Finance does not go all the way. I know the reason is that some of the provinces have not agreed and so we have this temporary expedient, this stopgap measure. But at least it is an attempt to move in that direction and to co-operate with those provinces which are willing to co-operate, or co-operate because there is no alternative, whichever it is. To that extent we give it our support.

But I hope the day will soon come when the people who represent our various provincial governments and the people who represent our federal government will realize that their responsibility in this matter of taxation is not to vie with each other for prestige and power and authority and the right to collect or spend so much money. I hope they will realize that their responsibility is to achieve an arrangement that will make for the best deal, the best standard of living, the best chance at equality for Canadian people from coast to coast.

This is a little more than I had thought of saying when I learned that this motion was being called tonight. Obviously what I have said has been prompted by the remarks of the hon. gentleman who preceded me. Before I sit down I want to say to the Minister of Finance that even as we have old age security on the statute books, despite the fact that the taxation arrangements proposed in 1945 have not been agreed to by all the provinces, I insist that similarly it is possible to treat health insurance in the same manner. As the Minister of Finance knows, the proposals made in 1945 were lumped together in one parcel. The taxation proposals were there and so were the proposals for health insurance, for old age security, for federal responsibility for the employable unemployed, for public works programs and all the rest of it. For quite a few years every time we raised the question of old age security or health insurance we were told "yes, those were in our proposals to the provinces in 1945, but the taxation part was not accepted, so we cannot go ahead with the rest". We have not heard that defence for some little while now. Perhaps one of the reasons we have not is that we have got over it and now have old age security on the statute books.

I submit to the Minister of Finance that so far as the provinces which have entered into taxation agreements are concerned, it is unfair to them to continue to deny to them the benefits of that kind of health insurance program which was proposed to the provinces in 1945, or something like it. Indeed some of the provinces are now suggesting that there should be a federal measure for health insurance with provision for provincial participation. The whole idea of a national social security program in terms of old age security and in terms of health insurance was part and parcel of the Rowell-Sirois concept and was part and parcel of the federal government's proposals in their attempt to interpret that concept in 1945. I suggest that just as it is a tragedy that these financial arrangements have not yet been worked out as they should be, so it is a tragedy that in the meantime the Canadian people have been denied the benefits of proposals such as the one for health insurance that was put before the provinces and the people of Canada in 1945.

The Minister of Finance may have agreed with the remarks I made with reference to the comments of the leader of the opposition. I hope he agrees with me now in these further remarks I am addressing particularly to him to the effect that in my view there is no reason for any further delay. It is unfair not only to the provincial governments, because as far as I am concerned they do not come into the picture, but it is unfair to the people of Canada, particularly those in the provinces with which agreement has been reached, to deny a health insurance program any longer. I hope the minister will give close attention to that together with the whole question of these taxation agreements.

Mr. Blackmore: Before we get too far from the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I think I should say something. The hon. member assumes, as is customary with people of his school of thought, that there is no money available in Canada except that which is taken out of people's pockets. That assumption is absolutely fallacious.

Mr. Gibson: Let's make this painless.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I know he is very honest, straightforward and sincere, and so am I. I do not agree with him at all in most matters of this kind. The hon. member has disregarded the essential element of provincial sovereignty. I suppose he would deny that, but I say it now because I want to be fair to him. The leader of the opposition made a speech, which I regret I was not in the chamber to hear, in which I understand he set forth the case for the individual province and its sovereignty. In doing so he was emphasizing an exceedingly important matter in this dominion.

When the fathers of confederation planned Canada they planned it with a number of sovereign provinces. Everything in connection with the British North America Act tends to show that. The decisions which were made by the privy council for a long time tended to show that. There is another school of thought which believes that it is impossible to govern Canada successfully unless the dominion government has the authority to command the provinces and abrogate their sovereignty. I favour the point of view of the leader of the opposition.

I believe the present government is deserving of much credit because it has learned the essential fact that by co-operation with the provinces it is possible to attain any desirable objective in the dominion. The present government ever since 1940 and before has had excellent results in co-operation with the provinces.

It must be borne in mind, as I have said many times on the floor of the house, that the men whom the people send to the provincial legislatures are just as intelligent as any man who has ever been sent to this house, and that the members of the provincial governments are just as skilful, sincere and single-hearted in their desire to govern well as any man who ever held a position in the government at Ottawa. This being recognized, we approach this whole problem from an entirely different standpoint. We agree with the idea of the leader of the opposition. I should like to put in a word for the recognition in Canada of the sovereignty of the provinces to a growing degree.

I object to centralizing control and the deprivation of the sovereignty of any governing body not only in Canada but in the world. I have set forth my reasons for that position. No group of people on the face of the earth knows better how to govern Canada than Canada itself. No group of people in the world knows better how to govern New Zealand than New Zealand itself. We do not have to have a cabal of people situated in Europe or some other place to govern any one of these great nations.

Mr. Sinclair: What about foreign leaders campaigning in British Columbia? How do they fit in?

Mr. Blackmore: British Columbia is a part of Canada, is it not?

Mr. Sinclair: I was talking provincially.

Mr. Blackmore: I would imagine that any Canadian would be quite at home campaigning in British Columbia concerning any matter pertaining to Canada.

Mr. Low: I seem to recall that Gerry McGeer and others campaigned in Alberta.

Mr. Blackmore: Continuing with the question of decentralization of power, I do not believe that power in a province ought to be centralized unduly in the capital of that province. It is fitting that power be decentralized so as to bring the government of the people as close to the people as you can possibly get it. The people in their communities, their counties, their municipalities, their school and hospital boards, will govern magnificently. Usually the only thing they need is the financial means with which to discharge the responsibilities resting upon them. They will do the rest.

May I come now to the Rowell-Sirois report? I have said on the floor of this house on other occasions that the Rowell-Sirois report was one of the most pernicious documents ever published in the Dominion of Canada. I am prepared to back that position with a good deal of argument, but not tonight. I should like to deal with one or two other considerations. I do not know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre remembers this; probably he does not. If it had happened while he was here he certainly would have remembered it. I am going to take this occasion to give credit where I believe credit is due. I consider the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre one of the best members who has ever sat in this house from every angle—

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Sinclair: Misinformed but good.

Mr. Blackmore: —from the standpoint of knowledge, courage and everything else it takes to make a good member. That does not mean that I agree with his ideas.

Mr. Knowles: That is the best compliment of all.

Mr. Blackmore: Wait till I get through.

Mr. Sinclair: He is going to call you ignorant in a moment.

Mr. Blackmore: Probably it will not be such a compliment after the story is all told. It will be found by and by that the line of thought I am following is sound, and that those who take the other view have not matured sufficiently in their thinking as yet. I say the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre probably would not know what the original recommendation of the Rowell-Sirois report was. Financially the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended that in return for the taxing privileges which are involved in this resolution the provinces should be given an annual adjustment grant. Quebec was to receive $8 million a year, although I could never understand why. Manitoba was to receive $2 million a year and all the other provinces combined were to receive $4 million a year. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre contrasts that with the allowances which are now given to the provinces for these great taxing privileges he will realize that he might like to make some reservation of his unqualified commendation of the Rowell-Sirois report.

Mr. Knowles: Surely the hon. member wants to be fair.

Mr. Blackmore: That is why I am talking as I am right here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I think I made it perfectly clear that I was supporting what I called the pith, substance and heart of the Rowell-Sirois recommendations. I made the statement that since that time we had experienced a war and we now have an almost entirely different situation. I may tell the hon. member that I read the Rowell-Sirois report long before I came here.

Mr. Blackmore: I said what I did so the hon. member would have a chance to answer me. When I have anything to say against a man I say it in his presence. I do not try to misrepresent what he said or to distort what he said; I give him a chance to say what he wishes right where I am talking.

Now let me go back to the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report. Let us remember that those recommendations were issued somewhere around 1939 or 1940, so we were not completely immature.

The province of Ontario was to receive nothing in the way of financial adjustment grant. The province of Alberta was to receive nothing and the province of British Columbia was to receive nothing. They were to give these almost priceless taxing privileges to the central government and receive nothing in return. Now I just ask any member of this house or anyone in the country to justify a set of financial recommendations like that.

What did it mean? It meant the centralization of financial control in Canada to such an extent that no province in this dominion would ever have a ghost of a chance of discharging its responsibilities to its people. It meant complete financial subjugation of the provinces of Canada to a central power which would have over them absolutely dictatorial financial power. I do not want to be unkind to anybody, but that seems to me to be a general line of thought that my socialist friends rather like to dream about. Well, I do not. I say that if the Rowell-Sirois report had been accepted just as it was, it would have been the end of sovereignty in the Dominion of Canada amongst the provinces.

Mr. Adamson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blackmore: What caused the change? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has given some fine expression of opinion and I am glad that he had the opportunity to do so. I gave it to him deliberately. But what happened? Before I say what I am going to say next may I recall to the members of this house, particularly those who were here in 1941, that there was a dominion-provincial conference called in Ottawa in the early months of 1941. To this conference came all the premiers. The Rowell-Sirois report with the undesirable features which I have already mentioned was presented to the premiers. One of the provincial premiers refused to accept this report, and he gave a masterful speech rejecting it. That man was Premier William Aberhart of Alberta.

Fortunately two other premiers joined him in the struggle, Premier Hepburn of Ontario and Premier Pattullo of British Columbia. If it had not been for the courageous stand of those three great premiers, the Rowell-Sirois commission recommendations would have been, shall I say, imposed upon or pressed upon the provinces of Canada. Because these three premiers were courageous enough to take that stand the dominion government began to negotiate with the provinces and, in the course of years, the dominion government discovered that it could pay rather substantial sums of money in exchange for the taxing privileges which are involved in this resolution.

I do not believe it would be quite in order for me to say more on this subject right here.

Mr. Knowles: Tell us what has happened to our gross national product during those years. It did not remain constant.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not saying that it did. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has implied, it would require much more extensive discussion than a person could undertake in a speech in this house in order to set everything in its proper proportion. I will grant that we greatly increased our national production, our national wealth and our national financial income as a result of our war activities.

An hon. Member: And good government.

Mr. Blackmore: I grant all that, but it would not have mattered a particle if we still had the Rowell-Sirois report with the spirit which prevailed in that document. It would not have mattered how greatly the income of Canada had been increased, we still would have found that Ontario and Alberta and British Columbia did not need any financial adjustments. That is just about what it would mean, and I do not see how anyone could draw any other conclusion.

I think it is fitting on this occasion that these observations should be made and these facts put before the people of Canada so that those who did not live through those dangerous times will have an opportunity to learn from history what some of the great men who have lived in Canada during the last two decades have done for the people of this country today.

It has been suggested that I elaborate just a little on the division of responsibility under the British North America Act. I do not propose to take long, not more than two or three minutes. I think the first thing to bear in mind is that the allocation of responsibility between the provinces and the dominion under the British North America Act is sound. We do not need to change the British North America Act at all. All we need to do is interpret it as it was intended to be interpreted, and give provincial governments the recognition and the financial assistance which evidently it was intended that the central government should give them. They will do the rest.

Just one more word before I close. When the dominion government and the people of Canada come to realize the tremendous financial resources which are available to the dominion government by the use of social credit, then they will really understand how great is the capacity of Ottawa to give financial assistance to the various provinces in accordance with their needs. We do not need to change the British North America Act at all. It is something like Christianity; all we need to do is live it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a few words; and at the outset I would say that I was greatly surprised tonight to hear the leader of the opposition, the leader of a national party, take the stand he has taken with regard to the dominion subsidy payments. In my opinion he certainly appeared once more in his old role as premier of the province of Ontario.

We hear the leader of the opposition in the house and outside preaching fair distribution of the wealth of this country. I have heard him do that on many occasions, particularly in the by-elections; but here is an example of one of the fairest distributions of wealth that could take place in the Dominion of Canada and it is being opposed by the leader of the official opposition.

I wish to speak briefly now as one coming from what you might call a "have not" province, or a less fortunate province. I believe that when we look upon the whole dominion we must all agree that if we are all to enjoy the same standard of living, then the wealth of the whole country must be fairly distributed. From my observations during the last fifteen years I would say that under Liberal administrations we have made more progress in that line than had been made from the time of confederation until 1935.

In my own province we will receive no less than $16·5 million under this agreement. To New Brunswick that is an enormous amount of money. When broken down it means over $30 for every man, woman and child in the province. For example, just taking family allowances alone, we get about $30 million in New Brunswick. As I say, we have about half a million people or one-half of the population of the city of Montreal and far less than the population of the city of Toronto. In that province we have already provided nearly 1,500 miles of paved roads, which have been built and maintained by 500,000 people. It would be utterly impossible to take from those people by way of taxation an amount to provide for those roads as well as the other services that must be provided. Our school system today is in the same category. The province has a fine school system, but it is very expensive when you have a small population.

In my opinion the only way we can enjoy these services is through a fair distribution of the wealth of this country. At this point I might say that when you mention subsidy payments, some people do not like the sound of it. I should like to point out, however, that we reciprocate in this way. We receive subsidy payments from the federal government, but over the years we have paid back millions and millions of dollars in subsidies to the manufacturers of these two central provinces, and we are continuing to pay those manufacturers. It is not a one-sided agreement. We have been paying these millions since confederation. It would appear to me that these subsidy payments are being opposed by the leader or the official opposition for the same reason that family allowances and the other services which we enjoy were opposed. It would seem that the central provinces do not wish the other parts of Canada to have the same standard of living which they enjoy. That is the way it would appear to a maritimer or one coming from New Brunswick.

I might say also that when the representatives of the provincial legislatures meet with the officials of the federal government, it is only natural that they should ask for larger subsidy payments; that is human nature. But I believe 90 per cent of the people of New Brunswick today, if they will be as honest as I am in speaking here tonight, will state that the payments we receive from the federal government are fair and just. So far as the payments made by the provincial governments to the municipalities and towns are concerned, those arrangements are purely between the provinces and those municipalities. No criticism can be levelled at the federal government on that point. How anyone can stand up on the floor of this house and suggest that we should be dealing with the municipalities is beyond my understanding. We deal with the provinces, and they deal with the towns and municipalities.

In concluding my few remarks I want to say I am confident the people of New Brunswick appreciate this assistance which is given by the federal government by way of subsidy payments. I have not the figures before me, but I am going to suggest before I sit down that this $16·5 million, which is the minimum payment under this arrangement, would be four times greater than our total provincial revenue for any year previous to 1940.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think I have seldom heard in this house anything so outrageously unfair as the remarks just made by the member who preceded me, who is usually a very fair-minded man. He has tried to leave the impression that the leader of the opposition has objected to the carrying out of these agreements. Actually he said tonight that of course these agreements should be carried out. The hon. member has tried to give the impression that the leader of the opposition is seeking to create a state of affairs in which there will be no recognition of the fact that there are certain provinces which, through no particular virtue of their own, are better off than others, and that there should be no fair attempt to equalize the burdens and privileges which are enjoyed in this country. For a member to stand up, as he has done, and try to create this impression I think is grossly unfair.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Did the leader of the opposition suggest that the federal government was taking all the taxing powers from the provincial legislatures?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What the leader of the opposition said, as I understood him—and incidentally it is what the member for Winnipeg North Centre was saying—was that there were certain duties to be carried out by the provincial legislatures and by the dominion government. He quoted statements to show that when this arrangement was set up it was with the full intention of restoring to the provinces the taxing powers which they had given up. But things have greatly changed since then.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask one more question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me interrupt you for a change, and I shall continue what I am saying. What the leader of the opposition suggested tonight was not taking away anything from anybody. Let me digress a moment to speak again to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and tell him that when he suggested going back to the time of the Rowell-Sirois report he neglected to take into consideration that many things have happened since then. There have been family allowances, old age pensions and so on, and nobody suggests going back on them. I suggest to him he is, to some extent, setting up a straw man.

I return now—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask one question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me finish. The point I want to make clear is that the leader of the opposition did not suggest this legislation should not be passed. He suggested that there was a problem to be considered. The premiers who were here in 1946, particularly the premier of Nova Scotia and others, all suggested there was a problem to be considered. Of course it is a difficult problem; we all recognize it. It is true, as the hon. member implied, that if Ontario and Quebec tried to erect a wall around themselves and say what we have we hold, that would be very unfair. As a matter of fact what has happened since in the way of federal taxation, old age pensions and family allowances, has vastly changed the position because the dominion now takes care of those services.

I say, therefore, that what the member said tonight was grossly unfair. Furthermore we affirm what the documents which report the dominion-provincial conferences showed years ago, and he will find it most explicitly stated there, that there was recognition of the fact there had to be a sharing of the burden right across the country. Let me say this finally. There has been a great deal of most important support from men who have thought the thing through, including the premier of Nova Scotia and other premiers for the view that just as soon as you take away taxing powers and keep them away from the provinces in normal times, you create difficulties. It was with that in mind, and not with the intention of depriving anyone of anything, that the leader of the opposition spoke tonight.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask my question now?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member has said the leader of the opposition was in favour of these subsidy payments. Did he take that stand when he appeared at the dominion-provincial conference as premier of Ontario?

Mr. Drew: Let me answer that question. The hon. member is the victim of the propaganda which he has been assisting in spreading.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No. I am the victim of propaganda the other way, namely the propaganda of the speech of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I would commend to the hon. member a little diligence in reading the record of what actually took place. If he would spend a little time reading it he would find, with regard to our position, that we made it clear that we wanted the adjustment of payments to be made in a manner that recognized the advantages of the province of Ontario and the other provinces that had advantages. If he will look at the official record of the dominion-provincial conference which started in 1945 he will find that, as reported at page 519, I said this:

> Yes, we receive benefits from outside of Ontario; and those benefits were admitted, were stated in our brief presented last January; and may I remind everyone at this conference that Ontario has said, and said very emphatically, that it recognizes certain advantages it possesses, and that it is not only willing, it is insistent upon combining with the other provinces of Canada to share any advantages it possesses.

I repeat that statement today.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I merely want to make one suggestion to the minister with regard to the leasing of tax fields. It has reference to succession duties. The statement made in this committee tonight with regard to the distribution of wealth being a good thing is one with which I am in agreement. But may I suggest that there is no other tax which tends so greatly to concentrate wealth and to perpetuate monopolies and large corporations as does the succession duties tax. Many small companies, particularly family companies, on the death of the owner or a large shareholder, in order to raise money for the succession duties have to sell the assets of the concern either on the public market or to some larger concern. By this procedure more and more of the productivity of the country is being forced into large corporations.

Until the war succession duties were solely a provincial levy; but as an emergency measure for war purposes the federal government invaded the succession duty field. If the federal government really want to get agreements with the provinces, I suggest that they should be willing to relinquish this taxing field. It raises little money. Particularly in the central provinces but also in British Columbia and Alberta, there are at the present time double succession duties. Because of this fact, instead of acting to distribute the wealth or to keep the small operator continuously in operation you are, through the effect of the succession duties, concentrating the productive output of this country into fewer and fewer hands. I think that is a wrong procedure. I think that at least a conference with the finance ministers of the provinces could be held to advantage in order to find out whether the federal authority could not profitably relinquish the succession duty field.

May I now say a word with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Charlotte. Assuming that a part of the profits of business in the maritime provinces leaves those provinces, we find that one of the worst drains those provinces have to suffer is through the excise tax and the sales tax. Every dollar of business done in those provinces has to pay the tax which goes to the central government. In effect—and this is one of the evils of the sales tax—you are putting a centralizing tax on business done in the maritimes; the central government is taxing them on the business so done. There is no drain which any manufacturer or any business in the central provinces puts on the maritimes that can possibly be compared to the drain of the sales tax and the excise tax. Those are inescapable facts.

I wish to make my plea that, as far as possible, the tax structure of this country be simplified and that where there is double taxation, as there is at the present time in the field of succession duties, the first job of governments at all levels is to see to it that such double taxation, wherever it exists, be eliminated.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 347, to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO RACE MEETINGS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 309, to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings).

Mr. Adamson: What is the principle of this bill?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Two amendments are proposed in this bill. The first is to subsection 4 of section 235 of the Criminal Code, and involves a change in the percentage which may be retained by the racing associations from the total amount of money wagered on each race, the change being from a graduated scale of percentages, depending on the amount wagered on each race, to a fixed percentage. In the old section the percentages varied from 9 per cent to 5 per cent, according to the amount. This amendment would fix the rate at 9 per cent.

The second amendment is to clarify the method of dealing with the odd cents which are retained at the present time by the association, and to make it clear that any remainder, as well as any odd cents, that may occur in the quotient when pools are calculated may be retained by the association. I am told that everybody agrees with this change and it is for the good of the community.

Mr. Adamson: Does it assist the $2 fellow to get a better chance?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. Knowles: The minister who is sponsoring this bill said that everybody agreed to it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I had not consulted my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: Whom does he mean by "everybody"? Seriously, who is asking for it? Who are the people who have agreed to it and why has this limit been raised? Previously when the amounts involved were higher the percentage that could be retained was less. It was down as low as 5 per cent in some instances. Why has the amount that can be retained by the association been increased? I have no doubt that the association agrees with it. What about the other parties?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think the provinces will agree also because they administer these parimutuel systems. Here are the notes. I am no expert myself because I never make any bets. Subsection 4 of section 235 of the Criminal Code now provides for such graduated scale of percentages ranging from 9 per cent to 5 per cent that may be retained by the racing association. It is now proposed that this rate shall be fixed at 9 per cent of the total amount wagered on each race.

At present the amount retained by racing associations throughout the country is calculated at the rate of 9 per cent on the amount of money wagered in respect of 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the races run. The lower rates of this graduated scale are used mainly on Saturdays and holidays, and these are the days when stakes races with substantial purses take place.

In the United States a fixed rate of parimutuel commission has been adopted instead of the sliding scale in effect in Canada at the present time. The difference to the racing associations by reason of a change to a fixed rate of 9 per cent would be a fractional percentage, but the change would greatly simplify the work of the departmental supervisors at the track and it is recommended for the purpose of a more efficient supervision and administration.

This has been submitted to the authorities, I suppose, because they can administer it more easily with a fixed rate than with this graduated rate which starts under the old section of the code when the total amount staked or deposited on each race is $20,000 or under at 9 per cent; over $20,000 but not over $30,000, 8 per cent, and so forth. I am told there is not much difference in the amounts which the association will get out of it, but to administer and operate these parimutuels it is more effective to have a fixed rate. I can bring as my witnesses editorials from some papers that have said it was a sensible amendment.

Section agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will proceed with the notice of motion of the Minister of Transport to approve the agreement for the promotion of safety on the great lakes; then, the following bills: Bill No. 308, to revise the capital structure of the Canadian National Railway Company; Bill No. 307, to amend the Canada Dairy Products Act; Bill No. 322, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, and Bill No. 337, respecting the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Low: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, as closely as possible.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 18, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third report of special committee on defence expenditure.—Mr. Croll.

Third report of special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Croll.

WAR REPARATIONS

TABLING OF REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table two copies in English of the report of the advisory commission on war claims. I had hoped to have the French version at the same time but the congestion at the printing bureau has made it impossible to have it for a few days yet. I thought it would be desirable to have the English version available at once as there is apt to be an item in the supplementary estimates dealing with this subject. I understand that the English version is ready for distribution to hon. members.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to this report. Will there be any legislation at this session as a result of the report?

Mr. St. Laurent: For the time being there will be an enabling item in the supplementary estimates to authorize the setting up of the war claims fund and the transfer from the general accounts of consolidated revenue to the war claims fund of the proceeds of certain enemy assets that have been converted. It may be that ultimately legislation will be required but it was felt that it was desirable to proceed as rapidly as possible and that further experience might be acquired in the course of proceeding before definite legislation in the form of a separate statute was introduced.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, June 18, 1952

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, the 18th June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Does the Department of Public Works intend to proceed with construction of the Pembroke-Allumette Island bridge, during the present year?
2. Has there been any correspondence with the governments of Quebec and Ontario relating to each of the said governments contributing one-third of the cost of construction? If so, have the governments agreed or refused so to do?
3. What is the estimated total cost?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Answered by 2 (b).

2. (a) Yes. (b) No definite replies from provincial governments.

DEFINITION OF TERRITORIAL WATERS—REPORT BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Applewhaite:

1. Is there an interdepartmental committee now considering the question of the definition or extension of Canadian territorial waters?
2. Has any report been made by this committee? If so, when, and to whom?
3. If not, when is it expected a report will be made, and to whom?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. The interdepartmental committee on territorial waters is a standing committee of representatives of departments concerned with territorial waters and considers questions that arise from time to time relating to them. It has at present under consideration a number of matters relating to the definition of Canadian territorial waters.

2 and 3. The committee is simply a part of the internal arrangements of the government and members of the committee either report to their respective departments on its proceedings, or, from time to time, the committee through its chairman reports to the cabinet. It is simply a convenient way of keeping departments in touch with one another.

STANDING ORDER NO. 60—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Probably I might at this time give my ruling with respect to standing order No. 60.

On May 20 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) requested me to consider standing order No. 60 and to give my opinion as to its proper construction. On June 4 and 16 there were further discussions on this standing order, which reads as follows:

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint: and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

All hon. members who have taken part in the discussions agree that the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider a resolution preceding a money bill is debatable. In my opinion that is the correct view so long as subclause (a) of standing order No. 38 remains in its present form.

The question on which there is some difference of opinion is the extent to which debate is to be allowed. This question was considered by Mr. Speaker Glen on the 23rd of February, 1942. At that time he ruled that the debate should be directed to the negative of the motion and should be general with no reference to details.

I should point out that the motion is for the Speaker to leave the chair, etc. It is not a motion to adopt the resolution. However, under our present practice members have been debating it as if it were such a motion. The minister makes an affirmative statement, frequently going into details, with the Speaker in the chair, and other members follow. The result is that a full discussion of the resolution takes place at this stage. I am sure that is not the procedure contemplated by standing order No. 60, nor is it in accordance with Mr. Speaker Glen's ruling, in which I concur.

After giving this matter my careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that if there is no objection to the consideration of the resolution in committee of the whole, the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair should be put without debate. If any members are opposed to the resolution, and do not think that it should even be considered in the committee of the whole, or if they require additional information before agreeing to the motion, they should be given an opportunity to speak on the motion. The minister should endeavour to answer the objections which have been raised and to give the information requested.

Accordingly in my opinion the practice of the minister opening the debate on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to consider in committee of the whole a resolution preceding a money bill should be discontinued.

When the discussion on this subject was before the house the other night a number of members expressed concern over the difficulty which the Speaker would have in keeping the debate within the limits of the above interpretation. I realize the difficulty but all I can do is to ask for the usual co-operation of all hon. members.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSAL FOR LONG SERVICE PENSION PLAN—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORTS

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege just for the sake of fair play.

I notice that several papers have announced the proposed pension plan for members.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIvor: I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the reports were not fair. The plan has been under discussion for over two years and it is neither fair to members of the committee nor to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that the newspapers have seen fit to report in the way they have. I was one of those who thought the Prime Minister was very cautious. Instead of having a spark of Irish in him, I thought he was a bit Scotch. He has proved to be cautious in the right way and this bill has not been rushed through. It is being sent to the committee on banking and commerce.

Thank you.

SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA

USE OF RADIOTELEPHONE ON GREAT LAKES—APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament approve the agreement for the promotion of safety on the great lakes by means of radio between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Ottawa, February 21, 1952, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at this stage I would like to table two copies of the agreement for the promotion of safety on the great lakes by means of radio. I understand the practice is to table those prior to discussion of the resolution.

The agreement referred to in the resolution has been under discussion and under consideration by Canada and the United States for some months. The purpose of the agreement is to provide for the safety of life on the great lakes by means of radiotelephone or the installation of radiotelephony equipment. This agreement will not come into force until two years after it has been ratified by both parties. It may be terminated after a period of five years, providing a notice of twelve months has been given. The agreement authorizes the use of radiotelephony as a means of communication and for transmission of distress signals by ships on the great lakes, on the distress frequency of 2182 kilocycles and the continuance of the present working frequencies. It provides also for the compulsory installation of radiotelephone equipment on

(a) All great lakes shipping of 500 gross tons and over.

(b) All passenger carrying vessels over 65 feet in length.

(c) On every vessel of less than 500 gross tons engaged in towing another vessel of 500 gross tons or over or any floating object having dimension of 150 feet or more, unless the towing vessel or object complies with the agreement.

The agreement further requires that a continuous listening watch be maintained on the distress frequency of 2182 kilocycles by all vessels that are subject to this agreement. It also stipulates that each government shall undertake to ensure that necessary arrangements are made for a listening watch by coast stations on that frequency. All of the provisions of the agreement apply to vessels subject thereto while they are being navigated on the great lakes or connecting channels such as the St. Mary's river, the St. Clair river, lake St. Clair, the Detroit river, the Welland ship canal and the river St. Lawrence as far east as the lower exit of the Lachine canal and the Victoria bridge at Montreal.

Provision is made in the agreement for the exclusion of various ships of war, such as destroyers, corvettes and the like, together with vessels in tow, vessels not self-propelled by mechanical means, government vessels not engaged in trade and certain others as specified in article 3. In general terms, as set forth in the preamble of the agreement, the purpose of the agreement is to promote safety of life and property on the great lakes of North America by means of radio, and especially to make provision for radiotelephone communication for safety purposes, including communication as an aid to navigation.

Basically, the agreement constitutes mutual recognition by the governments of the two countries that radiotelephony, which enables direct communication between vessels as well as from ship to shore, should be the primary means of promoting safety on the great lakes. Radiotelephony, as the house knows, is now used extensively and effectively on the great lakes as a means of aiding navigation and of securing assistance in time of distress. So far as radio is concerned, the great lakes presents specialized problems requiring special treatment based on local conditions. The peculiar requirements of the great lakes have promoted a rapid development of ship-to-ship and ship-to-shore radio telephone communication. This has been a rapid and largely spontaneous development on the part of the shipping industry.

Technical regulations have been appended or annexed to the agreement which I tabled a moment ago, and it is provided in article 1 of the agreement that these regulations may be amended, as may be necessary, by agreement between the two governments. The house will have an opportunity of seeing the provisions of the agreement. I do not want to go into them at this stage in detail, but perhaps a general review will serve some purpose.

Article 1 of the agreement contains general provisions for the carrying out of the agreement and its applications to vessels of all countries.

Article 2 contains definitions of terms found in the agreement.

Article 3 defines the categories of vessels to which the agreement applies, and also those which are excluded from the application of the agreement.

Article 4 stipulates that a vessel which is not subject to the agreement does not become subject thereto due to stress of weather or force majeure.

Article 5 provides for the making of necessary arrangements for a listening watch by coast stations on the distress frequency.

Article 6 provides for exemption of vessels either partially, conditionally or completely from certain of the provisions of the agreement relating to technical operations.

Articles 7 to 14 inclusive contain provisions affecting technical operations, including those relating to operators, radiotelephone installation, vessel records, authority of the master, inspections and surveys, certification and privileges, issuance of certificate on request of responsible administration, and control.

Article 15 provides that the two governments, to the extent permitted by their respective constitutional procedures, will undertake to assist the vessels of other countries in meeting the requirements of the agreement.

Article 16 relates to the exchange of information respecting laws, regulations and reports.

Articles 17 and 18 provide for ratification, coming into force, duration and termination.

I should like to say just one word about the number of ships affected by this agreement. With respect to the number of vessels of Canadian registry which will be subject to the requirements of this agreement, I should like to point out that there are 221 cargo vessels of 500 tons or over already fitted with radiotelephone and affected by this agreement, and 90 of those will require some improvement of their installations. This means that 131 vessels are now equipped with radiotelephony in accordance with the terms of the agreement. There are 19 passenger vessels over 65 feet in length affected by the agreement. Two require more up-to-date apparatus, and four will require to be fitted with the prescribed equipment. The very fact that so many operators voluntarily have equipped their vessels with radiotelephone installations is a clear indication of their preference for radiotelephony. It is considered the two-year period above-mentioned is ample time to permit adaptation to these regulations.

The implementation of this agreement will require an amendment to section 406 of the Canada Shipping Act, which is the governing section, to provide that ships subject to the agreement shall be fitted with a radiotelephone installation. It is the intention of the government to introduce at the next session of parliament an amendment to section 406 so as to make this provision of the agreement applicable. Perhaps here I could anticipate questions from the opposition as to whether or not this will be referred to a standing committee of the house. The government feels that that is not necessary at this time, in view of the statement which I have just made, because when the section is amended at the next session of parliament it will unquestionably be necessary to refer the whole of the agreement to a standing committee.

The obligations of the agreement will apply to ships on international voyages beginning or terminating on the great lakes or St. Lawrence river above Montreal, in addition to the obligations to which they are subject under the international convention for the safety of life at sea. The imposition of these additional obligations on ships in inland waters does not appear to conflict with the international safety convention. This agreement should work to the advantage of the safety convention ships using the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river above Montreal, as it will place at their disposal the extensive radiotelephone facilities which will be provided by coast stations and ships operating on the great lakes. Assistance will be given to foreign ships requiring such assistance by a depot established at Montreal where equipment will be available at low cost. It is expected that there will be only a minor demand for this equipment, inasmuch as vessels now plying on the great lakes from outside points are usually equipped with radiotelephone, or will be so equipped in the very near future with the adoption on a world-wide basis of the frequency of 2182 kilocycles for safety and distress radiotelephone communication.

The government has recognized for some time the need for an agreement with the United States dealing with the use of radio on the great lakes. This matter has been under consideration between the two countries for some years and the agreement which is the subject of this resolution has been carefully prepared by representatives of both countries. It has been received favourably by the shipping operators on the great lakes. The government considers that, if ratified by both countries, the agreement will be beneficial to shipping on the great lakes, and I recommend that approval of the resolution be given by this house.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition approve of this treaty primarily of course because it is to further the safety of life on the great lakes. In the ordinary course we believe it would have been wise to have the agreement considered by one of the committees of the house; but in view of the fact that the session is in its last stages and that the house is sitting such long hours we doubt whether anything would be gained by so doing. The minister did not give that reason for not referring the agreement to a committee; but perhaps if we put his reason and our reason together, we can agree that there should be no reference to a committee. However, since the matter is not to be referred to a committee I should like to place before the minister, on behalf of the official opposition, four or five questions in connection with this agreement, and I hope he will answer them when he closes the debate; or if there is no procedure for him to close the debate, perhaps the house would consent to have him deal with these particular questions.

Mr. Knowles: It is a substantive motion.

Mr. Green: In the first place, article 3, subsection 2, clause (d) provides that all government vessels are exempt from the provisions of this agreement. That provision will apply not only to Canadian and United States government-owned vessels but also to vessels owned by any foreign government. We believe that these particular vessels should not be exempt. If the vessels are of the size which would call for compliance with the agreement if they are privately owned, then surely government vessels should at least be equipped in the same manner as the private vessels. Perhaps it is the intention that such should be the case. There does not seem to be any reason at all why government vessels should not comply with these provisions which are designed to promote the safety of life. Some vessels coming here which belong to other countries will be owned by foreign governments. Certainly they should have to comply with the provisions.

Then I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that the exemptions contained in this agreement are extremely wide. We hope that the Canadian government will not take advantage of the power to give such wide exemptions. For example in article 3, subsection 2, there is a provision to the effect that where a vessel is not making more than two voyages on the great lakes in any one calendar year, she may be exempted from many of these provisions. It will still be necessary for that vessel to have what is called a safety radiotelephony certificate, and to meet the radio frequency requirements. But as I read this particular part of the agreement such a vessel can be exempted from having an officer or some official on the ship who is qualified, and from carrying out what are the most important requirements contained in the agreement.

In article 6 there are even wider exemptions. If the Department of Transport takes advantage of these powers practically any ship could be exempted. The first subsection of the article reads as follows:

Each contracting government, if it considers that the conditions of the voyage or voyages affecting safety, including but not necessarily limited to the regularity or frequency of the voyages, the route or routes, the maximum distance of the vessel from shore, the length of voyage or voyages, and the absence of general navigation hazards, or other circumstances,—

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that those specific cases are listed; but there is, in addition, the broad right to exempt to a wider degree. The article continues:

—are such as to render the full application of articles 7, 8, and 9, or any of them, of this agreement unreasonable or unnecessary, may exempt—

And here is the specific power given to the department.

—partially, conditionally, or completely from the provisions of articles 7, 8, and 9, or any of them, any individual vessel for one or more voyages or for any period of time not exceeding one year from the date of exemption.

We hope that little use will be made of those wide exemption powers. If that particular article is used extensively, there is a hole made in the agreement which would render it of comparatively little value. We should like to have from the minister a statement with regard to the policy of the government in granting these exemptions.

Then another question which is bothering us is the provision in article 7 of the agreement for compelling continuous effective listening. Subsection 1, clause (a) provides:

There shall be on board, as an officer or member of the crew of vessel, at least one person whose qualifications for radiotelephone operation for safety purposes on the great lakes have been certified by the contracting governments.

That provision, of course, is perfectly reasonable.

Mr. Chevrier: What article is the hon. member reading?

Mr. Green: Article 7, subsection 1, clause (a). Then clause (b) of the same subsection reads as follows:

From among those certified persons, the master shall designate one or more who shall operate the radiotelephone installation.

But it goes on to say this:

The duties of the persons so designated need not be restricted to duties in connection with the radiotelephone installation but may include any and all duties assigned them by the master.

In other words, the officer or member of the crew can be a freight checker, a purser, a steward or he can carry on any other duties on the vessel.

Then clause (c) goes even further. It reads:

Except when the radiotelephone installation is being used to transmit or receive on frequencies authorized for the maritime mobile service, there shall be continuous effective listening on the distress frequency by aural means by at least one officer or member of the crew who has been designated by the master to perform such listening.

Then we find this further sentence:

The person so designated by the master may simultaneously perform other duties relating to the operation or navigation of the vessel, provided that such other duties do not interfere with the effectiveness of the listening.

We have had difficulties on the west coast arising out of people having double jobs of that kind. There has been a considerable use of the radiotelephone on vessels, but the person who is supposed to be listening to the radiotelephone may have half a dozen other jobs to do; and even in the case of the radiotelegraph, that is the ordinary Marconi, we have had complaints of Marconi operators being put on other jobs, having to check the freight and look after various other duties, with the result that the radiotelegraph has not been properly watched, and there has been the same trouble with the radiotelephone.

Just a year or so ago we had an instance of a passenger vessel approaching the entrance to Vancouver harbour in a fog. It had a radiotelephone, and the operator on the First Narrows bridge was warning the vessel that it was running into the rocks; and yet, because there was nobody listening, no attention was paid to the warning and the vessel piled up on the rocks of Stanley park.

I should like to warn the minister that making provisions of this kind, whereby the duties of the man responsible for the radiotelephone can be expanded to cover other different duties, is bound to mean that he pays just that much less attention to the radiotelephone, and the end result is that you greatly weaken your provision for safety of life on the great lakes. I hope that the department will give consideration to that feature when preparing the legislation which is to be submitted next year.

Article 5 provides that:

> Each contracting government undertakes to ensure that necessary arrangements are made for a listening watch by coast stations on the distress frequency.

Obviously there is not a great deal of point in compelling ships to have radiotelephone if there are no proper stations on the shore with which they can communicate. We should like to know from the minister whether or not the Department of Transport is now in a position to provide the proper listening watches by coast stations? Will it mean the establishment of more coast stations than there are at the present time, or what is to be done by Canada to implement that particular article of the agreement?

Finally, I can find no provision in this agreement dealing with radiotelegraphy as distinguished from radiotelephony. I would have thought that the agreement would provide that radiotelegraph could be used as an alternative, but there seems to be no such provision. It is hoped that ocean-going vessels will come into the great lakes when the St. Lawrence waterway has been constructed. In all cases these ocean-going vessels will have radio operators. I would think that would be the position with practically all of the ocean-going freighters which would come into the great lakes. I believe that that eventuality should have been foreseen. We would hope that there will not be any removal of the safety provisions in connection with radio on these deep-sea vessels.

As the minister knows, there has been a good deal of complaint in British Columbia about the shipping companies trying to have regulations made so that they could use the radiotelephone instead of using the ordinary Marconi. Some of us who represent coastal ridings have felt that the lives of persons travelling on passenger vessels were being endangered because there were not sufficiently stringent regulations compelling the use of a Marconi operator, and we do not want to have any legislation passed by the Canadian government which would have the effect of making that situation worse even on the great lakes. When the minister closes the debate I would ask him to explain just how the plans for radiotelephony fit in with the ordinary Marconi.

There may be other points which have come to the attention of other opposition parties. We have had this agreement only a short time and there has not been a great deal of opportunity for study. I would ask the minister to deal with these questions which I have raised.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has I think covered the ground pretty well. The questions that he asked of the minister are ones that should be answered. Just as the hon. member says, we have had this agreement so recently in our hands that very little study had been given to it by myself, as a matter of fact, and I have not been back in the house except for the last few days. However, I endorse what he has said regarding the necessity of having competent people on board the lake ships who will be able to take any messages that come to the ship at any time.

Another important matter is that someone among the personnel aboard the ship, whether it be on the lakes, on the Pacific coast or on the Atlantic coast, wherever passengers are carried, should be competent to repair any break-down of the apparatus. I think that is a very important matter. I was on a ship off the Pacific coast a year or two ago, and I found that on most of the ships, while the radar was in operation, there was no one competent to make even a minor repair if anything went wrong with the apparatus. What is true of radar of course is even more true regarding the radiotelephone system. Anything that we can do by way of legislation and regulations to prevent the loss of life at sea, apart altogether from the loss of property involved, we should do in this house. I welcome the agreement. We have had several very serious disasters in the last few years which have given something of a black eye to our shipping on the great lakes as well as in our coastal waters. The more we do in the way of regulation and subsequent legislation to ensure absolute safety—radiotelegraph, Marconi, radar, or whatever it may be —the better it will be for our own shipping interests and for the good name of the country in which we live.

All I wish to say is that we join in supporting the agreement; and we hope that when further amendments are made to the statutes consideration will be given to some of the matters that have arisen and are not covered by this agreement.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of the minister, before this resolution becomes effective, that we have similar problems on the coastal range of the Atlantic. I would mention particularly Northumberland strait. Why could not this provision be made applicable to the Atlantic as well as to the great lakes service?

On several occasions lately I have discussed with the minister the matter of coastguard protection in the Atlantic region. When this resolution is going through, I am wondering why some further protection could not be given to our ships and sailors on the Atlantic seaboard, as well.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the type of equipment to which reference is made in this resolution is the same as that used along the Atlantic coast line. I would say however that in my opinion radiotelephone has been of greater assistance to boatmen on the Atlantic coast line than any other improvement in the last fifty years.

When the minister points out that this is an international agreement, I am reminded of the period of time during the war when it was found necessary to discontinue this service. In other words, boats that had been equipped with radiotelephone were obliged to remove that equipment during wartime, and it was of course costly equipment.

In the section from which I come both Canadian and American boats are plying those waters. I would say without fear of successful contradiction that two-thirds of the boats there, even those fifty feet in length, are today equipped with radiotelephones, and it is the greatest convenience one could imagine for those who operate the boats. The radiotelephone service is installed usually by the owners of the freighters and carriers. I would point out however that today many of our individual fishermen have installed a similar service.

Approaching the matter from its international aspect, I would point out that today even taxicabs operating along the international border must disconnect their radiotelephone equipment upon crossing the border, and upon returning it is connected again. This is a great nuisance to those who are operating taxis.

I believe the minister's suggestion is one that will be endorsed by all those who have knowledge of conditions on the water. We know that radiotelephone is a great convenience. I cannot see however that the services of a full-time operator would be necessary. I have said that I am not fully aware that the equipment here indicated is exactly the same as that used along the Atlantic coast line, but in what I am saying I am taking it for granted that this is so. In those circumstances I think it is not necessary at any time to have a full-time operator. This involves an additional cost for boat owners who are operating under conditions of great expense today, and who must pay high wages.

I support the resolution because I believe any type of radiotelephone connection is helpful in any area where it can be provided.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I understand I am not in order in speaking at this time. If I could have permission of the house I should like to deal with some of the objections raised.

Mr. Knowles: It is a substantive motion, and the minister has the right.

Mr. Pouliot: You are always in order.

Mr. Graydon: And you are among friends.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not so sure about the last statement.

I am most grateful to the house for the manner in which the debate has taken place. I have listened with interest to the general approval given to the agreement signed by Canada and the United States, subject of course to certain apparent deficiencies, as they have been pointed out by hon. members who have taken part in the discussion.

The object and purpose of the agreement is of course an excellent one, and this was made particularly evident in the remarks of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) who made special reference to the beneficial effects of radiotelephone in certain areas.

I believe there can be no doubt that in the minds of a great majority of those using the great lakes, radiotelephone is more efficient than radiotelegraph when operating within a restricted area. That is why I think there must be general agreement as to the purpose and object of this agreement signed between Canada and the United States. Radiotelegraph has of course a greater range, and unquestionably can do a better job on international voyages. But within the area covered by this agreement I do not think there is any doubt about the superiority of radiotelephone over radiotelegraph communication. That, at least, seems to be the opinion of the experts.

Turning now to the questions that have arisen, I need not say to the house that when an agreement of this kind has been under negotiation for several years it must of necessity have been arrived at by compromise. There are many things in the agreement we would have liked to see otherwise; but in our anxiety to reach a decision as to the mandatory installation of telephone equipment on our ships on the great lakes, we did consent to certain compromises.

That is the general answer I would make to some of the objections raised. And, dealing more particularly with those objections, we hear the question asked as to why government vessels are exempt. Our view was that they should not have been exempt. We felt all along that there should have been application of these regulations to our vessels.

Mr. Green: The minister is referring to government vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. However, the other party to the agreement thought otherwise. As a matter of fact I do not think it makes any difference because I can say now that the vast majority if not all of the government vessels operating on the great lakes are today equipped with radiotelephone facilities.

Then there was the suggestion that there are too many exemptions. In article 3 there are exemptions for certain ships, provided they do not make more than two voyages. In article 6 there is a general policy of exemption covering a wider field. It has been asked what the policy of the government is with reference to these additional exemptions. My answer to that is that the Canada Shipping Act, the international convention for the safety of life at sea and this agreement all make provision for certain exemptions. In fact in the Canada Shipping Act there are a number of sections giving the minister discretion, after recommendation from the board of steamship inspection, to grant exemptions. I think there should be exemptions for both parties because I can visualize a number of cases that might well arise when, if it were not possible to grant an exemption, it would be altogether impossible for the ship to go to sea. I can think, for instance, of exemptions now granted under the Canada Shipping Act in cases where the operator of a ship has no qualified mate or an engineer, and consequently would not be able to proceed and his whole operation is held up. There is provision in the act for that kind of exemption.

Mr. Green: The minister is not thinking of the Ming Sung ships, is he?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I was not thinking of them at this time although I believe that the exemptions in that case were wisely given. They may not have turned out as my hon. friend and I would have wished but I am still hopeful that notwithstanding the present position it will be possible to recoup a substantial amount of our money involved in those operations. I should like to get back to the exemptions with which I was dealing. It is not the intention of the government to use its discretion widely in granting such exemptions. I should not like to be tied down to what I say now, but I will say that on the contrary our intention is to exempt some ferries and perhaps also in some cases to reduce the power of equipment. Again I should not like to be tied down to this statement, but I will also say that beyond that I cannot visualize any general exercise of the discretionary powers by way of exemption.

I was also asked about the article governing coast station listening watches, how they are operating, is there a sufficient number in operation and will more have to be established. No greater number of listening posts will have to be established than are now in operation. As a matter of fact these listening posts have been in operation since 1938, I believe it is. They are effective and efficient, and we do not think it will be necessary to add to their number. We think that those existing now on the great lakes at places such as Kingston, Toronto, Port Burwell, Point Edward, Midland, Sault Ste. Marie and Port Arthur are sufficient to look after the operation of shipping on the great lakes at least on our side of the boundary line.

I was asked to differentiate between radiotelephone and radiotelegraph operations and to say why there is no provision here for radiotelegraph. I think I anticipated the answer in my opening remarks when I said that radiotelephone is more effective in a shorter range. The reason why radiotelegraph is excluded entirely from the operation of this agreement is that the range of radiotelephone is all that is required for the protection of life and property within the area of the great lakes. The law as it now stands is found in section 406 (2) (a) of the Canada Shipping Act which provides for the installation of radiotelegraph equipment on certain vessels. For instance the act requires passenger steamships to carry radiotelegraph apparatus and a radio operator when they fall within one of the three following categories, namely, (1) carrying fifty or more persons and going on a voyage of more than 200 nautical miles; (2) carrying 250 or more persons and going on a voyage of more than 90 nautical miles; and (3) carrying 500 or more persons and going on a voyage of more than 20 nautical miles.

In addition, there is provision in section 406 (2) (b) covering the requirements for cargo vessels of 5,000 gross tons and over. They have to carry radiotelegraph apparatus and a radio operator on voyages of more than 200 nautical miles. The law as it exists now is covered in those two sections. Then of course there is the international convention for the safety of life at sea which excludes the great lakes.

Mr. Green: Includes or excludes?

Mr. Chevrier: Excludes the great lakes. Therefore this agreement with reference to the compulsory installation of radiotelephone equipment will be restricted to the area of the great lakes as far east as the lower exit of the Lachine canal. Any ships travelling beyond the great lakes into the gulf of St. Lawrence and from there into the ocean, or vice versa, will be subject not only to this agreement but also to the international convention for the safety of life at sea which requires the installation of radiotelegraph equipment. That is the distinction which exists between the radiotelegraph and the radiotelephone and the reason why radiotelegraph is not included in the agreement.

Some objection was raised on the ground that it is not a good thing to allow an operator to do more than one job. It was said that it was not a good thing to have a man carry on as a boatswain, a mate or an assistant mate and at the same time listen to the telephone. I think the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) covered that. I do not know if my hon. friend has been on these ships when they are in operation. I have on a number of occasions, and I think the procedure is simple and one which works out quite satisfactorily. The loudspeaker is on the bridge and is tuned in to the frequency of 2182 kilocycles. There are always two if not more persons on the bridge, the master and a couple of mates. With that frequency tuned in it is a very simple thing for a man to listen to the radiotelephone and at the same time carry on his duties as mate, assistant mate or second assistant mate.

I have seen it done frequently in the summer months and I think it operates efficiently. There is no doubt but that the two parties to this agreement thought so, and I am sure they came to that conclusion because of the experience their nationals have had over the years. Some question was raised whether this agreement is applicable to the Atlantic region. The treaty covers the great lakes and the operation of ships between Canada and the United States. It is not made applicable to the Atlantic region. What is applicable to the Atlantic region is sections 406 (2) (a) and 406 (2) (b) of the Canada Shipping Act which require the installation of radiotelegraph equipment and the operation of that equipment. A good many ships now operating in that area have radiotelephone. It is not mandatory but they have it over and above the radiotelegraph equipment. That position will be covered by an amendment to section 406 of the act which it is proposed to bring in at the next session of parliament when we implement this agreement.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Might I ask the minister a question? When you speak of radiotelegraph and radiotelephone, would it not be necessary with radiotelegraph to have trained and experienced operators, whereas with radiotelephone any officer of the ship could operate?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, my hon. friend is quite right in that assumption. I do not know that I can add much more to this because, as I indicated earlier, there will be full opportunity to discuss the terms of this agreement when the amendment to section 406 of the Canada Shipping Act is brought in at the next session of parliament. I here state that I will introduce that amendment and I take it that in the usual course it will be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Pouliot: I would like to ask a question of the minister. What is the tonnage of the boats that will be affected by this agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: Earlier I indicated that there were three groups of ships affected. They are set out in article 3:

(a) Every vessel of 500 gross tons or over.
(b) Every passenger carrying vessel over 65 feet in length . . .
(c) Every vessel under 500 gross tons engaged in towing another vessel of 500 gross tons . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

KOREA

CANADIAN TROOPS ON KOJE ISLAND—REPLY TO REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Has he received any reply to the representations that were made to Washington regarding the sending of Canadian troops to Koje island and their duties there? If so, would he make a statement?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a reply was received by the department this morning. I have not had a chance to give it consideration and I would not want to say anything at the moment. I may be able to make a statement tomorrow or the next day when my estimates are before the house.

GERM WARFARE

STATEMENTS OF DR. ENDICOTT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I am sorry I was not able to give him notice, but that is due to the fact the literature only arrived on the desks of the members of this house today from a peace movement headed by Dr. Endicott. This literature states that 10,000 people assembled in Massey Hall were given proof of the use of poisonous gas and germ warfare by the United Nations troops, troops that are associated with our Canadian unit. This cancerous, termite group is able to address 10,000 people in Massey Hall—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Order, that is not a question, it is a speech.

Mr. Ferguson: What procedure is the government going to adopt—I am making it, not you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robinson): May I request the hon. member to ask his question.

Mr. Ferguson: I was asking the question when I was rudely interrupted. The question is: In view of this literature which has been distributed throughout this House of Commons, and I presume the Senate, is the government in a position to make a statement as to what steps they are taking to stop this seditious literature that is being circulated throughout Canada? What steps are we taking to stop this kind of cancerous condition that exists in Canada today, and should be stopped?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The hon. member not having given me notice of his question, Mr. Speaker, I shall take his question as notice and bring down an answer.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON AND ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Have the officials of the Department of Fisheries received from the Prince Edward Island fisheries federation an urgent request for the extension of the lobster fishing season to July 12, 1952?

If so, has this been granted?

While I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a second question to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew): In view of the very heavy losses in lobster fishing gear, namely traps and equipment, due to ice conditions in May and at a later date to very heavy storms, will the department now give consideration and financial assistance to compensate for losses of the north shore and south shore fishermen in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of both questions and I will endeavour to answer them.

As far as the first one is concerned, regarding the extension of the lobster fishing season to July 12, it is apparently an urgent matter. The department has received wires about it and I think that all other maritime members and senators have received similar wires. I can assure the hon. member that this matter is being considered at the present time. We have made inquiry from our inspector there to see if the request for extension is justified. The request is based on the fact that there has been bad weather and also that there were losses of gear earlier in the season.

On the second question, the policy of the government in such matters has been that they consider it a matter of relief. If it is of a nature or kind beyond the competence or capacity of the provincial government to deal with, that government may come to the federal government and ask for assistance. On the basis of the request and the size of the undertaking the government will decide whether or not assistance will be granted. Up to the present time the government of Prince Edward Island has not made application to us for assistance.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister when he would expect a decision with respect to the extension of the season? What affects the spring season in Prince Edward Island applies equally to the spring season on the north shore of Nova Scotia and Northumberland strait.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge no request has come to the department from the fishermen in that area but may I suggest that I take this as notice and tomorrow morning on my estimates I will be pleased to answer any of these questions.

COMMISSION MEETING FOR NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does he plan to have a representative of his department at the annual meeting of the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries being held at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, from June 30 to July 9, 1952?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question. Because the conference will be concerned largely with scientific matters relating to fisheries, the Department of External Affairs will not be represented at the second annual meeting of this commission. Canada, however, will be represented by the three Canadian commissioners, Dr. Bates, the deputy minister of fisheries, Mr. R. Gushue and Mr. Howard MacKichan. The commissioners will be assisted by Dr. Needler and other scientific advisers from the Department of Fisheries.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

UNITED STATES ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In view of the fact that word has just been received that the United States senate has sent the St. Lawrence seaway bill back to committee, I understand on a vote of 43 to 40—which would appear to kill it until the 1953 session of congress—may I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) what significance and effect that decision of the United States senate will have on our own plans for proceeding with the waterway?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should think it would have little or no effect at all on the present negotiations which are going on between Canada and the United States with reference to the project which we have had in mind. By that I mean that even when the matter was before the United States congress negotiations had been started, following the talk which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had with the President of the United States in September of last year, to prepare for a joint application before the international joint commission. That application is proceeding satisfactorily. It has reached a stage where it should be possible to go before the international joint commission; so that the decision of congress should not interfere in the slightest with the intention of Canada to proceed with its own development of the seaway on Canada's side of the boundary and also to proceed before the international joint commission with the concurrence of the United States, in so far as the development of power is concerned.

Mr. Graydon: May I suggest to the minister that this country has given the United States a pretty long time to make up their minds in connection with this matter and it would seem to me that as far as their participation is concerned we had better go ahead with this job alone rather than bother with their intervention at all.

Mr. Coldwell: I was going to ask the minister this. He said that the application has reached the stage where it will be possible to make the joint application. Does the minister mean that the application is going to be made forthwith?

Mr. Chevrier: We are proceeding along those lines now.

My hon. friend will remember that the legislation introduced at the last session covered both alternatives. If congress had approved we would have proceeded along the lines of the 1941 agreement. If they had not, we would avail ourselves of the alternative procedure, and make application before the international joint commission.

Mr. Coldwell: It was the phrasing of the minister's reply that I wanted clarified.

Mr. Graydon: The decision of the senate this morning does not mean that concurrence will not be forthcoming with respect to the application to the international joint commission? This only concerns the question of their financial participation in the scheme?

Mr. Chevrier: They are two different projects altogether.

PROVISION TO RELEASE CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FROM CERTAIN CLAIMS BY HER MAJESTY IN EXCHANGE FOR PREFERRED STOCKS, ETC.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 308, an act to revise the capital structure of the Canadian National Railway Company and to provide for certain other financial matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Pouliot: I will not insist, Mr. Chairman, on the fact that we have not received the printed copy of the evidence taken at the sitting of the committee last Tuesday, June 10, but we will examine the first section of this bill. I have some facts to lay before the house to make the committee better acquainted with this piece of legislation.

In the first place, I must say that there is some confusion in the finances of the Canadian National Railways, because there is only one man in Canada or in the world who can explain it. You and I, Mr. Chairman, cannot explain it. The leaders of the parties in the house cannot explain it, either. The minister cannot explain it. The official critic of the opposition and all the gentlemen who are interested in figures cannot explain it. Who said that? The president and chairman of the railway at page 155 of the report of April 29. Mr. Fulton had asked a question and then Mr. Gordon said:

The only man in Canada or in the world who can explain that is Mr. Cooper.

I am not surprised. I knew that.

Mr. Chevrier: He corrected that afterwards.

Mr. Fraser: He corrected that statement at the last meeting of that committee.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, perhaps, but this was the voice of the heart.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He corrected it, because I asked him and he corrected it.

Mr. Pouliot: That is all right; something was known in the meantime, but it is right here and the hon. member knows that it is right here. I do not repeat that statement as my own. I quote faithfully a statement that has been made by the president and chairman of the Canadian National Railways in a meeting of the railways and shipping committee. That statement explains a lot. It throws a vivid light on the whole financial structure of the Canadian National Railways.

Now, sir, I was very much interested to know if there was some co-operation between the board of directors and the management concerning the procedure to approve the financing of the railway. I insisted on having the bylaws, and on knowing how the gentlemen who represent the government of Canada on the board of directors manage that railway, and consequently how the decisions are arrived at: In the first place I asked for the bylaws in virtue of chapter 172 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1927. On May 26 the minister told me they were old bylaws passed at the time of Sir Henry Thornton. They existed. He told me that he would be ready to give them to me for my information. I thanked him. I accepted them. The other day the house did not want me to put them on the record; and for the punishment of the house I will not read them; it is a sanction. The curiosity of hon. members will not be satisfied, if they have any.

But afterwards chapter 172 was amended in 1928, 1929 and 1931 by statutes that everybody knows. Then I asked for the production of the bylaws passed in virtue of chapter 172 as amended. Owing to the change of times and the turning of the earth, I thought there would be new regulations in virtue of the Canadian National Railways Act as amended. The minister told me that there were bylaws passed not in virtue of the Canadian National Railways Act, chapter 172, but in virtue of the general Railway Act, chapter 170. On June 10 I asked the chairman and president what those regulations were; he told me that there were none except for some providing for cuspidors, for notifying the passengers on trains not to play poker, and things of such importance. There were no regulations. I am sorry I have not the printed copy of the report here, because I would quote it verbatim; but my memory is good enough to recall what happened on Tuesday last. At the present time therefore there are no regulations such as there were at the time of Sir Henry Thornton in order to have some order in the dealings of the board of directors with the management and also with the financing of the company. It is not a success. When I say that I have only praise for the Minister of Transport, for the staff of his department and also for many officials of the railway who are nice fellows and who are easier to deal with than are some others.

I now come to the matter of the finances of the Canadian National Railways. The gifts acknowledged to have been made to the railway by the Canadian government may not amount to $4¼ billion—"b" for "boy"—but they amount to at least $2 billion in 15 years. My authority for that statement is chapter 22 of the statutes of 1937 which quotes the exact amount of the debts of the Canadian National Railways which have been cancelled, and gives the figure of $1,218,642,195.27. Besides that I have also the authority of the minister himself as reported at page 3067 of Hansard to this effect:

My hon. friend—

Referring to me.

—said the total amount involved in this measure was $1,400 million by way of relief. That is not so. The amount under this bill, as I said earlier, is $736 million.

"M" for "Mary" or "Moses". If we add together $1,218 million and $736 million, we have that figure of $2 billion which is the minimum of the gifts that have been made to the Canadian National Railways. That is something which is worth considering. I am surprised that so many members of the opposition were quick to come to the rescue of the president and chairman when I quoted faithfully the remark that had been printed in the official report. Again I made the distinction that I made on June 6 with regard to the answer to questions, by Canadian National Railways, about the financing of that railway. On June 2 I was answered thus by the Canadian National Railways and their answer was conveyed to the house by the minister. The first question was:

1. Since 1923, what has been the total yearly amount of (a) advances and loans made; (b) guarantees given, by the government to the Canadian National Railways?

The answer was:

1. Financing for the Canadian National Railways has in each year since 1923 received consideration and approval by the government and is recorded in the statutes.

I know that quite well; but I have the right to get that information from the Canadian National Railways. I am not surrounded by statisticians who can do that research for me. I do my own work. We must have some co-operation in order to know what is going on. The second question was:

2. Since that date, what amount of the debt of the Canadian National Railways has been written off by the Canadian government?

The answer was:

2. See answer to No. 1.

That is a fine answer. The third question was:

3. Since 1923 what amounts have been spent in each province by the Canadian National (a) for the construction, maintenance and repair of the railway; (b) as capital expenditure for the construction, extension and installation of machinery in each of the erecting shops of the Canadian National?

The answer was:

3. (a) The accounts of the Canadian National Railways are not maintained in a way which makes it possible to segregate expenditures in the tabulation requested.

(b) To endeavour to give this information would involve an examination of accounting records for the past thirty years and this could not be undertaken by the existing staff of the railway.

I thought it bold of them to take that high-hat attitude with the government. I was one who years ago fought to have some light thrown on the railways' business. Then everything was a mystery. We could not know anything. When we ask for information, they say what they want to say. They are not under oath. What is the use of having committees of this house sitting to hear witnesses who are not under oath? Is any witness in court or before any tribunal insulted when the clerk of the court hands him the Bible and asks him to take an oath on it? Nobody is insulted. It is a matter of course. The witnesses are supposed to take an oath, to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. How is it that a practice has arisen, and has existed for a number of years, that when committees of the House of Commons hear witnesses who make most important statements they do not take the oath? Is there any insult in taking the oath? It is the common practice; otherwise the tribunals would not be worth anything; nobody could rely on the wisdom and fairness of judgments if the witnesses were not called to take the oath. There is no insult in that.

Such extraordinary statements have been made by some witnesses before the railways and shipping committee that I have enough respect for them to say I am sure they would never have dared to make them under oath. We take it for granted, and some people may find it extraordinary that I express sincerely my views before this committee of the House of Commons to make the people and the press of the country at large think of the aura of irresponsibility of the witnesses who come before the committees to tell tales, tell stories, bedtime stories.

I say to you, sir, that the reply from the Canadian National Railways was highly unsatisfactory, and it is an insult to the House of Commons. I protest strongly against the high-hat attitude of the president of the Canadian National Railways in that respect. Whoever sent that answer, it was under his authority.

Now, coming to more pleasant matters: the Canadian National Railways has refused to answer my question which was legitimate and pertinent. They could not do it. It is not surprising. There is only one genius there, Mr. Cooper, who knows everything. He is a Pic de la Mirandole, a genius, knows everything. Hon. members may get a mouthful of him before the committee but when they start to squeeze him they learn there is nothing to it. What is refreshing is the answer of the Department of Finance to another question that I asked, and which was given in a return on June 11. I asked:

Did the cancellation of capital stocks and certain indebtedness of the Canadian National Railway system to His Majesty, in virtue of chapter 22 of 1 George VI (1937), amount to more than $1,200 million, and what was the exact amount of that cancellation?

I gave it a moment ago; it is $1,218 million. There is a little explanation in the answer. It is satisfactory. My second question was:

What was the total amount of the Canadian National Railway system securities held by the Canadian government at various times since 1923?

I have the whole list. In 1923 it was $576 million; in 1936, it was $721 million. In 1937 it fell down to $79,252,000, obviously because of the cancelling legislation of that year. Then it went up, and in 1949 it was $743 million. In 1950, it was $739 million and in 1951, $857 million. The amount of the securities held by the securities trust of the Canadian National Railways increased. The third question was:

What amounts have been loaned or advanced to the Canadian National Railways system in virtue of the Canadian National Railways financing acts of 1934, 1935, 1937, 1940, 1940-1941, 1942, 1943, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1950, 1951 and 1951 second session?

It is all given, the total amount advanced, the amount of deficit charged to expenditures and so on. In one year it was $48 million, and in another year, $47 million. What strikes me is the way it reads. For instance, in 1934 we get:

Total amount advanced		$59,157,510.17
Amount of deficit charged to expenditure	$48,407,900.70
Amount repaid	10,749,609.47
		59,157,510.17
Amount remaining unpaid		nil

It is like that for many years, for 1937, for 1940, 1941 and 1942. Why? And there are small amounts remaining unpaid, but the total amount that has been fixed up by this legislation is $1,500 million.

Then there were other questions about the loans. The legislation concerning the Canadian National Railways is a kind of maze. It is included in so many statutes that they would form a whole library. But what interested me in that legislation, and I am not to object to it because I am a C.N.R. man inasmuch as the Canadian National Railways are more respectful of parliament and are more co-operative with the government, is that there should be some control of that. When one of the vice-presidents, Mr. Fairweather, appeared before the committee on railways and shipping on May 14, in connection with the Kitimat railway project, I asked him what percentage the province of Quebec had received from the tremendous amounts of money that have been earned by the Canadian National Railways and voted to them by parliament. The answer to the question was given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on May 15, as it appears at page 2226 of Hansard. That answer indicates that the province of Quebec has the smallest mileage per thousand of inhabitants, and the second lowest mileage per thousand square miles of land area.

Quebec has not been dealt with as it should have been, and by the Canadian National Railways in particular. We have evidence of it—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I must point out that we are dealing here with a measure connected with the refinancing of the Canadian National Railways. My hon. friend has been referring to a number of matters that I suggest are not germane to the discussion at all. I cannot see how railway lines in the province of Quebec have anything to do with the section now before us.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, the minister may be perfectly right in saying that, but the province of Quebec has not benefited at all from the huge sums of money voted by parliament to the Canadian National Railways. However I am ready to co-operate, and I shall not insist.

Mr. Chevrier: That is an inaccurate statement, and I certainly cannot allow it to go without challenge. However, I have raised a point of order, and I would ask for a ruling upon it.

Mr. Pouliot: I am ready to co-operate with the minister, even when he raises points of order which are groundless. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, that it is very easy for the minister to say that what I have stated has no relation to the bill, but it is even easier to say that if his request is granted I shall be able to prove that it has a direct relationship with the bill. However, I shall not insist upon proceeding; I have already made my case.

To conclude my remarks about the refinancing of the railways, I will say again to the minister that I am one of his most solid supporters, and I shall not insist upon discussing the matter further—and he knows it. On the other hand I do not want him to have to suffer unfair criticism from people who may hold him responsible for what is being done wrongly by the management of the railways.

This is a big piece of business. However, my memory serves me well enough to quote, in conclusion, the answer given by the president and chairman of the board to a question I asked him in committee. My question was about the purchase of shares of stock by the government. That stock was to carry interest at a rate of 4 per cent, I presume.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Do I understand the hon. member is concluding his remarks? I am forced to advise him that the time at his disposal has expired.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes. I shall be very brief. I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure you will see that in what I shall say I am strictly in order.

On that occasion I asked Mr. Gordon if the purpose of the provision whereby the government would buy a certain amount of stock from the railways was not to prevent the railways from being in the red, and showing a deficit. He answered affirmatively. Therefore, sir, my case is complete. Before I had all the information I now have, I stated in the house that the purpose of the legislation was to write red entries in black ink. I have now concluded my evidence, which is final. I hope, on the other hand, that the concession being made by parliament to the Canadian National Railways will serve a better purpose than what has been done for them in the past.

Canadian National Railways

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata. Perhaps no part of it held as great interest as did the last, in which he assured us that his speech had been designed to help the Canadian National Railways and the minister. Perhaps as it is now within two minutes of the adjournment hour, I might be permitted to resume at three o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, when the committee took recess I was just about to make some comments on this bill to revise the capital structure of the Canadian National Railway Company. This matter was debated at some length in the house. The bill has also been before the special committee, and there is no need for me to occupy much time. However, I should like to say a few things partly for the sake of getting them on the record, and there are one or two quotations I wish to give from the proceedings of the committee.

First of all I want to remind this committee, as has been said before, of the fact that this is a problem which has been before us for many years and the reasons for which we know. Shortly after the first great war it became necessary to amalgamate into one railway system several lines which had been privately owned and several lines which had been publicly owned, and which had the one common feature that they were all in difficulties. The railway was put together first of all in a rather haphazard manner, perhaps the best that could be done in the circumstances, and in the early 1920's just after this had been done there was a period of great doubt, anxiety and scepticism in the public mind whether the situation could continue or whether we might have to amalgamate all our railways into one unit. Most of us in the house are very glad that was not done because we dislike monopolies, even that strange creation called a democratic monopoly which is so dear to some members of the house, and which I always find it difficult to understand.

At any rate, that situation continued until the 1930's, which of course was a period of fresh difficulty. At that time the Duff commission was appointed and I should like to read a short extract from the report of that very able commission for the purpose of putting it on the record and also because it endorses the necessity of what is being done in this measure besides containing a warning which I think it is useful for us to remember. At page 30 of the report of the Duff commission I find the following:

> . . . this commission is of opinion that it must be frankly recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National system must be regarded as lost and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down . . .

That was the statement made by the Duff commission, but they did not regard that period of great economic distress as a desirable time to readjust the capital structure. I also wish to refer to another passage in the report of the Duff commission where they say that reasonable protection should be given to the privately-owned undertaking against arbitrary action by the publicly-owned undertaking which might unfairly prejudice the interests of the privately-owned undertaking.

On that score I should merely like to comment that when the two railways appeared before the Turgeon commission there was welcome evidence of good feeling and understanding along with healthy rivalry and competition and sympathy for each other's difficulties and problems. Mainly as a result of the report of the Duff commission we have the two railways and we have this healthy competition which has been greatly to our advantage and has provided us with two railway systems which I think can be regarded as admirable.

I should also like to refer to the measure of relief that was given in 1937 when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, then minister of transport, recommended to the house that a very large measure of relief be given, something over $1 billion, and that was in fact done. Finally we have the report of the Turgeon commission which recommended various further easements. I I was going to say that they are comprehended in this bill but it would be more accurate to say that the government's decision, based on the Turgeon report, as to what it recommends to the house is in this bill.

The bill has been before the committee. There is little need of my talking at length about it. As I shall indicate in a moment, the bill is believed to carry out the immediate objective. The disappointing thing about it, perhaps inevitably disappointing, is that I did not feel—I do not think anyone will disagree with this statement—that the railway or the department was able to tell us they felt sure that they had found a principle of action which enabled them to assure us that this second major operation on the finances of the railway would be the final operation. However, they felt that it was beneficial and that it could be brought forward and recommended to the house. I think it is of interest to read briefly what the president of the railway, Mr. Gordon, said about it. I am referring to the evidence Mr. Gordon gave before the committee.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member tell us what date that was?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The committee met on June 10. This is merely the typewritten copy, so the paging may not be of significance when it is printed. However I should like to read the following statement of Mr. Gordon from page B-6 of the typewritten copy:

> When we made our submission to the royal commission, as I said in my statement, I based it on the opinion, after analysis, that we needed relief, that is, that the Canadian National needed relief in the form of fixed interest charges of roughly $30 million a year. What I am saying about this bill is that it means that the actual relief that we get by the transfer of this $736 million into 4 per cent preferred stock would relieve us of fixed interest charges, plus the adjustments that we get in connection with the $100 million on behalf of Newfoundland, plus this arrangement in section 6, to give us an amount of equity capital each year, plus the prairie adjustment; so that when you put all of those together, you get the effect which in essence is the equivalent of $30 million a year relief. It is not exactly the same in form, but it is the same in quantum of relief, and it is in a better form in our opinion.

I read that because I think it is of importance to know whether the man who is primarily responsible for the operation of the railway did in fact feel that the measure before us would give the relief which is necessary.

As I indicated, there are some things which are disappointing. It would have been more satisfactory if we had been able to discern a principle in the amount of relief that was given, but I think the only principle you can find is that those responsible felt that a certain relief was needed and they took the means by one device and another to make up to the total amount of relief desired.

The other comments I wish to make can come up as we reach the appropriate sections of the bill, with the exception of one point. There is one comment I wish to make on a matter that seems to me to be of some importance. It arose before the committee and I hope it is relevant and proper to raise it here. I refer to the directors of the Canadian National Railways.

The directors of the Canadian National Railways are outstanding citizens, and nothing I say is intended to reflect or criticize them in the slightest possible degree. However, this I will say. I feel that with advantage to the railway the board might be enlarged. That suggestion is put by some on a geographical basis, that we should have all parts of the country represented from a geographical point of view. Personally I am not so concerned with that. I think it is more desirable to have a good man from British Columbia than a bad man from Ontario; but I feel ever so strongly that in the tremendous task which has been assigned to Mr. Gordon, for whom I have the highest respect, he needs the assistance of all the ability he can get. Do not misunderstand me, I do not believe myself that directors run a railway company. I know they do not and they should not. Nevertheless, if you look at the Canadian Pacific Railway you will find they have a large board. Secondly, you will find an extraordinary percentage of men holding key business positions. The advantage is that those men, even though they may meet very seldom, and even though they do not try to interfere with management—which they should not do—make available their advice. It is the advice of a large group of the ablest businessmen in the country. I am very confident that if Mr. Gordon were standing here now, and he were asked whether he would like to have the best information from the widest variety of sources, he would agree.

Let me say again that nothing I have said is intended to cast the slightest criticism on the members of the board. I have the highest regard for those whom I know. My suggestion is that the board might be added to, giving new resources of experience and knowledge, imagination and all the things needed to assist in running this enterprise. I suppose it is by far the greatest enterprise we have in Canada, and I make my suggestion in the hope that the minister may find it possible to consider it. It is not original and it was made at the time of the committee sittings, but I make it again in order that it may be on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Minister to release national company from claims by Her Majesty.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): On clause 3 I wish to raise the point that we are creating a huge amount of capital—$736 million of capital or, as it is sometimes called, equity. Later on the common stock is referred to in one of the clauses as having a value of $396 million, so that altogether we are setting up a company which, if you look at the balance sheet, will be presumed to have a value after all its debts of something well over $1 billion. I might point out that this is one place where the government has departed from the tenor of the principles of the Turgeon report because that report suggested that the relief to be given to the railway, instead of taking the form of a transfer of the indebtedness into stock, which of course is only a charge on the railway to the extent that it earns dividends, should be turned into what are called income bonds, that is to say into securities which represent a debt and which constitute a mortgage, but on which interest is only paid if and when it is earned.

I put that up to the committee and my point was not accepted so I do not press it further. However, I think it might be of interest to read Mr. Gordon's comments on it. His was an optimistic comment and I found it interesting, as perhaps others will find it interesting. I read from page 4 of the same evidence:

. . . the management expected that the Canadian National, on the average, will be able to provide out of its own earnings—

May I digress here just to say that a few minutes ago I read a statement by Mr. Gordon indicating that the relief they would get would be approximately $30 million.

. . . that the management expected that the Canadian National, on the average, will be able to provide out of its own earnings a reasonable amount for depreciation, to pay interest on its outside debts, to pay income tax, and have a dividend available for its preferred stock—maybe not 4 per cent in any one year but there will be something.

I was interested in that statement and I am very glad to see that the president of the railway is prepared to make a statement as optimistic as that because after all he is a realist, and I thought it might be worth while to have the statement on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 3 carry?

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Minister to purchase shares.

The Deputy Chairman: For the convenience of those members who have before them the printed copy of the bill I might say that the sessional committee on railways and shipping adopted an amendment to subsection 1 of clause 6 as follows:

By adding after the word "value" in the seventh line, the following words:
"when added to the par value of such shares of stock purchased under subsection (2)"

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Clause 6 provides a means whereby the railway can supply some of its needs for further additions and betterments, etc., by means other than borrowing. The means taken is that the Minister of Finance is to be authorized to purchase additional stock of the railway each year in an amount equal to 3 per cent of the gross revenue of the national system in any fiscal year. I think that is clear, Mr. Chairman, and that the minister by this purchase of capital stock will provide that much. For the purposes of the railway in the current year it would amount to something like $18 million.

Now I want to read a short extract from Mr. Gordon's evidence again, because we questioned him on this. First of all we asked how this 3 per cent was arrived at. It is difficult, I think, to give any definite principle, but we did ask him if he could indicate what percentage of his requirements might be satisfied in that way. I would like to read what he said and this evidence becomes relevant, Mr. Chairman, because we are in the midst of considering a bill which is to provide the balance of the request. Mr. Gordon was asked, with a substantial amount of additions and betterments provided by the provisions of section 6, how much would he still need to borrow. He said:

. . . the amount which the Minister of Finance contracted to buy there in the form of preferred stock, we are required to put into use for additions and betterments—

This, he adds, would be roughly 50 per cent of their needs for additions and betterments. Then he goes on:

In other words, we would still have to borrow the balance of our needs for additions and betterments. We would have our depreciation, and this of course would be over and above what we would have to borrow.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the situation. We have this provision whereby the Minister of Finance buys stock, and the balance—I think it is desirable for us all to remember this—will be provided by this house, as in past years. We shall still have the railway company asking us to provide an additional amount for additions and betterments.

The Deputy Chairman: May I also advise the committee that section 10 has been amended by the addition of the word "are" after the word "railway" in line 11 of subclause 3 of the last clause.

On section 11—C.N.R. securities trust.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to say a word on this section. There was some question about section 11 because of the complicated nature of the Canadian National Railways securities trust. Indeed, it was in connection with that that at one of the hearings the president of the company said there was only one man in the railway who knew about it, and he was shortly to retire. He later corrected that statement and I believe that he did, in fact, do himself an injustice.

This trust holds various securities representing really the ancient history of the various companies, and for technical legal reasons it is felt necessary to keep these securities alive and to provide a convenient means of holding them. I like to think the railway will gradually b able to eliminate this situation as time goes on and these securities can be redeemed.

DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT

REPEAL OF CHAPTER 39, STATUTES OF 1951

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 307, to amend the Canada Dairy Products Act.

Mr. Catherwood: Has the minister any representations—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably the question should be asked in the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister going to say something?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a question coming up.

Mr. Catherwood: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Gardiner: There is not very much that can be said. This bill came from the Senate. It will be recalled that a year ago when we put through the Canada Dairy Products Act there was considerable discussion on it in the Senate. I was away at the time that discussion took place, but the suggestion was made that we were most anxious for it to go through, and we were. The representations that came to us are largely from the dairy council of Canada.

Later on in the season, before we got the regulations drafted which were based upon this legislation, it was intimated to us that some of the provinces—I believe one was the province of Ontario—were putting through legislation which made it much less necessary that we have this legislation, that is in so far as it is covered by section 6 of the act. We made representations to the Senate that we were prepared to remove this section from the act entirely. They wanted to amend it to make certain provisions which went only partially as far as we were proposing to go in taking section 6 out. We are taking section 6 out of the act partially because of the fact that it deals with things other than dairy products. In discussing it before a committee of the Senate I suggested that if such matters had to be dealt with, I thought the better way to deal with them was in special legislation, not in the dairy act because they raised a great many questions which were not being properly discussed when we are considering dairy products. The Senate agreed to that suggestion and amended their legislation in order to make it conform with what we suggested, namely that we take out the whole section instead of just taking out part of it. That is the proposal here, namely that we take out the whole section.

I may say that I think most of the matters about which hon. members and others outside the house are concerned in connection with dairy products are already provided for under section 5 of the act in any case. Section 6 simply deals with substitutes for dairy products, products that really are not dairy products at all, and also dairy products which are adulterated by putting something else into them. That sort of thing can be covered under section 5; we do not need section 6 to do that. So we are suggesting taking out section 6.

Mr. Catherwood: I should like to ask the minister whether he has had any representations from the national dairy farmers or from the federation of agriculture with regard to this section of the act.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know that I have had representations. I have discussed it with the dairy council of Canada. I have discussed it with the president and other representatives of the federation. They all understand what is being done, and they do not see that it is going to do any particular harm to the act itself if it is done in this way.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the committee probably welcomes the introduction of this bill. I know that last year this amendment was slipped through in the dying days of the session. I am certain that quite a percentage of the members of the house did not realize that this provision had been introduced into the act, or the implications of it. I know that when I saw it afterwards and when I learned of the discussions in the Senate—we are all hard pressed with business at the end of a session—I was surprised that it could have gone through, because it seemed to me to be a violation of the constitutional provisions with regard to trade. It seemed to be an interference with trade which did not appear to conform to the non-interference with interprovincial trade provided for in the British North America Act. Of course I know why it was done.

Under the circumstances I think it is proper to repeal this section. If it had been challenged in the courts probably the government would have had a fairly difficult time in getting a favourable verdict for this provision. Be that as it may, I think the repeal of something that was done hurriedly last year, without the house realizing all the implications of it, is something we should all welcome at this time. I am simply saying that we are supporting the bill as passed by the Senate and now as recommended to the house by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not entirely agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I presume this amendment was introduced in the other place by the gentleman who is so anxious to ruin the dairy industry and who fostered margarine. As I understand it this provision would prohibit margarine, or formerly prohibited it. I remember discussing the matter at the time the bill came up for consideration last year. I am sorry the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not familiar with the bills that went through at the last session.

Mr. Coldwell: I am familiar with them, but this one went through at the end of the session without our noticing it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will admit it went through at the end of the session; but his colleague immediately behind him usually catches anything that might not conform exactly to the rules or to—

Mr. Coldwell: Hoyle.

Mr. Cruickshank: —Hoyle, as you might call it. What I am interested in particularly is the question asked by the hon. member for Haldimand. Has the dairy council or the federation of agriculture asked for this amendment, or is it merely this member in the other place who is determined, to the best of his ability, to ruin the dairy industry and who has made every possible effort to do so? I am particularly interested in the matter, owing to the fact that some 239,607,300 pounds of copra were allowed into the country tax free—and I do not believe there was any health examination—in order to permit the manufacture of margarine, a substitute, as the minister said, for a real dairy product. I will admit that that matter does not come under his department; I refer to this unfair competition of these cheap oils from other countries. I am surprised at the leader of the C.C.F. being in favour of this unfair competition with the dairy farmers of Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I did not say that. I said I thought this provision was unconstitutional, that it should not have been passed, and that if the government could not make it stick it would be better to repeal it.

Mr. Cruickshank: I will answer that statement by saying this. We have just gone through two election campaigns, and 90 per cent of the promises that were made by a certain party were unconstitutional and could not be carried out.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the reason the Liberals got licked?

Mr. Cruickshank: Certainly; because those promises could not be carried out.

Mr. Knowles: The Liberal promises.

Mr. Coldwell: It does not apply to us.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I will allow myself to be called to order by you, but not by another hon. member.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I did not mean the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not going to oppose this amendment but I cannot see the reason for the sudden change. There is only one province, namely the province of Quebec, which so far in Canada has had the good judgment to try to protect the dairy farmers.

Mr. MacNaught: What about Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Sinclair: Did the hon. member say "good judgment"?

Mr. Cruickshank: I will go further and say that great suburb, namely Prince Edward Island, has shown the good judgment to try to protect the dairy farmers.

Mr. Benidickson: They are road-blocking national trade.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member says they are road-blocking national trade. When we hear all the demands that are made for the protection of the pulp industry in Canada—

Mr. Benidickson: There is no protection for the pulp industry in Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have read articles with regard to some of the demands of the pulp industry which, I understand, includes a little place called Kenora.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would confine himself to the principle of Bill No. 307, which has to do with the dairy industry.

Mr. Cruickshank: I shall be glad to, Mr. Chairman. May I just say that I am certainly not going to vote against this amendment, inasmuch as it has been introduced by the Minister of Agriculture. I think it is a strange thing that just at this stage the Department of Agriculture should discover their mistake, or what they say was their mistake, when this amendment was not asked for by the dairy council or by the federation of agriculture or by any other representative group of farmers.

Mr. Gardiner: Probably the hon. member was not in the chamber when I spoke previously. I am not sure whether he was or not. His seat is behind me, and I did not notice whether he was in the chamber or not. But I have already stated that the dairy council suggested that this amendment be made. They made suggestions before the house met and also after the amendment was introduced into the other place. With regard to the suggestion made by the leader of the C.C.F. party, I would refer him to the discussion which took place in the other chamber. I do not want to read it, but it is on the record, indicating that they had dropped the constitutional arguments entirely. When I was invited to go over to the committee this year I thought I was going over to discuss the question from the constitutional point of view, depending on control or interference with trade as among the provinces; but when I got there I found they had decided themselves that that argument was either not sound or was not an argument upon which they wished to proceed. They proceeded simply on the merits of the argument as I have stated it to the committee, namely that in section 6 we are talking about substitutes for butter.

The section as it stands reads:

> 6. (1) The governor in council may by regulation prohibit . . . of any class of products that is designated by the regulations as being (i) milk, cream, butter, cheese, condensed milk, evaporated milk, milk powder, dry milk, ice cream, malted milk or sherbet . . .

In the discussions that took place, people stopped reading at that point and said that the act prevented trade in all these products. That is not what the act says. It goes on to say:

> . . . that contains fat or oil other than that of milk,

That is, it means that you have adulterated the milk or put something else into it that is not milk at all. It is pointed out that is dealt with in section 5; therefore we do not need section 6 in order to deal with that kind of thing. It is already dealt with. Provision is made by regulation to prevent trade in anything which has been adulterated.

The other part deals with a substitute for milk, cream, butter, cheese, condensed milk, evaporated milk, milk power, dry milk, ice cream, malted milk or sherbet. Well, a substitute for that is in all probability not a dairy product. Therefore we have suggested that if anything needs to be done in connection with that kind of product, then we should have separate legislation and not deal with it under the Canada Dairy Products Act, because we get into all this complicated discussion about trading in dairy products. You cannot trade in dairy products now which are not properly graded, as between provinces. That is all provided for in section 5 and in other parts of the act. Therefore we are simply removing section 6 because we do not think it is necessary in this act. If it should be provided for at all, it should be provided for in separate legislation.

Mr. Charlton: Did I understand the minister to say that the national dairy council and the dairy farmers of Canada had agreed to this?

Mr. Gardiner: I said the dairy council of Canada have asked that this be done.

Mr. Charlton: And the dairy farmers of Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: It has been discussed with the dairy farmers of Canada; they know what was being considered in regard to the matter, but they did not ask for it definitely.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE RATES OF BENEFIT, TO REDUCE THE NUMBER OF WAITING DAYS BEFORE RECEIPT OF BENEFIT, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 332, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my remarks at this stage of the bill will be very brief. We have already had a discussion on the principle of this amending legislation in the earlier stages, and we shall be able to deal with the details when we get into committee. Also we have made it clear that we support this legislation so far as it goes. However, I should like to make it clear once again that from a study of the principles underlying the funding of insurance of this kind and from a study of the amounts that are on hand in the unemployment insurance fund we feel that there is too great a disparity between the premium payments required of those insured and the benefits paid. In our view either one thing or the other should be done. Either the amount of benefits paid under the act should be increased or the premium payments required of those insured should be decreased. Our preference is for the former, that the amount of the benefits should be increased, having regard to the suggestions made to the government by the major labour congresses in this country.

As we have indicated on previous occasions, another shortcoming in the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I regret that there seems to be nothing in the amending legislation now before us to take care of it, has to do with the position of the unemployment insurance benefit recipients who, while on those benefits, become ill. I realize that the minister made a statement the other day on this point. I hope he has given thought to the reply I made to his statement, and that further consideration will yet be given that phase of the matter. This is entirely apart from the question of any sickness benefits that might be obtained under a health insurance program. Entirely apart from that, we believe that when a person is drawing unemployment insurance benefits, having qualified in every way for these benefits, he should not be cut off from them because he takes ill; particularly when, as in many instances is the situation, there is still no work for him.

There are two or three other matters in which we are interested but which we can deal with when we get into committee. I referred to some of these matters in the earlier stages. At the moment I shall leave it at that, expressing our very strong views with respect to those two matters which we feel to be very important.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to say a word at this time also. When the minister's estimates were before the house I made quite a lengthy statement in regard to section 38, regulation 5 (a), having to do with married women. Perhaps the minister and his advisers have read the Hansard report of that speech. I feel very strongly on that point, because there is rank discrimination in so far as married women are concerned when they lose their employment. I am just wondering whether the minister has any intention of making some amendments to regulation 5 (a) when the bill is in committee, because as it reads at the present time it practically deals out a married woman, despite the fact that she is supposed to be insured during the period of her employment.

I mention that now so the minister can give us some indication as to whether or not there is any intention of proposing an amendment to the regulation. It would not require much of an amendment to accomplish the purpose. Certainly it is inflexible at the present time.

I should like to say a word or two in support of the contention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that while a person is sick these payments should not be discontinued. I stressed this matter a couple of years ago in the house, but apparently there has not been much change in that regard. The position is that in many industries across Canada employees pay into a sick benefit fund. This is a form of insurance against being without funds when they are ill. As it is a form of insurance, they are legitimately entitled to receive that sick benefit for the period during which they are ill. Since that time the Unemployment Insurance Act has been passed.

There will be many men, particularly those employed in the heavy industries such as the steel plants, the coal mines and the automobile factories, places where the work is very heavy, who will find themselves ill and will not be able to carry on their normal work. These men may not be bedridden, but they receive the benefits of their insurance plan for which they have already paid, and from which they are entitled legitimately to collect.

At the same time they are not employed in their regular occupations and they have another form of insurance for which they are paying, covering the period of their unemployment. The person who is in the dual position of being insured on two counts, upon making application for his sick benefit is ruled immediately as ineligible for unemployment insurance. If he does not make application for his sick benefit and is registered as being unemployed, he places himself in the position of serving notice on his employer severing his employment.

In industry there are pension plans based upon the amount of time a man has worked. While a worker may be ill for only three weeks or a month, he must forgo his sick benefits if he wishes to receive unemployment insurance. If he takes the unemployment insurance, he thus severs his employment with his employer and may not get back on the payroll again.

This is a question which I suggest the unemployment insurance authorities should discuss with industrialists. I refer to the situation where there is a sick benefit plan in operation. These sick benefit plans came into being many years before the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed, and have carried on since that time.

I suggest that the man who is incapacitated for a short period of time, and may not be able to carry on his regular form of heavy employment, has a legitimate claim on both counts to the insurance for which he has paid. There should be an understanding on the part of the commission that a man who has registered as unemployed for a month or so should not be faced with an employer who takes the adamant attitude that the employee must be struck off the payroll, and will not be permitted to return to work. If the insurance is to be paid both ways, then there should be some co-ordination in administration. There should be some understanding.

I am not blaming the commission, because it has been my experience that in so far as it is within their power they are willing to co-operate. The adamant attitude is the one taken by the employer, and I am now referring particularly to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation in Nova Scotia. This matter has been discussed time and again in union circles, and I am just wondering if the minister and some of his officials might take a look into it and have a talk with the employer in this particular instance, because in my opinion he is the one who is taking the unreasonable attitude. It is up to someone to prove to the employer that this attitude is not reasonable.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) brought up an important point. I receive a good deal of correspondence from people who say, "We have paid unemployment insurance for five years, or since the inception of the plan. We are laid off when sick, and stay away for a few months, during which time we have no income. When we apply for unemployment insurance we are told we cannot get it because we did not sever our employment in the way set out in the act. We are told that ill health or sickness is not a justification for drawing unemployment insurance." Nevertheless these persons are not working, and have no income. Some of them suggest they should have a return of the premiums they have paid in, and that has been the general point of view discussed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. On the other hand the problem of dual insurance is one that should be discussed with employers with a view to arriving at some measure of co-ordination and understanding, so the insurance payments will be made for the purposes for which the two kinds of insurance were established.

I do not expect the minister to reply now, but I do expect him to take the matter under advisement and, at some time in the future, to give an explanation of what might be done, after he has consulted with employers and the others concerned.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief comment on what has been said this afternoon. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has recalled to my mind his suggestion for benefits during illness. As I indicated to him the other night, in common with all other features connected with this act that matter will be kept under study by the commission and the advisory bodies associated with it. The same observations would apply to his comments respecting on the one hand an improvement in the situation by means of better benefits than are set out in this measure or, on the other, improving the situation by cutting down on the amount of payments into the fund.

I think the hon. member will agree that up to this date the study that has been given this change has been at least intense and, to my mind at least, conscientious. The fact that we will be putting this measure into effect does not suggest in any way that the study of the machinery will come to an end or even to pause. That study will be continued.

The program the unemployment insurance commission has under way is a complicated one. As the house knows, the commission was given wide powers, and perhaps properly so, so that it might not be too easily swayed by outside influences. Nevertheless the members of the commission have been well aware of the points raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and those points will receive their continued consideration.

Referring now to the situation as it affects married women, the other night I had a comment to make to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), but when I was prepared to speak he was not in his seat. I prefer to make my representations to him personally, and perhaps he would be prepared to hear them when we reach the committee stage. I may also tell the hon. member that I will issue an invitation to the commission to make careful study of the other matter he mentioned which affects more particularly the city of Sydney.

Perhaps the other points raised might be more easily discussed when we reach the committee stage. I might point out at this juncture that the other day, in the company of the chairman of the standing committee on industrial relations, I reviewed the status of the members of that committee. We were astounded to find that some were on three, four or five committees. Consequently I am not suggesting at this stage that the bill be referred to that committee. The fact is that the five important amendments are not very complex. That does not hold, however, with respect to several of the minor amendments, and I should like to tell hon. members that if when we go into committee any technical features arise affecting these minor amendments concerning which hon. members would rather not take up the time of the committee of the whole, I will be very happy to make my officials available in my office at a time when we can go into them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson in the chair.

On section 1—Exempted persons.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I presume the minister has made what statement he proposes to make on moving second reading of the bill. In speaking on clause 1 it is not my intention to reiterate what I said the other night at the resolution stage of the bill, except that I wish to refer to one or two items. The hon. member for Cape Breton South spoke of the regulation affecting married women respecting which I spoke last year and again this year, and with which of course I am very much concerned. I should like to press for some action with regard to this regulation. Speaking in the house the other night at the resolution stage I made some remarks with reference to the reduction of the period from 90 days. At that time I said I could see that there might be difficulties in establishing intention, but that no fault could be found with reducing the period in the first instance to 60 days.

However, I must admit that since that time, having considered the matter further at some length, I have come to the conclusion that I was very lenient in that regard. I can see no reason why this section should not be taken right out of the regulations. I know the arguments that are put forward by the department. I know the difficulties with which the local offices are faced; but in my opinion they are no more difficult than those with which they are faced with respect to numerous employees in many lines of activity. To say that misrepresentation or malingering is confined only to one section of the labour force is in my opinion a reflection on the integrity of that particular group of citizens. I can see no reason at all why this regulation was put in the act in the first place. It has only been in effect for about two years, and has been operative for only a little more than a year. I can see no reason why this particular group was singled out for discrimination. It is not only a reflection on the integrity of working women but in my opinion it is also an intrusion on their civil rights.

Consideration of the matter from this angle has caused me to speak today in stronger terms than those in which I spoke the other evening at the resolution stage of the bill. While I was willing at that time to see the regulations relaxed somewhat, I now say I believe firmly that this particular provision should be stricken from the regulations as they now stand. I ask the minister to give this matter very careful consideration. I am sure there are other ways of handling this problem, and that it is no more serious among this class of workers than among all the other classes with which the commission deals. This section and the difficulty which is encountered with respect thereto lead me also to urge the contention I made the other night that there should be a woman member of the commission. As I said at that time, it is of course impossible to have such representation under the present set-up of the commission unless its membership is enlarged.

In the tenth annual report of the unemployment insurance commission there is a table on page 44 which deals with placements in regular and casual employment. I was interested to note that so far as regular placements are concerned those of women represent 36.3 per cent or well over one-third of those of men. As to casual placements the proportion is much higher. Casual placements of women were 63 per cent of those of men. Totalling the two and figuring out the average, female placements represented 40 per cent of male placements. I feel that in itself supports the contention that if the working forces of the Dominion of Canada contain within their numbers such a large percentage of women, then women should be represented on the commission by someone who understands those problems which are not so easily argued by fact and logic.

On page 28 of the same report there is a table of placements of handicapped people during 1950. Here again the number of female placements is well over one-third of male placements. That appears to be the case pretty well throughout the picture. On page 25 of the report special mention is made of the increased number of women in the labour market in Canada. I should like to read into the record a paragraph which deals with this problem. It is headed, "Increase of women in labour market", and reads as follows:

During 1950 there was a steady increase in the number of female applicants registered at local offices of the commission for whom it was not possible to find suitable employment. It is believed that the increase was due, in part at least, to the rising cost of living in Canada and the necessity for married women to seek employment in order to augment the family income. However, notwithstanding a steady demand from employers for stenographers and typists, many women registered in these occupations could not be referred to employers because they were married and no longer in the lower age brackets.

I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that this is a problem which has many sides, but whatever the reason may be for the increased entry into employment of women of all ages and all amounts of experience, we must nevertheless recognize now that it is a condition of modern living. Inasmuch as it is a condition of modern living we can no longer close our eyes to it. We must accept it. For this reason I am more than ever convinced that the efficiency of the commission would be enhanced by its enlargement to include a woman member thereof. This belief is confirmed by a booklet, "Unemployment Insurance in Canada, 1940-1950," issued by the industrial relations section of the university of Montreal. After describing in a general way the workings of unemployment insurance in Canada in the ten-year period it winds up with this paragraph:

If the unemployment insurance commission in its administrative task continues to give priority to the human problems of the individual, if day after day it betters its relations with the insured, if it encourages its personnel to pursue intellectual and moral culture, the commission will thus give to the law a more human and more socially valuable function.

I think that is perfectly true, Mr. Chairman, and I think it is a plea which might well be heeded by this house. In order to give the house something concrete upon which to take a stand I would like to move an amendment to this bill. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Meeker), that the following section be added to the bill:

20. That section 4 of the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended:

(a) by substituting the word "four" for the word "three" in the third line thereof and

(b) by deleting all the words after the word "council" in the fourth line thereof and substituting the following: "one of whom shall be a chief commissioner and one of whom shall be a woman."

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, is this amendment not to be considered now? I have something to say on clause 1 as soon as this is out of the way.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment just proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West is an amendment following section 20 of the bill and I think it should be moved at that point.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this would insert an extra section into the bill it was my opinion that it should be discussed on section 1 when the bill in general was being discussed. It will necessitate renumbering present section 20 and I do not see how it can be brought in under section 20 when there is an existing section 20. I would ask the Chair's consideration of that point.

Mr. Gregg: As I think my hon. friend for Hamilton West knows, the principle of making sure that the needs of women workers in Canada are taken care of is one that is paramount within the commission. The commission at the present time consists of three members, one appointed after consultation with the national organized labour bodies, one after consultation with organized employers; and the chairman is appointed by the government.

As the hon. member has indicated, unless it were possible to come to the point where organized labour would nominate a woman or organized employers would recommend a woman it would be quite difficult to do it under the present set up. I am quite sure that in any re-organization or expansion of the commission that factor would be taken into consideration. I would like to point out that in the whole array of advisory bodies starting from those that advise the local offices, those that advise the regional offices, and those that advise the head office, women are represented in an advisory capacity; but I know that does not fulfil the need she has in mind.

With respect to the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to give us the benefit of your views on two counts. First, it does not amend the bill before the house; it amends the original act. Second, public expenditure would be required to carry it out. I am therefore wondering if it would be in order on those counts.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I will take under consideration the remarks made by the minister and I will point out to the hon. member for Hamilton West who has proposed the amendment that her amendment adds section 20 to the bill. I therefore feel that I could not put that amendment now nor should I rule on it until following consideration of section 19. I will put it at that time, of course.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to bring it up again at that time because I believe consideration should be given to it. It is all very well to have good intentions but if they never get any further than lip service we are not going to achieve the results we hope for.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw attention to what I believe is an error in drafting or perhaps I should say a fault in the drafting of section 1. My hon. friend and I do not profess to be lawyers, but he has one on his right and perhaps there are some others near by. Section 1 deletes the present subclause (b) of section 16, subsection 1 and substitutes a new subsection (b) which provides for a slight alteration in the definition. I am not concerned about the substance; I am concerned merely about the wording. If the minister has before him the act in its present form, on page 9 of the office consolidation he will see, at the top of that page, that the set-up of section 16, subsection 1 is as follows:

> Where an employed person establishes to the satisfaction of the commission that he is either:
> (a) a person who is employed . . .
> . . . so and so, and then:
> (b) a person who . . .
> . . . so and so.

According to the authorities I have read on the drafting of legislation, that is not good; and I have a very excellent booklet on the subject by Mr. E. A. Driedger, counsel to the Department of Justice. According to him that is not good drafting.

With the proposed amendment subsection one of section 16 would read as follows:

> Where an employed person establishes to the satisfaction of the commission that he is either > (a) a person who . . .
> . . . such and such; and then:
> (b) habitually employed . . .

I submit that somebody got in a hurry and left out a few words, and that subparagraphs

(a) and (b) should be drafted in parallel form. The matter can be corrected very easily by putting in the words "a person who is". In other words, if you made paragraph (b) which is now before us read—

> (b) a person who is habitually employed in insurable employment for a total of not more than four hours a day;

—you would correct the fault to which I am drawing attention and you would make the new subclause (b) parallel in form with subclause (a). I wonder if the minister would care to comment.

Mr. Gregg: I understand from my officials that the author of your booklet vetted this paragraph but I see the point my hon. friend makes; that one of them is "a person who is employed in" and the other, while it makes sense, does not follow the same pattern and states that "he is habitually employed" . . .

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Driedger says that is elliptical and that an ellipsis is not good.

Mr. Gregg: I do not think it will affect the proper working of the section. It may add a little variety there and I do not think it is worth making an amendment.

Mr. Hees: When speaking at the resolution stage of this bill, I brought to the minister's attention the particular case of a man in my riding who had contributed to the unemployment insurance scheme ever since its inception eleven years ago. He had built up a credit of more than $900, and last November became unemployed. He drew benefits for thirteen days, and then had to enter hospital for an eye operation. As soon as he entered hospital his unemployment insurance benefits were cut off. After the man had been released from the hospital, being totally blind, I was notified. I brought the matter to the attention of the house through a letter written to me regarding my inquiry about that man, explaining why these unemployment insurance benefits had been cut off.

This letter had been written by Mr. B. G. Sullivan, Ontario regional supervisor, saying how much the commission regretted the action but at that time the man did not come under the regulations and could no longer, therefore, be paid unemployment insurance benefits. I also drew to the minister's attention the fact that I insisted on the Canadian National Institute for the Blind being notified. On my insistence they were notified and guards were provided so the man could resume his employment. I pointed out to the minister that, unfortunately, none of this would have taken place if I had not brought the matter to the attention of the unemployment insurance commission and requested, very strongly I may add, that they notify the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

In view of that incident, I should like to know what instructions the minister has sent out to the employees of the unemployment insurance commission concerning the steps they should take when a man or woman who has built up an unemployment insurance credit is prevented from working because of a permanent disability. What does the minister suggest they should do in order to see that a disabled man or woman is enabled to continue work, by means of guards or aids, as in the case of the man I mentioned?

The second point I should like the minister to answer is this. As I pointed out in speaking earlier, the unemployment insurance credits which a man or woman builds up are built up through contributions made by that man or woman and his or her employer.

Mr. Gregg: And the government.

Mr. Hees: But mostly by contributions made by the man or woman and the employer. I believe those credits belong to that man or woman by right. They exist because the man or woman built them up so they would be available if for any reason the man or woman became unemployed. When a permanent disability takes place the unemployment insurance commission completely cuts that man or woman off from unemployment insurance benefits, as in the case of the man I mentioned. The man in the case I cited had a credit of over $900, and the commission was quite willing to cut him off from that credit for all time by simply stating, in so many words, "That money no longer belongs to you; you have no right to it because you are permanently disabled."

I believe that is completely wrong. There is no time when a man or woman needs unemployment insurance credits nearly as badly as when he or she becomes totally disabled and thereby prevented from earning a living. Not only do they have to go on providing for themselves and their families, but in most cases they have doctor and hospital bills to pay as well. I believe there are many more reasons why those unemployment insurance credits should be paid to those people than to people who are just temporarily unemployed.

I feel sure that in answering the minister will tell me the Unemployment Insurance Act has been set up on an actuarially sound basis which does not take into consideration payments to people in the totally disabled category. However, I believe that if the commission's doctors have examined a man or woman and certified that he or she is permanently disabled and cannot earn a living, then the unemployment insurance commission should pay those people the credits standing in their name.

If it takes some readjustment of the actuarial set-up of the act, I feel there could be no more worth-while reason for so doing. I do not believe it would require a very great readjustment, because there are not many people who become disabled. I believe it is something which should receive immediate consideration by the government.

I would appreciate hearing from the minister on the two points I have mentioned: first, what instructions, following the rather shocking example which I brought forward, has he sent to the unemployment insurance employees across the country informing them that when a person becomes disabled the commission should not simply write him a letter saying how it breaks their heart not to be able to pay him any more insurance benefits. You could practically hear the tears falling on Mr. Sullivan's desk as he wrote the letter which I read to the house. You could just hear his heart breaking.

Mr. Lennard: I don't think he ever wept in his life.

Mr. Hees: I don't think he did, either. I should like to know what instructions the minister has issued to remedy that rather regrettable situation. I should also like to know what the minister feels about the necessity of continuing to pay whatever unemployment insurance credits a man or woman still has standing in their name at the time they become disabled.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member asks what instructions I have sent to the offices of the unemployment insurance commission across Canada, Mr. Chairman, with regard to this matter. I believe he knows that the minister has no right whatever to send instructions to the offices of the commission. I believe he has every right and every duty to call to the attention of the members of the commission any representations that may be made in this house, and that I most certainly do and have done.

With regard to the case mentioned the other night, I was glad to find that in that case the benefits had been reinstated in February. The remainder of the hon. member's remarks were related to a discussion which I tried to cover the other night, suggesting that this act be extended to cover sickness and disability. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was very quick to check me up and suggest that I had travelled over much more ground than he had. But I am sure the committee will realize that if the unemployment insurance commission once climbs over the fence into that field, it will be assuming obligations upon which it would be difficult to set limits by any mere patchwork amendments to this act. I am not going to attempt to cover that ground again now, but I would point out that matters affecting the stability of the fund are set out very clearly as a function for the unemployment insurance advisory committee under sections 82, 83 and 84 of the act.

All the representations that were made in today's discussions, the discussion on the estimates and on these amendments have been brought or will be brought to the attention of the commission and the advisory body for their continued study.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister finished? I asked for a straight answer on the second part. I asked him for his opinion on that matter. I will put it again. I will ask him what his opinion is on the specific case I brought to his attention. Does he think it is a fair thing to cut off from benefits a man who, for eleven years, contributed to his unemployment insurance, and built up a credit of more than $900 out of his own pocket and the pocket of his employer? The credit exists because that man and his employer have made it possible. Through no fault of his he suddenly becomes permanently blind. Does the minister feel that it is the fair thing for the unemployment insurance commission to do with $900 in its pocket which that man and his employer have built up for his use if he should become unemployed, simply to say to him "We are terribly sorry, but we just cannot do a thing for you; we have $900 which you have built up, but the regulations do not allow us to pay it to you"; and to then allow that man, who is permanently blind, just to live out the rest of his life as best he can? As far as I know the unemployment insurance commission, judging by the letter written by Mr. Sullivan to me, which I read to this house, did not have the slightest feeling of worry or distress about what would happen to Mr. Monk at that point. He was blind; he did not come under the regulations any further; and as far as I could see the members of the unemployment commission were perfectly willing just to abandon that man for all time. That is a specific case and an important one. I should like to know from the minister whether he thinks that is the kind of thing that should be allowed to go on. May I have an answer to that question?

Mr. Gregg: I do not think this is the occasion for the minister to express his opinion. I have assured my hon. friend that his representations have received and will continue to receive careful consideration. The man in question—and I do not give this as any rebuttal to the hon. member's statement—would not have paid in that amount out of his own pocket, but that is neither here nor there. It would be about $400 that he himself would pay for the period in question.

I have had a good deal of reason to believe —and I would certainly hope that such is the case—that the commission has engendered the tendency in their offices right across the country where they cannot do anything under the act or under the regulations, to make it as easy as possible for those who have been insured to gain assistance or advice in some other way, just as my hon. friend did in this particular case through the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. I do not want to express any opinion except to say that in this case or in any others we will undertake to make sure that the benefits under the act are administered to the advantage of the insured individual to the utmost possible extent.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am still not getting an answer from the minister. I want to know whether he is going to recommend to the unemployment insurance commission—

An hon. Member: He cannot.

Mr. Hees: If the minister cannot, what in the world is the use of carrying on this discussion in this chamber?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would suggest that the hon. member discuss this bill. He tried to discuss this subject the other day. He was out of order then and he is still out of order today. I would ask the chairman to direct him to discuss the subject matter of this bill.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, on item 1 I am discussing the general question of unemployment insurance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are not dealing—

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are not dealing with insurance for blind persons. We are dealing with unemployment insurance.

Mr. Hees: That is exactly what I am talking about.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No.

Mr. Hees: Yes, it is.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister has raised a point of order. As I understand it, the hon. member for Broadview is discussing a particular instance whereas the general rule is that on the first section of the bill we would be dealing with the principle of the bill under discussion. I therefore think that the hon. member should confine himself to a discussion of the general principle of the bill at this point.

Mr. Meeker: Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind the minister of a condition that exists in my riding and perhaps to suggest a solution that might be looked into. At the present time there are in my riding approximately 742 unemployed persons, and orders for jobs exist for only some 80 people. In addition, on part time and perhaps working two or three days a week are well over 1,200 people. In former years—or at least as far back as I can remember—Waterloo South, with its great textile industries, its woodworking firms and its large metal industries, was always one of Ontario's most prosperous communities. The fact that we have almost 2,000 people not working steadily is an indication that somewhere there is something wrong.

This condition has existed for almost a year. I defy any member of the government or any person in this committee to tell me or the people out of work in my community that the condition is only seasonal. One of the factors that contributes largely to unemployment in the furniture factories in my riding is the effect of the deferred depreciation regulations. Last year the Minister of Finance disallowed for four years depreciation on new plant and equipment. This disallowance definitely slowed the sales of factory, office and store fixtures and furniture. I have heard of many large retail firms which are refusing to remodel their stores with new articles of equipment, thereby causing unemployment in our furniture factories.

In larger towns and cities where people who are out of work are easily absorbed by other industries, this is not a serious condition. But in the smaller cities and villages where there is a large amount of unemployment, these people cannot be absorbed by other industries. I would urge the Minister of Labour to use his influence with the Minister of Finance with a view to getting him to correct this situation as soon as possible.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Rates of benefit.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would point out that this is the clause which makes for the slight improvement in the rate of benefit in certain of the categories. I have already indicated our view. With the fund being in the state it is, and the principles underlying the funding of such a plan being what they are, we feel that there is too great a disparity between the amount paid in and the benefits received. We suggested that one or other of two things should be done. I indicated that in our view the preferable change would be to increase the benefits by more than the minister has indicated in the bill.

In addition to emphasizing that view I should like to point out that when the act was amended in 1950 it was worded in such a way with respect to section 31 of the act, which we are now considering under clause 4 of this bill, as to create quite a bit of confusion in the minds of many workers as to the benefits to which they were entitled on becoming unemployed. Some of us pointed out when this was being put through in 1950 that there was more than confusion involved; that there was actually a certain loss of an alleged increase. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour will probably recall that he and I had quite a debate over the effect of the wording in section 31 (2) (b) as it stands at the present time in the main act. That clause reads:

> In computing the average daily contribution (a) one cent shall be deducted from each daily contribution paid by the insured person after the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty.

I pointed out to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour and to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who was piloting the bill on that occasion that the result of that clause being in there where we are told how a worker computes his benefit, is that when the worker looks at the table to ascertain his benefit he must move one line above the amount he is paying in to ascertain the amount of benefit he will draw out. I need not rehash the argument we had on that occasion. My position has certainly been vindicated, at least in my own experience, by the large number of letters I have had on this very point. Many a time I have had to explain to an unemployed worker why he was receiving not the benefit set directly opposite the amount he had been paying in, but rather the amount directly opposite and up one line. The reason for that is the section which I have just read from the main act.

I want to repeat my opposition to the substance of what was done on that occasion and to the confusion that it created. I am glad to note that at least the confusion is being resolved in the amending section now before us. But all that is resolved is the confusion; it does not make any change in substance. The terms of clause 4, which are now before us, when we get over to the table that is included in that clause, are different from the table at present in the act. That difference of course can be seen by looking at the table in its former state as it appears on the right hand page of the bill that is now before us. For example, the table on the opposite side formerly had opposite 3 cents the sum of $1 per day for a person without dependents. That was not really the case, for the qualifying clause which I read meant that a person had to move up one line. Thus his daily benefit was only 70 cents. In the new version of this table it is made clear that the person whose contribution is 3 cents draws only 70 cents a day. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that the confusion has been resolved and that from here on workers, when they look at that table, will not wonder why they draw a benefit less than what would seem to be that to which they are entitled. I am sorry that is as far as this correction goes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the minister explain why the two lower classes were excluded from increases in benefits?

Mr. Gregg: This amendment, like the others, was recommended and approved by the unemployment insurance advisory committee. I will not go into a comparison of the two tables because, although it has been two years, that confusion has been cleared up by the rearrangement of the table to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago.

Had the benefits been increased in these two lower classes which have been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Hamilton West—that is, opposite 3 cents, $4.80 weekly; opposite 4 cents, $7.50 weekly—we would have been faced with what the experts call over-insurance. The present dependency benefit rate, for instance, in the earnings class of $9 to $14.99 is 83·3 per cent of the wages. It was the opinion of the actuaries, supported by the advisory committee, that it would be unwise to increase the present ratio. This will affect a very few people. It is estimated that of the claims established in 1951 less than 2½ per cent were in this class, and in the last fiscal year the number of contributors in this class was only 1·54 per cent.

Mr. Goode: I should like to ask a question for information. I am not too sure whether I am on the right section or whether there is a section that would cover this question. If I am not in order of course you will tell me, Mr. Chairman. What is the position regarding the forestry workers and lumber workers in the province of British Columbia? As the minister knows, these men are on strike at the present time in rather large numbers. I do not know what the situation is. Under the act are these men going to be entitled to benefits somewhere down the line?

Mr. Gregg: The amendment two years ago covered woods workers both in the east and in the west, but there is a general clause in the act which says that claimants on strike do not receive benefits.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Goode: Then it does not matter how long the men are on strike or how short a time they are on strike, they are not entitled to any benefits whatsoever?

Mr. Gregg: If it is adjudged a strike, under section 39 of the act they do not get anything during the work stoppage.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Recovery of benefit erroneously obtained.

Mrs. Fairclough: Am I correct in assuming that no claimant will be penalized in respect of what is an honest error? In other words, as I read this new section, if a claimant had received benefits erroneously, through no fault of his own, without misrepresentation, he would not be penalized, nor would he be forced to repay those benefits?

Mr. Gregg: No.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is that correct?

Mr. Gregg: That is correct.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Absence or incapacity.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 12 amends section 83 of the act, which is one of the sections under the general heading "unemployment insurance advisory committee". In fact this is the section which spells out the constitution of that committee and certain of its powers and functions. While we are on this clause I should like to take a moment to express to the minister my very strong views with regard to any change that may be made in the functioning of the advisory committees at the three levels. The minister knows that what I have in mind is covered by the difference between circular letter No. 18 and a proposed circular letter No. 19. As I understand it, under the present arrangement the avenue of travel between these committees is vertical. The local committees make their reports and recommendations to the regional committees and the regional committees in turn to the national advisory committee. In return the replies to those reports and recommendations, and any suggestions, travel the other way. That is provided for in circular letter No. 18, which spells out the way in which the committees are to function. As the minister knows—and this is set out in the section with which we are now dealing —these are people who are outside the direct employment of the unemployment insurance commission, and who represent labour and management. They are there to give advice.

It appears that there is some thought of changing the way those committees function and suggesting that the local committees should have their contact and their way of reporting only through the local civil service side of the unemployment insurance commission; and that similarly the regional advisory committees should maintain their liaison with the regional officials through the civil service side of the unemployment insurance commission.

It has been represented to me by some of those who are interested in the matter that the present set-up has some very desirable features that should not be lost. Those who take this view fear that if there is a change to the other pattern, many good ideas born or hatched at the local level will never get to the point where they may really be considered.

Without in any way reflecting upon the efficiency with which the officials of the commission carry out their duties, there is a tendency on the part of officials to be concerned only in keeping things going as they are. So long as things are running along all right, so long as "Everything's up to date in my department"—and in this I am borrowing from a song we heard not long ago at the press gallery dinner—there is nothing to worry about.

I share the views of those who expressed the thought to me that the ideas generated in the local committees would not get very far past the local officials if that change were made. When I sought to have tabled a copy of circular letter No. 19 the minister informed me that it was only a proposed circular letter, and that it had not yet been put in final form. He pointed out that therefore it could not be tabled. Naturally I have no objection to there being a circular letter No. 19, or to there being a review of the pattern set out in circular letter No. 18; but I would hope that the proposed circular letter No. 19 might be reviewed before it is put in final form.

If any changes are felt desirable, let it not be at the expense of the loss of values to be obtained from getting ideas from the local level right up to the top level and back again, and securing the views and the opinions of advisory committees at all levels. It is not necessary to spend more time on the subject now, but I do urge the minister to give consideration to the point of view I am putting forward today, and which I understand has been expressed by some of the local and regional advisory committees.

Mr. Gregg: This section has to do with the members of the committee who advise as to the stability of the funds. However, I did not mind hearing my hon. friend's remarks on the other matter, because it was mentioned by him before. I can assure him, with regard to draft circular No. 19, that before it is fully considered and put into effect there will be a desire to see that all the benefits of the old plan are maintained, in conjunction with some other good suggestions. It is the intention that regional committees will be fully informed of the recommendations of local committees and as to the action taken thereon, and that there will be no effort to prevent the discussion and consideration of any items which they feel have not been properly dealt with or which in their opinion have some regional significance.

If the regional employment committee in Winnipeg or in Moncton, let us say, or in any of the other regional offices, has a good idea or a constructive suggestion, I think it is important that it should be brought to the attention of the regional office immediately. At the same time I agree that it should be carried forward, and that the national committee should know about it.

I can assure the committee that every effort will be made to improve that technique in every possible way; because it is in this way in my opinion that the pulse of public opinion and the views of the workers as to the kind of service they are getting is brought to bear upon the commission.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Rates of supplementary benefit.

Mrs. Fairclough: It would appear from the table in this section that the increase in benefits has not been extended to the supplementary benefits. If that is so, would the minister explain the basis upon which that action, or lack of it, is founded?

Mr. Gregg: This amendment was made necessary by the amendment to section 31. Previously the calculation of the average daily contribution, which is the basis of regular benefit, included the deduction of one cent collected for the purpose of the supplementary benefit. Section 31 has now been amended, and this deduction is not made.

It is necessary to change the first column in subsection 3 of section 87C to conform with the change in the table in section 31. I believe that is a full explanation. The rates of supplementary benefit have not been increased but remain the same. The reason for this is that contributions to provide for supplementary benefits are in the main paid by persons entitled to regular benefits, and it was felt that any surplus of these contributions should go to the benefit of the many rather than to increase the benefits of the few.

For example, in the last fiscal year over 500,000 persons received regular benefits and only 85,000 claimants received supplementary benefits. Having used the service to increase the regular benefits it was not found possible also to increase the supplementary. Supplementary payments made in the fiscal year 1949-50, from February 28 to April 15, amounted to $4,554,165; in 1950-51, from January 1 to March 31, they were $3,925,984; in 1951-52, from January 1 to April 30, they were $4,644,615.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think the minister's argument holds water, because if we are going to say that those who pay into the fund should be those who receive the benefits, then there is a very great class which has paid for years and has no hope of ever receiving anything from the fund. Those who are permanently employed, or who believe they are permanently employed, and even those in municipal service who have every expectation of being permanently employed in their present positions, would be in this class. Some of the arguments which have been presented to the commission with regard to these workers from whom contributions are taken, but who have no prospect of ever benefiting, would refute the minister's argument in this connection.

The mere fact that those who receive the supplementary benefits are a minority is no argument. If the scale of benefits is to be graded, then in my view the supplementary benefits should follow suit.

Mr. Gregg: Of course, as in every other type of insurance, if the unpleasant happening against which one is insured does not take place, then no collection is made. But it will be borne in mind that the supplementary beneficiary, before he or she can become so, must first become a regular one, and while in that regular capacity does receive the benefit of the upgrading.

Mrs. Fairclough: It must also be borne in mind that they are paying 2 cents a day in addition between the two contributors and the government's contribution, which after all is also paid by the worker and the employer.

Mr. Knowles: It must also be borne in mind that it will be even more painful for that person now to have to take a still greater drop from the amount of his regular benefit to the amount of his supplementary benefit. Previously in the top bracket a recipient could be on a benefit of $21 and have his supplementary benefit drop to $16.80. That was a drop of $4.20. Now it will be a drop from $24 to $16.80 which, as I suggested, is all the more painful. For the reasons the hon. member for Hamilton West has put forward, it does seem to me that there should have been at least a proportionate increase in these benefits along with the regular benefits.

While I am on my feet may I say, recognizing again that it is only a minor point, that we are glad to have the confusion that existed in this section resolved in the same manner that it has been resolved with respect to section 31. When the minister was on his feet a moment ago he said that the deduction of one cent was no longer made. That of course is just a way of calculating the benefit. There is no change in the amount paid in for the supplementary benefits. The only change that has been made is that the unemployed person will find the amount of his benefit directly opposite the cents per day he is paying in instead of having to go up one line as was the case in the confused table we had before.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Duration of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Knowles: Clause 15 is the one that extends the period for entitlement to supplementary benefits to three and a half months instead of three months in the early part of the year, and that of course is a welcome change. Would the minister comment on the words that have been added in line 14 which are underlined, namely "and for no other period"? I should like to be sure that these words do not impose any limitation not already applicable to the supplementary benefit. Things like this do sneak in sometimes.

Mr. Gregg: I am informed that it was not intended to impose any limitation whatsoever on a person who is qualified for any one class but rather that it was for clarification.

Mr. Knowles: Clarification of what?

Mr. Gregg: It was intended to clarify the practice which is already in effect.

Mr. Knowles: At this time of day I guess I may as well let the minister off.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—No discrimination in referring to employment.

Mrs. Fairclough: As I said at the resolution stage, I am very pleased that the minister has seen fit to put this subsection in the act. The only point I want to make is that of course this is merely a declaration of intention. There are no regulations. It is possibly in the nature of a pious hope; and while I think there is no doubt that the regional offices will be properly instructed in the usual course of events with respect to this section, I wonder if the minister would give consideration to having this new section properly publicized in a general way so the workers of Canada will know that this clause has been inserted in the act.

Mr. Gregg: Yes. When passed these amendments will be fully publicized through the Labour Gazette and other media.

Mr. Knowles: We too feel that this section should not pass without a word of approval from our group. We are indeed glad to see this provision being written into the statute. As the hon. member for Hamilton West has pointed out, there are further steps that could be taken in the field of fair employment practices legislation, but we heartily welcome the addition of this subsection to section 88 of the act. The hon. member for Hamilton West suggested that this subsection does not carry with it any power to make regulations. May I suggest that if regulations are necessary or would be useful to carry out the intent of the new section 88, subsection 3, it seems to me that is covered by section 97 (t) of the act which reads as follows:

. . . the commission may also make regulations (t) generally for carrying this act into effect.

If any such regulations are necessary to give definite effect to this intention I would hope that they will be made.

Mr. Gregg: That is correct. Our understanding is that if it is found necessary the unemployment insurance commission can make regulations under that section to carry the intention of the act into effect.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Coming into force.

Mrs. Fairclough: On clause 1 of the bill I proposed an amendment which the chairman said might be considered under this section. At that time the minister made two points by way of explanation with respect to the amendment being in order. While I concede that on the ground of expenditure there may be something in what he said, I claim that unless it is possible for a member to propose additional clauses to a bill amending an act then there is no opportunity to make suggestions for the amendment of an act except at the instigation of the government. Without any further debate I should like to ask that the amendment I have proposed be considered.

Mr. Catherwood: Before you give your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I think the hon. member for Hamilton West since coming here has made a real contribution to the representation of labour in the House of Commons. I think her amendment to the effect that a woman should be appointed to the unemployment insurance commission should certainly be given consideration. I believe her contention is sound particularly in view of the fact that women are playing an increasingly important part in the business and industrial life of the country and also, we are happy to say, in political life. I trust that every consideration will be given to her recommendation; but if you think the amendment is out of order, Mr. Chairman, then I hope the minister will seriously consider the matter before the next session of parliament.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): If I may I should like to add a few words to the comments the minister has made concerning the proposed amendment. My personal view is that if the amendment were to carry it could not be administered in a satisfactory way because under present practice the advisory committee is composed of eight persons, four of whom represent workers' organizations and four of whom represent management organizations. I fail to see how we could make it mandatory on either the workers' group or the employers' group to have a lady delegate to represent them on the board. So far it has been the policy to leave absolute discretion to these national organizations who send the delegates.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member not confused? This refers not to the board, but to section 4, namely the set-up of the unemployment insurance commission itself.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I am sorry.

Mr. Knowles: I am just straightening the member out.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): One member of the board represents the workers and one the employers. It has been left absolutely to their discretion to send the delegate they choose, without any qualification. I cannot see how we could make it mandatory either on the employers' side or the workers' side to restrict their choice of member.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I interrupt to say I covered that point. The only reason I asked for an additional member was that I realized that you cannot tamper with their selection of delegates to the commission.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Yes, but I come to this point. If another member is added, that would disturb the proper balance of the board. As I mentioned, it consists of two members plus a chairman appointed by the government. If I may I would like to mention to my hon. friend that on the various employment committees we have across the country, on the national level, the regional level and the local level there has been representation of women all along. If my hon.

friend is interested I would like to put on the record the representatives that actually sit on those boards. On that national employment committee we have Mrs. G. D. Finlayson, vice-president of the national council of women of Canada. On the regional employment committee for the Atlantic region we have Mrs. G. O. Spencer of Moncton, also of the national council of women.

Mrs. Fairclough: Might I interrupt to say it would make this more interesting if the parliamentary assistant in giving the names of these people would say what their respective occupations are.

The Chairman: Order. If the amendment is declared to be in order then debate may be carried on, but on the other hand if I am of the opinion that the amendment is not in order I cannot entertain any discussion except that which has to do with the point of order itself. I do not think that at the moment the parliamentary assistant is speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I agree, Mr. Chairman, but I wanted to be as courteous as possible to my hon. friend in view of the interesting suggestion she has made. I do not think it would be practical, and I fully subscribe to the comments of the minister a little while ago when he said that in his opinion the amendment was out of order because it involved the expenditure of public money.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I say that when anything new is proposed it is said either to be impractical or that the applicant is demonstratively unsuited for the job, or there is some other such vague illusion. I refuse to concede that this appointment would be impractical. I think it would be highly practical and that a suitable person could be found to fill the position. That person would not necessarily have to be suggested by the employers or the workers but would have full knowledge of women's working conditions in Canada. That member would not be appointed because of general interest in local conditions but rather in national conditions.

The Chairman: Order. In the course of the discussion on clause 1 the hon. member for Hamilton West moved that the following section be added to the bill:

> That section 4 of the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended:
> (a) by substituting the word "four" for the word "three" in the third line thereof and
> (b) by deleting all the words after the word "council" in the fourth line thereof and substituting the following: "one of whom shall be a chief commissioner and one of whom shall be a woman."

[Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle).]

The section if amended would read:

> This act shall be administered by a commission to be called "The Unemployment Insurance Commission," which shall consist of four commissioners, who shall be appointed by the governor in council, one of whom shall be a chief commissioner and one of whom shall be a woman.

My predecessor in the chair earlier in the day, the deputy chairman, suggested to the hon. member for Hamilton West that this addition of a section to the bill might more properly be considered after consideration of section 20, since it is an addition to the bill. Citation 670, as it appears in Beauchesne's third edition, page 232, confirms that view. It says:

> In committee all the clauses of the bill are considered before any new clauses are brought up and added to the bill. But this practice is not rigorously followed and the committee is generally guided by what is most convenient in each particular case.

I think he was quite right in considering that it was more convenient to discuss this after dealing with section 20 since it is an addition to the bill.

A point of order has been raised by the Minister of Labour, that the amendment would not be in order because it would give the government a direct order to expend some additional money. It would increase the financial responsibility of the government. I have looked at the act and find that the addition of one member would make an additional expenditure of $9,000 a year since that is the present salary of each of the commissioners who are now appointed. Therefore it is a case upon which decisions have been rendered on many occasions in the past. Perhaps I might refer hon. members to citation 453 which appears in Beauchesne's third edition at page 171 and which reads as follows:

> The tendency has been in the Canadian House of Commons, for the past twenty-five years, to rule out all motions purporting to give the government a direct order to do a thing which cannot be done without the expenditure of money.

Citation 437 of Beauchesne's third edition, page 167, reads in part:

> No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government, of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer.

From time to time rulings based on these citations have been appealed. I have one in mind which appears at page 306 of the Journals for Tuesday, 29th November, 1949, when Bill No. 194 was under consideration in the committee of the whole. The hon. member for Assiniboia moved at that time that clause 4, subclause 2 be amended by deleting therefrom the words "fifty per centum" and by substituting therefor the words "seventy-five per centum". The chairman ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it increased the financial responsibility of the government. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appealed from the ruling of the chairman, and that ruling was sustained.

Basing my ruling on the citations I have just quoted, I am sorry but I must declare the amendment out of order.

Mrs. Fairclough: Of course I bow to the ruling of the chair; but I can only ask the minister to consider this matter very carefully before next year, as was already suggested by the hon. member for Haldimand, because I believe it is a problem that must be considered in the days which are to come. The participation of women in the working classes is becoming increasingly prevalent and I ask the minister to take this under consideration. If there is any way in which I can assist I will be only too glad to do so.

Mr. Dupuis: I have a question to ask the minister, but I wonder whether this is the right time to ask it. Is the suggestion made in some circles of giving benefits to people on strike receiving proper study and consideration by the unemployment insurance commission?

The Chairman: Order. That question does not come within the scope of this bill. The hon. member may ask the question when the estimates of the Department of Labour are before the committee.

Bill reported.

Mr. Gregg moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just before the motion is put for third reading of the bill, Mr. Speaker, may I say just a further word to the Minister of Labour. I appreciate, although I do not agree with, the stand he has taken with respect to our oft-repeated representations on behalf of the recipients of unemployment insurance benefits who become ill while they are in receipt of those benefits. I hope that, in spite of the stand he has taken today, he will give further consideration to the particular problem I have outlined to him on a number of occasions. If his further consideration leads him to feel he cannot change his opinion, I hope he has been impressed with the seriousness of this problem, as I am sure he has out of his own experience, and that he will come to the conclusion that something has to be done about it.

I hope the remarks made in this debate by my colleague the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) and others will impress themselves upon the minister's mind so he will realize, as I am sure he does, that this problem must be attended to soon. Accordingly I ask him to use what influence he can with his colleagues in the cabinet, and he knows whom I mean, for the early introduction of a nation-wide health insurance program, including a provision for sickness benefits.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO REVISE AND CONSOLIDATE, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 337, respecting the Northwest Territories.

He said: Hon. members will recall that at the second last session of parliament a number of amendments were made to the Northwest Territories Act. Recognizing the continued and healthy growth of the territories, the principal amendment provided to the citizens of the territories the opportunity to elect three out of the total of eight members of the territorial council. The election was held under the supervision of the chief electoral officer, and the three newly elected members joined with their five appointed colleagues at the first meeting of the council ever to be held in the territories. It assembled in Yellowknife on December 10, 1951, and its opening was attended by proper ceremonial. The citizens of Yellowknife, through the warmth of their reception, their interest and enthusiasm, showed clearly that they welcomed this evidence of their new status.

The Northwest Territories Act was first passed in 1869. There have been several revisions and consolidations since then. The last revision was in 1927. The present Northwest Territories Act is contained in chapter 142 of the Revised Statutes of 1927, and four amending acts were passed in 1938, 1940, 1948 and 1951. The legislative powers conferred upon the commissioner in council by the present act are set out in sections 9 and 10, which confer upon the commissioner in council legislative jurisdiction over most of the subjects in which, under the British North America Act, the various provinces of Canada have jurisdiction.

There are several other matters in respect of which provinces usually have jurisdiction and in respect of which it is now proposed to confer jurisdiction upon the commissioner in council of the territories. These are roads, wills, the property of married women, coroners and inquests, controverted elections, the manufacture and possession of intoxicants, the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, and agriculture. At the present time all these matters are within the jurisdiction only of parliament. However, with the rapid progress in economic development in the territories and the substantial increase in population consequent thereto, it is now considered desirable to authorize the legislature of the territories to deal with these matters, and to repeal sections of the Northwest Territories Act dealing specifically with them.

In the past there has not been, nor is there now, statutory provision for the establishment of a consolidated revenue fund into which territorial revenues from direct taxation within the territories are paid and out of which disbursements for territorial purposes may be made. It is therefore proposed that there be in the Northwest Territories Act a provision for a territorial revenue account which will be maintained as a separate account in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

The territorial court was disestablished in 1905, when the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were created out of the territories. Since that time judicial functions, both civil and criminal, have been exercised by stipendiary magistrates, who have the powers, authorities and functions which were vested in a judge of the supreme court of the Northwest Territories prior to its disestablishment. The increase in population in recent years has resulted in an increase in the number of civil and criminal cases requiring trial by an experienced judge. It is therefore now considered desirable to re-establish the territorial court. It is proposed that the judge of the territorial court of the Yukon Territory will be ex officio the judge of the territorial court of the Northwest Territories, thus providing for the proper trial of cases without the necessity of appointing an additional judge. Corollary thereto, it is proposed also to provide for the appointment of police magistrates, in whom will be vested power to try minor civil and criminal cases, and who will have jurisdiction comparable to that exercised by police magistrates in the provinces. The present stipendiary magistrates resident in the territories will be appointed police magistrates.

Consequent upon the re-establishment of the territorial court, it is also proposed to redefine the areas in respect of which provincial courts have concurrent jurisdiction with territorial courts. At the present time the superior courts of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have in all parts of the territories east of the 89th meridian, and the superior courts of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have in all parts of the territories west of the 89th meridian, the same jurisdiction in civil matters arising in the territories as they have in respect of matters arising within the territorial limits of their ordinary jurisdiction. This has in some cases led to abuse. For example, writs have been issued in Edmonton against residents of Aklavik, with the result that the defendants have been put to extraordinary expense in making their defence at a place so far from their normal place of residence. Aklavik, located on the Arctic ocean, is 1,300 miles from Edmonton and there are no highways or railways leading to it.

It is of course still desirable to provide concurrent jurisdiction for areas of the territories where the population is sparse. It is therefore proposed to limit concurrent jurisdiction to the superior courts of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland in civil matters respecting persons and property in the territories east of the 102nd meridian, and to repeal the present provision for concurrent jurisdiction in respect of matters arising west of the 102nd meridian.

Provision is made for appeals to the court of appeal of Alberta from judgments respecting matters in areas west of the 102nd meridian, and to the courts of appeal of the provinces exercising concurrent jurisdiction in matters arising east of the 102nd meridian. It might be helpful if I stated that the 89th meridian passes through Hudson bay and the 102nd meridian is the boundary between Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

This bill seeks authority to have jurisdiction conferred upon the commissioner in council with regard to the manufacture and possession of intoxicants. At the present time this jurisdiction is vested in parliament although the commissioner in council now has jurisdiction regarding the sale of liquor. This double jurisdiction has caused some confusion, and it is considered desirable to delete from the Northwest Territories Act provisions regarding the manufacture and possession of intoxicants, so that all legislation relating to the manufacture, possession and sale of intoxicants may be contained in one statute, namely the territorial liquor ordinance.

It is proposed to delete from the act a number of sections relating to criminal matters. These will now be contained in the revised Criminal Code.

Another section of the bill would confer upon the governor in council authority to make regulations concerning reindeer. As hon. members may be aware, since 1933 the government of Canada has maintained reindeer herds in the territories for the benefit of natives. There are now three herds managed by native herders. It is planned to establish at least two more during the next few years and it is therefore considered desirable to give to the governor in council authority to make regulations concerning such reindeer.

There are several other minor amendments which I do not think need be mentioned at this time.

The bill contains 48 sections. Of these only 23 either are new or embody substantial changes from the present act. The remaining 25 sections are included chiefly to effect a consolidation and embody no substantial changes in the provisions of the present act.

The present act with amendments to date contains 117 sections. Seventy-two sections have been dropped. As mentioned, these sections refer to criminal law, coroners and juries, married women's property, wills and other miscellaneous subjects, all of which are adequately covered in other legislation or will be covered by territorial ordinance.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think this bill can be welcomed by the house in that it is merely bringing up to date what is in fact the constitution of the Northwest Territories. I would hope to see in the near future the ratio of the elected members to appointed members of the council increased in favour of the elected members. However, as the area of the territory is so vast one cannot as yet treat the area in the same way a province is treated; and possibly one will not be able to do so for many years to come.

The other hope one can have is for the establishment of a superior court in the territory. I realize that this also is a matter of difficulty. In the past litigants have suffered tremendous hardships in travelling to the superior courts of the various provinces. The distances even in the territories are greater than that across the Atlantic ocean. That illustration will give the house some idea, perhaps, of the tremendous size of the territory involved.

In passing I should like merely to mention the job that was done in driving the reindeer herd. There have been a number of scientists and other men such as explorers who have done a job which I think is unique in all the history of treks. For seven years the reindeer on which the economy of the Eskimo so largely depends were driven from their original feeding grounds into the eastern Arctic. The epic of the drive of those reindeer herds is, in my opinion, one of the great sagas in the history of the north.

I welcome this bill. If there are any objections to it, I feel they can be dealt with as we go through the bill clause by clause.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCulloch in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. McLure: Under the definition of intoxicants in paragraph (e) would come certain hair lotions or hair tonics. There is one in particular that is being used a great deal today, from which a drink is made. It is called "shako". The reason it is called "shako" is that those who use it are obliged to take it out of a bottle similar to that which the barber uses, and to take it out by drops. But judging by the arrests made for drunkenness it is the most potent thing on the market today. If anyone wants to get a real kick from intoxicating beverages I am sure that he will find that "shako"—if it is not prohibited according to this definition—will give him a real one, according to police records. I should like to know from the minister whether the definition which mentions these various things such as drinkable liquids, preparations or mixtures, would include any of those hair tonics that half the people are getting drunk on today.

Mr. Winters: It would, Mr. Chairman. If it were a drinkable liquid such as "shako" and then was used as an intoxicant, in that case it would.

Mr. Herridge: I am rather intrigued by paragraph (e) of section 2. The wording is rather interesting to me. It reads to this effect:

> . . . and all drinks, drinkable liquids, preparations or mixtures capable of human consumption that are intoxicating.

Will the minister explain to the committee the difference between "drinks" and "drinkable liquids"? Does that wording not seem to be superfluous?

Mr. Winters: I cannot suggest any difference at the moment between drinks and drinkable liquids. This section was taken in toto from a similar section in the Indian Act, and the wording is the same.

Mr. Herridge: It does seem redundant.

Northwest Territories Act

On section 13—Legislative powers.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is paragraph (r) the same as in the other act? It says there is no change in substance from section 12 of the old act in regard to education.

Mr. Winters: This is the same as section 12 of the old act. There is no change in wording.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Laws of England.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am not a member of the legal profession, but I should like to know why they are taking as their authority the laws of England rather than the laws of the provinces, federal laws, the Criminal Code, and so on? It says:

> Subject to this act, the laws of England, relating to civil and criminal matters . . .

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member reads all of section 2 he will see the reason for that.

Section agreed to.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Territorial revenues.

Mr. Catherwood: Will the minister explain the reason the change is made so that all territorial revenues shall be paid into the consolidated revenue fund? What would be the advantage of that system?

Mr. Winters: It is to regularize the accounting procedure. Prior to the time this legislation will have been enacted the revenue accumulates in the consolidated revenue fund in some instances; in other instances and as in the case of liquor the revenue is paid into what was known as the territorial liquor fund. We are now seeking to establish the practice of putting all territorial revenues into a separate account in the consolidated revenue fund where revenues and expenditures will be centralized.

Mr. Brooks: What relation is there between the expenditures and the revenues of the Northwest Territories? Is there any? Will the revenues in any way pay for the expenditures?

Mr. Winters: No; the expenditures are still quite considerably higher than the revenues obtained directly from the Northwest Territories. The other night when the resolution was being considered I put the figures on record. I think they are of the order of ten to one.

Sections 20 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Herridge.]

On section 28—Meaning of Court of Appeal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Subsection 2 reads:

> Subject to subsection 3, an appeal lies from the final judgment of a judge of the court to the appropriate court of appeal in any civil case where (g) the action is for divorce or judicial separation.

With respect to the section which was referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland in regard to the laws of England, did the laws of England in 1870 grant divorce?

Mr. Winters: They did.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that the reason for this section?

Mr. Winters: There is no change here. The provision has always been the same.

Mr. McLure: You have been going so fast that I have not been able to keep up. I wanted to ask a question on section 27. How is the grand jury paid?

Mr. Winters: The section says that no grand jury shall be summoned or sit in the territory.

Mr. McLure: No grand jury?

Mr. Winters: No.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—Appointment.

Mr. Brooks: With reference to the appointment of magistrates, can they be appointed from any province in Canada outside the Northwest Territories, provided that there are not sufficient barristers in the Northwest Territories? I would ask the same question with regard to the appointment of judges.

Mr. Winters: The answer is yes, from any part of Canada.

Section agreed to.

Section 33 agreed to.

On section 34—Civil jurisdiction.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think we will all agree that you are doing your part in enacting very profound legislation, Mr. Chairman, with the help of the members who are present. I refer to the speed with which you are accomplishing your task.

The Chairman: I have to interrupt the hon. member. I would like to hear the remarks he is now making. I think they are addressed to me. Would he be kind enough to speak louder, please?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not know that I can assist, Mr. Chairman. I was complimenting you and other hon. members on the task you are performing in enacting very profound legislation with the help of hon. members who are present. That is all I was saying. You are calling section after section, and we do not know, until you have called it and gone on to the next section, just what is being enacted. I suppose someone has to be complimented. You being the chairman, we compliment you.

The Chairman: Would it help the hon. member if I called these clauses slower? If the rate I am calling them is too fast I will very gladly slow down. The hon. member will realize that when I call a clause and nobody rises I cannot wait until some hon. member makes up his mind to speak up five or ten minutes after the clause is called.

Section agreed to.

Section 35 agreed to.

On section 36—Appointment.

Mr. Herridge: Subsection 2 of section 36 reads:

> Every commissioned officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is, when he is in the Territories, ex officio, a justice of the peace in and for the territory.

My question is this. Commissioned officers in the territories would be few and far between. Because of that fact, is there any possibility that a man might be arrested on a charge as a result of the action of a commissioned officer in the territories, and then find that at the same time that commissioned officer would be trying the case as a justice of the peace, even indirectly?

Mr. Winters: In practice that particular officer would not sit in judgment, and that condition would not arise.

Section agreed to.

Section 37 agreed to.

On section 38—Prisons in the territories.

Mr. Brooks: I note from the clause that any imprisonment up to two years may be made in the territories. In connection with more serious crimes, is provision made for confinement in any other penitentiary in the dominion? Is it necessary to have a clause in the act to that effect? I do not see one.

Mr. Winters: No. Provision is made and it is taken care of in the Penitentiaries Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the consent of the committee to be allowed to ask a question with regard to section 27 which says that no grand jury shall be summoned or sit in the territories. If I have the consent may I ask this question? My understanding is that the grand jury is usually regarded as filling a useful function. May I be informed on that?

Mr. Winters: That is exactly the same provision as is now contained in section 41(2) of the act. There is no change in wording or substance.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could the minister go farther and say it has been considered on its merits, and that it was not thought to be needed or desired?

Mr. Winters: It has been considered on its merits, and has not been found necessary up to the present time.

Section agreed to.

Section 39 agreed to.

On section 40—Roads; subject to control of commissioner.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I notice that this section refers to roads, streets, lanes and trails. What is proposed with respect to the construction of roads and streets in this enormous area? Are there to be special appropriations in the estimates to provide for streets in small communities? Who will be responsible for the expenditure of those moneys? What engineers are there in the area, including the built-up communities? Have those areas been surveyed, with due regard to their natural resources, mineral developments and the like?

Mr. Winters: All the communities have been surveyed and laid out. Some of them are a good size, the largest being Yellowknife, Fort Smith and Hay River. The system of providing roads is one which has grown up over the years. In most cases each project was treated on its merits. Today this has been somewhat regularized, so that the roads have been divided into three general classifications.

The first of these is resource roads. These are roads intended to enable the resources of the area to flow into the economy of Canada, and they are considered to be the responsibility of the federal government. They are built and maintained out of funds appropriated by parliament.

The second classification is that of trunk roads. These are roads connecting two settlements or two administrative districts, and they are considered primarily to be the responsibility of the territorial government. But here, too, depending upon the circumstances and merits of the case, the federal government may participate both in respect of capital cost in the first instance and the cost of maintenance in the second place.

The third classification is that of local roads. These are roads within settlements, such as roads within the administrative district of Yellowknife. They are the responsibility of the local administrative district.

Section agreed to.

On section 41—Regulations respecting reindeer.

Mr. McLure: What are the regulations with reference to the moving of the herds of reindeer? Are they all in one district at the present time, or are they transferred to different districts? How many animals can be killed for the benefit of the Eskimos or the Indians each year? Then I am in some doubt as to the meaning of the words "part thereof" where they occur in that part of the section which reads:

> Where a peace officer or any person who is a game officer under any ordinance has reasonable grounds for believing that any reindeer or part thereof has been taken.

Mr. Winters: The expression "part thereof" normally applies to reindeer heads taken as trophies.

Section stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Could we have a word from the man who directs our shortcomings about what we are to do tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up the motion in the name of the Prime Minister concerning pensions to long service members of the House of Commons and refer the subject matter to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Then if I have the co-operation of my friend perhaps we might complete Bill No. 337, respecting the Northwest Territories, which we did not pass today. Then we will take up the estimates of fisheries, mines and technical surveys, external affairs and secretary of state.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSAL FOR LONG SERVICE PENSION PLAN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the subject of a pension plan for members of parliament after long service based on contributions by all members be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is adopted I want to say just a word. I have indicated to my colleagues in my own party and to all others with whom I have had an opportunity to discuss this matter since it was first mooted at this session that I could not agree with the pension plan at least so far as it has been disclosed to us up to the present.

My feeling is that if it is desired that members of parliament should have pensions for long service, and the members are prepared to finance that plan on the basis of their own contributions, then there would be no objection to it. But as the plan has so far been outlined—and I must say that we have not any real specific details of it and therefore my remarks this morning will be short—in so far as we do have knowledge of it, I understand it is to be financed on the basis of an equal contribution from the treasury, that is from the taxpayers of Canada. On the basis that I now understand it, it will be of a nature far more generous and available at times far shorter than is usually the case with pension plans. It seems to me wrong in principle for members of parliament in this way to vote themselves a pension on a basis more generous than the usual plan, by means of a contribution from the treasury.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand this matter is to be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, and it may be that particulars will be given there which minimize the objections which I have to it. But on the basis of my understanding of the scheme presently under consideration, I have felt and still feel that it is wrong in principle, and I wish to indicate at this stage that I have that feeling and am opposed to it.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES RESPECTING CURRENCY, THE MINT AND THE EXCHANGE FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure intituled, "An Act respecting Currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the Exchange Fund," providing therein for certain administrative changes, and repealing the Currency Act, part II of the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act, sections twenty-eight, twenty-nine and thirty of the Bank of Canada Act and the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POSTAL SERVICE

MAIL DELIVERY TO SABLE ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): May I ask the Postmaster General if his department has made arrangements with the Royal Canadian Air Force to drop mail to the residents of Sable island during the course of training flights?

Hon. Alcide Cote (Postmaster General): I want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I might inform him that at the present time there are standing instructions to the effect that mail is to be dispatched on every available flight going to Sable island. I may add that I shall be glad to inquire into the possibility of using Royal Canadian Air Force training flights to drop mail on the island.

ORAL ROBERTS HEALING CAMPAIGN

CUSTOMS CHARGES ON ENTRY INTO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I should like to refer to the question asked in the house by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood) concerning the payment of $700 as custom charges on the entry into Canada of the Oral Roberts Healing Campaign. This matter was dealt with in accordance with routine practice.

The equipment imported by this evangelist consisted of a large tent capable of seating 10,000 persons, the necessary chairs, lighting equipment, loud speakers, furnaces, organ, etc., all transported in eight trucks and seven trailers. This equipment, in the ordinary course, would be subject to payment of duty on its full value, but in accordance with customary practice the sanction of council was obtained for collection of duty on the trucks and equipment on 1/60th of their value, per month.

HOUSING

LOW-RENTAL ACCOMMODATION—ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES FOR APPORTIONMENT OF COST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the Minister of Resources and Development table in the house the agreement recently entered into with the province of Ontario under which the province is assuming the full 25 per cent portion of the cost of providing low-rental housing under section 35 of the National Housing Act, thereby relieving the municipalities of the burden?

[Mr. Abbott.]

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): There is no new agreement between this government and the government of the province of Ontario. The legislation and the basic agreement provides for the government of Canada to pay 75 per cent of the cost of projects under section 35, and the provincial government to pay 25 per cent. How they apportion that 25 per cent between themselves and the municipalities is a matter for them.

Mr. Fleming: I assume that the minister saw the press report in yesterday's press indicating that there was a new agreement in that respect entered into between the province of Ontario and the dominion, under which the province was assuming all of the municipalities' 7½ per cent share. Is there anything in that press report at all?

Mr. Winters: Yes, I understand there is something in that press report. We have been aware of discussions the government of Ontario has been having with the municipalities, and they have arrived at some new apportionment of the costs which I understand will be helpful to the municipalities. This arrangement could have been entered into at any time since the legislation was enacted in 1949.

KOREA

CANADIAN TROOPS ON KOJE ISLAND—REPLY TO REPRESENTATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked me if we had received a reply from the United States government to the note we addressed to them regarding the dispatch of a Canadian company for duty on Koje island in Korea. As I indicated, that reply came in yesterday morning, and I have now had a chance to examine it.

In that reply the United States government states its appreciation of the importance attached by the government of Canada to the maintenance of Canadian forces as a unit, and the feeling underlying Canada's traditional position in this matter, and therefore, the United States government desires to meet the wishes of the Canadian government in so far as is practicable without endangering the United Nations military effort in Korea. This friendly assurance is welcomed and the qualification is understood and quite acceptable, as it was, of course, never our intention that the natural desire to keep Canadian forces together under Canadian command should be permitted to endanger the United Nations military effort in Korea.

CIVIL SERVICE

QUESTION AS TO FIVE-DAY WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Finance if he is in a position to report to the house on his recent discussions with civil service representatives concerning the possibility of the five-day week?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No, I am not.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister be in a position to discuss the matter when we reach his estimates?

Mr. Abbott: I shall be in a position to answer questions, but I do not know that I shall be able to give a great deal of information in addition to what has already been furnished.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO REVISE AND CONSOLIDATE, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 337, respecting the Northwest Territories—Mr. Winters—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 41—Regulations respecting reindeer.

Mr. Adamson: Before this section carries, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one word in connection with those who have been responsible for the policy of shifting reindeer. I should like to let the house know of the excellent work which was done, particularly by one Dr. Porsild, as well as many others in the department. They have moved these reindeer many thousands of miles over a period of many years. The movement of the herd will mean that the economy of the whole eastern Arctic, having regard to the Eskimos, may now be placed on a stable basis.

I could not allow this one clause to pass without paying tribute to the men who have been responsible for this work and particularly to Dr. Porsild, not only because he has done this work with regard to the reindeer but because his work with regard to the shifting of the caribou is also outstanding. When we have public servants of such outstanding merit as are the people who have done this job of pioneering in this territory, I think we in the House of Commons should commend them whenever possible.

Section agreed to.

Northwest Territories Act

On section 42—Manufacture and importation of intoxicants.

Mr. Fraser: Are the regulations with regard to the sale of liquor to Indians the same in these territories as they are in other parts of Canada?

Mr. Winters: The same regulations in that connection prevail in the Northwest Territories as elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. Fraser: What about sale to the Eskimos?

Mr. Winters: Sale to the Eskimos is prohibited.

Mr. Fraser: It is also prohibited?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 43 to 48 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

141. Departmental administration, $294,900.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, on Friday last the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo rose to speak just before the house adjourned, and it is his right to speak first this morning. However, I asked him if I might have the privilege of first answering the two hon. gentlemen who spoke on Friday, namely the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for St. John's West. The hon. member has kindly consented to allow me to do that. First, I should like to thank the hon. member for Skeena for his kind remarks with regard to the department. Such remarks are always appreciated.

An hon. Member: We cannot hear the minister.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, I think I can make myself heard if there is not too much other noise in the chamber.

As I was saying, I want to thank the hon. member for Skeena for his kind remarks with regard to the department. Such remarks are always appreciated. I sometimes think that our civil servants and officials, not only in this department but in others, do not get the encouragement they should. When you are in ordinary business, there are many ways of measuring the success or failure of your business. It can be done by noting the sales of your product, your production in the factories or by your balance sheet. But in government operation we have many valuable servants, and there is little way in which you can measure their success unless it be by the occasional compliments which are paid to them. It is not often these compliments come to them. If business is good in the country generally, the industry itself takes credit for that situation, and the ministers will take the balance of the credit. But in many cases the credit is due to those behind the scenes. I felt that this should be on record as far as my department is concerned.

The hon. member for Skeena first raised the question about sales and excise tax on fishing gear used in commercial fishing. I have been looking into that matter. In the immediate post-war years it was the policy of the government to encourage production as much as possible by removing the sales tax, the excise tax and duty, as was done with regard to agricultural implements and in many other fields of production. At the same time they removed these duties and taxes on many commodities for fishermen as well. I have here a fairly lengthy list of articles on which these taxes have been removed. If I have the consent of the house I will place this list on Hansard without taking the time to read it. I might also say that the secretary-manager of the fisheries council of Canada, in co-operation with members of our own economics branch is giving further study to this matter, to see whether there are any other items in addition to those on this list on which these same taxes might be removed. I think that probably answers the first question.

Memorandum

Re: Representations of Fisheries Council of Canada
Customs duties and sales tax

Prior to the last budget the council made representations to the Department of Finance, which were supported by this department, that changes should be made in the customs and sales tax procedure with respect to the following items:

Tariff item No. 401b—Wire rope and cable—dutiable at 15 per cent B.P. and 25 per cent M.F.N.

Tariff item No. 440k—Gas engines—The rate allowed under this item is available only to bona fide fishermen, which does not include engines financed for fishermen or engines bought by companies.

Tariff item No. 682(1)—Rope over 1½ inches in circumference which is currently dutiable.

In his second question he referred to the Babine slide. The Babine lake is the principal spawning area for the salmon that go up the Skeena river and from the Skeena river and the Babine river into Babine lake. Just close to the confluence of the Babine river and Skeena river there was early last spring a substantial slide blocking the river. This slide was some 200 miles or more away from the mouth of the Skeena river. There were no roads, and no means of getting in there. The first intimation we had that the salmon were not getting up the river was the fact that bruised and damaged fish were returning to salt water. This was immediately investigated, and the slide was discovered. There were some 70 odd miles of primary road to build before we could get any equipment into where the slide occurred, and the construction of this road was undertaken immediately. The road has been completed and it now extends within a few hundred yards of the slide itself.

Engineers from our own department, as well as from the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, have been in that area and examined the results of the slide, and in a few weeks they will be able to give a better idea of the work necessary to repair the damage. They are also preparing to lift the salmon from the river over the slide and allow them to go free to the spawning grounds in Babine lake. I am happy that this work is progressing satisfactorily, and a great deal of credit should go to the group of engineers and men who have been looking after this work in a very difficult area. It is hilly, with heavy bush and deep snow; but nevertheless the work did not stop during the winter and has continued up to the present time.

The hon. member for Skeena also asked a question with respect to the conservation methods that we are adopting in regard to flatfish. Regulations are now being formulated to give the chief supervisor of fisheries power to close fishing in Skidegate inlet when such is deemed necessary for conservation, and particularly during spawning season. With regard to conservation of flatfish generally, the fisheries research board has been carrying on investigations for a number of years past and in its estimates this year there is an amount of $81,500 for continuance of the work.

Then the hon. member referred to tuna in his fourth point. For two years we carried on the work of prospecting for tuna in an effort to find where the tuna were, the best method of catching them and what type of lure would be most suitable. This proved of very great benefit to the fishermen, but we now feel that it is not necessary to carry on that work because the fishermen themselves know the approximate time of the runs and the lure necessary to catch the fish. In addition to that, the fish and wildlife service of the United States have their boat there, and from them we get information. We in turn give this information by radio and any other means possible to our own fishermen. Since we are short of boats, we believe that what boats we have can be put to better uses in other places, and we think that for the present at least we should not continue this tuna patrol. I think I have dealt with all the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena.

The hon. member for St. John's West thought I should have made a statement at the opening of the discussion on the estimates rather than wait to the end. From experience I believe that everyone can get more information, and certainly the department can, by reserving for private members as much of the time allocated for fisheries estimates as is possible. After all, the estimates for the department are brought before parliament, and I regard this as an opportunity for hon. members to ask questions, to criticize or to make complaints. I feel that in that way both the members and the department would be served best. However, I do think that at this time I should take a moment or two to say something about the general trend, particularly of prices and of the catch in Canada.

So far as Newfoundland is concerned, they have no carry-over of salted fish from last year. The world supply of salted fish is, if anything, less than it was in former years. In addition to that, the price is holding pretty firm and we think it will continue to hold firm. However, no one can guarantee that it will. It will depend to some extent on the general food prices in Canada; if they remain firm or if they go down or up, they will be sure to influence somewhat the price paid for salted fish as well as for other fish.

So far as filleting is concerned, there has been quite an expansion of the filleting industry in Newfoundland, and this helps to diversify the fishing industry of that province, I think to their advantage. I might say that the first year in which Canada exceeded the 100 million dollar mark in fish was in 1945. This last year the catch has gone slightly over 2 billion pounds. Of that amount Newfoundland caught last year some 621 million pounds. The second province in Canada in amount was British Columbia with some 600 million pounds. Newfoundland has added considerably to the status of Canada so far as the fishing industry is concerned.

So far as general price in the maritimes is concerned, that is also holding up very well, as is the price for the inland fisheries. In British Columbia there is a slightly different situation. Last year was among the all-time highs, with a pack of slightly over 2 million cases of canned salmon. That, with the temporary suspension of sales to Europe, means there is a carry-over. But a carry-over is not unusual in the salmon canning industry. They are accustomed to large packs, which sometimes increase for a matter of two or three years; and then the surpluses have later been moved out. In all probability the same will happen again, although we must admit that at the present time there is some difficulty, particularly in connection with the smaller concerns that are not well financed. But that situation is being watched very carefully to see if the department can be of any help.

Generally speaking, one must be reasonably well satisfied with the progress of the industry. It is not contracting; it is an expanding industry, as it should be, in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: Could the minister say the extent of the carry-over on the Pacific coast?

Mr. Mayhew: No. I do not know what the extent of the carry-over is. I do not think it would be in the best interests of all to publish it, if I did know; and I think the hon. member will understand why.

Then, the hon. member for St. John's West asked about the fisheries prices support board, and the program of deficiency payments made on the 1950 production of salted cod. The hon. member suggested that we should have made different payments, depending upon the actual prices received by the individual fishermen.

I explained before in this house that to have done so would have destroyed the market relationship between different qualities and between different localities. In my opinion, the kind of price support the hon. member is advocating would remove the price incentive to produce better quality, and, until we have better quality, there is little hope of our solving the problem. May I say here that I think the speediest way we can get greater return to the fishermen of Newfoundland, as in other places, is to try to get more out of the volume we have taken. In other words, the solution is to have premium fish; and premium fish for Newfoundland in my opinion is highly desirable, because Newfoundland has to overcome the disadvantage of distance from the main markets. They can overcome that disadvantage by premium quality. To that end not only the industry, but the department as well, is working.

The hon. member also suggested that we should make special payments to those who had a low catch. Low catches are due to many factors. The fish may not be there; the weather may be bad; the method of fishing may be inefficient and, in some cases, one fisherman may not work as hard as his neighbour. To undertake to meet every case of low income through subsidy would destroy all incentive for the fisherman to do his best, and would result in no progress toward the use of more efficient methods.

The hon. member also referred to the drift of fishermen away from the salted fish industry. In a few years he will probably be complaining about the drift back into the fisheries. It is only natural that at some periods one industry is going to be more attractive than another. During the present period, when the fishery is adjusting itself to new conditions, which is bound to take time if it is to be done right, it may well be in the best interests of all concerned if some of the fishermen can find employment elsewhere.

And may I say on that point that I believe this is in accordance with the policy of the Newfoundland government, which is doing everything it can to bring new industries into that province, so that the people there will not be solely dependent upon the fisheries for their welfare.

But there is nothing new in this. Let my hon. friend look at the wartime figures and he will find a decline much greater than that of today; but he will also find that the number increased just as quickly after the war was over.

The hon. member had something to say about the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act and the small number of loans being made. He neglected to point out that in fisheries, unlike agriculture, there are provincial fishermen's loan boards in all the eastern provinces. He also neglected to point out that, rather than make repayable loans to fishermen to help them get better boats, the federal government is providing outright grants. No such grants are made to farmers.

Although I believe most hon. members are aware of this fact, perhaps I should explain that we do give subsidies to groups of fishermen who want to build draggers, and boats of that nature. This assistance is given to the extent of $165 a ton. In addition, the loan boards of the various provinces do make repayable loans.

The hon. member referred to a question on the order paper which had reference to long-lining experiments. In his speech last Friday evening he stated that he had asked for the value of the catch. As will be seen at page 585 of Hansard, he asked for the cost since the commencement of long-liner experiments in Newfoundland cod fishing, and the revenue received from that operation. This information was given.

In 1950 the operation was on an experimental basis, and the charters contemplated the value of the fish taken would accrue to the government. In 1951 the operation was planned to provide information based upon fishing to produce maximum quantities from known areas. The boat O Johnny O operating from June 9 to December 15 caught 398,313 pounds of fish. Gross stock from sale of this fish was $9,599. After providing a boat's share of 20 per cent and expenses of $2,156 there was a share of $1,842 for each of the crew of three men. I might add that they were fishing approximately six months, and the amount received made an average of over $300 a month for the members of the crew.

Captain Hemeon commenced operating with the Miss Osborne. It unfortunately was lost in early August. He continued with the East Wind for a short time and latterly the Edward Humby. He produced 391,000 pounds of marketable cod. Gross stock sales were $10,129. After providing boat shares and operating expenses, four men shared $1,522 each.

If the Miss Osborne had continued throughout the season and there was no lost time it is estimated 500,000 pounds of fish would have been taken with an estimated share per man of $1,822.

Detailed comparisons have been worked out as to operations by these two boats and a selected number of the better boats at Bonavista. After taking all aspects of operation into consideration the crew shares of the long-lining boats were about double those of the local boats operating traps, line trawls and hand lines.

While under existing conditions funds for bait depot construction are necessarily restricted, the department continues to give consideration to the establishing of bait service facilities, but depending on measurement of need.

With regard to the specific instances cited by the hon. member; in the first, the North Harbour area comprising North Harbour, St. Joseph's, New Bridge, Mount Carmel and Tickles, fish production is small. The distances between each of these villages and North Harbour is considerable, and our information is that it is not likely that if a depot were established at North Harbour fishermen from the other villages would patronize it.

With reference to the request for a depot at Colinet island, while there is greater fishing effort there, the fact is that the existing depot at St. Mary's is only eight miles distant and surely some arrangement could be worked out among the fishermen to obtain and transport bait from this plant. It is a fact that Colinet island fishermen have been using the St. Mary's depot.

In all of the above settlements a total of about 130 fishermen operated in 1951, the production of salted codfish by trawls being less than 4,000 quintals. Following due consideration it is the view of the department that even if bait storage facilities were provided at these places the production of fish would not be materially increased.

The hon. member referred to the Newfoundland fisheries development committee, stating that it had been working for the past two years and asking whether I could report on what has been done and whether or not an interim report had been presented by the committee. In the first place I should point out that this committee was set up early in 1951 and therefore has been working for only a little over one year. During this period the committee has brought together a great deal of information from many sources on all aspects of the Newfoundland fisheries. The committee has indicated to me that it expects to have its report completed in the fall of this year. The report, when completed, should provide a road map for the future development of the fisheries of Newfoundland.

With respect to an interim report, the committee did make certain proposals for additional exploratory and technical research work during the present summer. This government, as well as the government of Newfoundland, has agreed to carry out much of this research in order to facilitate the work of the committee.

The hon. member pointed out that he had noticed that new hatcheries were being built in the maritime provinces during 1951 and wondered if we had given consideration to such establishments for Newfoundland to plant lake trout and Atlantic salmon. I should like to make the following comments.

(a) No new hatcheries were built in the maritimes during 1951.

(b) Under our agreement with the province of Newfoundland, the province is responsible for freshwater fish. The question of hatcheries for lake trout would thus be for its consideration.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

(c) We have had before us representation for salmon hatcheries in Newfoundland. From our knowledge of the present condition of the salmon populations and as a result of the experience gained elsewhere, we are not convinced that hatcheries will be of great benefit. It is our feeling that improvement of access to available spawning grounds, such as is contemplated by the fishways now under construction on the Terra Nova and Humber rivers, will be more productive.

I think I have answered all the questions put forward by the two previous speakers.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, as most of my constituents are fishermen, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to express our sincere thanks to the Minister of Fisheries for the great personal interest he has taken in the problems of Newfoundland fishermen, and to the federal government as a whole for the various forms of assistance provided such as bounties for fishing boats, experimental research and particularly for the deficiency payments on dry shore-cured, salt cod, without which many fishermen would not have been able to meet the cost of production. I feel also that I would be failing in my duty to my constituents if I did not seize this opportunity to lay before this committee the situation that has arisen in my riding owing to the presence of foreign draggers on those fishing grounds upon which shore fishermen depend for their livelihood.

In order to see the picture in its true perspective hon. members must understand that there are in my riding about 45,000 people of whom at least 80 per cent are either directly engaged in the fishing industry or indirectly dependent upon it. Owing to the decline in the bank fisheries and the use of draggers by companies operating fresh fish filleting plants, the majority of those directly engaged in the fishing industry are inshore fishermen.

These inshore fishermen put out from their harbours in the early morning and return in the evening of the same day with their catch. They use a variety of small boats from a 20-foot open boat powered with a 5-horsepower engine and a 2-man crew to a 50-foot decked boat with a 2-dory crew. These boats are not equipped to go long distances offshore and consequently are absolutely dependent upon the inshore fishing grounds for their livelihood.

Unfortunately the largest and best of these inshore fishing grounds lie from five to fifteen miles off shore, well outside the three-mile limit of territorial waters. The grounds themselves average from two to six miles in width and from five to twenty miles in length. The inshore fishermen have had the exclusive use of these fishing grounds for nearly fifty years and the whole economy of the inshore fisheries and the communities dependent upon them has been based upon the supposition that these fishing grounds would always be available.

I have gone into all these details for three reasons. First, to show that the presence of draggers denies the use of these grounds to the inshore fishermen. Second, to show that the draggers actually destroy the fishing grounds. This destruction is such that it may take years or even generations before nature can repair the damage. Third, to call attention to the waste inherent in dragger operations generally.

In order to fully appreciate these three points hon. members must understand that inshore fishermen fish with trawls. A trawl is a line from one to five miles long from which at intervals of approximately three feet hooks are suspended on short lines about eighteen inches long. These trawls are set in various directions to cover different depths of water, depending always upon the direction of the wind and of the ocean currents. Trawls are expensive. When draggers are operating nearby, the inshore fisherman dare not risk setting his trawl for fear it will be destroyed by the dragger, in which case a large capital investment would be lost which he would not be able to replace.

On the other hand, the dragger drags over the ocean bottom a large bag-shaped net with a wide open mouth. As it moves over the bottom it tears up everything in its path. It overturns boulders, tears away marine algae and other forms of marine plant and animal life which consolidate the ocean floor and provide breeding and feeding conditions for the various forms of marine life which are essential conditions for a good fishing ground. After being dragged along the bottom for an hour or two the huge net is hoisted to the surface. In it are fish of all varieties and sizes. Much of this fish is already dead—killed by the terrific pressure of being hoisted through the water and the weight of fish one upon the other. The non-commercial varieties are thrown back into the sea. The dead fish sink to the bottom and decay. Many of the commercial varieties are too small to have commercial value. These too are usually dead and are thrown overboard along with the others. The commercial fish are cut and the entrails are thrown overboard to sink to the bottom and add to the pollution.

In my own mind I have always regarded a fishing ground as a sort of marine oasis, a place where the temperatures of the water are suitable and congenial to the fish so that they regard it as a pleasant surrounding where they like to come and linger. Picture a fishing ground twenty miles long and five miles wide. Picture a dragger towing its huge net over the ocean bottom, tearing up the loose stones, destroying the plant life and upsetting the balance of nature. Picture the pollution from the decay of thousands of dead fish and fish offal and hon. members will understand that a fishing ground which has well served hundreds of fishermen for hundreds of years, and is capable of serving them well for hundreds of years to come, can be destroyed overnight by the operation of a single dragger and rendered unusable for a whole generation.

Hon. members will understand from what I have said that the dragger method of fishing is not only very destructive but also very wasteful since so many young commercial fish are killed before they have grown to a commercial size and are thrown back into the sea. In my opinion, this waste is sufficiently serious to warrant study by an international commission in the interest of conservation. It may be a long time before the effects of this waste become apparent in vast submarine areas like the Grand Banks, but in my opinion dragger operations on the smaller grounds should be regulated by international agreement, and should be prohibited altogether within thirty miles from shore to protect those inshore fishing grounds upon which the economy of the shore fishery depends.

Our provincial government and the federal government are collaborating with a view to reorganizing the Newfoundland industry so that the fishermen may derive greater benefit from these inshore fishing grounds. There seems little point in encouraging investment in this phase of the industry if the fishing grounds upon which it depends can be destroyed overnight by draggers.

It was foreseen that this menace might develop from the local draggers' operations but nobody ever dreamed that foreign draggers would be involved. However, the unexpected happened and hon. members will recall that last March it was reported to this house that a number of French, Spanish and Portuguese draggers were carrying out operations on inshore fishing grounds in the Rose Blanche area upon which the fishermen there have been dependent for generations. The results were as I have already described.

From the legal standpoint they were perfectly within their rights as long as they kept outside the three-mile limit, and some of them were equipped with radar which enabled them to skim along the edge of the three-mile limit.

Morally it was a resort to the law of the jungle as a result of which many Newfoundland fishermen with their wives and children will have to go cold, ill-clad and ill-fed during the coming winter. At best it was a thoughtless and selfish act towards a people who had always regarded them as friends, who shared with them the common dangers of wresting a livelihood from the sea, and who had always subscribed to the philosophy of live and let live. At its worst it could be described as an unfriendly act of economic aggression towards a friendly nation that has sacrificed many lives to set Europe free from aggression and has made many substantial contributions of money and materials to aid European recovery.

We must impress upon these foreign governments that Newfoundland is now a part of Canada; that Newfoundlanders are citizens of Canada and that they have every right to expect Canada to protect their interests and to defend them from every form of aggression whether military or economic.

It is quite evident that this problem has international complications, but France and Portugal are partners with Canada in the United Nations and also in NATO. Surely if that partnership is founded on the slightest bit of good will it should be possible to come to some kind of mutual agreement that will prohibit all draggers both local and foreign from operating on those traditional inshore fishing grounds upon which generations of Newfoundlanders have depended in the past and upon which they must depend in the future.

I know that the minister and his colleagues are fully aware of the problem. I trust that before long it will be possible for him to announce that a satisfactory solution has been found and that some sort of agreement has been reached which will safeguard the interests of Newfoundland fishermen.

(Translation):

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I hope that I will not be thought too presumptuous for rising so soon after having been officially presented to this house. But I do wish to make a short plea in favour of the fishermen of the county of Gloucester. During the campaign preceding the by-election of May 26 last, I offered the electors of my native county to be their spokesman on the floor of this house. They were so kind as to give me this mandate. Today an opportunity, which I would not like to let pass, is offered me to bring to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) and of the house, in very cursory fashion I must admit, the case of the Gloucester county fishermen.

Fishing is definitely one of our most important industries. Our ancestors, the old Acadians, descended from those Bretons and Normans from Old France who settled on the coasts of the bay of Chaleur or of the gulf of St. Lawrence after the dispersion, were led to take up fishing, as much from tradition as from necessity. One of our fine folksongs is aptly dedicated to the "Acadian fisherman". Myself a descendant of Acadian forefathers and fishermen, since my forebears, my grandfather and my uncles on my father's side were all fishermen, I cannot resist the temptation of placing on the official record of this house the first stanza of this song, of this ode dedicated to the valour and bravery of the Acadian fishermen of our country.

> The sea is my domain;
> A son of Brittany, I,
> To my beloved ocean,
> Do dedicate this strain.

I deem it an honour and a privilege, if not a duty, to utter my first message in this house in the beautiful language of my ancestors, on behalf of the fishermen of my county.

I believe I may state, without fear of contradiction, that it is a long time since the matter of fisheries, in so far as my native county of Gloucester is concerned, has been brought before the house and full consideration has been given to their importance in our economy, to the needs of our fishermen and, more especially, to the remedial action the Department of Fisheries could so effectively and so easily take.

The county of Gloucester is bounded on the north by Chaleur bay and on the east by the gulf of St. Lawrence. Its coast line, including Shippegan and Miscou islands, covers more than 150 miles.

Such nice coastal villages as Green Point, Petit Rocher, Beresford, Salmon Beach, Stonehaven, Grande Anse and Maisonnette, by the clear and blue waters of Chaleur bay, are important fishing and canning centres for lobster, the famous bay salmon, cod, herring and mackerel.

Between Maisonnette and the villages of Upper Caraquet, in Caraquet bay, there is fishing as well as breeding of the famous Caraquet oysters, which, for a few years now, have had the competition of the not so well-known but just as delicious oysters from the oyster farms of Shippegan and the surrounding area. Every Monday, the fleet of modern draggers sets out to sea from Caraquet and the whole area of Lower Caraquet as well as from St. Simon and the villages of Lameque and Shippegan for what is known in Acadian language as the "great cod fishing" on the fishing banks of the gulf of St. Lawrence.

Miscou and Shippegan islands do hold, of course, strategic positions as far as fishing is concerned and if the villages of Petite Riviere de l'Ile and Ste. Marie sur Mer were to be given the grants required for the development of their respective harbours, our coastal fishing would expand in such a way as to benefit the whole northern area of Gloucester county.

Similarly I hold that the dredging and the building of harbour facilities at Tracadie—a very important problem which I shall take up again in due course—is necessary if we want to get the maximum yield from our fisheries in the northern part of New Brunswick.

Having given this very cursory and incomplete picture of our maritime position and of the importance of the fishing industry in our part of the country, I now come to the suggestion which I would like to offer to the Minister of Fisheries and which is related to the estimates that are being submitted for our approval.

I had not had a chance to glance at those estimates until the last week end. I find no provision whatever in the estimates for aid or assistance to fishermen, whose ships or fishing gear have been destroyed or damaged by storms. That is a very regrettable oversight indeed. Every year, federal grants and subsidies are meted out to western farmers and fruit growers; if I am not mistaken, last year help was extended to potato growers and again, quite recently, to the western cattle breeders. I have nothing against these grants, but my contention is that the fishermen in the maritimes have been much too long the forgotten children, the orphans, of the federal government.

When I have had enough time to consult the statistics and to gather facts and figures, I shall deem it my duty to reopen the question, in order to prepare a full-length speech in defence of our maritime fisheries.

In my opinion, fishermen are too important to our economic framework and they have to risk too much, assailed by wind and storms in the bay and the gulf, to be deprived of fair and adequate compensation for their losses. These losses are all too frequent. Thus, every winter, every fall, our smelt fishermen lose thousands of dollars when their seines are carried away by ice floes. Similarly, salmon, mackerel and herring fishermen suffer enormous losses each year when their nets are damaged or carried away by ocean currents.

On the day following the by-election of May 26, a storm swept the shores of Gloucester—it was perhaps the tail end of the election tide-race that had swept over Gloucester county the previous day—causing our lobster fishermen of Shippegan parish alone losses of between $15,000 and $18,000, according to information I have received from my people.

I therefore feel justified in asking the Minister of Fisheries to give immediate attention to the matter, with a view to setting up—and this is the important point—a system of federal aid to compensate our fishermen for the heavy losses they sustain through storms.

Since there is no hesitation in granting aid to farmers and stock breeders during epidemics, why not give assistance to the fishermen who are constantly victims of the worst plague there is—and I know something about it—storms at sea? I cherish the hope, therefore, that the Minister of Fisheries and his department will be kind enough to consider favourably these more or less scrappy remarks, this hastily prepared plea and that, in the near future, they will take the necessary steps to come to the rescue of our unfortunate fishermen, not only in my constituency of Gloucester, but in the maritimes and all of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it was only on the week end that I had my first opportunity to scan—rapidly, I must admit—the estimates of the Department of Fisheries. Representing as I do a constituency in which fisheries occupy such an important place in our economy I decided to rise today, at the risk of appearing to be somewhat presumptuous, so soon after my official introduction in the House of Commons, in order to present a strong plea—unprepared and incomplete though it may be—on behalf of those hardy toilers of the sea, the fishermen of my county and of the maritime provinces. In looking over the estimates of the Department of Fisheries I was amazed to find therein no provision whatsoever for aid or assistance to fishermen who have the misfortune to lose their boats or their gear or to have the same damaged as a result of storms or other whims of this most exacting mistress—the sea.

My submission to this committee is this. Since the federal government does not hesitate to subsidize the wheat growers, the potato growers, the apple growers or, as is now being done, the cattle breeders or ranchers, why has it never seen fit to give financial assistance to the fishermen who are too often the victims of this unpredictable and most uncontrollable epidemic, a storm at sea. I have definite information that in the province of Quebec, where fisheries are a provincial matter, in case of loss of gear or boats fishermen are being directly assisted by the provincial government. As soon as a loss is reported to the provincial department of fisheries in Quebec, an investigation is carried out; and upon a favourable report being submitted to the department by the provincial inspectors, satisfactory financial assistance is granted to the Quebec fishermen.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, I have as yet been unable to prepare a real speech in support of federal aid to our fishermen, but I plan to do so at the first opportunity. However, I respectfully suggest to the Minister of Fisheries and to his department that immediate steps should be taken in order that the too-long-forgotten children—the orphans, may I say—of this federal government, namely the fishermen of my county, of the rest of the maritime provinces and of Canada, may soon be granted the same preferential treatment that has been so generously meted out by this government to the farmers and to the cattle breeders and ranchers. This, Mr. Chairman, is my submission to the minister and his department.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the new member who has recently come into the house on the presentation he made here today. I noted this morning the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries. He suggested that his department has gone a long way in encouraging a greater production of fish. At this point may I say that a greater production is of little benefit if the prices paid to the fishermen are below the cost of production. That is the matter with which I wish to deal for some little time.

I have carefully scrutinized the estimates of the Department of Fisheries, inasmuch as I had been given to understand that officials of this department have stated that assistance to the fishing industry compares favourably with that which is provided for agriculture. I could at this time go into a long dissertation with regard to comparisons as between the two industries. I shall, however, refrain from doing so to any great extent, as the figures before us will speak for themselves.

The total vote for the fisheries department this year is nearly $10 million. If that figure is broken down it will be found that five-sixths of it or approximately $8,500,000 go to the employees of the department, leaving one-sixth, or $1,500,000 for other purposes connected with the industry; and five-sixths of this remainder, of $1,500,000, does not apply in any way to the province of New Brunswick. I refer to $700,000 for seal skins; $342,500 for bait service for Newfoundland; $240,000 for fisheries support board, Newfoundland, which leaves $160,000 for bounty payments for all the maritime provinces and $150,000 for the construction of draggers in all of the maritime provinces. With regard to the province of New Brunswick, my estimate would be that we would receive less than $100,000, including the bounty payments which cost the taxpayers of this country not one single penny.

In reply to a question which I placed on the order paper some time ago with regard to loans under the farm loan board and the fisheries loan board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1952, I received the following reply on June 4 from the Minister of Finance: Under the farm loan board, $4,238,400; under fisheries, $800. In other words, for every single dollar fishermen were granted, agriculture was given $5,298. This may be considered to be a fair distribution by some people in this country but I am sure the great majority of Canadians would not look upon it in that light. Just at this point I should also like to put on the record some information which was given to the hon. member for Oxford a few days ago. This was the average amount of government subsidies for the fiscal year 1950-51. In the answer given you will find the following: Department of Agriculture, $120,455,000. Defence production; the only item that came under that department was assistance to the steel industry of about $1,500,000. Subsidies to the provinces averaged about $18,500,000. So far as fisheries is concerned, the total amount paid in 1950-51 was $127,000. The total subsidy paid under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to the Canadian gold mines, however, is near $9 million. I might also add to the ones that I have given the subsidies of the Department of Transport as follows: Maritime Freight Rates Act, $8,474,577. The total grant from that department was $8,768,000. The Canadian maritime commission amounted to $14 million. I could go on with many more. These are on the record, however. I believe that when they are compared with the financial assistance given to the fishing industry we will all be convinced that the fishing industry in this country today is a forgotten industry.

There are many examples I could give to the committee, but as I said previously, I shall refrain from doing that at this time, as I wish to discuss a problem which is of great importance to the whole economy of the county I have the honour to represent. I refer to the sardine industry, although many other branches of the fishing industry would come within the same category, and they might be described as the depressed industries, particularly our sardine industry and our fishermen who are engaged in the catching of ground fish.

During this session we have heard many suggestions with regard to some type of insurance to protect all types of fishing equipment. Before I get too far away from my main subject, I should like to suggest a way in which an insurance plan might be established, which would give the fishermen some protection, and at the same time the fishermen themselves would be contributing. In no way would this place any financial burden on the taxpayers of this country. I refer to the $160,000 which is paid in bounties and distributed among thousands of fishermen each year in payments ranging from $5 to $10, regulated of course by the number eligible for payment and by the number of applications received. This bounty is of little assistance to the industry, and although I am not familiar with insurance rates I am convinced that $160,000 would pay the premium on an enormous amount of insurance and give those fishermen a protection which is considered very necessary in other industries but has never applied to the great part of the fisherman's property used in his hazardous calling.

It might be necessary for the government to supplement this payment by some amount, but I suggest it to the department for their consideration, and also to get the reaction from the fishermen themselves. I believe it would be a move in the right direction, and would be endorsed by the majority of the fishermen in the maritime provinces.

I should now like to turn to my main subject which is, as I said, sardines. In doing so I wish to emphasize the importance of this industry to southern New Brunswick. During the past few months the press of the province of New Brunswick has been giving its readers some useful data in connection with our clam industry. They have gone all-out in expressing their anxiety regarding the depletion of our clam flats. We who live in that area are fully aware of the fact that clams are becoming less plentiful, and we all understand why this condition has been brought about. During the past six or seven years, for the first time in history, those engaged in this industry have been receiving a fair price for their product. For years clams sold for prices ranging from 80 cents a barrel to $2. However, the price has advanced during these last five or six years to $8, $10 and sometimes to $12 a barrel. These prices induced a greater number to go into the industry. The demand has been really good and the prices are very encouraging.

So far as the depletion of the beds is concerned, we who have been very close to the industry—and by "very close" I mean on a frozen beach with a hoe producing clams —feel that the Department of Fisheries has the right approach to this problem. They plan closing certain areas at different periods. If this is done, our supply of clams will gradually increase, as they grow very rapidly and any danger of depletion, in my opinion, is something we should not be too worried about.

Mr. McLure: The hon. member is now speaking about soft-shell clams or hard-shell clams?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Hard shell. We all agree that the industry is of great importance, and I would not in any way want to leave the impression that I do not realize that myself.

While this problem was being given substantial publicity in the press I had expected that the sardine industry would certainly be mentioned. Although this industry is of the greatest importance to our province it was apparently taken for granted that all was well, even though the sardine fishermen themselves had been greatly disturbed.

At this point I wish to explain some of the problems these fishermen have had to contend with and briefly describe the particular period within my memory which dates back about forty years. I wish to emphasize the lack of any control whatsoever over this industry by the producers themselves. In some cases, tons of sardines are taken to canneries for samples. The entire lot may be condemned by inspectors. Then the fishermen are paid whatever the canners feel that they wish to pay them. There is no regulation to govern that. I often stop to consider how the canners themselves would regard an arrangement of this character: for example, if they sold 10,000 cases of sardines and were paid for 5,000, or if they bargained for $8 a case for the finished product and after delivering the product were paid only $4. These organizations, however, are protected against any such incident. Is it not reasonable to expect that those who produce the raw materials which are so essential to the canners should demand the same protection and security? This security and protection which some enjoy, however, has never applied to these primary producers, except in wartime, and then it was applied to protect the canner himself. My first recollection of any type of agreement regarding an established price to be paid for sardines goes back to a period before the first great war. At that time representatives of the sardine fishermen met with the canners during the winter months, which would be previous to the building of their weirs. A price for the coming season was agreed upon, and in many instances individual fishermen would sign a contract with a particular canner for the entire catch of that season. These contracts were entered into in good faith, and in most cases were strictly adhered to.

I point this out to show that forty years ago this industry was much more stable than it is at the present time. We have been going backward rather than advancing, and before I finish I hope to be able to prove that statement to be correct.

I now come to the period of the first great war. This system that I have described continued until 1916, as the year 1915 was the last year I remember when an established price was arranged between the fishermen and the canners. I well remember the price for that year was $15 for the spring season and $10 a hogshead for the summer and fall season. The year 1917 was a year of scarcity. Sardines sold as high as $90 a hogshead in the spring, but before the year was out the price had dropped back to $10 a hogshead. Perhaps 2 per cent of our fishermen received the benefit of the high prices and the other 98 per cent paid it back to the canners before the season was over.

In 1918, the year after this experience, by some international governmental arrangement a price of $25 a hogshead was established; this price held for the season ended November 30 of that year. As the canning period at that time was controlled in the United States—and it is at the present time—the period in which they could operate was from April 15 to November 30. The first year after the war, however—1919—prices again dropped to $5 and $10 a hogshead. Fishermen's unions were formed in an endeavour to cope with the situation, but their efforts were in vain. We drifted along until 1923, taking whatever was offered.

In 1923, another year of scarcity, the prices of sardines climbed in the latter part of the season to $50 and $60 a hogshead. Less than 5 per cent of those engaged in the industry received any benefit from the high price.

And the following year, 1924, those who did not benefit from the high prices in 1923 were held responsible and before that season was completed the $5 and $10 prices prevailed.

In the year 1925, through the efforts of the late P. J. Veniot, the then premier of the province of New Brunswick, a floor price of $10 a hogshead was put into effect. The canners resented government interference, and immediately decided to destroy this protection, not that the price of $10 per hogshead was excessive or unreasonable, but purely as a matter of principle.

I will now explain the methods they employed and how successfully it worked to the canners' advantage. The year 1925, when this arrangement went into effect, happened to be a year of plentiful supply. The canner would send his boats or carriers day after day to the same fishermen, ignoring those in the area around him. It created dissension among the fishermen. A fisherman would feel, "Well, if John Jones can sell his fish, there is something wrong; I am going to sell my fish." They broke up that arrangement inside of six weeks from the time it was established. After this episode we continued to drift with the tide. There was no organization. Fishermen were completely at the mercy of the canners.

Conditions were fair until the thirties. During this period of time sardines were sold in the county of Charlotte for as little as one-tenth of a cent per pound.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask to what concern in the county of Charlotte those fish were sold? The hon. member spoke about fish being sold in Charlotte county. To what cannery or to what concern were they sold?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): To Connors Brothers and American canneries.

Mr. Brooks: What is the largest concern there?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There is one large cannery, Connors Brothers, in Charlotte county.

Mr. Brooks: That is the chief market there?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No; I must give Connors Brothers credit. They have paid higher prices at all times than the American canners paid. But the prices have been down—away down.

Mr. Robichaud: What about McLean's?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is Connors—the same thing.

Toward the end of the thirties conditions continued to be only fair; and after the outbreak of the second world war a ceiling price of $15 per hogshead was again established. This price was not established to protect the fishermen, but was established to protect the canners. It was a ceiling price and, as I say, it was to protect the canners.

This was not considered to be too generous a price, but it did stabilize the industry; and while this price was maintained we enjoyed a period of moderate prosperity. After the abolition of the $15 price, which was too low when the subsidy payments had been removed from netting and other fishing equipment, we carried on normally until the past three years. Again we find we have a depressed industry, with very limited markets and abnormally low prices. In fact, the prices are far below the cost of production. There are sardines being sold today in Charlotte country for one third of a cent per pound. And no fisherman can produce fish under present-day conditions at that price.

Mr. Brooks: So that the price paid in Charlotte county today is a higher price than paid in the Maine canning industry?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes, the price being paid by Canadian canners is higher than the price paid by American canners. A few cases have been reported where fertilizer prices were paid. This was in 1950, two years ago. The carrier would take them to the cannery instead and find a market for them in the cannery, putting the difference between the fertilizer price and the cannery price in his own pocket. I am not insinuating that this was any fault on the part of the canner. This was just the work of a selfish employee of the cannery who was out to make what he could for himself.

In 1951 scarcity again was responsible for a fair price being paid to the fishermen; and during the latter part of last year, and during this past winter, weir fishermen and purse seiners were paid $20 per hogshead. This price encouraged the weir fishermen to build weirs again, many of them going in debt for the necessary materials. Before they were completed the price dropped from $20 to $6 or $7.

I believe that during the past winter, when the American canneries were obliged to close, sardines were being canned for them in Canada. This had not happened before in my lifetime. It indicated that their 1951 pack had been sold, and that we might expect a good demand and a fair price in 1952.

Those are the actual facts which led the fishermen to believe that they were comparatively safe in preparing for this season. In many cases this preparation was very costly and entailed an enormous amount of labour. Owing to the quality of the sardines being produced at the present time, the canners have complete control regarding the quantities they wish to pay for, and the amount to be paid per hogshead. The price being paid at the present time would be about one third the prices paid last year, or would compare with those paid in 1950.

At this point I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared recently in the Maine Coast Fisherman which, in my opinion, is one of the best fisheries magazines published. This article describes conditions in the Maine sardine industry, which compares favourably with our own industry in southern New Brunswick. This is the June issue, and states:

> The following editorial which appeared in the Maine Coast Fisherman, June number, is republished as a matter of interest to local fishermen who sell their product in Maine:
> We occasionally hear fishermen grumbling that they have been short-changed for herring which they have sold to a packing plant. As most seiners and weirmen know there is a law on the books supposedly designed to protect the fishermen when selling herring. It reads in part:
> "Any person, firm or corporation purchasing herring from a fisherman or his agent shall either pay cash to said fisherman or his agent at the time of the purchase or shall furnish to said fisherman or his agent a written acknowledgment of purchase, containing all information necessary to complete understanding of the transaction, including the price and quantity and providing for payment not later than 7 days after receipt of said herring, and all payments shall be made in money or in money equivalent . . ."
> We have checked with the Sea and Shore Fisheries Department about enforcement of this law. It is the department's responsibility. They report that only one fisherman has ever complained to them. When informed that he would have to swear out a complaint against the packer the case was dropped.
> As the law stands now it is practically impossible to enforce. There are not enough wardens to supervise every transaction. If a fisherman feels he has not been paid for the full amount of herring that he saw go into the carrier, he must have a warrant sworn out against the packer.

And this is the part I wish to emphasize:

> Just as soon as he does that, he promptly loses the market for his fish. As the law now stands it is useless to the fishermen.

The minute he forces the packer to pay for the amount he puts aboard his carrier, the packer puts him on the black list and he is not able to sell his product at all.

Mr. Brooks: I understand the hon. member has been reading from a publication in the state of Maine, and he says that conditions in New Brunswick are similar to those described in that article. Is that the condition in Charlotte county, New Brunswick?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): So far as paying for sardines is concerned.

Mr. Brooks: So far as controlling the packers, controlling the industry, controlling the payments to the fishermen and giving them short weight is concerned, those conditions obtain as well in New Brunswick?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): As I have said, we are able to get a better price from Canadian canners than we can from United States canners.

Mr. Brooks: I understood the hon. member to say that conditions are the same.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The same condition would apply in Charlotte county. The editorial continues:

> We think the fishermen will be wise to see to it at the next session of the Maine legislature that this law is repealed. If another law is to be passed in its place it should be set up so that the sea and shore fisheries warden is the complainant just as he is in any short lobster case. This would make spot checking of herring transactions by the wardens somewhat more workable than it is under the present law.

From this editorial one gets a good idea of the complete control by the canner. If the fisherman, the producer, complains or insists on being paid for what he produces he is blacklisted by the canner and the market for his catch automatically ceases.

I should like to point out that as far as agreements are concerned the canners have never been able to agree among themselves. In the past they have had international agreements as to price, but when sardines were in short supply and the demand for the finished products above the average, deceptive methods were employed to break their own agreements. First one and then another canner would suggest to an individual fisherman that he would take short measure if he was given the catch. Or, when the situation was reversed and sardines were in plentiful supply, the canner would suggest to the individual fisherman that he would take his catch if he was prepared to give big measure. This was a most unsatisfactory arrangement in either case as it resulted in instability, breach of contract, lack of confidence or, in other words, general chaos. But in the final analysis it is the producer who pays the bills.

I have endeavoured to give you a true picture of the sardine industry as it has been carried on since I can remember and during the period I have mentioned I was actively engaged in the industry for twenty-three years. The dates I have mentioned are from memory and will be subject to correction if my memory has failed. However, I feel quite confident that they will be found to be substantially correct if checked.

In summing up the complete background of this industry I should like to suggest to the committee, without any fear of contradiction, that a similar set of circumstances could not be found in any other old established industry on this continent and that no other class of primary producer in Canada have been so completely ignored and left to work out their own salvation.

These rugged individuals engaged in this industry, the greater percentage of whom I know personally, are not looking for handouts. They have always been ready and willing to take the bitter with the sweet, but when the diet becomes all bitter they wonder if they have a friend anywhere to come to their defence. They realize that from personal experience I should be cognizant of their desperate struggle for survival so it becomes my unenviable duty to place their problem once more before the government in the hope that my presentation will not fall upon deaf ears.

I firmly believe that if anyone is prepared to criticize he should be in position at the same time to offer some constructive solution to the problem involved. For that reason I shall now suggest what in my opinion is the only course to follow in order to bring some semblance of stability to an industry which is now in a depressed condition and whose future is most gloomy indeed. In doing so I am confident that the course I shall suggest will be endorsed by every sardine fisherman in southern New Brunswick and in the state of Maine.

These sardine fishermen on both sides of the border must insist that the fisheries departments of the United States and Canada, together with the canners in both countries, get together immediately so that an opportunity will be provided for representatives of these fishermen to present their views and work out a plan whereby fishermen would be given a fair return for that which they produce. This has been accomplished in the past during the world wars and it was the only period in fifty years when fisherman and canner alike knew where they were going.

A stable price would benefit not only the fishermen, but the canners as well, and many canners I am sure will agree with that statement. A stabilized price would not cost the taxpayers of either country a single dollar. During the periods I have mentioned, when prices were regulated by government action, no subsidies were paid by the government of either country. For example, the margin to the ultimate consumer as between sardines at $10 per hogshead and $20 per hogshead would be approximately 50 cents per case of 100 cans, or one-half cent per can. That differential would appear to be insignificant in so far as the consumer is concerned. It is a fundamental principle from the standpoint of the producer that this differential may mean the difference between stability and prosperity, on the one hand, and depression and chaos on the other.

At this point I should like to suggest that the canner also has a problem. The supply of sardines to the cannery is most unreliable. There are long periods of scarcity and then there are periods of plentiful supply and for those reasons the cannery must stockpile during the periods when supplies are available in order to take care of their customers over the twelve months. The prices paid for sardines which are stored are of paramount importance to the canner. In the spring a canner may pay $20 per hogshead and store the sardines for three months. Then the price may drop to $10 per hogshead and the cannery purchasing at that time is able to quote lower prices. For that reason the canners try to keep prices at a minimum, never at a maximum, when there is a plentiful supply.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, at the time the house rose at one o'clock I had described present-day conditions in the sardine industry after a review of a forty-year period. I would like to say at this point that we all realize that there is great competition among the canners on the east coast, and for that reason it is perhaps to be expected that they must purchase their materials at as low a cost as possible.

Again I want to emphasize the fact that the fishermen cannot be blamed for their lack of organization or the lack of assistance received from the fisheries department. If these prices however force more of the fishermen to leave this industry it might have a very harmful effect, and again an answer to the whole problem might be the establishment of more fishmeal plants in this country which would take care of the surplus at all times. Some may say this whole question is purely a question of supply and demand. I would agree with that statement to a certain degree if we were not dealing with an extremely perishable commodity, so much so that it would be impractical or almost impossible to attempt to regulate the supply at any one time. This truism greatly strengthens the argument in support of a fair price policy for these primary producers.

The proposed international gathering which I have suggested to deal with this problem is not a new idea and I have taken the same stand on many different occasions since I came to Ottawa. I should like to quote briefly from my remarks as far back as 1945 during my first session as a member of this house. These remarks will be found at page 3657 of Hansard for December 17, 1945. At that time I said, and I was referring to the price support which was being discussed at that time by the agriculture department:

> We in the maritime provinces are in a different position from the western farmer. As I have pointed out, we are depending on the American markets for our livelihood. Therefore nothing but an international agreement would be sufficient to give us the protection I feel we deserve.
> I am personally acquainted with most of the Maine canners and fish buyers, and knowing them as I do, and knowing the friendly feeling that exists on this border, I feel confident this could be done by the two countries agreeably to the fishermen on both sides.
> I trust the department realizes the importance, indeed the necessity, of an agreement of this kind, and will work with the fishermen and the fisheries department in the United States to have an international agreement as to floor prices that will meet with the approval of all concerned.

We all realize I believe that these problems in many cases are deemed to be of a local nature and do not affect any great areas, but I would like to say that this particular industry means much to the whole economy of the county I represent. I would say that 25 per cent of the people in that county are engaged directly or indirectly in the fishing industry.

So far I have described conditions under which we have carried on in that industry on the Atlantic seaboard. In conclusion, I would like to describe conditions on the Pacific coast where these primary producers have some control over their own affairs.

Before a seine or net is put in the water in British Columbia an established price has been arranged with the canners and fish meal manufacturers for the entire season; not for a short period but for the whole season. We had a similar arrangement on the Atlantic coast more than forty years ago, as I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks today, but that arrangement has been discarded and conditions have worsened rather than improved since that time.

Fish or herring for fish meal delivered to factories in British Columbia by the fish producers are worth about $30 per ton or $18 per hogshead in our measure. Compare these prices with prices being paid for fish meal on the Atlantic coast line. If we had unlimited markets for any kind of fish at these prices being paid in British Columbia our worries would be over. The British Columbia herring fishermen receive 100 per cent more for herring going into the manufacture of fish meal than we receive for sardines which are canned on the Atlantic coast line and go into food. If the herring and sardines which were of poor quality at different periods during the past years could have been used in the manufacture of fish meal at the prices paid in British Columbia our industry in New Brunswick and Maine would have prospered rather than have become depressed.

If this old established industry is to survive we must have international agreements between producers and processors in southern New Brunswick and the state of Maine. The fisheries departments of these two great countries must be held responsible for any unnecessary delay in rectifying this glaring example of injustice. If the course I have suggested is not followed by the fisheries department our young men on our three large islands, Deer island, Campobello, Grand Manan, and along our entire coast line must leave their homes and seek better living conditions elsewhere.

If a set of conditions such as I have described could be found anywhere in the agricultural industry, officials of that department and sufficient funds would be made available immediately to investigate, and a remedy would be found without delay to take care of the situation. I suggest most sincerely that the fisheries department should be held responsible and any delay is not necessary. There are officials all through this section working for the department who know that the conditions I have outlined today are exactly as I have described. Information that might be necessary for the department to take some action in this regard must be already in the hands of those officials. The fishermen themselves are demanding that some action on the part of the department be taken. I would trust that the delay would not be unnecessarily long and that the situation might be investigated within a reasonable time.

At the same time a full-scale investigation into the spread between prices paid fishermen for ground fish such as cod, pollock and haddock and consumer prices might be in order. That might also apply to the prices consumers are obliged to pay in all parts of Canada for fish products. The great spread between the prices paid the producer and those paid by the consumer is something that should have been investigated long ago. The variation is too great between what the producer receives and the price that is being asked today of the consumers in this country. Such an investigation, I am sure, would bring to light a differential of most unfair proportions.

I regret that the time at my disposal will not allow me to go into this most important subject to a greater extent. An investigation, however, would I am sure be wholeheartedly approved of and supported by those engaged in the industry.

In conclusion, may I emphasize the fact that the action which I have suggested on the part of the Department of Fisheries is long overdue. We have always supported any assistance given to any other primary producers in Canada. I believe we have every reason, therefore, to expect some consideration to be given to those engaged in the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Gillis: I have a few remarks I should like to make on this item, Mr. Chairman. First, I should like to compliment the member for Charlotte. He gave us not only a very factual speech, but a well reasoned speech. Of course, being a practical fisherman himself, he knew his subject and placed it before the house in a very comprehensive way. I consider that in the last few years the Department of Fisheries has made a lot of progress, compared with what it was when I first came into this house. When I came here, the industry was really the forgotten industry. The question of fisheries was seldom raised in the house, and up until the last few years, from what one could gather, the fisheries department was the convenient spot in which to place a minister while he was waiting to be appointed a judge. In that way the fishing industry as a whole received very little consideration, and was really the forgotten industry.

In the last few years I consider that that department has made progress. For example, during this session the fisheries committee was perhaps one of the busiest committees. It sat continuously, and dealt with many phases of the industry. Previously that committee would only be called together about once every two years to find out if we could change the label on a can of salmon or something like that. This session that committee was very busy, and I think any member who sat on it will agree that we received a lot of valuable information about the fishing industry. I know that, as one member of the committee, I did. The present minister has at least been going around the country trying to acquaint himself with the industry. I am reasonably sure that the present deputy minister, whom we have all had occasion to meet or correspond with from time to time, is in the process now of tying up the industry on a national basis; something that has never been attempted before.

As the member for Charlotte points out, the industry still requires considerable analysis. Like every other industry in North America today, the fishing industry is undergoing a process of technological advance. It is becoming a mechanized industry. Anyone who reads the evidence the deputy minister gave in his first statement to the committee can see that clearly. The day of the hand line shore fisherman has just about passed. Of course, this advance is going to hurt some people, and the impact of it should be lessened as much as possible. I believe the impact could be lessened if some of the suggestions made by the member for Charlotte were implemented.

There are just two things I want to mention. First, I believe that the recommendations made by the member for Charlotte with regard to the $160,000 bounty should be taken into consideration. This amount of money, which serves very little purpose today, should be utilized as an insurance premium in order to guarantee the fishermen against the hazards of the industry. This $160,000 bounty is fixed by statute, and the department cannot play around with that. Actually, it means about $6 per man per year, so in the final analysis it is nothing. As someone said this morning, it will not even buy a good bottle of Scotch today. At one time it would buy two bottles, but today it will not even buy one good bottle. The regulations under which that money is paid are very inflexible. A fisherman has to have his application in by the January deadline, and then the amount of money which each fisherman receives is based upon the number of applications. In many cases the fishermen in the remote sections, far from post offices, do not get their application in and do not share in the $6 payment. I think a much more useful way of handling that would be the way suggested by the member for Charlotte. An insurance premium should be paid, even if the government has to add to the amount, in order to provide hazard insurance for those engaged in the industry.

Coming from the Atlantic coast as I do, I know that last year the fishermen suffered severe losses along the coast line. On at least two occasions they lost complete sets of gear, and that is a severe loss to the average fisherman. His means of livelihood are swept away overnight, and he is not in any position to replace the equipment. He certainly should be insured against that kind of hazard. If something like that is not done, then I believe the regulations under which this bounty is paid should be investigated. This amount of money is ridiculous for the purpose it is supposed to serve. It should not be statutory because it is fluctuating from year to year. If a bonus is going to be paid in that way, and for that purpose, then the government should look at the need as it fluctuates from year to year, and at least allow sufficient latitude to administer the program in a way to provide the best relief. As it is now, I do not think it serves a useful purpose.

The second thing I should like the minister to comment upon when he replies is the enforcement of an old law, particularly as it applies to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. In the past trawlers, draggers and fishing vessels of various sorts from other countries such as Portugal and Spain had the privilege of entering Halifax, Sydney, North Sydney and those coastal ports in order to purchase supplies. There has been a law against that procedure for a good many years, but it was never enforced. Within the last year the department has undertaken to enforce the law so that the foreign fishermen are prohibited from entering Halifax, Sydney and North Sydney to purchase supplies and so forth. An exception has been made, however, in the case of Newfoundland. These foreign fishermen can still go there to purchase supplies. I do not believe the department can justify that.

Either the law is good and can be enforced one hundred per cent as it applies to any section of the country, or it is no good and should be repealed. In view of the fact this law has not been enforced for a good many years, many people in these towns I have mentioned have built up a business on the waterfront on the strength of being able to get this trade when the foreign ships came into port. I should like the minister to tell us what the intention of the department is. Do they intend to enforce that law so far as Nova Scotia coast ports are concerned and leave Newfoundland as it is, or do they intend to revise the regulation altogether in order to bring some unity into its application? I am not quarrelling, mind you, or expressing an opinion about the value of the complete enforcement of that regulation. If I was asked for my untutored opinion with regard to the matter, I would say that the enforcement of the regulation—while it might do some harm temporarily to some people carrying on business—over the long pull would be much in the interests of the industry. But it is not my business to make these regulations or to enforce them. I suggest to the minister that if the regulations are going to be enforced, it should be done impartially. No section should be exempted. If the regulations are not going to be enforced, they should not be enforced in any part of the country.

Mr. Ashbourne: What about St. Pierre and Miquelon?

Mr. Gillis: We do not have much to do with St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Mr. Ashbourne: They are near to Newfoundland.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member means keep them out of there also?

Mr. Ashbourne: We could not do that.

Mr. Gillis: I am not suggesting that. I am suggesting that North Sydney and Halifax should get the same kind of law, as it applies to vessels coming in and making purchases, as Newfoundland is getting at the present time. Of course I realize that the Department of Fisheries is rather supernumerary in the matter of Newfoundland fisheries, when consideration is given to the fisheries commission in Newfoundland, the powers they have, and the restrictions with regard to becoming a member of the fisheries commission. If I were the minister I imagine I would figure that, with regard to Newfoundland, I was merely attached for rations and discipline, when consideration is given to the scope of that commission which has been perpetuated for ten years under the terms of confederation. But that is another argument altogether and I am not going to enter into it. In fact, it is none of my business. We shall let the premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Smallwood, work this thing out.

The two things on which I wish the minister to comment are, first, the fishing bounty, and what is going to be done about it; and second, how are we going to enforce the regulations with regard to these foreign ships making purchases in the ports that I have mentioned?

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, probably I should answer some of these questions before I get too far behind. First I should like to reply to a question that was asked of me on the orders of the day yesterday by the hon. member for Cumberland. The question was with regard to extension of the lobster season in that area. We find that this year to date there has been a slightly lower catch of lobsters than there was last year, although not a great deal. We have therefore not fully made up our minds yet just what we will do. But if there is any extension—and it is likely that there will be some—it will apply to the whole of that district, not just to one part of it. Our announcement will be made shortly.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister state when the announcement will be made?

Mr. Mayhew: It will be made by the first of next week at the latest, but probably this week.

[Mr. Ashbourne.]

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo made an extremely interesting speech. He dealt with two important problems, one of which is the danger to stocks from the use of draggers. I think probably there has now been sufficient experience in the use of draggers to determine whether or not there is a depletion of the stock in the areas where draggers are being used. That question has to be constantly examined and reports made. The information we have to date is that the use of draggers has not in general diminished the supply, although if there is constant use of draggers in a small area around the shore the condition might easily be somewhat different. That position will be watched carefully.

The other matter to which the hon. member referred was the extension of territorial waters. I have repeatedly stated in the house that, with regard to the conservation of fish, the three-mile limit was not satisfactory. However, the extension of territorial waters is an international matter and would require agreement by many other nations. The question of the stocks of fish comes within the competency of the international commission for the north Atlantic fisheries, that will be holding its second session in St. Andrews at the end of this month. At the present time the commission is examining the position in area No. 5, which is George's bank. Other areas will receive the attention of the commission from time to time.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester on his maiden speech. We were glad to hear him and to realize that he is interested in the fisheries of his riding. I wish to assure him that we too are greatly interested in that area. He spoke particularly about insurance for fishermen's boats. He also spoke about lack of assistance. I should like to advise him that in his own county we have given a subsidy to some 38 boats, to a total of approximately $167,000, which was $165 a ton. Every one of those boats is insured. They are insured for protection. The provincial government gives them a loan. We give them a grant. Our grant is insured for a period of five years, but the boat is insured until the provincial loan is paid off. It is therefore possible to get insurance on certain types of boats.

I will agree, however, that there are many smaller boats with gasoline engines on which it is virtually impossible to get insurance; at least the rate for insurance is so high that the fishermen could not afford to carry insurance on a small boat. I should like to inform the hon. member for Gloucester and other hon. members that at the present time we have three men from our economics branch set aside to study the possibility and the probability of bringing into force insurance on boats.

Personally, I have considered that the lives of the fishermen and the boats they work in are the two main things to be taken care of. If it is at all possible to provide some insurance which I hope will be a three-way insurance; that is, where the fishermen, the provincial government and the federal government take part in providing insurance, at the start, on men's lives and on the boats that they sail in. Later on, if it is possible to include the gear, that can be done but it will probably be well after my time. However, I want everyone to be assured that the lot of these people who harvest this valuable food from the sea is one with which we are concerning ourselves.

The hon. member for Charlotte brought out the idea—and it was referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South—that the $160,000 that is paid as a bounty should be used for insurance purposes. In the hon. member's own riding there are 146 boat owners and 181 fishermen working on the boats, or a total of 327 men, in the county of Charlotte who are getting some of this money. In the whole of the maritime provinces there are 14,358 men. It would be very difficult to get all of these men to agree to cancel their right, which amounts to a little more than $6 apiece; it amounts to $9.55 each. That is what it amounted to last year.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said that it was a variable amount. It is not exactly a variable amount; it is the interest on $4 million. That is the amount on which the interest is based. I think it would be difficult to get an agreement from the 14,358 fishermen that their money should be used to pay for insurance on boats when perhaps a good many of these men do not own any boats at all. There is also $1 a ton on the vessel itself that goes to the vessel owners. They could easily apply that, if they wished, to this purpose. However, it is a matter of their own desire as to whether they would like it to go to pay insurance on their boats. There would be great difficulty in getting all these men to agree to the use of that money for that purpose. I take it that this is not an instance where the majority should rule. In this instance the individual should have some rights.

The hon. member for Charlotte did make a very useful speech. He is a man who knows the fishing industry very well. A good many of the suggestions that he put forward will be seriously considered. He, too, advocated the principle that the $160,000 should be used for the purpose of insurance. He spoke of the price of sardines. The price of sardines is a competitive one in the tinned fish trade. In the first place, the plants in his own district have to compete with the sardines and canners from the state of Maine, and that competition is pretty keen. They likewise have to compete with Norway, Sweden and many other countries that are putting up sardines and have been doing it for quite a long time. Right in the heart of one fishing community that I visited not so long ago I saw Norwegian sardines and our own fishermen ready to buy them. It is a very competitive article, and a good deal of it is sold in the cheaper markets. They are put up in a tin that a man can put into his lunch kit, and that composes the main portion of his lunch.

The hon. member spoke of the competition and implied that some of the canners were not living up to their contracts. I think that if any of our Canadian canners were not living up to their contracts the fishermen would very soon complain about it, and they would have recourse to the courts to collect from them. But I think he was referring mainly to the Maine canners, and over them we have of course no control whatever.

The hon. member brought up another matter which I think I should reply to. He mentioned that the amount in the estimates before us is approximately $10 million. It is a little less than that, and he compared that with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, and said that ours is so much smaller. Well, I am not going to say that we are doing everything for the fishermen that we would like to do. I suppose the Minister of Agriculture would say the same about agriculture. But we should at least remember this. The total value of the fisheries to Canada last year, including Newfoundland, was $200 million. On the other hand, the total value of agriculture to Canada is $2 billion. There is a vast difference. If you compare the $10 million that we have with the $60 million that agriculture has, you will see that it is not too far out of line, but more than the $10 million that is in our estimates goes for that type of work. If you want to take in everything that we do for fisheries you will have to examine your estimate books in relation to your various communities or provinces and you will find large sums of money in there for the building of wharves, for breakwaters, for fishermen's floats, and for a great many other items.

The item of $80,625 for price support was referred to. That is only the administrative item. It is not what is actually spent for price support. However, I am not finding fault with the hon. member for bringing up these questions. I appreciate it very much, and it will get very careful consideration.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to foreign vessels having a base for their operations on our coasts. This is not a regulation, as was referred to by the hon. member; it is an act of parliament, the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act. I agree with him that it does need revision. He says that it has not been enforced. It was enforced very rigidly up until the beginning of the first war when, by order in council, there was some relaxation. It had been enforced I think rather indifferently between the two wars and since the last war. However, the act is so strenuous in its application that if one of those foreign vessels were picked up we would have no option but to confiscate the vessel itself. That, I think, would be rather unfortunate. When this was brought up about a month ago it was the first time, in my experience. Things have changed considerably since the act was passed. There were days when shore bases in this country were much more valuable to foreign countries than they would be today, when there are modern boats with a much greater tonnage, and with much greater sailing speeds. There is also the difference that, since Newfoundland came into confederation, by the terms of union, Newfoundland was permitted to continue furnishing these boats with supplies.

Then there has been another change. The islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon are owned by France, and they have allowed the boats of some European countries to base there. This is a point that has changed the picture considerably.

We have been asked what we are going to do about the act, and the answer is that we are going to discuss the matter with other departments vitally interested, with a view to a revision of the act. We would hope that this revision of the act, whatever it may be, will be done in sufficient time to enable people on the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coasts to make preparations to have supplies ready for the boats, should we find it desirable to make the change in the act.

However, this is not something that can be done lightly, because a number of factors are involved. When we give shore rights to a foreign country, we give to them the full advantage Canada has in respect to its proximity to the fishing grounds. In extending this privilege we would be giving away the locational advantage our fishermen have, and, I suggest, we have a right to expect something valuable in return for that.

Before taking my seat I should like to make one further observation, in the hope that those who are interested will pay some attention to it. We prohibit our own nationals from fishing in their larger boats inside the twelve-mile limit, while foreign boats can come in to the three-mile limit. I would hope that the foreign boats coming in and having the privilege of using our ports would at least recognize the regulations we have placed upon our own draggers and trawlers.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments on this first item. The hon. member for Gloucester dealt this morning with some of the problems of the maritime fishermen, and this subject was also discussed by other hon. members, in particular the hon. member for Charlotte and the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

As the first member of the official opposition to speak, following the speech of the hon. member for Gloucester, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate him upon the showing he made this morning. His speech augurs well for the valuable contribution he will be able to make as time goes on.

The minister dealt with certain matters of administration, and referred specifically to the possibility of insurance. His declaration was one which all hon. members will welcome, and which we believe is necessary. Some steps in that direction are past due, and I am glad to know the minister is giving the matter consideration. In my opinion some action should be taken.

Of course that is only part of this general problem confronting the fishermen, and particularly the inshore fishermen, those operating on smaller capital and with the small boats. I noticed a while ago an announcement by the Department of Labour in which it was said that it was impossible to apply unemployment insurance to the fishing industry. I think that is a wise decision; in view of the number of share men operating on the larger boats, and the number operating in smaller boats, I should think it would be virtually impossible to do anything for them that would be beneficial by way of unemployment insurance.

Someone may say that there is a sick mariners fund. Although I have no direct knowledge in the matter, it may well be that the sick mariners fund would serve a useful purpose in respect of those fishermen operating out of Lunenburg, or those other ports where one finds the large trawlers, and other heavy equipment going out for purposes of deep-sea fishing. But this does not apply in respect of line fishermen operating out of the little ports along the coast—or if it does operate at all, then only in a very few cases. Those men own their own small boats. They simply go out into the bays and return at nights. My understanding is that in order to qualify for treatment they have to be taken sick while aboard, and the fact is that most of them are at home when sickness befalls them. Thus the fund is absolutely useless to them.

I say there should be some study given to working out a program equivalent to that of workmen's compensation. I realize that workmen's compensation is a provincial responsibility, and that it is administered by the provinces. But it must be kept in mind that the fisheries come within the jurisdiction of the federal government. In my view we should make a study of the system. For instance, I have seen fishermen whose hands have been punctured by hooks, and where blood poisoning has set in. Those men have been laid off for months, and without receiving one red cent. Their earning capacity is ruined for the rest of their lives.

I know those fishermen do believe that some such system could be invoked. I would hope that departmental officials might give further consideration to this matter, and that when he speaks again this afternoon the minister might make reference to it. Or, if he would consider the matter, and speak about it at another time, I would be happy then to hear what he would have to say.

The minister made another interesting statement this afternoon when he referred to the draggers. I understood him to say that there was no evidence as yet that the operations of draggers had resulted in a depletion of stocks, but that study would be given to the matter, and if they were satisfied that this depletion had taken place some appropriate action would be taken. I can recall raising this matter of draggers and trawlers three or four years ago when I first came to the House of Commons, and that at that time the then minister gave exactly the same answer. He said there was no evidence that the draggers and trawlers were depleting the stock in any way, but that, if they were, action would be taken.

I notice that in a report which appeared in the Halifax Herald on January 7 of this year the minister's own officials made some comments in this connection. The article quotes Dr. Needler, director of the fisheries biological station at St. Andrews, and Dr. Templeman, director of the fisheries research station of Newfoundland, as making reference to the work which the trawlers and draggers are doing on the banks, and they make reference to the effect on stocks when, for instance, two Spanish trawlers sweep together. They make the statement that the evidence indicates that this is prejudicial to the stock of haddock.

I suggest that if in the opinion of experts there is evidence that these trawlers operating on the banks are depleting the haddock stock, it is a fair inference that the smaller draggers operating in narrower waters would also damage the stock. I can assure the minister of this, that it will require all his eloquence, logic and charming personality to convince the fishermen along the bay of Fundy that this is not the result. It may be coincidental with the shortage of haddock, but many of the people down there hold the belief that these draggers and trawlers are definitely prejudicial to the industry.

The minister pointed out a moment ago that our own draggers and trawlers are required to keep twelve miles off the coast, whereas foreign vessels may come within three miles, and that that is a matter to which he has given attention. I think it is time that special attention was given to this matter because, as I have said before and as the minister undoubtedly knows, there are departmental reports to show that at times these boats do come within the three-mile limit and operate close to the shore line, in fact so close that they drag up lobster traps which are set a few hundred feet from the coast. The excuse is always that they have been lost in the fog. I certainly regret that lack of navigational skill which permits them to get lost, and still avoid going on the rocks entirely. The only ones they are putting on the rocks are the fishermen whose gear and fish are being destroyed. I think definite action should be taken in this regard.

Reference was made to the extension of the coastal waters. I think there is a good legal argument, certainly a practical argument which could be advanced for the declaring of the bay of Fundy as being inland waters. I understand certain peace treaties would be involved. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs will agree that in the discussions which took place many years ago between Great Britain, which was then looking after our foreign affairs, and the United States that matter was left open. If the departmental officials would go into this and see that it was raised at a conference I think that they would find that action could be obtained.

While I realize that there is logic and force in his argument, I hate to accept entirely the statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton South that because this industry is being mechanized the little people are being forced out entirely. I admit that that is true in connection with deep-sea fishing.

Those of us from Nova Scotia will remember the bitterness of the discussion twenty years or more ago when we had the controversy as between trawlers and schooners and the rest. That matter was settled because of economic necessity; that era is past.

But all along the coast are many small villages which are supported by fishing operations from small boats which go out into the bay of Fundy or probably in waters in other parts of Canada. That phase of the industry cannot be mechanized. You have an ideal situation in the bay of Fundy and if proper steps were taken to stop the operations of trawlers and draggers the small hand-line fisherman would be able to earn his living and support his family and community as he has supported them for generations. With the regulations that now exist and the circumstances under which they now operate, unless something is done all these communities along the bay of Fundy and in the southwestern part of the province are going to be threatened with extinction. I urge that action be taken in this connection.

I do not want to take up the time of the committee any longer except to refer to one other matter which has already been before the house, the damage which was done to the fishing industry last winter by the serious storms which occurred at that time. The minister has referred to the possibility of some insurance scheme being worked out to cover the boats. That would be most helpful, but in this series of storms, which were almost continuous, almost complete economic disaster was faced by fishermen all along the coast of Nova Scotia.

Speeches were made in the house by the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth, the hon. member for Charlotte, and I think I made a contribution myself, urging that action be taken. I am sorry to see that as far as the main estimates are concerned there is no item which I can relate to the disaster which these people suffered. Possibly something will be included in the supplementary estimates, and I think we should be told whether there will be an item there. We have heard the logical appeals made by hon. members representing various constituencies and some action should be taken.

I was reading a statement made in the other place by an hon. gentleman from New Brunswick who at one time was a cabinet minister in the government of that province, and it certainly was not a Conservative government. He said that in so far as the maritimes are concerned apparently God worked in a different way than for the rest of Canada. When an act of God occurred down there it was considered to be the fault of the people and nothing could be done about it, whereas the government apparently felt it had some responsibility for the acts of the Divinity in the rest of Canada. That was a statement made in the other place.

In answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth the parliamentary assistant said that the matter was under investigation. Then the minister stated that there had been no request from Nova Scotia with regard to this. I have here a long and indignant statement by the minister of trade and industry of Nova Scotia which deals with the whole situation. He states that this matter is the responsibility of the federal government and that he has asked that action be taken.

It is true, as some have suggested this morning, that this industry has not received the same support which other industries have received, but I do not agree for a moment with the hon. member for Charlotte that, because agriculture has received certain treatment, fishing should receive parallel treatment or be considered on the same basis. Farmers suffer crop failures, and at least in the east they do not receive any money for it. They suffer from storms and various other things and receive no money. I think the minister was right when he said that in so far as the economic value of the product was concerned, agriculture was not receiving proportionately more than fishing.

If an economic disaster such as this had occurred to some other industry in some other part of Canada I think it would have been received much more sympathetically than this particular situation. I think the minister should state just where this matter stands, just what is being done or what will be done with respect to it. Scores and scores of fishermen have lost virtually all their capital. They have lost their boats, they have lost their gear, and in many cases, as the Minister of Public Works well knows, the wharves in their villages were lost. We do hope that some of these will be replaced so they can carry on.

This matter should receive consideration. We have heard it said that this industry is an orphan, but this government which is now in power should look after it. We realize that the minister is taking an interest in this industry and has travelled around the country, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, probably more than any other minister. But no matter how sympathetic or how intellectual the consideration given to this matter may be, that alone will not solve the economic problems of these people. I ask the minister and the department to give these matters careful consideration and see that action is taken at the proper time.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, I think I should answer the hon. member right now. The province of Nova Scotia asked that a survey be made by the department of the storm losses in that province. That was completed last month. I am now informed that there has arrived at my office an official request from Nova Scotia for assistance. We have not had time to consider that so I do not know what it contains.

At the earlier request of the provincial government a thorough survey was made of the losses. The bulk of the losses were made up of lobster traps. The number of traps reported lost in the storm is given at 155,000, or 30 per cent of the total owned by fishermen. These traps would be worth about $1 million but it is understood that many of the traps lost were old. There are of course always some losses, so that only a proportion of this year's loss can be considered to be above normal. The government has just received a submission from the provincial government based on the facts as now known.

The lobster catch in Nova Scotia for the first four months of this year was 4·7 million pounds as compared with 5·7 million pounds in the same period in 1951. With better prices, however, the value of the catch this year was $2,256,000 compared with $2,121,000 a year ago. That is the position today and I can assure hon. members that due consideration will be given to the provincial government's request.

Mr. Gibson: I just want to address a few remarks to the minister as the Minister of Fisheries and also, I hope, as a minister from British Columbia.

As he will realize, our province is having its share of difficulties these days. We seem to have strikes in lumber and amongst our carpenters, and there is also threat of a strike in fisheries out there. We have all those troubles which have also been complicated by what I might suggest was "hoof-and-Hansell" disease out there. I know the minister will be particularly interested and probably the fisheries research board will be interested to note that they catch the biggest crop of suckers with bait of just straight corn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gibson: However, getting back to a serious vein, I must say that the threat of the fisheries strike out there is very serious and it seems to me that both sides would be very interested in the remarks which the minister made today. I felt, however, that the minister was somewhat reticent. I can quite understand his not wanting to take part in what appears to be a labour dispute, but it seems to me that with the type of fishery there is in British Columbia it is a little different from the ordinary fisheries dispute. I do not think either the fishermen or the operators out there can claim any fishery. I think the people of Canada can claim that it is one of their assets. It would seem to me that the minister might have gone considerably further than he did this morning and given both sides of the dispute some factual information which he must have and which is available either in his department or through the Department of Trade and Commerce who always have surveys of market conditions in Canada. They will know the true picture of the stocks of canned salmon on hand. It seemed to me that on going into a new packing season with this very substantial carryover we would all be very interested to know just how he feels about it.

As I said, I do not feel that he would be taking part in what might ordinarily be termed an industrial dispute if he were to give us that. As the minister realizes, fish are not like timber. If we have a strike in the timber industry naturally we have a tie-up of timber while the strike goes on, but that is not so with salmon on the Fraser river. I am speaking here particularly of sockeye salmon. Great steps have been taken in the conservation and propagation of the run on the Fraser river so it seems to me we should see what can be done to assist, as this asset belongs to the Canadian people as a whole. The minister knows that if these beds get more salmon than they can take there is actual harm done to the fishery.

As we all know the Americans are going to get their share of the catch and I would like to be sure that we, through our fisheries department, are acting in the interest of the Canadian people by trying to take what steps are possible to ensure that Canada gets its share this year, whether or not the fish operators and the fishermen get together out there. I would be very anxious to see the minister have a senior representative of his department out there while the negotiations are going on. I would like him to provide some factual information regarding the market, which I think would be very helpful in this case.

I was glad when the minister replied to the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena the other night. I too feel that fishermen in many cases pay sales tax on commercial gear when they should not have to. I realize that there are difficulties of administration of which we are quite well aware, and I am sure the department is doing everything possible to see those difficulties are adjusted. I would just ask the minister to use his good offices to see that sales tax is removed from commercial fishing gear in every possible case.

Coming from the Pacific coast I think I should say a word about the passing of Mr. Frank Tait of the minister's department, who was district supervisor at Nanaimo and who served the department with distinction for so many years. It is a matter of great regret to us there that he passed away so suddenly.

In conclusion I would like to commend the officials of the department for what I maintain is very efficient administration on the Pacific coast. That is the only place where I am familiar with their activities, and I can assure you it is excellent.

Mr. Pearkes: This morning the minister referred to the carryover of the pack on the west coast. While he was not able to say the extent of that carryover it is obvious that it is very considerable. I wonder if the minister could tell us now what steps his department is taking to assist that situation, particularly in view of the difficult labour situation which has arisen on the Pacific coast and to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has just referred. I wonder whether every possible endeavour has been made to find avenues by which the carryover can be disposed of. It occurs to me that possibly the armed forces should have an opportunity to use some of that carryover, and I would like to know if the minister has investigated that possibility. Would he tell us what steps his department is taking?

I would also like to add my tribute to Mr. Tait, who passed away only a few weeks ago. He was known to all of us on the Pacific coast and was very highly regarded not only by officials of the department but by the fishermen of the whole area.

Mr. Mayhew: I am sure the family of Mr. Tait will be very pleased to learn of the kind remarks by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Nanaimo. Similar remarks have already been passed on to the family by myself and by the department.

May I at this moment refer to another member of the department whom we lost and who has been a very close friend for a number of years. I speak of Mr. Hanson, who was a member of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission. Olof Hanson, once a member of this house, made a considerable contribution to British Columbia and to Canada. Although he had a good living out of Canada, he made sure that wherever he was, no matter what position he held, he left the country better than he found it.

Both hon. members have spoken about our canned salmon position. Last week the canned salmon operators had two representatives in Ottawa, and we spent a good many hours with them going over their problems and canvassing any plans that might be helpful to them. They left the city the night before last, and I am quite sure they are satisfied that if there is anything this department can do we will do it.

I did not mention the amount of the carryover, because I do not think they would appreciate that. It is not something they would reveal in the ordinary course of business, so I do not think it would be right to mention it here. Anyone who is interested can easily make a fairly close calculation and see that it is a considerable amount. Last year the pack was a little over 2 million cases. Because of the exchange situation the industry will not be able to send any more salmon to the United Kingdom this year. A large sum of money has been spent in trying to promote the sale of salmon in Canada. The industry has spent almost $350,000 and the individual canners are spending another $350,000, making a total of $700,000 spent in promoting the sale of canned salmon within Canada. As a result of that expenditure considerably more than the usual amount of canned salmon has been marketed domestically.

If the expected pack of approximately a million and a half cases is realized this year, that is providing the fishermen go to work, there could be a substantial carryover again at this time next year. I do not think that I should say any more than that. I believe everyone in British Columbia realizes that the stocks are high. They realize also that the price of canned salmon is high, and that it is difficult to make sales at high prices. I believe that with the good judgment of all concerned they will be able to get together and straighten this out without a strike. I do not feel I should say more than that at the present time.

Mr. Ashbourne: I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to say that I appreciate the work which has been done by the fisheries department, and also to pay tribute to the minister himself. As one who has the honour of representing possibly the third largest riding in Canada, and the one with the longest shore line, I think that my remarks at this time are in order. I should like to refer particularly to the Labrador coast, and to point out to the minister the need for protecting the salmon rivers. I would suggest that fishery guardians be appointed there, as is the case in Newfoundland.

I should like also to mention the serious decline in the Labrador fishery. In 1935 that fishery produced about 400,000 quintals of fish, that is floaters and shore fishermen together. Last year I believe the catch was down to less than one-third of that, or approximately 130,000 quintals. That is a serious decline in the Labrador fishery. As the house may remember I brought this matter to the attention of the department last year when the fisheries estimates were under consideration. I do not know what can be done about the matter, but I believe that last year the shore fishery produced about 700,000 quintals. In view of the extent of the trawling and dragging operations which are being conducted on the banks of Newfoundland, I believe we can reasonably look forward to the time when our fishermen will have to go farther afield in order to secure the catch of fish needed by the Canadian people, in fact by the whole world, as a source of food.

So far as Labrador is concerned, I should like to point out that every spring seal fishing takes place along the Labrador coast and the strait of Belle Isle. The fishermen who prosecute this fishery take the pelts and the fat, but leave a tremendous amount of good food on the ice floes which they are unable to utilize. The report of the fisheries department and the research board just came to hand yesterday and I have not been able to make a close study of it, but it does reveal the tremendous amount of research which is taking place in this regard. I believe something could be worked out whereby we could utilize some of this wholesome protein food which now goes to the bottom of the ocean. I can vouch for the food value of the kidneys and livers of these young seals, and there is a great deal of food value in the rest of the carcass. If it were only utilized for poultry or dog food, at least some way should be found to use these resources which are now sinking to the bottom of the ocean.

We are very thankful for the deficiency payments which have been made by the department to the Newfoundland fishermen. It appears that far-reaching changes may be in the offing for the fisheries of Newfoundland, so a word or two in this regard may not be out of order. I should like to say a word about the marketing organization in Newfoundland which is known as NAFEL, the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited. When we realize the chaotic conditions that existed in the free marketing of fish in the European market and the cutthroat competition, and then see the orderly marketing which we have through NAFEL we are impressed with the wisdom of keeping such an organization, even though it may need some reorganization in order that the maximum return will be forthcoming to assure our producers of being properly reimbursed for their labours.

Another matter I should like to mention, Mr. Chairman, is that of unemployment insurance. I am not unmindful of the difficulties which are in the way of working out a suitable scheme of unemployment insurance for fishermen; but I want to go on record as saying that I do not consider that this matter defies solution. Where there is a will there is a way. I believe it is possible to work out a scheme whereby unemployment insurance may be made available for the fishermen.

I realize that this year a change has taken place with regard to the value of our exports to the European markets, in view of the change in the currency situation. This year instead of our fish being sold for sterling it is to be sold for dollars. I hope the minister will see that dollars will be available to the European buyers so the exporters will be able to get the necessary currency in exchange for their fish.

There are certain other matters that I should like to mention. For instance, I think that additional investigation of the banks off Newfoundland and Labrador should be followed up. We are looking forward to the report of the fisheries development committee.

There is also the matter of the extension of the territorial waters of Canada. I think it was only last year that some of the Norwegian sealing steamers which engaged in the seal fishery here in Canadian waters came within the three-mile limit and picked up seals. I could not say whether or not those were their own seals which they had taken, panned and flagged and which had been driven, as were the ships, within the three-mile limit. The whole matter needs to be gone into. I believe that possibly a suitable treaty or convention could be arranged with Norway and the other countries whose fishermen obtain the advantage of this natural resource upon which our fishermen have to depend in order to get their livelihood.

In my district the losses by fishermen were serious last year as a result of that December storm. I am glad some insurance will be worked out for their protection.

Another matter I wish to mention is the need for a bait depot in my district at La Scie. I should like to point out to the minister one other thing, as I have already done. I understand that the site was bought or secured in order to put a bait depot there, but so far I cannot get any further definite promise of a bait depot at La Scie. I should like to point out that not far from La Scie there are two islands, namely the Horse islands, and just across the neck of land in Notre Dame bay there is a settlement of fishermen called Shoe Cove; and it is impossible for the fishermen there to have any large wharf or facilities other than their stages which they use to land their catches of fish. I should like to impress upon the minister the necessity of getting a bait depot for these people. I am not one who would advocate unnecessary expenditures; but I would say this is a necessity for our people.

While the fisheries are declining in Newfoundland and, as was pointed out by the minister this morning, there is a drawing away from the fisheries to other more profitable avenues of employment, as is quite natural, nevertheless we realize that the fishing industry has been looked upon in Newfoundland as the backbone of the country in the past. We must protect these men, and we want to do something to encourage them.

There is just one other point I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, and it is this. I would ask the minister, in his reply, to put on record the details with regard to the bounty of $165 a ton which is being paid for longliners. I believe this is the way in which our fisheries will be developed in the main in the future. As I said before, I am looking forward to the report of the fisheries development committee which has been functioning for a long time and has put a great deal of hard work into its report. We all look forward to that report with interest, feeling that it will bring forth some sort of plan which will be most helpful to the fishermen in Newfoundland.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I believe that he and I, along with the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, represent most of the west coast salmon fishermen. His idea with regard to the department having a responsible official doing the negotiating in connection with the strike that may happen on Sunday is good. It seems to me that if these men—the united fishermen's union and the industry—approached this matter with any kind of common sense and with the feeling that they wanted to settle the strike, it could be done in about half an hour. In Steveston in the municipality of Richmond we are faced with having some 1,500 boats tied up on the shore. Those fishermen have large families. The economic results of this possible strike in my riding are going to be severe, as they will in Comox-Alberni and in Coast-Capilano.

I know it is a provincial matter, as the Minister of Labour told me the other day in reply to a question of mine in the house with reference to the lumber strike. But there again common sense perhaps goes beyond legal limits. If a senior official from the fisheries department cannot hold a watching brief—and I quite understand why he could not do so, and I quite understand why the Minister of Fisheries would not want to become involved in what is perhaps a purely domestic matter—I think something can be done in this House of Commons at least to help in the settlement of the strike before it happens. As I say, most of the fishermen are in these three constituencies. It is quite understandable why the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance could not go to the coast even though he might want to do so. However, I think some of us private members who are interested should offer to sit around the table with the fishermen and the industry, should they want us to do so, before this matter comes to a definite strike. I want to suggest to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that he and I should offer or volunteer and that if our services are requested in this matter in an unofficial capacity, we should make ourselves available to both the industry and the fishermen on the west coast.

Mr. Mayhew: The hon. member raised a question about Labrador and the subsidy on longliners. That subsidy is $165 a ton, as I said before. The province of Newfoundland has recently formed a fisheries loan board. Therefore the subsidy is applicable to the fishermen of Newfoundland.

Mr. McLure: I am not going to make any lengthy remarks at this time, but there are a few things I wish to bring forward before we go on to the next item. Yesterday I put a question to the minister to which I should like to have had a more definite answer today, with reference to the extension of twelve days being granted in the month of July. I do not wish to dictate to the department or even tell them that it should be done. If the inspector down there goes to the fishermen, as I understood the minister to say today is to be done, and the fishermen say they should have that extension, well, they should have it. I would rather argue this season for some compensation for the extremely heavy losses they have had this year. Take the people of Prince Edward Island, on the north shore and on the south shore. There the season opens May 1. Their first loss this year was from ice conditions, something that rarely happens. On top of that they had the worst storms of the season. Out of some 12,000 traps the fishermen put out from Rustico harbour I understand that over 6,000 were lost. That is 50 per cent of the total number of traps and gear they put out. On the south side, where the storm was not quite so bad, they lost 25 per cent of their gear. That does not happen every season, but it did happen this year. If the fishermen do not get their traps repaired, or if they do not know in time that they are going to have an extension of twelve extra days in July they will not have any traps fit to put out. Therefore I urge the minister and the department, if they are going to make that decision, to make it soon so the fishermen can put out some extra gear to take advantage of the twelve days extra time, or whatever extension they may have.

There are several other matters I might speak about, but as the time is going along and there are many other estimates to come up I think perhaps I shall leave my further remarks until a little later except to say a word about draggers and the waste that some other hon. members have said is caused by the draggers. I understand that in my province the department is supporting draggers and perhaps putting them into business where there was never any dragger fishing until last year. As one hon. member said, if the draggers are going to put the shore fisheries out of business it should be thoroughly considered before any action is taken, so our shore fishermen will not lose what at the present time is their livelihood.

Quite a few hon. members spoke about the bounty this afternoon. I understand that the bounty is more or less a trust fund which could not be taken and used, without the proper legislation, for anything but a bounty. When we come to that item I hope the minister will give us a little bit of the history of the bounty money, where it comes from and so forth. We know how it has been spent; it goes out as a bounty. If the minister will give us some information about that bounty when he replies it will settle some of the arguments as to whether or not it could be used for insurance.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wish to ask the minister a question on item 141. Under "general services" on page 190 there appears the following: "Director of Newfoundland fisheries." Does the amount given opposite that include part of Mr. Gushue's salary?

Mr. Mayhew: Perhaps the hon. member would leave that until we come to the item. No, it does not; it refers to the director here in Ottawa.

Item agreed to.

142. Information and educational service, including $3,500 for grants to fisheries exhibitions, $136,600.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice in the amounts estimated for 1951-52 there is a drop of about $32,000. Can the minister tell me what he is saving that money on? I presume it is in the latter part of the details.

Mr. Mayhew: Would the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that on page 192 in the estimated total for 1951-52 the expenditure was $106,000. Last year we voted $138,000. This year it is going to be $136,000. I wondered how the saving of $32,000 was made in the past fiscal year. What did you save the money on? Perhaps I might save some trouble in looking up the details if I said I was chiefly interested in three items, publication of reports, film displays and advertising, and grants to fisheries exhibitions. Were these amounts spent in the past for these three items?

Mr. Mayhew: Last year we had an amount in there for a film which we did not proceed with. This year we intend to proceed with it and that is why we want to provide for it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): A special film?

Mr. Mayhew: A special film, yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where is it to be made?

Mr. Mayhew: It is a film on the British Columbia fishery.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Was any money spent on exhibitions? I see an amount of $3,500 for that purpose.

Mr. Mayhew: The sum of $3,500 is mainly for the grant to the Lunenburg exhibition. That is the only grant being made this year.

Item agreed to.

143. Markets and economics service, $194,600.

Mr. Balcom: Since Nova Scotia is an important centre of fishing, I wonder whether the department has given consideration to including provision for an economist being placed at Halifax?

Mr. Mayhew: We have an economist at the Halifax station now.

Mr. Balcom: A recent one?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes, a recent appointment.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I notice in the estimates there is provision for a large number of economists. If I understood him correctly, the hon. member for Halifax asked for another one. What is the purpose of having these 18 economists? What are their duties and responsibilities, where are they stationed and what do they do?

Mr. Mayhew: I have a long statement here, but we have spent considerable time on these estimates and, while it would be interesting to read it, I hesitate to deal with it at such length. Last year their work consisted of providing services in Newfoundland in connection with price support, and the service they have rendered to many other departments. They are connected with the economic consideration of departmental policy, the handling of requests for price support, and the operation of such price support activities as are authorized by the government. Then, in co-operation with the Department of Trade and Commerce, they make studies of the factors affecting the export market as it applies to fisheries products. In co-operation with the dominion bureau of statistics they work on the collection compilation and analysis of fisheries statistics, and the development of a fisheries census. They conduct basic research into the field of fisheries products. They prepare for publication and make reports on economic surveys and market reports, and make contributions to departmental publications. That gives some idea of the work involved.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Were the new economists appointed last year, or is this staff that has been in the department for some time? There would appear to be 18 of them now. Has the department been expanding in this respect?

Mr. Mayhew: A change is being made shifting staff from the prices support board to the department.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): We have here reference to a director of the marketing and economics service. How long has the director been in the department, and what are his duties? He is receiving $7,080, and is thus a reasonably high-priced man. I believe all would agree that there is some scope for work of this kind in the department.

Mr. Mayhew: He has been in the department since 1945. He is now acting head of the prices support board, and was for some time with the Department of Agriculture. He is heading up this branch, and is a very valuable man to the whole department.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Would the minister care to give his name?

Mr. Mayhew: Ian McArthur.

Item agreed to.

144. Administrative expenses of the Newfoundland fisheries board, $33,900.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Who is to be the new chairman of the fisheries board in Newfoundland? Is there any difference involved in the new title of "administrative officer"?

Mr. Mayhew: We have not yet made any appointment to replace Mr. Gushue.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I believe it would be appropriate to pay some tribute to the outstanding services rendered by Mr. Gushue during the many years he was chairman of this board, during which time he gave valuable service to Newfoundland. I believe he is recognized internationally today as an outstanding figure in the matter of the fisheries of this country. I feel it is only his due that he be paid a tribute for his intelligence and his courtesy in dealing with matters relating to fisheries.

Item agreed to.

145. Industrial development service, $40,000.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): What number were benefited by the bounty payments during the last year, and what was the average amount paid?

Mr. Mayhew: That does not come under this item.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How is this money spent? I see it makes reference to technical services to fishermen and the fishing industry. I should like to have some particulars about this vote.

Mr. Mayhew: This item makes provision for the longliner, mentioned this morning. It will enable us to carry on with the use of longliners in Newfoundland, experimentally. Two years ago we had two boats, and last year we had two. In addition we are putting on two more boats, so that there will be four operating this year on an experimental and exploration basis in and around the islands of Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In what area will those boats be fishing?

Mr. Mayhew: Northward from Bonavista along the coast, but not in the areas where they were fishing last year. It will be from Bonavista bay, up to Englee, and in that area.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will there be any boats working along the coast from St. John's south, or along the south coast?

Mr. Mayhew: No, not this year.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask a question about the statutory vote with reference to fishing bounties. The minister said this afternoon that in the maritime provinces there were more than 14,000 eligible for the grant of fishing bounties. How many of those who are eligible applied for and received the bounties?

Mr. Mayhew: I gave this morning the number who applied before January 1.

Mr. Gillis: How many are eligible to receive it?

Mr. Mayhew: We do not know. We know only the number who have applied. There may be others who are eligible but who have not applied.

Mr. Gillis: I have received letters from several fishermen who were eligible but who did not get in under the deadline. Because their applications were not in by a certain date they were not accepted. Could the deputy minister give an approximation of the number in the fishing provinces who would be eligible under the vote of $160,000?

Mr. Mayhew: There were approximately 100 applications made after January 1.

Mr. Gillis: From all over?

Mr. Mayhew: All over.

Mr. Gillis: That is national?

Mr. Mayhew: It is not national. It applies only to the maritime provinces and Quebec; it does not apply to the west coast or Newfoundland.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Queens asked the minister to give us a little background of this vote. I know the minister argues, as others have argued, that this $160,000 is interest on a fund held in trust for a particular purpose. That fund was set up by legislation and parliament can change that legislation. If the amount obtained in this way is inadequate to serve the purpose intended, then new legislation to provide better insurance for those who operate under this general set-up should be considered. I should like the minister to tell us when the fund was established and what the legislation stipulates.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I agree with what the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said in this regard. My experience has been that only 50 per cent of the fishermen eligible for bounty actually make application. In many cases the payments are quite small and of little benefit to the individual fisherman. If this money could be used for some purpose which would benefit all fishermen, then I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the regulations should be changed. Can the minister tell us the average payment made last year?

Mr. Mayhew: As far back as 1818 the United States made a treaty that covered their right to fish in Canadian waters and to use Canadian ports. There was considerable contention over this, and in 1854 with a reciprocity treaty equal rights were given to Canadians in United States ports. Then later, in 1871, the Halifax award was made under which the United States paid $4 million to Canada and $1 million to Newfoundland as compensation for the greater rights given their fishermen. The payment of $4 million to Canada was put out at interest from which these payments are made. The average payment last year was $9.55. We know nothing about what happened to the $1 million which was paid to Newfoundland and which went to Great Britain.

Mr. Gillis: I feel that the legislation under which this—

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but a few days ago I interrupted the hon. member for Cumberland when he was attempting to discuss a statutory item and indicated that such discussion should take place on the first item of the department. I have allowed this question to be asked and the minister has answered it, but following up what I indicated a few afternoons ago I think the hon. member should not discuss a statutory item except on the first item of the department.

Mr. Gillis: I waited deliberately until we reached this item. I shall remember this next year and have a real discussion on the first item.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think we all want to co-operate, but I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton South has yielded too much ground. This money has been placed in the hands of the government and is being distributed in a certain way, and if we do not avail ourselves of this opportunity we will have no record of the expenditures. I do not want to press the matter at this stage but, on the other hand, I feel strongly that we are entitled to this information.

Mr. Mayhew: I do not know of any further information I could give. This is a statutory item which can be changed only by an act of parliament. There is nothing we can do about it except to pay out the money as specified by the act.

Item agreed to.

146. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 26, 1947, $700,000.

Mr. McLure: I notice there is a decrease of $100,000 in this item, and I take it that is due to a change in policy under which you are now machining, dyeing and processing these furs in one place. I have been urging that this be done ever since 1945 in order that a uniform fur seal skin could be offered to the trade. In figuring it up for last year I find that you lost $165,000 plus extra expenses. I want to say to the minister and the department that I hope this season, whatever the catch is, they will have it properly processed instead of having a portion of the seals processed and the others dragged along at a very low price. I notice that this year, for instance, those processed in St. Louis by the Fouke company sold on an average for about $66 more than those processed in the other place.

I have warned the department about that for the last seven years and I hope they now have definitely changed their policy and that we will not have to compliment them in the same manner another year. We hope to see their earnings improve; and I think the committee would be very glad to find out from the minister the amount of profit this fur seal trade is bringing in.

I have another point on this matter of fur seals. A few days ago I drew to the attention of the minister the fact that Japan wanted to get back into this treaty and get a share of the fur seal business. Whatever the minister does on behalf of his department and Canada, let him not give away one per cent or one single skin. If the Americans wish to give their share or to give any amount we cannot stop them. We are now entitled to 20 per cent, so let that not get out of our hands. We need that 20 per cent. Do not be influenced by anyone who says Japan should have 5 per cent. Japan at one time had the opportunity and abused it. Now let her get that amount from the United States if she wants to, but I would like the minister and the department to stand firm and not give away one per cent let alone 5 per cent of our share of the fur seals.

Mr. Gibson: Does the minister feel that he can usefully comment on the observations made by the hon. gentleman?

Mr. Mayhew: The member for Queens first asked what was the revenue from this source. It was a gross of $772,507.84 last year. We paid to the Canadian government $482,245.52 in duty, which left a net of $290,262.32; but the revenue to Canada was $772,507.84.

In connection with the remarks the hon. member made about Japan, I believe Japan has made application but the matter has not yet been given consideration. Those remarks will be in our minds when any negotiations are going on.

Mr. McLure: Can the minister give us assurance now that the processing of our fur seals will all be done at one place, in St. Louis?

Mr. Mayhew: The first year I was Minister of Fisheries there was quite an agitation to give a Canadian firm a chance to prove whether they could properly process seal skins in Canada and thus create a manufacturing industry. We did allow a Toronto firm a considerable number of skins to see what they could do. That has not turned out to be a success up to date, so they are not processing at all. We still have some skins in England with Martin's. They will be finished and sent to Canada. If they turn out to be as good as the St. Louis Fouke skins we may try them out with some more. However, my instructions to the department this year have been that all the skins we take this year should go to the Fouke company at St. Louis for processing and dyeing. Further than that, we have asked them to process enough that we can reduce our inventory of skins at St. Louis.

Protection branch—

148. Operation and maintenance, $2,747,294.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether this is the right time to ask the minister a question about hatcheries. I regret that I was not here this morning, when I understand the minister spoke about the fish hatcheries in the maritimes. I wonder if he would mind letting me know whether any consideration has been given to the establishment of a salmon or trout hatchery in Newfoundland.

Mr. Mayhew: I answered the question this morning and I think the hon. member will find the answer in Hansard.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The only reason I mention this is that I understand the minister said there was no work done last year in the maritimes on hatcheries.

Mr. Mayhew: I did not say no work was done; I said no new hatcheries were built in the maritimes last year. When I first saw them the hatcheries were in a pretty run-down condition and I thought they should be repaired and at least put in presentable condition. That was done, but no new hatcheries were built. Trout hatcheries in Newfoundland, as well as in some other places, are the responsibility of the provincial government. As far as salmon hatcheries are concerned they have not proved adequate to meet needs. We think the policy of clearing and improving the ascent to the fish beds is a better way of increasing salmon production in Newfoundland as well as in other places.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I must thank the minister for going to the trouble of again saying what he said this morning, but I would like to draw attention to the report of the department for 1950-51 where it says:

> Thirty-three new outdoor concrete ponds, each with a capacity of up to 50,000 salmon or trout fingerlings, were constructed at hatcheries throughout Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I was referring to work in 1950-51, unless he tells us it is impossible to learn what is being done in 1951. It is further stated in the report that:

> Operations were carried on at thirteen main hatcheries . . .

Do I understand from the minister that the policy of salmon hatcheries is being abandoned notwithstanding the extra work which was done in that season?

Mr. Mayhew: The concrete you refer to was put on the bottoms of the pools. They were mud bottoms, and we put in concrete bottoms as an improvement of the hatcheries.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On that point, Mr. Chairman, on page 21 of the report these figures are given: speckled trout, 12,045,408; brown trout, 30,655; rainbow trout, 147,176. They must have been planting these small trout there.

Mr. Mayhew: Under the terms of the union Newfoundland agreed to look after the fresh water streams, but our department is responsible in the maritimes.

Mr. Balcom: There are two questions I would like to ask on item 148. In Nova Scotia a great many guardians are employed over a period of six months but actually they are only paid for a period of perhaps four months. It is rather difficult for a man to give up some employment he might have, thinking he is going to be employed for six months and then receive remuneration for only four months. I think perhaps even where the water might be low and fish not very numerous the employment of those guardians should be continued.

Mr. Mayhew: Well, that is something new to me. I never heard that we were engaging people for six months and only paying them four months' salary. I have not the answer here, but I assure the hon. member I shall look into it.

Mr. Balcom: I have another question that comes under this item. Has there been an open season on Arctic char?

Mr. Mayhew: There has been no open season for Arctic char; we have given special permits in that connection.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister comment briefly on the boats which are available for protective service on the east coast, and particularly for the western part of my province. Last year I think there was one called the Cygnus which was available, in addition to an older one that was in such bad shape the captain thought it was unsafe to take out in stormy weather. Only these two ships were available for work around the southwestern part of the province, so I should like to know if the minister would make a brief statement listing the number of ships which are available for that service.

I noticed also in the details for this item—I do not want to inquire about a lot of details—that apparently this year we are employing 39 captains as compared with 42 for the year before. I presume that the word "captains" refers to sea captains and not to vessels. We have 39 full-time employees, which is 3 less than last year, yet the amount for this year is $116,868 as compared with $97,104 for last year.

Mr. Mayhew: We have eight boats in all available in this section.

Mr. Nowlan: Could the minister name them, please?

Mr. Mayhew: There is the Cygnus, Lacuna, Limanda, A. Halkett, Gilbert, Venning, Modiolus and the Mya.

Mr. Nowlan: Where are they based? From what ports do they operate?

Mr. Mayhew: There is the Gilbert at Lunenburg, the Cygnus at Halifax; the Lacuna at Halifax and the Limanda in the Digby-Yarmouth area; the Modiolus in the Digby Neck-St. Mary's bay area; the A. Halkett is across at Cape Breton, the Mya and the Venning are in the Northumberland straits.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): In this same connection, I find we appear to be providing money for 100 engineers. I should like to ask the minister if there is actually a need for 100 engineers, and for what purpose are they used?

Mr. Mayhew: I think the hon. member is taking in all the engineers throughout Canada, including Newfoundland and the Atlantic coast. In that event he would be about right.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister explain the increase in the salaries for captains? Perhaps there was an automatic increase, but I just noticed that apparently there was a reduction by three in the number of captains, but an increase of about $20,000.

Mr. Mayhew: That is due to a salary revision by the Department of Labour.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand from the minister that there is a need for 100 engineers in operating the boats used by the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. Mayhew: We have approximately 70 ships protecting the whole area, some of which are quite large and require more than one engineer. Some have two engineers and some three, depending upon their size and their sailings.

Mr. Hodgson: I should like to ask the minister a question about the increase in operation and maintenance. There was an increase of $146,286 in this item for the protection branch under "field services" the increase in operation and maintenance is $457,903. I think the minister should give an explanation of that large increase in one year.

Mr. Mayhew: The hon. member will notice there is quite a list of employees in this protection branch, and the increase here is the increase allowed in the revision of salaries last year.

Item agreed to.

Fish culture and development branch—

153. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $193,190.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This item refers to fish culture and development work, operation and maintenance. I recognize that this is a very important service, but a large sum of money seems to be needed. There is a great necessity for fish culture work in Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces in order to build up these places as tourist attractions. I should like to have a statement from the minister concerning what is being done in expanding that work, and how many fish hatcheries there are in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces.

Mr. Mayhew: This is an important department, in fact one of our most important. Its functions include stream surveys, stream improvement and control, predator control, reduction and elimination, and modified hatchery production procedures as an aid to maintaining and increasing stocks of fish. It includes also field administration of oyster and clam culture in the maritime provinces. The main functions are operation of experimental oyster farms to develop farming techniques based on scientific research and their demonstration.

The number of hatcheries in Nova Scotia are: main hatcheries 7, salmon ponds 3, rearing stations 5, or a total of 15.

Item agreed to.

Field services—

154. Consumer branch, $46,060.

Mr. Gibson: I notice that in this item there is a decrease of $9,000. This is an important branch. I was wondering whether the minister had any statement to give to the committee as to what success is attending their efforts in selling canned salmon. I was particularly interested in the comment made by the hon. member for Nanaimo today with regard to the armed services. About a year ago, from the answer to a question of mine, it seemed that the armed forces were eating comparatively little canned salmon. A commodity of this kind is easily stored, and it is of high quality. I noticed particularly that our armed services were eating the most expensive type of canned salmon. I would have thought possibly the department would be able to influence the cooks or the quartermaster's officers to use more of our product than they do, particularly the pink variety of salmon. It certainly is competitive with other protein foods and is economical.

Mr. Mayhew: The reduction in this item is not real because we are going to have to ask for something more in the supplementary estimates in order to provide for the fisheries cook book which I think most hon. members have seen. There has been wide circulation and favourable acceptance by the trade generally of that book. We therefore must have an extra amount in the supplementaries to make up what we thought we were going to be able to get along without.

The hon. member for Nanaimo spoke about the use of salmon in the armed forces. I think I am quite safe in saying that matter is being arranged. I had the experience of sampling some Russian salmon on one of our boats in Korea. I was able to talk the matter over with the minister here and I think in future our troops, wherever they are, will be able to get canned salmon.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister was also asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni how this program was working out. I wonder if he can tell us about that. I do not know as yet where the experimental kitchen is. I should like to see it some time.

Mr. Mayhew: I will give the hon. member an invitation now to come down and have a sample from our kitchen.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Today or tomorrow?

Mr. Mayhew: I will give hon. members a general invitation, as long as too many of them do not come down at a time. Last year we asked a great many parties to come down—or at least the ladies did—to have a demonstration in the kitchen. I would say our diet kitchen is one of our most effective pieces of work, having regard to the work they are doing not only here in Ottawa but from one end of Canada to the other. I think it is having a good effect.

Mr. Nowlan: If I can get an invitation by rising to speak I will certainly do so. I want to commend the minister for the work which has been done by the consumer branch. I think it is something which is well worth while. On both sea coasts I think we are conscious of the fact that this country has not appreciated all the possibilities with regard to the preparation and distribution of fish. I believe real leadership has been given in this matter up to the present time. I think the minister and the officials who have been distributing the literature or working on this matter deserve commendation. I should like to see greater emphasis placed upon it.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I agree that this department is doing important work. I want to join my colleague in commending the minister and the officials for the excellent work they have done in the last two or three years. I want to point out, however, that there is still some room for further development and extension of the work of this department with regard to making fish menus more acceptable to the people, especially to tourists who come to the maritime provinces. Hardly a tourist who comes to our part of the maritime provinces but looks forward to getting tasty menus of native fish. There is a great deal more to be done. I want to commend the minister and his department for what they have done and for what they are endeavouring to do.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the minister tell us where that kitchen is or where we have to go?

Mr. Mayhew: The kitchen is in the basement of the west block. You will find the kitchen itself much better than the path to it.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to rise and join other hon. members in complimenting the minister and his officials on the work done under this item. I think it is one thing being done by the fisheries department that is stirring the imagination of many people in Canada. I have heard a number of women express the opinion that it is an extremely effective way of promoting fish sales in this country.

Item agreed to.

155. To provide for the destruction of harbour and gray seals, $45,000.

Mr. McLure: What was the bounty paid per seal last year and how much bounty was paid for seals destroyed in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Mayhew: The hon. member wants the breakdown by provinces?

Mr. McLure: Yes.

Mr. Mayhew: In Nova Scotia it was 995, $5,780; in Prince Edward Island, 232, $1,505; New Brunswick, 287, $1,895; British Columbia, 279, $13,955 or a total of $23,135. I might say this is one item that we would be only too happy to increase. We wish people would take more interest in the destruction of these seals. It would be beneficial to them and to the industry.

Mr. McLure: The bounty is $10?

Mr. Mayhew: $10 for adults and $5 for pups for the maritime provinces.

Mr. McLure: Is there any way use could be made of the oil if they were taken in? I understand that $10 is paid on the snout and that no use is made of the rest of the carcass in any way. Could the oil be extracted? It should be good for something.

Mr. Mayhew: It would be impossible to get them in sufficient volume to be of any use. You get a seal here and there. Before you would get them collected the seals would not be fit to use.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister tell me how one can get hold of the skin of a hair seal? I will tell him what I have in mind. It is almost impossible to get the skin of the hair seal which is used as a climbing skin in skiing and mountaineering. It has become almost impossible to get them either here or in Europe. I just wondered whether there was any possibility of getting a skin. Several people have asked me about the matter.

Mr. Mayhew: They are processed in Newfoundland and it would be quite easy for anyone to get a skin.

Mr. Adamson: Where?

Mr. Mayhew: From Newfoundland. I have not the address. Any of the Newfoundland people could probably give it to the hon. member. Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's West would like to give it to him.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I shall be pleased to give the hon. member the address.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries research board—

156. Headquarters administration, $92,794.

Mr. Balcom: Mr. Chairman, it is pleasing to hear coming from the opposite side such words of praise for the Minister of Fisheries and his staff. Just recently some 50 members of the house had an opportunity to visit Halifax and the experimental station down there under the leadership of Dr. Beatty and his staff and Mr. O. F. Mackenzie. We should like to commend the minister and the deputy at this time for the fine work that has been done.

Does the minister consider that we are making satisfactory progress in the prevention of bacteria spoilage that normally occurs in fish?

Mr. Mayhew: I would not like to answer that question; I do not know. We are doing the best we can. I do not think we will ever get to the stage where we will be satisfied with what we are doing.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yesterday I received a copy of the annual report of the fisheries research board of Canada for 1951; I spent most of last night reading it, and I found it very interesting. I would certainly like to compliment the fisheries board on the very fine report they put out and on the work they are doing. I notice that on page 5 it is recommended that a much larger ocean-going vessel is urgently needed for work on the banks in northern waters. Is it the policy of the government this year to have that vessel built?

Mr. Mayhew: We have some money in the votes for the plan of a boat, not for the actual construction. We shall have to wait until next year for that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice also that the department purchased a building in St. John's from the provincial government. Has the minister the price of the building? Can he let me know what it cost?

Mr. Mayhew: It would be in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister does not know?

Mr. Mayhew: It would be in the votes of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. McLure: A year or so ago research work was done with reference to scallop beds in Prince Edward Island. There was a great fanfare of advertising about it. No one knows where the scallop beds are. They found them, of course, but I cannot find anything about them. Many people are asking where the scallop beds of Prince Edward Island are. Where did the research board locate them? If the minister has the information there, it would be well to put on record where they located the beds.

Mr. Mayhew: I have not the information here in presentable form, but I shall see that the hon. member gets the details.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries research board—

157. Operation and maintenance, $1,759,395.

Mr. Catherwood: I have a few remarks to make in connection with this item. I ask the minister not to overlook the problem of the inland fisheries of Canada. I notice by the twenty-first annual report of the Department of Fisheries that landings dropped 18 per cent, or something like 25 million pounds of fish, in great lakes waters, and the catch of both whitefish and pickerel declined significantly. I realize that this is largely a matter that comes under provincial jurisdiction. Nevertheless it is a very important industry to the inland part of Canada, and I hope the minister and his department will give every co-operation and assistance to the departments of fisheries of Ontario and the other provincial governments in this matter, and particularly in the matter of research. I believe the department at Ottawa can make a real contribution to research in inland fisheries.

Mr. Nowlan: I notice there is an increase of $264,897 in this item. Will the minister tell us how much of that is owing to statutory increases in salaries, and how much to increases in staff?

Mr. Mayhew: The sum of $191,525 is salary and wage increases; special services, $3,270; travelling expenses, $29,000. The other large items are repairs and upkeep of buildings, $18,000, and repairs and upkeep of equipment, $20,000; and other miscellaneous items totalling $276,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is any assistance or encouragement given to the use of nylon in fish traps in Newfoundland?

Mr. Mayhew: I am told that we have done no experimenting in nylon traps to date.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I understand that one fish merchant down there was in communication with the officials of the research department about making experiments along that line, because they are very much lighter and I believe they give longer life. It might be worth while for the research board to consider using them.

Mr. Mayhew: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I understand from the report that they have been used in the salmon fishery.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I presume my inquiry will come under this item. I want a statement from the minister, if he will give it to us, as to what development there has been in the last year in propagating oysters. In northern Nova Scotia and especially in Prince Edward Island we have I suppose the best natural oyster beds anywhere in the world. The department did undertake to establish an oyster bed in my constituency of Cumberland, in the Malagash and Wallace area, but I was very much disappointed at the headway the department was able to make according to the last report I received. This is, as I said, a natural oyster area, and produces the best flavoured oysters in the whole world. It is a very serious reflection on the minister personally, and on his department, that they cannot make a success of propagating oysters as they should in this natural area of northern Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and eastern New Brunswick. Can the minister make a statement as to what has been accomplished during the last year and what is proposed for the ensuing year out of the funds we are now providing?

Mr. Mayhew: I am sorry, but I have no additional information to what I gave last year. I know the St. Andrews' station under Dr. Needler is very interested in this. He is the one who is responsible for it. It was through him that the report was made available.

Mr. Nowlan: I did not get an answer to the question I asked the minister with respect to the increase in costs, but I presume it will appear in Hansard. I should like to ask a specific question with respect to the scallop fisheries. I do not expect the minister to have all the details of all the work that is being done by these research boards under this head, but I would draw this matter to his attention. If he can comment on it now, well and good; if not, I should like to hear from him later.

As he knows, the scallop fishery in the bay of Fundy, emanating from the constituency of Annapolis-Kings, is the largest in Canada and one of the largest in the world, and is of tremendous importance to that whole area. Recently a boat operated by his department, and I believe coming out of St. Andrews, has been fishing or dragging for scallops. Instead of using a conventional ring of $2\frac{3}{4}$ inches they have been experimenting with a ring of $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches. I have had this matter up with some of the officials of his department and have been told by them—and I accept their word absolutely—that this is simply an experiment which is being carried on and it may not have any particular merit whatsoever. However, it has caused a great deal of concern to many of the fishermen, because from the information I have received the cost of this new ring would be very much in excess of that of the old ring. I believe the boat operated for about thirty days and they caught about 3,200 pounds of scallops. Scallop fishermen would starve to death if they had to operate a ring of that size. I am well aware of the necessity for conservation, and I agree of course that the department should be taking steps to conduct experiments. But I would place on record the warning that this should be only an experiment, and that no change should be made until there has been careful consultation with those involved. Certainly they are exercised about it at the moment.

Mr. Mayhew: I can assure my hon. friend that that will be done.

Item agreed to.

International commissions—

160. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission appointed under treaty dated May 26, 1930, between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries of the Fraser river system, $164,200.

Mr. Goode: Why is there a reduction of $2,150 in this item?

Mr. Mayhew: It is a matter of adjustment between Canada and the United States on a divisible share basis.

Item agreed to.

161. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission to overcome obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon at Hell's Gate canyon and for investigating and overcoming obstructions to such salmon at other points on the Fraser river watershed (revote), $8,000.

Mr. Green: I notice the amount is only $8,000 this year. Is that work practically completed, or what is the reason for the decrease in the vote?

Mr. Mayhew: The Hell's Gate project is practically completed. This amount is for maintenance purposes.

Item agreed to.

Special—

165. To provide for the extension of educational work in co-operative producing and selling among fishermen, $80,000.

Mr. Herridge: How is the greater part of the educational work done?

Mr. Mayhew: Work to the value of $46,000 is done at St. Francis Xavier university, $24,000 in connection with the social economics service in Quebec, and $10,000 for the University of British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

166. To provide for administration expenses of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, $80,625.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the minister give the committee the final figures in respect of deficiency payments for 1950? I would ask for the information in two lots, namely the amount for Labrador and the amount for shore fishermen.

Mr. Mayhew: The total amount was $1,219,262.55.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How much for Labrador and how much for shore fishermen?

Mr. Mayhew: The amount for Labrador was $447,539.36. This item will appear in the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

167. To provide for assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger and/or long liner type, subject to such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $150,000.

Mr. McLure: How much of this assistance is in connection with draggers built for operation in Prince Edward Island? On what terms are they built? What would be the cost?

Mr. Mayhew: I have answered that question several times this afternoon. It is $165 per ton. The subsidy is given by the federal government, and where the provincial governments have loan boards, they give loans. Our subsidies vary, but they run about $6,000, or $6,500.

Mr. Pearkes: None of this is given to the west coast?

Mr. Mayhew: No.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How many of these wooden vessels in different sizes are being built under the authority of the department, and where? Let me point out that in Nova Scotia, especially in Cumberland county, we have old shipyards, very few of which are still in existence, with a record of constructing wooden ships to sail the seven seas. They were doing that a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago. Even then they were turning out a quality of ship that could not be surpassed anywhere. How many of these are being built under the authority of the department, and where? Is preference being given to these old shipyards that have survived through the years, even in competition with steel ships? I suggest special consideration should be given to them.

Mr. Mayhew: We have no say as to where they shall be built; the fishermen make that decision. They are not in competition with steel. If the hon. member wishes to have a breakdown by provinces for the last five years, it is as follows:

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is there any provision where a conversion is being carried out, let us say from a Labrador vessel to a longliner?

Mr. Mayhew: No. There is no provision for converting old ships.

Mr. Nowlan: Do all the draggers under this item have to operate outside the twelve-mile limit, or are they the ones on which the restriction is placed?

Mr. Mayhew: It depends upon the size of the boat. If they are over 100 feet, they have to operate outside.

Mr. McLure: I do not think I received an answer to my question as to the cost of draggers built in Prince Edward Island. What proportion does the department pay?

Mr. Mayhew: We have no knowledge of the cost of a boat, nor are we concerned with it. We take into consideration only the tonnage. The provincial government making the loan makes the decision on the question the hon. member has asked.

Item agreed to.

168. To provide for assistance in the construction of bait freezing and storage facilities, subject to the approval of the governor in council, $30,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that in 1950-51 only $5,900 was spent, and that last year $24,000 was to be spent. Is any bait depot or bait storage depot to be built in Newfoundland this year? The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay made reference to one at La Scie. Is that going to be built this year? Is any other bait storage depot going to be provided in Newfoundland?

Mr. Mayhew: We have in mind one bait depot in Newfoundland for this year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where is that to be?

Mr. Mayhew: It has not yet been decided where it is going to be. At the present time representatives of this department, of the departments of Agriculture, Public Works and Resources and Development, and of the provincial government are on a trip through the northeastern part of Newfoundland from Bonavista north to St. Anthony to investigate general resources.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the minister in a position to say whether small holding depots, such as he spoke of, are possible where it is not considered to be an economic proposition to build the regular size bait depot?

Mr. Mayhew: My understanding is that the smaller holding depots may be necessary in some places, but we are using the Arctica for distributing bait. The bait freezing operation is under active study at the present time. It is not by any means turning out as we thought it would, and the cost to the taxpayer is considerably more than we thought it would be or should be.

Mr. Carroll: What are the conditions under which bait freezing facilities will be established? For many years we had a bait freezer at Port Hood operated by a company there. Then a couple of years ago the Nova Scotia government extended its electric power line across the island and for some reason or other it was found that the bait freezer could not be operated. Would it be possible to have something done if the necessary application were made?

Mr. Mayhew: We will review each application as it comes in. The conditions to be met are as follows. There must be proper freezing facilities provided. It must be combined with fishing operations, as the bait operation by itself is not profitable. The need for bait facilities in the area to be serviced must be established. The bait facilities must be refrigerated and of a capacity suitable to meet the needs of the area. These are to be determined by engineers of the fisheries research board.

Mr. Carroll: Was a subsidy agreement entered into in connection with the Cheticamp fishery some years ago and, if so, for how much?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is the last item and I should like to place on record two sentences from a letter from one of my constituents in connection with the storm and ice damage. The minister was not able to give a complete answer as to the policy of the government in connection with paying for this damage, and I would just like to quote from this letter as follows:

> The damage suffered was severe. Not only did we lose thousands of traps, but we lost the fishing due to this. We believe that the government should compensate the fishermen and packers of the maritimes as well as they do the farmers of the west when they have a loss.

I wanted to put that on record so the minister will understand the position of the lobster packers in Northumberland strait and Nova Scotia generally.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—

221. Departmental administration, $431,397.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I have a very brief statement that I would like to put on the record at this time.

The several divisions of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys have a long career of accomplishment in the development of Canada's natural resources. In its several branches we have had and now have men of outstanding qualification who have devoted their lives to the fascinating work of unlocking the storehouse of Canada's resources.

From the discussions that have occurred in this house during the last few weeks I take it that we have quite a number of hon. members who are experts in mining. Those who are not experts are already informed of the work of this department through the publication of the "Summary of Activities in 1951" that has been distributed to all hon. members. If any have not read this publication as yet I would commend it to them, because I think it gives a very concise and complete summary of the activities of our department. This pamphlet was released because of frequent requests from hon. members for information on the activities of the department.

Arising from the rapid expansion of the industry we are now serving, this department has carried out during the last year—and we are planning to carry out this year—one of the largest programs of field work, research work, map making, tests and investigation that we have ever had. Because of the urgent need for minerals that are vital to our defence effort emphasis in recent years has been more particularly on mining and metallurgical problems of economic importance. The work of surveys and exploration has spread out into new areas and has caused an exceptionally large demand for surveys of this department including mapping.

Coupled with this industrial expansion are the requirements of the defence services in geography, geology, topographical and hydrographic mapping and metallurgy. Much of the assistance given in the discovery of mineral deposits and in developing new mines is indirect, because it is the consistent policy of this department not to compete with or duplicate the services of private industry or provincial governments. However, there are many services that can be properly performed by the government of Canada.

As an introduction to these estimates I just wish to give a brief explanation of the functions of the five branches that make up the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

The surveys and mapping branch supplies the fundamental maps on which all surveys and developments are based. The geological survey of Canada provides through maps and reports the geological information derived from field studies which give clues to the mineral-bearing formations and structures. These maps and reports are a prime necessity for the prospector in his search for minerals. The mines branch has as its broad function the development of processes for the treatment of ores and fuels and of methods of use for many industrial minerals. It deals also with metallurgy in reference to requirements of national defence and of industry. The geographical branch established only a few years ago is proving to be a useful service to many departments of government and to the general public. It conducts field surveys in various parts of Canada and compiles topical studies in Canadian and foreign geography. It also is assembling data for the production of a new atlas of Canada. The dominion observatory has several functions which may be listed as follows: positional astronomy for the determination of precise time; stellar physics or the study of the physical processes going on in the atmosphere; terrestrial magnetism; seismology or the study of earthquakes; astrophysics or the studies of the meteors and the physical nature of the stars.

The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is finding it difficult to keep abreast of the greatly increasing needs of the mining and metallurgical industries and the increased demands for more maps and for more mapping and charting. The department is striving to give the best service possible by concentrating its attention on areas or on problems in the forefront of mineral development, and by giving priority to minerals and problems of current strategic importance.

The hon. member for Peace River suggested that it might save some time and some discussion if I were to give a breakdown of the increase shown in our vote this year. There is a total increase in the vote of $2,803,078. Of this, emergency gold mining assistance is taking $1,300,000. Salary increases and statutory increases in salary amount to $1,150,000. That leaves a net increase in expenditures amounting to $353,078. That represents only 1·6 per cent increase over the 1952 estimates of expenditure, other than the items mentioned.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South made a reference recently to the work of the geological survey branch of our department. His remarks are reported on page 3280 of Hansard. He cites a request that was made through him to our department for an airborne magnetic survey of an area in Nova Scotia for a private company. It is the policy of this department not to compete with or duplicate the efforts of private industry or of provincial governments. Several companies are equipped to do commercial magnetometer surveys. Their services are available to private companies. The geological survey of Canada has conducted airborne magnetometer surveys since 1949. They are conducted, however, on a broad regional basis, and in no case has a survey been undertaken for an individual enterprise in competition with private consultants or operators.

The airborne magnetometer is to some extent still an experimental device. The policy of this department has been that of investigating the greatest possible number of geological formations over wide areas, in order to study and appraise the value of the results obtained and to correlate the results with the known geological and geophysical data in the areas. Our activities to date in this regard have been in the regions where known geological and geophysical characteristics are most favourable for correlation of results.

Mr. Adamson: I do not suppose that ever before in the history of the human race has such a challenge been put to so few people, Mr. Chairman, as the challenge which the development of our natural resources puts to the 14 million of us who call ourselves Canadians. The possibilities of mineral development in Canada absolutely beggar description. Never has any country shown so much of what lies under its surface as has Canada in recent years, and it is becoming more and more of a challenge to us as new instruments of recovery are developed and perfected.

Before going on with my rather brief remarks, because as I have said this subject is probably as important as the development of the Atlantic pact, I should like to say that our civilization has progressed at a geometric rate. The stone age took many hundreds of thousands of years; the bronze age took a few thousand years; the iron age took a few hundred years; the steel age could possibly be measured in decades, and the atomic age which we are in now could be measured in years. I do not speak tonight as a technical man. Long ago I gave up my practice as an engineer. I speak as a citizen of a country that is just on the verge of becoming one of the really great nations of the world, and becoming so because of the development of its natural resources.

At the outset I shall try to give a little credit for the great work that is being done by the scientific, engineering and technical personnel of this department. Today the men who have the skills of the directors of this department are constantly offered remuneration not twice but frequently many times what they are being paid in the government service. I refer to men like Dr. Hume, the director-general of scientific services; Mr. Bell, head of the geological surveys; Mr. Parsons, of the mines branch; Mr. Watson of the geographical branch and Mr. Miller of the surveys and mapping branch. I should like to see some consideration given to the men who have these skills, which are so important to the development of this country, so they could receive rewards for their services at least in part commensurate with what they could command in private industry. The legal profession has the ability to require payment for services rendered, even while the members of that profession are acting as members of this house. I should like to see consideration given these men and all the others who have technical skills which are so vital to us, to ensure that their remuneration is in line with what they could command in private industry.

Turning to the work of the department, I do not think the people of Canada are aware of what has been happening in Canada since the last war. I do not propose to go into the matter in any detail, but I want to give one or two examples of the sort of thing we have developed. There is today a practice which is known technically as shoran which permits the rapid mapping of vast territories by trilateration with a degree of accuracy which is amazing even when compared with the old triangulation system we were taught as students many years ago. I believe that is a Canadian development or one which was largely perfected in Canada. That one development has meant much to the mapping of our country, particularly to that part of it which lies more than 100 miles away from the United States boundary, that part of the country upon which our economy must more and more depend.

Then I come to an example of the difficulty of geological survey work. I think I will read part of this report to the committee because it gives some idea of the tremendous job the geological survey are attempting to do and are doing in Canada. It is at page 19 and concerns the development in British Columbia. It states:

> On account of the rugged terrain and accessibility factors, geological mapping of a standard Cordilleran map sheet bounded by two degrees of longitude and one degree latitude, requires a minimum of four years, which is twice the time ordinarily required for an equal area in other regions of Canada.

Not only does it require more time; it requires different equipment and more machinery and devices which have been developed by the scientists of the department.

The challenge that faces us is so tremendous that it staggers the imagination. I will just give one or two examples. I cite the metals tantalum and columbium which are essential in modern industry and which up to now have been available only in Nigeria, Brazil and the Belgian Congo. Five geologists detailed to do investigation work in the Yellowknife and Great Slave areas conducted detailed investigations at Great Slave lake; and there is a possibility that, through the work of these five geologists, this continent may become self-sufficient in those important metals. Then there is the discovery of a deposit of base metals at Campbell Chibougamau which has recently come into such prominence. That is another example of the work that is being done.

I do not propose to go further into this matter of our geology, Mr. Chairman. I do not propose to deal, except briefly, with the job that is being done in the mine dressing laboratories. The difficulty about the huge variety of different types of ore which have been developed in Canada is that they are useless unless a method of extraction can be developed and made commercially profitable. The ore dressing laboratories have done a splendid job in this regard. We who benefit by the economy of Canada owe to these scientists a debt which I think is greater than we at the present time realize.

I want to say, however, that there is one warning which should be heeded, and I think the minister brought it out when he spoke. These men who are doing this work, particularly the work of the geological survey, are making reports of a scientific nature. When those reports are completed they are of the utmost value to all the people of Canada. But those reports are the responsibility of the geologists, surveyors and technical men who prepare them. Under no circumstances should they be released until the technical men in charge have finished with them. There should be no such thing as prior information. I have seen these parties working. They say, "We hope we do not discover an ore body." I think they have been extremely accurate and ethical in the way they have presented their reports. But there is the danger that these reports receive publicity before they are finalized. I think that is one of the difficulties and one of the dangers we must guard against, in view of the tremendous amount of work that is being done at the present time.

If there is any criticism of this department, it is this. I feel that the $1,300,000 extra expenditure under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act should not be an expense against the department. That is an expense directly caused by the policy of the Department of Finance. The increase in salaries I agree with; but I should have liked to see that $1,300,000 expended on more surveys, on more geophysical work, on magnetometer work and on the discovery of more anomalies and new techniques throughout the country. As I tried to say when I began, the rate of development in Canada today absolutely defies description. It offers a challenge that no other people have ever faced, and the work cannot proceed fast enough. We are on the threshold. If we have the wisdom, if we have the political ability not to destroy the heritage which is offered to us, we can become one of the great powers because of our heritage of natural resources and particularly because of our heritage of mineral resources for which this department is responsible. I only hope we can accept that challenge and be prepared really to develop the country as the picture is just unfolding before us.

Mr. Dumas: Under this departmental administration item I understand that hon. members can make general remarks and comments and ask questions, if they wish to do so. I should like to congratulate the minister and his staff on the excellent idea of publishing a summary of the activities of his department. I wish also to congratulate the deputy minister and the directors of the different branches on having made this report available soon after the end of the year. Under the title "Geological Survey of Canada" we see a very clear and concise report of the work which has been done during the last year.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister one of the desires of the prospectors of my district. Following the work done by those who are in charge of the different parties going out every summer to make a geological examination of the rock formations in the different parts of the country, preliminary blue line plans and preliminary reports are made available to those who are interested. Later a final coloured plan and final report are also made available to the prospectors, to the mining companies and to all those who are interested in looking for new mineral discoveries. Prior to two years ago, in our district those maps and reports were made available to the prospectors through the offices of the various mining recorders, and they were distributed free of charge.

Since that time a prospector who wishes to have a map has to fill out a card and send it to the department. If the prospector is not in a hurry that is all right, but if the prospector wants the map in a hurry, then I think it is a big disadvantage to have to send to Ottawa to get it. I would suggest that the minister consider very seriously the possibility of going back to the old system of having those maps available in the offices of the mining recorders in all the provinces.

We have good reason to ask for that, and I shall cite only one example. Three years ago a very important discovery was made not far from Amos in the constituency of Chapleau. That discovery today is the Barvue mine. This mine will be in production within the next month or two. When the discovery was made the prospectors were interested in staking some ground surrounding that discovery. In order to make their staking as profitable or as practical as possible they naturally wanted to get some information on the geology of the district. The only way for them to get that information was to secure a map which would show the geology. If they had had to write to Ottawa to get the maps it would have taken probably four or five days or maybe a week, and by the time they received the map there would have been no ground available in the surrounding district, because a week after the discovery the whole of one township was staked and more. Therefore I would suggest to the minister that we go back to the old system, even if the department has to charge a nominal sum for those maps. I think we would render a great service to the prospectors by making these maps available through the mining recorders in the different districts.

The work being done by the geological survey branch of this department is really No. 1 work, and I wish to congratulate those who are associated with it. Many reports and maps are being published, and I see no reason why those maps and reports should not be made available to those who are really interested in them. Moreover I think it is the aim of the department to do everything it can to encourage the development of our natural resources. I am sure that if we went back to the old system of distributing those maps and reports, even if there had to be a nominal charge, everybody would be happy and more satisfied.

Mr. Gillis: I know the minister does not want to hear long speeches, and most of the members do not want to make long speeches at the present time. Everybody is tired of talking and of listening, but I have a few remarks I want to make on the estimates of this department. This is one department that it seems to me has been somewhat neglected in the past as far as discussion in the house is concerned. The estimates always went through very quietly; but new activities are being undertaken by this department as well as by others; we are becoming better acquainted with them, more services are demanded, and so forth.

When he opened the discussion of his estimates the minister stated there never was a time in the history of Canada when there was a greater search for or a greater need of minerals than at the present time. I agree with that statement. He made reference to the few observations I had made in the debate on the amendment of the leader of the opposition which dealt with the question of international markets. I am not going to go into what I said in any great detail, except to say that the action of the department in respect of my request was anything but satisfactory.

The minister has said that it was a request from a private company. It was not a request from a private company. The fact of the matter is that the people who made the request were prospectors. They had all of their analyses made and the property was practically proven; but the capital available to form the company could not be obtained until the magnetic survey was completed. That was what was required by those who had the money and were quite willing to put it into the property. But the person who had the lease on the property at the time, and who over a period of some four years did the prospecting, unfortunately died within the last month. His wife still resides in North Sydney. I do not know whether or not she is interested in going forward with the project.

The person in question, Mr. H. W. Taylor, was a prospector who had spent about four years of his time in prospecting the area. He had leased some 57 square miles from the provincial government, and was in touch with an English company that had taken some of the samples. They had agreed that if the property was developed there was a market in England for about a million tons of the ore per year.

I sent all the correspondence to the minister's office, and I was disappointed to learn that the survey could not be made in Nova Scotia. They did not have the necessary equipment. In view of the search for minerals now going on, and the amount of time this man and his wife had put into proving the property, I felt it was not unreasonable to ask the department to use the equipment they have to complete the survey, always having in view the possibility of developing another industry in the maritime provinces, particularly when industries are so badly needed there.

The answer I received was that surveys of that kind were not undertaken for private companies. Perhaps I would be prepared to agree with that proposition. But this was a company in the embryo stage. The survey was necessary in order to enlist capital in the company. Had that been done I am sure the rest would have followed automatically. I was disappointed by the position taken by the minister because, in reality, these two people were prospectors who had a good chance to form a prosperous company, if the survey had taken place.

It did not take place, and I would hope that the department might take a further look into the matter. I can well understand that it cannot send this type of equipment all over the country at the request of any little company that thinks it may have a prospect. That would not be reasonable. On the other hand I believe there should be enough flexibility in the administration of the department to take a look at that kind of proposition, particularly where there are extenuating circumstances involving two people of this kind who spent four years in prospecting. According to the letters and other data I have seen this was a pretty good prospect. Nevertheless, at some time in the future some other, bigger company may undertake the work.

While I am critical on this particular point, let me say that I have had pleasant experiences in dealing with another section of the minister's department. I refer to that section in which chemical analyses of minerals are made. I have had a good deal of this work done in that branch of the department, and I have always found it courteous and efficient. I would refer particularly to Mr. J. A. Fournier with whom I had the pleasure of doing business. There is no difficulty in getting the work done when it comes within the scope of that particular branch of the department.

The fact remains, however, that in respect of this survey matter I was somewhat critical. I think a mistake was made, and that it might well be corrected the next time we have to go at this sort of thing. We learn from our mistakes. I believe we lost a company there through not making the survey available when it was required. That is all I have to say on that score.

My main reason for speaking this evening is that I am still interested in the Nova Scotia coal industry, and there are one or two things I would like to say about it. First of all, I was disappointed in a recent appointment made to the board. That was the appointment of another coal operator. I have nothing against the appointee, except that he is a coal operator. This board was recommended by the Carroll commission following its survey of the coal industry in Canada. The recommendation to establish the coal board was contained in the minority report of the commission, written by Mr. A. J. Morrison, whom the minister knows well and who comes from Alberta.

Had it not been for the unions which had pressed for the commission in order to iron out the difficulties of marketing and the future development of coal, there would not have been a coal board. The case for the board was made by the unions, and the recommendation for its establishment came from the secretary-treasurer of the miners' unions in Alberta.

For that reason I say those who dig the coal are entitled to representation on the board. When it was set up I complimented the government, and pointed out I thought it was a move in the right direction. It would result in a central body having administration over subventions, regulations, marketing and all that sort of thing. I thought it was bringing skilled organization into the field and would bring sanity to the coal industry, because it was in a pretty haphazard condition from province to province.

Well, the board was set up. When it was established the late D. W. Morrison was appointed as the representative of labour. The other members on the board were either coal operators or coal importers. We went along with that without making much protest. My view always was that it should have been divided fifty-fifty as between operators and those who dig the coal, with an independent government chairman to act as referee.

Instead of having equal representation on the board, when Mr. Morrison, the labour representative, passed away another coal operator was appointed in his place. In my opinion it is a coal board no longer; it is now a coal operators' protective association, and can be used for that purpose. The interests of most people and most organizations are selfish; and it is only natural to expect that the coal operator on the board will be thinking of his own interests. But another person is interested, and he is the man who digs the coal. In my view he is entitled to at least some representation. I hope the minister will rectify that mistake when he gets a chance, because it is a mistake.

The man who digs the coal had some respect for that board. I never heard much criticism of it. It was always thought to be doing a good job. Now we know something about subventions, where they are going and what amount is being paid. But their representative was taken off the board and replaced by another coal operator. The picture has changed and there is a lot of resentment. It may be a small thing to the minister or the department, but it is a big thing to the man who digs coal in Alberta, in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia. He feels that the one man who could speak for him on that board was removed and replaced by a coal operator. Perhaps the minister could be excused because he has only recently taken over the department. Perhaps the minister has never rubbed shoulders with that kind of thing and does not realize the psychological damage that was done to the coal miner when the labour representative on the board was removed.

The last annual report of the department indicates that considerable attention is being paid to research and that sort of thing in connection with the coal industry. Plans are being made to find other uses for coal. However, as far the the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is concerned, there does not seem to be much co-ordination between it and the users of coal, the Canadian National Railways, for example. The estimates indicate that $120,000 is being provided to McGill university for the purpose of developing a coal-fired turbine engine, and according to the departmental report this experiment is expected to be finished by the end of this year at which time we may have some idea what value there may be in such an engine.

Instead of the Canadian National Railways waiting to see what was going to be developed, Mr. Gordon told the committee a few weeks ago that they had a program for the complete dieselization of the Canadian National Railways—that is to use oil—which it is expected to be completed in the next five years. He stated that no more steam locomotives are being manufactured in North America, but that is not true. I have had some correspondence recently with a fairly large United States company which claims that it is putting out a good type of coal-fired engine which compares favourably with the diesel.

What I am complaining about is that this government agency is rushing ahead as fast as it can to stop using coal on the Canadian National Railways. At the same time the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are carrying on research to see if an engine using coal cannot be developed to operate just as efficiently and economically as a diesel engine. I think Mr. Gordon could well have carried on his program from Toronto west to a certain point and then gone rather slowly with dieselization east of Montreal.

The coal industry is most important to that part of the country, particularly to Nova Scotia. The C.N.R. market is around 288,000 tons per annum, but according to Mr. Gordon, at the end of five years that market will be pretty well wiped out. As I say, that is the main market for Nova Scotia coal.

Then we must consider natural gas. The government is granting a franchise to a company to pipe Alberta gas to Montreal and Quebec city. That gas will replace coal, not only for domestic purposes but for metallurgical purposes as well, because natural gas can be used in place of coal in any industry except basic steel. All these developments are taking place with the sanction of the government. At the same time the government is carrying on research to perpetuate the coal industry and make it more efficient. They are putting $7,500,000 into a mechanization program for Dominion Steel and Coal. However, there is no over-all planning as far as the industry is concerned. One department seems to be working at cross purposes with the other instead of all these different people sitting down with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to see what can be done. In my opinion there is considerable evidence that there is no co-ordination of thinking in connection with this matter which is so vital to the economy of the country.

It is time the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys asked his colleagues in the government for a little more co-operation. I think this department is trying to do a good job in connection with this industry. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a pretty long-headed person and I remember back in 1947 he warned the coal operators of this country that if they did not watch themselves, develop their industry, conserve resources, and bring in new techniques, in a few years they might be faced with the kind of thing the coal operators of Great Britain were faced with at that time. I think that is quite true.

Despite all these developments in gas, oil and all that kind of thing, I think we must realize that for a long time to come there will be a definite place for coal in the economy of North America. I think the minister should ask his colleagues whether there is any future for the coal industry in Nova Scotia. The government has a $10 million investment in the industry in the maritimes which has been made only recently. The government is helping to mechanize the industry, but what is its future? Is Mr. Gordon right in rushing ahead to dieselize the whole system? The economy of this province is being threatened, and at the same time the government is carrying on research on a turbine engine which may be more efficient and economical than the diesel. Is Mr. Gordon in too much of a hurry? What effect will natural gas have when it comes down from Alberta?

I am not against progress, but I do not think it is good sense to destroy the economy of one section of the country in order to make the cost of fuel a little less in another section. We have talked to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour about it. After reading this report and looking at these estimates it is evident that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is actually coming into its own. These matters have never been treated before as a mining proposition; everything else was dealt with, but not that. Today we have geological operations, research, subventions; all these matters are concentrated in the department. For the first time it is really getting down to business and doing a decent job.

What the minister must do is tell the other departments that they should not work at cross purposes with his. They should all sit down with the coal board and study this whole proposition before they start handing out money for pipe lines and all that kind of thing to offset the work this department is doing. While I am critical of the amount of co-operation we got in connection with the magnetic survey, from my reading of this report—I always read them—I think the department is doing the best job that has ever been done. I believe more members should take an active interest in the department and push it along a little. I do not think there is progress unless we have a little fight once in a while. That is the way we learn, and we keep people on their toes. I am quite satisfied with what the department is trying to do as far as the mining industry is concerned, but I am not satisfied with what a lot of other departments are doing to offset the work of this department. Along with research, subventions and that sort of thing, you are really getting a pretty good picture.

[Mr. Gillis.]

As we look at the estimates along the line I may have a few more questions to ask.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Before the minister answers the question of the member for Cape Breton South, could I add something along the same line? I have a communication from Alberta raising the very question which the member for Cape Breton South has raised, whether coal-burning locomotives are a thing of the past. I have here a report of a United States railway, the Norfolk and Western. As has been stated, they are carrying on experiments in coal-burning turbine electric locomotives, and they expect good results. The people in Alberta, though perhaps not so deeply concerned as the people of Nova Scotia because they are not so dependent on coal, are nevertheless concerned.

Before I take my seat I would like to ask one other question which is prompted by the remarks of the member for Cape Breton South. I refer to the inability of the government to assist private enterprise in the case he mentioned. I realize the difficulty, as he did. However, I noticed that in his preliminary remarks the minister said something to the effect that we do not compete with private industry or with the provinces. I understand the sense in which he said that. On the other hand when it comes to a case of some assistance being required it seems to me very unfortunate that it cannot be given.

I realize, as did the hon. member for Cape Breton South, what the difficulty is. He said you could not run off after every query you got. Take on the other hand the Ontario research foundation. Perhaps it went to the other extreme, but its chief purpose was to do scientific work which would directly assist private enterprise. I am not suggesting this department can conduct itself in that way. Nevertheless I find myself very interested in the two questions which the hon. member for Cape Breton South has asked and I thought that before they were answered I might associate myself with them.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I very much appreciate the kind references which hon. members have made to the work of the department. The hon. member for York West made a reference to the shoran method of triangulation. I was very glad he mentioned that, because when our supplementary estimates come up we are going to have a large item for that very purpose. The reason is that during past years, since the war at least, the R.C.A.F. have been co-operating with us in the work. They are no longer able to continue and, as the equipment we have been using is just about worn out, we are going to have to replace it and that will cost some hundreds of thousands of dollars. We did not know that the R.C.A.F. were withdrawing from the field when our main estimates were printed; therefore it has to come in as a supplementary.

The hon. member for York West also made reference to our ore dressing laboratory. What he said was true I think; and we have one of the most up-to-date and best laboratories of that kind in the world. He expressed a little apprehension lest prior information get out in reports from our department but I think the record of the department speaks for itself. There has never been any known instance of that happening and I am sure it is being watched very carefully.

He had criticism about the cost of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act being charged to our department. We do not particularly resent that because we are responsible for the administration of the act and the money, of course, all comes out of the consolidated revenue fund anyway. I think perhaps it is better for us who are more familiar with mining practices to have responsibility for its administration.

Mr. Adamson: Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, I misquoted a figure. I said $1,300,000 but the actual figure is $10,800,000. I do think it is wrong for that expense, which is really a Department of Finance expense, to be charged to the technical branch.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member for Villeneuve referred to map distribution. At a recent prospectors' meeting in Noranda I said that we were quite willing to supply maps at provincial mining recorders' offices. My colleagues here tell me that within a very few days the mining recorders in Quebec will have a supply of our maps. We are willing to do that for other provinces as well. The card system was initiated in the first place to keep a better record of the distribution of our maps, but we realize that it has not been very convenient for the prospectors and we are willing to go back to the old method.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South has made further reference to the magnetometer survey that was requested. I think I can put his mind a little more at ease if I tell him that for the particular area that we were requested to survey we have no base maps and without base maps a magnetometer survey is useless. It so happened that this particular area is in a national park or it has been reserved for park purposes—I have not the exact details—but we have not the base maps which are necessary.

As minister of this department I am between the devil and the deep blue sea. On the one hand our department is interested in the development of gas and oil reserves in this country and I am also responsible for the dominion coal board.

Mr. Knowles: Which is which? Which is the devil and which is the deep blue sea?

Mr. Prudham: I will leave that to you. We are endeavouring to keep a fair balance between all these rival interests in our department. Perhaps it is a little difficult at times, but we are putting forth quite an effort to find new uses for coal and better methods of preparation. I have quite a lengthy statement here on the work of the fuels division, especially in relation to the coal mining industry. I think perhaps it would be worth while putting it on the record.

Projects having a direct bearing on the coal industry have pertained mainly to research on underground mine pressures and to coal preparation methods at collieries. This twofold investigation has been and is being conducted both in western and eastern Canada with the objective of studying the economic mining of coal at depth, with special attention to the avoidance of violent pressure "bumps" and "gas outbursts", in order to allow the safe mining of coal at greater depths than is now feasible; and to work with coal mining operators in helping them to clean and improve the quality of their product for the market. Special attention has been paid to the utilization of the finer sizes of bituminous coal which predominate in Canadian mining operations. A dozen mining engineers are now conducting field work in close association with the operators in Alberta, British Columbia, and Nova Scotia.

During the past decade a systematic study of the physical and chemical characteristics of Canadian coals as mined has been carried out. To date the coals mined at 150 different collieries have been investigated, which means that the properties of coals from practically all the larger producing mines have been studied and the results reported. This investigation affords information of great value to the operators in sizing and cleaning their product for various uses.

Other projects of a minor nature of direct assistance to the coal mining industry are the analyses of mine air gases and tests on the inflammability of coal mine dusts. These are concerned mainly with mine safety measures. The publication of the Canadian coal analyses, and co-operation with purchasing agents of government departments in their coal purchases according to quality specifications, has been continued during recent years.

Long term projects, with the increased use of Canadian coals in view, pertain to its use in a coal-fired gas turbine unit and to producing synthetic liquid fuels by hydrogenation. The objective of the first is to develop a coal-fired gas turbine primarily for locomotive use. If such a prime mover can be produced it will benefit the coal mining industry by retaining part of the coal market that will otherwise be lost to diesel or other types of oil-fired locomotives. The railways will also benefit because coal is generally the cheapest fuel on the basis of heating value.

The general purpose of the hydrogenation project is to investigate and improve upon partly developed methods for converting coal and heavy petroleum oil crudes to high grade liquid fuels. The Canadian reserve of petroleum, which is fast approaching the country's peacetime requirements, would not satisfy the demand if petroleum from the Middle East and South America were drastically restricted under wartime conditions.

Domestic stoker coal and coking investigations should also be mentioned. The increased use of Canadian coal in domestic stokers is under constant study. Installation of an experimental testing unit has been completed, and a series of tests has begun to compare the value of Canadian coals with standard imported coals; and the results are expected to be of assistance to manufacturers of equipment in improving stoker design.

Experiments were recently conducted on the blending of western bituminous coals, particularly from the Crowsnest area, to aid in promoting the increased and more efficient use of Canadian coals for making coke for foundry and other metallurgical uses. With the object of materially improving the physical properties of metallurgical coke for use in blast furnaces at steel plants in the east, the blending of Nova Scotia coals varying considerably in volatile matter content is also being intensely investigated.

In co-operation with the dominion coal board the division of fuels has recently completed a survey of the industrial market for Canadian coals. It has been concluded that there is a market for approximately one million additional tons of these coals a year, provided the coals meet minimum requirements in regard to cost and delivery.

Mr. Blackmore: I was interested in the statement the minister made, Mr. Chairman, but I think what the house wants to know is what the results are. Has the department discovered what are the possibilities now of Alberta coals sharing in the Ontario market, which it would seem that they ought to do both from the standpoint of Alberta and from the standpoint of Ontario in case there should be any interruption in supply from across the line. Of course that is a subject that is of interest to one who represents a coal mining riding, as I do.

Mr. Prudham: I would prefer to allow that question to stand until we reach the coal board's estimates. We are probably straying a little from the subject.

Mr. Blackmore: That will be in the minister's own estimates tonight?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell the committee what the present situation is with regard to the mining of uranium in Canada?

Mr. Prudham: The mining of uranium, of course, is the responsibility of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company. The tonnages mined are secret, and we have not that information. Our department does work on the treatment of radioactive ores, but we have no information on the mining activity.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In his opening remarks the minister said the department was careful not to compete either with private enterprise or with the provinces. Can the minister indicate just what is the line of demarcation between the work of the dominion department and the provincial departments? Is it purely geographical or is it functional?

Mr. Prudham: This department does the over-all geology and map making. The provinces, generally speaking, do the detailed mapping and the detailed geology of local areas, as well as the work directly connected with the mining ventures.

Mr. Adamson: I think the minister might explain how his department works in with the provincial departments of mines. For instance, take the Red Lake survey, which is an Ontario mining map. I think the committee would be interested in knowing the way the country is divided, that is where the Ontario department of mines does the surveying and makes the geological report and where the federal department does it.

Mr. Prudham: There is no definite line of demarcation between the work of the two departments. We are always careful to co-ordinate these efforts. Sometimes one provincial department will be willing or perhaps better qualified to do a certain project and that will be left to them. There are very amicable and cordial relations, generally speaking, between this department and the provincial departments of mines. We do not have any difficulty in deciding which work belongs to whom.

Mr. Adamson: It is said that there is no overlapping. Let us consider a new district like Chibougamau; it is really not a new district but an old district that has come into its own after many years of frustration and trouble. In so far as the general geological surveys are concerned, naturally the department of mines of Quebec has had nothing to do with that district; or is that so?

Mr. Prudham: Generally speaking the basic geology and the basic maps are prepared many years in advance by this department. Then when a discovery is made the province comes into the picture and takes on the more detailed work in connection with the specific area.

Mr. Herridge: I was quite interested in the question asked by the member for Greenwood, because I was going to ask a similar question. I have seen provincial parties doing triangulation work and contour surveys in connection with forest surveys. Then a year or so later along comes a federal party and does triangulation work and a contour survey. Is there any consultation with the provincial departments to stop all unnecessary duplication and overlapping?

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member is referring to the British Columbia government, no doubt, and this department actually prints many of the maps for that government. We try to see that there is no overlapping. We do not know of any.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to press this unduly but I confess it does not seem to me that merely because there is cordiality between departments there is a sensible division of the work. Indeed, if I had taken strictly the words the minister used a moment ago, I would have thought it rather looked as if there were duplication. As I understood it, he said his department dealt with a certain area in a rather more general way, and then the provincial department came along and did it in a more particular way. I am not a geologist and I am not competent to ask the question in any detailed way; but I confess that at the moment I am quite unable to see how there is any sensible line of demarcation as I think there should be and as I hope there is.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I believe there are a few constitutional reasons that probably vary somewhat between different provinces. I do not know those details. I am not versed in that subject. I am told that perhaps British Columbia would have a slightly different set-up because of the terms under which it came into confederation. Generally speaking this department has no direct responsibility for the mineral resources. The province has control of its mineral resources. We are a surveys department. We endeavour to perform an over-all service for Canada and for industry. The province has a primary responsibility for the resources. Generally speaking we work on the over-all geological survey of the country and the preparation of the base maps. The provinces then take over in their own particular areas.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister really mean that the dominion department in effect do what they are asked to do by the provinces? Is it the province which determines what assistance it wants and then it gets it? Is that the system? If that were the system I could understand it. Otherwise I am still left with the fear that there is duplication and overlapping.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Drew: Before the minister answers that question, may I raise another one related to the same subject. As in every other department, we see a substantial increase in the cost of administration. We are told that the government recognizes the need for some measure of economy. We have not yet been able to see, in the estimates presented by this or any other department, much evidence of that recognition. In view of the declarations that have been made that some attempts are under way to find possibilities of economy, I should like to know whether in fact there has been any careful examination of the many duties carried out by this department in relation to the departments of mines in the provinces in order to see whether there are not ways in which savings can be made by avoiding duplication as between the various departments.

Mr. Prudham: To answer the leader of the opposition first, may I say that is constantly done. We have mines ministers' conferences. The provincial ministers have a meeting at least once a year, at which representatives of this government are present. We endeavour at all times to avoid duplication of effort and expense. I can assure the hon. member that from day to day we are watching everything possible in this department. We are endeavouring to save money at all times and to get the maximum results.

I can give the hon. member for Greenwood an outstanding example of federal-provincial co-operation. It was with respect to the magnetometer survey that was made of Ontario recently and which resulted in the discovery of the Marmora iron deposits and other deposits that are now being investigated. That was a co-operative venture shared by this department and the department of mines of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Fraser: Does that survey also include the deposit in Simcoe?

Mr. Prudham: No; that was their own work in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Drew: I know there has been a large measure of co-operation between the departments in many respects. I know something of the conferences that take place between the ministers of mines. I must say I cannot agree that these conferences ordinarily have anything whatever to do with an examination of the kind I suggest. In view of the fact that the minister has said that these examinations are taking place constantly, can he produce by way of illustration any recent report that would indicate the exact nature of the examination and survey that takes place of the comparative services performed by his department and by the provincial departments?

Mr. Prudham: There is no published report of that type; but every year, before the field season opens, our chief geologist and our director of scientific surveys contacts the various provincial departments and discusses the program for the coming season. They in turn state their plans. Their over-all season's work is planned in that way.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think the answer is simply that there has been no real examination of the possibility of avoiding duplication. I say that in view of the fact that requests have been made for some time for an examination of the various departmental activities. I know this matter was under discussion some years ago. I have not been able to find anything in the nature of a real examination of the functions of the department. Even if only a few thousand dollars are saved, I think the time is overdue for a rationalization of the functions of a dominion department and a provincial department where they occupy the same field. I am saying that in relation not only to this department but in relation to other departments where they occupy the same fields. Can the minister explain to us just exactly how this examination has been carried out, if in fact examinations of that kind have been carried out in recent months or years?

Mr. Prudham: In Canada we have a national advisory council consisting of representatives from each provincial government, from all the main universities, from the federal government and two from industry. They talk over this very problem. They meet at least twice a year. While they have no official authority they act in an advisory way to all governments concerned.

Mr. Drew: So that we will know what is being done in order to effect some economies —even though they be only a few thousand dollars it would be helpful—can the minister refer us to any recommendations from this advisory council with regard to any details that have been put into effect for the purpose of producing economies by the avoidance of duplication?

Mr. Prudham: I think such a report could be made. I do not know of any concise report that is available at the moment.

Mr. Drew: I simply bring these remarks to a conclusion, Mr. Chairman, by saying that from the answers that have been given I am satisfied that such an examination has not been made. All I can do at this time is urge the minister to adopt the same course that would be adopted in ordinary business practice where different companies are associated in a similar business and where, invariably, they have a careful examination made to see that there is avoidance of duplicating services.

In this instance we have a department which is occupying in some measure one of the fields that under our constitutional allocation of authority is under the jurisdiction of the provinces. That does not apply to every department. It does apply to this department; it does apply to the department of health. It applies to several of the other departments, and I can only urge in all sincerity that a real effort be made to examine most carefully into the functions of the department and see whether savings —and substantial savings—cannot be made by rationalizing the relationship of these departments.

Mr. McCann: After listening to the remarks of the leader of the opposition with reference to this department I am going to make a few observations, because I feel that perhaps I have a little background in connection with this department.

I was the first minister when the department was organized. I will admit that I was perhaps a little sceptical, too, as the leader of the opposition is, that there might be duplication of services as between the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the various departments of mines of the different provinces. After a rather thorough examination I was convinced that such condition did not actually exist.

If one goes over the history of the old department of mines and resources he will find that mines was one particular branch of it. I can give the committee illustrations to indicate the great advantage that has been enjoyed by this country in the development of its natural resources because of the fact that the mines branch existed.

Before me here this evening is the director of scientific services who as a young man, twenty-five or thirty years ago, was out in the province of Alberta on geological surveys for a number of years, and to him and to his staff more than to any other group of people in this Dominion of Canada may be credited today the wonderful development that is going on at this time in the Alberta oil fields. Had it not been for the fact that geological surveys were made in that province thirty years ago and the mapping was done, there would not be the development there is today in the province of Alberta.

The function of the department lies in finding out where these resources are, in presenting maps that geologists and prospectors may use. I will give a typical example, which is a true one. Years and years ago in the Eldorado district where the present great deposit of uranium is in this country, maps were made and it was indicated, and it was on the records here in Ottawa, that there was a deposit of uranium in that country. Gilbert La Bine, who organized the Eldorado Mining Company as a result of that map, went into that country and found and developed one of the greatest resources we have in Canada today, a resource which was taken over by the government of this country at a time when it was very urgently needed.

The function that has been carried out for years is for the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to make these geological and geodetic surveys, to prepare the maps which are freely available to any citizen of this country who is interested in the development of the mining resources.

The function of the provincial people is mostly in the line of development. These resources belong to the provinces. They have been developed by the provinces. In the province of Ontario the great development that took place in the Cobalt country, in Kirkland lake and in the Porcupine; the development in northwestern Quebec, where hundreds of millions of dollars have come into the coffers of the people of this country, have been the result of the initial surveys and developments of the department of mines of the federal government.

Do you know what the mineral wealth of this country is at the present time? Last year $1,200 million of new wealth was taken out of the ground in Canada. That is growing yearly, and the time is not far distant when wealth to the value of $2 billion will be developed from the mining and oil industry of Canada. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the money spent by this department is well spent. True the costs of administration may have gone up. They have gone up in every government department. Why? Because of increased wages, because of the fact that all the materials which are being used have increased in price, because of the increases in staff and in highly paid technical people who are necessary in order to carry on this work. For instance, take the hydrographic surveys. We are mapping the seas of this country, mapping out where the fishing areas are; and in times of war or potential war these hydrographic surveys are of great benefit to this country for our own protection. It is costly to maintain ships, as they do in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys; therefore costs must necessarily go up.

Without speaking at any greater length, Mr. Chairman, I must say I cannot agree with the leader of the opposition. I feel that perhaps he is not as well informed as he might be with reference to the function of the various departments provincially and federally. But the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys federally are doing the fundamental work, the a, b, c work, with reference to the development of the resources of Canada, and in the main the provinces are reaping the benefit.

Mr. Drew: It would be easy to agree with and support most of what the minister has said except the wholly unnecessary concluding remarks; because the minister was nearly correct in most of what he said.

The fact is that the development of mining in this country has been remarkable and a challenging story of development. Nothing that I have said in any way changes that. In fact what I have said on numerous occasions in this house and elsewhere is that there is no more challenging story in Canada than the story of mineral discovery, very largely related to the information which has been made available through the various departments in regard to mineral possibilities. I would ask the minister, however, simply so that a very remarkable story shall not be confused, to check back on his story about Gilbert La Bine, because it was an even more remarkable story than he has indicated. It was remarkable because of the fact that there was no accurate map at the time he made the discovery. The maps we now have which show the location of the Eldorado mine are, as a matter of fact, the result of the work done under another estimate which will appear later, which provides for the photographing of the great territories of this country where other kinds of mapping may not have taken place.

Mr. McCann: It was indicated long before that, because Gilbert La Bine told me himself.

Mr. Drew: Yes, it was indicated in 1780, which was long before this government came to power, and it was actually on a map drawn by Hearne at the time he made a trip down from Coppermine through that area. I am not saying this facetiously. I am saying it because I believe it is one of the most remarkable and challenging stories in our mineral history. Samuel Hearne recorded seeing evidence of mineral outcroppings at what later turned out to be the very point where Gilbert La Bine discovered what became the Eldorado mine.

I am not raising this by way of criticism. I am only saying that it is a fantastic story, and that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys itself can claim great credit for the fact that after discovery was made, through co-operation with the air services very accurate maps of that whole tremendous mineral area were prepared by air photography. What I do want to emphasize is this. No one is more convinced than I of the immense possibilities of mineral development in this country. This department has been doing excellent work for many years, before there were departments of mines in some of the provinces and in fact before some of those provinces had established claim to these resources. This department is doing excellent work today. Throughout the years the men who have served the department have established a name for devotion to service, and highly efficient service, that is recognized throughout the world. No one would be more anxious than I to make sure their services are recognized. I am not talking about the efforts made by individuals; I am not talking about individual devotion to service; I am not talking about the great achievements of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I am simply suggesting that in this huge business of government under a federal system, where departments are occupying the same fields, in the light of the excellent things that are being done, and of the increased responsibility, there should be an attempt to save money where money can be saved. I suggest that an effort be made to get the departments together and examine the possibility of co-ordinating their activities in a manner that will make it possible to perform their service on the most economical basis.

Item agreed to.

228. To provide for payments to McGill university in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine, $120,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What progress has been made in this project?

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Prudham: The experiment has progressed to the point where they are constructing a working model. It is hoped that before the end of the year it will be in operation for the first time.

Item agreed to.

Geological surveys—

229. Administration, operation and maintenance, including the expenses of the national advisory committee on research in the geological sciences, and an amount of $2,200 for Canada's share of the cost of the committee on mineral resources and geology, London, England, $2,202,873.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How many geological survey parties will be out in Newfoundland this year?

Mr. Prudham: Hon. members will be interested in their respective provinces, so I shall place the full information on the record. In the Northwest Territories there will be 6; in Yukon Territory, 6; in British Columbia, 15; in Alberta, 8; in Saskatchewan, 5; in Manitoba, 4; in Ontario, 6; in Quebec, 6; in Quebec (Labrador), 4; in New Brunswick, 3; in Nova Scotia, 3 and in Newfoundland, 7.

Mr. Green: How many of those parties are out on oil and gas territory?

Mr. Prudham: There are 5 altogether.

Mr. Green: In which provinces?

Mr. Prudham: There are 4 in Alberta and 1 in Ontario.

Mr. Green: Is any survey work of this type being done in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba?

Mr. Prudham: We have a regional office in Calgary which is co-ordinating all the information in respect of wells being drilled on the prairies, including the Peace river section of British Columbia. They keep a record of all cores, and that record is kept up to date.

Mr. Green: What is the connection of this department with the operations of the Emerald tungsten mine in southern British Columbia?

Mr. Prudham: We have nothing to do with the operation of the mine, but we are doing work on the metal recovery, in which we are trying to increase the yield of metal from the ore.

Mr. Green: Does the department have any working arrangement with the Department of Defence Production in connection with the production of strategic minerals?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, we have special arrangements. The men in our department act in an advisory capacity, on occasions. We have two on loan at the present time for that purpose.

Mr. Adamson: What is the procedure when a prospector finds radioactive ore? What does he do, and how does the department help him? Some years ago it was believed that thorium, which is a radioactive mineral, was not known in Canada. Have any deposits of thorium been discovered in this country, and what is the procedure when radioactive thorium is discovered?

Mr. Prudham: Our department has published a booklet intended for the use of prospectors, and I should be very glad to send my hon. friend a copy of it.

Mr. Adamson: I am familiar with that booklet. However, I believe the committee would like to have more general information because we know that, in connection with the geology of Canada, there is now an amazing variety of places in which radioactive deposits have been located. These have been found where, years ago, it was never expected they would be found. I believe a short general statement of what should be done would be of interest to the committee. Not only are the prospectors interested, but others are also interested because radioactive ore has been discovered in places we never dreamed of looking even as recently as the close of the last war.

Mr. Prudham: Our geological survey maps indicate where uranium is likely to be found. We also keep an inventory of radioactive properties. We send a geologist around every year to inspect all newly reported discoveries. If the hon. member wishes I could furnish him with more detailed information, but at the moment I do not have it with me.

Mr. Adamson: Has thorium been discovered to any extent in Canada?

Mr. Prudham: I am told that thorium is known to exist in the Wilberforce area of Ontario. As there is no general use for the mineral at the present time there has not been very much interest in it.

Mr. Green: Is the geological survey branch working toward a complete geological map of Canada? Is that a long-term process?

Mr. Prudham: We are working to that end, but it will take many years.

Mr. Green: I am not questioning the value because I know it is of great value, but I understand it is hoped eventually to have the whole country surveyed geologically.

Mr. Prudham: Yes, but it will take many years. I cannot say just how long. The same is true with the hydrographic survey, which may be going on for hundreds of years.

Mr. Green: I believe there was a commitment to conduct a geological survey of Newfoundland. What progress is being made?

Mr. Prudham: At the present time we have seven field parties working which are concentrating on a strip across the centre of the island from coast to coast. We are making as rapid progress as we can.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice there is an increase from $15,000 to $148,200 for the charter of aircraft, and I was wondering if that is explained by the aeromagnetic survey?

Mr. Prudham: A large part of that increase is accounted for by a special project of a helicopter survey from the east end of Great Slave lake to Hudson bay. This will be over virgin territory about which little is known. We think it is a highly mineralized area which may have prospects in connection with strategic minerals.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that an aeromagnetic survey?

Mr. Prudham: No, it is just a preliminary geological survey.

Mr. Fraser: The minister mentioned radioactive ores in the Wilberforce area in Haliburton county. I understand that those ores are nearly as good as the Eldorado ore. They tried to get the government interested but they seemed to give them the cold shoulder, from what I could make out.

Mr. Prudham: Our information is that the deposit is partly radioactive thorium. The mineralogy is not fully understood as yet.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are the specimens in the museum kept up to date and is there sufficient space for specimens from the newer discoveries?

Mr. Prudham: The museum comes under the Department of Resources and Development. I know they are crowded for space. We keep only representative samples there at the present time. We would like to do more, but I believe they are severely cramped for accommodation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is there any place in the country where all the specimens may be seen?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Adamson: I would hope to see the day when the geological survey branch and its staff are removed completely from the museum. Despite the drive for economy I think this is necessary as the poor old museum is having a pretty sick time of it.

Everything is cramped, most of the specimens are stored and as far as I can see will be stored for all time. It is like an iceberg; there is more underground than can be seen by the public. On the whole I think it is rather tragic. Perhaps when our expenses for national defence decrease there may be some improvement in that connection. That is a goal toward which we can work. What research is being done in connection with permafrost? I understand that some work is being done along this line which I believe would come under the geological survey.

Mr. Prudham: We have one project at Resolute Bay where they are diamond-drilling to find the depth of the permafrost. With regard to my hon. friend's earlier remarks, I must say that this branch is sadly underhoused. We need a geological building where we could display the samples and efficiently carry on many other operations. If we get an estimate for a new building past the treasury board some day I hope my hon. friend will support us.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and mapping branch—

231. Surveys and mapping branch administration, $40,796.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the department have anything to do with determining the boundary between Quebec and Labrador?

Mr. Prudham: This department carries out boundary surveys at the request of the provinces, but up to date we have had no request for that particular survey.

Item agreed to.

Canadian hydrographic service—

234. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's annual contribution of $5,750 to the international hydrographic bureau, $2,083,822.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is it proposed to conduct any surveys in Newfoundland waters and, if so, where will they be conducted?

Mr. Prudham: In Labrador, Battle Harbour is a defence project and Hopedale is a further defence project. In Newfoundland, Placentia Bay, a defence project; Conception Bay, also a defence project; Newfoundland harbours, a resources and industrial development, plus general naval requirements.

Item agreed to.

237. International boundary commission—administration, operation and maintenance, $61,292.

Mr. Knowles: What are the present functions of this commission?

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. Prudham: The purpose of this vote is to enable Canada to fulfil her treaty obligations of maintaining the international boundary in a state of effective demarcation. This includes the clearing of boundary vistas, the repairing and resetting of monuments, the maintenance of boundary range lines, etc. as required under the treaty. Some 5,600 miles of boundary line between Canada and the United States and between Canada and Alaska are involved.

Mr. Fraser: They ought to put up "no smuggling" signs.

Item agreed to.

238. Legal surveys and aeronautical charts—administration, operation and maintenance, including a grant of $350 to the Canadian Institute of Surveying and Photogrammetry and the expenses of the board of examiners for dominion land surveyors and payment of fees of B. W. Waugh, J. E. Lilly and J. E. R. Ross, members of the board, and A. W. Cole, secretary of the board, $630,195

Mr. Fraser: I would just like to ask why there is an increase in this item of $81,000.

Mr. Prudham: The total increase in salaries under this item is $34,213, of which $28,000 is for increased rates of pay and $27,000 additional is provided for hire of outside land surveyors, largely for surveys on Indian reserves. Then $16,000 is provided for radar altimeter work.

Mr. Fraser: Why should the increase for surveys on Indian reserves all be thrown into this year?

Mr. Prudham: This department, under the dominion lands act, does all the surveys that are required by statute to be done by dominion land surveyors. We undertake this work at the request of other departments—the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Indian affairs branch, the Department of Resources and Development—and for any other federal property that requires survey.

Mr. Fraser: You mentioned $27,000 on account of surveys for the Indian affairs branch?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: What was the amount last year? Is this for special reserves or does this $27,000 cover more than one reserve?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it would be for more than one reserve. I have not the details here as yet but I am informed that last year the amount was about $22,000 and this year it is $49,000.

Mr. Fraser: That is an additional $27,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I would like to ask one question on this item. Would the minister mind informing me of the meaning of "legal surveys"? They are not done for private individuals are they?

Mr. Knowles: It means they are not illegal.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, "legal surveys" is a term used to describe the work carried on by this department to establish boundaries and various legal subdivisions coming under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I believe that when our dominion land survey bill was before the house last year it was set out that where there is a common boundary between private property and crown lands the individual adjoining can request that a provincial surveyor also participate in the survey. They delineate demarcation of ownership as it affects federal land.

Item agreed to.

Dominion coal board—

246. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $111,753.

Mr. Blackmore: This is an item on which I take it the minister will agree to have a full discussion. I may say that we in Alberta feel that the dominion coal board has let us down altogether in the matter of our coal. There was a time when they gave us a substantial subvention to help us get coal into the Ontario market.

As a result of the present situation I would like to ask the minister some questions. He no doubt agrees with me but being a member of the government he is in a rather difficult position; but I will ask these questions: First, how many areas in Alberta produce coal fully suitable for transportation to Ontario and for sale in Ontario; and I will ask which areas? Second, how great a subvention would be necessary to render it possible to deliver such coal in Ontario on a basis permitting successful competition, that is of course competition with coals coming in from the United States or any other place? Third, how much of a subvention is now being paid? Fourth, if there has been a reduction of the subvention in whole or in part during the last ten years, how great a reduction has taken place? Fifth, how much coal was imported from the United States in each of the years 1949, 1950 and 1951?

I think probably it will take the minister a few minutes to get the answers to those questions and during that time I would like to make these observations.

As is well known there are a number of kinds of coal in Alberta ranging all the way from lower bituminous, what we might call soft bituminous, up to close to anthracite, coal which could probably very well be classified as anthracite. During the years I have been in parliament a number of reasons have been advanced why it was not feasible to bring Alberta coal down into competition in Ontario. In my own opinion most of those reasons were just pure pretence. I have had the impression that there have been big interests in the United States with representatives in governing circles, and I won't say where, who have been persistently exercising an influence against the bringing of Alberta coal into Ontario, in my judgment to the serious disadvantage of both the west and the east. The questions I have asked are designed partly to uncover the situation and my colleagues and I will probably have something more to say as this information develops. The hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for Red Deer have both been awaiting an opportunity of raising this question. I just happened, by accident, to get in first. They are just as keenly interested as I am, and I am saying this so no one will believe I was the one who brought it up and they were not going to do so.

Mr. Prudham: In answer to the hon. member's first question, I would say that all coal produced in Alberta is suitable for marketing in Ontario.

Mr. Blackmore: May I just raise a question there to help the minister. There are some coals, of course, which they have said would seriously disintegrate on the trip east. They raise that as an objection, you see. They say there is too much water in it or too little water, but like most excuses I do not think it would hold water.

Mr. Knowles: Somebody is all wet.

Mr. Prudham: Over the past years we have been carrying on discussions with the Alberta minister of mines with a view to establishing a standard of quality for coals that would be most suitable for the Ontario market. The dominion coal board has agreed to co-operate in such an effort. Considerable work has been done in gathering information on the qualities, moisture content, the b.t.u. value and so on of various coals. The Alberta government has agreed to police the quality regulations that are finally decided upon. In other words, any coal that is eligible for subvention assistance under the auspices of the dominion coal board will have to have the stamp of approval as to quality from the Alberta government.

The amount of subvention necessary to compete is the subvention we are now paying. The subvention rate is designed to make Alberta coal competitive with United States coal imported into eastern markets. The maximum being paid is $3.50 in southern Ontario areas. There has been no reduction in the subvention since it was first instituted. The amount of coal imported into Canada in various years is as follows:

Year	U.S. Bituminous	U.S. Anthracite	British Anthracite
	Tons	Tons	Tons
1947-1948	25,079,000	4,576,000	55,000
1948-1949	24,980,000	4,584,000	191,000
1949-1950	15,382,000	3,810,000	354,000
1950-1951	23,688,000	4,090,000	398,000

Mr. Shaw: Earlier this session, Mr. Chairman, I directed certain remarks of mine to the coal industry, particularly as it applies to my province; and after all Alberta is that Canadian province in which the greater amount of coal is produced. It also represents the area in which we have the greatest known reserves. I just happen to represent a constituency in which coal mining is an important industry.

When I raised this question earlier I emphasized two important facts. First, I am inclined to believe that today the Canadian coal mining industry is deteriorating. I think all the evidence one is able to gather indicates that this is a fact. In the second place I emphasized the fact that should a war break out and our oil supplies in the Middle East be cut off, as I am afraid they would be, we would find ourselves calling upon the coal industry for substantial assistance just as we did during the last war. I am very much afraid, Mr. Chairman, if this condition of deterioration continues, and war does break out, we are going to call upon that industry to do what I am afraid it will be utterly incapable of doing. Once our coal mines are permitted to deteriorate to the point where they close and the workers are dispersed in other industries in Canada, then it becomes a problem of the first magnitude to get those mines back into operation.

I have gathered a few figures, but before I refer to those may I say to the minister that I am particularly pleased to learn that the closest co-operation exists between the minister of mines in Alberta, Mr. Tanner, and the coal board with respect to laying down quality regulations, as well as the stamping of coal that does attain a certain quality in order that we may be assured of our best quality coal being shipped into central Canada. The minister indicated that while there has been no change in the subvention, it still represents an amount which enables us to put Alberta coal into central Canada—

Mr. Prudham: I am sure the hon. member is misinformed. The subvention rate was increased last year.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Mr. Shaw: I am sorry, but I understood the minister to say there had been no change. Even so, I would remind the minister of the freight increases which have taken place during the last year—

Mr. Prudham: Not since the subvention rate was increased.

Mr. Shaw: —which must have an effect upon the position of our Alberta coal in relation to coal which is marketed in central Canada.

In 1948 the Alberta industry produced 8,110,000 tons of coal. There was an increase in 1949 to 8,616,983 tons. We find a very sharp decline in 1950 to 8,138,206 tons, and a further substantial decline in 1951 to 7,661,276 tons. I fully realize that this decline in coal production in Alberta has been coincidental with, and one might even say attributable to, the increase in competition from labour-saving fuels, marketing difficulties due to freight rate increases and so on over the past several years. I do not believe there is any argument either about the obvious advantages of labour-saving, clean fuel; advantages which have enabled natural gas, for example, to supplant coal as a domestic and industrial fuel in most of our urban areas and larger towns in western Canada, particularly in my own province of Alberta.

Increasing competition has been felt, so the mine operators say, from liquid petroleum gases such as propane and butane, and from fuel oil in some rural areas. One of the things that does concern me is this.

During the past number of years the railways have represented our most substantial consumer of coal. According to figures which I have, in 1948 the railways consumed 2,312,273 tons of Alberta coal. In 1949 it went up to 3,126,425 tons; in 1950 to 3,308,365 tons. Then there was a sharp decline in 1951 to 2,443,326 tons. The railways which in the past have provided the largest non-seasonal market for Alberta coal are proceeding with a plan which will ultimately result in the conversion to diesel power of both of our transcontinental system. In the meantime an increasingly large number of steam locomotives are using fuel oil rather than coal. This oil, of course, is obtained as a by-product of light fuel production at refineries using light crude stock or from the particular heavy crude fuels such as those we find in Lloydminster, Vermilion and Wainwright. This railway conversion program apparently completely ignores the possibility that in the case of war or in case of any national emergency there may be an acute oil shortage, as I have already stated, and in the meantime some of our mines may have had to close down with the resultant dispersal of trained personnel. I think that is a matter to which the railways themselves should give serious consideration.

I have already mentioned the competition from other forms of fuel. While facing that unabated competition from other types of fuel, coal mine operators have had to contend with constantly increasing marketing costs brought on, I would say, in the main by freight rate increases over the past several years.

Mr. Blackmore: And production costs.

Mr. Shaw: And production costs. The increased production costs resulting in substantial part from heavier shipping costs brought about by freight rate increases have meant substantially increased overhead costs, thus placing the mines in an extremely inferior marketing position. Each increase in freight rates has further restricted markets when the industry is in no position to absorb these extra costs. If one examines the facts of the case I think he will find that every time we have had a freight rate increase in Canada we have lost markets for Alberta coal. They were simply put in this difficult position where they could not compete at all with imported coals.

To meet this situation which threatens death by strangulation if a large increase in production should be requested—such as, I might emphasize, was obtained by the federal government during the last war—efforts are being made to prepare more marketable products from coal. I think that is probably one of the healthy signs. I am going to ask the minister a few questions with respect to that matter. When I say that the industry is threatened by strangulation, I think I am not stating anything that is foreign to the facts which exist at the present time. I know it can be said that the number of mines in operation in Alberta, for example, has increased since 1948 from 94 to 104 in the case of subsurface mines. There has been a decrease in strip mine operations during the same period of time. But while there has been an actual increase in the number of subsurface mines operating between 1948 and 1951, I think the facts are that most of the increase in mining operations is represented in the smaller mines or the family mines, as we know them. The significant fact, of course, is that during those four years we have had an important decline in actual coal production.

I realize fully that certain efforts are being made to produce other products from coal in my province. As I said a moment ago, in that connection I think I see a hopeful sign. I have noticed that they are concentrating more and more upon the manufacture of briquettes. That procedure is going on in the Coalspur, Mountain Park, the Crowsnest pass, Canmore and Seebe areas in Alberta. Coke is also processed in Coleman. I am told that greater attention is being given to the manufacture of coke and briquettes. There seems to be a rather satisfactory market for those products.

I am going to ask the minister if he has any information with respect to "fabricoal". I am not too certain what it is. I know that at Big Valley, Alberta, activity has been under way for some time, and I understand that about 1,742 tons of that product were marketed outside of the province last year. As I say, I do not know exactly what "fabricoal" is but I am particularly interested in it. If it represents an activity that might provide further marketing opportunities for Alberta coal, it is of course natural that we are all for it. I should like to have the minister comment upon that matter, if he will, when I am finished.

I should like to stress the point that the thing I fear above all else is deterioration in the coal mining industry to or beyond the point where we may find it utterly impossible to rehabilitate that industry in time of great emergency. I know that certain changes are conceivably inevitable. I realize fully, of course, that if one has an opportunity to burn gas, he is not likely to burn coal when it represents a product that is dirtier to handle, shall we say, and which, through the process of combustion, produces ashes which have to be removed.

I also appreciate that it may be quite natural for the railroads to move from coal burners to oil burners. But I think the one thing the railroads should realize is that this may not be the proper time to do that. If the international picture were somewhat different from the one we see at the present time, then I would say: "Surely; move along in unrestricted fashion in this process of conversion." But I am a bit fearful. I am not talking for a handful of coal miners who may be in my constituency because I realize that it is quite possible, without too much difficulty, to rehabilitate coal miners and move them into other industries. But I know you cannot move them back as easily as you can move them out. In the light of the international situation I am fearful that we may not be doing all we can to keep this industry in a healthy state in order to meet any emergency that might develop.

I wish the minister would go into this question of subventions a little more fully. Have subvention increases kept pace with increased transportation costs? Can he give us some further information with respect to new processes such as the manufacture of "fabricoal"? Can he give us comparative figures with regard to retail prices of imported United States domestic coal, as we sometimes call it, in Ontario and Alberta coal which is brought into Ontario and sold for what we call domestic purposes there? I well recall that a few years ago I procured figures which indicated that Alberta coal could be laid down in Ontario on a competitive basis outside of lake port areas such as Hamilton and Toronto. This was a number of years ago. From a dollars and cents point of view, having regard to all the costs involved, I wonder whether Alberta coal can today be laid down in central Canada on a competitive basis. I have one more question. What is being done by the coal board to advertise Canadian coal and to assist in the consumption of Canadian coal, a Canadian product, in central Canada? The hon. member for Lethbridge said a moment ago that a lot of propaganda has gone out from time to time with respect to Alberta coal being an inferior product. As a matter of fact, at one time it was even said they shipped low-grade coal into Ontario to prove that it was no good. I would hate to think that is being done; yet I am not surprised at anything nowadays.

Mr. Blackmore: I am afraid it was done.

Mr. Shaw: Well, I think it was, but I hope it is not being done today, because those of us who are familiar with Drumheller lump coal know there is no better domestic coal in this country, and I doubt whether there is any better domestic coal anywhere. I would appreciate what information the minister can give, if he can give me a bit more confidence than I have at the present time with respect to the future of this industry.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. gentleman has asked what the coal board is doing to advertise Alberta coal. Well, it is not the function of the coal board to do that.

Mr. Shaw: Canadian coal?

Mr. Prudham: Canadian coal; it is not the function of the coal board to advertise. If we believe in private enterprise that is the function of the coal operators themselves. I had that question put to me last fall by one of the coal operators' associations. They said: "You have been minister for eight months; what have you done to help us?" I said: "What have you done to help yourselves?" They said: "We have not done anything"; to which I replied: "As soon as you show signs of helping yourselves I will get right behind you, but I am not a Joe-boy for the coal industry". I can say for the coal board that they are there to help in any way they can, but the onus is not on the coal board specifically. It is still primarily a problem for the industry. I think that they can do a better job in advertising, processing and selling their own product.

Mr. Shaw: You give them advice.

Mr. Prudham: This applies especially to the western points.

Mr. Shaw: Do you give them advice?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, we do. The hon. member referred to "fabricoal". I have never heard the name before; but during my inspection trip of the Alberta mines I stopped at Big Valley and saw that operation. It was still in the experimental stage. They had a compressor there, compressing slack coal into bricks. At that time the machine was not working properly. They were having a lot of trouble, but I heard that they have since perfected the process. It seems that the coal was shipped to Texas, or wherever this machine is manufactured, from this particular mine. It worked perfectly on the samples that were shipped, but when the machine was shipped to Alberta, the altitude being higher, the machine did not work and they had many problems. I am glad to know that it is now in operation. It is a convenient way of merchandising soft coals. I do not know what acceptance that product would have in Ontario. It appeared to be a large brick, about the size of an ordinary building tile. I think an educational campaign will have to be carried on if it is going to be used on any large scale in eastern Canada.

One of the difficulties in selling western coal in the east is that the equipment down here is designed for anthracite coals and other United States coals. Before western coals can be used satisfactorily an educational program will have to be carried on, and in some instances conversion of burning equipment will have to take place.

About the beginning of the last shipping season I had several Ontario coal dealers in my office begging for Alberta coal. They said: "We cannot place an order anywhere, in Drumheller valley or anywhere else". The reason for that is that Alberta coal does not store very well, and consequently none is shipped until the heating season begins. At that time the Alberta mines are unable to deliver all the coal that is requested.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister permit a question? Does that apply to all Alberta coals, that they are not capable of being stored?

Mr. Prudham: No, it does not.

Mr. Blackmore: It applies in a general way?

Mr. Prudham: In a general way, yes.

Mr. Fraser: Would that include briquettes?

Mr. Prudham: No; I was coming to that. I think the operators are on the right track now in turning to briquetting, to this "fabricoal" and to other methods. I think that probably will contribute to some extent to the solution of their problems.

Mr. Blackmore: Before the minister goes on, can he give us offhand the names of the Alberta coals that will store successfully; that is, Drumheller coal, for example, and Nordegg coal? What mines produce coal that will store?

Mr. Prudham: I do not wish to give any trade names at this time; I do not think it would be fair, but generally speaking—

Mr. Blackmore: If you give us the mines—

Mr. Prudham: No, I prefer not to do that. It is up to the coal miners themselves to advertise their product. Generally speaking the mountain coals are more easily stored than the prairie coals.

As to the subvention, there was no appreciable increase in the freight rate on coal from western Canada to eastern Canada from 1933 to 1950. When that increase went into effect in 1950 the subvention rate was changed upward to keep Alberta coal competitive in eastern Canada. The question at the moment, as I understand it, is not one of markets; it is a question of consumer acceptance. In that field the coal operators themselves have a big job to do. The coal board is willing to help in every way possible, but the onus is on private enterprise. It is up to them to make an all-out effort.

The coal operators and I believe the Alberta government co-operated last fall in negotiating with the railways to forestall a further increase in freight rates. That effort was successful. I understand they are now negotiating with the railways to ascertain, if possible, the out of pocket costs of hauling coal, with a view to trying to forestall any further increases in the near future. I think that answers the question.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister tell us the tonnage of briquettes that came from Alberta last year?

Mr. Hansell: I was interested in hearing the minister say in answer to a question of the hon. member for Red Deer that it was not the function of the coal board to advertise Canadian coal, and that he was not desirous of being a Joe-boy for the coal mining industry. I am sure we from Alberta have no desire to make one of our Alberta colleagues a Joe-boy for any industry. Perhaps the minister has forgotten that evidently there must be a few Joe-boys in the government, because some of the departments do advertise the industries connected with them. I would point out specifically the Department of Fisheries which carries on quite an advertising campaign on behalf of the fishing industry. I do not think the minister would care to say that the Minister of Fisheries is a Joe-boy for the fishing industry. The Department of Trade and Commerce carries on quite a campaign on behalf of certain industries in the expectation that they might bring some business to those industries. Over the years I have spoken on behalf of the coal mining industry in Alberta. When I was first elected I tried, in my small way, to study the coal mining industry, and I decided to make a speech about it each year. Evidently, however, my speeches were not very powerful, because it appears I cannot get very much action from the government in respect of any over-all national coal policy.

Perhaps as the years have passed I have weakened a little in my efforts. I carried on a sort of annual speech-making event on behalf of the coal mining industry. This is my seventeenth year in the House of Commons and I do not propose to repeat my speech this year, because I do not expect it would bring any better results than it has in the past.

The picture is a dismal one. In the past years I have seen no change in the government's attitude toward the coal mining industry, and toward bringing into existence a coal mining policy that would give some hope to what would now appear to be a dying industry. Yet nothing seems to have changed. The coal is the same kind of coal we have mined for years; the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway are just the same; they still run their trains on the same tracks. Although there may have been some changes in methods and equipment, the coal mines are the same and the consumers are the same. We have industries as well as domestic consumers in Canada. The unfortunate thing is that the government is the same. We have had the same government for a number of years. All this adds up to one thing, and that is that the coal situation is just the same and it does not look as though there will be much improvement in the future.

We still have no coal policy; we have no stability for the industry, and it has no future. I would hope that perhaps later on we might have no Liberal government.

Sometimes however a show is made at attempting something. Over the years there have been a number of coal inquiries and commissions which have resulted in a lot of data and detail. All these have made their recommendations; but I have not been able to find out where one of those recommendations has ever been accepted.

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. member mind repeating that? I did not hear what he said.

Mr. Hansell: I said that over the years we have had a good many coal inquiries and commissions, but I am not aware that any recommendations of those inquiries or commissions have ever been accepted as a policy by the government. If they have been accepted, then the recommendations have been so minute that they have not made much difference.

There was quite a flurry a few years ago when the Carroll coal commission travelled across the country and spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in its efforts. It was quite a show, and it gave some hope to the coal mining industry while the sittings were going on in various places. A lengthy report was published, and a good deal of valuable information appeared in it. The commission was well manned, and had on it a representative of labour as well as one from industry. In short the commission was well rounded. The report was voluminous and valuable; but what happened to it? No recommendations were adopted. It has now been filed away on some musty old shelves in government offices, and the only real use to which it has been put, evidently, is to make fodder for mice and other starving rodents.

That is the situation. The coal mining industry is concerned with the advent of the diesel engine. As the minister is aware, most of the coal mined in Alberta for industrial purposes is for use on the railroads. The diesel engine is upsetting the calculations of the coal mining industry. I would ask the minister to tell us the government's policy to keep this industry on its feet.

Referring to an earlier vote the minister said that a market for about a million tons of coal was now available. I was disappointed when he did not tell us where that market is. Evidently it is a new one somewhere, and I would ask him to tell us where it is, because a million tons would make a worth-while addition to what we already have.

Mr. Prudham: I do not agree with the hon. member when he refers to coal mining as a dying industry, any more than I would agree to gold mining being described as a dying industry. Coal mining is fundamental to our industrial life. I believe, so far as Canada is concerned, that when the gas and oil that has captured the imagination of the public at the present time, and for very good reason, has been used up, coal will be very important. It does any industry good to have a little squeeze once in a while, and I think the coal industry is no exception. They will have to improve their methods if they wish to survive. That process may be a little painful, but I believe it will survive.

The dominion coal board was created to do and is now doing everything possible to assist the industry through this period of transition. Through advertising the coal board does everything possible to promote the use of Canadian coal in Canada. We do not advertise Alberta coal specifically, but we direct our efforts toward benefiting the coal industry of Canada generally.

I believe the Alberta government, with which my hon. friend is very friendly, has definite responsibilities in respect of Alberta coal. The gas and oil development which is contributing to the prosperity of Alberta and of the Alberta government especially is doing more than diesels to put the coal industry of Alberta out of business. Therefore I feel that the Alberta government has a direct responsibility to the coal industry.

Recently the Alberta government allocated a certain amount of gas for export to the Pacific coast. That will affect a very important market for Alberta coal and will create a further problem for the coal industry of that province. I believe the Alberta government will measure up to its responsibility because it has been most co-operative so far. I certainly hope they will go much further.

If my hon. friend would like to know what has happened as a result of the reports of royal commissions on the coal industry and so on, I suggest that he read our annual report.

Mr. Hansell: The minister referred to a million tons.

Mr. Prudham: The report I put on the record was made by the fuels branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. That market is wherever it can meet competition. There is a market anywhere in Ontario for Alberta coal if it can meet competition.

Mr. Hansell: If that is the answer, why limit it to one million tons, why not five million or ten million tons? The minister mentioned specifically that there was a market for one million tons. That was the figure he read from the document and I would like to know where it is. So far we have had no answer. It is like a dog chasing his own tail, it just gets nowhere. However, if that is the minister's answer I shall not press it, as I understand we want to get on with the items tonight.

Mr. Prudham: The present transportation facilities from western Canada would limit the movement of coal to Ontario to not more than half a million tons per year. At the present time there is a competitive market for an additional three-quarters of a million tons of Canadian coal in Quebec. That would make more than a million tons.

Mr. Gillis: Is the mechanization of the maritime coal industry making satisfactory progress? I notice the production is down this year as compared with last.

Mr. Prudham: The progress to date of the mechanization program is not satisfactory either to the dominion coal board or to the operators. Many difficulties have been encountered, largely due to the defence program. They have been unable to get certain types of electrical equipment. They are changing from a compressed air to an electrical operation, and it has been difficult to make the hoped-for progress. We are keeping closely in touch with it. One engineer from the department went there a few weeks ago, and we are sending two more in the fall of the year.

Mr. Fraser: Is the department trying to work out new methods of using Alberta coal for the manufacture of chemicals and other things?

Mr. Prudham: New equipment is being installed at the moment in the Booth street laboratory for the hydrogenation of coal and other heavy fuels. In this connection they deal with very high pressures.

Mr. Fraser: That is turning it into liquid?

Mr. Prudham: We are experimenting with turning it into liquid, and also trying to develop new combustion methods.

Mr. Shaw: Under normal circumstances we would pursue certain matters a little further, but due to the lateness of the hour and I am sure the anxiety of the minister to get his estimates through, in co-operation with the committee, so we can get on to external affairs tomorrow, we will forgo asking further questions. We have expressed our feelings to the minister and to the government, and no doubt when we next have a chance we will bring up this matter again.

Item agreed to.

247. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $6,000,000.

Mr. Adamson: I do not want to be cast in the role of a prophet, but I would not be at all surprised if some of the younger members now in the house will some day see coal being used mainly not as a fuel but in the production of synthetic materials in the petrochemical industry. What research is being done in developing by-products from coal?

Mr. Prudham: Other than the hydrogenation project we have no specific undertakings at the present time. The men in the department keep in close touch with experiments being carried on in the United States. We do not undertake any experimental work that is being duplicated elsewhere in Canada or the United States where we have access to the results.

Mr. Adamson: This department is responsible for the production of probably $1,500 million worth of products which form the sinews of most of our manufacturing and which will become more and more important as the years go by. I suggest to the minister that at the next session the committee on mines, forests and waters be convened so that the experts of the department, the directors and others, may come and inform members as to what is being done. I think that is one of the essential jobs of the technical personnel in the department.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 20, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF VESSEL

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): In November, 1950, Mr. Speaker, I made an announcement that the lack of steel had made it necessary for the government to suspend temporarily construction of the proposed Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry. Today I am happy to inform the house that the government has reviewed the situation with respect to availability of scarce materials and, on the advice of the Canadian maritime commission, and after consultation with the premier of Nova Scotia has agreed that tenders should now be invited for the construction of the vessel.

I should like to remind the house that the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry project is not only a federal-provincial project, it is an international project including as it does the construction of approaches, causeway, pierhead and terminal facilities by the state of Maine and the town of Bar Harbor. I am happy to say that the Maine legislature has passed, and the governor has signed, the legislative bill relating to this work.

May I say a word or two about the ship itself? The vessel will have an over-all length of 348 feet; breadth at main deck 65 feet; car capacity 150 automobiles; total passengers carried 600. There are two car decks, the lower car deck having head clearance for long-distance refrigerated trailer trucks and buses. The service speed of the vessel will be approximately 18½ knots. A notable feature of the vessel's construction is that it will be equipped with a Denny-Brown stabilizer which has the effect of minimizing vessel-rolling during rough weather. In the summer tourist season the ship is scheduled to make the round-trip voyage in daylight hours. Our Nova Scotia members can readily appreciate the value of such a unit.

While initially the ferry will be dependent on summer tourist traffic, the real justification for the vessel is the hope that having furnished this new gateway there will develop a commercial business by truck which will bring the produce of Nova Scotia to the markets of the United States and vice versa. The ship, in reality, will be a continuation of the highway between Maine and Nova Scotia, along which will flow countless automobiles with passengers anxious to visit and admire the beauties of Nova Scotia and of the New England coast line.

I think that in fairness, Mr. Speaker, I should add that the hon. member for Digby-Yarmouth (Mr. Kirk) has been pressing me for a statement on this subject for the last two days. I have suggested to him that he not ask a question in the house concerning it because I hoped to be able to make a statement. I am sorry it was not possible to do so before this morning.

Mr. Balcom: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Balcom: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this is going to be a source of great satisfaction to the people of Nova Scotia—

Some hon. Members: Order. Question.

Mr. Balcom: —and the Annapolis valley as well. When is it expected this ship will be put into operation, and is there going to be refrigeration accommodation?

Mr. Chevrier: The statement I have just made refers to the refrigeration which will be in the ship. It is expected to have it in operation some time in 1953.

Mr. Balcom: I presume that, in so far as possible, architects and engineers from Nova Scotia will be employed?

Mr. Chevrier: I must say that the plans are ready now.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 363, for the relief of Ann Martha Treglown Goodfellow.—Mr. Winkler.

STRAWBERRIES

QUESTION AS TO IMPORTATION FROM HOLLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, apparently there is grave concern among the strawberry growers on the lower mainland of British Columbia over the possibility of the importation of strawberries or strawberry pulp from Holland. Can the Minister of Agriculture give the house a statement on this question now or later today?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) as well as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra telephoned me about this matter and indicated that there was some discussion of the matter in British Columbia. I have made inquiries and I am told that there have been no imports of either frozen or SO_2 strawberries into Canada up to the present time so far as we can find out. I understand that the complaint is not that there has been importation into British Columbia but that British Columbia is not able to sell her berries to eastern manufacturers because of a suggestion that SO_2 or frozen berries may be coming from Holland to the eastern plants.

Up to the present time, so far as I can find out, there has been no such importation. I am making further inquiries as to the possibility of those berries coming in and I will make a further report later.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

ARMY STORES INVESTIGATION—MCDONALD, CURRIE AND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on May 26 the house passed a motion for papers which stood in my name with regard to correspondence concerning the appointment of Mr. Currie. The papers have not yet been produced. I should not imagine that they are very complicated. No objection was taken to the motion. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence if he will look into the matter and have that return made at an early date.

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): The matter will be looked into, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—MEETING WITH OFFICIALS OF GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister state whether the meeting between the officials of the government of India and the Department of External Affairs on Canada's part in the Colombo plan for this year is concluded? If so, is the minister in a position to say what decisions were reached?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A preliminary meeting between representatives of the government departments here which are particularly interested in the Colombo plan and the High Commissioner for India has been held, but no conclusions were reached at that meeting. For one thing, no vote has as yet been passed for the Colombo plan for the year 1952-53. It is, however, hoped that we shall be having further meetings in order to go into this question in greater detail.

KOREA

CANADIAN TROOPS ON KOJE ISLAND—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY DR. ENDICOTT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) but in his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. Has the justice department or the government come to any decision as to whether the communist Endicott is to be prosecuted on account of his statement, made in Winnipeg on Wednesday evening, that Canadian soldiers helped the Americans needlessly slaughter communist prisoners on Koje island?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report of the statement made on Wednesday evening. Which Wednesday was it?

Mr. Fraser: On Wednesday last. I will send the clipping over to the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is Wednesday of this week. I should appreciate it if the hon. member would let me see the report of that statement. I shall be glad to refer it to the Department of Justice to see whether it constitutes anything different from what had already been considered as emanating from this Dr. Endicott.

Mr. Fraser: In the clipping it is mentioned that the justice department was trying to come to some decision. I just wondered if it had done so.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Department and missions abroad—

85. Departmental administration, $2,613,057.

The Chairman: Hon. members will no doubt wish me to point out that these items had been earlier referred to the standing committee on external affairs and have been referred back to this committee after they were carefully considered in the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee quite realizes that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs have been before the standing committee of the house. But as the external affairs department is one in which the whole country is interested as well as the whole world, and as things are changing from day to day, I just wondered whether the minister was going to make a statement at this time before we asked questions.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It had not been my intention to make anything like a general statement at this time. We have had two or three debates this session on external affairs. Only as recently as a few days ago we had an interesting and detailed discussion of European and NATO developments. If the committee agree, I would prefer to make any statement that is required on points that may be brought out in the course of our consideration of the estimates.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the protest which this government sent a few weeks ago to the state department of the United States with regard to the transfer of one company of our 25th brigade to temporary guard duty on Koje island.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs advised the house that the government of the United States had accepted our protest. I believe that was the obvious thing for the government of the United States to do, because they had no alternative. They know perfectly well that a formal, publicized rejection of our protest would simply give the communist propaganda machine more material to use against us. In sending that protest I believe that we have already given them far too much of that kind of material.

I believe that the fact that the United States accepted our protest in no way excuses or justifies the great amount of publicity that attended the sending of that protest. If a government which has reached adult stature in the handling of external affairs wishes to send a protest to an allied government with regard to some matter, I believe that it does so in a quiet, restrained and unpublicized manner.

The only explanation which I can find for this tremendous amount of publicity is that the publicity machines in some of our departments of government are getting a little bit out of hand. First of all, we see the Department of National Health and Welfare flooding the country with pamphlets advertising the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Then in answer to that move we see the Department of External Affairs counter with headline publicity in which their minister is portrayed as the great white father who fights the battles of all Canadians outside of our shores.

It is going to be very interesting to see what the Department of Finance and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration are going to be able to do in order to further boost their ministers in the leadership race as it draws close to the line.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we have a look at the circumstances which have prompted this very unfortunate outburst on the part of our government. The circumstances are these: One company of our 25th brigade was sent by the United Nations commander to share in the police duties on Koje island. This was a temporary assignment, within the theatre of operations, and one which the United Nations commander was quite entitled to make.

His only obligation was first to get in touch with the commander of the British commonwealth division, under whose command our 25th brigade has been for some time, and request that the company should be sent. However, despite this fact, the government sent to the state department of the United States a protest which unfortunately received a great deal of headline publicity.

If this assignment was to have been a permanent one, or if our troops were to be sent outside the theatre of operations, then I believe this protest would have been justified, provided that the United Nations commander had not first received the permission of the Canadian government. However, to send a much publicized protest to the state department because of a temporary assignment, within the theatre of operations, and which was merely to do our share of the police duty necessary on Koje island, does, I feel, Mr. Chairman, make us look rather ridiculous in the eyes of our allies.

It has, I believe, shown a complete lack of understanding of the need of a field commander to feel free to assign troops under his command to normal duties, of a temporary nature, and within the theatre of operations.

I feel sure that during the last war there were many questions of allied policy on which Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill were not in complete agreement, but the public was never aware of these differences. These statesmen knew that nothing feeds the enemy propaganda machine quite so well as to publicize differences between allies, and so they resolved their differences privately.

In conclusion, I say that I sincerely hope this government will learn from these two great statesmen, and when it feels called upon to criticize the action of an allied government in the future, it will do so in a restrained, dignified and unpublicized manner.

Mr. Pearson: I think I had better just say a word about the hon. gentleman's statement. I am grateful to him for his advice on the conduct of diplomacy. As far as I am concerned, I will do my best to follow that very good advice in the future. But his implication that my statement in regard to this matter was made from a desire for publicity is just as unfounded as any statement of mine would be that he had made his statement because of a desire for publicity.

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, I should like to correct the minister. I at no time said that these statements were prompted by the minister, because I frankly do not think that he would prompt such statements. I think that in the departments we have built up publicity machines which sometimes get out of hand, and I think this is one instance when this publicity machine did get out of hand. I am not blaming the minister; I am blaming his publicity machine.

Mr. Sinclair: We accept your apology.

Mr. Hees: It is no apology; just the minister's mistake.

Mr. Pearson: I happen to be the minister of the department which possesses what has been called this publicity machine, which I think consists of a press officer. I am glad to take the responsibility for anything that is done by my department.

The matter that has been referred to need not I think be exaggerated. Our statement, which was made in this house—because when we have important statements to make on matters of direct concern to Canadian interests I think it is desirable to make them in the House of Commons—indicated that we had sent a note, which has been called a note of protest. In fact it was a note expressing our concern that a detachment of Canadian soldiers had been removed from the brigade for duty elsewhere in Korea in circumstances which we thought at that time were such as to make possible prior consultation with the government. But it will be recalled by the committee that in the note we made it quite clear that military considerations must govern these matters, and that in a case of military emergency no formation should expect to operate as a formation if it is necessary to break it up. That exception is understood by us, and I am sure by other governments with forces in Korea. However, when our brigade was sent to Korea its directive in this matter was quite clear. That directive, which was sent to the brigade commander and also to the unified command, was to the effect that the principle of the separate entity of the Canadian forces should at all times be maintained. That is a principle which has been considered of importance to Canadian governments from the time of the first war, and it was laid down in regard to our operations in Korea.

It was considered proper at this time to call attention to that principle, of course always excepting military emergency. That was done. The United States government has expressed its appreciation and understanding of the importance of this principle for us, and at the same time has quite rightly emphasized the overriding importance of military considerations. I think that this exchange of correspondence between the two governments has served a useful purpose, and I do not think that the communists are going to be able to exploit it to any great extent.

As I indicated in my statement, we are happy to have our brigade in Korea take its full share of duty there as a unit of the United Nations forces. That is a principle by which we are also governed. But, subject always to military considerations, we feel it important to make quite clear that the directive which was given to the brigade at the time, namely, that a separate entity should be maintained, should be observed not only in Korea but wherever Canadian troops are serving, because we have learned from experience that that is the best way that Canadian soldiers operate in campaigns outside of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add one word to what has been said. I agree fully with what the minister said about the importance of maintaining our control. The only suggestion I have to make to him —and here I agree with the hon. member for Broadview—is this: It seems to me this was an instance where he might have put the telescope to his blind eye, because it does seem to me it was a very small affair.

Secondly, and on a different point, it also seems to me that, as my colleague said, this surely might have been an instance where whatever communication was to be had might have been had in private. There must have been many instances of much vaster importance during the recent hostilities where leaders of governments did not always see eye to eye, but those differences were not made public, and the ordinary citizen did know of it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on at least four occasions in recent weeks members of this group have asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a statement respecting the attitude of the Canadian government toward the activities of Syngman Rhee. On several, indeed if not on all those occasions, the reply of the minister was that he would prefer to wait until we reached the discussion of his estimates, at which time he would be prepared to make a statement in the matter.

I might remind him that the first time I put a question to him regarding this matter was prior to the occasion when several of the united nations associated in the effort in Korea, indicated their dissatisfaction with Syngman Rhee's disregard of democratic practices. We had hoped that Canada might take the lead in connection with the matter.

At any rate the whole question is very much in the news these days. Almost every day there is an item of significant importance in news broadcasts as to the way in which Syngman Rhee is trying to get rid of any political opposition in that country.

I should like to take a moment to read to the committee an extract or two from the Christian Science Monitor of June 18, 1952, in which the chief far eastern correspondent of that paper, Mr. Henry S. Hayward, sets out some of the background. He says:

> The "communist conspiracy" which President Rhee charges is behind the current South Korean political tempest is largely fictitious.
> The "conspiracy" was conjured up, in other words, to justify the president's action in declaring a state of martial law, in arresting a dozen members of the national assembly, and in seizing emergency political powers.

Mr. Hayward points out that this article is based largely upon an interview he had with Mr. Paul F. Douglass, who is in Korea as one of Mr. Rhee's top political advisers. Having pointed that out, the writer of the article goes on to say:

> Claims that a communist conspiracy exists among members of the national assembly with whom Mr. Rhee is feuding, that the assemblymen have accepted bribes, and that an increase in guerrilla activity threatens South Korea's security—all these are trumped-up charges manufactured to disguise or justify the declaration of martial law, the arrest and intimidation of assemblymen, and the grasping of emergency powers that will permit Mr. Rhee to remain in command, Mr. Douglass explains.

Obviously my reason for reading a few sentences from the Christian Science Monitor is because of the reputation that paper has for objective reporting on matters of this kind. As my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East, my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I have indicated on previous occasions, we feel that this is a matter of great concern to us. We knew when we went into the situation in Korea that we were not going to the defence of a well-organized and properly functioning democracy. We knew that we went in to take a stand against aggression. But I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs must agree with us that it is a pretty hard pill to swallow when we see that we would appear to be defending a regime that is engaging in such undemocratic processes, as is indicated in the news every day. I would hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would now be ready to state the views of the Canadian government in this matter.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, it is quite true that I did indicate on previous occasions that during the discussion of my estimates I would make known our view in the matter. I am glad now to be able to do so.

In the first place, as the hon. member who has just spoken has indicated, we must be clear in our own minds as to the basis of our original intervention in Korea. It was not for the purpose of supporting or removing any Korean government, whether that government was bad or whether it was good; rather it was to defeat aggression and to carry out our obligations as a member of the United Nations.

Although that has been the purpose of United Nations intervention, as a country participating in this collective operation we cannot refrain from indicating our interest in what goes on in Korea itself. We certainly have an interest in such developments, and for at least three reasons. In the first place, the political objective of the United Nations in Korea—and that, of course, is to be contrasted with the military objective—as stated in the United Nations resolutions is to establish in that country a free, united and democratic government.

Secondly, any division and disturbance, to say nothing of civil outbreaks behind the lines, endangers the military position. We must always keep that in mind. It would be an ironic tragedy indeed if United Nations forces in Korea, there to keep the aggressor out, should have to be used to keep the peace among those people whom we are attempting to assist.

Thirdly, we have an interest because, as a member of the United Nations, we are participating in the relief and rehabilitation of Korea itself. So these events, though they may seem to be domestic in a certain sense, are events which must arouse our interest and concern. And they have done that, as is already indicated by the questions asked in the house.

I think it is no exaggeration to say that these developments in South Korea have been unhappy and, in a sense, dangerous to the accomplishment of the United Nations objective there. The situation is not good from that point of view, and it does not seem to be improving—though constructive efforts are being made by United Nations agencies and by other governments to bring about a solution.

The present situation really dates from May 28 when martial law was declared in Pusan and in the area surrounding Pusan, and when certain members of the national assembly were arrested. We made inquiries about these events and, having satisfied ourselves as to what had actually happened, we addressed a communication to the Secretary General of the United Nations. For his part the Secretary General expressed his concern to the United Nations commission for the unification and rehabilitation of Korea in the following words:

> I have been following with deep anxiety the difficulties that exist between the executive and legislative branches of the government of the Republic of Korea and I have constantly and strongly endorsed the efforts of the United Nations commission to co-operate with the government in ensuring conditions of political stability within the country.
> Strict adherence to constitutional and democratic processes are all the more necessary in a country which must nurse and develop all of its resources to join members of the United Nations in repelling aggression and in promoting economic recovery. It is, of course, the responsibility of the Korean people and representatives to choose their own public servants but the United Nations, and especially those members providing assistance in Korea, cannot remain unconcerned when arbitrary methods are used which threaten to destroy the roots of democratic government. From the beginning of the United Nations responsibilities in Korea, there has been a paramount concern, expressed in every discussion on Korea in United Nations organs, that conditions should be created which would encourage the steady development of democratic, constitutional government.

And then he concluded his message by saying:

> You—

That is, the United Nations commission for the unification and rehabilitation of Korea.

> —have my continuing support in your efforts to assist the government in bringing the crisis to an end and in bringing the blessings of good government to the Korean people.
> I should be grateful to have you bring this message to the attention of the president of the republic.

I understand that that was done. We also hoped that the United Nations commission might be successful in its intervention to settle the dispute between President Rhee and his assembly. Syngman Rhee, the head of the Korean government, is a great Korean patriot and indeed has been considered by his people, and I suppose rightly so, as the architect of their freedom. He commands great support in that country and he remains its outstanding personality. Indeed our information is that there is no other comparable personality around which a strong government could rally. Therefore, it would be tragic if the end of the career of this great Korean patriot should be signalized by the destruction of democratic freedom and the rule of law in Korea.

We feel, and other governments which have expressed their concern feel, that if the Korean constitution has to be changed it should be done by lawful process and not by what has been termed, I believe, in the article which my hon. friend just read, a one-man revolution. I am sure that all hon. members will join me in hoping that the president of the Korean republic, who we all realize has held office in a period of great difficulty and cruel suffering by his people, will heed the friendly counsel that has been given and permit the normal processes of democratic government to be upheld in that country at a time when the menace from the north remains so great.

Neither Korea nor the United Nations can afford to have political disturbances behind the lines nor to permit the purpose of the United Nations or the safety of United Nations soldiers to be prejudiced by political intrigue and ambition.

Mr. Fraser: Did the minister hear the radio broadcast this morning when it was stated that Syngman Rhee's supporters in the assembly had swung chairs at their opponents?

Mr. Pearson: I did not hear that broadcast, but I suggest that that is one of the less dangerous manifestations.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs in what he has just said, but I think we should be clear about one thing in our minds. If a dictatorship is set up by Syngman Rhee or anyone else in Korea, that is a dictatorship outside of the communist dictatorship, then all that the United Nations have done in Korea in trying to protect South Korea will have been done in vain. No dictatorship could maintain South Korea against the communists because it would not have the support of the common people of South Korea. We realize that there was not a democratic government in Korea to begin with, but there was a nucleus of democracy. If Syngman Rhee is going to abolish all that and set up a dictatorship, the United Nations might as well move out because everything we shall have done up to date will have been lost.

Mr. Fraser: Is Syngman Rhee trying to have the council, or whatever you call it, elected by popular vote instead of by the assembly as has been done in the past? He is trying to make it more democratic, is he not?

Mr. Pearson: I am not too sure of the details of the Korean situation, but I understand that the president of the republic is elected by the national assembly and not by direct suffrage. I believe that in the ordinary course the national assembly would be choosing a president some time in July and the president feels that it would be better to have the constitution changed so that at some subsequent time the president might be chosen by a direct vote of the people.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, because of the sort of literature that has been coming to us and the press reports which have been published condemning the minister of external affairs, I think someone should stand up in this house and say that we are backing him to the limit in his work and plans for the peace of the world. It may be my nature to be impatient with these peace propagandists, but I think they should get after Russia because of the recent attacks made on Sweden and other places.

If the dominion government through the minister of external affairs had not supported the United States in stopping aggression in Korea, where would Korea be today? Where would Sweden be? Where would Norway be? Where would Finland be? Where would Denmark be? Where would we be later on? I know that the great Peacemaker says, blessed are the peacemakers, but He also said:

> Neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

I have admired the outstanding patience of the minister and I hope he will just carry on cheerfully and thoroughly and be one of those ready to say to those who deserve it: So far shall you come and no further.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, in view of the criticism which has been voiced about the minister's handling of the Koje matter, I desire to commend the minister upon his management of Canadian external affairs in connection with the situation relative to the United Nations actions concerning the use of Canadian forces when dealing with the Koje situation. I urge the minister to guard with utmost exactitude the sovereignty of Canada in all of his external contacts and relations.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take up with the minister a question which has been raised before concerning the safety of Canadians in China. This question in the main has revolved around the fate of Canadian missionaries in China. I want to make it perfectly clear that although my remarks will relate to the fate of Canadian missionaries, I am not concerned exclusively with missionaries or those of any one religious denomination, but with the fate of the comparatively large number—I use the words "large number" under the circumstances—of Canadians still in China.

I do not think it is necessary to rehearse at this time the discussion I had previously which was based on the statement made by the Prime Minister on April 21 as to the situation of some Canadian missionaries and sisters in Chinese prisons. On the basis of that statement it was suggested that the Prime Minister was minimizing the dangers and hardships they were undergoing. I have had correspondence with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs on that point, and it certainly appears that every effort is being made, within the limits of current policy, first to find out exactly what the situation is, and then to do what can be done, again within the limits of current policy, to make certain that the treatment of Canadians is mitigated so far as possible. My remarks now are directed rather toward the limits of current policy.

The minister has consistently stated in discussing these matters that, because of the unpredictable nature of the communist regime in China, because it is not prone to have regard to what other governments say about it and to follow their advice, it has been his feeling and the feeling of his department that to criticize or make strong statements with respect to the treatment accorded to Canadians in China would probably do more harm than good and would prejudice the safety of Canadian nationals rather than improve their position. I think there is room for controversy regarding that policy quite apart from the question whether or not we have done all we can to look after our people over there. It is suggested that the policy of soft words and of extreme caution in discussing these matters which has been followed by the minister has, instead of assisting Canadian nationals in China, made their position worse because it has been taken by the communist government as an indication of weakness or lack of interest.

I know that you cannot make predictions as to how this peculiar form of ideology will react in the people who profess it. We cannot tell how they are going to react to anything we may say, but it certainly comes to mind that the communists believe in displays of toughness. They follow that policy themselves and I think we have seen through the communists' own methods in other situations that the only thing which the communists respect is strength. While I know we are not in a position to intervene actively in China, nevertheless it does occur to me that we might apply the same policy to our expressions of concern and our intentions with respect to looking after the welfare of our nationals in China. In this regard I was interested in an article appearing on page 3 of the May 31st issue of The Ensign. It is a dispatch from Hong Kong and reads as follows:

A clear call to the press of the west to "tell the world" of the bitter and cruel persecution of the Christian church and its missionaires in China has been issued here by the editorial board of the China Missionary Bulletin.

I am sorry that I have to confess that I am not absolutely certain of my facts but I believe that the China Missionary Bulletin is not a Catholic organ although it is referred to in The Ensign which is a Catholic paper. I believe I can say that it carries additional weight in the sense that it represents several denominations. The article continues:

"Conditions for the church and for humanity in China are so bad that the world must be told about them," the board declares. Although there must be "due regard for the well-being of the heroic bishops, priests and people there," nonetheless, "the sad and painful" story must be told. "Suppression of clearly confirmed news will not serve to lighten the burden of the priests and people there," the board writes. "But it will play into the very hands of the communist terrorists who consistently use fear as a trump card. This must be understood: the free world can no longer afford to be duped by the Red game. The tendency to hold back news for fear of reprisals must be re-examined and re-evaluated," the board says pointing out that "Catholic missioners generally have not been prone to science. The differences between the world visions of communism and Christianity are so irreconcilable and the stakes are so high that there can be no minimizing of the horrors of communist terror. Remaining silent more often than not means falling victim to the communist game."

In the same issue on the same page there is also a report of an interview with two nuns who were imprisoned in China in which they themselves say that it is necessary and desirable that there should be the maximum publicity given to the maltreatment accorded to Canadian missionaries by the communist authorities in China. When you have the missionaries themselves, who it seems to me are the ones who know the conditions and who are the ones who would suffer if the policy should be wrong, saying that a policy of giving maximum publicity is not wrong, then I think we must consider very carefully whether we are following the right course in using cautious expressions and the gentle word, which has been the policy followed by the minister to date.

I do not want to do the minister an injustice and confuse two things. I believe that there must be caution in that what we say is based on fact. We must not make statements as to numbers or conditions when we do not know that those statements are absolutely accurate. However, I believe that once the fact is established—and there have been several facts established with respect to persecution and ill treatment—then I believe the strongest of language and the strongest of condemnation is called for. It is that policy that I would ask the minister to review and to say whether he does not feel that the time has now arrived for the strongest possible condemnation of the maltreatment which these Canadians have been receiving in China, not just because they are missionaries but because they are Canadian nationals and are engaged in works of charity and mercy.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Before the minister replies, I should like to draw his attention to one feature of the same subject. What co-operation exists between the Canadian government and the United States government which is also interested and which is responsible for many United States nationals who are in that country? During the past week I had a letter from the Passionist organization. Bishop O'Gara of Ottawa is the head of that organization in China. Together with five other Passionist fathers he has been under house arrest for the last two years. When the minister is replying will he tell us what the existing policy is with regard to co-operation with the United States in this respect?

Mr. Pearson: I welcome the opportunity to make a statement on this important matter, and I might deal first with the points that have been made last. I would say that we have maintained close co-operation with the United States in respect of the nationals of both our countries who are in China. We exchange information and views as to what can most effectively be done. We are both in the same position in the sense that neither government has any representation in China. As I recall, the last intervention that was made was made on behalf of the United States and Canada by the United Kingdom representative in Peking.

In so far as the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops are concerned, I do not admit that we have indulged in soft words as the best means of assisting Canadians in China. If the hon. gentleman will read some of the statements that have been made in the house I think he will find some words which could hardly be considered as soft because the treatment that has been meted out to certain Canadians in China and to other westerners would not deserve soft words in describing it. It has been brutal treatment. It is bad enough, however, without exaggerating it, and that brutal treatment has not been applied to all Canadians.

It has been suggested outside the house in journalistic quarters that we have intervened too weakly and, I believe, that we have only intervened recently. The fact is we have intervened a good many times through the channels which are open to us. We have intervened in more than one way, not merely through the United Kingdom representative in Peking, though I am not in a position for obvious reasons to make public all the machinery that we have used in this matter. It has been suggested that we should have been stronger in our intervention and stronger in our denunciations and protests. The hon. member for Kamloops has indicated that communists are only impressed by a display of force. I agree with that, but I should add that my experience is that they have never been very much impressed by displays of verbal force alone. They carefully examine the material force which is behind the words you use. If you have not got ways and means of carrying out your statements, then they will not be impressed by them.

Mr. Fulton: I was speaking of the force of the statement, and not of any threat behind the statement.

Mr. Pearson: In the interventions and statements we have made, we have acted on the best advice we could obtain from our own experts and from other governments which were helping us, as to the manner of protest most effectively designed to help those we were trying to help. In the notes that we have sent, and in the statements we have made, the language we have used has been at least as strong as that used by other governments in the representations they have made.

In the letter which I wrote the hon. member for Kamloops dated May 9, and which I think has been made public, I concluded with the following words:

> You will agree, I am sure, that our primary concern in this matter must be for the safety and well-being of the more than one hundred Canadians still in China. From the outset of the troubles in that country, this has, in my opinion, made it desirable to keep statements upon as realistic and factual a basis as possible. These unfortunate people are exposed in a position where no one can help them if the communist authorities choose to ill-treat them. Therefore the utmost circumspection in public discussion is obviously desirable, and more restraint has to be shown than our feelings in the matter would dictate.

In this same letter to the hon. member I attempted to remove any impression that the Prime Minister's earlier statement might have left that we were a little cool to some of the mistreatment to which Canadians had been subjected. I included the following words:

> It is not easy to measure degrees of maltreatment. When the Prime Minister used the words "Canadians had not in general been physically maltreated," he was thinking of torture or anything causing bodily harm or permanent disability and he gave, I think, an accurate picture of the situation of the great majority of Canadians in China. However, I am well aware that the three Sisters of the Immaculate Conception who reached Hong Kong two months ago were subjected, if not to physical maltreatment, to the most degrading ordeals during and after their "trial." They were paraded through the streets where the mob was encouraged to spit upon them and to pelt them with filth. Others have suffered similar experiences. We understand that they have borne up well despite the hardships they have undergone, and it is thought, certainly it is hoped, that they will suffer no serious after-effects.

For obvious reasons, Mr. Chairman, we can never be absolutely certain of our information, but the factual situation in regard to the number of Canadians remaining in China seems to be as follows: On March 12, there were 168 Canadians still in China. On June 9, there were 121, so during the previous three months some had been able to get out. Of those 121, 40 are Catholic nuns; 39 are Catholic priests; 6 are Protestant missionaries with 1 dependent; 6 are non-Asiatic Canadians and 29 are Chinese Canadians. It is reported that of this number still in China, 7 are in prison, 4 sisters and 3 priests; 15 are under house arrest, 3 sisters and 12 priests. During the last few months 9 Canadians who had been in prison have arrived at Hong Kong, 3 sisters, 2 Protestant missionaries and 4 priests.

Mr. Fraser: Would that include the 4 who were sent out of China from the labour camp, and who arrived yesterday?

Mr. Pearson: I am not sure, but I do not think so because this information antedates that news as it appeared in the press.

As regards the general situation in China, the attitude of the Chinese communist authorities to Canadians, and the kind of life that Canadians have been living in China and the treatment they have received, I cannot do any better than to commend to hon. gentlemen as an antidote to the vapourings and ravings of Dr. Endicott on this situation of paradise which he has found in China, a very restrained report, which is all the more impressive because it is restrained in sense and in language, written by a missionary who has an abiding love and understanding of the Chinese people because he has been there many years. This report is by Dr. Kilborn, a medical missionary, and it has been circulated within the last few days by the board of overseas missions of the United Church of Canada. I have read no more impressive report of conditions in China, and no more damning indictment of the reason for the deterioration of those conditions and of the attitude of the Chinese communists towards westerners.

Mr. Drew: We have had several answers which have explained the position of the government in regard to specific points, Mr. Chairman, which have been raised this morning. But it is in regard to the wider implications of this discussion that I should like to address my remarks. At the very outset I wish to suggest that we ought to ask ourselves what it is we really are discussing on this lovely June morning. What is it that is before the house at this time?

This is the first item in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. It is the first opportunity that has been presented for several weeks—in fact, one might say two or three months—for a general discussion of external affairs. For that reason I believe we should ask ourselves exactly what it is that is before us. We are discussing survival. We are discussing our survival as a free nation, and the survival of western civilization; that is what we are discussing. Yet, we have an atmosphere of almost complete unreality in dealing with survival itself.

It is true that the first item of the estimates deals with the financial problems of the department, but it is the basis of a general debate. Events have occurred that have profoundly affected the position of this country and of the free world. The attention of the minister was drawn to something that he has done. It was pointed out that in the opinion of one hon. member it had not been wise to seize on this opportunity to publicly announce criticism of the course followed by the United States army in its direction of military affairs in Korea. I do not think the opening words of the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be passed over without comment. In reply to something which certainly should have been raised in this chamber, because it is something that has been commented upon generally in the press throughout Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in commenting upon the statement made by the hon. member for Broadview, said, "I am grateful to him for his advice on diplomacy." No hon. member sitting in this committee was unaware of the sarcasm behind that remark. That sarcasm was recognized by the laughter on the other side of the chamber which greeted his statement.

I wish to refer to that comment for this reason. Any attempt that has been made by the members of this party to present a unified front in principle on every possible occasion, so that no comfort could be taken by Russia or any other possible enemy in any evidence of disunity with regard to matters of basic principle, should not, I hope, be taken by the government as an admission that we are to be treated like children and are to be admonished any time we point out to the government things that we think should be corrected.

After all, truth is largely the result of open and free controversy. The very purpose of freedom of speech and freedom of exchange of ideas by every means of communication now open to us is not merely that people may have the pleasure of speech but that truth may result from the exchange of discussion and the exchange of ideas which take place in that way. When it comes to questions of principle, we want to be sure that, wherever it is possible, there be unity and agreement without regard to party affiliation so that it may be known that Canada stands united in every effective step that may be taken for the defence of freedom and of our civilization.

But we must examine what it was that the minister regarded as something which it was almost an affront to mention. The handling of a single infantry company was the occasion for headlines in relation to something that could easily have been dealt with by a private exchange of correspondence or by a telephone call. Whether the intention was what has been suggested by some editorials or whether it was not, the fact remains that this protest was regarded by responsible publications in the United States as something which was hardly in keeping with the relationship between Canada and the United States.

It should not at any time be suggested that we take our directions from comments in the United States. Nevertheless, at a time when we are seeking to strengthen the great partnership of the free nations of the western world, we must not ignore the effect of statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, by the Prime Minister or by any other member of the government which speaks for the whole of Canada in international affairs. For that reason I would point out that this is not a case of someone presuming to come into this chamber and advise the minister on diplomacy. Even though the minister may not think that it is for him to take advice of that kind, I would point out that others have expressed their comments on this matter. For instance, a responsible publication in the capital of the United States, namely the Washington Post, referred to the note so much publicized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as a silly note. It went further; and I quote from what was said in an editorial in the Washington Post in relation to this statement:

> Actually the Canadian protest to the United States about dispatch of Canadian troops to Koje without prior approval from Ottawa was more than a trifle silly.
> The request reportedly was cleared with the British commonwealth commander in Korea who seemingly neglected to inform Ottawa. It would be ridiculous, of course, if a field commander had to seek government approval for every tactical disposition of troops. Either Canadian troops are part of a U.N. army or they are not. If they are, then the principle of international command must apply just as it applies to other troops in Korea.

That is the end of the quotation that I propose to read from that editorial. I mention this editorial which expressed sentiments similar to those which appeared elsewhere in the United States. I think that we as a nation must be extremely careful, and that the government which expresses the voice of Canada on behalf of all of us in international affairs must be extremely careful—and I think it is our duty to say that they must be careful—when they are dealing with something in relation to military activity in an area in which such an overwhelming preponderance of the responsibility for success rests in the hands of the government of the United States and the military commanders of the United States.

We are proud—and justifiably so—of the manner in which young Canadians have on this occasion carried forward the great traditions of this country, as they have done whenever we have been called upon as a people to assume our military responsibilities. The fact remains, however, that the overwhelming burden is being borne by the people of the United States. We must be extremely careful that we do not suggest to them that we are unconscious of the burden they are carrying or the sacrifices they are making. I also think that we should be extremely careful that we do not at any time say things which would in any way interfere with this great friendship of ours.

The only reason that I have raised this matter at this time is that when this point was raised this morning, the Secretary of State for External Affairs brushed it off as though it was almost an affront that it was raised here. I suggest that the House of Commons and the people of Canada who are behind Canadian efforts to build up the combined strength of the nations of the western world would have welcomed some indication by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he himself thought the protest was a little bit silly and that we are not going to see any repetition of incidents of that kind.

We are now coming to the close of another session, and what is happening at this time is just exactly what we predicted would happen toward the close of this session. It will be recalled that at the very beginning of this session, on a number of occasions, we urged that the government place before the house the business with which we would be called upon to deal in a manner that would give us a continuing sense of reality, the opportunity for early debate and for the presentation of arguments which not only could impress themselves upon the members of the house but also convey to the people of Canada—through the press, the radio and otherwise—information with regard to the subjects which were before those who have been sent here as their elected representatives to do the business of Canada. At the time those suggestions were made, they were treated with scorn by the government. In fact, the attitude taken was that we were being rather presumptuous in telling the government what it should do about the business of the house.

Here we find ourselves with several important committees still meeting, which draw members from this chamber. We find ourselves with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence still to be dealt with, as well as other important departments. All this has helped to create the atmosphere of unreality in which this present debate is now projected. It has been the result either of planned frustration or of complete failure by the government to understand how the business of this house can be carried forward in an orderly and efficient manner. It is one or the other. Hon. members are left to guess until the last minutes of the session at night what they are going to deal with the following day. Debates cannot be planned. Important measures are brought forward at the last moment.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the leader of the opposition. It seems to me that he has now embarked upon what might be termed the general conduct of the business of the house, and it does not relate to the debate on external affairs, no matter how wide the debate may be on this first item. I would therefore ask him to come back to the subject of external affairs.

Mr. Drew: I was pointing out the reason for the atmosphere of unreality which must be apparent to every member who is sitting in this house, and I said all that I propose to say in regard to the incompetence and the planned frustration which have resulted in this situation.

Today we have reason for hope, and great reason for hope, that the growing strength of the western allies is going to fulfil the hopes and dreams of those who have supported the principles that have been put forward on behalf of Canada by this government. But there is no reason to treat this situation lightly. Too often subjects of the most far-reaching consequence have been dealt with in a casual manner, which has helped to convey to the people of Canada the impression that there is not that measure of urgency which I believe should be in the mind of every Canadian at this time. I would recall merely as an example, that when a situation arose in Berlin a short time ago which easily could have provided the spark that would have ignited all the combustible material that has been built up in that area, the Secretary of State for External Affairs summed up the situation in these words:

> There will undoubtedly be fireworks, but there is no reason for panic over the giant crackers or for relief over the rockets that burst in the form of a dove.

Words of that kind may possibly be useful on occasion. Apt expressions often are more useful than extended arguments in illustrating a point. I do suggest, however, that the gravity of the present situation is such that on every occasion when the events of the moment are described by the Secretary of State for External Affairs he should use words which will leave no doubt in the minds of the public that these are not fireworks, but that we are confronted with the most critical situation that has ever confronted free nations except in time of general war.

It is even possible that never before have we been confronted with as critical a situation as today, because if we lose this struggle we lose freedom not only for years but for generations.

So that we may get this subject in its proper perspective I should like to quote from a book which has just been published by Drew Middleton, the head of the New York Times European bureau, under the title "Defence of Western Europe". I do so because he is generally regarded as one of the most competent observers of international affairs. He has written this book as a result of interviews with officers and civilians who have escaped from behind the iron curtain. He has written it as a result of confidential discussion with men of the highest authority. For that very reason it is one of the very significant books of this year, and perhaps of many years. I should like to quote from this very recent and very important book, pointing out that we are now in the most vital period of this cold war, which can become a hot war at any time.

[Mr. Drew.]

He points out that we are at the same stage in relation to Russian preparation that we were in relation to German preparation two years before the outbreak of the last war. He points out that the production of Soviet Russia and its satellites is rapidly mounting to a crescendo, and that within two years it will have reached its peak. For that very reason, if Russia contemplates war, 1954 is the target year for any efforts that we should be making.

He does not approach this subject with the thought that war is inevitable. On the contrary, what he is trying to do with all the vigour, with all the earnestness and with all the sense of reality of one of the really great war correspondents and military observers of modern times, is to point out to the people of the free world, while there is yet time, that we are not going to coast by any easy route into the distant lands of promised peace; but that if we are going to have the kind of peace that we want we are going to pay for it in effort and in money.

What he seeks to point out by the most earnest argument is that we must put forward every effort with a sense of the utmost urgency; that there can be no easy course, and that we are certainly going to feel the strain of our effort if that effort is to be successful. In a nutshell, what he tells us is to remember that those who have examined the records tell us today that if only the free world had displayed such unity in 1939 they could have prevented the war even with all the German preparations. The question is whether, with that evidence so recently before our eyes, we are going to prevent another war, when preparations on an immensely greater scale are taking place within exactly the same pattern today.

Then he refers to the statements of General Mast, the great French general. We may well listen to what he says about General Mast's observations, just as we might wish today that we had listened to the advice of General de Gaulle in the days before the last world war. The French army's collapse in 1940 was certainly not the fault of that officer of great foresight and great vision who predicted the manner in which any armoured threat might be met and might be overcome. He made his predictions in words that unfortunately were picked up and copied by General Guderian and other German armoured commanders for the purpose of organizing their forces in a manner that brought such dramatic and terrible success. I refer to that because perhaps the very fact that General Mast is no longer an active member of the French general staff may incline some to forget the importance that is attached by many people to the views that he has put forward. I quote now from Drew Middleton's book, and shall continue to quote until I indicate that the quotation is ended:

> The first point made by General Mast is that although our present concepts of Soviet power are based on the peacetime strength of the Russian military, naval and air services, we should be confronted, after a partial mobilization, with 250 divisions of ground troops, 20,000-30,000 aircraft and more than 300 submarines. After three months of full mobilization there would be 350 divisions; this figure would rise to 500 divisions by the end of the first year of war.
> This is the basis, General Mast points out, on which the West must make its calculations if it wishes to avoid, in an infinitely more important arena, the underestimates made at the beginning of the Korean war.

I am still quoting from Drew Middleton's book where he refers to General Mast's book:

> Although this book is concerned principally with Europe and its defences, it is worth quoting General Mast's appreciation of the direction of the Soviet attacks in time of war. He lists them as:
> 1. A naval, air and ground attack in the Arctic aimed at the capture of Alaska and Iceland.
> 2. An air-ground attack in the Middle East aimed at the occupation of Persia, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and the isthmus of Suez.
> 3. An air-ground attack on western Europe and North Africa aimed at the conquest of all Europe and the elimination of western military power from the entire North African shore of the Mediterranean.
> 4. A harassing action in East Asia (Korea and Japan) accompanied by indirect action, carried out by China, in southeast Asia.
> 5. World-wide naval action by submarines against the seaborne transport of the anti-Soviet coalition.
> It is General Mast's contention that the Soviet union will be capable of undertaking all these operations simultaneously. He divides the forces allotted to these operations as follows:
> Alaska and Iceland, 3 to 6 divisions and 1,500 aircraft;
> The Middle East, 40 to 60 divisions and 5,000 aircraft;
> The Far East, 20 Soviet divisions and 5,000 aircraft, plus Chinese reinforcements.
> For the European theatre of operations, General Mast divides the effort in this way:
> Scandinavia, 15 to 17 divisions and 1,000 aircraft;
> Western Europe, 120 divisions, initially, gradually increased to 180-190 divisions plus 10,000 aircraft;
> The Balkans, 35 divisions plus 1,500 aircraft plus the armies of the satellite states. These latter we will discuss in detail later.
> Thus a general officer of the highest professional qualifications. The numbers seem like figures in a nightmare, rising and falling before one's eyes. Yet they represent the capacity of the great power complex with which we are now faced.

That is the end of the quotation from Drew Middleton's book that I propose to put on the record. These are Drew Middleton's words: "The numbers seem like figures in a nightmare, rising and falling before one's eyes". Yes, they are a nightmare. Those in this chamber who saw the effect of military superiority when it was directed by the German general staff from 1914 to 1918 and again from 1939 to 1945 know what military superiority at the outset of any war really means. They know the terror; they know the anguish; they know the horror of trying to build defence forces under pressure of that kind, of trying to meet the threat of superiority of that nature, which constantly approaches nearer to complete and utter victory.

Right across this country today there is a challenge to those who have seen what that kind of thing means, a challenge to create in the minds of our people—and there is a similar challenge in other free nations to create in the minds of their people—a sense of urgency and a sense of reality in the face of nightmare figures of that kind.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, and with such truth, that Russia is never very much impressed by verbal force. He told us just a short time ago that they examine what real force lies behind the statements that are made. I am suggesting that the statements that are made here at this time, statements that are made with that nightmare reality before us and with other balancing considerations before us, must be assessed with a full recognition of what it is we are trying to do, and the purpose towards which the combined efforts of the free nations are directed, both in the Atlantic and the Pacific areas at the present time.

One hon. member said a short time ago that we should say to Russia, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." By all means, let us say that. But with what? If the Secretary of State for External Affairs is correct in his analysis of the Russian position, then, unless we are resting entirely upon our confidence in the atomic bomb, let us assess quite carefully what it is we are hoping to do to meet figures of the kind I have just put forward.

What I wish to emphasize particularly is that the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence do go hand in hand in preparing for the defence of freedom of the Canadian people at this time. It is the function of the Department of External Affairs to make the international arrangements and to assist in creating the pattern within which our military contribution forms part of the great international framework devoted to the hope of peace and security.

We all recognize that with a population of 14 million people, as compared with the 160 million in the United States, the more than 50 million in Great Britain, the nearly 50 million in France, the more than 50 million in Italy, and all the other millions in the other free nations of western Europe, we are of course only a part, and perhaps a relatively small part, in that great team which is now building its strength for the defence of all the free nations which are confronted with the threat represented by the figures I have just placed on record.

We certainly will support what is done in that respect. But to give reality to the enormous sums which will soon be asked from this House of Commons for purposes of national defence, it is important that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in a much clearer manner than has yet been done, should put before the house exactly the pattern into which this military contribution is going to fit.

On earlier occasions members of this party have put forward the contention that we should be re-examining our military organizations, that we should be remembering that military logistics suggest that our effort should be directed to the building up of the most compact, hard-hitting and mobile forces in view of the fact that, of necessity, in any combined effort, they will likely be moved far from the shores of Canada to keep any threat away from us.

The possibility of having a discussion in regard to that subject in terms of complete reality would suggest the advisability of our knowing much more than we now know of what was really discussed at Lisbon, what was discussed earlier here in Ottawa and what was discussed elsewhere, so that we may not simply have the bland assurance that what we are doing meets with the approval of the NATO organization. Rather we want to know what the real plan is and be ready to support it and contribute our part to that plan consistent with the best possible use of the industrial and other opportunities that we do possess.

In saying this I wish to place before the committee at this time the suggestion that we remember the vital importance of Europe to Canada, to the United States and to the free world, not merely as the home from which our civilization sprang but rather as to what it means today in the contribution it could make to the combined strength of the free world. It is not just the great historic territory west of the iron curtain; it is not just the area in which our culture found its expression before it came to this continent; it is not just the area where 200 million vigorous, educated and cultured people live and are bound to live in the future.

Let us think of what it means to the balance of military power if under any circumstances, either by military aggression or by political action, western Europe, the cradle of our civilization, came under the domination of the Kremlin. Think of what it would mean in terms of the great gun plants, of the great armament factories, of the aircraft factories and of the naval bases. Think of what it would mean if all that production were under integrated control. Think of what it would mean if throughout the whole of Europe, from which modern industry emerged, they were pouring out guns, tanks, aircrafts, machines of war as well as ships and the other military requirements of world power.

Let us remember, simply as an example, what the occupation of Poland, of Czechoslovakia, and of East Germany has meant to Russia where they have been able to take over the Bergenhutton steel plant of Poland, the Skoda plant at Pilsen and the great gun and armament plants of East Germany. The reason our troops and the troops of the United Nations are undergoing such difficulties in Korea today, the main reason perhaps why the communists may well be planning the delays that are now taking place, is that the highly developed industrial and military skill of East Germany, Czechoslovakia and southern Poland are now under the most dreadful compulsion to work for the Soviet empire.

Think of what it would mean if all the great gun plants of the whole of Germany, of France, of Italy, of Belgium, of Holland, yes and of Britain as well, were under unified control. Think of what it would mean if all those plants were producing aircraft to a single design. Think of what it would mean if they were producing submarine parts in all countries of Europe to be assembled at the naval bases in the Baltic, on the Atlantic coast and in the Mediterranean.

This is not a distant possibility; this is an immediate possibility unless the plans we are making bear fruit and preserve us from the threat that is constantly before our eyes. The Schuman plan for the unification of steel production in Europe has not yet reached fulfilment but it would become a dreadful reality under the most terrifying form of integration. Think of what that would achieve under the awful compulsion by which they would employ the brains to direct those operations.

I have reviewed these possibilities simply to suggest that we get back to reality. We are not discussing ordinary administrative problems of government, we are discussing nothing less than the survival of our civilization. Canada will never stand alone. Canada has indicated, and the government has expressed, that opinion with the full and unqualified support of the members of this house. But there has been plenty of evidence that the people of Canada have not found in the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or in the interpretation of our position by this government that sense of urgency and reality which conveys to their minds the necessity for the amount of co-operation which will prevent a third world war.

Whatever differences of opinion there may have been, and some of those differences have been expressed in recent days, whatever may have been said this morning about our desire for a more dignified and more co-operative point of view on Canada's part which recognizes our place on this great team of free nations, it is with our eyes on the future and the understanding of all that another world war would mean that I urge with all the sense of urgency I can express that we keep in mind what Canada has suffered already in two world wars and realize how much more terrible a third world war would be.

I am simply urging that in our discussion of the affairs of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence we keep before our eyes at all times the fact that nothing less than the most effective use of the great strength of the free nations will prevent another world war and keep that peace which is our one and only purpose.

There are many people in Canada today whose relatives live beyond the iron curtain. They ask themselves what hope there is of being reunited eventually, within their own lives, with those they left in the lands where they were born.

Today in this country people of German stock whose relatives are now in Eastern Germany, people of Polish stock, of Hungarian, Bulgarian, Roumanian, Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian, Ukrainian and Chinese stocks, yes, of Russian stock as well, are all asking whether the present division of this old world of ours is permanent or whether the efforts that we are making to prevent war and preserve peace is something that offers some hope, in the years ahead, of their being able to rejoin their relatives, meet them again and establish those contacts that decent human beings all wish to maintain. In the plans that we are making today I think we should offer hope not only that these plans contemplate a static peace but also that in due course the strength of our position may offer the opportunity to all nations to determine their own form of government and the way they will live as they were promised in the charter of the United Nations when it was signed in San Francisco in the spring of 1945.

This surely is a hope that will give new spirit, encouragement and faith to many people today who are constantly suffering the anguish of complete separation from those who are so dear to them. In that regard I think we should remember that for long years in the past there have been great associations of nations which maintained peace by the strength of their defences. Then in the course of years there were improvements in the relations between those nations, and ultimately they came closer and closer together. In the early days of the present century we came very close to establishing the kind of world in which there would be a constant freedom of movement, in which people could not only exchange ideas but also move freely from land to land. It is difficult for us to realize today that in the early days of the present century it was possible for a person to move around this world of ours without a passport, and that it was even possible for people to move with almost complete freedom in Russia itself when they visited that country.

That is a kind of world we have almost forgotten but that was a kind of world which emerged, with all its weaknesses and all its faults, at a time when the combined strength of free nations preserved peace against the threat of aggression. I would hope that we may not only look to a static peace in which there will be great armed camps on one side of the iron curtain and great armed camps on the other side but that we may also look forward to the day, distant though it may be, when in God's good time the fortitude, understanding of their purpose and the combined strength of the free nations will not only offer the hope of peace and security to us but will bring to those nations now in slavery the promised peace and freedom which they were assured by the charter of the United Nations.

It is with that dream, it is with that hope of a day when even the people of Russia may find that freedom which they have so richly earned by their own sacrifices in time of war, that I urge that we cast our eyes toward the very real world in which we live at this time, and that we discuss all these problems in terms of cold reality. At times when one hears some of the exchanges that take place, when one hears explanations that seem to have so little regard for the fantastic figures of the military might to which we are opposed, it almost seems as though the one thing that would do any good would be for all men to go out and shout at the top of their lungs, through megaphones amplified by every loud speaking device that would give their voices strength: "For the love of all that is dear and sacred to the people of Canada today, wake up!"

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I think at least the earlier remarks of the hon. gentleman deserve some comment from me, and for the next minute or two I propose to make that comment. He indicated that when this discussion began and the question of the dispatch of a Canadian contingent to Koje was raised by the hon. member for Broadview, my opening observations on that subject gave the impression of sarcasm, and that I was merely interested in brushing off what the hon. member for Broadview said as an affront. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that when he mentioned my opening words he should also have mentioned the opening words of the hon. member who preceded me and who in those words stated that this action of the Canadian government in defence of a principle to which it is committed, and to which I think the Canadian people are committed, was inspired by a publicity machine. If those remarks had not been made by the hon. member for Broadview, possibly my opening remarks might not have been made in the same tone as they were. That, I think, sufficiently explains the way this subject was introduced by me.

The leader of the opposition indicated that we on this side will not accept either advice or criticism on such an important matter as foreign affairs. I assure him—and I do not need to assure the committee—that the government on this particular subject, as on other subjects, is always very glad indeed to accept criticism and advice. We have no illusions of either omniscience or infallibility. The Koje matter arose—and I do not wish to labour the point—because of a principle to which we attach importance, and we declared our support of that principle and our understanding of its importance by a statement in the house. The hon. gentleman has stated, and I have no quarrel with him in the statement, that it has caused a great deal of attention, especially in the United States. He has read from an estimable and highly regarded United States newspaper, the Washington Post, which described our intervention on this occasion as a silly note. I submit that the Washington Post rather misunderstood the Canadian position, but if the hon. gentleman wishes to associate himself with that description of our intervention to protect the entity of the Canadian brigade in circumstances which were not governed by military considerations I have no quarrel with him.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, I am not going to allow that kind of remark to stand unchallenged. I did not associate myself with that statement, and the Hansard record will make quite clear the way in which I introduced that remark. I would suggest that an observation of that kind is exactly the kind of observation that carries this debate away from the level that should be maintained. Mr. Chairman, it is one o'clock and I suggest that we rise.

Mr. Pearson: Before we rise, in reply to the question of privilege, I suggest if the hon. gentleman does not associate himself with the statement of the Washington Post then that is quite satisfactory to me. All I know is that he read it with apparent approval.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Hees: I should like to refer back briefly, Mr. Chairman, to a discussion we had this morning on the Koje incident. I am trying to satisfy myself about this question of the timing of the protest which was sent to the United States government. In a moment I shall ask the minister to answer one or two questions.

On May 26 the minister made a statement in the house, as recorded at page 2552 of Hansard for that day. He said:

> The government feels that it is essential that the Canadian policy in respect of the breaking up of the Canadian brigade for miscellaneous duties in Korea should be made clear. A note has accordingly been presented to the state department in Washington.

From that, one would assume that a formal diplomatic note had been sent off by the time the minister spoke in the house at three o'clock in the afternoon. However, two days later there is a United Press dispatch from Washington which reads as follows:

> The state department said today that it sympathizes with Canada's objections to the assignment of Canadian troops to the Koje island prison camp. However, department spokesman Mr. Michael J. McDermott said that it has not given Canada any formal assurances pending the arrival of a formal diplomatic note.

On the afternoon of May 28, as recorded at page 2659 of Hansard for that day, the hon. member for Peel asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs the following question:

> May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not he has found out what has caused the delay in the mails between Ottawa and Washington with respect to some of his recent correspondence with the United States government?

The minister replied as follows:

> As far as I know there has been no delay whatever in this matter. I assume the hon. member is referring to the statement which I made on Monday. That statement was in the hands of the United States state department in Washington, and indeed in the hands of the United States embassy in Ottawa, before it was given to the house.

You will notice that the minister mentions a "statement" but not a note. Later on that same day we had another United Press dispatch from Washington which was filed at ten o'clock at night and which says:

> Canada sent a formal note to the United States today, demanding that it be consulted on any future decisions to split up units of Canadian forces serving in Korea.

As I understand it, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, there is a difference between a formal diplomatic note and a statement. As I understand it, a statement is a sort of memorandum, sent between one government and another, and which requires no answer. A formal diplomatic note is a formal message between two governments that requires an answer.

From the news dispatches I have read, and the statements in the house, I am led to believe that, although the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a statement to the house on Monday, May 26, a formal diplomatic note was not received by the state department in Washington until forty-eight hours later. Perhaps a statement might have been received, but not the formal diplomatic note which was required. Can the minister clarify that situation?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I think I can clear up the point that is troubling the hon. member. The timing of those events to which he has referred is as follows: Before the statement which I gave to the house upon the Koje matter was made on May 26 our ambassador in Washington had left a copy of that statement with the state department. In diplomatic parlance, I suppose it would have been called an oral note—a note of the statement that I was to make that afternoon in the House of Commons in Ottawa. A copy of that statement was handed also to a representative of the United States embassy in Ottawa. It is, therefore, strictly accurate to say—no matter what press reports may have stated to the contrary—that the statement which was made in the House of Commons in Ottawa was made after its contents had been conveyed to the United States government through the state department and through the United States embassy in Ottawa.

When the state department received this oral note from the ambassador they said that if a formal reply were desired it would be preferable to resubmit the oral note in the form of a formal diplomatic note. That was done the next day, and a formal reply was received the day before yesterday. The actual terms of the statement, in the form of an oral note delivered by the ambassador to the state department and by this department to the United States embassy here, were in the possession of the United States government before the statement was made.

Mr. Hees: Would it not have been desirable to send off a diplomatic note at the same time as the statement was made in this house, especially in dealing with a touchy matter such as this? Does the minister not consider that might have been a desirable thing to do?

Mr. Pearson: It might have been. It could have been done that way. I am not suggesting that the exact procedure adopted was the best one; that is a matter of opinion. We thought that in doing it in the less formal way, as we did originally, we would deal with this matter in Washington on a less formal diplomatic basis and obtain the assurances we thought we had a right to request from the United States. They felt that if we wanted these assurances the first note should be resubmitted as a formal diplomatic note so that we would get a formal diplomatic reply, and that was done.

Mr. Hees: I believe that the move the minister decided upon in the first place would have been very satisfactory, if it had not been accompanied by the very undesirable headline publicity. That was what bothered the state department.

While speaking this morning in reference to my remarks, the minister spoke as though the government were the only body interested in maintaining the unity of the Canadian forces serving overseas. I should like to refer to my remarks this morning when I said, "if this assignment were to be a permanent one, or if our troops were to be sent outside the theatre of operations, then the protest would have been justified, provided the United Nations commander did not first receive the permission of the Canadian government." In other words, if our forces were to be broken up for anything but a very temporary assignment, or if they were to be sent outside the theatre of operations, of course the Canadian government should be notified, and permission received.

However, I went on to say that, in my opinion, if the duty were a temporary assignment, within the theatre of operations, merely to do our share of the routine chores, then I thought it was almost ridiculous to expect the United Nations commander to follow that same procedure with all sixteen governments who have troops serving under him in the Korean theatre. If he wanted someone for guard duty, or almost any kind of routine duty, it seems to me almost ridiculous that the United Nations commander should have to take the time and trouble to obtain the permission from Canada or Turkey or any of the other countries that have troops serving in the area before assigning troops to that work. If the commander desired to assign troops to some permanent detail, where they are going to be some months away from their mother formation, or if they were going to be sent outside the theatre of operations, that would be a completely different thing. To me this is something which ties the hands of any commander unnecessarily. I think we must remember the tremendous responsibility which a commander like that has. Just so that we may know where we stand on this matter, does the minister really believe this? If, in future, the duties that the United Nations commander wishes some portion of our troops to perform are in the nature of a temporary assignment, within the theatre of operations, and are simply a matter of routine duty, do the minister and this government feel that on every occasion this government's permission must first be obtained?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, that is a matter of opinion. When the hon. gentleman talks about the impossibility and the undesirability of a United Nations commander in the field having to consult sixteen governments before he uses their troops for temporary duty in any way in which he may see fit, that is one way of stating the case. The fact of this situation is that there are, I think, only two governments in Korea—apart from the United States government—which have self-contained forces there to be used there as an entity; other forces are there as small contingents and under the terms of reference under which they were submitted to the United Nations, there may be no mention of the way in which they should be used. They are battalions and even smaller than battalions. We sent a self-contained brigade. As I indicated this morning, in making that brigade available to the United Nations for combat duty—and that phrase was used in our submission to the Secretary General—in the directive to the brigadier it was made quite clear that the principle of the separate entity of Canadian forces was at all times to be maintained; and that principle was made clear to the unified command.

It was therefore felt that, before detaching even a small part of this brigade for duty 200 miles behind the front lines where the brigade was stationed, it would have been advisable—as no military consideration was involved—for the unified commander to have apprised the Canadian government of his desire. That was the only point at issue. Now that the exchange has taken place between the two governments, that point has been cleared up in a way which is satisfactory to us and, I think, to the United States government.

It is always a difficult problem in combined operations of this kind, especially United Nations operations, to reconcile national interests and international action, as I mentioned the other day. I hope that as a result of this exchange and this clearing of the air that problem will not arise in the future. It is also quite clear that not merely this government but all Canadian governments have attached great importance to the principle of Canadian troops serving under Canadian command and being under Canadian control when they are in combined forces, always subject to considerations of military emergency. In respect of our association with other commonwealth forces in the last war we went to the extent, in this House of Commons, of passing the Visiting Forces Act to make sure it was done in this way.

Mr. Hees: There is just one more question I should like to ask the minister and it is this. If in the future we find ourselves called upon to make a protest to an allied government about some matter such as this, does the minister not think that instead of doing it in the way of headlines, it would be preferable to do it between the two governments in a quiet, restrained and unpublicized manner? Which does he think is the best way of carrying out this kind of communication between governments?

Mr. Pearson: I can answer that question only by saying that we should be governed by circumstances. This was a situation which we thought was of far greater interest and importance to Canada than it was to the United States or to the United Nations. We therefore made our public statement in the House of Commons. There may not have been in our minds any idea that that statement would cause the headlines that it actually caused in the United States and would arouse as much interest among the editors of certain newspapers such as the Chicago Tribune, the Patterson press, and the Hearst press as well as the Washington Post. I would not want to lay down any hard and fast rule governing situations of this kind.

I think that in any difference of opinion with a friendly government we must always weigh two factors, namely the protection of our own national interests and the effect that any public discussion and division of opinion would have on the unity and the solidarity of the coalition. Those two factors must be taken into consideration in any statement we make or in any action we take which may not be agreeable to some other member of the coalition. In this particular situation, as this was an important matter of principle although the number of troops involved was small, in order to emphasize this Canadian interest we decided it would be well to make our statement publicly in the House of Commons.

Having said that, I agree entirely with my hon. friend when he says that we should be extremely careful, in any of these differences we may have, to weigh the effect of a public difference on the unity of the alliance. We are all free countries in this coalition. We have to pay a certain price for freedom. One way in which that price is expressed is in our right to disagree publicly with each other. In doing that we cannot help, on certain occasions, giving ammunition to our enemies. There is no doubt about that. But nevertheless we should not give them any more ammunition or any stronger ammunition than the circumstances make necessary.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to change the subject and to take the opportunity provided by consideration of the minister's estimates to make a few observations concerning an organization that comes within the jurisdiction of the minister's department. It is an organization that has demonstrated co-operation and great achievement throughout the years based on good will and friendship between two great countries, Canada and the United States. I am referring particularly to the international joint commission. I am making these few observations this afternoon because I believe that there are a great many people in Canada who are not aware of the importance of this commission or of the good work that it has done throughout the years, and particularly on account of certain remarks made in certain places and in certain editorials and press comments across this country in connection with the personnel and the functions of the commission.

Before I proceed, Mr. Chairman, I might say that we in this group have a high regard for the functions of the international joint commission and for the way in which it works. This getting together of two countries to assemble facts and evidence and then, as a result of that assembling of facts and evidence, to decide where a structure shall be built for the development of our natural resources to the advantage of the people in both countries in many cases, or in one country or the other, is a clear indication of the type of planning that we in this group believe in.

I understand the major functions of the international joint commission are two in number. The first is the hearing of and dealing with applications received from governments or companies who wish to erect certain structures that will affect the level of waters at the international boundary. The second is in dealing with references made to the commission by the governments of Canada and the United States for certain investigations. I understand that the first applications for investigations were heard in 1912, or that the first application for hearing before the commission was made at that date. Since that time I understand some 45 hearings have been disposed of by the commission. In a previous debate an hon. member said that there should be an investigation of the work of the international joint commission. I cannot see that point, Mr. Chairman, because anyone who wishes to peruse the evidence placed before the commission in all the hearings since 1912 to this day and the disposal of those hearings would have a very thorough understanding of the function and the work of the international joint commission. I understand that at the present time there are three applications before the commission: one from the government of the United States concerning the dam at Libby, Montana; one from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company concerning the erection of a dam at Waneta; and one from the city of Minot, North Dakota in the United States, concerning some action that will be taken on certain waters.

So far as investigations are concerned, I understand that eleven have been completed from 1912 to date, and six are still in progress. I mention these things briefly, Mr. Chairman, because I live in a constituency which is very interested in the work of the international joint commission at this time, and has been for some years. It is considering some very great problems of that area. I have had the opportunity to attend hearings in the United States and in Canada. I might say that personally I have been greatly impressed with the work the commission is doing and all the people whom I have met who have had an opportunity of attending these hearings have recognized the great value of the work the commission is doing.

I understand that the investigations still in progress are concerned with the Columbia river basis reference, which was issued on March 9, 1944, an investigation of tremendous importance to the people of southeastern British Columbia; the Sage creek reference of April 8, 1946 and the midwestern watershed reference concerning Waterton and Belly rivers and Souris and Red rivers of January 12, 1948, and the air pollution reference of January 12, 1949; the Saint John river reference of September 28, 1950, and the Niagara Falls reference of October 10, 1950.

I mention these, Mr. Chairman, to place on the record the fact that the commission is now making investigations that concern western Canada, the central provinces and eastern Canada. It is making investigations of great importance to the Canadian people. In view of the great industrial development and the need for power and the need for agricultural extension, there is no doubt about it that the importance of the work of the international joint commission is increasing from year to year. As a matter of fact, wise decisions on our future development depend to a great extent upon wise decisions made by the commission.

I want to make a brief reference to the personnel of the commission. Who are the people charged with the responsibility of representing Canada on the international joint commission? We are fortunate, Mr. Chairman, in Canada in having the type of personnel on the commission that we have at this time. I am mentioning this fact particularly because I think that well qualified men who make some personal sacrifice to serve Canada, as some members of the commission are doing at this time, should be recognized in this house and in the country. We have as the chairman General McNaughton, whose record in the first world war as a soldier, and in the second world war, was outstanding. He is a scientist, an outstanding engineer and administrator. He was the president of the national research council for some time. Mr. George Spence is the second member of the commission. He was a pioneer farmer in western Canada and has had long experience in the legislature, in parliament and in public affairs. He has shown himself to be an outstanding administrator in the administration of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and wherever he has gone his, shall I say, earthy and practical qualities have been recognized particularly by the farmers who attend the various hearings.

Then we have Mr. Lucien Dansereau, an engineer of long experience with the Department of Public Works, a man of wide experience in the field of public works in Canada and in eastern Canada, and in the administration of matters of that sort. In addition to that we have on the international joint commission a loyal staff. Some of the members have been serving that commission for a good many years. They have given loyal and devoted service. More than that, they are a staff who are particularly interested in the success of the commission's activities and in the work the commission is undertaking.

As I said before, I have had the opportunity of attending some of the hearings, and I have read a good number of reports of the various references and of the applications, and I have thus been able to obtain some knowledge of the work of the international joint commission. There is no doubt about it, Mr. Chairman, that we in Canada are most fortunate to have the present members acting as members of the Canadian section of the international joint commission. They are doing a great work of great importance on an economical basis. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that a close examination of the figures will show that our international joint commission has performed a greater service at a less per capita cost throughout the years than any other international commission in the world. Knowing these facts, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that hon. members and the majority of Canadians will join me in paying tribute to the work of the commission in the past and to the excellent work that the international joint commission is doing for Canada today.

Mr. Pearkes: Earlier in this session similar attention was drawn to a decision handed down by the international court of justice, supporting a claim by the Norwegian government for the right to define that certain waters be included as territorial waters of the Norwegian government, which before that date had not been included as territorial waters.

In their submission to the international court of justice the Norwegian government adopted what might also be called a new theory, in that they defined a base line which ran from headland to headland along their coast, and from that baseline westward they included a zone which they considered was their territorial waters. I might say that the definition of this new territorial water affected the fishermen of the United Kingdom who previously had fished in those waters. Now a very similar problem arises in connection with the territorial waters of Canada, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific.

I bring this matter to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at this time because of a recent agreement which has been made, known as the north Pacific fishery agreement, based on the peace treaty recently ratified with Japan. By that fishery treaty, Japan, or Japanese fishermen, agreed to abstain from fishing salmon, halibut and herring in the north Pacific; but they have the right, as they have always had up to now, of fishing for other species of fish off our Canadian coast. Not to any great extent have the Japanese in the past availed themselves of that right. But the right exists, and the right has been recognized by the fact that only those three species are included in the abstention clause. There are certain waters on the Pacific coast which one can only define as being inland waters lying between such islands as Vancouver island and the Queen Charlotte islands. They include such waters as Hecate and Queen Charlotte straits and so on which, in the past, have been regarded as the high seas. They extend for more than three miles from any line drawn which follows the indentations of the British Columbia coast line.

For many years the fishermen of the United States have exercised the historic right of fishing for certain species in the waters between Vancouver island and the mainland, and between the Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland. I understand an interdepartmental committee has been set up in order to study this whole question of the definition of territorial waters. I would ask the minister to tell us what progress has been made by that interdepartmental committee in the discussion of this subject, because many departments are affected. I understand however that it is under the general conduct of the Department of External Affairs which, naturally, would be the department most vitally interested. I would ask how active that committee is, how many meetings they have held this year, when the last meeting was held, and what progress is being made.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised a point of both practical and legal importance. The traditional position of Canada and a good many other countries has been, as hon. members know, to recognize the three-mile limit as the limit of territorial waters, though outside that three-mile limit it is usually understood that there would be a jurisdictional area extending farther.

This is an important matter from the standpoint of fisheries. The approach to it usually varies, in certain countries, according to whether the fishermen are inshore or offshore fishermen. There is another aspect of the question the hon. member has touched upon, namely the establishment of inland waters—whether one must follow the indentations of the coast line in establishing the three-mile line, and declare anything outside of that as open sea, or whether one should draw the line from headland to headland.

All these questions were given consideration at the time of the discussions in connection with the fisheries agreement with the United States and Japan. I can only say that if on that occasion we had insisted upon the abandonment of the traditional three-mile zone it might not have been possible to secure an agreement.

However, as the hon. member has pointed out, a decision has recently been handed down by the international court of justice on an appeal from Norway, which does give a nation the right to establish a zone of territorial waters wider than the historic three-mile limit. The implications of the decision are important, and that is one of the matters being studied by the interdepartmental committee. I believe the question has also been considered by the fisheries committee of the house. The interdepartmental committee is an active one but has not yet reported to the government, although we expect to have a report from it before long. Represented on it are the Department of Justice and the Department of Fisheries as well as the Department of External Affairs. I am sorry I am not in a position to tell my hon. friend when we shall have the report, but we hope to have it soon.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister, I understand, cannot report any progress at the moment by the committee?

Mr. Pearson: I can only report progress. This is not an easy or a simple matter, but rather one requiring consultation not only with other departments of this government but with other governments as well. It may take a little time before there can be any final report from the committee. However, I am sure a report will be made available as soon as possible.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will relate more particularly to item 102 in the estimates, which deals with the world health organization. The fifth assembly of the world health organization met in Geneva, Switzerland, this year from May 5 to May 22 inclusive, and I was honoured by being appointed by the government of Canada to the Canadian delegation attending that assembly.

The other delegates were Dr. Oliver Leroux, of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Dr. T. C. Routley, secretary of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. J. T. Phair, deputy minister of the department of health in the province of Ontario, and Mr. Bruce Williams, representative at the permanent delegation of Canada to the European office of the United Nations.

Hon. members are aware that the world health organization was set up as a permanent independent agency at an international conference in New York in 1946. It is supported by funds, subscribed on an agreed basis by member governments.

WHO has its headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland, with six regional offices. One is in North America, one in South America, another in Europe, another in Africa, one in the eastern Mediterranean and another in the Far East. It gets support from governments in all parts of the world, with the exception of Russia and her satellites. They too belonged to the organization at first, but have later withdrawn their financial support.

WHO is run by a director-general in the person of Dr. Brock Chisholm, a Canadian, along with an executive board of eighteen members, six of whom are elected each year. This year Canada was elected to a seat on this board and will, therefore, have some say in the direction of the organization for the next three years. I may add that, in the voting, 60 nations cast their ballots. Two were spoiled, and Canada got 57 of the 58 votes.

The four years that WHO has been in operation have given ample and positive proof that nations can share common problems and can work together for common solutions, while at the same time retaining their full national sovereignty. In the first four years nations have demonstrated that they are willing when necessary to subordinate their national, regional and ideological interests in order that the great work of WHO may go on.

When health leaders of the nations meet together through WHO, dedicated as they are for the betterment of health of all peoples, they cannot help but make a very vital contribution towards international co-operation and good will.

Throughout the centuries health professions have developed and applied principles of co-operation for great humanitarian objectives which transcend geographic, political and social barriers. It is this faith which brought WHO into being.

To state it simply and in its broadest terms, the goal of WHO is to prevent disease and heal the sick.

Discussion of international health appealed to our ancestors of two or three generations ago differently from what it does to us today. It meant to them that there were great killer plagues with which mankind has been afflicted since the very beginning of history. Hans Zinnser wrote a very vivid book entitled "Rats, Lice and History". One chapter deals with the relative unimportance of generals and draws attention to the fact that disease can be a much more effective killer than warfare and that epidemics have done as much to shape the course of history as great military leaders and military campaigns. We have only to read accounts of the bubonic plague, the black death, typhus, smallpox, intestinal diseases, syphilis, et cetera, to know that this was so. If we read history we find that our ancestors had great fear of these epidemics and many accounts are on record of how they tried to avoid disease. But lacking knowledge as to its cause and spread, they had frequent reminders of what epidemics meant in terms of fear, misery and wholesale death.

The first effort to control disease on an international scale took place about the middle of the last century or one hundred years ago. The main emphasis at that time was placed on quarantine, on the efforts to keep diseases outside the boundaries of countries. The opening of the Suez canal precipitated restrictive measures on the part of many European countries. The fear was that the opening of commerce with the east would introduce the bubonic plague, yellow fever and other diseases of that nature into European ports. Quarantine is still sound for certain circumstances, but today because of the advance in preventive medicine there is a well-based hope that a number of the most destructive epidemic diseases can be obliterated or at least suppressed to the point where we need no longer fear them to the same degree.

A new concept of international health was recognized in the formation of the world health organization. It is now accepted as reasonable and proper for those sections of world humanity which possess special health knowledge, skills and devices to share these possessions with their less fortunate fellow men. This is a very important new factor in international health, pioneered it is true by voluntary organizations but now vigorously supported by governments through WHO and the technical assistance programs.

Dr. L. A. Scheele, surgeon general of the United States and president of the WHO, who is retiring this year, said:

> It has given structure and consistency to the reverence of human life in this world which has had too many lapses into barbarism.

In the four years of WHO existence there has been a greater reduction of death rates in many countries than in any similar period. Diseases like malaria, yaws, syphilis, smallpox, trachoma, plague and yellow fever are definitely being controlled, while tuberculosis and diseases due to environmental sanitation are also receding. Increased production of food and other goods has already resulted in many countries from the improvement of the health of the people. This has been most marked in large areas now under cultivation because of the scientific eradication of malaria infestation.

If we look over the list of subcommittees of WHO we will realize that much other work is in progress, though probably with results less dramatic than those mentioned. A partial list would include public health administration, maternal and child health, nutrition, health education, nursing, exchange of scientific information, assistance to educational institutions, sanitary conventions and regulations, biological standardization, drugs that produce addiction, as well as committees on various diseases such as leprosy, tuberculosis, malaria, plague, cholera, poliomyelitis, bilharziasis, et cetera.

The policy of WHO has been to encourage self-health. This is essential for the sound development of any program in preventive medicine. It is felt that if WHO supply the necessary materials and get the program well under way, and if the scheme is soundly conceived, it should then be carried through with local resources. The WHO policy was to require governments receiving assistance, either through the regular WHO program or through the special accounts for technical assistance, to pay certain of the local costs involved. These costs, which did not require the expenditure of foreign currency, included the provision of local services, labour, office space, supplies obtainable within the country, local transportation, postal and telecommunications. Lodgings for the international staff were also to be supplied by the recipient country, but in certain circumstances the director-general could agree to provide lodgings from WHO funds.

At the recent meeting in Geneva much dissatisfaction was expressed with these provisions by certain member countries. On behalf of our delegation I stated that the provisions should not be changed. A committee was set up to reconsider the policies on participation of member states in certain costs incurred by WHO. I was elected chairman of this committee which passed a draft resolution giving the director-general power to assume a whole list of local costs. In presenting the resolution to the whole committee I expressed my opposition, but it carried by a large majority. One clause of the resolution refers it to the 1953 world health assembly. I might say that our delegation debated this at different times and our argument was that if they assumed too great a proportion of the costs in a particular country they would not be able to carry out so many projects.

The Canadian delegation on various occasions objected to the increase of the 1953 budget over that of 1952. There were only two other states actively concerned in maintaining the 1953 budget at the 1952 level, namely, the United States of America and the United Kingdom. The financing of WHO budgets is complicated by the problem of nine inactive members and China which continue to be assessed. Under current procedures their assessments are not considered available for expenditure.

The budget this year, exclusive of money received from the technical assistance program of the United Nations, is up 11 per cent. The total budget is around $9,823,000. That does not mean that Canada will pay 11 per cent more, although we will pay roughly $9,000 more under the 1953 budget. Besides the budget, there were many other items up for discussion in which the Canadian delegation took an active part. Some of these included the approval of the program for 1953, publications of the world health organization, the advisability of biennial assemblies, the advisability of holding assemblies of the world health organization away from Geneva, the sale of WHO seals, internal administration and bookkeeping, fellowships and many other matters. The Canadian delegation took no active part in the long and acrimonious debates both in committee and in the plenary sessions on "regions undesignated". This came up in connection with Tunisia and Morocco as well as when Turkey wanted to withdraw from the eastern Mediterranean regional jurisdiction. The complaint of a delegate from one country that no regional meetings were being held and the reply of the delegates of a group of other countries that no meetings would be held as long as the first country was a member kept the meeting in prolonged tension. While our delegation took no part in acrimonious debate, yet we offered suggestions on many matters, some of which were adopted. We think we did not fail to take a stand on all vital matters and hope we made a useful contribution to the conference.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will permit the hon. member for Greenwood to ask a question having to do with the world health organization.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wanted to ask the hon. member for Welland a question. I noticed that he said that Russia and her satellites withdrew their financial support. Am I right in assuming that means they also stayed away from the meetings?

Mr. McMillan: Yes, that is true.

Mr. Green: I should like the minister to bring us up to date on the situation in the Pacific and on Canada's policy on Pacific affairs. There seems to be less prospect of a truce in Korea although that impression is gained from press reports and may not represent the actual position. Then we would also like to know the situation in the other spots in Asia where there is fighting, particularly Indo-China and Malaya.

Another development within recent days, in fact I think it took place yesterday, was the recognition by the Japanese government of the Chinese nationalist government as the government for the whole of China. That appears to be a far-reaching step which may have far-reaching effects. It may even affect Canadian policy. Then there is the withdrawal by the United Kingdom of her commercial interests inside red China. That too seems to be quite an important change in the Pacific region.

We should also like to know whether the government is now any more favourably inclined than before to the negotiation of a pact in the Pacific which will serve the same purpose as the North Atlantic pact does in that area. As the minister knows, we have advocated such a pact for several years but the policy adopted has been one of bilateral agreements. There is an agreement between the United States and Japan, another between the United States and the Philippines, and a third between the United States and Australia and New Zealand. Is it the intention that there will only be these bilateral pacts or is there in prospect a wider pact which will set up some kind of defence organization for the Pacific?

I believe that Russia is more apt to make trouble in the Pacific than in the Atlantic. She has a much wider field across the Pacific ocean and seems to have been more aggressive there than in Europe. I am afraid that as a nation we do not appreciate how much trouble can come from the Pacific and, in fact, if a world war comes it may well come from that direction. I noticed reports in the Vancouver press of the last few days indicating that there has been Russian reconnaissance of Alaska and northern Canada by their strategic air force. That may or may not be true but certainly the Pacific is a dangerous spot, and I should like to know what the policy of the Canadian government is at the present time with regard to that great area.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman has brought up a very important subject and has touched upon a very important area of the world. The situation there certainly does not seem to be improving to any great extent —that is an understatement—even though in Europe it may be improving in some respects. I welcome the opportunity to say a few words about this area although I have made statements on the subject recently in the house. In that connection it was indicated this morning by the leader of the opposition that we did not have enough opportunity to discuss these matters. I took the opportunity of the luncheon recess to find out on how many days we had discussed international affairs, including affairs in the Far East, during this session, and I think the record is such as to disprove the statement that we do not take these matters seriously in the House of Commons in so far as provision of time for their discussion is concerned. There were four separate occasions during this session when a debate on international matters was initiated, and advantage was taken of those occasions by any hon. member who wished to speak on international affairs. Now we are back again, and I do not complain about it a bit, on Far Eastern and Pacific matters.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has asked me to state the position with regard to Korea, Japan, Indo-China, Malaya and—I would have been very surprised indeed if he had not brought this up—a Pacific pact. So far as the situation in Malaya is concerned, if I may start there, there has been some improvement since General Templer took command, but it is still far from stable. The efforts that are being made to stamp out communist banditry are making progress but it is discouraging to realize that only four or five thousand of these bandits in the jungles of Malaya have been able to create this problem which has persisted for so many years. They are able to do it partly because of the nature of the country, the inaccessibility of the areas in which they take refuge, partly because there is a native population which, through fear, intimidation or some other motive, has been helping them, and partly because they have been able to exploit legitimate feelings of nationalism and the desire for a better life. The situation is better but it is far from being satisfactory.

In Indo-China the drain on French resources of men and money continues. I am informed that the military position is better now than it has been for some time. There again one cannot become unduly optimistic because there always remains the possibility of outside intervention of a greater strength than has been the case up to the present time. The most encouraging feature I can think of in the Indo-Chinese situation has been the increased participation of the Viet Nam government and army in the dangers that face them. As help continues to go to Indo-China, largely from the United States which is playing a very important part in this area of the world where we are defending ourselves against communist aggression, and where once again the United States is the cardinal factor in that defence, the Viet Nam army is assuming a greater share of responsibility. I believe that is an encouraging development. The more the defence of that country can rest on a government of its own people and an army of its own people, the better chance there is of keeping communism outside the country.

The situation in Japan has not altered very much since I last spoke on this matter except in relation to the development to which the hon. member referred, and to which reference was made in the press this morning. I should not like to comment on that until I see the actual text of the Japanese government statement. We have not yet received that text. Press accounts indicate that the recognition which was extended to the nationalist government of China by a treaty signed between the two governments has been extended from the area over which the nationalist government now exercises jurisdiction, that is to say Formosa, to the whole of China. If that is actually the case, it is a matter of some importance.

Then I do not need to tell the house that the armistice negotiations in Korea drag on their weary way. I am still of the opinion, and my opinion is shared by a good many people, that it would be a great mistake on our part if we on the western side took any steps to break off these negotiations. If that is to be done, let it be done by the other side. This policy has been adopted by the unified command, and has been put into effect by the representatives of the unified command with persistence and patience, and I think with great intelligence. Nevertheless little if any progress has been made, and I can only echo what the United Kingdom minister of defence—whom we are so happy to have in our country again—said yesterday, that no one can tell, because no one knows, what is in the hearts of the communist negotiators. As I have said before, there is probably a fifty-fifty chance; there may be an armistice or there may not; I do not know. As the talks drag on all the various governments concerned are searching for some way out of what seems to be an impasse in regard to the armistice and indeed what seems to be a difficult situation in Korea generally.

It has been suggested that the United Nations armistice negotiators might be changed, and representatives of other nations included. This might have been a good idea in the early days, and I do not desire to express an opinion on it, but I am inclined to believe with some others that it would not be of any great value today, and might be misinterpreted. If at this stage of the game the composition of the team of negotiators were changed by the addition of representatives from other nations, it might be taken as an indication of distrust in those negotiators—as though we had to have somebody alonside them to see what they were doing. We have no such distrust.

The situation in regard to prisoners of war, which seems to be the only point which stands between the negotiators and success, has not changed. There has been no progress in respect of the last offer which was made by the unified command. The communist negotiators have treated that offer, which as I said in the house at the time it was made was extremely fair, with ridicule and with violence. This does not necessarily mean that they may not change their minds very quickly. Violence in communist negotiations can almost instantaneously be followed by concessions if the word comes from headquarters to make concessions. So far there is no indication any such word is on the way.

There are other difficulties in connection with Korea. I touched on one of them this morning. There is the difficulty of the prisoners on Koje, which has come up in another connection. This was a most complicated and frightening problem. We may have our own views about it, but at the same time we have to realize that the situation which faced those on the spot, when they were confronted with the necessity of dealing with these prisoners by the thousands, was one of unprecedented complexity. They had to be dealt with at a time when the United Nations forces were retreating and at a time of great military uncertainty, when no one could be sure whether the position in Korea would be held. Thousands of prisoners had to be herded together without sufficient men to guard them. It is quite understandable that they should be thrown on an island and given some—I was going to use the word "freedom"—in their internal management. As it has turned out that has led to unfortunate consequences, but it is easy to be wise after the event. The Americans themselves, who do not hesitate to criticize their own efforts, have done so on this occasion. I think we should realize also however the difficult problem with which they were confronted. Whether or not they have made mistakes, the fact is now that extremely vigorous action has been taken. So far as we can judge the situation on that island of ill omen is quiet, and we must hope that this particular problem has been liquidated.

As to the future, I can only say that all the governments concerned, as I mentioned just a few minutes ago, are now looking for any possible way out of this situation, and especially in regard to what might be done about the prisoners of war. Consideration has been given to whether there might be some procedure by way of rescreening the prisoners under international control or some device of that kind which would remove the communist fear that the first screening was not fair. If that could be done and some new machinery set up along those lines it might be possible to remove what seems now to be the last obstacle to the armistice.

In making these investigations, however, I suggest we must of necessity insist on one principle, and that is that no one who has surrendered to the United Nations forces must be forced back to the country from which he came. The communists in Korea who talk so much about the Geneva protocol have already forced prisoners whom they have taken to join their own forces. They do not appear on any prisoner of war list; that is one of the incongruities of the situation. But whatever they may have done or not done, I suggest that in working out some arrangement for this prisoner of war question we must take our stand that no prisoner who genuinely refuses to go back—and it must be a genuine refusal given to somebody who is capable of interpreting the prisoner's wishes—should be forced back.

This is my final word. If armistice negotiations should break down and be succeeded by another all-out offensive on the part of the communists, the persons responsible—and I repeat what I have said before—should have it made clear to them that the consequences of a second all-out aggression might be far-reaching indeed, even farther reaching than the first.

Mr. Green: The minister did not deal with the question of a security pact.

Mr. Pearson: I apologize to the hon. member for omitting mention of the Pacific pact. Our position in that regard has not changed. The Prime Minister of Australia, who is as interested in this matter as the member for Vancouver-Quadra, has been having some discussions in London and Washington about a Pacific pact. I understand that he arrives in Ottawa on Sunday, and we shall have an exchange of views and go over the whole situation with him. So far as we are aware, however, the position remains as I stated it on April 9, namely that ultimately a general Pacific pact of the nature indicated by my hon. friend may be the most desirable way of establishing and preserving security in the Pacific. At the present time we agree with Mr. John Foster Dulles, who had a great deal to do with the pacts that now exist in the Pacific, when he said:

> I don't think it is feasible on any quick timetable to put together the countries of Asia in the same way as the countries of the Atlantic.

[Mr. Pearson.]

However, we shall be glad indeed to discuss this whole question with the Prime Minister of Australia when he arrives on Sunday, and to get his views on that matter.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us the policy of the Canadian government with regard to Formosa?

Mr. Pearson: We have no special relations with Formosa. Our policy toward Formosa is, I suppose, largely governed by the fact that it is the seat of the government of Chiang Kai-shek; and that is the government which at the present time is recognized as the government of China. Formosa is part of China and is recognized by us as such.

Mr. MacKenzie: Before we rose for lunch a question was raised by someone with regard to the safety and the position of Canadian nationals in China. Perhaps the minister answered that question before I came in. If he did so, I am sorry to make reference to it now. The question was as to how safe they were in China and what we can do to assist them to leave China.

As a matter of fact, one of those whom I consider to be authorities on Chinese problems, namely Dr. Stuart Allen, was in Ottawa a couple of weeks ago. As will be remembered, he was interned at Chungking in China for about a year. I had an extremely interesting talk with him, and this particular question came up. While it is true that we have in red China no representative as such, nor has Britain—at least no potent one; it seems to me that Britain never had anything but a consular service there at any time—there are at least 22 countries which Canada recognizes, and with which she is quite friendly, which have full ambassador status in red China. They include such countries as Holland, Denmark, Switzerland, Norway and Sweden. I wonder whether it would not be possible for Canada to use the good offices of one of those countries that are so well established in red China to assist the Canadian nationals to get out.

Mr. Pearson: Not only is it possible, Mr. Chairman, but we do that. Our representations to the Chinese communist government have in fact been made through other channels than the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires in Peking. He is an experienced and capable diplomatic official and we are exceedingly grateful to him for what he has done; but his opportunities for assistance are not as great as he would like them to be. We have therefore also used the good offices of other nations represented at Peking, including the Indian ambassador. On this occasion I should like to express, on behalf of the government, our gratitude to those representatives for what they have done for us in China. The situation, as I said this morning—and I went into this matter in some detail—remains difficult; but we are doing what we can to get the Canadians out.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to item 108 of the estimates. I am sure all hon. members are aware of the real assistance given under the United Nations expanded program for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries, of which vote 108 represents Canada's contribution thereto in the amount of $850,000. But it seems to me that we are not doing nearly enough for the new and struggling state of Israel. Consider for a moment just what the facts are.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I point out to the hon. member that we are considering item 85. I understand that his remarks are directed to item 108. Would it not be preferable for him to defer his remarks until that item is reached?

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, I have discussed the matter with the minister and he suggested that it might be advisable for me to speak now, inasmuch as we are ranging over quite a number of subjects. However, I bow to your ruling.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macnaughton: In the first place, the new state of Israel is struggling with critical problems largely the result of the rapidity with which urgent immigration has been flowing into the country. So rapid has been the population increase that it has exceeded the rate of development of the country's physical resources. Large scale development plans and projects are under way which will eventually meet the needs of the increased population.

Israel is not only an Asiatic state in which democracy is practised and western techniques are dynamic; it is already a valuable customer of Canada. It is now a customer for Canadian products to the annual value of between $12 million and $13 million. By contrast the other Middle Eastern states purchased in 1950 Canadian products in the following amounts:

Jordan	$ 46,338
Syria	1,462,395
Egypt	3,716,105
Iran	992,407
Iraq	70,127
Turkey	3,743,554

The total purchases of Israel were more than those of all these other countries I have just mentioned. In 1950 Israel occupied nineteenth place in point of volume of purchase of Canadian products.

Probably the best evidence of the proper use of moneys advanced to assist in the development of underdeveloped countries is contained in the report of the secretary of the export-import bank with headquarters in Washington. Sidney Sherwood, the secretary of the export-import bank, in a short article under the heading "Making the Most of a Loan", wrote as follows. I should like to quote his words because I think they contain the germ of further worth-while ideas. He wrote:

> In January of 1949, the export-import bank loan to Israel was made in the amount of $100 million to assist the new state in carrying out its economic development program. This loan to Israel was made only after long and thorough study of the economic risks involved.

He goes on later to say:

> In fact, the export-import bank with $3 billion in outstanding loans or undisbursed commitments in over forty countries has few borrowers who have used their loan dollars more wisely or meticulously than has Israel.

The final report of the United Nations economic survey mission for the Middle East states:

> The case of Israel is sui generis. There one finds a western civilization of the most modern type which is making prodigious efforts to draw life from the barren soil of Palestine.

In this age of transition when all over the world not only political ideologies but economic patterns are in sharp conflict, it is no wonder that eyes are being increasingly focused on the Middle East in a sharp concentration on the impact of all of the forces which plague the modern world.

Here we find the conflict of past and present. In Israel western civilization has been injected into a region dominated by an eastern, semi-feudalistic system of land-tenure. In Israel socialism and co-operative enterprise are working hand in hand and side by side with private enterprise for the development of a new economy.

Is it possible that the resolution of the problems concentrated in this small but strategic part of the world will provide patterns for solutions on a wider scale? If the experiments now being carried on in Israel and the Arab states succeed in finding a modus vivendi, history may well record that the Middle East played the role of the crossroads laboratory of civilization in one of the greatest crises the world has known.

This is a critical moment for the new state of Israel. Canadians have a strong cultural attachment with the peoples of Israel. We have already, especially in the United Nations, proved our friendship for that country. Now when Israel needs help to meet its economic crisis, we have the opportunity to prove our friendship in a practical way. Consequently I would ask the minister to give some attention to this very item, and see if there is not something more we as a Canadian nation can do to help one of our really good friends in the Middle East.

Mr. Adamson: Before the item carries I should like to renew a plea I have made previously, though I have not renewed it as often as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has renewed his request for a Pacific pact.

Mr. Green: We are going to get it.

Mr. Adamson: We may even get what I am asking for.

The republic of Austria occupies a key position geographically in Europe. Not only does Austria occupy a key position geographically but she is still an occupied country with Russian troops actually on her soil. She is still very much in the forefront of the war that is not cold by any manner of means, certainly as far as the Russian occupied portion of the city of Vienna goes. I again want to make a plea for recognition by the appointment of a Canadian minister to Vienna. I do that for a number of reasons. First of all, if Austria and her really amazing fight against engulfment by communism can be recognized, we will help to make her a strong as well as a free and independent country.

There is, and there always must be, a great cultural tie between Austria and Germany. They are both Germanic peoples. There is also a tremendous economic tie. It was, if I may say so, the stupidity of France in the twenties in opposing the proposed economic union which eventually sowed the seeds of the national socialist party in Austria and which eventually resulted in the putsch and the taking over of Austria by Hitler.

It must be remembered that the first real act of extraterritorial aggression by Hitler was against the sovereign state of Austria, and there is still a danger of regarding Austria as an adjunct of Germany. I would hope that as soon as possible our government will appoint a minister to Vienna. There are many excellent reasons for this, entirely apart from the geographical position of Austria. Three times before in history the very frontier which is being defended now was defended against the Asiatic horde. I had the privilege of being near Vienna, in the American zone on the Danube, and seeing the Americans manning positions. One of the officers showed me a mound near one of their posts which had been a Roman fortification nearly 2,000 years ago.

Looking down from Kobenzl over Vienna one saw Russian barracks in almost exactly the same place as the Turkish encampments when Prince Sobieski, in September 1683, threw back the Mongol hordes. Those are historical incidents which are being repeated today. From our point of view we should do everything possible to recognize Austria as a sovereign nation, not as a territory to be serviced from our embassy or our legation in Berne, and certainly not as an adjunct of our embassy in Bonn. The minister may have done something about this in the last few weeks. If so I am glad to hear of it as Vienna is again the outpost of Christian and western civilization.

There is one other thing I should like to see done, and here again I may not be fully informed as to what may have happened. I refer to the procedure in providing asylum to the escapees. I think the attorney general of the United States, Francis Biddle, was prominent in the organization which looks after escapees from communist countries. Up to comparatively recent times the escapee would come over from the communist country. He would escape luckily with his life. Of course he would have no papers, and frequently very little identification. Because he had no papers and little identification, the first thing that would happen to him would be this. He would be put in prison until such time as he could get papers or other identification, which often was never. In other words, immediately he made his escape he was kept at a frontier point, in a state of imprisonment. There is of course a very obvious danger that many of the escapees may be plants; they may be Russian agents or communist agents escaping for that purpose, but I feel that there are methods by which we can weed out those who are in that category. I realize there is great difficulty in doing that. I would like to know what we are doing to see, so that these men who have had the courage to escape from the communist world, whatever part it may be, are looked after by some organization. I know our record in that respect has been good. As a matter of fact, until comparatively recent years our record was considerably better than that of the United States. We were prepared to take many of these people without all the documentation asked by the United States. I feel that is one of the worth-while things that can be done today in Europe, to assist our friends from behind the iron curtain, to obtain physical safety and political asylum.

Mr. Pearson: In regard to the first point, we appreciate as does the hon. member the importance of Austria at this time—indeed especially at this time. We have been discussing with the Austrian government the possibility of an exchange of diplomatic representatives. I hope to be able to make an announcement on the subject before long, though I cannot be sure that it will completely satisfy the hon. member.

Then with reference to the question of escapees, as the hon. member has indicated I believe it can be said that we have played some part in giving asylum to these unfortunate people some of whom have done so much for freedom, for democracy and for us. There is always the consideration of security, and it is a specially important consideration in these cases because, as the hon. member has suggested, this is the kind of thing that could be exploited by those desiring to bring people into our country for wrong purposes. However, once security considerations have been met, we have made special arrangements on occasions to take escapees into Canada, and I hope we will continue to discharge our share of that international duty.

Mr. Adamson: I gather that every case is judged on its merits; there is no special organization looking after escapees?

Mr. Pearson: No, there is no special organization; but we have established contact with the committee to which my friend has referred. Then, of course, we are also participating in the new refugee organization, PICMME, that is continuing the work of IRO. Through that organization we are in touch with some of them.

Mr. Knowles: Arising out of the minister's reply to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when he asked about Formosa, I should like to ask a further question. I realize the minister's statement was necessarily brief. I realize, too, that there was no real need for him to repeat statements he had made before. It does strike me, however, that the statement he made today was a little too brief. All he said was that, so far as Formosa is concerned, it is the seat of the Chiang Kai-shek government, which the Canadian government still recognizes.

I trust—and this is my reason for rising at this time—that there is no change on the government's part in the position the minister indicated to the house earlier in this session. That was a repetition of the position he stated on previous occasions, but he gave it again on March 21, 1952, when, after making certain other statements, he said:

> We do not intend to use our own forces to restore to China the regime which is now in Formosa after being driven off the mainland.

I trust the statement the minister made today, that the Chiang Kai-shek government on the island of Formosa is a government recognized by the Canadian government, does not mean that this government is showing any interest in Chiang Kai-shek being restored to the mainland of China.

Mr. Pearson: No. There is no change whatever in our position. And if any statement of mine this afternoon implied that there was, I would like to correct that implication. However, I do not think what I said is susceptible of that interpretation. If I remember correctly, I said we recognized Formosa as being under the jurisdiction of Chiang Kai-shek and, as such, part of China. It is de facto part of China. The final disposition of Formosa has not yet been determined; but it has always been viewed by this government in the light of international arrangements which had previously been agreed upon.

So far as any action is concerned on our part to restore the nationalist Chinese regime on Formosa, our attitude in that matter is exactly as it was stated last March.

Mr. Green: Will the minister give the committee the latest news concerning the Ming Sung ships? The last word we had was that they were in Canton waiting to make a dash for Shanghai; but they are supposed to be our ships, and they are still flying our flag. Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs could give us some information about them.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I cannot add very much to the last statement on this matter made, I believe, by my colleague the Minister of Finance. These ships, so far as we know, are still in Canton; and so far as we know they have made no dash from Canton to any other port.

Mr. Green: Is there any possibility of getting our money back?

Mr. Pearson: We are exploring every avenue which might mean the return of some of our money in respect of these ships. But I would not want to give heavy odds that we will get much of it back.

Mr. Pearkes: Any of it.

Mr. Green: I raised the question because two days ago the Minister of Transport seemed a little more optimistic, when he said:

> I am still hopeful that notwithstanding the present position it will be possible to recoup a substantial amount of our money involved in those operations.

I take it the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not so optimistic.

Mr. MacKenzie: Referring again to the status of Formosa, are the terms and regulations set out in the Cairo declaration which cover the destiny of Formosa still recognized as such?

Mr. Pearson: If I remember rightly we adhered to that Cairo declaration, and we also are committed to some extent by the terms of the peace declaration with Japan. But I would not wish that to be interpreted as meaning that we are bound at this date, in 1952, by every clause of the Cairo declaration, because other governments have not considered themselves bound by all of that declaration. And, though it would be an important consideration in any attempt finally to settle the future of Formosa, it is not necessarily a governing consideration. There might conceivably be some other disposition of Formosa, than that visualized in the Cairo declaration.

86. Passport office administration, $222,847.

Mr. McLure: I understood the minister to say this morning that he is responsible for everything taking place in his department. I shall now make reference to something affecting his department, and then he will be free to judge whether or not he has been responsible for this condition.

In the last six months I have had considerable contact with the passport office. I must say that I would not have had this contact had not people written to me to obtain passports. You would think they could be picked up in about five seconds.

I should like to give the details of one case. Twenty-five years ago an immigrant from Denmark settled in Prince Edward Island. After he had been there a short time he married a fine lady and started in as a citizen of our province, taking out his naturalization papers five years later. He was quite successful in life, and only about two weeks ago decided to take a trip back to his homeland. He wanted to take his wife along. He made application to the passport office, but before doing so he paid for his transportation via New York.

Mr. J. W. O'Brien, a passport officer, sent the husband his passport but wrote to the wife stating in a very nice letter that when she had married she had given up her citizenship. He explained to her that she would have to get a registration certificate from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. That is where I came into the picture. I got a long letter from these people telling me they were afraid they might lose their fare. I immediately telephoned to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and I sent over their letter at once by messenger.

The matter was taken up immediately and this lady in Charlottetown was told to fill out and sign certain papers and return them, after which a certificate would be issued immediately. The gentleman in that department said he would take it over immediately to the passport office. I want to say that this gentleman, Mr. J. E. Duggan, and Mr. O'Brien both indicated that they were ready to do everything they could to provide service to the people who were requesting it. After dealing with them I have come to the conclusion that if there are two civil servants who are ready to do more under trying circumstances I would like to meet them.

Just one other incident I should like to mention. I wanted a small favour from the minister of external affairs. I knew he was a busy man, so I saw a Mr. Molson in his office. I want to say that I have never received better service from anyone since coming to Ottawa. I just wanted to place on record my appreciation of the courtesy extended by these three gentlemen. I leave it to the minister to say whether he is responsible or not.

Mr. Pearson: It may be entirely unconstitutional, but I must say that the responsibility for the courteous and efficient service rests entirely with the officials concerned. I know they will be most gratified at the kind words of the hon. member.

87. Representation abroad—operational—including payment of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff appointed as directed by the governor general in council, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $4,938,357.

Mr. Pearkes: Are the expenses of military attachés covered by this item?

Mr. Pearson: No, they would come under the Department of National Defence.

Item agreed to.

93. Canadian section of Canada-United States permanent joint board on defence including $7,500 for the chairman, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, $10,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item and also tell us who is the chairman of this board.

Mr. Pearson: The chairman of the Canada-United States board is General McNaughton and the other members of the Canadian section are Admiral DeWolf, Air Vice-Marshal Miller, Major-General Sparling, Dr. R. A. MacKay of the Department of External Affairs, with Mr. Phillips of the Department of External Affairs as secretary. The board is most active and I believe at the moment is meeting at Whitehorse.

Mr. Green: I notice the salary of the chairman is $7,500. Is that paid in addition to the remuneration he receives in connection with other positions?

Mr. Pearson: General McNaughton is paid $7,500 as chairman of this board and $7,500 as chairman of the international joint commission. While he is in receipt of those salaries he does not receive his pension. He gets a total income of $15,000 for his work on these two boards, but roughly $9,000 would be paid anyway as a pension under national defence.

Item agreed to.

96. To provide for the construction and execution in Canada of seven doors to be donated by Canada to the United Nations permanent headquarters in New York, $50,000.

Mr. Pearkes: What are these doors being made of?

Mr. Pearson: Nickel-silver. They are the seven main entrance doors to the new United Nations building in New York.

B—General—

The Canadian government's assessment for membership in the following international or commonwealth organizations—

97. United Nations organization, $1,463,200.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if under this item the minister could make a statement on Canada's part in the United Nations disarmament commission?

Mr. Pearson: I can make a statement and I hope to be able to keep it fairly brief. The disarmament commission, which was set up at the last assembly of the United Nations, has been quite active with meetings in New York. The Canadian representative on that commission is our permanent representative to the United Nations, Mr. David Johnson. In fact he was the chairman of the disarmament commission in the first month of its existence.

We had hoped that this commission might be the means of providing a sincere and constructive effort to reduce the level of armaments, but from the very beginning the delegate of the U.S.S.R. removed most of the hope we had of that purpose being achieved because he used the commission as a sounding board to attack the United States, especially in regard to the fantastic charge of germ warfare in Korea.

It is true that the U.S.S.R. did put forward their usual scheme for the immediate reduction of all armed forces. This scheme has been analysed, and we have tried to show them that it would not work. However, it was not considered desirable to take merely a negative attitude in this commission so the United Kingdom, the United States and the French members of the commission, in consultation with Canadian and other members, put forward a proposal of their own for arms reduction. It was thought that it was a practical one and could be taken as a basis for consideration. It was in a sense an effort to meet the Russian position, and it established the level of the armed forces of the U.S.S.R. and the United States at 1,500,000 men, of China I believe at 1,500,000 men, of France and the United Kingdom at 750,000 each, and with respect to other countries in the proportion of 1 per cent of their population. This was put forward by these delegates in good faith. It was hoped that it might be examined by the U.S.S.R. as a sincere and constructive proposal, but since then it has been turned down by the U.S.S.R. representative on the commission, and for the time being that has made progress difficult, if not impossible. However, the commission is not giving up and will continue to meet and report to the next session of the assembly.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to express the hope that every use that can be made of this commission and other means in the propaganda battle will be used. We are getting into a state where we have various kinds of war and various kinds of peace. Amongst the wars we have are cold war, hot war and propaganda war. I suggest there are times when we do seem to let the other side take a little of the initiative in the propaganda for the reduction of armaments and for peace. I simply express the hope that we will not always let the other side make these moves first and leave us in the position of having to try to counteract them, but that on occasion we will use a commission such as this to make propaganda moves ourselves.

Mr. Pearson: I agree. That was one of the reasons why so much time and effort were put into the proposal of the three western powers which I have just mentioned and which is still before the commission.

Specialized agencies—

98. Food and agriculture organization of the United Nations, $246,800.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to be one of those who sneer at international organizations, because I believe in them very greatly. On the other hand, one does feel that it is very easy for them just to grow and grow if we say nothing about them. Here we have the food and agriculture organization which is costing us $135,000 more. Would the minister say a word about that? Actually it is costing us more than double this year.

Mr. Pearson: The representatives of the Department of Agriculture could more effectively describe the operations of this United Nations specialized agency, but I can say that it is considered by those who have had something to do with it, and who have had something to do with other United Nations organizations, as one of the most practical and useful of the specialized agencies of the United Nations. The technical divisions of the food and agriculture organization through which it does its work are agriculture, distribution, commerce and statistics, forestry and fisheries, nutrition and rural welfare.

During the first five years of its operation FAO has established a statistical service in the fields of food and agriculture and forestry and fisheries. It has collected, collated and published a wide range of technical information. It has also—and I think this is the most important part of its work—assisted participating countries, especially what we call underdeveloped countries, in improving the efficiency of their food production by providing them with technical advice and assistance for various periods of time and by sending technical agricultural missions to those countries. Canadian experts have taken part in a good many of these missions.

FAO has also undertaken a number of experimental projects in the field under its terms of reference. One that occurs to me was in Mexico where, by virtue of an FAO mission and the assistance FAO was able to give to that country, the production of a certain agricultural commodity was increased many times with great value to Mexico. I think it is doing a useful and practical job the value of which, of course, as is so often the case in these matters, is much greater to countries less materially advanced than to those like Canada which are materially advanced in agriculture. I can only conclude by saying that I think the money we spend on the food and agriculture organization is well spent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister described it, it reminded one, though with differences, of the Colombo plan. I suppose there is a very marked difference. The Colombo plan, I take it, does not deal directly with food but with mechanical installations of various kinds. I suppose that first of all the Colombo plan is not a United Nations plan but a commonwealth plan, and I take it there is a great distinction there. The minister spoke of FAO being able to do useful and constructive work in Mexico. I take it that was merely by way of advice. I suppose FAO has no means of stepping in and giving material assistance.

Mr. Pearson: In the case of the Mexican venture which I mentioned they did in fact send a technical agricultural mission to Mexico which stayed there some time and was responsible to a very large extent for the increased production. It also used facilities placed at its disposal by the government of Mexico. The Colombo plan of course works in co-operation with FAO whenever any project under the Colombo plan needs agricultural experts or agricultural assistance. That has happened once or twice already.

Mr. Low: I should like to ask the minister whether FAO has arrived at a position any nearer to the acceptance of such an organization as an international commodity clearing house for the proper distribution of world surpluses of food.

Mr. Pearson: I know that FAO has been interesting itself for a good many years in marketing problems through its marketing committees, especially in the establishment of what I might call an international ever normal granary, but it has not yet been able to produce a scheme acceptable to all the governments concerned. The work in that field has not proceeded beyond the investigational and exploratory stage.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask the minister what seems to be the main difficulty in the way of establishing a scheme that would be acceptable. Is it finance?

Mr. Pearson: I should not like the committee to consider me an authority on this matter. I suspect the main difficulty has been to reconcile the interests of the predominantly food producing countries with those of the food consuming countries.

Mr. Blackmore: That would be a matter of finance, would it not?

Mr. Pearson: Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, finance enters into all these matters. That is quite true.

Mr. Blackmore: I realize that the minister is in a difficult position in dealing with this matter. Human common sense would dictate that mankind should believe that where we can produce an abundance of goods we should somehow or other be able to get them into the hands of people who want to use them. My general idea concerning FAO at its inception was that the men who conceived the idea intended to accomplish exactly that. They said that if man can produce the goods then it is our business to be able to put them into the possession of the people who want to consume them. In other words if the world can produce enough food, clothing and shelter, it is a complete anomaly that 1,500 million people should go to bed hungry every night. It is our business to devise ways and means whereby that production of which the world is capable shall supply the needs of such unfortunate people. Do I get the impression that the minister thinks that was the idea behind the FAO?

Mr. Pearson: I cannot really add very much to what I have said on this matter. As some hon. members will recall, this question was discussed in some detail before the standing committee on external affairs. There is an FAO committee on commodity problems. It is meeting now, and is going to correlate the needs of the various agricultural organizations. The Canadian representatives on that committee are I believe Dr. Barton and Dr. Hudson. A report on the work of the committee up to the present was given to the standing committee on external affairs. If hon. members are interested, they will find it as an appendix to the minutes and proceedings of the committee, No. 3. The report of the FAO committee on commodity problems has outlined some of the difficulties in the way of success in this field, but FAO is endeavouring to make progress.

Mr. Low: I have just a word to say, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this same item. I should like to say that the reason I asked the question was this. Since we examined the estimates in the external affairs committee a report was issued by one of the agencies of United Nations, I believe on May 12, indicating in some detail the conditions in the world with respect to food. I believe one of the important statements made in the report was that, in the opinion of the committee, if all the factors, land, fertilizer, modern machinery and the technical know-how throughout the world were to be utilized fully, there is no question about the ability of the world to produce sufficient food to take care of the needs of 2,400 million people. It is believed that they could be fed and kept at a fairly good standard of well-being.

That being the case, I have wondered about our own situation in Canada. We are not producing anything like the amount of food we could produce. Our farmers are afraid to go all-out in their productive efforts because they cannot find a market. If they did make that all-out effort they would find, under present circumstances at any rate, that present prices would be depressed so badly they just could not stay in business. It does seem to me a sad state of affairs that our producers of food in this country are not making an effort, and that inducements are not held out to them to enable them to produce all the food the world needs and yet stay in business. This is especially true when one considers the statement of the hon. member for Lethbridge that nearly half of the world's population is forced to go to bed hungry every night. We come face to face with the paradox of the world's abundance on the one hand, and on the other the suffering and deprivation on the part of half the people.

Because I have thought a good deal about that since that report was issued, I asked the question about the international commodity clearing house. It seems to me that such a body is not only desirable but absolutely essential if we are going to be able to furnish these people in backward countries and underprivileged areas with the things they need. It seems to me now is the time to be pushing this just as hard as we possibly can.

While I am saying something about this work, I should like to mention the services of the gentleman who made his report in the external affairs committee, Mr. Nik Cavell. I believe his services had been utilized in connection with technical assistance. I am sure the minister will not mind my mentioning it at this point, but I heard his report and had an opportunity to question him in the committee. I must say that Canada is fortunate in having a man of his ability and wide experience to administer our share of the technical assistance being advanced to the underprivileged and underdeveloped areas of the world. I was deeply appreciative of the fine job this man has done, and I wanted to say a word before the committee. I believe we are very fortunate in having a man of his calibre engaged in this work.

When we come to item 108 I hope the minister, in answering a plea that was made on behalf of Israel this afternoon by the hon. member for Mount Royal, will mention what plans are now in the process of formulation for increasing the amount of assistance to these underprivileged areas, and whether it is possible for him to use more money, and use it wisely and efficiently, than is being provided at the moment.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not wish to hold matters up, but it seems to me that in this problem which has been raised there lies the whole secret of the decision as to whether or not we are going to win the peace. It is a foregone conclusion which must be obvious to every thoughtful person inside this house and out, that we cannot reasonably expect conditions of peace to prevail in a world in which 1,500 million people have to go to bed hungry every night. In a world which the great Creator has abundantly provided with the means of production of all the goods which are necessary to give everyone in the world a reasonable standard of living, I do not think we can afford to let this matter slip by without a considerable amount of emphasis in our expression concerning the question.

I realize that the minister is quite helpless in this matter. Nevertheless it comes up for discussion under his estimates. It is just one of the headaches, of which he has an abundant supply.

Mr. Gillis: Tell him how to fix it up.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I shall tell him how to fix it up. As a matter of fact, in my speeches in this house during the last two years I have laid down a definite policy to fix it up. There has been no criticism of the suggestions I have made, nor intelligent questioning of those suggestions. I shall challenge anybody in this house to offer any criticism.

It is quite obvious that the difficulty is financial. The FAO organization, no matter how it may try, under the present financial system just cannot possibly get the money with which to buy from Canada, as an example, the surplus goods that Canada can produce and render available for distribution in the world. Now, is that not putting the matter simply, in a nutshell? That is the problem, is it not?

Mr. Gillis: That is right.

Mr. Blackmore: How do you solve that problem? What we are trying to do is to tax Canada, in addition to all the other taxes we are laying on, for the FAO. Under our present financial system we are forced to tax Canada for enough additional money to provide the FAO with enough money to enable the FAO to buy the surplus products of Canada. Is that not plainly and simply put? In respect of the United States, FAO under the present financial system has to call on the United States to tax the United States for enough additional money to provide FAO with enough dollars to buy the surplus products the United States is capable of fabricating and rendering available for distribution in the world. Is that not putting it straight?

The problem is this. Canada cannot afford that taxation. The United States cannot afford that taxation. If those two nations cannot afford it, no other nation can. Then how in the world are we going to enable FAO to obtain the money with which to buy the surplus production these two nations alone are capable of fabricating? That is the question simply put.

Mr. Gillis: The hungry countries have no money and they have nothing to exchange.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right. Therefore do we say that because they have nothing to exchange, they must die?

Mr. Gillis: Not necessarily. But you have to tax somebody to pay your producers for the goods.

Mr. Blackmore: But you cannot tax the people who produce them; and it is a foregone conclusion that you cannot tax the people who have to consume them, because those potential consumers are already in the depths of poverty.

Mr. Gillis: So where do we go from there?

Mr. Blackmore: That is the question. Where do we go from there? The answer must be found in what social credit has proposed time and time again for seventeen solid years in this house, namely that nations must be prepared to create money debt free and render that money available. Let us take the United States as an example. The United States could create money by the billions, debt free, in order to buy her own surplus of production. A number of people may say, "That will not work." But, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that we have found out that nothing which has been proposed up to the present time can possibly work. If the solution is to be found, it must be along the line of creating debt free dollars.

Could the United States safely create $1 billion of United States money and put it into the hands of FAO, to be used for the purchase and distribution of United States goods among needy nations? The answer is a resounding yes. All United States history and all financial history proves it beyond any shadow of doubt, if we will clear away the prejudice which has been engendered in our minds by men who have endeavoured to keep us enslaved. Abraham Lincoln created $450 million of greenbacks in the civil war. With those dollars he won the war. It now remains to be shown why the United States administration today could not create a corresponding amount of money, debt free, and either give it to FAO or put it in the hands of the needy nations so they can buy American goods.

The greatest problem that faces the United States and Canada today is that of markets, the problem of being able to get rid of their goods. I do not wish to bear down on this subject too long, Mr. Chairman, but I think the House of Commons should require the minister to determine exactly why FAO is unable to do the thing it ought to do—and which everybody's common sense tells him it ought to do—and then, the next time he comes before the house, be prepared to give not a shifty, evasive, meaningless answer but a factual answer that will meet the demands of intelligent minds.

I do not propose to enlarge on this subject because probably it would not be quite in order for me to do so. On the other hand I do not know but that it is the thing which is most in order under this item. If an arrangement could be made among the nations—the United States, Canada, Britain, France, the members of NATO and all the other nations that are able to produce and that want to purchase and want to sell—for determining some means whereby money could be created and rendered available for buying and distributing surplus goods, there is no reason under the sun why such a proposal should not succeed. It will be the greatest single factor contributing to peace just as the lack of it now is the greatest single factor contributing to war. For us to pretend that we can seriously go about the problems of removing the causes of war without attacking this essential matter of money for distributing surplus goods is to make ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of all realistic people.

Last year I suggested—and with this comment I will close at the present time unless I am provoked to go on a little further—that we could easily make Great Britain the clearing house. The hon. member for Cape Breton South will readily appreciate this suggestion. We could easily make Great Britain the clearing house if we and the United States would get off Great Britain's back, and abolish our contemptible unconditional most favoured nation clause and our GATT arrangement and all the others that have been strangling our commonwealth, and in place of them take effective measures to make Britain strong as she should be by now, so long after the war. Great Britain can create pounds sterling. There is no question about the remarkable success of the pound sterling, is there? There is no reason under the sun why Great Britain cannot create pounds sterling and distribute those among these unfortunate nations, take from us the goods which are necessary to enable her to support such pound sterling issues and become a great factor in the distribution of goods in the world. If there is anyone in the country who can offer a reason for questioning what I have said, I hope he will get into this chamber and give the reason. I am challenging anyone to show that the method of approach which I have suggested would not succeed.

Most of those nations that are now "have not" nations can produce certain kinds of goods and offer them for sale. Let us take Japan as an example. There is no nation on the earth that is potentially a better producer than is Japan. There are no people who are more skilful, more adaptable and more willing to work than are the Japanese people. Yet when they produce and then offer their goods to the world, they confront an almost impassable barrier because we refuse to accept their goods. What is the way out of all that difficulty? If Britain could take raw materials from raw material producing nations and exchange those with the Japanese for the goods they are able to produce, and then place those Japanese goods in the nations where they are needed and receive their production in return, it is conceivable that it would not be long—probably four or five years—until you would have built up in Britain an organization as a result of which the whole world trade could begin to be integrated and you would have real multilateral trade.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Just so long as it is a little more intelligent than the questions the hon. member ordinarily asks. Just ask a question that is intelligent. If the hon. member asks a question to which he requires an answer I will take care of every question he asks.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): If the hon. gentleman wishes to be impertinent I will not honour him by asking a question.

Mr. Blackmore: The difficulty with the hon. gentleman is that the only questions he has ever asked me have been impertinent ones. Up to the present time that has been my experience with him. If what I have said has offended him I withdraw it. Let it be a pertinent and intelligent question and I shall be happy to answer it.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I would ask my hon. friend whether the textile industry in Japan would continue to prosper and whether the textile industry of England would continue to prosper under the arrangement he has in mind?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, because—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: It is a good question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: The answer would be—

The Deputy Chairman: We have had a very full discussion on the first item of these estimates, and I was wondering whether the hon. member would co-operate by directing his remarks more particularly to item 98, which deals with the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall be glad to, Mr. Chairman, thank you. First of all, the answer to the hon. gentleman, whose question was quite intelligent and straightforward, is this: Yes, all the textile industries of all the world could prosper if the people needing textiles were provided with the means of buying the products of these textile industries.

The answer to the hon. gentleman's question first of all would be this question: Is there among the 2,400 million people of the world a need for all the textiles that all the textile industries in the world can fabricate? The answer to that question must be a resounding yes. Then why in the name of common sense can we not provide the people who need textiles with the means of buying the textiles that the textile industries of the world stand ready and eager to produce? That is the question. I submit that if there is any member in the house who would give a realistic answer to that question, that answer must be yes. I thank the hon. member for his question. The same thing would be true in respect of all other goods.

For a further example, is there any conceivable reason, as the hon. member for Peace River has pointed out, why we today in Canada should be reducing or limiting our production of hogs when 1,500 million suffering people require food? We are discouraging the production of cheese, of milk, of eggs, of fruit and a great number of other commodities. We ask: Are we discouraging their production? Of course we are, because we say there are no markets. Well, there are people needing these foods, hundreds of millions of them. People are dying because they cannot get the foods. A food and agriculture organization has been set up to take care of that very problem, and the item providing for the support of that organization is under discussion before us at this moment. What are we going to do about it? I submit that until the Secretary of State for External Affairs calls on the members of the Canadian cabinet and says: Gentlemen, we just cannot fool with this thing any longer. If I am going to go on working with you I want you fellows to get down to brass tacks and get a solution to this distribution problem. I do not want to wait ten years to do it, either. I want you to have something shaped up in two months.

Mr. Low: Page Jimmy.

Mr. Blackmore: Page the Minister of Finance. He is the one man—

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Knowles: And Howe!

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Let us turn to Germany. Look at the tremendous capacity there is in Germany for producing goods of all kinds. When you mention that enormous increase in the productive capacity of Germany how do you feel? You feel worried because they are going to compete with us for the world's markets. Well, can you think of anything more absolutely fantastic than to be in fear of greater production in a world where there is a tremendous amount of need?

Mr. Martin: I am sure nobody wants to ask the hon. member to abbreviate his remarks, because what he is saying is extremely important; but there are other occasions for saying it and I submit that this is not the particular item under which to discuss this matter. There may be other opportunities later on. I do not like to restrict my hon. friend but I do suggest that the important observations he is making could be made on another item, perhaps at another time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I had already drawn to the attention of the hon. member for Lethbridge the fact that we were discussing the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations, under item 98. I would ask him to co-operate by directing his remarks more particularly to this item.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I cannot see how in the world a person's remarks could be more particularly directed right to this problem of food and agriculture. How are we going to get food produced? How are we going to get it consumed? If that is not what this organization is set up for, I ask you in the name of common sense what it is set up for, and what is the use of spending any time and money on a thing that cannot begin to solve the problem? Is there anyone who is prepared to question me on that matter?

I greatly appreciate the courteous way in which you have managed this affair, Mr. Chairman, and I greatly appreciate the courteous way in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare raised the question. I will accept the minister's suggestion that I seize another opportunity; but I will tell you about what will happen. This matter ought to be discussed on the estimates of the Minister of Finance. The minister should come right here in this house and every member of this house should be right here and say: "Doug Abbott, we want answers; we want results. We do not want you to get up and parade out of the house when we begin to talk about this thing. We do not want you to send in your parliamentary assistant to talk about this thing so we cannot get at you. You are the fellow who has to help solve this problem, and we want you to do it right here and not next year".

Last year I tried in every way to get the Minister of Finance on the floor of the house to discuss this matter in a straightforward, scientific, realistic way, with no results at all but insults, practically, because the minister went out on June 20 and stayed out. On June 30 he did not even come in to discuss his estimates. He was utterly afraid to face the problem on the solution of which depends the whole success of the food and agriculture organization and peace or warfare in the world. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

99. International labour organization, $248,900.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to raise again with the minister the question I raised before. The international labour organization was established in 1919 at the time of the establishment of the league of nations. It was an independent organization; and it has continued to do useful work. I should like to hear from the minister just what functions it discharges and as to what relationship, if any, it has to the United Nations Organization. I remind the minister of what I said a moment ago—if I am wrong he will correct me—that I think it was established in 1919 at the time of the league of nations.

Mr. Pearson: The international labour organization is a specialized agency of the United Nations, even though it was established long before the United Nations. Actually it was established in the time of the old league of nations, as my hon. friend recalls. It has been very active since the war. A number of international labour conferences have been held which representatives of employers, employees and governments attended; there have been various trade committee meetings held. About 200 conventions and recommendations have been adopted, dealing with wages, hours of work, employment of women and children, labour conditions in special industries and things of that kind. I think these conventions have been useful. There again the situation is very much like that of FAO. The usefulness of this organization is greater in countries where labour standards are not as highly developed as they are in our own country. But I think it is a useful international organization. It is certainly considered as such by the labour organizations of this country, and I hope this vote for the continuance of Canadian support will be accepted by the committee.

100. United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, $331,800.

Mr. Knowles: Has consideration been given to the proposal that Canada send three delegates to the gathering at Venice organized under UNESCO with respect to an international society of artists? I believe a request was made to the government that financial assistance be made available for the sending of these delegates. What has been the outcome of that request?

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry I have not that information at hand at the moment, but I shall be glad to secure it before the discussion of the estimates is complete and give the hon. member the information.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not wish to cast myself in the role of a hard-boiled Philistine; but this is an organization one often hears criticized, and I think probably unfairly. It is easy to criticize UNESCO because it deals with cultural things which are hard to assess in any ordinary, mechanical way. Would the minister say a word on this subject?

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate the fact that UNESCO was one of the specialized agencies which was subjected to a good deal of criticism, especially in the earlier stages of its existence. I think that criticism sprang largely from the suspicion—that too many of the resources of UNESCO were going into projects which did not have sound bases in reality, and that too much academic—and I am using the word "academic" in the wrong sense—work was being done. It was felt that some of the projects put forward for international examination were, to say the least, pretty unreal.

The policy of the Canadian delegation at UNESCO meetings has been to try to introduce—and we are not alone in this—an element of practicality and reality into UNESCO activities. We think a good deal of progress has been made in that direction. Under the leadership of the present director-general I think UNESCO is performing a useful function in the field of what we might call non-material co-operation; and this should be a very important field of international co-operation indeed.

We discussed this matter not long ago—perhaps it was in the standing committee on external affairs—and reference was made to whether UNESCO might try to get agreement on some of the more important periods of history so there could be a universal history text book. I doubt if that would be possible, but I certainly think it is something worth trying for.

103. Commonwealth economic committee, $16,830.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What are the functions of the economic committee? The amount involved is small, but I would like to know what it is for.

Mr. Pearson: This is a commonwealth committee which originated from one of the resolutions of the imperial economic conference of 1923. It has continued in existence ever since, though now on a much reduced scale of activity. There was some question after the war as to whether certain of these commonwealth committees, which had not been very active, should be re-established. It was decided to re-establish this committee but to keep its activities down to a minimum so that, if it could be used for purposes of expansion later on, as work developed, it would be available.

I must confess there has not been much for it to do since the war. On the other hand its expenses are limited. It does issue volumes of what it calls a commodity series, setting out statistics in regard to world production, commonwealth production and commonwealth trade. It has also been issuing certain periodical intelligence services which are published sometimes weekly and sometimes monthly, as necessity indicates. This is an intelligence service in respect of trade in certain commodities within the commonwealth. That is about the extent of its activities.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would hesitate to suggest spending more money, but I would ask whether in fact this organization is occupying the field alone. In other words is there any other organization seeking to do this particular work? If not, then without wishing to refer to other debates that have taken place, it seems to me this is a matter of considerable importance; and I suggest that the minister might study it with a view to seeing whether its activities might be extended.

Mr. Pearson: That is a good suggestion. As a matter of fact we were one of the doubtful governments after the war, doubtful in the sense that we wondered whether it was worthwhile reviving the committee. But we found ourselves in a minority at that time, and agreed to its revival. At the present time a review of the activities of this commonwealth economic committee is being undertaken. In the light of that review it will be decided by the governments concerned whether the committee should be continued.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, in this connection I fancy people throughout the country who read Hansard will be interested in the following figures. Canada this year can afford $1,463,200 for the United Nations Organization; she can afford $246,800 for FAO; she can afford $248,900 for the international labour organization, and $331,800 for UNESCO. But for the commonwealth economic committee she can afford only 16,830 measly dollars.

That is something to arouse a person's interest. We know the greatness the British commonwealth had attained up to world war I. We know the British commonwealth almost single-handed, with the assistance of France and Russia, held the Kaiser at bay. We know the British commonwealth held Hitler at bay. One of the greatest stabilizing factors the world over, not only from the military but from the economic standpoint, was the British commonwealth. Why in the world is it we have lost interest in the British commonwealth? What has gone wrong with the puny men who are guiding us today? What are the powers behind them that are making them act like this? Surely what the British commonwealth was it is capable of becoming again; it has the same people and the same resources.

Why was there any doubt as to whether or not this economic committee should continue? I will tell you why. The policy, the concepts of men in the Canadian government and in the other governments that had to do with all this whole thing were guided by a group of evil people who wanted to destroy the British commonwealth. Why do they want to destroy the British commonwealth? Because the British commonwealth has been too great a blessing to mankind, in the minds of those evil people who are guiding the destinies of the world right now—from the United States. The thing we have to face up to right now is whether we are going to allow these evil forces to continue to weaken the British commonwealth and disintegrate it as they have already gone far towards doing, or whether we are going to have the British commonwealth rise and become the great and mighty power it ought to be in this year 1952, and which it can be if the Canadian government and other governments in the empire stand solidly together and say to the United States, "you have gone just as far as you are going to go in this matter of destroying the British empire".

I say that next time the minister should bring down probably ten times as large a vote for this economic committee, and I hope he will do other things to change the ideas of certain people. I still believe there is a great deal of virtue in that fine song about Britain which goes: "God, who made thee mighty, make thee mightier yet". That applies to the British commonwealth if we have the wisdom and courage to apply it. So will the minister just see that this economic committee is supported more generously in the future and be ready to bring in a report next time which will go much further than just telling us about a few pamphlets of statistics published?

Mr. Pearson: The destruction of the commonwealth is not involved in this vote. The budget for this organization was fixed by all governments of the commonwealth at a figure of something around $100,000 until it is decided what the future of the committee should be. It was also decided that Canada's contribution toward that $100,000 would be about 16 or 17 per cent, and that percentage is reflected in this vote. That is all there is to it.

Item agreed to.

108. United Nations expanded program for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries, $850,000.

Mr. Low: I wonder if the minister could answer the plea made by the hon. member for Mount Royal and indicate what moneys could be used under this vote.

Mr. Pearson: This is the vote for United Nations technical assistance. The target this year is $20 million, and it was felt that the appropriate Canadian contribution would be $850,000. That can be used for technical assistance in any underdeveloped country requiring such assistance, which would include Israel. It might well be that our part of this general vote could and would be used for assistance along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Mount Royal.

There is no special vote for assistance to Israel nor is it possible to include that state in the assistance given under the Colombo plan. We have already indicated our feelings toward Israel and have made certain goods available to that country. We have tried to assist them in that way quite apart from the fact that individual Canadians have rendered a good deal of financial assistance to this new state. The technical assistance program, toward which we are contributing this amount, could be used for that purpose. No doubt if Israel made application, the application would be considered.

Mr. Blackmore: I take it that this is to assist only in connection with production.

Mr. Pearson: It takes other forms such as the exchange of scholarships and fellowships, the sending of experts by the United Nations to help set up public administration organizations or civil service organizations, social welfare schemes and such things as hydroelectric developments.

Mr. Blackmore: I take it that up to the present there has been no technical assistance in the way of finding markets.

Mr. Pearson: All these schemes can be related to the economic progress of the country which is being assisted, and that should enable the country to find its own markets.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not wish to hold up the discussion but let me suggest to the minister that the men who have to do with this particular organization should become thoroughly proficient in social credit so that when they go to other nations they can teach them how to consume and how to distribute.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to bring that suggestion to the attention of the director-general of the United Nations technical assistance program, who is a Canadian, originally from the west.

Item agreed to.

International civil aviation organization—

109. To provide the international civil aviation organization with office accommodation at less than commercial rates, $76,046.

Mr. Green: I understand there is to be an increase in the amount used for this purpose. Would the minister indicate whether I am right?

Mr. Pearson: A further amount will be required as a result of recent discussions with the organization. An additional amount of $141,000 will be provided in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Green: In effect that additional amount is being paid to outbid other countries which wanted the headquarters moved from Montreal.

Mr. Pearson: I would not put it quite that way. The organization felt that the expenses of operation in Montreal were very high as compared with the expenses of similar international organizations in other countries. There was a good deal of discussion in the organization about whether it would be more economical to move the headquarters to one of those countries where such facilities are provided sometimes free of charge. As the result of this and as the result of an approach made to the Canadian government it was felt that we would be justified in making a further grant of $130,000 toward the rental of their building.

Item agreed to.

International joint commission—

110. To provide for preliminary studies and surveys of the mid-western watershed, $10,000.

Mr. Herridge: I support this item, but I would ask the minister for an explanation.

Why is it that we find different votes for different surveys by the international joint commission under different departments? For instance, the one concerning the Columbia river basin is found under resources and development?

Mr. Pearson: When a new reference is made to the international joint commission it has been the practice in the interest of convenience to have the Department of External Affairs pay the amount required for the first year. Any further amounts required are provided by the department directly concerned.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

113. Colombo program for technical co-operation in south and southeast Asia, $400,000.

Mr. Blackmore: I take it that this plan also has to do purely with production. These peoples should be taught how to consume and distribute. May I suggest once more in all seriousness that every organized community in the world ought to know a little about how to distribute and the system that will teach them how to distribute is social credit. I suggest that the minister also give some advice to these people to have their experts thoroughly versed in social credit rather than in orthodox finance which has already proved itself to be worthless and a failure.

Mr. Herridge: If the minister is going to put in a word for social credit I suggest that he bring the Regina manifesto to their attention as well.

Item agreed to.

114. To provide for and authorize grants or loans to governments of countries in south and southeast Asia to assist in the economic development of such countries, and special administrative expenses in connection therewith, $25,000,000.

Mr. Catherwood: The minister said this morning that his department had been in consultation with Indian officials, and I should like to know what the department has in mind in connection with the sharing of this $25 million. Is it going to be handled in the same way it was handled last year?

Mr. Pearson: This is the vote for the Colombo plan and, as the committee knows, is for $25 million to carry on the work which we began last year and which proved so valuable as a means of strengthening the relations between the countries concerned and also for practical purposes in those countries. This year we are asking for the same amount. How that amount will be divided among the countries concerned is now under discussion. Last year $15 million of the $25 million was used in India and $10 million in Pakistan. Of the $15 million that went to India the committee knows that $10 million was used for the purchase of wheat.

We are now discussing with the representatives of the Indian government how the money that will be allocated to them if this vote is passed will be spent. It is impossible to come to any final conclusion on the matter until we know exactly how much will be available for India because this year we propose to make a part of the $25 million available to Ceylon. Therefore it is difficult for me to say anything more definite than that. In the preliminary discussions with India—and we have also had preliminary discussions with Pakistan and Ceylon in connection with projects for those countries—it is interesting to note that India has shown great interest in using as much as possible of the funds which may be made available to them for the purchase of wheat.

Mr. Knowles: It is pretty close to six o'clock and realizing that it is desired to get these estimates through before we rise I will not take time to speak at any length on the item. But we would like to make it very clear once again how strongly we of this group support item 114, as well as items 113 and 108 which have already been passed. We feel that not only is the expenditure of money in this way to help improve the living standards of our fellow humans in other parts of the world good in itself but also that it is one of the best expenditures possible for the maintenance of the peace of the world. We strongly support these votes. We would be glad to see them much higher, and we hope the spending of them in the most useful and effective ways will be pursued diligently by the government.

Mr. Pearson: May I just say in that connection, because I think it is of some importance, that at the recent meeting in Karachi the Indian minister of finance said:

> The significance of such friendly assistance—

He was referring to the Colombo plan.

> —far transcends its material value.

The minister for economic affairs of Pakistan said at the same meeting:

> It is becoming increasingly clear that the members of the plan work as members of a family, unified with the idea of helping each other, and in the spirit of give and take there is no feeling of superiority attached to the act of giving or inferiority tainting the act of receiving.

The other day in the Australian house of representatives their secretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Casey, said—and I hope I may be pardoned for reading it:

> In the current financial year, Canada made a contribution of $25 million and will give a further $25 million for 1952-53. I would draw particular attention to the welcome and farsighted generosity of the Canadian contribution, bearing in mind the geographical distance of Canada from south and southeast Asia.

Mr. Low: That of course is just another example of what decency of treatment between people and countries will do, and until we establish an all-round program and policy of decency of treatment we just cannot expect to have peace. I certainly go along with all others in the committee in supporting the Colombo plan. It has done a grand job.

Mr. Blackmore: If the Colombo plan were using social credit there would be remarkable effects. You would not only have the sayings of these men; you would have wonderful achievements.

Item agreed to.

115. Contribution to the provisional inter-governmental committee for the movement of migrants from Europe, $154,600.

Mr. Green: Item 115 is a new vote. Will the minister explain it to the committee?

Mr. Pearson: This is an item for an intergovernmental organization for the movement of migrants from Europe in order to continue some of the work that was being done by the international refugee organization. When that organization was wound up last year it was felt it would be in the general interests of refugees and of receiving countries if some of the machinery, especially the shipping machinery that had been built up under the international refugee organization, could be kept in being. Therefore this temporary organization was formed for that purpose. Its emphasis is placed on assistance to migrants from Europe to overseas countries. For that purpose certain ships that previously worked for IRO are being retained by this organization.

Mr. Green: Will there be a vote each year or will there be just the one for the present year?

Mr. Pearson: It is just for this year. I do not know how long this organization will be required. During the course of the year it will be decided whether it will be continued for another year in the light of the results achieved.

Mr. Pearkes: Have the ships the minister referred to been purchased by Canada? Were they Canadian ships before?

Mr. Pearson: The ships I have referred to were rented by IRO from various ship owners, and that is being continued. They have not been purchased.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF STATEMENT OUTLINING PROGRAM FOR 1952-53

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (for the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like leave to revert to motions in order to table a statement on behalf of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blanchette: I should like to table, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence, a statement outlining Canada's defence program in relation to the estimates for the year 1952-53. This statement is along the same lines as that tabled in connection with last year's estimates. Copies in English and in French are immediately available for distribution.

PRIVATE BILLS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 338, for the relief of Marie Jacqueline Michelle Major Valiquette.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of this house I should like to move the second reading of all the divorce bills on the order paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lisgar suggests that we take all these divorce bills for second reading in one motion. This would affect Bills Nos. 338 to 345 and also divorce Bills Nos. 348 to 362 inclusive. Has the hon. member the consent of this house to proceed in this manner?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At this stage of the session I shall not object to a number of bills being grouped in one motion for second reading, but I do wish to register once again, and I shall probably do it again and again and again, my protest against these divorce bills being handled in this way. I repeat my earnest hope that one of these days we shall, as a parliament, decide to deal with these bills and any others that may continue to come before us in a more proper manner than is the present practice.

With respect to this group of bills covered by the motion made by the member for Lisgar, may I say that if it turns out that any of these cases is contested in the committee on miscellaneous private bills, we would of course want to review those cases more fully when they get back to the committee of the whole house.

Motion agreed to, bills read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

[Mr. Winkler.]

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation —Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time in nearly two years that I have made a statement on one of these bills which are presented to us for the purpose of incorporating a pipe line company. I do so for the purpose of indicating my opposition to this particular application and to the procedure which is followed in dealing with matters of this kind. In fact, my remarks are as much directed to the procedure as to the specific purpose of the bill before us. There is no pretence whatever that the purpose of this discussion is anything else than the hope that it will not be possible to deal with this bill during this session. After all, that should be frankly stated. It is the only device that can be employed to prevent the passage of a measure which certain members think should not pass, and where it appears that there is to be no real attempt to place before the house any sound argument in favour of the adoption of the bill that has been presented.

I have listened to the arguments that have been made against the adoption of this measure. I think those arguments are sound. I think the arguments should appeal to the judgment and common sense of the members. There has been no serious attempt on the part of anyone to meet the arguments that have been put forward. The attitude seems to be simply this: The bill is before the house, and we are not going to say anything more. We hope you will not be able to keep on talking against the measure and that in due course, without any argument in its support, it will come to a vote and we are sure that a majority will support it. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that is a reflection on the whole house. I suggest it is a reflection on the methods of this house, and it is a reflection on the manner in which the members are called upon to deal with what should be serious business.

My remarks are prompted particularly by the fact that when this bill was before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the evidence from expert witnesses who were available was cut off arbitrarily by a motion presented to that committee. On Thursday, April 24 of this year, at a meeting of that standing committee the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) moved that sufficient evidence had been obtained for the committee to decide as to the economic practicability of the pipe line under consideration, and that the question be put on the preamble without further examination of the witness. After discussion and the question having been put on the motion, it was agreed to on division. The record of the committee then sets out the division, and I see that the motion was supported by a substantial majority. The members of the opposition opposed it, with the support of one Liberal member of that committee.

That motion was not only to the effect that other witnesses should not be heard, but that the committee had heard enough from a particular witness. That witness was a man who was giving reasons why he thought it was not sound economically and otherwise to proceed with this particular pipe line. That course having been adopted, and the House of Commons now being asked to pass a bill which was denied an adequate examination before the committee, I do not think that the members of the house, without the opportunity to hear witnesses, should be called upon to deal with it.

I wish to speak about the procedure. I hope the extended discussion which has taken place on this measure may serve to impress upon the government the desirability of another procedure in dealing with the issuing of charters for pipe-line companies. I think it is appropriate to review exactly what it is the House of Commons is being asked to support by the motion now before us. We start with the fact that this bill is to incorporate a pipe-line company under the Pipe Lines Act which was passed by the House of Commons on April 30, 1949. That act, which is the overriding act empowering pipe-line companies to carry on their corporate activities, gives certain powers to any company incorporated to operate a pipe line. I think the members of the house should recognize how far they are being asked to go when they support a measure of this kind. Section 7 of the Pipe Lines Act sets out the powers which automatically are conferred upon any company which receives incorporation in this manner and then obtains authority to proceed with pipe-line activities by permission of the government and the board of transport commissioners who must pass upon the application.

I wish to read these into the record because they indicate the extremely wide powers that any such corporation receives. I am inclined to think hon. members generally have not been impressed with what it is they are being called upon to do. Section 7 of the Pipe Lines Act reads as follows:

> 7. A company may, for the purposes of its undertaking, subject to the provisions of this act and the special act,
> (a) enter into and upon any crown land without previous licence therefor, or into or upon the land of any person, living in the intended route of its line, and make surveys, examinations or other necessary arrangements on such land for fixing the site of the line, and set out and ascertain such parts of the land as are necessary and proper for the line;
> (b) purchase, take and hold of and from any person any land or other property necessary for the construction, maintenance and operation of its line and alienate, sell or dispose of any of its land or property that for any reason has become unnecessary for the purpose of the line;
> (c) construct, lay, carry or place its line across, upon or under the land of any person on the located line of the company pipe line;
> (d) join its line with the pipe line of any other person at any point on its route;
> (e) construct, erect and maintain all necessary and convenient roads, buildings, stations, depots, wharves, docks and other structures, and construct, purchase and acquire machinery and other apparatus necessary for the construction, maintenance and operation of its line;
> (f) construct, maintain and operate branch lines, and for that purpose exercise all the powers, privileges and authority necessary therefor, in as full and ample a manner as for a company pipe line;
> (g) from time to time alter, repair or discontinue the works or any of them, mentioned in this section, and substitute others in their stead;
> (h) transport oil or gas by company pipe line and regulate the time and manner in which oil or gas shall be transported, and the tolls to be charged therefor; and
> (i) do all other acts necessary for the construction, maintenance and operation of its line.

Those are immensely wide powers, Mr. Chairman; yet those are the powers which automatically are conferred by the Pipe Lines Act upon any company which receives a charter under a bill such as that which is now before the house. I do not think hon. members should be asked to confer powers of that kind under which they can seize property that we do not even know yet by actual description. If this company is incorporated and if it should receive the permission of the government and the board of transport commissioners to proceed with the operation of the pipe line, it will have wide powers of expropriation which should never, under any circumstances, be given to unknown people, for an unknown destination, and over an unknown route. I cannot think of anything which would indicate less regard for the responsibility of members of parliament than to give such wide and sweeping powers with no rigid definition of the route this pipe line would follow.

On a number of occasions when other pipe lines have been dealt with we have learned that these companies are quite ready to change the route, depending on what they think is most likely to meet with approval. They have the power to change the route. We are therefore asked, with all the responsibility and the authority of parliament, to confer these sweeping powers upon unknown people who acquire their rights under a charter issued in this way.

On an earlier occasion, some two years ago, I suggested a procedure which would be in keeping with the ordinary practices in matters of this kind and which would take away from the House of Commons and the Senate the pretence of exercising judgment with regard to something about which we have not sufficient evidence to exercise proper judgment. The procedure to which I refer would be simple. It would be for the government to introduce a simple amendment to the Pipe Lines Act. It need be only a single section which would say that the kind of company described in the Pipe Lines Act and which would obtain the powers conferred by the Pipe Lines Act would be a company which obtained an ordinary charter under the dominion Companies Act. It might be suggested by someone that this would be exercising still less control over the incorporation of companies of this nature. I should like to see no pretence whatever that real control is exercised. It is true that this debate has provided an opportunity to place before the committee arguments in support of a policy of Canadian priority in relation to the use of our resources. I submit that such a policy can be expressed, and established in some other way. I submit that a policy could be declared by a resolution, and that such a policy would guide those who are called upon to exercise their discretion in permitting these pipe line companies to carry on business. We do not yet know whether this company would be allowed to carry on business if it did get a charter. For that reason, amongst others, I do not think we should be granting a charter, which has some real money value the moment it is granted by this house, when we have no way of knowing whether or not that charter is ever going to give anyone the right to proceed.

I hope the time that has been occupied in discussing this subject for the purpose of indicating that a very substantial number of members do not want to see charters granted in this way will impress upon the government the desirability of such an amendment. That does not mean that a company which obtains a charter under the dominion Companies Act can proceed with a pipe line simply by virtue of the charter. It means that a company which obtains a charter in that way will then require to obtain permission to proceed with the operation of a pipe line by an application to the board of transport commissioners. It still must obtain permission from the government of Alberta if the gas or oil comes from the soil of Alberta. It must also obtain permission from the dominion government, and therefore the granting of a charter under the Companies Act would still leave the matter for decision by those authorities who now have no opportunity to exercise any real judgment as to whether or not the applicant in question should have the right to carry on business.

We would save time, and there would be no pretence about parliament having passed judgment. In that case any number of people who wanted to get charters could get them; and each would meet fairly before the board of transport commissioners and before the governments concerned and be able to present evidence in the ordinary way. No one would be left out in the cold. Anybody who was prepared to pay for a charter could get that charter, and the whole question would then be one for a semi-judicial body, the board of transport commissioners, to decide, with subsequent decisions by the dominion and provincial governments concerned. That, it seems to me, is a sensible, businesslike procedure which is in keeping with the general practices in regard to matters of this kind. It is one which would take away from parliament something that is occupying a great deal of time unnecessarily, and which I am sure will continue to occupy a great deal of time unnecessarily if this procedure is still followed.

I made that proposal before; in fact I made it on March 20, 1950. I hope that now, in 1952, the government may decide that this would be a better way of proceeding. If on the other hand the government has some other alternative, I certainly would be very happy to support any method which would take away from the parliament of Canada the pretence of passing judgment upon something in regard to which we are not furnished adequate information.

There is another point in regard to this matter that I should like to discuss. I should like to discuss the merits of this particular application and indicate why I think it is desirable that there be some clearly declared policy in regard to matters of this kind. This particular application is for a charter to construct and operate a gas pipe line from the province of Alberta into the province of Manitoba; and it is disclosed by those who have argued in support of the measure that the pipe line will then proceed into the United States.

May I emphasize once again that I for one am not arguing against the export to the United States in sensible and reasonable quantities of any raw material or commodity produced in this country. Nevertheless I do believe that the first concern of the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada should be the advancement of Canada and the employment of our own resources to the greatest possible advantage of our own people. Just a few days ago I presented an argument in this house in regard to wider employment of some of our raw materials in Canada. I was interested and somewhat surprised to find that argument summarized in the opinion of some people, as an argument in support of a ban on export. Hansard will disclose that I suggested no such thing; that I suggested the very contrary. I am saying that now simply to emphasize that whatever argument I am putting forward, it is not an argument in regard to a ban on this or any other raw material or natural resource that we possess, where it is in our interest that we export it. What I am saying is that the course we adopt should assure that we shall gain the greatest possible advantage from our own resources here in Canada. With that thought in mind let us see what the situation actually is.

Both Ontario and Quebec through their governments have indicated their desire to have natural gas from the province of Alberta. That has been stated without any reservations by members of the governments of these two provinces. Arguments that were put forth in support of this measure in no way dispose of the argument that was presented on the other side, that if this particular charter were granted it would for the time being prevent the construction of another pipe line to carry natural gas to the east. Therefore one of the questions to be decided as a matter of principle is whether or not this House of Commons, if it is called upon to exercise some measure of judgment, is or is not going to say that it concurs in the representations made by these provincial governments and is willing to take a course which will assure the transmission of natural gas for use in these two provinces.

Ontario already is using a very substantial amount of natural gas coming into the province from the United States. For that very reason it would be unreasonable to suggest that we should not be prepared to co-operate at different points in Canada where that co-operation seems reasonable. I think it would be very reasonable for the government of Canada to discuss with the government of the United States appropriate exchanges of natural gas at different points along the border.

The Canadian government knows that at this time there is an application before the appropriate authority in Washington to permit the export of natural gas into Ontario, a province which has been using natural gas from the United States for some time. Actually there is a contract now in existence under which gas is transmitted from the Texas panhandle up to Ontario; and that contract calls for the delivery of more than five billion cubic feet of natural gas a year. That however has not yet been formally approved by the authority in Washington which deals with matters of this kind. Therefore the whole situation in regard to that export is in a state of uncertainty.

I think this is the very kind of thing that could be dealt with properly by discussions between the two governments. Where there is any possibility of export, in a case of this kind, it should be as the result of negotiation and arrangement of that nature rather than by a hit or miss process such as that indicated in the measure now before us.

If a pipe line should carry natural gas through to Ontario and Quebec, that would not mean Ontario would be denied any natural gas for which it might have contracted with the United States. It would simply mean that the very much larger quantities that are required than those they can hope to obtain from the United States would become available right across the great industrial areas of northern and eastern Ontario. Also it would mean that this gas would become available in the busy industrial centres of Quebec.

Still, if that were a large pipe line, export at different points might be arranged by consultation between the governments of Canada and the United States. But if we are going to deal with this on its merits, then I submit that the first pipe line to the east which should be approved is a pipe line that carries its gas into the large industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec so as to assure to these provinces this natural resource which will help so much to develop the whole country.

Mr. Blue: What about Bruce?

Mr. Drew: I was under the impression that Bruce is still in Ontario, and I hope it will continue to remain in Ontario. I had not heard that it had declared its independence at any time. But I would certainly hope that the fine county of Bruce, along with all the other counties in Ontario and Quebec, would benefit from the available supply of this cheap and very efficient fuel.

I have heard the comment during this debate that this is an argument in favour of Ontario and Quebec. I have heard it said that it does not very much benefit the intervening provinces in western Canada, nor does it greatly benefit the maritime provinces. Well, we cannot change geography, much though we might like at times to do so. We cannot change the fact that there would still be a very long pipe line to the maritime provinces, if it were to be carried down there.

Nevertheless the area within which gas can be transmitted economically is increasing all the time, and it is conceivable that at some time even that might happen. I should be more inclined to hope that some time in the not too distant future the liquefaction of coal, or other employments of coal in the maritime provinces, might give them the advantage of their own raw materials which are in such abundance in those provinces in a form that could be changed into another type of fuel, and then into either gas or electricity. However, that is something for the future, something to consider at another time.

So far as this measure is concerned, I do submit we should not overlook the fact that the very large population of Ontario and Quebec provides a sound commercial outlet for the natural gas from Alberta. It has been noticeable that during the course of these discussions members of this house from Alberta have concurred in that suggestion. They have indicated their own opinion that this pipe line is not a sound proposition, and that if we are going to be called upon to deal with matters of this kind in the House of Commons, then the charters to be granted should have the interests of Canada as their first consideration.

I would hope also that we would bear in mind that when we strengthen the productive capacity of any one part of Canada, we strengthen the whole economy of Canada and increase the possibility that this country as a whole may advance, and that there may be an improvement in the situation in every part of the country.

With that thought in mind I would hope that in some way independently of this measure a clearly stated policy would be adopted by the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada under which, in the employment of our resources, we would place the interests of Canada and its people first, while at all times expressing our willingness to export resources on a reasonable basis so long as we do not limit our own opportunity for expansion and growth by so doing.

When I began these remarks I left no doubt that I was not making my argument in the expectation that it would change the opinion of those who have presented the measure to the house. I do hope that the absurdity of wasting so much time to prevent the adoption of an unwise measure will impress upon the government the wisdom of following some other course in dealing with applications of this nature.

I would hope that when this session comes to an end—and I certainly hope this bill has not been passed at that time—the government might decide that before we meet again there will be some provision for the issuing of a charter in a simple manner, and a procedure which would place anyone wishing to obtain a charter on an equal basis when appearing before the board of transport commissioners and the governments affected. They would then make the decision as to who is going to have the right to build and operate a pipe line. I will go further and say that instead of continuing this debate for the remainder of this session—I say this in all earnestness—the government should consider introducing a simple amendment to the Pipe Lines Act along the lines I have advocated. It could be a brief amendment adding a section providing that a company referred to in the act shall be a company with a charter obtained under the dominion Companies Act. I am reasonably sure that the members of this house would support such an amendment. It would take much less time to deal with that very effective amendment than will be wasted if this bill is brought up for discussion once again.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of joining with the official opposition in its filibuster against this bill, but I think a few words should be said. I must say that in my seventeen years' experience in this house, it is the first time I have known a leader of the opposition to talk out a private member's bill, but I suppose such things can happen.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to interrupt the hon. minister except—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: I am not going to interrupt the minister except to point out that I spoke on a private member's bill two years ago at the same time with the minister.

Mr. Howe: I am speaking at the same time with the leader of the opposition and probably for the same purpose. The suggestion is that it is all wrong for members of the House of Commons to examine the provisions of these bills, that the Pipe Lines Act should be changed so that any company incorporated under the Companies Act would have these rights. We all know that all that is necessary to be incorporated under the Companies Act is to file the necessary documents with the Secretary of State, pay the necessary fee, and then the incorporators would have everything they are asking this parliament to give them, by this bill.

Why not do that? That procedure has been considered. The reason was referred to by the leader of the opposition. Incorporation under the Pipe Lines Act carries with it the right of expropriation. It has been the practice of this parliament since confederation to be very jealous of granting incorporations that carry with them the right of expropriation.

Hon. members are aware that anyone wishing a charter to build a railroad or lay track for a distance of more than seven miles must come to this parliament with a private bill. Why? Because by the terms of the Transport Act the authority for laying of that track carries with it the right of expropriation. Anyone who wishes to build a bridge across international waters must come to this parliament to be incorporated because he is asking for rights over international waters, which rights are very jealously guarded by parliament.

I quite agree with the hon. leader that any reputable company that is properly financed, that is composed of reputable people and that has an objective that is reasonably sound should be able to obtain incorporation by a private bill approved by this House of Commons. That has always been my contention. I ask hon. members to remember that all this bill gives is incorporation; it does not grant any rights whatever to the company except the right which the leader of the opposition says should be granted as a matter of course under the Companies Act.

I do not agree that anyone should be able to go to the Secretary of State and by virtue of the fact that he files certain documents obtain an incorporation as a pipe line company when such incorporation may lead to obtaining the power of expropriation. It has always been the belief of the government that anyone who wants the right of eminent domain, the right of expropriation, should be compelled to come to parliament where he can be examined by members of parliament or by anyone who has a particular interest in the incorporation. The member representing that particular district should have the right to ask the incorporators any question he wishes to ask and obtain a satisfactory answer.

I believe that is a desirable safeguard. The incorporators of pipe line companies should be compelled to appear before a committee of parliament, to show what their interests are, to indicate their intentions, to prove their financial bona fides and, in short, to establish themselves as a reputable company.

You say, "That is perfectly reasonable. We pass several private bills of that type every session." We have run into two long filibusters in connection with pipe lines. One bill was before this parliament for two sessions before it was finally passed. That was the second bill. It is said that there is something wrong about this bill, but it is exactly like a bill which gave the same privileges and set out the same purposes of incorporation, which was passed at a previous session. That bill had to do with a pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg and then southward, and there was no difficulty about it. But in connection with this bill we have had this blockade lasting for several months.

I do not want to impute motives, but it seems to me that this opposition is really not opposition to a bill. There is nothing wrong with the proposed incorporation, as the leader of the opposition admits. This is opposition in favour of an incorporation which was granted previously. That was obviously the case two years ago, admittedly so. At that time it was contended that there was a perfectly good Canadian company that had been incorporated to build a pipe line from Alberta westward and then down across the international border, so why incorporate another company that would be a competitor.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Green: I will sit down when I am told to by the chairman and not by a backbencher.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member please state his question of privilege.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is quite wrong. If he will remember, the opposition was on the ground that the other—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a speech.

An hon. Member: No privilege.

The Chairman: The hon. member must realize that he is not stating a question of privilege; he is merely trying to clarify a point in the minister's speech which in his opinion is not correct. That must be done either by the hon. member asking the minister if he may interrupt in order to clarify the point or by waiting until the minister has completed his statement and then clarifying the point himself.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

Boundary Pipeline Corporation

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has made one speech.

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege—

The Chairman: Order; we cannot have two members holding the floor at the same time.

Mr. Howe: Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: I have told the hon. member that his question was not a question of privilege.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: I am willing to listen to an explanation.

Mr. Green: My question of privilege is that the minister said that the opposition to the bill two years ago was in order to prevent competition. That was not the case at all. The purpose of the opposition was to prevent lines being built down through the United States with only branch lines to serve Canada.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is not a question of privilege.

The Chairman: The minister may now speak.

Mr. Howe: I do not wish to be contentious. I have not had the advantages of other members of the house. I did not attend the committee's hearings, and I have heard very little of the debate in the house. I do not even know who the sponsors of the bill are. I refer to the real interests behind this bill. I presume other people know, but I do not know. I have no interest in the bill; but I do want to voice objection to this sort of delaying tactics every time a pipe line bill comes before the house. The hon. leader has said everybody is entitled to incorporate. Perhaps they are. I would not object to that statement; but before anybody is incorporated I say they should come before a committee of the house and show their bona fides. This company has done that. All companies asking incorporation must do so under the method of procedure specified by the Pipe Lines Act. I do not wish to undermine that procedure. I believe it is the correct procedure and I deplore the activities of the official opposition in blockading this second pipe line bill that has been subjected to this treatment.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, though not a member of the official opposition I feel there are two or three things I should like to say with respect to the bill now before us. Certainly no one can accuse me of having participated in a filibuster, because I have not taken any time in the house previously in connection with this matter or any other comparable measure which has come before us. I was particularly interested in the observations made by the leader of the opposition during the concluding portion of his remarks. He referred to the absence of a national policy with respect to the question of gas export. My personal conviction is that in the absence of such a national policy, clear cut and definitely defined, we have encountered the difficulties which are before us now and have been before us during the weeks and months that have gone by.

A moment ago the minister indicated that when a company desiring incorporation appears before a committee of the house every member is provided with an opportunity to secure definite information with respect to the specific route and to raise whatever objections he may desire to raise. I take exception to that statement. I am not aware of the fact that this company filed a specific proposal as to route.

Mr. Howe: On a question of privilege, if the hon. member will let me explain, I did not say that. All a company comes to this house for is the purpose of incorporation. The matter of the route is a question for the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Shaw: That is true, but did not the minister assert that when such a company appeared before the committee of the house members were afforded an opportunity to raise objections to any such specific acts of expropriation, let us say, which may affect the particular districts they represent? Certainly my experience leads me to the conclusion that no such opportunity is actually afforded at all. When a company appears before a committee of the house it is for the express purpose of putting before the committee a general idea of what the company proposes to do with respect to export, and information relative to the method of financing the company's operations. Beyond that I am very much afraid that members of the committee are left pretty much in the dark.

My fundamental interest in this matter at the present time stems from the fact that when the master pipe line measure was being considered by a committee of the other place the attorney general of my province appeared before that committee and pleaded with them to lay down regulations which would make it necessary for a company of this kind to appear before a semi-judicial body for the purpose of securing the right to incorporate under the Companies Act. Mr. Maynard, the attorney general of Alberta, in anticipation of some of the very difficulties we have encountered since that time, pleaded with the committee to give favourable consideration to his proposal. I well recall the reception his proposal met before that committee, because I witnessed it. It was turned down. To my mind so much of the difficulty we have encountered since that time stems from that very fact.

So far as safeguards in connection with expropriation are concerned, certainly the board of transport commissioners could take every precaution to determine whether the company applying for incorporation was complying with all the regulations with respect to expropriation or anything else, as a matter of fact, covered by any legislation existing in Canada today. I agree with those who have laid down the principle that, so far as the export of gas from one part of Canada to another part and thence elsewhere is concerned, we should give prime consideration to the requirements of our own country first. I am not one of those who assert that that involves the piping of gas from Alberta to the maritimes or, as a matter of fact, even to the province of Quebec or conceivably even to the province of Ontario, because I recognize that there is merit in a policy whereby we might exchange gas with our United States friends to the south.

Certainly we have to approach the matter from the economic point of view when making a decision in that respect. I think my own province is quite justified in the position it has taken with respect to meeting its own requirements first, and certainly I believe the rest of us are justified in asserting that we should see to it that the requirements of the Canadian people are met as far as possible. With respect to the bill now before us, I have no particular interest in the persons involved but I suggest it is unfortunate that we followed the course of action which we adopted in 1949 because it led to this difficulty. I think even now it is not too late for the government to introduce amendments to the master pipe line legislation which would enable us to refer these applications to a semi-judicial body—I have already mentioned the board of transport commissioners—for the purpose of dealing with them instead of doing it in the House of Commons. I feel confident that just as long as we have applications of this kind coming before the house, just so long are we going to encounter the type of debate we have had during the past several weeks and months. It is nine o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

433. Departmental administration, $213,883.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether the fund which was referred to in the report tabled by the Prime Minister recently having to do with claims arising out of enemy action will be administered by his department. If so, what is the basis of the administration? There are not sufficient copies of that report for every member to have one, so I have not had an opportunity of looking at it yet. I want to know what the relationship is between that set-up and the war claims commission which has been operating under this department.

Mr. Bradley: One of the recommendations of the Ilsley commission was the setting up of this war claims fund, and there was a further recommendation that a commission be set up to administer the fund.

Mr. Fulton: Under whose department will that commission operate?

Mr. Bradley: The commission, when set up, will make recommendations to the government about the matter, but no decision has yet been made about the commission.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister, then, whether we are any further along, and if so how much, toward a position where people who have lost all their assets as a result of enemy action—I refer particularly to those civilians who were prisoners of the Japanese—will be able to have some payment on their claims? When may we expect some final action?

Mr. Bradley: The government still has to deal with this report. It consists of some hundred pages concerning how these claims are to be dealt with; and in the meantime of course, there has been the decision to set up this war claims fund.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister nothing further to say about it? I have asked him this question every time his estimates have come up, and each time we have been assured that the matter is being dealt as diligently as possible. Two years have gone by now, and some of these people are starving; in fact I do not know how some of them are living. Is there anything else the minister can say?

Mr. Bradley: I believe we are very much closer. At least we have the report of Mr. Justice Ilsley, than whom I do not think we could get a more competent man in the dominion, and we have the war claims commission set up. Now we have to come to a decision on this report.

434. Companies branch, $87,658.

Mr. Fulton: I have some questions here, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he has received complaints from lawyers as to the length of time taken between the filing of an application for incorporation and the granting of that incorporation. My information is that as much as two months sometimes elapses between the filing of the application and the granting of the letters of incorporation.

Mr. Bradley: It very often happens that there are errors in the documents filed, and frequently there has to be a conference between the department and the applicants before we can get these matters strengthened out. This sometimes takes time.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister information as to the number of applications at the present time which have not yet been granted?

Mr. Bradley: I have no figures at the moment, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think there has been any undue delay.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a supplementary question? How long is the delay? Surely one could have an idea. What the minister says about there being data to verify is understandable, but the profession is surely entitled to a certain degree of service. We are entitled, as representing the public, to know what the story is.

Mr. Bradley: If the documents are completely in order and all the requirements of the law have been fulfilled, there might perhaps be a lapse of two or three weeks. If everything is not in order it will take an indefinite time, depending upon the length of time required to get things properly in order as the law requires.

Mr. Fulton: Not wishing to misinterpret what the minister has said, may I ask him if we are to understand from the fact that it takes two or three weeks to process an application when things are in order, that if there be an error it would take some two or three weeks to find that there is an error and report back to the applicant?

Mr. Bradley: Possibly, but possibly not as long as that.

Mr. Fulton: I have no personal knowledge what the record was in the past, but is the fact that this two or three week period is necessary for processing an application an indication that there is an accumulation of work at the branch which, in effect, amounts to its being in arrears?

Mr. Bradley: There is a shortage in our staff, as a matter of fact, and the number of applications is increasing all the time. Perhaps there have been some delays, but not very many, except of course in cases where there are debatable points as between the applicant and the department. Then it may take months, and may involve a hearing in the minister's office. As a matter of fact, last week I had a hearing in the office which lasted over three hours.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can quite understand that when a question arises there may have to be a hearing and delays, but that seems to be a matter in which the applicant ought to be able to look after himself. What bothers me is that, if I understand the minister, where things are in order and there is no hitch of any kind, where I take it it is just a routine matter, I was shocked to hear the minister say it would take two or three weeks. I would have hoped he could say just two or three days. If it takes two or three weeks, I should like to know what is actually involved. So far as I am aware there is nothing very much to be done.

Mr. Bradley: It is not possible to lay down any definite rule in cases of that kind, because what sometimes happens is that an emergency arises or there is some reason why there should be particular haste, and priority is given to a case of that kind. One cannot lay down any definite period within which an uncontested—let us put it that way—application will be finally processed.

435. Trade marks branch, including a contribution of $2,400 to the international office for the protection of industrial property, $93,704.

Mr. McLure: This item refers to trade marks and so on. I notice that the total vote is $93,704, and the amount for stationery is nearly 11 per cent of that or $10,000 for office stationery, supplies and equipment. It would seem to be extremely high for office stationery, etc., when there is only $93,000 for the total office.

Mr. Bradley: I think some $5,000 of that amount is for the printing of the new act.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister explain what this item of $2,400 means, which is described as a contribution to the international office for the protection of industrial property?

Mr. Bradley: That is our contribution to the fund under the international Paris convention of which we are members.

436. Bureau for translations, $898,025.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that the French translations of the committee reports are available to hon. members a long time after they are published in English. The delay is so great that at times the reports are available only at a subsequent session. For instance, this year we had numerous reports of last year that we received only by the end of the session. The minister will realize that it is an abnormal situation.

I asked him if some suggestions had been made by the bureau for translations or by an organization called the technological institute of the French language. He said no. I will make a suggestion. The translators and perhaps the minister will be greatly surprised when they hear it. It is that we have too many printed reports of the evidence of the committees. The size of the reports we get is greater than that of Hansard. I wonder whether it is necessary to print everything that is said in the committees. It is true that there are some important committees; but when a member sits on a committee, he thinks the committee on which he is sitting is the most important of all the parliamentary committees. I would therefore ask the minister to suggest to his colleagues a considerable reduction in the number of printed reports of the evidence given before the committees.

Most of these reports remain unread by hon. members. It is physically impossible to read all of these reports. They are thrown into the wastepaper basket and this entails considerable waste. Will the minister, be kind enough to tell us today, tomorrow, the day after Monday or Tuesday what the cost is of the printing of the committee reports in English and in French? What are the committee reports that are published and what is the cost of the publication of those reports in both languages?

When I speak about the translation, what I say about it applies as well to the English edition of all those reports. Most of the time it is no more useful than is the French translation. Both should be suppressed. It is only in major cases that we should have printed reports of the committees.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I believe the hon. member who has just spoken has struck upon one way in which expenditures may be reduced. It seems to me, as the hon. member has said, that a committee member is chiefly interested in the committee on which he is serving. If he reads the evidence taken in that committee he is doing about all that he can do, if he is also to attend the sittings of the house. It is seldom that a member will read the reports of committees on which he is not serving. I therefore think the economy to which the hon. member refers could be effected with respect to both the English and the French editions.

I am not so sure, however, that this particular vote covers that matter at all. This has to do with salaries in the bureau for translations. Perhaps the Secretary of State can tell us where these people are employed and for what particular purpose. Is it in connection with the House of Commons and the Senate or elsewhere? While he is answering that question I wonder whether he would be good enough to explain why it is necessary, when they have 168 translators, to employ outside translators at a cost of $7,500?

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the hon. gentleman,—

Mr. Lennard: The hon. member is not the minister.

Mr. Pouliot: —because I am familiar with the situation. I fought the bill for the institution of the bureau for translations. It was brought in by a Conservative Secretary of State, Mr. Cahan, on the suggestion of a civil servant who was afraid of being fired. This civil servant created the position of superintendent of the bureau for translations in order to have a niche for himself there in case he was fired, but he was not. That was the only purpose of the establishment of the bureau for translations.

Moreover I will tell the hon. gentleman that the House of Commons has no control over the translators. Prior to that time the translators were under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker; that included the translators of the committee reports, the translators of Hansard and all the translators that were doing the work of the House of Commons. They were under the immediate jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker. That situation was changed. Now all the translators are in the bureau for translations under the immediate jurisdiction of the superintendent of the bureau for translations and then of the Secretary of State. We have no more to do with them. They are no longer the employees of the house. The same applies to the Hansard reporters. Prior to that time Hansard was under the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. That was the purpose of the debates committee, of which I happened to be the chairman, without canvassing for that honour.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You did not find a niche.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the hon. member. The debates committee has nothing to do now except to decide on the number of copies of Hansard that should be available to the members of parliament for free distribution.

Mr. Knowles: It had one meeting about four years ago.

Mr. Pouliot: Prior to that time it had frequent meetings, because it was on the recommendation of that committee that the staff of Hansard was appointed. That committee also had jurisdiction over the translators. Now nothing of the sort exists. This situation has come about as a result of Conservative policy and legislation that was enacted when Mr. Bennett was in power.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How long ago was that?

Mr. Pouliot: It was in 1934. The record is downstairs. What I regret is that we no longer have authority over the employees of the house. The same thing is true with respect to the elevator men. They are not under the authority of Mr. Speaker; they are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works. A number of those in the civil service besides the stenographers, the messengers, the members of the protective staff, the post office and others who do our work are not under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker. That is a situation which I think is abnormal. Moreover, in 1936 I introduced legislation to repeal the act establishing the bureau for translations. Unfortunately the Speaker at the time did not understand the thing very well and he declared the bill out of order. But here it is. The hon. member for St. John's West has the whole story.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am very grateful to the hon. gentleman. He does seem to be well informed on the subject; nevertheless I should like a reply from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Bradley: Whatever may be the merits of the argument of the hon. member for Temiscouata, whose experience in this chamber extends over a much longer period than does mine, the fact still remains that parliament has charged this department with the responsibility for the bureau of translations. We have to look after all translations for parliament and for all government departments and agencies.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Explain the need of the outside translators.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Bradley: That happens during the time parliament is in session, particularly, when we have more work to do than ordinarily.

Mr. Lennard: What work?

Mr. Herridge: I do not wish to be discourteous to the hon. member for St. John's West, but I think he has things upside down. When dealing with the question of committee reports, I understood the hon. member to say that only the members who were on the committee read the reports; the others did not read them. It is the other way round. It is the members who are not on the committees who, in my opinion, need the reports.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The hon. member said "need" not "read".

Mr. Herridge: I always read the reports to see what the hon. member for St. John's West has said on any question. If I did not read the reports I would not know.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I cannot return the compliment.

Mr. Bradley: We have to look after whatever parliament gives us to translate. It is not our business to say what we should do. We do what we are told by parliament, and the additional men we engage during rush periods are in the nature of a temporary staff, as it were. They are paid for doing their work and we think we save money because we do not have them on the staff all the year round.

Mr. Lennard: The Secretary of State said that when the house was sitting they needed additional translators or additional staff. I should like to know what the translating staff have to do when the house is not sitting.

Mr. Bradley: We have to translate reports and correspondence from all departments of government throughout the year.

Mr. Knight: Do the interpreters who interpret in regard to censorship of books for the Minister of National Revenue come under the jurisdiction of that minister, or under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State?

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member; I do not think the minister heard the question.

Mr. Bradley: I did not hear the question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knight: There are certain interpreters used in the department that censors books and literature. That censorship is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue. My question was whether the interpreters under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State are used for that purpose, or whether these interpreters are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue, who is supposed to be the censor of literature in Canada.

Mr. Bradley: We have nothing to do with interpreters. If any document has to be translated for any department of the government our bureau for translations does it.

Mr. Pouliot: With the exception of the Senate, because the Senate has kept its jurisdiction over the translators and has set a good example to the House of Commons. In 1934 the House of Commons abandoned its rights over the translators, while the Senate kept them.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the hon. member for Temiscouata will not mind at this point if a part of what he said when he was on his feet before is corrected. He was correct, I would say, in telling us that the translators do not come under the jurisdiction of the House of Commons, but the other groups to whom he referred before, the reporters, the postal branch, the stenographic branch and so on, all come under the jurisdiction of the Speaker. They are listed under legislation.

Mr. Pouliot: Not for their appointment, as it did before. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what the hon. member said.

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, yes. I used the English language. My hon. friend is quick enough to understand it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me there is still a difference between two authorities, and I should like to have this matter straightened out. As I understood him, the hon. member for Temiscouata told us that we no longer have any control over the translators. On the other hand, the Secretary of State, as I understood him, said the translators did what the House of Commons ordered them to do. These two statements, if I correctly summarized them, seem to me to be in conflict.

Mr. Bradley: We do the work that is sent to us to do.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): A service department.

Item agreed to.

437. Canada Temperance Act, $1,000.

Mr. Fulton: Can the Secretary of State explain why this item of $1,000 for legal fees with respect to the Canada Temperance Act is necessary?

Mr. Bradley: That item is there in connection with the Canada Temperance Act to be used if necessary in places where the federal government has to foot the bill. I do not know whether anything will arise this year.

Mr. Fulton: What are these places? I am seeking information about this?

Mr. Bradley: This act is now in force in only two places for which we have any responsibility. Should it be put in force in some other part of the country where we have responsibility we may have to use that vote.

Mr. Fulton: Does the Secretary of State not think that we could wait until we put the act in force in these places where we have responsibility before asking parliament for this money, which is the basis for taxation which is struck?

Mr. Bradley: No; we must have the vote there, because we do not know when the occasion is going to arise.

Mr. Fulton: How long is it since an occasion has arisen?

Mr. Bradley: Any place in Canada can put the act in force. If that should happen it may be that we shall incur expenses in connection with it.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry; I do not quite see the force of the minister's explanation. It would seem to me that if this is an act which it may become the responsibility of this government to enforce—the Secretary of State has not yet said how long it is since that situation has arisen, but I would gather that it is many years—surely the Department of Justice could make counsel available to his department to look after it. Surely the Department of Justice and the counsel available within that department could look after it. I must say that at the present time I cannot see why this item of $1,000 should be included for something that looks like a contingency which never arises.

Mr. Bradley: This is a federal act. I understand that in Ontario the province bears the cost of enforcement wherever it may be necessary. However, there are parts of Canada where this is not done. Should the act be put into force in one of those places where the province will not bear the expense, then we have to do it. That is the reason for the vote.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister tell us how long it is since that situation has arisen? How long is it since the act has been put into force in any place where this government would have jurisdiction?

Mr. Bradley: Until 1950 the act was in force in the county of Beauce, in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fulton: I take it that it is not in force there now, and that there has been no need for this money in the last two years.

Mr. Bradley: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: Is it not the minister's opinion that we should dispense with the item until we have notice that the act has been proclaimed elsewhere?

Mr. Bradley: We cannot wait until the next session. If it happens to come into force in the meantime we have to enforce it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This has been going on for years. How much is in the fund now?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It lapses every year.

Mr. Bradley: Yes, it lapses each year.

Mr. Pouliot: As you know very well.

Patent and copyright office—

439. Patent division (including the former patent record division), $840,391.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice there is an increase in staff from 13 to 22 in the administration division, and that in the patent division there is an increase in number of staff from 138 to 146. Would the minister explain that? Then, in previous discussions of this kind we have been informed that the patent division is behind in its work. Is that still true?

Mr. Bradley: This is simply a shift of salaries from one portion of the branch to another. The men are still doing the same work.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the minister answer the other question I asked, as to the patent office being behind in its work. Is that true today?

Mr. Bradley: During the year we received 15,448 new applications, of which we disposed of 14,496. We have an increase of 952 pending applications. Considering that there was an increase to the extent of 1,124 new applications filed during the year, we think we have held our own fairly well.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have here the report of the commissioner of patents for the year ended March 31, 1951. There are one or two things in it with which I am not familiar. In the fourth paragraph on page 10 there is reference to the London accord, and to German patents. Would the minister explain that paragraph and the significance of those expressions? What does the London accord cover, and do we come in under it?

Mr. Bradley: Immediately after the war the London accord became an arrangement under which citizens of allied countries could get, royalty free, the right to use wholly-owned German patents.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is a very brief and, I suppose, complete explanation. But I see on page 5 a reference to 11,000 claims under the international convention. Would the minister explain the significance of the international convention as distinct from the London accord?

Mr. Bradley: Under the Paris convention some 50 or 60 countries by agreement among themselves made an arrangement whereby nationals of those several countries would have the same rights in other countries, in respect of industrial property, as in the country of origin.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister enumerate those who are included? Perhaps it would be easier to enumerate those who are not included.

Mr. Herridge: And would the minister please explain his answer? It is not very clear to us.

Mr. Bradley: Roughly, in the western world it would include Canada, the United States, Mexico and Brazil. It includes also the western European countries. Roughly speaking, other countries would be out.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has referred to 50 or 60 countries, and in enumerating them he referred to Canada, the United States, Brazil and European countries. That would be only about a dozen. Is South America out?

Mr. Bradley: I have not the figures here at the moment, but if my hon. friend wishes to have them I can get them for him accurately.

Item agreed to.

440. Copyright and industrial designs division, including a contribution of $2,100 to the union office for the protection of literary and artistic works, $20,279.

Mr. Fulton: Earlier this session I had occasion to bring to the attention of the minister a suggestion made by the exhibition association in Vancouver that at agricultural fairs where musical compositions are played, not for profit but simply for the entertainment of the crowds attending such fairs, they should be exempt from the payment of copyright fees on such musical works. Such musical pieces are played not for profit but for the entertainment of the people attending the fair, and it is contended that they should be exempt from the payment of the copyright fees on musical works.

I understand that attempts have been made several times in the past to frame a section for the Copyright Act which would have the effect of exempting agricultural fairs from the payment of royalties on music played under such conditions. Apparently those attempts were not successful, and I wonder if the minister would say what is the position today and what is the government's attitude toward the request of the Vancouver organization—they may have been joined by others—that the legislation should be amended to exempt agricultural fairs from the payment of royalties on the performance of copyrighted music.

Mr. Bradley: I understand that this matter has been referred to the supreme court and apparently their views are not particularly favourable to the organization my hon. friend has mentioned. We are prepared to take this matter under consideration, but just what will be the result from the standpoint of policy I am not prepared to say at the moment. I understand there are cogent arguments which could be used against it.

Mr. Fulton: Did the minister say that the supreme court does not look with favour on the organization to which I have referred?

Mr. Bradley: The Supreme Court of Canada gave a judgment, the interpretation of which was unfavourable.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I could put it this way: the supreme court gave a judgment which interpreted the Copyright Act in a sense which was unfavourable to the organization.

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: That was some time ago and I understand that representations have since been made that this action be taken. I have received letters and I have written to the minister about it. I wonder if he could indicate what is the present position.

Mr. Bradley: The position is unchanged but, as I said before, we are prepared to consider that particular point when we revise the act.

Mr. Fulton: When will the revision of the act be undertaken?

Mr. Bradley: Probably within the next twelve months.

Mr. McLure: The total vote is $20,279, and over 20 per cent of that is for stationery. That seems completely out of line with the other items. They must be great letter writers.

Mr. Bradley: There are a lot of copyright certificates to issue, and copies have to be issued as well.

Mr. Green: Has the department given any consideration to a problem which arises in connection with the importation of educational and scientific books. I understand that books of that type come in duty free, but because of the provisions of our Copyright Act the Canadian purchaser of such books may not get the benefit. The Copyright Act permits the publisher of such a book to send these books to a Canadian agent and set whatever price he desires on them. I have had complaints from people in Vancouver that they have had to pay several dollars more for a book in Canada than it was selling for in the United States.

One man wrote to the United States for a book listed at a certain price but the publisher told him that he must get it from the Canadian agent, and he found several dollars was added arbitrarily to the United States price. In other words the copyright law is being used to extort higher prices from Canadian purchasers of these books, and that seems to me to be unreasonable.

Mr. Bradley: I am not prepared to give the hon. member an answer right now, but we will look into it.

Mr. Green: It is most unfair that such a situation should be created by our copyright law which apparently gives such wide protection to the holder of a copyright that he in turn can hold up the public and deprive them of the benefit that should accrue from no duty being payable. I ask the minister to look into the whole situation.

Mr. Bradley: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Lennard: What is this contribution to the union office for the protection of literary and artistic works? Why do we have to contribute to this union?

Mr. Bradley: We are members of the organization and we have to contribute to its upkeep.

Mr. Lennard: What is that?

Mr. Bradley: The Berne union.

Mr. Pearkes: I wrote to the minister about a year ago stating that representations had been made to me that an amendment should be made to the act so that horticultural creations could be patented or copyrighted. Could the Secretary of State say what action has been taken? It seemed to me that the larger horticulturists were anxious to have this amendment, whereas it might prove detrimental to the smaller growers who would have great difficulty in paying for the necessary copyright for patents or whatever it is called.

Mr. Bradley: This comes under patents, but I have no objection to answering. The matter is under consideration now. I believe a system of protection has been introduced in the United States, and we are watching to see how they get along with it.

Mr. Pearkes: Will you keep in mind the interests of the small growers?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: It is so easy for a big firm to import a creation and get a copyright on it or a patent, as we call it, whereas the smaller man who has developed a floral creation cannot get a copyright. Therefore his interest is excluded from the development of that particular species. I do not think it is altogether a good thing to have this copyright included unless adequate safeguards are given.

Mr. Lennard: With respect to this union office, is the government a member of the union and what union is it?

Mr. Bradley: It is a union for the protection of industrial property.

Mr. Knowles: It says literary and artistic works in the book of estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry, but I have not understood about this union yet. Who are the members of the union? Is it international? Is it the various nations that are the members, or who are the members?

An hon. Member: The check-off.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. This is the check-off.

Mr. Bradley: Reading from the second schedule to the Copyright Act, which is the revision convention signed at Berlin on November 13, 1908: This convention, Mr. Chairman, was revised again at Rome in 1928 and at Brussels in 1948.

Convention for the purpose of revising the convention of Berne of the 9th September, 1886, the additional article and the final protocol attached to the same convention, and the additional act and the interpretative declaration of Paris of the 4th May, 1896; made on the 13th day of November, 1908, between His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Emperor of India; His Majesty the German Emperor, King of Prussia . . .

—and so on.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then as I understand it this is an international union of various nations. What do they do? Are they joined together to give mutual protection?

Mr. Bradley: It renders mutual copyright protection in somewhat the same way as is done for industrial property.

Item agreed to.

Office of the Chief Electoral Officer—

56. Salaries and expenses of office, $60,963.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the reason for the increase in this item?

[Mr. Bradley.]

Mr. Bradley: I think the increase is caused mainly by the increase in salaries. I believe that is the main cause.

Mr. Green: I noticed on page 129 where the details of the vote are given—

Mr. Bradley: I might add that there is another cause. The employees of the chief electoral officer were brought under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission and that led to a readjustment of salaries upward. That also is responsible in part for the increase, and then there was the general increase in salaries.

Mr. Green: In the details we find an amount of $14,280 for casuals and others. That is an expense which was not incurred in the preceding year. What is the explanation for that?

Mr. Bradley: The explanation for that is that seven additional employees had to be taken on in connection with extra work the chief electoral officer had to do as a result of the change in the election act which resulted in the issuance of a new instruction book.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The amount of $14,280 is for the coming year. Have they been taken on since April 1?

Mr. Bradley: I believe they are employed now. I might add that the seven employees who were taken on have to divide into parcels and package some 300 tons of election material to be used whenever required.

Mr. Knowles: When will that be?

Mr. Bradley: You tell me.

Mr. Knowles: We thought we might catch you napping.

Mr. Adamson: Three hundred tons seems like a lot of paper, but only a small portion of it has any real validity.

Mr. Bradley: That will continue to be so.

Mr. Adamson: I want to ask where the expenses appear for the work done in establishing the Northwest Territories election machinery. Do they appear under this item or under the Northwest Territories estimates?

Mr. Bradley: All expenses for elections are paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Adamson: It was said in the house the other night that under the new legislation for the Northwest Territories the chief electoral officer and his officials have spent some considerable time setting up election machinery for the first time in the Northwest Territories. There must have been extra expense for that work. It must have taken his time and probably the time of many of his staff. They must also have had travelling expenses. Is that in this vote or is it in the vote for the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Bradley: That was paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, and I understand the amount was in the neighbourhood of $14,000.

Mr. Cardiff: The minister referred to seven employees having received a lot of the money in this vote for the distribution of tons of this election material. Surely to goodness they are not carried from one year to the other to run an election once every four or five years.

Mr. Bradley: These employees were taken on in January. They will probably be there about a year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice on page 129 that sundry expenses of elections are set at $25,000 for 1951-52 and also for 1952-53, but to the left of those figures actual expenditures are shown as $222,000 in 1950-51 and $327,000 is the estimated amount for 1951-52. Can the minister tell us how much has been spent so far with respect to the six by-elections in 1952-53 for which there cannot be any vote in these estimates?

Mr. Bradley: As I say, these election expenses are paid out of the consolidated revenue fund but the Auditor General insists that we keep that vote there every year.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can you tell me how much the six by-elections cost?

Mr. Bradley: I understand that the accounts have not all been paid yet.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How much has been paid so far?

Mr. Bradley: We have not that information.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can you get it?

Mr. Bradley: We can get it for you.

Mr. McLure: I want to draw attention to another item having to do with stationery.

Now here is an expenditure of $60,000 and the stationery item is only $750, whereas in some of the other votes it was more than 25 per cent of the total vote.

Mr. Pouliot: It is because this is a branch of the department in which there is no red tape.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the hon. member a parliamentary assistant?

Mr. Bradley: That is just office stationery, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: What practice will be followed with regard to the appointment of returning officers once the redistribution bill has passed? There are to be new ridings, of course, and some ridings are to be wiped out. What procedure will be followed, and how long will it be before the returning officers are appointed for all these ridings?

Mr. Bradley: We can do nothing, Mr. Chairman, until the redistribution bill passes. Then the appointments will be made by order of the governor in council as soon as possible.

Mr. Green: Will they be appointed during this calendar year?

Mr. Bradley: Possibly; I hope so. One never knows when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will bring about an election.

Mr. Knowles: While we are making up our minds on that point, may I remind the Secretary of State that it is usual for the redistribution bill, as we call it, not to become effective until after dissolution.

Mr. Bradley: There is authority in the Canada Elections Act for the appointment of returning officers in these new ridings when the new act passes.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the Secretary of State could explain to me how, under the item of expenses of elections, where the vote is $25,000 this year as it was last year—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That question was asked twice before.

Mr. Knowles: Go ahead and see if you get the same answer.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the answer was not understandable. What I am interested in is how expenses of $327,000 are paid out of the amount that is authorized?

Mr. Bradley: For the benefit of the hon. member I do not mind answering the question again. Election expenses are paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, but the auditor general insists that we have an item of $25,000 in the estimates each year.

Mr. Knowles: That is the same answer he gave last time.

Item agreed to.

Civil service commission—

78. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $1,912,064.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask some questions that may involve the Secretary of State getting some figures. If that means that any more officials need to come in, then I have given fair warning.

While waiting for that, may I draw to the attention of the Secretary of State a paragraph in a document which has just recently been published. It does not bear a date of publication, but on the back at least there is a note which says it was printed in 1952.

It is entitled "For your information as a civil servant of Canada", and it was prepared by the staff training division of the civil service commission, Ottawa. On page 16, under the general heading "Your promotion opportunities", I find this paragraph:

> When vacancies occur, a sincere and planned effort is made to select the best person available, regardless of sex, religion, nationality, political belief, personal sponsorship, overseas service or any other extraneous consideration.

I shall grant, Mr. Chairman, that some of these considerations are correctly described, but is that a correct way of referring to overseas service—as an extraneous consideration?

Mr. Bradley: From where did the document come?

Mr. Knowles: I thought I indicated it came from the civil service commission. It is a booklet entitled "For your information as a civil servant of Canada", prepared by the staff training division of the civil service commission, Ottawa. It was printed by Edmond Cloutier, C.M.G., O.A., D.S.P., queen's printer and controller of stationery, Ottawa, 1952.

Mr. Bradley: Would you mind reading that again?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I think I know the cause of the levity, but I regard the matter to which I have drawn attention as quite serious. It seems to me that somebody has made a slip. The paragraph reads:

> When vacancies occur, a sincere and planned effort is made to select the best person available, regardless of sex, religion, nationality, political belief, personal sponsorship, overseas service or any other extraneous consideration.

I agree that, in civil service matters, all those considerations except the last one might properly be designated as extraneous. Surely the civil service commission does not regard overseas service as an extraneous consideration.

Mr. Bradley: I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would tell us whether that applies to appointments or promotions?

Mr. Knowles: According to the book it appears, as I said before when I read this the first time, Mr. Chairman, under the general heading of "Your promotion opportunities".

Mr. Bradley: I understand that overseas service does not apply to promotions.

Mr. Knowles: Does the Secretary of State feel that even if that is the case it is proper to refer to overseas service as an extraneous consideration.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Bradley: From the standpoint of promotions it is apparently not to be considered; that is what the statement says.

Mr. Knowles: We shall leave it to the Secretary of State to get a copy of this booklet, and see what he really thinks about it. May I ask the minister whether he has any up-to-date figures as to the number of civil servants in the various categories, permanent, temporary permanent, temporary and any other category. I do not want to confuse him—

Mr. Pouliot: Take permanents first.

Mr. Knowles: We shall take the permanents first, then the temporary-permanent and temporary. Can the minister give the figures for this year, last year and perhaps the year before that?

Mr. Bradley: There are, roughly, 130,000 employees under the civil service commission. Of those 60,000 are permanent and 70,000 are temporary.

Mr. Knowles: What was the situation a year ago and two years ago?

Mr. Bradley: The increase in the permanents last year was 10,000 and the year before about 6,000, so the number of temporary employees would be reduced accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Secretary of State divide the temporaries into ordinary temporaries and temporary permanents?

Mr. Bradley: We have no such distinction.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to bring to the attention of the Secretary of State a case which concerns pensions of civil servants. Apparently some distinction is made between veterans who served in the first world war and those who served in the second world war.

A veteran of world war I entering the civil service after July, 1924, can have his war service counted towards his superannuation on paying double the normal contribution for that period—that is, the employee's share and the government's share—plus 4 per cent interest.

However, as he entered the service after July, 1924, he comes under the provisions of part I of the Civil Service Act which stipulates a ten-year salary average to establish his rate of pension.

Had he entered the service prior to July, 1924, part IV of the act would have applied and his pension would have been based on the average salary of five years. In short, the 1914-18 veteran, although he is purchasing service for that period at a high rate plus interest, is denied the privilege of being placed under part IV with resulting benefits in retirement.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Chairman, I think that is a matter for the Department of Finance, not for this department.

Mr. Adamson: Does not the question of civil service pensions come under this item?

Mr. Bradley: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Adamson: Does not the civil service commission set the rules of entry?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was trying to apprehend the purport of what the hon. member was saying. I think he will find that the matter can properly be discussed under item 130 of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether the civil service commission has anything to do with the prospect of the five-day week, or is that matter also to be referred to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Bradley: I think the days and hours of work are determined by the treasury board.

Mr. Knowles: All right. We will take that matter up with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Adamson: There is just one other question I want to ask and it is this. Under what rules does a person become permanent? Who sets the designation? I have in mind one case of a civil servant who has had 27 years with one department, has been promoted three or four times, and has been actually in charge of one of the subdepartments of this department in the absence of the director. Yet despite all efforts, and despite 27 years of continuous service, he has not been able to be classed as a permanent civil servant. A great deal of that service, in fact most of it, was given overseas. This civil servant is in the department of immigration, as a matter of fact. That fact may have something to do with the matter. After that length of service it would seem to me a gross injustice not to have that civil servant classed as a permanent civil servant, particularly having regard to the fact that he has for years requested that he be considered as such. Who decides? Is it the minister? Is it the director? Is it the civil service commission? Who makes the decision?

Mr. Bradley: The decision will depend upon two questions. The first is whether the work he is doing is of a permanent character. Second, the department must report that his work is satisfactory and ask for his transfer to the permanent list.

Mr. Adamson: The work is of a permanent character.

Mr. Bradley: I wonder whether the hon. member would be good enough to give me the details of that particular case. I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Adamson: I will, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLure: Does the civil service commission make any appointments?

Mr. Bradley: I understand that it made 29,000 appointments last year.

Mr. McLure: Did it make those appointments on the record of the candidates, having regard to how they are appraised on their examinations?

Mr. Bradley: That is so; yes.

Mr. McLure: Or did it merely make recommendations to the government instead of making the appointments?

Mr. Bradley: The civil service commission is an independent organization. The government does not interfere with its decisions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How many civil servants are ordinarily resident in Ottawa?

Mr. Bradley: About 32,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is a high number for this city. I take it that the people of other provinces and other cities outside of Ottawa are given opportunities to take examinations for appointment here? Would that be correct?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Following up that question there is one other I wish to ask. As to the people at the extremities of the country—for instance, those in British Columbia or in Newfoundland—does it work out in practice that although they are notified of positions, they do not actually enter to any extent and compete?

Mr. Bradley: The commission has regional offices in every province in Canada, I understand, and they issue notices. Application can be made through the regional office in each province.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are there actually many applications for appointments that are being made here in Ottawa?

Mr. Bradley: As a matter of actual fact quite a large proportion of officials do come from the extremities of Canada, but frankly not as many as we would like.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister just said the commission had made 29,000 appointments, I think it was, last year. If I remember correctly he said earlier that the increase in the number of civil servants had been only 10 per cent of the total.

Mr. Knowles: He said the number of permanents had increased by 10,000 and that the number of temporaries had decreased by the same number.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What does that indicate as to wastage? The argument is apparently stronger if there are 29,000 appointments made and the numbers are no greater.

Mr. Bradley: The 29,000 includes wastage. The actual increase was about 8,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is the point I want to get at. Is there wastage of 21,000?

Mr. Bradley: That is turnover.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That seems terrific. Is there anything that can be said in mitigation of what seems to be a rather astonishing figure?

Mr. Bradley: It has been much higher during the last two years. For that we blame the industrial situation to some extent.

Mr. Green: Does the minister mean that the members of the service are able to get so much better salaries outside that they are leaving the service?

Mr. Bradley: In a good many cases that is so; yes.

Mr. Adamson: Then the turnover in the civil service is of the nature of 24 per cent per annum.

Mr. Bradley: I have not worked out the percentage.

Mr. Adamson: There are 130,000 civil servants. Is the turnover 29,000?

Mr. Bradley: We have to take into account the fact that a good many of those appointments are for short terms, and there may be a turnover in one appointment perhaps two or three times a year.

Mr. Adamson: Are most of these 29,000 in the lower brackets, or are a fair percentage of them in the upper brackets? What I am interested in is not only the turnover in the lower brackets, but the appeal by industry for the higher paid civil servants. Are we losing a great number of civil servants in the higher brackets to industry, and particularly civil servants who have technical skills?

Mr. Bradley: No; the bulk of the turnover is in the lower brackets.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister said a few moments ago the government does not interfere in connection with appointments. I understand examinations are held for appointments. After the examination a person is appointed. Those who rate in order of merit are listed, I understand. Has it been the experience during the past year that all those who happen to be in second place have received the appointment, if a vacancy occurred in the position?

Mr. Bradley: No; there are cases in which the department rejects the higher candidate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What happens in that case? Is there a report to the minister? I have known of a case where I think that happened. What happens in such an incident as that? Does it remain wholly with the commission or not, where the commission decides not to act according to the strict principles laid down. I am not saying that is never the right thing to do, but I am asking whether in such a case there is any report to the minister of the circumstances. Is there a check of any kind on the commission in the matter?

Mr. Bradley: Is the hon. member referring to a rejection by the department?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understood the minister to say there were certain cases where the person who came highest, according to the ordinary test, was not appointed. I know that happens occasionally and I am asking the minister whether in such a case there is any procedure whereby a report is made to the minister or to someone else. In other words, in such an exceptional case is there some reviewing authority?

Mr. Bradley: So far as the commission is concerned the candidate who gets the highest marks gets the job, but he may be rejected by the department. Section 24 of the act reads as follows:

> The deputy head may, at any time before the expiration of six months, reject any person assigned or appointed to any position under his control or direction, or he may extend the period of probation within which such person may be rejected for another six months; and the cause of rejection, or the reason for extending the period of probation, shall be reported by the deputy head to the commission.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is the other way around.

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is to say, the deputy head may for cause refuse to continue an appointment and then refer it to the commission?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That part is clear; but does the minister now say that the commission is bound, absolutely bound, to appoint the person who receives the highest marks? "Marks" was the word he used. Is it as definite and as rigid as that? That surprises me. I am also wondering if it is quite as rigid as that in practice.

Mr. Bradley: I do not think I shall read the section unless the hon. member requires it, but ordinarily the decision is that the person getting the highest number of marks gets the position, so far as the civil service commission is concerned, but considerations may arise occasionally which would cause them to give a different decision.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What would those considerations be?

Mr. Bradley: Special qualifications.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That comes back to this.

Mr. Bradley: I will read the section of the act to you, if you like.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me put my question first. A few minutes ago the minister used the word "marks" which suggested that the whole thing depended on examination. Now he is using a broader term, which I think might be quite sensible, an additional test. But I want to know whether in fact it is marks, or whether the commission is entitled to use its discretion. For instance, there are certain appointments that are made partly as a result of written examinations and partly as a result of a personal interview. What is the situation here?

Mr. Bradley: The section reads:

> The commission shall thereupon appoint the person whose name stands highest upon the commission's list of eligible persons for the class in which the position is found and who is willing to accept the appointment; in case there is no such list for the class, the commission shall forthwith hold an examination and, if necessary to prevent any serious interference with the public business, but not otherwise, may fill the position at once by making a temporary appointment as prescribed herein.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am getting more confused every moment because that seems to refer to a list. If that list was not available and you went on and had an examination, what would happen? Would the minister read those words again?

Mr. Bradley: They read:

> The commission shall thereupon appoint the person whose name stands highest upon the commission's list of eligible persons—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How is that list arrived at?

Mr. Bradley: By a competitive examination. An examination may be either written or oral or both oral and written.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to return to the item which was up a moment ago, namely the item of wastage. The minister seemed to give the answer in a very general and somewhat offhand way. All we got in the end was that the wastage was predominantly among the junior ranks, which is what one would expect because there are more of them. But I would have thought that would be a matter of such deep concern to the minister and to his senior officials that we should be able to get some rather detailed information. I would have thought there must be some rather significant facts which should enter in here. I do not feel like leaving it in that entirely general, and if I may say so, offhand way.

Mr. Bradley: I understand this subject is being considered very seriously by the commission now.

Mr. McLure: Does the civil service commission make appointments? I asked that question before, and the answer was that it does. However, a little over a year ago I was interested in two individuals who had taken part in an examination. Altogether there were four or five who took the examination for a civil service position, but the man who ranked highest in both the written and oral tests did not get the appointment. The man who came third was appointed. Of course, according to my belief, the civil service commission did not make any appointment at all; I always think it is the government that makes the appointment. Of course I may be wrong in that.

In this instance, according to the regulations of the commission the man at the top should have received the appointment. I do not wish to give names because the man who was appointed is a good chap and a friend of mine, but his capabilities are not nearly equal to those of the man who was first in the test. They are not in the same class at all.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Perhaps he got it because he was a friend of yours.

Mr. McLure: No; the fellow who got the job was a strong Liberal.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): And that is why he was a friend of yours?

Mr. McLure: He was a friend of mine, just the same.

Mr. Hees: We make allowances.

Mr. McLure: And that was the reason he got the job. It is a pity to have this question bandied about here tonight. What we should do is to have the officers of the civil service commission before us for an hour or two so we could iron out some things we all know are not as smooth or as straight as they should be. I realize that recommendations are made to the Department of Finance, the Department of Agriculture, or whatever department it may be; but I do not think those recommendations are carried out. I say the department turns around and says to the civil service commission, "We will tell you whom to finally appoint". Then the appointment is made.

Mr. Bradley: I wish to repeat that the government does not interfere with appointments made by the civil service commission. There are cases when departments reject those who have been selected by the commission, but they would constitute less than one per cent of the whole.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I wish to say only a few words, and they are words of congratulations to the civil service commission upon the very fine job they are doing. I say that seriously and sincerely. My only complaint in the county of Charlotte is that those who receive the appointments are all Tories. I repeat that in my view the commission is doing a fine job, and they are to be congratulated upon the way they make appointments.

Mr. Knowles: Have you never seen D. R. Bishop?

Mr. Adamson: What is the procedure when a minister requires a certain man? Can he appoint him without going through the civil service commission? The Department of Defence Production would be a case in point. The minister of that department might require a certain man for a specific job. Generally the man selected must sacrifice a great deal when he accepts the job. However, the minister wants one man he knows could fill that job, and he does not want to go through the civil service commission. The man is needed in a hurry. What is the machinery? Is it possible to by-pass the civil service commission in a case of that kind?

Mr. Bradley: It can be done where parliament gives authority to do so; but not otherwise.

Mr. Adamson: Parliament gives authority through what means? Is it by order in council?

Mr. Bradley: By statute.

Mr. Balcom: With regard to the returned soldier preference, is there a point where that preference does not operate as against non-soldiers?

Mr. Bradley: If a returned veteran comes up to the standard required by the department, he has absolute preference over all other candidates.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that only in respect of appointments?

Mr. Bradley: For appointments, yes.

Mr. Balcom: Does that mean that the man who was able to pass the examination would not receive the appointment, but that a returned soldier would? How does that effect the department concerned?

Mr. Bradley: So far as we know the preference given to veterans has not done any serious harm to the service.

Mr. Balcom: Is special consideration given to a soldier who has enlisted in the Canadian army but who, because of his officer holding him in some special job, has been prevented from going overseas?

Mr. Bradley: There is no provision for them now.

Mr. Balcom: Would the minister take that into consideration?

Mr. Churchill: I would ask the minister to make a statement concerning competitive examinations held to fill positions that become vacant during the year. Would he indicate the number of examinations set, the cost of setting them, the number of candidates, and the cost of conducting examinations.

Mr. Bradley: We have not those figures at hand now. To secure them would involve some research, but if the hon. member wishes to have them I can get them for him.

Mr. Churchill: The minister said there was a wastage of about 29,000 per year. That would seem to be important, and perhaps the process of filling positions that become vacant would be costly. The information I have asked would be helpful.

Mr. Bradley: I think I can get it.

Mr. Adamson: What is the cost of recruitment for the civil service? The breakdown refers chiefly to the salaries of personnel including clerks, investigators, organizers and the like. There is one small amount of $35,000 for advertising, as it is set out at page 153. What was the cost to the civil service of the recruitment of the 29,000 people who came in? My understanding is that the commission is responsible for upgrading and for other duties. In this instance I am referring to the job of recruitment. What was the cost of recruiting those 29,000?

Mr. Bradley: You mean the bulk figure?

Mr. Adamson: Yes; that would be all right.

Mr. Bradley: The total cost was about $2 million, and I am advised that the estimated cost of recruitment was $1,125,000.

Mr. Adamson: That is about $30 a head?

Mr. Bradley: I do not know; the hon. member is better at figures than I am.

Mr. Adamson: It is about $40 a head.

Mr. Howe: Very cheap.

Mr. Pouliot: In previous years there was a list at the end of the civil service commission report indicating those who served on the civil service commission board. I was most interested in that list because it showed the gentlemen who conducted the examinations. I wonder why the publication of that list has been discontinued, and when it was discontinued.

Mr. Bradley: The list is available to the hon. member if he wants it. It was deleted from the report purely as a matter of cutting costs.

Mr. Pouliot: I would like to know when and why it was deleted from the report.

Mr. Bradley: It was hardly deleted; it was not inserted, which is somewhat different. The object was purely to cut costs. I can get the list for the hon. member if he desires to have it.

Mr. Pouliot: I would like everybody to benefit from it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How many appointments to the public service—do not let us call it the civil service—are made without the tests which have been described to us having to be passed? For example, do those who come in on a temporary basis have to pass the tests that have been outlined to us tonight? Is the method of appointment exactly the same?

Mr. Bradley: Yes, if the positions are under the jurisdiction of the commission.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do they take the same examinations and are they chosen in exactly the same way as the members of the permanent staff?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then we will leave them aside for the moment. Are there not in fact a good many appointments of a minor nature which do not come to the civil service at all?

Mr. Bradley: I believe there are about 30,000 positions which do not.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When we are given a list of civil servants we do not get that 30,000. We have more employees than we know of. That is not my point. I want to know how the division is made. Can the minister tell us in a general way who those 30,000 are and how they are appointed? Are they appointed by friends of the party?

Mr. Bradley: The statutory law of the country determines which positions come under the civil service commission.

Mr. Adamson: Does that mean that there are—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Thirty thousand civil servants not appointed by the commission? No, sir; it is not true.

Mr. Adamson: The question was answered as though there were.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If you are speaking of prevailing rates and labouring people, they are not appointed by the commission.

Public Archives—

A—Department—

321. General administration and technical services, $262,306.

Mr. Herridge: The two votes having to do with this branch show a decrease of $1,279, and I am rather sorry to see that tendency although I am all in favour of economy. I think at the present time the archives is one branch of the government service which actually requires more funds to do its necessary work. I rise as one who is interested in the archives to express my appreciation—I am sure I am joined in this by a lot of other people—of the excellent work being done by the dominion archivist and his staff. We are fortunate in our present dominion archivist because of his wide knowledge and ability, his academic training and his great interest in the archives of Canada. I am sure that everyone will agree that anyone wishing to secure anything from the archives is met with the most courteous and efficient service on the part of the archivist and his staff.

I think the present report on the public archives is excellent. It is drafted in easily understandable and readable form. Besides the excellent pictures of Her Majesty and the Duke of Edinburgh there is an excellent picture of the minister and also one of the undersecretary of state. I have had several people comment on the excellent reports and the clear picture given of the work being done in the dominion archives branch. They show that the work is well organized and that they are doing a lot of work that has not been done up to date.

Public Printing and Stationery—

323. Departmental administration, including in 1952-53 procurement and accounting services to meet stationery and printing requirements for other departments, $353,732.

Mr. Knowles: It is a little late to open up a discussion on matters relating to the printing bureau. It is going to take us a while to digest the information we have obtained this evening, so we will cut it short. Initially may I ask the Secretary of State if he can tell us when it is expected the printing bureau will move to its new quarters, and what progress is being made in connection with that building.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that is a subject upon which I am not a very capable prognosticator. It depends on when we can get the steel and when we can proceed with the work. Possibly if my hon. friend were to apply to the Minister of Public Works for information he would get more than I can give him.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the Secretary of State can tell us what is the current rate of wages at the printing bureau.

Mr. Bradley: It is $1.75 an hour.

Mr. Fulton: What is the reason for the large increase in this item? There is an increase of $281,000. The item is for departmental administration, including in 1952-53 procurement and accounting services to meet stationery and printing requirements for other departments. The amount is $353,732 compared with $72,604 last year, an increase of $281,128. It is four times the amount of the item last year. Why is that increase so pronounced?

Mr. Bradley: The explanation is that in years past a good many of the administrative staff and employees in the printing bureau were paid by a sort of surcharge placed upon the price of work done for the departments through the advance account. This year we are bringing these items into the estimates so it is all before the house.

Mr. Adamson: Does this mean that there is a change in procedure with respect to parliamentary printing? I remember being on the printing committee some years ago, and there was considerable criticism raised about the printing of committee reports. The reports would be printed in English and then months later a contract would be let and the reports would then be printed in French. They were only available months after the session had ended. There was considerable criticism of that practice in the committee because by that time the French version of those committee reports would be virtually valueless. They would be out of date. Has that practice been stopped, and does this increase in the estimate take care of that?

Mr. Bradley: This item brings about no change in the procedure. The reports come out in English first because for the most part the proceedings are in English and they have to be translated into French. That is what causes whatever delay there may be in the production of the French copies of the reports. This item makes no difference in procedure.

Mr. Adamson: The committee reports in French are contracted to printers outside the printing bureau, are they?

Mr. Bradley: Some are and some are not.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister give me any idea of the percentage of contracts let outside the printing bureau?

Mr. Bradley: About 65 per cent of the whole went to outside firms last year.

Mr. Adamson: About 65 per cent?

Mr. Bradley: Of the total.

Mr. Adamson: Sixty-five per cent of the total printing went to outside firms? Can the minister give me an idea of the cost of that in round figures?

Mr. Bradley: About $4¼ million. That does not include paper. We usually provide the paper.

Mr. Adamson: Printing to the value of $4¼ million went to outside printers?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: The printing bureau provided the paper and the $4¼ million went to outside firms simply for printing. Is that so?

Mr. Bradley: That is correct.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PRIVILEGE—REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER ARTICLE BY MEMBER FOR YALE

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret to have to rise on a question of privilege which concerns an article published in the Armstrong Advertiser on May 29, 1952, and written by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones). It reads as follows:

Rail extension queried

Mr. Pouliot, Liberal member for Temiscouata, was the only one injecting a sour note when the bill to extend the Canadian National Railway at a cost of $10 million to Kitimat was under discussion. He claimed that British Columbia already had more mileage of railway per one thousand inhabitants than any other province. (Statistics proved such not the case).

Here is the record, Mr. Speaker; I am reading from page 118 of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines:

By Mr. Pouliot:

Q. Mr. Fairweather, you are welcome. Will you please tell me what is the mileage of the railways in British Columbia compared to the province of Quebec by thousand people?

A. Well, I am sorry, sir, I cannot give that offhand; I would be pleased to figure it out.

Q. Well, I will tell you, it is three to one—three people out of one thousand in British Columbia have a line of railway—I mean both railways, compared to one in the province of Quebec.

That is what I said. I will tell the hon. gentleman of whom I am exceedingly fond to be more careful in the future.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if the hon. member misread my statement. I took it from the Hansard. If it is checked, I think you will find that it is correct.

Mr. Pouliot: I would ask the hon. gentleman not to take anything for granted. Let him look at the record again.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY AND SATURDAY SITTINGS ON AND AFTER JUNE 25

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday, June 25, 1952, and every Wednesday thereafter, and on Saturday, June 28, 1952, and every Saturday thereafter, until the end of the present session, the sittings of the house shall in every respect be under the same rules as are now provided for other days under the special order passed Friday, June 13, 1952; and also that the order of business and procedure on Saturdays shall be the same as on Thursdays.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is it the intention of the department to extend the lobster fishing season in that part of Nova Scotia known as Inverness-Richmond, for which an application has been made?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): It is the intention of the department to extend the lobster fishing season in area 7, the area referred to by the hon. member, to Saturday, July 5, 12 o'clock midnight.

[Later:]

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. Has any decision been made with regard to the extension of time in connection with lobster fisheries in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Mayhew: I gave an answer only a few moments ago. The intention is to extend the season to midnight on July 5—that is, five days.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Is the minister in a position to make a statement to the house on the week-end news reports concerning discussions with the United Kingdom respecting the St. Lawrence seaway development? Are these discussions at a private or at a government level?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I did see the reports in a number of papers to the effect that contractors in the United Kingdom were most anxious to help in the development of the St. Lawrence seaway project, but personally I have no knowledge of any official offer being made. I think that what the newspaper report indicated was simply that in case it were possible for the province of Ontario and the federal government to proceed, the one with the power development and the other with the navigation facilities, there was being offered to the Canadian government equipment which might be used for both power and navigational facilities. Beyond that I am not able to comment. I think it is a newspaper statement more than an official offer; but if one were made it would be carefully considered.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO RETROACTIVE PROVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Would it be possible for the minister, before this session ends, to make a statement as to whether or not the amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, which have been put off until the next session, will include a provision making the terms of those amendments retroactive to whatever date would have been the effective date had the bill been brought in at this session, as was indicated in the speech from the throne?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): It would not be possible to do that, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I should supplement the answer I gave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is possible that some of the changed provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act could be made retroactive, but I think it is unlikely that all of them could be.

GERM WARFARE

STATEMENTS BY DR. ENDICOTT—INQUIRY AS TO LEGAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his department received any legal opinion from the Department of Justice, which apparently was asked for it some five weeks ago, relative to whether or not proceedings under the Criminal Code can be taken or will be taken respecting the statements made by James Endicott as to germ warfare.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This question was raised last Friday, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said at that time that it was still under advisement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it has been for six weeks. One would think they could get an answer in that time.

TAX AGREEMENTS

COMPENSATION TO PROVINCES IN LIEU OF CERTAIN TAXES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 347, to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I explained at the resolution stage, the purpose of this bill is to authorize our entering into agreements with the provincial governments to make certain payments to them in return for the rental from them of certain tax fields for a further five-year period. I have also made it clear that the new agreements will be in substantially the same form as those which have been in effect with eight provincial governments during the past five fiscal years.

I believe the house would think it appropriate if I should now make a statement recalling some of the background and explaining the essential features of the new agreements.

It will be recalled that following protracted negotiations in 1945 and 1946, tax rental agreements were entered into with seven of the then existing provinces, that is, with all provinces except Ontario and Quebec, and later when Newfoundland entered confederation in 1949, a similar agreement was entered into with that province. Under these agreements, the details of which were the outcome of lengthy discussions, the provinces undertook not to levy during the five calendar years 1947 to 1951, or allow their municipalities to levy, personal income taxes, corporation income taxes, other taxes on corporations, or succession duties. In return for this undertaking, the federal government agreed to make rental payments during the five corresponding fiscal years—that is to say, the five fiscal years ending March 31, 1952—determined on the basis of certain formulae arrived at in joint discussions with the provincial governments. These rental payments were to be such as to guarantee to the province a fixed minimum level of payments, but this guaranteed minimum was to be adjusted upward to take account of national economic growth and increased provincial population. In practice, the actual payments made to the various provinces during the five years of the agreement exceeded by very substantial amounts the guaranteed minima.

Another feature of the old agreement involved the levy by each agreeing province of a tax of 5 per cent on corporation income earned within its jurisdiction. The purpose of this provision was to allow any non-agreeing province to tax its corporations up to this level without subjecting them to a tax burden higher than that being paid by corporations in the agreeing provinces.

[Mr. Abbott.]

In keeping with the same purpose, the federal government has so shaped its own succession duty program as to allow a credit up to one-half of the federal duties for duties paid to a non-agreeing province, and there has also been a standing offer to non-agreeing provinces to allow a credit against federal personal income tax up to 5 per cent for a personal income tax imposed by any non-agreeing province. Neither of the non-agreeing provinces has chosen to take advantage of this latter credit.

Before proceeding to discuss the provisions of the new agreement, I would like to express my own general satisfaction with the conditions that have prevailed in federal-provincial tax relations during the post-war period. Those provinces which entered into agreements have, I believe, been well compensated for renting certain of their tax fields to us and have been assured against the possibility of drastic declines in the yield of these important fields of direct taxation. This has enabled them to plan their own programs with greater assurance and has undoubtedly improved their credit in the financial markets. At the same time, a level of efficiency in over-all tax administration has been achieved hitherto unknown in this country. Furthermore, the non-agreeing provinces have shown a restraint in employing their taxing powers which has contributed in no small measure to achieving a national system of taxation which is almost free of overlapping administration and conflicting jurisdiction.

As already indicated, the old agreements with eight of the ten provinces expired on March 31 last. In anticipation of this event, the federal government called a conference in Ottawa in December, 1950, of all provincial governments to consider the terms of new agreements for the ensuing five-year period.

In return for the same provincial undertakings as in the old agreements, the federal government offered to provide guaranteed minimum payments at a level considerably higher than under the old agreements. I shall come to the details of this offer in a moment or two. These proposals were considered at the conference in discussions which were marked by the utmost cordiality but no final decisions were taken and the provincial representatives undertook to give the proposals further consideration.

During the course of 1951, I received certain counter-proposals from the provinces, all of which were given the most serious consideration and many of which we were able to accept. By means of discussion with representatives from individual provinces following which any changes were made known to all the provinces, we have now succeeded in arriving at a basis of agreement which represents only a modification in detail of the proposals made to the 1950 conference. It is to implement this basis of agreement for which authority is requested in this bill. Up to the present time the indication is that at least the same eight provinces with which we have had agreements for the past five years will be entering into new agreements for the next five years.

With this general background, I shall now turn to a more detailed discussion of the main provisions of the proposed new agreements.

I shall deal first with the provincial undertakings. The provincial governments and their municipalities will, as in the old agreements, refrain from imposing personal income tax, the corporation income tax, the so-called corporation taxes—i.e. taxes on places of business, paid-up capital, etc.—and succession duties.

As in the case under the old agreements, any province has the option of retaining its succession duties if it so chooses, in which case, of course, there is provision for an offsetting reduction in its compensation. Actually, none of the provinces with which we have concluded agreements has accepted this alternative.

A change of some substance which was announced some time ago is that the agreeing province will no longer be required to levy a 5 per cent corporation tax. As explained in my budget speech, we are accomplishing the same general purpose by adding the 5 per cent tax—or practically all of it—to the federal rate and allowing a credit up to 5 per cent on corporation income earned within a non-agreeing province.

Under the old agreement, the agreeing provinces retained the full right to levy charges on their natural resources and to impose income taxes on mining income or on logging income. The federal government also undertook to allow a deduction for such provincial taxes from income subject to its corporation tax. These arrangements will be continued under the new agreement.

Provisions relating to the obligation of the federal government to pay compensation to the provinces are much more complicated and I must ask the house to bear with me in this rather involved exposition.

The guaranteed minimum payments under the new agreements are, with the exception of one additional formula, basically those of the expiring agreements adjusted upwards to a higher level. The old guaranteed minimum payments were established, by election of each province, on the basis of two general alternative formulae. The relative advantages of these I discussed in detail when I introduced the 1947 legislation and I will not review them at this time.

Briefly, it might be said that one of these, through emphasis on a per capita payment, gave more prominence to the factor of fiscal need. This formula was as follows:

1. $15 per capita on the 1942 population of the province, and

2. the amount of the statutory subsidies payable to the province in 1947.

This option was most favourable for Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland.

The second formula was designed to give more emphasis to the tax potential of a province. In it there were three elements, namely:

1. 50 per cent of the province's revenue from personal income taxes, corporation income taxes and corporation taxes, in the year 1940 as established for the purposes of the wartime tax agreements;

2. $12.75 per capita on the 1942 population of the province; and

3. The amount of the statutory subsidies payable in 1947.

This formula was more advantageous for all other provinces with the exception of Prince Edward Island for which a special guaranteed minimum payment of $2,100,000 was fixed.

In the proposals made at the 1950 conference, the federal government offered new guaranteed minimum payments on the basis of these formulae adjusted upwards by the ratio of change in provincial population and per capita gross national product between the year 1942 and the year 1948. In general, this "upping" of the payments to the 1948 basis had the effect of increasing the minimum payments by about 50 per cent. However, at the same time to meet the position of certain provinces which had argued that greater emphasis should be given to the element of tax potential, a new alternative formula was suggested.

The components of this new option were as follows:

1. The estimated yield of a personal income tax at 5 per cent of 1948 federal rates applied to 1948 incomes in the province;

2. The yield of a tax of 8½ per cent on corporation profits earned in the province in 1948. This rebate of 8½ per cent, I might explain, is taken as a fair measure of the corporation tax potential and takes account of the gross or specific taxes traditionally levied by provinces on corporations as well as taxes on corporate profits;

3. The revenue received by the province from succession duties in a recent 3-year period; and,

4. Statutory subsidies payable to the province in 1948. In actual application, this formula proved to be of benefit only to the province of Ontario.

As a result of provincial representations subsequent to the conference, minor modifications in the calculation of the adjustment between 1942 and 1948 have been accepted, but essentially the new guaranteed minima are those offered by the federal government in December, 1950. To conclude this aspect of the matter, therefore, I will, with the permission of the house, place on Hansard a table showing the guaranteed minimum payments under the old agreements and the guaranteed minimum payments that will form the basis of agreements that will be authorized under the bill now before us.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the permission of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: The table follows:

Guaranteed Minimum Payments

	Under old agreements	Under proposed new agreements
Newfoundland	$ 6,208,765	$ 9,174,624
Prince Edward Island	2,100,000	2,977,015
Nova Scotia	10,870,140	15,348,220
New Brunswick	8,773,420	12,576,093
Quebec	56,382,127	85,080,466
Ontario	67,158,027	101,801,370
Manitoba	13,540,038	18,634,954
Saskatchewan	15,291,490	20,026,085
Alberta	14,227,882	20,985,710
British Columbia	18,120,124	29,647,487
Total	$212,672,013	$316,252,024

Let me emphasize that the amounts I have included in the table are only the guaranteed minimum payments below which no actual payment may fall regardless of prevailing economic conditions or changes in population. The actual amounts payable in a given year —which, incidentally, we call the adjusted annual payments—are the result of calculations by which these guaranteed minimum payments are increased to give effect to national growth, as measured by the gross national product per capita, and to provincial growth, as measured by the provincial population.

Under the old agreements, the adjustment for these factors has been calculated as the average of ratios for the three years preceding the year of payment in relation to the base year 1942. This three-year averaging had the effect of bringing greater stability into the adjusted payments by spreading out the effect of a sudden change in economic conditions. It has been represented to us, however, that in a period of very rapid growth such as we have been experiencing, the three-year averaging process may slow down unduly the increase in provincial revenue at a time when fairly rapid increase in those revenues may be needed because of rapid growth of provincial population. In order to meet this argument, we proposed in the December 1950 conference to provide in the new agreements for an averaging calculation based upon a two-year period rather than upon a three-year period. Subsequent representations have indicated that even this adjustment was not believed by some governments to be flexible enough, and early this year, in a letter to all the provincial governments, I proposed that a province should have the option of choosing either an adjustment based on a two-year average or one based simply on the data relating to the one year prior to the year of payment. In a period of expansion, the one year calculation obviously will result in a considerably higher immediate payment to provinces and perhaps it is not surprising, therefore, that all provinces so far have elected to accept this option.

Under the new agreements, therefore, the adjusted payments which we will make to any agreeing province, in each of the five fiscal years beginning with this fiscal year, will be based on the ratio of per capita gross national product and of provincial population in the year preceding the year of payment compared with the new base year, namely, 1948. To illustrate the effect of this new adjustment process, I would like, with the consent of the house, to place on Hansard a table comparing the guaranteed minimum payments that will be authorized for each province under the bill with the amount of the adjusted payment, as presently estimated, that will be payable in the first fiscal year of the new agreement, namely, 1952-53.

Perhaps I should add that the adjusted payments shown in this table include the statutory subsidies payable to the various provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreeable to the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: The table follows:

Payments Under the 1952 Agreement

Province	Guaranteed Minimum	Adjusted Payment 1952-53
Newfoundland	$ 9,174,624	$ 12,291,593
Prince Edward Island	2,977,015	3,915,671
Nova Scotia	15,348,220	20,150,413
New Brunswick	12,576,093	16,624,628
Quebec	85,080,466	115,003,725
Ontario	101,801,370	137,173,274
Manitoba	18,634,954	24,760,084
Saskatchewan	20,026,085	25,570,643
Alberta	20,985,710	29,368,527
British Columbia	29,647,487	41,376,383
Total	$316,252,024	$426,234,941

Another point of some significance to which I should call attention is that under the new agreements the adjusted payments to be made in respect of any one year will be paid in quarterly instalments within the fiscal year —June 30, September 30, December 31 and March 31. Under the old agreements the quarterly payments began on September 30 of the calendar year and the last one was made on June 30 of the following year. The house will note that, as a result of this change, the agreeing provinces will receive during the fiscal year 1952-53 the final or June 30 quarterly instalment in respect of the last year of the old agreement, and, in addition, the four quarterly instalments of the first fiscal year of the new agreements. This change was made possible by greater promptness in securing our estimates of gross national product and provincial population and is one which naturally is valued highly by the agreeing provinces.

Another change of minor significance is that in the new agreements the gross national product concept which we will use in calculating the adjusted payments will be that of gross national product at factor cost rather than gross national product based on market prices. This new concept has the advantage of eliminating indirect taxes levied in Canada, an element which reflects primarily the relative intensity of use of certain tax sources at any one point of time rather than the level of economic activity.

A feature of the 1947 legislation that will be continued in the future is the payment to the provinces of one-half of our corporate income tax collections, less certain deductions, from companies engaged in the generation or distribution of electric energy, gas or steam, in respect of their income derived from such generation or distribution. Under the authority of the existing act, payments have been made to all provinces whether or not they had entered into a tax rental agreement. In respect of incomes of the three years, 1947 to 1949 inclusive, these payments totalled approximately $9,600,000. These are the only years for which it has as yet been possible to make payments. In view of the more precise determination of income derived from this class of public utility companies from the specified type of activities provided for under this year's amendments to the Income Tax Act, the payments to be made to provincial governments in respect of the next five years will, of course, vary somewhat from what those payments would have been had the old methods of calculation been followed.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the minister one question about the new method of estimating gross national product at factor cost. How much higher will that be?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot answer that now, but I shall get the information and have it available when we are in committee.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the motion was before this house that it was expedient to introduce this measure I placed on record my opinion in regard to the unsatisfactory situation which is created by the extension of these agreements with no assurance that we will at some point tackle the fundamental problem which makes it necessary to have agreements of this kind. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has pointed out that the new agreements which will be implemented through the provisions of this legislation will be in substantially the same form as earlier agreements. This will simply mean that the agreements entered into in 1942 as a temporary expedient in time of war are to be carried forward still further into the years of peace with no assurance that the unsatisfactory relationship so clearly set forth by the Rowell-Sirois commission and by other committees which have examined this subject will be changed in any way. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has said that he is gratified with the measure of agreement there has been in dominion-provincial relations in the taxation fields. He has pointed out that the non-concurring provinces have shown what he described as restraint in avoiding duplication of taxation and administration. He also referred to the fact that there had been further conferences between representatives of the dominion government and the provinces with regard to this subject but that no final decisions have been reached. Those words could be used without change over and over again—"no final decisions have been reached".

Mr. Abbott: I was referring to the conference of December, 1950, and only to that.

Mr. Drew: I realize that. I repeat that those words could be used over and over again with respect to the meetings that have taken place in connection with this general subject of taxation—"no final decisions have been reached." The important decisions that need to be reached are decisions with regard to a system of taxation which will restore to the provinces that measure of independence in taxation which is an essential requirement of the effective functioning of the federal system. So far as this measure is concerned, it is the only way by which agreements can be carried forward which must be carried forward in some form by many of the provinces until some more satisfactory method of allocation of taxes is found.

When this has been pointed out on earlier occasions, an attempt has been made, without any justification in fact or from the record, to say that certain provinces have sought to retain special advantages and that it is because of the selfish attitude on the part of certain provinces that over-all arrangements have not been made. At no point in these discussions has there been a recognition on the part of the federal government that the objections that have been made, not only by the provinces which have not signed agreements but also by the provinces which have and which have indicated they had no other choice from the financial point of view, were made because there is a question of principle involved which is of very great concern not only to those interested in the provincial field of legislation and administration but also to all of us who believe in the federal system and in the continued strength of that system.

The decisions that have been sought by those provinces that have not agreed have not so much been decisions with respect to the amount of money involved as they have been decisions as to a satisfactory readjustment of taxing methods in Canada which will on the one hand avoid duplication and on the other hand give to the governments which must exercise their responsibility in the field of legislation and administration some measure of discretion with respect to taxation which will give them the real authority over the field of legislation and administration conferred upon them by the British North America Act. Those who have expressed concern with regard to the absence of any evidence of new arrangements at this time have done so with a great deal more than the amount of the payments in their minds. The simple question before us is whether the constitution is of any importance.

Is it of any importance to us that we retain the real genius of our federal system in this country? Is it of any importance that we carry forward the basic principles which were inherent in the type of federal system adopted in this country in 1867?

There are some of us who think that it is of vital and fundamental importance that the strength of the federal system be retained by a proper allocation of taxation which will go hand in hand with the other responsibilities. Those who are fearful of centralizing power in the hands of the central government remember what history teaches us where the government that taxes is not the government that spends. That can apply to a handing over of taxation rights by the central government on the one hand or by provincial or state governments on the other. Over and over again federal systems have been weakened and have collapsed where there was too great centralization of taxing power in the hands of the central government. There are also those who remember that one of the contributing factors in the weakness of the German democratic government set up after the first world war was that the central government under the Weimar constitution had become dependent upon the state governments for a substantial part of its tax resources. History teaches us the importance of imposing at the same time upon a government which spends the responsibility for being answerable for its taxation.

If the government that spends is not the government that taxes there is a loss of direct responsibility to the people both by the government which taxes for another government and also by the government that receives. The dangers of that situation may not emerge quickly. Certainly over the years that has been the situation. The measure before us simply extends an unsatisfactory situation and tends to centralize control over provincial activities in the hands of the dominion government. The best evidence of that is the fact that more and more representatives of the provincial governments and representatives of the municipalities, which are the statutory emanations of the provincial authorities, are coming here to seek special arrangements to deal with this and that problem which ordinarily could be dealt with by the provincial governments if they had that flexibility of taxing power which the full strength of the federal system demands.

One of the reasons that some concern has been expressed about the extension of grants by the dominion government in fields which are normally within provincial jurisdiction is that the experience in the past has been, where these grants are extended, that dominion activities in these fields constantly expand until the original allocation of authority under the B.N.A. Act has been very substantially changed in actual practice.

Many people who are anxious to see education carried to the very highest possible level in every part of Canada have expressed concern about the grants for education by the dominion government, not because they are anxious to see any restraint imposed upon the ability of the local authorities to advance education in every way that is within their power, but rather because they see the possibility of a trend to place under the dominion government, no matter what political party may form that government, some measure of supervision and control which would go hand in hand with grants of that kind—such as was not contemplated by our constitution. I have supported the request for grants to our universities and I have done so because I believe that our universities perform a great national service and that in addition to the ordinary problems of education there is the necessity for an expansion of higher education, particularly in the technical fields, as part of our general plan of development and national defence. I have expressed those views on earlier occasions and shall not repeat them. Nevertheless, I do see dangers if this tendency should increase.

In the same way I supported the idea of a national library, although it is conceivable that there might be an argument about whether libraries are exclusively under provincial jurisdiction, ones that go beyond the extent of a parliamentary library. I do see the desirability of having a national library where the great traditions of our country may be preserved, encouraged and expanded; nevertheless I see dangers there, related to the subject now under discussion, unless we keep constantly in mind why it is important that the federal system retain that clear allocation of responsibility which preserves the vitality of a system in which unity is in itself largely the result of the extent to which diversity is maintained under that federal system, along the lines laid down in 1867.

To illustrate what I mean, I can see the danger that unless the fundamental principles inherent in our federal system are constantly recognized and preserved there might be a tendency for some to suggest the creation of a department of education under the dominion government. Perhaps it might be called a department of education and culture. When we have seen the extension of the activities of other departments which carry on activities so intensively in the provincial field, I think all of us should be greatly concerned about the possibility of there being any extension of those activities in a manner that would distract attention from the fact that it was considered wise to leave under the provincial governments and provincial legislatures certain clearly defined responsibilities in certain clearly defined fields. I would hope that we would not see this tendency extended. I would hope that we would not see any suggestion to extend the central authority over education or over other matters which are now under the authority of the provincial governments, and which should remain there unless a change by agreement between the dominion and provincial governments is made in regard to any of those subjects at any time.

Changes can be made simply by invasion of a field without agreement being necessary, and that has already occurred on certain occasions. I mention this in relation to the bill now before us because I do wish to emphasize the fact that we should be expressing some concern today and some regret that we have no assurance that the conditions which have made agreements of this kind necessary for some of the provinces—and I recognize that necessity—are not going to be brought to an end, and that there will be that balanced system of taxation which will restore the full authority of the provincial governments in those fields that were intended to be fully under their direction and responsibility.

From what I have said it will be clear that I intend to support this measure because there is no alternative before us. I would point out that every province in this country has in the past indicated its willingness to enter into rental agreements of a satisfactory nature provided that there were assurance that this whole subject would be fully examined and that an effort would be made to seek a solution of the problems which have made those agreements necessary. I once again point out that these agreements were stated by this government in the first place to be temporary expedients in time of war, an attempt to meet for the time being an unsatisfactory situation emphasized by the Rowell-Sirois report; and I do hope that there may be greater success and greater determination to find a real solution to this problem.

We need to tackle the whole combined problem of taxation in Canada—dominion, provincial and municipal. The municipal problem is in many ways at the moment perhaps the most serious of all. The municipal problem is one which arises in different ways in different provinces. Each province has its own municipal system under its own municipal laws. Each province has its own provisions for delegating the powers of taxation to the municipalities. Not one of us should overlook the extent to which there are increasing appeals by the municipalities directed to the dominion government for assistance in meeting their problem.

If our federal system were working as it should, there need be no appeal at any time from any municipal authority to the dominion government. Under the federal system it was intended that their relationship be a direct relationship with the provincial government. They are under the provincial government both for their legislative authority and for their administrative arrangements. That relationship should be continued. It will interfere with those relationships if they become dependent upon the dominion government for supplementary grants to assist them in meeting those obligations which are so close to the daily lives of our people.

In saying that I am remembering, and emphasizing, that it will be only through arrangements that will give to the provincial legislatures and to the provincial governments the powers they really should have that this situation can be met effectively. Our provincial governments and our municipal governments have been emphasizing the extent to which they need greater flexibility of taxation. From the domestic point of view I think there are few problems of greater importance or of greater urgency than that of taking the appropriate steps to inquire into our whole system of taxation. I think there should be conducted, under an arrangement approved by the dominion government and the provincial governments, an inquiry which will seek to advise the dominion, provincial, municipal and independent taxing authorities, with an effort made not only to simplify our taxing methods, to avoid duplication wherever possible, to reduce taxes in any way that they can be reduced at this time, but also to find a way in which the taxes will bear upon our people most lightly at a time when they are bound to bear heavy taxes in any event.

It is not only the burden of taxes that affects individuals and business in this country; it is the impact of particular forms of taxation. That matter should also be examined. I almost hesitate to make the suggestion, in view of the fact that the government have shown such an unwillingness to consider royal commissions except when it happens to be for some purpose which they themselves bring forward; nevertheless I suggest that a royal commission should hear evidence from experts in the dominion, provincial and municipal fields, as well as independent experts from this country and from outside of Canada, in order that such a commission might make recommendations that would be helpful to both the dominion and the provincial governments.

As this measure is passed which will make it possible for the dominion government to enter into agreements which I understand have been approved by eight of the ten provincial governments, nevertheless I hope the government will recognize the need for tackling this over-all problem of taxation at the earliest possible date so that duplication may be avoided, taxes may be reduced wherever that is possible, the different levels of administration may have flexibility of taxation, and the impact of taxation itself may be in such a way that it will increase the general efficiency of production throughout Canada in every way it can. This is a time to urge that this be done, and to express once again the fact that we are called upon to pass this legislation and to see these agreements renewed for another five years without any assurance that this problem is really going to be tackled.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when we had before us the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill, I indicated that we would support this measure. That is our position. Despite any shortcomings there may be in the situation owing to the fact that an over-all agreement has not yet been reached, we feel that this legislation certainly goes in the right direction.

It is our contention—as I pointed out on June 17, and therefore I do not need to repeat it today—that our primary concern in these matters should be not for the alleged rights of any of the governments of this country but rather for the rights of the Canadian people. We feel that any taxation arrangement akin to the set-up that we had in Canada prior to the war makes for terribly inequitable taxation. Such a system results in the situation that those who happen to be in parts of the country into which the wealth produced in other parts of the country is channelled are able to escape the taxation they should pay. After all, we are Canadians first, not citizens of particular areas in this country. It seems to me that the most important field in which we should express our Canadianism is in the economic field by an attempt to achieve as fair a distribution as we can of the wealth that is produced by the Canadian people from coast to coast.

Although we regret that an over-all agreement has not yet been reached, although we regret that there has not yet been worked out a plan that will satisfy all of the governments concerned, and although we hope that that might yet be done, nevertheless we would not want to retreat by one iota from the position that has been attained by such agreements as have been signed between the federal government and eight of the provinces. We shall therefore support this measure.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) today once again expressed his concern for restoring to the provinces what he referred to as that independence in taxation which he regarded as an integral part of the federal system. We feel that more important than the independence of taxation which some provinces might like to have is the desirability of all of the provinces having the financial capacity to discharge their obligations to the Canadian citizens residing within their borders. A few provinces may have enjoyed that financial capacity under the kind of set-up that we had prior to the war, but certainly all provinces did not have that financial capacity. They approach enjoyment of that financial capacity under these agreements. As I have already said, we feel that that consideration is a much more important one than is the proposal that every province should enjoy complete independence in the field of taxation. It is our view that there are various aspects of taxation, and that there are many other aspects of public policy, by which the people in the provinces retain the control over their provincial governments. There is still plenty of room for testing the responsibility of provincial governments to the electorate in the various provinces. In fact we have had some recent examples where that responsibility has been well tested. Some were tested and found satisfactory; some were tested and found wanting. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for these reasons and as I have already indicated, we shall support this measure.

There was one reference in the remarks of the leader of the opposition with which we agree, namely, the fact that one of the most difficult problems in the field of taxation in this country at the present time relates to municipal taxation. That is a matter beyond the control of the federal parliament; that is a matter that calls for negotiations between the various provincial governments concerned and the municipalities which are their creatures; but we feel that something is terribly needed in that field as well. Indeed, it is because of the situation in that field that there is given added impetus to the proposal that we have made from time to time, that there should be federal aid for education.

At the present time the cost of education for the most part is levied against real estate, which we feel is unfair, for it does not accord with the principle of taxing according to ability to pay. It would be out of order for me to pursue the question of federal aid to education under this motion, but I do bring it in, in passing, to emphasize both the need for a revision of the taxation arrangements as between the provinces and the municipalities, and also as to the need for federal aid in this important field of education.

The leader of the opposition had a fair amount to say on the question of education, particularly with respect to the grants to the universities by the federal government. It is also to be noted that he has given support to the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), with respect to the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for the purpose of equalizing educational opportunity across Canada. He has given that support both in speeches that he has made and by his vote, for example, on April 21 of this year, as reported at page 1463 of Hansard. In fairness to him I must admit that when he spoke on the question he expressed certain misgivings, and he tied that support to his ideas about dominion-provincial taxation arrangements; but nevertheless I think that it was an expression of his best judgment when on April 21 he voted for that motion for federal aid for education. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have there a recognition by the leader of the opposition of the principle which underlies these agreements, namely, that in a country like Canada, and as part of our federal system which we all support, it is essential that there be some central body with sufficient taxing authority to be able to tax the wealth of this country wherever it is made and redistribute it on a basis of fairness to the people of Canada, no matter in what part of the country they may live.

Because we believe that the rights of the people of Canada to the best that our economy can make possible are superior to the rights of individual governments, either provincial or federal, we support this measure.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I remember when the first taxation agreements were negotiated between the dominion and the provincial governments we were given assurance that after the war the process of negotiating further extensions of the agreements would be terminated; that is, that these transfer agreements would be only temporary expedients. If I remember correctly, there were two important reasons given for the negotiations to start with. If I remember rightly the first of these was that there had to be some assurance of what the minister has called a restraint in applying taxation measure across the country so that fairness would result, particularly in wartime.

The second reason, if I remember rightly, was to put into the hands of the federal government those authorities and powers which would make it possible for us to conduct a strong and vital war effort. Well, I supported the negotiations of the first agreements because I felt that there must not be confusion in taxing matters within Canada if we were ever to put on a war effort that would be successful and that would terminate in victory for our side. I did say at the time we were negotiating the first agreements that I thought the federal government should be a little more honest in their statements. I felt that when these agreements were negotiated the federal government itself would never want to surrender whatever authorities were given over by the provincial governments. I think my fears were well founded. If I had been a betting man then I likely would have said that I bet my last shirt that those authorities and powers transferred to the federal government under the agreements would never be returned to the provinces and I believe that subsequent events have proved that my fears certainly were well founded.

At the present time we are considering an extension of the agreements for another five years. With the procedure calling the provinces together and negotiating with them in detail all parts of the agreements which had not worked out satisfactorily in the past, and revising those parts of the agreements which have become intolerable, let us say, I have no quarrel at all. I have no protest against the procedure. The provinces that did negotiate seem to be quite well satisfied with the results of their negotiations, and the details of the new agreements as outlined by the minister this morning seem to me to be perfectly acceptable, and I have heard no protest from any one of the provinces that has indicated its readiness to enter into a new agreement.

Of the provisions of the present agreements, so far as they relate to my province, I certainly have no criticism. The amount of the payments, the application of the principle of guaranteed minimum payments to the provinces, is a good provision. I think it is quite acceptable to all those provinces that have negotiated. Of course to Ontario and Quebec the principles do seem to be unacceptable.

[Mr. Low.]

With the provision of the adjustment payment basis I find myself in agreement. It seems to be fair. I have nothing to protest against in that regard. Perhaps I can best sum up what I feel about the bill in this way, that it is only the modification; it provides only for the extension of the present agreements on a modification basis; that is, it provides for modifications of previously negotiated agreements, but it does not in any way get down to a permanent solution of the great problem that confronts the governments of Canada, namely, a final decision on the allocation of taxation powers that could be concluded finally and for, let us say, a reasonable number of years ahead.

I think that this matter of having to come back every five years and renegotiate on the basis of agreements that were entered into temporarily to begin with is not a good thing, and I do not believe that the minister himself likes it at all. I believe in the federal type of union in this country; I think it was developed to fill a real need. In a country such as ours I doubt very much whether we could ever have satisfactory government under a unitary system. I doubt very much that we could ever have satisfactory government under a unitary system; there is too much diversity; it is too big a country. There are too many local problems to make that unitary type of government possible. And so I say I believe in the federal system as it applies to Canada. I believe in the arrangement as it was originally worked out by the fathers of confederation. I do believe that it was sound, and that the allocation of powers under the terms of the British North America Act was wise.

What I would like to see is some form of final agreement on the matter of a taxation policy as between the dominion and the provinces, settled in such fashion as to maintain the balance between the provinces on one hand and the federal or central government on the other. I would like to see that balance carefully preserved, because it was worked out by the fathers of confederation in an exceedingly wise manner, in my judgment.

Therefore we most certainly must be careful in anything we do that tends to modify the balance that was established. And in my judgment, having the federal government assume authorities that have been considered provincial for so long does interfere with that balance. It places in the hands of the central government undue authority over local governments.

I am not a centralizer; I do not believe in centralization. Obviously the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has certain ideas with respect to the centralization of power in the federal government. I do not believe it is wise to take government too far from the people. The grass roots of democracy is right down in the municipality. That is where I think we should begin to decentralize, and see to it that the municipalities have sufficient authority to take care of the needs of the people right in the municipality. They are the people who know how to administer the affairs that touch their lives directly.

I am thinking now in terms of such things as health schemes and hospitalization. There is a tendency in this country to remove these things from the municipality, and to centralize their administration in the provincial governments. Now there is a move to try to centralize that sort of thing in the federal government. Well, it just will not work—that kind of centralization. I think it has been amply demonstrated in this country as in others that there are things, things that touch the lives of the people very closely, which ought to be left exclusively to the administration of the municipalities in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: The administration, yes.

Mr. Low: That is true. The point I make is—

Mr. Knowles: There is no argument about that.

Mr. Low: Within the scope of my experience, any time the central government has been prevailed upon to make contributions by way of financial assistance for those things that are administered by municipal and provincial governments, it has insisted upon having a hand in the administration. That is not good. To my mind that is the great danger of the centralization movement.

I say this, that there is no reason why the federal government should not be able to come to the assistance of the provinces, and perhaps indirectly through the provinces to the municipalities, without insisting upon having a hand in that direction and also in the administration. For example I cannot understand why it is necessary, if the federal government is to take part in the cost of education, that it should insist upon setting up what may be called virtually a ministry of education in the federal field. That in my judgment is stupid, in the extreme.

Mr. Knowles: That would be the basis upon which you voted for the resolution of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight).

Mr. Low: Yes; I voted for the resolution of the hon. member for Saskatoon on this basis, that the federal government ought to be prepared to make contributions toward educating the boys and girls in this country, with no strings attached. Those contributions should be handed over to the provincial governments to be administered where the education is to be administered, under the constitution—and not in any way on a basis of giving the federal government authority to interfere or to impress upon the provinces its ideas of policy. I think we have always stressed carefully that whenever federal grants are called for, if they are to be made at all they should be made upon a basis of a complete hands-off policy.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he indicate the difference between the federal government turning over out of federal revenues money to the provinces for purposes of education, without attaching any strings thereto, and turning over federal moneys to the provinces for other activities, provided it likewise leaves the administration of those activities to the provinces. Are they not on all fours?

Mr. Low: I think they are.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made some comments about my remarks, may I ask if he means by that that the federal government should exercise control over education in the provinces, where grants are made for education?

Mr. Knowles: If I may be permitted to answer the question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), asked during the speech of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the answer is very definite—and it has been placed on the record repeatedly —that we insist that there be no interference of any kind on the part of the federal government with provincial administration of education. That has been made clear in the resolution of my colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon, and in all of our speeches on the question of federal aid for education. No one has any doubt about that point at all. My question was: If we on this side of the house—the leader of the opposition and those of us in this group, and the hon. member for Peace River—take that stand with respect to education, why can we not take the same stand with respect to other matters?

Mr. Low: I would say there is no good reason why we should not take the same stand with regard to other matters. In fact, that is the stand I am taking—exactly that. But when we talk about centralization and taxation powers for the purpose of redistribution, so that the people of the country can share equally in the good things Canada has to produce—well, then, we get into a type of theoretical discussion which, I am afraid, has no termination at all.

It looks to me as though we are getting onto pretty dangerous ground when we talk about the centralization of taxing powers in the federal government, on that basis. I think there has to be a completely new approach to the whole matter of revenue. I would like to look at it more from the point of view of revenue than of taxation.

Somehow or other, in discussions of this kind, it would appear from what we say that we think there is no other way of getting revenue, except through taxation. But that is not true; that is not true, by any means. I think there is one government at least in the Dominion of Canada that has proven quite definitely that there are other sources of revenue.

Mr. Sinclair: Out of oil wells, though. We cannot all have them.

Mr. Wylie: Jealousy will get you nowhere.

Mr. Low: We are using that as a means of obtaining revenue; but I would say once again to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) that you cannot begin to compare an $89 million industry, and its power or ability to provide revenue, with a $525 million industry, such as he has in British Columbia. You cannot put them on the same basis.

Let me point out that out of the $89 million industry last year in Alberta we obtained much more revenue than did British Columbia from the $525 million industry, an industry based upon resources belonging to all the people out there.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is comparing royalties and leases which in no way affect corporation taxation.

Mr. Low: The same thing would be true with respect to the oil industry. There are large corporation taxes paid just the same as in the lumber industry, and there are the same types of wages and salaries paid and dividends and profits. What I am getting at is that I think it is a wrong approach to consider taxation as the only source of revenue for a government. It is not. The sooner we realize that it is not, the sooner we are going to come to some new arrangement as between the various governments of Canada so that the responsibilities allocated to those governments by the British North America Act can be discharged fully by the respective governments.

I think we shall have to change our approach. I say that the revenues which the provinces need to discharge the responsibilities placed upon them by the British North America Act ought to be made available. They can be made available. Anyone who says that they cannot is denying that this country can produce in tremendous quantities. The amount of revenues to be obtained by all governments in Canada is limited only by the extent of the resources we have, manpower resources and natural resources, and our ability to get labour and effort applied to those resources. That is all. What we need to do is to approach this whole matter of revenues for governments from the point of view that what we must get into the hands of the various governments is revenue to enable them to discharge their responsibilities under the constitution.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member think it was a good thing if, by some happy accident, let us say by finding out that crown lands produced a terrific amount of revenue, a government found itself depending less and less upon taxation? Does he not think it is sound that a government's revenue should come from taxation? Is not that the chief hold that the citizen has on a government in calling it to account? Supposing, for example, a government did not need to tax at all; would not that create a very unsound situation?

Mr. Low: It is pretty hard for me to assume that any government would ever get into the position—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I once heard a conversation between two men, evidently from Alberta, where one expressed some hope that Alberta might be able to do away with taxation altogether.

Mr. Low: I cannot conceive of a condition under which a provincial government would not have to use taxation, if not continuously at least periodically. It will be a long time I suppose before we see governments doing away completely with the power to tax. But I think it is possible for governments, provincial governments particularly, to apply the minimum of taxation and attempt to secure the bulk of their revenues from other sources. I believe that that is possible. As a matter of fact I think we are demonstrating that in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And desirable?

Mr. Low: I think it is desirable; I do not think there is any doubt about the desirability.

Mr. Hansell: It would still have the power.

Mr. Low: I would point out to the hon. member for Greenwood that although a provincial government might not be applying taxation measures, it would still have the authority to tax. That authority should be kept by the provinces. It should be remembered that the resources from which a province might obtain large sums of money are expendable. They are resources that eventually will play out and when they do the province would of necessity have to go back to the imposition of certain taxation measures which it may have abandoned in the meantime.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What a wonderful time the government would have in the interval.

Mr. Low: I am not so sure. One thing we have to have in our mind is that no principle can be said to be absolute. I believe the hon. member for Greenwood will agree with that. What I am speaking of this morning is this: I think that if we approach this whole matter of dominion-provincial relationship so far as finance is concerned from the point of view of getting into the hands of the provincial governments, and through them to the municipal governments, the amount of revenue which they require to carry out their responsibilities under the constitution, we will be doing a whole lot better job than if we just think in terms of taxing powers, having to tax here or tax there.

It seems to me that the revenue which any province needs at the present time has to be assured to it and should be assured for years ahead. I do not believe it is possible for us to give them a feeling of stability by merely extending taxation agreements for five-year periods. I do not think that that is possible nor is it desirable.

I should like to see some permanent solution to this whole question. The sooner we do what the leader of the opposition, in the final minutes of his address this morning, said we should do, namely, review the taxation system and how the various taxes impinge upon the various governments, review them to see if there is not some way of coming to an agreement by which the provinces will know that certain taxation fields are exclusively theirs and certain taxation fields are exclusively the dominion's—approaching the whole matter from that point of view and reaching a final agreement and conclusion as soon as possible—the sooner we will be able to establish our provinces and our municipalities on some basis of stability and permanency.

I am concerned, as I said in the beginning, with preserving in our federal system a balance which shall not be subject to undue centralization or undue decentralization. On the other hand, we realize that there must be a strong central government as well as strong provincial and local governments. That is desirable. It is that balance which I think we ought to try to achieve.

The leader of the opposition spoke of attempting to preserve the vitality of our federal system. I think perhaps it can best be described as vitality in a country like ours with its diversity of resources, diversity of conditions, a land that extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It seems to me that one of the important things we have to do is to lay down a set of policies and conditions under which we can guarantee that the vitality of our country shall never be diminished or depleted.

I think decisions have to be made soon on a more permanent basis. While we are prepared to accept the principle of Bill No. 347 which is now before us, I do not want it to be assumed that we are permanently in agreement with the idea of an extension of taxation agreements every four or five years. That is not adding to the possibility of stability in our country in any respect. We support the bill for the time being, but we do ask that the government of Canada which controls the financial policies of the whole country make every effort to come to some final allocation of powers and authorities in the financial field which will guarantee that the provinces and municipalities will have the wherewithal to take care of the responsibilities placed upon them by the British North America Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I agree with those who have said we will support this measure. I just want to underline one or two things that have been said already. I think there is no doubt that we all agree with the remark that has been made that we are all federalists. We do not believe in a unitary form of government. I think it was the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe who said that the dominion after all was the child of the provinces and not vice versa. There are two things which I think are clear. First of all we are taking what was an emergency measure and perpetuating it. When I say "perpetuating it" of course I know we say that it is temporary. I think we admit it is an expedient, but after something goes on for five, ten or perhaps fifteen years it is not so very temporary and it becomes very difficult to unscramble the omelet. I think we all admit as an academic proposition that it is sound that those governments that spend money should raise the money they spend. However, we have departed a long way from that principle. Eight of the provinces have found it a comfortable and apparently a comforting thing to do.

I have often reminded the house that we have been passing through very prosperous years when the goose has been hanging high and the provinces have received grants which I presume were very satisfactory to them. So the thing has gone along, but nevertheless I do not think anything has happened to cast doubt on that principle. If I remember right it was strongly asserted by, among others, one who was very well known in this house, the present premier of Nova Scotia.

There is one other thing I want to say. Even in spite of provincial satisfaction which seems fairly widespread, we do see one place where our present system is not really giving satisfaction, and that is in the case of the municipalities. I take it that the municipalities were not and could not be present at the discussions which took place because after all the municipalities are creatures of the provinces, and it would be almost, if not wholly, impossible to carry on discussions with them at large. Nevertheless there remains the problem that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) mentioned, and it seems to me it is a very real one. I should just like to say that in my opinion we should remind ourselves when we are doing this that, in spite of its wide acceptability, we are infringing upon a principle which I do not think has ever been satisfactorily set at nought in argument. We say we are doing it temporarily but as the years go on it is going to become harder and harder to make a change without great disturbance. There are some indications now, notably in the municipalities, that we have not solved the problem so far, and I should not wonder if, before the final solution comes, we may find, as people find so often, that we have to go back to accepted principles.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words with respect to these tax agreements. I am sure that western members agree with the principle one hundred per cent. We hear a great deal about the centralizing of taxation but in a country like ours it is very hard to get away from it. The wealth produced in the western provinces is not taxable. It is the taxable dollar that you have to take into consideration, and that taxable dollar goes to eastern Canada. The taxable dollars accumulate in the place where commodities are bought. We buy goods from eastern Canada and the profits are made in eastern Canada. It is impossible for the governments of western Canada to tax those dollars. I say that all should come within the scope of the agreements in a federation of this kind. It unites the whole of Canada. We have a big industrial area in Ontario and Quebec and then an agricultural area east and west of the two industrial provinces.

The agricultural areas must have some form of taxation that will help them and that form of taxation is controlled now by the dominion government. The provincial governments have no right to enter that field of taxation. Even if they had, the head offices of the big industries are in eastern Canada and the governments of the agricultural areas still could not tax them. The system in effect at present in some of the provinces is being condemned. That is most unfair. In the last provincial election the premier of Saskatchewan was going around the country condemning the action of the federal government so far as the moneys paid to them are concerned. I do not know what it would amount to now but before the taxation agreement was entered into all the province of Saskatchewan could collect in the form of income tax, corporation taxes and succession duties was $4,500,000. If they had the opportunity to tax today about all they could possibly collect would be double that amount. One has to take into consideration the amount of wealth produced in that province which should be taxable but cannot be because it goes out of the province. Let us say that they would have got $8 million today if they had the power to tax. The federal government is taking care of the taxing and in doing so is giving the province of Saskatchewan $26 million.

The distribution of that $26 million has prevented Saskatchewan from falling into a depression. If we in Saskatchewan as an agricultural province did not have the benefit of the grant from the federal government we could not possibly enjoy a standard of living that would compare with any part of the industrial areas of Canada. We could not tax real property in order to secure the amount of money the provincial government should have to do the job it has to do. The only way we can secure a fair distribution of the taxable dollar is under the system now being followed by the federal government. We in the west are very pleased with the way the federal government has taken hold of this matter. It is agreed that we would like to have more money but I think it is the duty of those who receive the money to give some praise to the man who has to collect it. In many parts of the country he is being condemned for high taxes. The people are paying taxes but they are having the money paid back to them and receiving services so there should be no kick coming. I wish to congratulate the minister on the job he has done. I hope he will carry on and give us more instead of less.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the complaints of the west with respect to this matter. May I say that the one hope of having a geographically balanced economy for Canada is the industrialization of the west. Industrialization of the west can take place only through the development of natural resources other than farm resources. I only hope that the citizens of the three western provinces will try to forget wheat and try to remember that a great part of three western provinces is under the Pre-Cambrian shield and that a great part is now potential oil country of the greatest magnitude. Until such time as we can go farther in the west in producing natural resources other than farm produce we will not have a truly balanced economy.

There is just one other matter that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. I have mentioned it before and I do so now very briefly because I think it is important. I refer to the matter of succession duties. Succession duties were brought in as a war measure simply and solely. They were an invasion of the provincial field but were justified as a wartime measure. To my mind collection of succession duty by the federal government is an invasion of provincial autonomy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Adamson: I have said it before but I feel that succession duties have an unfortunate result. They tend to centralize industry in the hands of a few large corporations. When one of the owners of an individual or family corporation dies, succession duties very frequently result in the corporation being liquidated or sold to a larger corporation in the same field. That is a bad thing, Mr. Speaker, because it not only has the effect of centralizing industry in one or two larger plants but it destroys smaller industry.

I realize that small industry has been very prosperous and has been booming recently, but throughout the years if the principle persists and if succession duties are levied at extremely high levels the result will be to centralize power in the hands of a few large corporations.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate until one or two things said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) made me feel that probably it was in order that I should make one or two brief comments.

The hon. member for Greenwood spoke as though it was easy money that was going out to the provinces as a result of the agreements now under consideration. I had the impression that the hon. member for Greenwood had not given adequate weight to the amount of money that was being taken from the provinces by these agreements and the amount of money that had been taken from the provinces every year for generations, before it was conceived that an agreement such as that which is now before the house was an appropriate thing for the dominion government to consider and to adopt in co-operation with the provinces.

My attention was also somewhat arrested by the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood in reference to assistance to municipalities. I will grant that one of the great difficulties we have in Canada is that of providing to the municipalities adequate purchasing power in order to enable them to discharge the responsibilities which properly rest upon them, and must so rest; but the same difficulty is being found in respect of each province even in spite of the excellent arrangements—as I think we can fairly call them—which the minister has announced and for which the dominion government is certainly worthy of credit which I freely give.

I think the hon. member for Greenwood would be interested in knowing what the province of Alberta is doing in respect of providing assistance to municipalities. This year the Alberta government had an income of $116 million. Of that amount of money she is paying out to the municipalities just under $29 million in order to help them in financing the responsibilities they have. A good deal of that money—not a great amount, but a reasonable amount—is being provided to municipalities in such a way as to encourage the municipalities to keep their taxes down. I do not know of any other province in Canada that had been following that policy before Alberta began it. It therefore is a real credit to the present administration in Alberta that this sort of measure is being applied. I do not think I will comment on that matter particularly because we are all anxious to get along with the business in hand.

Some of the things that Alberta is doing for the municipalities are as follows: Fifty per cent of the gasoline tax has been made available as grants to municipalities. A portion of this will be paid out for the purpose of tax reduction to which I referred just a moment ago. In addition, the balance of the fund will be distributed each year in the form of unconditional grants on the basis of relative assessment. Again, that is an indication of what I said a moment ago, namely an encouragement to the municipalities to keep down their taxation rates.

For school construction, 25 per cent of capital borrowing of any school district—that is borrowing that has been approved by an advisory board set up for that purpose—is provided by the province as an outright grant. The schools may borrow an additional 25 per cent of their needs from the school lands trust fund at 3 to 3½ per cent. As everyone recognizes, that provision is a real blessing to the schools and, at the same time, the municipalities. The province also will guarantee the interest on the remaining 50 per cent of capital needs the schools must borrow on the open market. As will readily be noted, these measures are designed to give support to the credit of the municipalities.

As to road building, capital grants to municipalities for road construction are on a 75-25 per cent basis with the provincial government paying 75 per cent. A fund has been established, moreover, from which municipalities can borrow money for self-liquidating projects at 2 per cent interest, repayable over a period of 20 years.

Here are some of the things for which Alberta provides her municipalities assistance and the amounts provided: School grants for 1952-53 amount to $9,870,000; teachers' retirement fund, $565,000; school building assistance fund, $2 million.

As to public health: per diem hospital grants, $1,102,000; special hospitalization grants, $1,504,000; hospital construction grants, $500,000; grants for health services, $58,000.

As to public works Alberta provides: grants for roads in municipal and improvement districts, $3,880,000; grants for bridges, $800,000.

In respect of the treasury department she provides: grants to municipalities in lieu of taxation on certain government buildings, $30,000; grants under the municipal assistance act, $5,991,000.

Under the lands and forests department she has granted: increased payments to municipalities from grazing leases—which would naturally come to the provinces—$200,000. In total in these respects the direct financial assistance from the province to the municipalities amounts to $26,500,000 in the year 1952-1953.

Some other advantages being granted by the Social Credit government are as follows: They have assumed 60 per cent of the indigent relief and child welfare costs in Alberta—formerly paid by the municipalities—$585,000; the 10 per cent of the basic old age and blind pensions formerly paid by municipal authorities, $500,000; they have made a reduction of a municipality's share of the cost of mothers' allowance from 25 per cent to 20 per cent, estimated at $50,000; the cost of hospitalization for pensioners, formerly paid by municipal authorities, $1,450,000 the province has assumed. These amounted in total to $29,085,000.

I think the hon. member for Greenwood, after contemplating this record, will realize that if the other provinces in Canada could be so blessed as to have Social Credit administrations elected, he would not need to worry greatly about municipal assistance in the days to come.

In addition to this, from 1935 up to the present time, the province of Alberta has cancelled $47,800,000 of debt owed by the municipalities to the province. These cancellations would be classified as follows: In consideration of taxes, $8,600,000; in consideration of direct relief granted, $29 million; in consideration of seed and feed relief, $10,200,000.

In addition to these, starting right from the very beginning of the Social Credit administration the Alberta government saved thousands of farms and homes of Alberta citizens. These citizens have since become prosperous, which indicates that the general attitude of the Social Credit government in respect of these people, who were in bad circumstances, was correct, that is, that the people were good; they were credit worthy. All they needed was assistance in times of serious difficulty.

I think it would be well, Mr. Speaker, to give the minister, and particularly the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) these figures to relieve his mind in respect of anxiety about the financing of municipalities.

I think I shall make one more comment before closing, and it is this: If we look at the amount of money in Canada which is now in the hands of the people in savings accounts and in other places, we shall be simply astounded at the amount which has come into the possession of the people of Canada since world war II broke out. Where did all that money come from? Every dollar of that money, I believe, except what has come in from outside sources such as the United States for investments, has been created by the banks in Canada. I hope the hon. member for Greenwood will get that down into his mind and let it impress him. Every dollar of that increase in money in Canadian banks and institutions has been created by the banks of Canada since the year 1939; and the banks of Canada have claimed it. They have gathered interest on it and are still gathering interest. Is it not an astounding thing? Why did not a good deal of that money come from creations by the dominion government? Why should not the dominion government have been creating that money and owning it and using it for the benefit of the Canadian people instead of allowing our banks to create it and lend it for the benefit of the banks? I believe that question will help hon. members to realize what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) had in his mind when he implied that there are sources of revenue other than the money which can be taxed from the people.

When the government of this country and the governments of the provinces begin to study this matter they will begin to realize that all the money which we are now raising as a result of this taxing agreement set-up could be greatly supplemented, greatly added to, by wise use of the Dominion of Canada's power to create money representing the increase in production of the nation.

Let us just take another glance at what this actually means. I am speaking from memory, but as I recall it, when the second war broke out our income, our production, amounted to something like $5,500 million a year. Now it is estimated that in the year 1952 our production will be $22 billion or $23 billion. Where did it come from, the money that resulted from that enormous increase in production? The most orthodox financial mind must realize that when there is an increase in production there has to be a corresponding increase in money, otherwise prices fall. Where did such increase in money come from? As I said a moment ago, the banks created every dollar of it in Canada except what came in from outside, from countries such as the United States, or from some other outside source.

Let us concentrate our attention on this tremendous increase in production and the increase in money which must result in order to enable the people to exchange what they can produce as a result of the increased production. Then we shall find out and understand that Social Crediters know something about public affairs in respect of even managing a dominion such as Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I, like the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), had little intention of entering this debate. It was not, however, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who provoked me to enter but rather the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I see he is not in his seat at the moment; I hope he will be coming in very shortly.

As far as these tax rental agreements are concerned, I think there is very general agreement in the eight signing provinces that these agreements have been good business for the provinces concerned. It is certainly the opinion of citizens of those provinces, both in their capacity as businessmen paying corporation taxes, and as individuals paying personal income tax. I think I can go so far as to say that perhaps the businessmen in the two non-signing provinces would not be averse to paying just 5 per cent corporation tax provincially instead of the 7 per cent they pay in these provinces which have not signed these agreements. If that were all I had to say about these matters I would sit down.

However, the speech made by the leader of the opposition at the resolution stage of this debate was so extraordinary that I think some attention should be paid to it. If hon. members will look at page 3361 of Hansard, at the bottom of the right-hand column, they will find a paragraph which I will describe as the most skilful pussy-footing ever conducted in this House of Commons. So that hon. members can form their own opinion I am going to read this paragraph:

> Either we believe in the federal system or we do not. No one in the House of Commons or outside of it needs to become hysterical or to suggest that we are treading on sacred ground if anyone should assert the proposition that he believes in unitary government in this country. That argument has been made before and it will be made again. There are those who sincerely believe that Canada would be better off with a single government.

Then he goes on to imply that the federal government are those who believe that; that they believe in an all-powerful central government; that they assert that they have all the knowledge and brains in the country. For example, he says:

> This government—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the page?

Mr. Sinclair: I continue; page 3362:

> This government may think it is in a better position to exercise judgment in regard to important matters than are some of the provincial governments. If that is their opinion, most certainly they are free to assert it; and anyone should accept that opinion as an expression of individual belief or the collective belief of this government.

The Minister of Finance immediately interjected and made it quite clear that that was not the view of the government; that it had never been the view of the government. I began thinking to myself, why is the leader of the opposition taking such pains to state the obvious, that in this country everybody is free to say whether he believes in the federal system or in the unitary system; and who was getting hysterical about it? The hon. member for Greenwood himself in today's debate a little earlier said that we all in this country believe in the federal system of government, that it is in our constitution, and that ours is a vast country spread over 4,000 miles, over very many geographical and economic regions. Obviously, we must have a strong central government and an able, efficient local administration in these different regions. We know that every public figure in Canada with one exception has realized that. Who is the one exception? This exception was Colonel George Drew, lecturer and writer of the period from 1935 to 1941. He of course is now the leader of the opposition. He still lectures us but he is not writing.

I realize too that the hon. gentleman made another plea to this house in the budget debate, a very interesting plea. This will be found on page 1794 of Hansard when he appealed to the house somewhat along these lines: Surely all of us have said some things at some time which we would rather not have said. No person in Canada has said more things that he would rather forget than the leader of the opposition. He appealed to us at the bottom of page 1795 to forget those old speeches. All they did, he said, was to sow discord and disunity.

But not in the country. It certainly sows discord and disunity in the Tory party for Tories in some parts of this country to be reminded of what Colonel George Drew, lecturer and writer, said, and what Premier Drew of Ontario said on national issues. We all realize what a difference there is between his appeals and his performances. He asks us to forget old speeches, then issues that great little Tory pamphlet which has been circulated all over Canada, featuring the remarks made by ministers in this house, casual asides, not considered statements of government policy but truncated little asides made in the heat of debate, stripped of any context. Then he implores us to forget the public statements he has made in the past.

Well now, I am going to look back on some of the speeches he has made, not casual asides but considered speeches on his views. We all know in this house that nothing gives the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) greater pleasure than to quote his old speeches back to us, so I am going to flatter him by also quoting him. The thing we must remember is to distinguish between George Drew the lecturer and writer in the period between 1935 and 1941, and Premier Drew of the immediately following period. In his speech on this resolution, despite his earlier plea to forget old speeches, he has referred back to a speech by Colonel Ralston in 1940 and to one by Mr. Ilsley in 1941. He also quoted from his own old speeches of that period. I therefore feel free to read from the position taken in public addresses by Colonel George Drew between 1935 and 1941; and he assured us in an early debate that these speeches are his very own; they were not speeches prepared by Rod Finlayson.

Here is an interesting paragraph from a speech in London, Ontario, as reported in the Toronto Star of February 23, 1935:

> For Canada, harassed by debts, labour troubles, and conflict in company, insurance and labour laws, Col. Drew saw in one strong central government the solution, instead of an utterly mad jig-saw puzzle of ten conflicting governments. If we were starting all over again who would be crazy enough to set up ten governments in Canada?

By 1936 he had moved on in his speeches to this theme of centralization of government, as he went back and forth across the country. This is what he said before the Toronto board of trade on November 10, 1936; as reported by the Toronto Globe:

> Canada must eliminate the costly inefficiency of ten governments doing, in most cases, the job of one, or else sink in the rising tide of fascism.

He was not even a good prophet. I have seen no rising tide of fascism in this country which he predicted.

Then, again in Toronto on December 10, 1938, as reported in the Montreal Gazette:

> The way to get back to the ideals of confederation, to the ideal of a strong central government, is for Ontario as the largest province to sit down and say to Ottawa:

And this is Mr. Drew speaking for Ontario:

> We have acquired rights it was never intended we should have. We have duplicated services. We propose to hand back to you all things of necessarily national character and retain only those things necessary for the good functioning of local government.

And again, speaking at Sudbury on January 20, 1939, as reported in the Toronto Star:

> Legislation to end Ontario government services which duplicate those of other jurisdictions was promised here last night by Col. George A. Drew if he heads the provincial administration.
> Declaring national unity to be the greatest single issue in Canadian public life in that it would promote development and create employment, the Ontario Conservative leader said at the present time "ten men throughout Canada are being paid to do one job." He instanced the insurance and companies departments of the federal government and the nine provinces.

Then he came down to Halifax; he was really covering the country from coast to coast, to give the Canadian people his views on the absolute necessity for powerful, central government. By 1941 he was really in his stride when, speaking before the bar association at Halifax, he said, as reported in the Halifax Herald of April 25, 1941:

"What we need greatly is to look at government from a business viewpoint," he said, "paralleling methods that a private business with a head office and nine branches would employ to promote more efficiency. Preservation of a nation's integrity must come from a strong centralization feeling," Colonel Drew continued. Canada's main problem was its decentralized government system, and the speaker declared, "solution of that problem would insure continuance of the national structure."

That is quite extraordinary in view of his recent speeches in this house. Next we have his statement before the dominion-provincial conference, the first report he made as premier of Ontario to a dominion-provincial conference, in which he said:

Decentralization of services provides the best assurance that the flexibility, vigour and efficiency of public administration will be preserved.

What a difference! What happened in this country between those statements made in 1941, when Colonel Drew was advocating a central office and branch offices; something like the Timothy Eaton form of government, with a powerful head office and branch offices all over the country just to take orders.

Why do we see this sudden change when we come to the dominion-provincial conference, this change from powerful centralization to complete decentralization. There was no change in the country in this period; it was the same Canada. There were the same provinces, with the same powers. Our national and provincial problems had not changed, and for the most part we have had the same government. The only change, of course, was that Colonel George Drew the lecturer and writer had become Colonel George Drew, premier of Ontario, in the interval.

Many people who listened to him in those days at these many public functions may have been persuaded by his eloquence and glamour to believe in centralization. When this metamorphosis from George Drew the lecturer and writer to George Drew the premier came about and he changed his views, where did that leave these people, his converts? They did not become premiers, too. What was responsible for the change? He had become a big frog in a small puddle, and was very anxious to have that puddle expanded by placing more power with the provinces. I am sure hon. members will remember the story of the frog in Aesop's fables who saw a jackass and wanted to be as big as the jackass, so inflated himself up to those dimensions, finally blowing up. Premier Drew, too, wanted to inflate the importance of his position as premier of Ontario. He did not want to head one of his earlier branch offices. And that I think, is the real reason for the basic change from the great national advocate of centralization who, after a five-year speaking campaign suddenly—in one brief year—becomes the great advocate of decentralization, of giving more power to the provinces.

Now, I have said this in all kindness. In expressing these views he was very careful to preface his speech by saying "Let us not get hysterical because other people may have different views." That is quite true. If a mature mind has mature views which he expresses, and sticks to them, we must respect him. But what always puzzles us is the sudden turnabout position of Colonel George Drew, a mature man making a lot of serious speeches on a grave problem. When he made these speeches on centralization he was certainly mature physically, let me put it that way; but he has not yet told us what was responsible for his sudden about-face, from a doughty advocate of a powerful central government to being the champion of decentralization.

Let me turn now to the actual tax agreements and the points which have been raised about them. The first and the most important point is that the whole problem is based upon a formula which takes into consideration first of all the population of the country and its gross national product, what all the people in this country are producing, as Canadians.

The second important point is that these tax rental agreements are all optional. No province is obliged to sign. The provinces have gladly agreed to re-sign now that they have found this is a good way of doing business, advantageous to them and to the country. I need only remind the leader of the opposition that Mr. Anscomb, his chief lieutenant in British Columbia—he is just a lance-corporal now—was so delighted with the new agreement that he rushed back and made a public announcement before telling the cabinet. The hon. member for Peace River earlier expressed the satisfaction of the Alberta government with the way these tax rental agreements have developed. Then there is another reason, which was put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he said that this is not a matter of ten warring kingdoms waging battle with some central kingdom, but that it is a Canadian problem affecting just the Canadian people who live in ten provinces.

When you speak of a province you are not speaking of those politicians who, for the moment, form a provincial government. You are speaking of the Canadian people who live in one of our ten provinces. We have rich provinces with great natural resources and, on the other hand, we have some poor provinces who have little in the way of great natural resources. These resources do not belong to the provinces; these resources are the heritage of all the Canadian people no matter where they may live. These resources are entrusted to the provinces for management, but in the end, as I say, they are the heritage of all the Canadian people and all the people are entitled to benefit from them. These agreements make this possible.

Let me give you an example. In my province we have the greatest lead-zinc deposit in the world in the fabulous Kimberley mine. Last year the company operating that deposit paid about $40 million in corporation income tax to the federal government. That was the people's share of the profits made from mining that resource in British Columbia. As such all the people of Canada are entitled to receive some benefit from that, and when the federal government collects the tax and thus spreads it back amongst all the provinces, all the people do get benefit.

Timber is another great resource in British Columbia. The largest of our timber operations in its annual report published earlier this year reported a profit of $31 million, on which they paid $16 million taxes. That was what they paid under the corporation tax of 52 per cent. We, the people of Canada, are the major shareholders in every successful industrial operation in Canada when we take 52 per cent of their profits as taxes. Again, that resource does not belong to the people of British Columbia, it belongs to all the people of Canada; yet only the federal government can tax these profits for all the other nine provinces. There are similar resources in other provinces, although of course there are provinces which are deficient in such resources, the wealth from which can be shared by all provinces through these agreements.

The second point, which I think is a more important one, is this matter of business taxation. I am going to turn to the Timothy Eaton Company, since the leader of the opposition at one time thought the best way to conduct the government of Canada was to have one strong central office with ten branch offices. Eaton's is a good example of a concern with a head office in Toronto but doing business throughout the length and breadth of Canada. We all know that indignation has been shown at various times in different municipalities by local stores which have their own staffs and which pay local salaries and local taxes when chain or departmental stores open up a little order office, pay few local taxes or salaries but take business away from local stores. Their main profits are recorded in their head office in Toronto and are beyond the reach of either the municipality or the province, other than Ontario, to touch.

Timothy Eaton did not set up business with the idea of avoiding taxation. He set up his company in the best way he could for commercial reasons and they pay full taxes, but our tax distribution under provincial control does not put those taxes back in the areas where the profits were earned. The federal government can tax them and share the taxes back with the other nine provinces. The same thing is true of a firm like General Motors which has centralized all its operations in Oshawa. Assuming that one-tenth of their product is sold in British Columbia, it follows that one-tenth of their corporation profits should be taxable in British Columbia, that one-tenth of the income tax paid by their workmen should go to British Columbia. But because Oshawa is beyond that province, under a system of provincial taxation that is not possible. If there were ten General Motors plants across the country, one in each province, there would be no problem, but General Motors have found it profitable to have this centralization of business here in Ontario. When the provinces rent their direct tax fields to the federal government they do receive back a share of the profits earned in their province.

These tax rental agreements afford an opportunity of equalization, because the federal government does tax all industry in Canada and does spread out all those tax resources among the signing provinces and can thus give the provinces their fair share of the profits made by Canadian corporations from their operations throughout Canada and through export.

A third point which is important to us in the western provinces is that these tax rental agreements do give us some return for the benefit of the protection which the Canadian parliament has given for many years, particularly to the industries of Ontario and Quebec. I am as much a free trader as anyone, but it is quite true that in a growing country like Canada an infant industry may require a measure of protection until it can get on its feet. That protection is really at the expense of the consumer. When such an industry in Ontario and Quebec because of this protection can sell its goods in the west and make profits it is beyond the reach of those western provinces to tax those profits, but it is not beyond the reach of the federal government. In our powers of taxation in the way of income tax, corporation tax and succession duties we do get for all Canada our fair share of those profits and by means of these tax rental agreements we spread that fair share across the country.

As the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) pointed out, when Saskatchewan gave up the right to collect income tax, corporation tax and succession duties the best they could ever do in those fields was $4,500,000 a year. This year they are going to get $25 million from the federal government as tax rental. Even if their tax collections had doubled in the years 1939-40 down to today they are still getting far more than they could ever have hoped to collect in that province. Yet all they are getting is a fair share of the national wealth through the taxes paid by those concerns and individuals who have done well in this Canada of ours, a share based on population and national production.

We talk a lot about autonomy. The charge is made that these tax rental agreements are stripping autonomy from the provinces. I think there is a far greater freedom for the provincial government in Saskatchewan having $25 million revenue from income tax, corporation tax and succession duties to devote to provincial purposes than having $4,500,000 which was the best they could collect before this plan was inaugurated.

If there was any sign of earmarking these rental payments from the federal government to the provincial governments for specific purposes then there would be some justification for this cry. We are not stripping autonomy from the provinces when the provinces are free to use these large payments in any way they think is best fitted for their purposes within their own province. We have heard the cry that we should earmark federal funds for education, for helping the municipalities, for assistance in roadbuilding and so on, but the moment we do that we will be stripping down provincial autonomy. The best way is the way we are doing now, that is, to turn over these sums, $162 million in all this year, to the provinces for them to spend within their sphere of responsibility as they see best.

There is another important factor in the fact that the provinces are relieved from the burden of collecting these three taxes. They are also relieved from the problems that would be created by varying levels of taxation. It is one of the anomalies of our taxation system that the poorer a province is the higher they must make their taxation rates. The rich province with great industries is able to have low tax rates while the poorer province, as I say, must have higher tax rates which in turn discourage industry from establishing in those provinces, which continues the disparity between rich and poor provinces. Through these tax agreements we have done away with eight different levels of taxation in the eight signing provinces; there is now just one federal level of taxation.

We have removed the cost of double administration, of having provincial tax offices and federal tax offices doing the same work. We are helping the taxpayer and corporations by removing the necessity for keeping two sets of books, one for the purpose of provincial taxation and the other for the purpose of federal taxation on different bases.

There is just one adverse effect which was pointed out directly by the hon. member for Mackenzie and indirectly by the other hon. members. Since the federal government is doing the major tax collection job for the eight provinces we are centralizing just one thing—centralizing all tax criticism on the head of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). The provinces are thus enabled to escape almost all criticism. A provincial leader may feel free to go around his province belabouring the federal government, especially the Department of Finance, for the heavy level of taxation, never mentioning the fact that we are collecting his province's share of the succession duties, the corporation tax and the personal income tax. However, the Minister of Finance and this government are quite willing to put up with that penalty because they know that these agreements are in the best interests of the Canadian people.

However, the payments under the tax rental agreements are only part of the benefits flowing from the tax rental plan. The only hon. member who has mentioned the other benefits promised in the green book proposals of 1945 is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who referred to it in his excellent speech at the resolution stage. If all the provinces yielded these tax fields we promised to do more than share tax revenue with the provinces. We promised that if they would all sign we would enter the social security field by way of family allowances, old age pensions, health grants and health insurance. While all the provinces have not signed—the two major provinces with the largest tax fields have not signed—we have done a great deal toward carrying out those obligations which were mentioned when this tax rental scheme was brought up for renewal in 1945, even though these proposals were contingent on all provinces signing.

There are other large financial grants, not to the provincial governments but to the people of the provinces, through family allowances, through the new old age pension plan; to the hospitals through hospital grants; to the provincial governments through the trans-Canada highway grants—entering fields which are really provincial fields—and through the recent grants to universities; under all of which we are sending almost $800 million over and above the tax rental payments into those provinces out of the federal treasury, again to ensure uniform appreciation by all Canadians of the wealth of this country. It is certainly a program which has met with great approval across the country. It is true we do not give all this aid to the provincial governments; family allowances and old age pensions go direct to the people. That is the point the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made. The agreements with eight of our provinces do not mean that we are giving aid to the provincial governments but to those Canadians who live in those provinces so that they will have the same opportunity as Canadians who live in any other province.

If these things like family allowances and old age pensions were back purely in the provincial field, as the leader of the opposition would apparently like, we can well imagine the very great difference in standards between the family allowance paid in Ontario, with its concentration of industrial and commercial interests, and that which could be paid in a province like Newfoundland. Yet the old people of Ontario and Newfoundland and the young people in those provinces who receive family allowances are all Canadians entitled to the same benefits. I think that real national unity has been achieved in these eight provinces by the fact that they have signed tax rental agreements. Because of that it has been possible to go ahead with many of these programs. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre bouncing up and down. It is true that it has not yet been possible to go ahead with health insurance but we have gone a long way in other respects in view of the fact that the two major provinces have remained outside the scheme.

With respect to this matter I want to refer now to another instance of opposition by the present leader of the opposition to this program of redistribution of wealth through the federal tax revenues. I am going to turn to page 1803 of Hansard for May 1. I say that most Canadians thoroughly approve of this scheme which has enabled us to have uniform distribution of national wealth to the children of Canada no matter in what province they may reside, to the old people of Canada, to the hospitals of Canada and to the universities of Canada to the amount of $800 million a year all told. Here is the real root of the opposition of the leader of the opposition to the tax rental scheme. I am quoting now from his famous radio broadcast of August 9, 1944, which is to be found at the page of Hansard to which I have referred. This is not a heated aside made in debate, later regretted; it is a carefully considered and prepared statement which was broadcast in the province of Ontario. It reads as follows:

> This family allowance bill is an obvious bribe . . . there is every reason why it should meet with approval in Quebec where there was a very important election approaching . . . Millions of dollars from the pockets of the people of Ontario will go to the province of Quebec under this measure . . . The people of Ontario will be asked to pay nearly half of the $200 million which will be needed as the initial amount to put the Family Allowances Act into effect.
> Our attitude toward any measure which takes money from the pockets of the people of Ontario for the special advantage of Quebec is based upon considerations which affect that province alone. You know what those considerations are.

I have never before heard the leader of the opposition when he was so coy as in that last line. I take it the considerations are that in Quebec there are more and bigger families than in Ontario, but every one of those French-Canadian children in Quebec is just as entitled to the same national family allowance as are children in the small families of Ontario or any other province. There is the heart and root of the objection of the then premier of Ontario both to the tax rental program and to family allowances; he did not want to share the wealth of Ontario with any other Canadian. I want to be fair to him so far as family allowances are concerned. Since that speech in August 1944 he has of course swung around and now lauds this Liberal government policy. He made a curious defence of that speech in the house earlier this session when he defended it by completely ignoring it and quoting from another speech he made a year later. That is a very curious defence. However, he has now completely swung around and has at last seen the virtues of this great Liberal measure because on Monday, May 19, the Canadian Press carried across the country a report of an address by the leader of the opposition in Quebec. The report reads in part as follows:

> Speaking in French, he told audiences here, at Normandin, Mistassini and St. Felicien that family allowances should be increased, even doubled.

Mr. Fleming: There is not a word of truth in that.

Mr. Sinclair: What a long way he has gone since the days when he classed it as a bribe to Quebec.

Mr. Fleming: There is not a word of truth in that report.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Press service extends from coast to coast, and everyone in the house or in public life knows that the usual lame excuse of any foolish politician whose tongue has outrun his brain is to throw the blame on the press and say that he was misquoted.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do you believe it is true?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, I do, knowing the kind of statements the leader has made in the past.

Mr. Fleming: You need your head read then.

Mr. Pouliot: Arthur Meighen was always misquoted.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): So is the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Sinclair: In conclusion, I want to say that the tax rental agreements with eight of our provinces, associated as they have been with the old age pension plan, family allowances, health grants, trans-Canada highway grants and university grants, have gone a long, long way to equalize opportunity in this country for all Canadians no matter what province they may live in, and have spread the national wealth on a national basis and so strengthened both the provincial governments and the federal government. The plan will be on an even sounder basis when the two central provinces come into the scheme, and I hope that day is not far distant.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if it is the case that this bill when passed will give the government authority to enter into tax rental agreements not only with the eight provinces that have already indicated their willingness to do so but also with the other two provinces?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that the failure to reach over-all agreement did not stand in the way of proceeding with old age security under the new legislation we now have, can it be concluded that failure to reach an over-all agreement does not stand in the way of a nationwide program of health insurance?

Mr. Abbott: I would not think one should necessarily make that assumption.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Compensation payable.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I recall it the original calculation was based on the gross national product of 1942.

Mr. Abbott: Under the old agreement, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This agreement is carrying everything forward five years.

Mr. Abbott: It is to be 1948 so far as the guaranteed minimum is concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is my question. Why is it 1948? The original year was 1942. The agreement moves on five years. Why does the year of calculation move on six years?

Mr. Abbott: In considering the whole situation we came to the conclusion that 1948 represented a year in which business conditions were such that in increasing the original guaranteed minima to bring them up to the 1948 basis that was as far as the federal government felt it could properly go and give a guarantee to the provinces that these amounts would be paid no matter what economic conditions might be. 1948 was three or four years after the end of the war, and to a considerable extent conditions had levelled off by then. For this and other reasons it was felt that 1948 was the proper year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In other words, apparently you felt free to take whatever year you liked regardless of whether it was five years from 1942 or six.

Mr. Abbott: Quite so.

Mr. Gibson: Would the minister say whether during the operation of these agreements the provincial governments have been reasonably fair with the federal government? It occurs to me that we have left quite a loophole here resulting in the federal treasury being deprived of money when we allow the provincial governments to set the royalties on their natural resources. After all, if they take it from us we do not get a chance at it in the form of income tax. I know that the government of British Columbia, for instance, when selling their natural resources to the logging companies pretty well assess what the probable profit in these logging operations will be and they will not allow you more than 20 per cent profit on your operation. They put up the stumpage value to take care of whatever profit there might be in excess of 20 per cent.

Mr. Abbott: Speaking generally our relations with the provincial governments on the operation of these agreements have been most satisfactory.

As my hon. friend is aware, there is a definition of a proper royalty in the agreement entered into with the provinces and therefore the federal government would be in a position to challenge any royalty which was in excess of what was proper and reasonable or prejudicial to the federal position.

Mr. Gibson: The royalty would be different from the stumpage value on timber?

Mr. Abbott: I think we are really talking about the same thing.

Mr. Adamson: I think this clause might be the place for the minister to inform me of the difference in computation of the gross national product.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I can give the exact difference. As my hon. friend is aware, the gross national product at factor cost eliminates indirect taxes in Canada but not depreciation, whereas at market price it includes both those items. The figure would therefore be lower than at market prices, but as long as you are relating like with like it does not make any difference in the practical operation of these agreements, so far as the provinces are concerned.

Mr. Adamson: The term was new to me and that is why I asked about it.

Mr. Abbott: It is one of these economic expressions.

Mr. Adamson: Factor cost means the gross national product with such items as sales tax and it would also include royalties and stumpage dues deducted?

Mr. Abbott: It would mean the gross national product less indirect taxes, but not less depreciation reserves. My hon. friend will realize that those might well be eliminated for calculations of this kind because as I mentioned in my opening statement, it does not seem appropriate to relate payments which may be made to the provinces to a particular level of indirect taxes which may be raised or lowered for reasons other than a desire to affect the total payments to the provinces. After consideration of the operation of these agreements over five years it was felt that the figure relating to the gross national product in the formula should be based on factor cost rather than market price.

Mr. Adamson: Factor cost means the basic cost of production rather than the price received for the material?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I think that is a very good layman's or colloquial explanation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister referred to depreciation a moment ago and that prompts me to ask this question. Will there be any adjustment necessitated by that change in depreciation or is the amount involved not sufficient to make a difference?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that it is not significant compared to the amount of indirect taxes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was not here this morning when the minister spoke and I wonder whether these amounts which are going to be guaranteed for five years are higher than the provinces have received?

Mr. Abbott: I put a table on Hansard showing the new minimum guarantees and on an average the figures are 50 per cent higher than the current minimum agreements. I also gave figures for the present estimated payments to each province. For instance for Newfoundland, the province in which my hon. friend is probably most interested, the guaranteed minimum is $9,174,624. The adjusted payment for the first year of the new agreement on the basis of present estimates would be $12,291,593. I put on Hansard a table showing the corresponding figures for all provinces.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Knowles: Before the title carries I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question following on the answer made by the minister a few moments ago.

He said that in his view it does not necessarily follow that failure to achieve an overall agreement does not stand in the way of a nationwide program of health insurance. Is it not correct to say that for a couple of years now the federal government has not given that as a reason for not going ahead with health insurance?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think that I want to get into a discussion on health insurance, Mr. Chairman, in the committee stage of this bill. As Mr. Ilsley made it clear, in 1946, and I made it clear in 1947, they have nothing whatever to do with any other phase of federal-provincial relations. They neither prevent nor assure the implementation of such plans as health insurance programs. There is this difference, as my hon. friend appreciates. The question of health is one which is primarily provincial and there are constitutional problems as well as financial problems involved in the implementation of a health insurance plan. I am not prepared today to enter into any discussion of what may or may not happen to health insurance in future years.

Mr. Knowles: I was not trying to involve the Minister of Finance in a discussion of health insurance but I was trying to get clear the relationship between the tax rental situation and the proposals that were made to the provinces at the conference in 1945. The minister now says that Mr. Ilsley made it clear in 1946 that the tax rental proposals were not to be regarded as on the same footing as the proposals of 1945. Nevertheless it has been a factor in the Canadian situation in the last few years that some of the measures which were proposed along with the taxation arrangements suggested in 1945 have since been implemented, and it appears to some of us that since failure to achieve an over-all arrangement did not stand in the way of universal old age security, it should not stand in the way of a nationwide program of health insurance.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORIZATION TO MAKE CAPITAL EXPENDITURES IN 1952

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1952, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues who have been kind enough to give me this opportunity to express some views about the legislation now before the house. In the first place I will read my credentials to discuss that legislation.

(Translation):

Province of Quebec,
Municipal corporation of the county of Riviere du Loup.

At a general and quarterly meeting of the municipal council of the county of Riviere du Loup, held in its ordinary place of meeting (county town) of the said county, in the city hall at Riviere du Loup on Wednesday, 11th of June, 1952, at 10 a.m., the following resolution was passed:

The members of this county council discussed the important issue of retaining in Riviere du Loup the Canadian National Railway shops, which is in the general interest of the whole county, as well as the complete overhauling of the Temiscouata railway line.

Reeve Jos. Rousseau, mayor of Saint Jean de Dieu, speaking on this subject, acquainted his fellow members of the county council with the encouraging remarks made in this connection by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, Prime Minister, when waited upon by a delegation from Riviere du Loup at his office in Ottawa.

Consequently the members of the municipal council of the county of Riviere du Loup unanimously resolve to express strongly their support for the retention in Riviere du Loup of the aforementioned Canadian National Railway shops and the complete restoration of the said Temiscouata railway, because of its vital interest first of all to the city and because of its immediate benefit to the whole area.

Therefore, the council place their confidence in the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent and are also counting upon his colleague, the Minister of Transport, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, and his other colleagues in the cabinet.

The council members would feel they were remiss if they did not approve the untiring work of our valiant and devoted M.P., Mr. J. François Pouliot, in these cases and we invite him to continue working towards the success of this matter. Carried.

Jos. Rousseau, Reeve
Paul E. Roy., sec-treas., C.M.C.

(Text):

Let us have a look at the past and the future financing of the C.N.R. Bill No. 308 and this one are the Siamese twins of high finance. The former one dealt with the indebtedness of the C.N.R. to the government and the public until December 31, 1951. The latter provides for unusual ways and means to brighten the C.N.R. picture during the calendar year 1952.

In virtue of Bill No. 308, the total indebtedness of the C.N.R. to the government and the public for loans made from 1938 to 1951 was reduced by one-half. In the second place, in consideration of that so-called release, the C.N.R. transferred to the government 736,385,405 dollar shares of preferred stock of the company bearing hypothetical interest of 4 per cent. In the third place, the initial stated value of the no-par value of the capital stock was reduced to $396,518,135.06. In the fourth place, the initial value of $1,218,642,195.27 of the 5 million shares of the capital stock of the securities trust was also reduced to $378,518,135.02. To summarize that piece of legislation, the government is holding in the first place $736 million of preferred stock bearing a problematic interest of 4 per cent; and in the second place, the company has acknowledged a moral debt of $775 million in common stock.

With operating revenues of $553 million in 1950 and $624 million in 1951, it might have been expected that the management could have made both ends meet in 1952. I cannot understand the financial policy of the Canadian National Railways. In 1937, according to the old ways of Roman law, the debts were cancelled. One-half of them were cancelled again by legislation a few days ago. Yet here we are seeing the C.N.R. going to borrow again formidable sums of money. My fear is that they are extravagant. That is easy to see by looking at the report so extravagantly printed as compared with that modest one of the C.P.R.

Before starting to discuss the bill before the house I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the stenographic report of the committee on railways and shipping has been tampered with. We had to wait quite a long time for the publication of the volume No. 4 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the railways and shipping committee. Many changes have been made in the stenographic report. Here is one at page 222:

> Mr. Pouliot: If the gross revenue of the railway is $600 million, and if the government will buy 4 per cent preferred stock, that would be $18 million.

That figure should be corrected; it should be $24 million. To continue:

> Mr. Gordon: That is right.
> Mr. Pouliot: Then it would mean that instead of paying for a deficit of $18 million, they will be buying shares in that amount?
> Mr. Gordon: Well, now to follow up Mr. Macdonnell's question . . .

An important statement by the president of the railway has been struck out of the record at page B-22 of the stenographic report, namely "That is right." That was the answer of the president to my question and it does not appear in the printed report. I did not check all the changes; but that one shows that I was not so wrong when I asked a question about an oath being taken by the witnesses who appear before our committees.

Notwithstanding the cancellation of debts in 1937 and the most generous provisions of Bill No. 308, the C.N.R. again intends to borrow $342,890,990 in virtue of the legislation that is now before us. If the operating revenue in 1952 amounts to as much as in 1951 it means that the C.N.R. wizards will spend nearly $1 billion this year. Here are the figures: $624 million operating revenue of last year, plus $342,890,990 to be borrowed by this bill, making a total of $966,890,990. According to the above figures the operating expenses of the C.N.R. this year would amount to two and a half times those of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Last year they were $402 million. This is due in large part to the purchase of new equipment, to be paid for by borrowed money in virtue of this bill. The C.N.R. has purchased new equipment to the amount of $96 million. The C.P.R., with net earnings of nearly $27 million last year, did not dare to spend so lavishly on the purchase of new equipment.

The road and equipment property of the Canadian National Railways is assessed for more than $2 billion. The report does not mention the number nor the value of steam locomotives, but their number must be large and their actual value a real asset. Does the management intend to bury all the fine steam locomotives alive in scrap iron cemeteries? There was no inventory of the equipment in the Canadian National Railways report. The management should peruse the annual report of the Kansas City Southern Railway and of the Norfolk and Western Railway, which are, I believe, the first and second most efficient railways in North America.

It is only fair to say that where diesels are ousting steam there is waste, owing to the need for both sets of servicing shops, steam and diesel. When Mr. Gordon was appointed I wondered why he did not borrow a man from the Kansas City Southern or the Norfolk and Western. Diesel locomotives cost $100,000 more than steam locomotives. There are 24 of 1500 to 1600 horsepower in the 1953 budget. At page 74 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence Mr. Gordon said:

> For the five-year program which we have in mind. at the present trend of prices, it would cost us roughly about $95 million; and for complete dieselization of the C.N.R. it would cost us about $500 million.

At page 71 Mr. Gordon said:

> By the economies achieved we will pay off that expenditure in a period of ten years.

The five-year program was extended to ten years. At page 72 Mr. Gordon said:

> It may be twenty years or twenty-five years before we have completely dieselized, but I say that inevitably there will be no steam locomotives as time goes on.

Dieselization is the fad of the C.N.R. for the time being, although Mr. Gordon said at page 78 of the report:

> We are very interested in turbine development and are keeping closely in touch with the experiments which are going on. We are also closely watching an experiment which is going on between our research and development branch and McGill university which relates to the relative economy of oil-fired gas turbines and coal-fired gas turbines. That presents a real possibility and we are watching it with great interest.

It is possible to convert steam locomotives into turbine-propelled locomotives, and some research is being undertaken not only by McGill university but also by the department of technical surveys. It may mean that in future diesel locomotives will be outmoded and the railways will try some other locomotive. At page 92 I asked Mr. Gordon if he had attended the dinner of the engineering institute where the main speaker was the Prime Minister. He said that he had not been there but that he had read the report of the Prime Minister's speech about atomic power. The Prime Minister said that as soon as the cold war is over we could expect atomic power to progress to the point of meeting civilian needs. Then I asked Mr. Gordon the following question:

I wonder if the management or the scientists who work for the railways and who are in touch with the atomic board of control? Are they?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Fairweather, our vice-president in charge of research, is a very extraordinary individual and he keeps very closely in touch with all these developments. About three months ago he attempted to explain atomic power to me and he managed to make me understand it, so I can assure you that he is very closely in touch with current developments in this field.

Mr. Pouliot: This is only a preamble to what I am going to ask you. Owing to Mr. Fairweather's learning and interest in scientific matters, can you foresee the date when diesel locomotives will be replaced by locomotives which will use atomic power instead of oil?

Mr. Gordon: I am afraid that is going too far into the future for me to predict. But I will say this: that developments in the scientific world affecting the production of energy are something that we will always keep in touch with; and if it becomes a practical matter, we will have to deal with atomic energy just the same as we deal with diesel engines now. There is a constant stage of evolution, and there is no place where such developments are more apparent than in the transportation field, because energy is one of our most important factors.

Mr. Pouliot: I take it that if atomic energy proves to be practical, you will abandon all the diesel locomotives?

Mr. Gordon: It will depend on the economics of the situation; but what we have to think about here is the cost involved in scrapping existing equipment, and what savings could be made. I think that we are much too far away from the practical appreciation of the costs involved to form any intelligent judgment about the matter yet.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, do you consider it to be possible?

Mr. Gordon: I do not rule out the possibility. I do not rule out anything as being impossible.

Mr. Pouliot: You cannot say then that it is impossible?

Mr. Gordon: No, I cannot.

The Chairman: Carried.

This is to be found at pages 92 and 93 of the report. I draw your attention to the fact that Mr. Gordon has said there there is constant evolution in matters of energy. But on June 19 the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) made a most interesting statement about a United States company which claims that it has put out a good type of coal-fired engine which compared favourably with the diesel. What I appreciate is the fact that the hon. member has stated in the house that the statement by Mr. Gordon to the effect that steam locomotives are no longer built is untrue. I agree with the hon. member on that. He added that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys was carrying on research to see if an engine using coal could not be developed to operate just as efficiently and economically as a diesel engine. He added that he thought Mr. Gordon could well have carried on his program from Toronto west to a certain point, and then could have gone rather slowly with dieselization east of Montreal. He referred to an important statement by Mr. Gordon to the effect that with that dieselization plan the Canadian National Railways would buy 280,000 tons of coal less from the maritime provinces than they do now.

I wonder if the government of Nova Scotia has been awakened to the results the miners of Nova Scotia would suffer if Mr. Gordon's ambitious plans are carried out. I congratulate the hon. member for the interest he has shown in the welfare of his constituents, and I was very much interested also to hear the comments of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) on the same subject.

Hon. members will have seen in the press last month that in the United States a shipbuilding firm is laying this month the keel for the first American atom-powered submarine, which shows that atomic energy is a reality. Not only that, but Mr. N. R. Crump, vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, stated in Vancouver on May 10:

"It is quite within the realms of possibility that within our time atomic engines may prove practicable and economical for commercial transportation", Mr. Crump said in an address to the 66th annual meeting of the Engineering Institute of Canada.

The days of the pioneer developer are not over, he said.

"The glamorous days of spanning a continent and laying rails through the Rocky Mountains may be gone, but the search for the quicker, safer and more comfortable and more economical means of transportation continues."

He found here a field for the skill, imagination and ingenuity of the engineers.

"As I visualize the future, major developments may be anticipated in all the four principal aspects of transportation—power, vehicle, way and communications.

"It is safe to say that nowhere else in the world has the engineer played so large a part in the development of a nation as in Canada."

Naturally, Mr. Gordon's dieselization program was approved by the editorial of the Globe and Mail; but it does not amount to much. According to those people we are in a period of transition. Why waste millions on costly experiments? I mean it is absurd to take for granted that the turbine locomotives and atomic engines will not displace the diesel locomotive in the near future.

With the money that is spent by the Canadian National Railways they publish pamphlets. I have one which was issued this year, entitled "Quebec, La Doulce Province". At page 18, on the upper left corner, there is a beautiful photograph with the caption of Rimouski. On the upper right hand side of the page there is another picture of a settlement bearing the caption Riviere du Loup. In fact, it is the same as all that is done by the Canadian National Railways; they are not accurate. The picture of Rimouski on the left is that of Riviere du Loup. It is a very fine picture of Riviere du Loup. The picture described as Riviere du Loup is not at all that of Riviere du Loup. That is the way they do advertising in our part of the world. I ask the management if it was done on purpose; if not, the officials in their public relations office are not qualified to hold their positions.

Riviere du Loup is the place where Sir John A. Macdonald spent more than twenty summers while he was prime minister of Canada. Hon. Alexandre Taschereau, former premier of Quebec, has been living there for fifty years. At the present time the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) has chosen to have his summer place there. It is also the place where my distinguished colleagues, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) were born. All those who pass through Riviere du Loup know that it is a progressive city. I am proud to live there. It is unfortunate that the province of Quebec has always been snubbed by the Canadian National Railways management. I have been a member of parliament for many years—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. member for Temiscouata to indicate to the house how he relates his remarks to the principle of this bill which has to do with the authorization by parliament of the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures, and to authorize the guarantee of certain securities.

Mr. Pouliot: I shall explain the situation to you. This bill is to implement the budget of the Canadian National Railways. If you will take the trouble to look at the bill you will see that the figures of the budget are included in the bill. In the budget is an enumeration of the work to be done this year by Canadian National Railways. In section 3 reference is made to additions and betterments, excluding new equipment, $23,014,271. There is also new equipment obligations incurred prior to 1952 that become due and payable in 1952, $93,647,760.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I might indicate to the hon. member that when I asked him the question I had looked at the bill and saw that the capital expenditures referred to are precisely those enumerated in section 3 of the bill. That is what he should relate his remarks to, and not what the management has done in Riviere du Loup or the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pouliot: You did not let me finish my argument. I want to show that we have suffered injustices in the past and I hope they will be corrected this year with the moneys that are going to be voted for the Canadian National Railways. If I cannot lay my grievances before the house those wrongs will never be remedied. In order to obtain satisfaction this year from the Canadian National Railways I have to lay my grievances before the house. There is no other way.

When we were discussing Bill No. 308 the other day the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) raised an objection and I did not insist because that bill related to previous financing of the Canadian National Railways. This bill relates to present and future financing of the Canadian National Railways. My grievances could not have been remedied in the past. If they had, I would have no grievances to present today.

This is a matter for the future and I cannot do otherwise than to bring it before the house. I refer to the way in which from time immemorial we have been dealt with by the Canadian National Railways. I must do that in order to have these wrongs redressed this year. I hope I have made myself clear. I submit that I am perfectly in order in stating that in the past the management of the Canadian National Railways have snubbed the province of Quebec. There is no reason for that and I hope that this year they will recognize their responsibilities to my great province and do better than they have in the past. That is my argument, and I hope I have been able to convince Your Honour.

I only want to say that two great newspapers of Quebec city, Le Soleil and L'Action Catholique, support my contention that the province of Quebec has not had a fair deal from the Canadian National Railways from time immemorial. I should like to refer to an answer given by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith) on May 15 to a question asked by myself as reported on page 2226 of Hansard. I think that proves the statement I have just made. He gives the railway mileage per thousand inhabitants in the different provinces as follows:

Newfoundland	2·0
Prince Edward Island	2·9
Nova Scotia	2·2
New Brunswick	3·6
Quebec	1·2
Ontario	2·3
Manitoba	6·2
Saskatchewan	10·5
Alberta	6·0
British Columbia	3·3

The average is 3·0 per 1,000 inhabitants, and that shows that we have one-third of the average mileage in Canada. Then the mileage per 1,000 square miles of land area was given as follows:

Newfoundland	4·9
Prince Edward Island	131·0
Nova Scotia	67·3
New Brunswick	66·8
Quebec	9·2
Ontario	28·8
Manitoba	22·0
Saskatchewan	36·7
Alberta	22·7
British Columbia	10·8

The average is 19·8, and in this case we have less than one-half the average. Surely we have reason for complaint. I brought up this matter before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and I should like to refer to a question which I put to vice-president Fairweather of the Canadian National Railways on May 14, as follows:

> Will you please tell me what is the mileage of the railways in British Columbia compared to the province of Quebec by thousand people?

Mr. Fairweather replied as follows:

> Well, I am sorry, sir, I cannot give that offhand; I would be pleased to figure it out.

That information should be on the desk of all the officials of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. On the same date, as reported on page 125 of the proceedings of the committee I said:

> I will repeat before the minister what I have said in the first place, it is that the Canadian National Railways are snubbing the province of Quebec, they are giving us the cold shoulder and they treat us like country cousins.

I am most thankful to one of the brightest members of the press gallery, Mr. Douglas How, who wrote a most excellent dispatch. It was sent by the Canadian Press to all the papers that form part of that organization. In the Montreal Gazette of May 15 the article was headed "C.N.R. snubs Quebec, B. C. is unfair, Temiscouata M.P. tells Commons." The Trail Times published the same story on the same day under the heading, "C.N.R. Snubbing Quebec, B.C. unfair, Pouliot." The Montreal Star had this headline: "Pouliot back in old form at C.N.R. Kitimat hearing." Le Droit of Ottawa headed their article this way: "Les chemins de fer nationaux lèvent le nez sur le Québec, déclare Pouliot". The Fort William Times-Journal had this heading: "Fiery Pouliot claims C.N. unfair to Quebec." And so on and so on. I will not mention any more of them.

To show you how we are dealt with by the Canadian National Railways, there were day labourers who shovelled snow in the winter months, particularly in February, and their unemployment insurance books were sent by the railway to Campbellton. I tried to get them back. They could not collect any insurance, and my last information was that at Moncton they had 8,000 books of unemployed people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Pouliot: As I spoke immediately after the minister I am entitled to more than forty minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member claims that because he spoke immediately after the mover he is entitled to more than forty minutes. That is by virtue of standing order 37 which reads as follows:

> No member, except the prime minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

The general rule is that no member shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate except the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition—

Mr. Pouliot: I am not the Prime Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I presume those two lines are the ones which, in the opinion of the hon. member, apply to his case at this time. He is referring to a government order having been moved by a minister or someone on his behalf and the member, in this instance the hon. member for Temiscouata, who speaks in reply immediately after such minister. May I tell the hon. member that at first sight in my view the word "reply" refers to an hon. member sitting on the opposite side.

Mr. Pouliot: No, no.

Canadian National Railways

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may give his views after I am finished but at the moment I would ask him to listen to what I have to say. In my view the word "reply" has reference to the reply made by a representative of the opposition. In this case a government order was moved and no speeches were made. It may be argued that, the mover having risen in his place and having agreed to the chair putting the motion that the bill be read a second time, it is to be understood therefrom that he has said, "I so move". I would ask the hon. member to look at citation 294 on page 114 of the third edition of Beauchesne and especially at citation 288 on page 113 which reads as follows:

> The member who makes a motion may give the name of his seconder who will, if necessary, lift his hat as evidence that he has intimated his consent, and the seconder will then be allowed to speak on the question. But if the seconder should rise and say only a word or two,—for instance "that he seconds the motion,"—he is precluded from again addressing the house.

In this case the mover, the Minister of Finance, did not say a single word. There were no speeches. Therefore how can any other hon. member offer a reply? If we are to understand from the chair putting the motion that the minister or someone on his behalf has said, "I so move" and that therefore he has spoken, then a member may stand up and offer a reply. In my view that reply, according to standing order 37, is one that is offered by a member of the opposition and not by a member on the government side. I would also point out that the last paragraph of citation 294 reads as follows:

> If a member who moves an order of the day should rise and say only a word or two,—for instance, "that he moves the order,"—he is precluded from again addressing the house; except if the order of the day be a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill, in which case he will be allowed a reply.

That provision takes care of the reply that can be made by the minister or someone on his behalf who has moved a government order. The point on which I should like to hear the hon. member is whether in his view he thinks the minister has spoken merely by consenting that the motion for second reading be put by the chair, and that therefore a reply can be offered. In the second place, if a reply can be made, then according to standing order 37 should it not be made by a representative of the opposition and not by a member sitting on the government side?

Mr. Pouliot: The rule does not say that the minister shall make a two-hour speech in moving second reading of a bill which has to be replied to. It was the Minister of Finance who moved second reading. He chose not to speak in explanation of the bill, which was not asked of him, and I rose to speak immediately after the motion was put. If I had not spoken perhaps the motion would have carried, but I will tell you that I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. members in the opposition groups who have given me the opportunity to speak immediately after the motion was put. More than that, I will tell you that the standing order makes no difference between government supporters and opposition members. We are all alike in the house and the same rule applies to opposition members as to government members. In addition, I do not know anything about the book from which you have quoted except the standing orders of the house. One of the authors of these compendiums told me one day that I had never quoted him in the house. I said, "Sir, it is for a very good reason. I have never read your book."

The rules of the house should be interpreted with fairness in order to give members the opportunity to say what they have to say. I submit it is not necessary for a member to make a long speech to afford the opportunity to the member who speaks after the motion is put to speak for forty minutes or more. I am not asking for the indulgence of the house. If you do not intend to reconsider your decision in the light of what I have said I will ask for a vote of the house, and even if I am alone I will not be displeased. I must tell you that I am greatly surprised at the interpretation you have given in your ruling, and I hope you will reconsider your decision.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It does not happen very often that a member offering to reply to the mover of a government order is on the same side as the government. That is what struck me at first.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member that the mover of a government order does not have to make a two-hour speech or a forty-minute speech in order to move the order. It is understood that when the motion is put from the chair the mover has said, "I so move". The minister may stand up and indicate to the chair by taking a bow that he does so move and one must understand that he has so moved. From that point on the Speaker puts the motion and an hon. member may stand up and offer the reply referred to in standing order 37. That is the interpretation I am inclined at this moment to give to the standing order.

As I said, the point has not occurred before and it is difficult for me to decide. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) will understand that I wish to be as fair as I can under the circumstances to him or to any other hon. member. Perhaps I could take advantage of a practice which is very well recognized in this house; that when there is a point about which the Speaker is doubtful he may ask opinions of other experienced members of the house. I would appreciate it, therefore, if at this moment other experienced members of the house would comment on the interpretation I have given, and also on the views expressed by the hon. member for Temiscouata, about the meaning of the word "reply" and who should be entitled to take advantage of standing order No. 37 in the case of a reply. If no hon. members wish to offer opinions at this time I will have to make my own interpretation and decide now, and there would always be the recourse of appealing my ruling.

Mr. Drew: I did not intend to make any observations in regard to the point raised. I do not recall it having been raised before and the only reason I rise now is because a decision on one occasion, as we have discovered, is apt to become a precedent for another.

As I conceive the rules in regard to debate they are related to the fact that under our system there is on one side the government and on the other side the opposition. As I understand the rules, when they use the term "reply" in response to a statement of the Prime Minister or a member of the government it is a reply by the opposite side of the house. With very warm regard for the hon. member for Temiscouata I nevertheless did not wish to have my silence taken as indicating that I was willing to accept the proposition that he is entitled to reply on behalf of the opposition. I am not saying that facetiously; I think that would be the result of such an interpretation of the rule as he puts forward. I think the very fact that the statement is made that the minister presenting the case for the government may exceed the time limit and that it may be exceeded by the member immediately following him in reply is related to our system of having two sides in this house. I do submit, with respect for the views of the hon. member who has sat here for so long, that the reply in this case is obviously intended to refer to a reply by some member of the opposition speaking in reply to a member of the government.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps I might say a word, Mr. Speaker, on the interesting point raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata and on which you, sir, have made certain comments. With great respect, I am not so sure in my own mind that it matters whether or not the minister moving the order makes a speech. I cannot see that that would have any bearing on whether the member speaking in reply immediately after is entitled to the extra time allotted under standing order 37. If a ruling were to be made that because the minister had not made a speech therefore the first opposition member could not have additional time, we would get into the situation where the minister could easily prevent a lengthy speech from the opposition side of the house simply by making no speech at all when he moved the order. It seems to me it has to be taken for granted that the minister moving the order, even if he does not avail himself of the right to speak, has spoken by the fact that he has made the motion.

I offer that comment with respect, sir, with regard to part of what Your Honour has said. Obviously I am in disagreement with that part of what you said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already agreed to that.

Mr. Knowles: Then we are making headway. The point raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata, as to whether he comes under the provision of standing order 37 wherein it refers to a member speaking in reply immediately thereafter, does raise a difficulty. If he, a member on the government side supporting the minister and supporting the bill, is to be regarded as a member speaking in reply, and if such a ruling were made, then in future if the Speaker in the chair at the time happened to see a government supporter as the second speaker, merely because an opposition member was a little slow in getting to his feet, we would have the result that two long speeches could be made on the government side, but no member on the opposition side except the leader of the opposition would have the right set out in standing order 37. That is one result of such an interpretation which would have to be considered. Obviously that would be unfair.

The other point I wish to draw to your attention is one that I have looked up since the matter arose. As a matter of fact I was not sure I would get it in time to be able to refer to it before you ruled; but in looking in Beauchesne's third edition, in the annotations following standing order 37, one finds in citation 219 a reference to a discussion which although not exactly the same does bear on the point now before us. It occurred in the House of Commons in 1929. I have sent to the library for the volume of Journals referred to in that citation and I have been looking through pages 394, 395 and 396 as suggested by the citation.

I find on that occasion the order before the house was a motion to go into committee of supply. It had been moved by Mr. Robb and the first speaker was the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, my predecessor, the late Mr. Woodsworth. It appears that the Speaker on that occasion had stopped Mr. Woodsworth at the end of his forty minutes. He was asked, however, to reconsider his ruling and two days later he gave a revised ruling. The incident itself occurred on Wednesday, May 8, and the revised ruling of the Speaker of the day was given on May 10, 1929. It is a lengthy ruling which I shall not quote in full, and I want to make it perfectly clear in drawing attention to this that the situation was a little different because it was with respect to a motion to go into supply. Nevertheless in the ruling of the Speaker of that day there is this key sentence:

> Therefore, Mr. Woodsworth, in order to speak longer than forty minutes, was bound to argue against Mr. Robb's motion.

There may be other rulings, but that is the only one I have been able to find and it certainly gives guidance to us today. The Speaker was attempting to interpret the meaning of the words "in reply". In fact a little earlier he said:

> I have since given the most serious consideration to the interpretation of this standing order and as I said the whole question hinges on the meaning of the words "in reply" as they appear therein.

Your Honour today said the same thing. Mr. Speaker Lemieux went on to say this:

> What is a reply? According to the King's English dictionary it is:—
> "That which is said or written in answer to what is said or written by another; rejoinder; response."
> Therefore, Mr. Woodsworth, in order to speak longer than forty minutes, was bound to argue against Mr. Robb's motion.

Then he went on to point out that since Mr. Woodsworth was opposed to the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply until he had had an opportunity to air the grievances which Mr. Woodsworth had in mind at that time, therefore he was opposing the motion. He thus qualified as the first member following the minister and speaking in reply thereto, in the sense that he was opposed to Mr. Robb's motion. On that basis Mr. Speaker Lemieux reversed his decision of May 8 and decided that under those circumstances Mr. Woodsworth should have been allowed to speak longer than forty minutes.

I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not the provision should be interpreted any wider than that. Mr. Speaker Lemieux did not have before him a situation such as we have today where the first member following the minister is a government supporter. He did say, however, that Mr. Woodsworth was speaking in opposition to Mr. Robb's motion; therefore he was speaking in reply and had the right to speak for more than forty minutes. The question Your Honour has to decide is whether the speech by the hon. member for Temiscouata can be construed as a speech in reply within the meaning of standing order 37. The ruling to be made seems obvious, but I leave it to Your Honour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I go any further, perhaps I might ask the hon. member for Temiscouata if he intends to vote against the motion for second reading of this bill.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, I will express my opinion but I will accept no direction from anyone. I am a supporter of the minister, but I feel that this legislation should not be approved in toto. There is no ruling of a previous Speaker that will force me to say things that I do not want to say. My speech is one which is critical of the management of the Canadian National Railways to which we are lending more money. I am not going to say anything against the minister, his colleagues or the government; but I complain of the management of the Canadian National Railways. Is that enough, sir?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I asked the hon. member that question merely in order to make as sure as possible that the ruling that I am about to give will be fair. The House of Commons is composed of the government and the opposition and both have rights and functions. It seems to me that the standing order means the member of the opposition who, immediately after the minister who has moved a government order, speaks in reply, in criticism of the measure that has been moved. It seems to me that he is the one who is meant by the standing order.

May I consider for a moment or two the precedent that was quoted to us a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It appears that Mr. Speaker Lemieux, when he gave his own interpretation of this standing order and the words "in reply", understood that an hon. member, no matter what side of the house he may be on, who stands up immediately after the minister and argues against the measure that has been moved by the minister, within the terms of standing order 37 is allowed to speak for more than forty minutes.

From the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata I did not gather that he was arguing against the principle of this bill. He said he was airing grievances and that he had complaints against the management of the C.N.R.; but at no time in his speech could I discover that he was arguing against the principle of this bill and therefore arguing against its second reading. That is why I asked him that question—it was to enlighten me as to the trend of his argument—whether he was arguing against the second reading of this bill. Because if it was the case that he was arguing against the second reading of the bill, then he may be within the terms of the interpretation given by Speaker Lemieux and be entitled to speak for more than forty minutes.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I will give you some confidential information. Before rising to speak after the motion was made, I went to see the financial critic of the official opposition, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and asked him whether he was going to speak, because I wanted to speak for more than forty minutes. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was not in his seat but I spoke to his leader who had no objection to my suggestion. I spoke to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who said he did not intend to speak. I also saw the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I asked him if he intended to speak and he said no. After all that, I rose.

I do not want to deprive the opposition of any right. I acted as a gentleman; I saw them and I asked them what they wanted to do. I would have asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if he had been in his seat, but he was not there. I asked his leader and one of his colleagues, and the leaders of other parties. I did not speak to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I do not know whether or not he was here. However, I spoke to the hon. member for Greenwood, as financial critic, and I asked him if he would allow me to rise after the motion was made. Now, sir, that is that.

I sat under Mr. Speaker Lemieux and I know where his rulings were manufactured. It is a most absurd thing to suggest that one should have to denounce the government in order to enjoy the liberties that we have under the standing orders of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should ask the hon. member not to indicate that anyone has suggested to him that he should vote against the government. The hon. member will understand that if the Speaker were to give rulings without at any time asking hon. members to provide any explanation of their views, perhaps the hon. member would be the first one to object. Because I have asked the hon. member for his views on a certain point in order to make the fairest possible ruling, I hope he will not suggest that there has been any indication given to him by me, at least, that he should vote against the government. I should like to have this point made clear. I think I have heard sufficient, and I am prepared to give a ruling.

Mr. Knowles: Before you rule, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member for Temiscouata that if he had approached me, as he said he approached the others, I might readily have agreed to unanimous consent being given for such time as he might feel he required; but I am sure he will agree with me that there is a wide difference between getting the consent of the house for a specific occasion and having a ruling made that can have serious consequences for the future. That is the point at issue at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion a reply can be offered by any hon. member in this house provided that, by debating the measure which is before the house, he has shown that he is arguing against it. I do not take that from the speech of the hon. member, and therefore he was not speaking "in reply" within the meaning of standing order 37, as I understand it and as set out in the ruling of Mr. Speaker Lemieux which is to be found in the Journals of the house, volume 66, page 394. The hon. member having exhausted his forty minutes therefore cannot speak any longer.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to rise at this point to answer some of the statements that have been made by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I am sure he will understand it is not because of the high regard that I have for him that I do rise at this point—

Mr. Knowles: Or because of the lack of high regard.

Mr. Chevrier: Or rather because of the lack of high regard, as the hon. member has just pointed out.

When we were considering another measure the other day the hon. member made certain statements which I did not take too seriously because I did not think they were made seriously, and I made no reply. Today these charges have been repeated, and I feel it is my duty and my responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to say something on this occasion. I will not repeat what was said in an earlier debate because I have no right to do so. Neither can I refer to what took place earlier in this debate because unfortunately I was not in the house. But there seems to be an opinion in my hon. friend's mind, rightly or wrongly, that certain questions answered by the Canadian National Railways are dissociated, to some extent, from the minister. I must say to my hon. friend, with all respect again to him, that I must take the responsibility in this house for any of the answers that are given by the Canadian National Railways. Of course it is his privilege to criticize those answers, as it is his privilege to criticize the management on this occasion. But the questions which have been answered by the management of the Canadian National Railways, as is their practice, are passed upon by me, and I must take responsibility for them. I must also accept my share of any criticism that is levelled at the management.

Then there seems to be a feeling in my hon. friend's mind that the Canadian National Railways has discriminated in some form or other against the province of Quebec. May I say to him, again with the greatest courtesy, that that statement is not factual. That statement is inaccurate, and I have reasons for saying that. It is not the policy of the management of the Canadian National Railways to discriminate against any province of the country. On the contrary, it is their policy and their responsibility to manage the affairs of the railway in the best interests of the system and in as equitable a manner as can be done for the benefit of the country. I do not think it is any criterion of discrimination to say there are fewer miles of railway in one province than in another. That of itself is not evidence of discrimination, because if one looks at it from another angle, the province of Quebec has benefited largely from the operations of the Canadian National Railways not only because the head office of that company is in that province, as is the head office of a subsidiary of the company, Trans-Canada Air Lines, but also because of large capital expenditures which have been made all across the country, of which the province of Quebec has received an equitable share.

With reference to the Temiscouata railway, at the last session of parliament the Canadian National Railways took over that railway in line with recommendations made by the hon. member for Temiscouata in this house and elsewhere. They have sought to bring the level of that line up to the level of the Canadian National line. They may not have succeeded in doing that to the extent my hon. friend would have wished, but to a large extent the level of employment, the rate of wages and many other conditions that exist with reference to Canadian National employees generally were made to apply to the employees of the Temiscouata railway. Therefore I say to my hon. friend in as friendly a fashion as I can that while he has the right, as has any other hon. member, to complain about the management of the Canadian National Railways, still I think the management—in fact I am positive—has in no way discriminated against the province of Quebec.

I have confidence in the management of the railway and so has the government. I can only say it is true at times the management do make mistakes from time to time; they are not infallible.

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: And they may have made the mistake—which I am not prepared to admit—that my hon. friend had in mind in the committee; but I say that the charge that there has been discrimination against one province in particular is certainly not true. I repeat that the management of the Canadian National Railways, in my humble opinion, are doing an excellent job and I trust they shall continue to do so.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Most of what I want to say can be said in committee, Mr. Speaker. There are just one or two brief comments I wish to make. I do find that these figures give an indication which is somewhat inconsistent with some of the conversation which was had at the time the recapitalization bill was before us earlier. I shall refer to that more in detail. Having given that indication may I say that so far as I am concerned we may now go into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Pouliot: This clause gives a definition of "national company" and "national railway system". What is important for hon. members to realize is precisely what the Minister of Transport has said at page 44 of the report. Referring to the members of the board of directors he said:

> They are appointed by the governor in council to administer the affairs of the railway.

If during the sitting of the committee of the whole, or later on third reading, I refer to the report it will be the report of the railways and shipping committee. Some people are under the impression that the Canadian National company is the management. In the report at page 2 there are pictures of the various officials of the railways. But they are not the company; they are the management. The only member of the company is the president, who has been appointed chairman of the board. It is not in his capacity as president of the railways but in his capacity as chairman of the board that he is a member of the national company.

I want that to be mentioned at the outset. It is important to realize that the directors who have been appointed by order in council form the national company. They are the Canadian National Railways. If action is taken against the railways they are the ones who are sued, as a body. That is all I have to say for the time being.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In connection with the figure at the top of page 2, where it makes reference to $93,647,760, I wish to refer to what was said in the house by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, as it is reported at page 3356 of Hansard. He gave first of all the two figures which appear at the bottom of page 1 in the bill. Then he goes on to give this figure of $93,647,760 for new equipment ordered prior to 1952. That, I think, is worked out by taking the votes in the two statutes of last year, computing the amount spent and then revoting the balance.

If I am correct in that I should like to pass on to a further comment. I have looked at the statutes of the first and second sessions of 1951, and I find authority given there to spend these amounts. There is no time limit put upon it, and I assume the very fact that this sum of $93,647,760 is put in here, some $66 million of which is a revote, is on the assumption that the legal position is considered to be that this authority has now lapsed and there must be a revote. I wish to be satisfied on that point, because I find nothing in the statutes setting it out. If that is so, I wish to be satisfied that there is no need of stating that these other authorities are at an end. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. $66 million is a revote. But if my hon. friend will read the statement made at the resolution stage by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance he will recall that the parliamentary assistant pointed out then that it was the legal opinion of the justice officials that these grants had not lapsed, but that they thought it was desirable to revamp the style of the annual financing act so that parliament would be in complete control again of everything outstanding relating to capital expenditures. We did have tag ends outstanding from the previous year. That is the reason something new is being done this year, to the extent that we are revoting items of the refinancing acts of last year which are unspent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am still left in doubt. We call it a revote, but actually is it not an additional vote? There is nothing in the bill to indicate that it is a revote. So far as the bill is concerned we now have an authority which includes $64 million, or thereabouts, of what was authorized last year. Does the parliamentary assistant agree with that?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If that is so, are we not proceeding in a rather loose manner if, with the understanding in our minds that it is a revote, we actually give authority, which is in fact an additional authority, and thereby have legally available an additional amount of $64 million? If that is so—and I do not want to be arguing at length about a technicality—this would not seem to be a desirable way to legislate.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Greenwood will recall that last year two acts were found necessary. There was a new departure at that time from some of the previous legislative patterns, in that the supplies and delivery situation was very uncertain in respect of equipment of the magnitude of railway equipment. In consequence parliament was asked last year to authorize the railways to make commitments for equipment that it was not expected would be delivered within the legislative year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That was in June a year ago.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. Some of that equipment has not been delivered. Rather than fail to remind parliament—and this is a reminder to parliament, as it is set out in the measure—that this commitment is still outstanding, and that there are deliveries under it still to be made, parliament is being given an opportunity, by a restatement of these amounts of money, to make a revote, just as it would revote items in the estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate that the parliamentary assistant has stated the position exactly. But I am still left with this question: Should there not be a section in the bill which says that authority is cancelled in respect of the amounts not used as set out in the two bills of last year? As it now stands, when we pass this bill we will have $64 million extra. If I am correct in this, why do we not say that the preceding authority is cancelled?

Mr. Benidickson: Does not subsection 6 cover the point? It says:

> No amount shall be spent for a purpose mentioned in this section in excess of the amount authorized by this section in respect of that purpose.

Then again, is it not sound law that a statute of this year would certainly succeed and have greater authority as well as replacement of a statute of last year dealing with the same items?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I must say I would have thought, in connection with the statement last made by the parliamentary assistant, that if in fact we legislate for an additional sum of $64 million, without saying anything about what was done last year, we will have authorized $64 million additional. I note that subsection 6 says:

> No amount shall be spent for a purpose mentioned in this section in excess of the amount authorized by this section in respect of that purpose.

Without setting myself up as an authority like the Department of Justice, I must say that argument does not sound very convincing to me. I do suggest and suggest strongly that in view of what the parliamentary assistant has said to the effect that the Department of Justice consider the authority does not lapse, there should be something in this measure which would have the effect of cancellation. After all, this will become more or less a pattern, to the extent that we are beginning something new.

I realize there are those in the house more competent than I am to express legal opinions, and I would be very interested to know if there are any in the house who agree or disagree with me. As I understand the present position we now have a stronger statement than I made first, in that the Department of Justice say that these do not lapse, and therefore that $64 million of what we are being asked to authorize is a duplication of authorities given last year. That is not good legislation, in my opinion, and I think it could be easily cured by an apt clause saying that this authority cancels the authority for $64 million contained in the statutes, I think it is chapter 45 of the first session and chapter 9 of the second session of 1951. I suggest that as a sensible way of dealing with it. Let me say that I have spelled out the figures with some difficulty and I think I now understand the situation. I do put forward that suggestion as to the form of the legislation.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Green: Could there not be included wording to the effect that a certain figure is a revote in the same way that those words are used in the ordinary estimates?

Mr. Benidickson: I think the language of the bill in that respect is quite clear. It says that the appropriation was not taken advantage of.

Mr. Green: What section is the parliamentary assistant referring to?

Mr. Benidickson: Section 3. All the individual items are there. Take the item for additions and betterments; that is a revote, and I think that is clear from the language. It says:

> Additions and betterments (excluding new equipment) obligations incurred prior to 1952 that become due and payable in 1952.

In other words those are not current budget items. Then the matter raised by the hon. member for Greenwood is covered as follows:

> New equipment.
> Obligations incurred prior to 1952 that become due and payable in 1952.

Those now require financing. They are distinct from the other items. They are within the 1952 budget; they are described as obligations incurred in 1952 that become due and payable in 1952.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not afraid that this money will be issued twice. I am simply trying to suggest a workmanlike bill by making it clear that the amount of the appropriation not used last year is cancelled. If the parliamentary assistant does not want to do that, then as far as I am concerned I would be prepared to let the thing go with the request that this matter be brought to the attention of the Department of Justice to consider whether such a cancellation clause should be used in the future.

Mr. Benidickson: This bill has had the attention of justice and the clause which I quoted I think is clear for that purpose. I certainly assure my hon. friend it will be reconsidered for another year.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I listened to what the Minister of Transport said a moment ago about the way the province of Quebec has been dealt with by the management of the Canadian National Railways. I want to tell him that I have always drawn a distinction between himself and the management of the railroad company. I make other distinctions as well. What I complain of is the way eastern Quebec is dealt with by the Moncton officials. The best answer I could make to what the minister has said is to refer to a letter signed by nine members of parliament, all supporters of the government, who have asked for an extension of the central region to the Matapedia river including the Gaspe peninsula. Each one of those members was dissatisfied with the management. They are all supporters of the government and no one was forced to speak against the government. They all signed that petition with enthusiasm in order to get rid of the control by Moncton over us.

Mr. Brooks: Where did they come from?

Mr. Pouliot: From Levis to Gaspe. I should like to tell the minister that when I complained of bigotry on behalf of the family compact of Moncton C.N.R. officials there were big headlines in the Moncton Times-Transcript and the Saint John Telegraph-Journal. Neither of those papers came to the defence of those men in its editorial. I hope the day will come when the whole of the province of Quebec will be under the central region. As long as we are under the control of Moncton we will always have trouble. After I made my complaint I received the following letter from Moncton under date of May 2:

> You certainly hit the nail on the head when you called the C.N.R. Moncton railway officials bigots. The great majority are, and it is time someone should take action and see that a certain minority of the employees receive equal rights and promotion.

I am considerate and conciliatory of everyone, but I do want my people to be respected and dealt with fairly. I should like to refer to certain questions which I asked and which had reference to additions and betterments and new equipment which are covered by this section. Riviere du Loup is one of the old terminals of the Grand Trunk Railway. There were railroad shops there before there were shops at Moncton or anywhere else. Much of the difficulty we suffered was remedied by the present government, by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport. The minister must have noticed that in the first part of my speech on second reading I quoted verbatim a resolution passed by the county council of Riviere du Loup expressing gratification at what had been done by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport. Here are questions I put to the management of the railway and the answers I received. You will see that this is not the way members of parliament should be answered when they put questions on the order paper.

1. What are the names and values of each of the pieces of machinery which were returned from the workshops of the Canadian National Railways at St. Malo, Quebec city, to Riviere du Loup?

Answer: Following the acquisition of St. Malo shop by the Department of National Defence in 1940 certain machinery was transferred to Riviere du Loup. From current records it is not possible to give the detailed information requested.

2. When did such transfer take place?

Answer: See answer to No. 1.

3. What are the names and the respective occupations of the employees of the Canadian National Railways who were transferred back from St. Malo, Quebec city, to Riviere du Loup?

Answer: Current records do not contain the information necessary to answer this question.

4. On what date did each of said transfers take place?

Answer: See answer to No. 3.

5. What are the names and the values of each one of the pieces of machinery which were at the Canadian National Railways shops at Riviere du Loup (a) immediately after the transfer above referred to in paragraph 1 took place; (b) on May 1, 1952?

Answer: It is not the practice of the company to maintain historical records that would facilitate an answer to the first part of this question. Information as to present values is not available.

The minister would never have made such an answer. He is too well educated for that. Here is another one:

1. Since 1923, what has been the total yearly amount of (a) advances and loans made; (b) guarantees given, by the government to the Canadian National Railways?

Answer: Financing for the Canadian National Railways has in each year since 1923 received consideration and approval by the government and is recorded in the statutes.

That is very bold. We are left to do our own work. We have no staff except the help of a stenographer. I went to the library and wanted some co-operation to get that information. No information was given. I continue:

2. Since that date, what amount of the debt of the Canadian National Railways has been written off by the Canadian government?

Answer: See answer to No. 1.

3. Since 1923, what amounts have been spent in each province by the Canadian National (a) for the construction, maintenance and repair of the railway; (b) as capital expenditure for the construction, extension and installation of machinery in each of the erecting shops of the Canadian National?

Answer: (a) The accounts of the Canadian National Railways are not maintained in a way which makes it possible to segregate expenditures in the tabulation requested.

They only have to do the work. It is possible for them to do that.

(b) To endeavour to give this information would involve an examination of accounting records for the past thirty years and this could not be undertaken by the existing staff of the railway.

Imagine how bold they are. In the future I trust the minister will tell them to do otherwise when they answer questions. As a matter of fact they did, and I voice my appreciation to him. I received another answer in the form of a sessional paper of June 16 and it was very different. We made some headway with it. We have started to learn what the management is doing with the money voted by parliament. It is time to know what is being done. The question was as follows:

1. How many steam locomotives were repaired during 1951 in each of the Canadian National erecting shops?

Canadian National Railways

Answer: The total number of steam locomotives repaired in all shops in Canada in 1951 was as follows:

Shop	No. Repaired
Moncton, N.B.	183
Riviere du Loup, Que.	57
Montreal, Que.	318
Stratford, Ont.	313
Transcona, Man.	253
Fort Rouge, Man.	133
Edmonton, Alta.	35
Port Mann, B.C.	28
Total	1,320

This information gives me at the same time an approximate idea of the number of locomotives owned by Canadian National Railways, which is mentioned nowhere in their report. They give a lump sum for the equipment but the number of locomotives is not mentioned as it is in the reports of so many railways. Last year there were 57 locomotives repaired at Riviere du Loup. I thank the minister for that information. Then there was this question:

3. Since January 1, 1952, how many steam locomotives have been sent to each erecting shop for repairs?

Answer: The number of steam locomotives sent to each erecting shop for repairs from January 1 to May 31 is as follows:

Shop	No. repaired Jan. 1 to May 31	Undergoing and waiting May 31
Moncton, N.B.	95	27
Riviere du Loup, Que.	26	6
Montreal, Que.	148	46
Stratford, Ont.	142	38
Transcona, Man.	110	36
Fort Rouge, Man.	46	35
Edmonton, Alta.	33	5
Port Mann, B.C.	16	5
Total	616	198

Then there was also this question:

5. During the period—

The period is April 15 to May 15, 1952.

—how many steam locomotives were sent to each of the Canadian National erecting shops for repairs?

Answer: Between April 15 and May 15, 1952, locomotives were sent to various shops as indicated below:

Shop
Moncton, N.B.	25
Riviere du Loup, Que. (including 1 rotary plow)	3
Montreal, Que.	39
Stratford, Ont.	23
Transcona, Man.	18
Fort Rouge, Man.	6
Edmonton, Alta.	9
Port Mann, B.C.	5
Total	128

Of that total Riviere du Loup had 3. Two others have come since, but the locomotives that were sent to Riviere du Loup were for repair No. 5, the most minor type of repair. It is just a matter of adjusting something, and these repairs did not provide enough work. I think that in a country like ours the shops of the Canadian National Railways should be given work in equal proportion. I understand that the Point St. Charles shops are larger than ours but there is no reason why the program which was prepared last year for the current year should not be put into effect on that basis. We should have had 66 locomotives to repair at Riviere du Loup, and there is no reason why we should not have them. I am ready to co-operate with the minister to the utmost, even to sacrificing the right to speak. I might have spoken against him if I had been allowed to speak, but I am not that type. I give him credit for what he does, but I continue to maintain my distinction between him and the president of the railway, and between him and the Moncton officials.

If I were to compare him to the Moncton officials it would be a gross insult to the minister. I hope the day is near when we of eastern Quebec will be on the same footing as the rest of the population of the province of Quebec and will be together, instead of being under the domination of Moncton. I rely on the minister. He said he had helped the employees of the Temiscouata railway. Without his help and without the help of the Prime Minister we could not have gone anywhere. I hope they will continue in that good way and that they will find the right words, words of persuasion or of condemnation of those concerned, in order that there may be some progress in work that is going to be sent to Riviere du Loup. How is it that Riviere du Loup is left aside as a country cousin when there are shops that are no more important than Riviere du Loup—I mean those in Edmonton and Port Mann—which are maintained and given plenty of work all the time? It cannot go on like that.

The president stated before the committee that he was all for centralization, but how is it that there are two shops together at Transcona and Fort Rouge—within a radius of a few miles—and the Canadian Pacific Railway shop is close by? There are three railway shops within a very small radius while down home it is almost impossible to get anything.

Now, I rely on the Minister of Transport, I rely on the Minister of Veterans Affairs who was born in Riviere du Loup, on the Prime Minister who lives in Riviere du Loup, and on all our friends to see to it that Riviere du Loup is given by the Canadian National Railways a fair amount of work at present and in the future as it has been in the past. When I complain of the manner in which my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec have been treated I mention the Moncton officials who curse the French Canadians, and I know they are not acting under the advisement of the minister when they do so.

Therefore, sir, I come to a happy conclusion. I could have finished my speech in ten or fifteen minutes on second reading but I am satisfied to have said what I wanted to say for the defence of my people. I protest against the useless expenditure of the Canadian National Railways. When I learned of the appointment of Mr. Gordon, having seen his signature on a dollar bill, I said, "Here is a man who will not need to borrow any money to manage the Canadian National Railways efficiently."

I hope this is considered in a spirit of conciliation and collaboration and that the wrong my people have suffered and are suffering now will be redressed at the earliest opportunity. I will thank the leader of the government and the Minister of Transport for what they do in that direction.

Mr. Brooks: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has stated that the officials of the Canadian National Railways at Moncton did not treat his people in Temiscouata and at Riviere du Loup fairly because they were French Canadians.

I do not feel that it is necessary for me to rise in defence of the officials in Moncton except to say that I know at least 50 per cent or more are of French extraction. I think the minister will bear me out there. Also, the city of Moncton has practically 50 per cent or more people of French extraction and as far as our Acadian people and English-speaking people in New Brunswick and Moncton are concerned, we live very agreeably and happily together and we are very proud of that. We in the province of New Brunswick of French extraction and of English extraction have a very kindly feeling toward the people of Quebec. We have always looked upon them as our friends and I personally regret very much that the hon. member should make a statement of that kind in this house and say the people in the city of Moncton unfairly treated people in his part of the country and that he feels they did so because his people are French Canadians. That is very far from the truth indeed.

Mr. Pouliot: That is not at all what I have said. I said they were cursing the French Canadians. With regard to the way we are dealt with I will send the hon. member a copy of my correspondence with the executive vice-president and my hon. friend will see the way in which Riviere du Loup has been dealt with by Moncton. When I meet him personally I will tell him much more besides. He did not quote any editorial in defence of the Moncton officials. There was none in any of the three papers which have printed and given great publicity to what I have said. Moreover he must know of the Moncton officials that they are a family compact. They are not Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit or C.C.F.; they are shaking hands under the table—

Mr. Brooks: They are good Canadians.

Mr. Benidickson: On a point of privilege, I regret the need to interfere with this debate, but on the other hand the discussion at the moment relates to current operation and has nothing to do with capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways.

The Chairman: As I understood the last remarks made by the hon. member, he was through.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is half a minute to six.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, just at six o'clock I was going to ask the person in charge of the bill—the parliamentary assistant at the present time—concerning the manner in which these amounts are going to be expended. But since six o'clock I have been looking at No. 2 report of the sessional committee on railways and shipping. I wonder whether he would correct me if I am wrong in my understanding that at page 132 under "Financial authorizations—1952 requirements by regions, departments, etc." for Newfoundland and district, the amount shown there is the amount that would be spent out of the 1952 authorizations. At pages 134 and 135 there are also other amounts shown. At page 134 I believe is shown the equipment ordered in 1951 and which will be delivered after the 1951 fiscal year has expired in July.

Mr. Benidickson: Is my hon. friend, at page 134, referring specifically to 50 30-ton box cars which are specifically marked "Newfoundland"?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes. That is right. Are they to be delivered in July? The parliamentary assistant should be in a position to say now that it is so near the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Benidickson: This equipment in column 1 has all been ordered and delivery is anticipated prior to July 1.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that schedule being followed?

Mr. Benidickson: So I am advised.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The reason I am asking is that it is quite notorious that the equipment on the railway is insufficient to handle the greater volume of traffic. I am wondering whether these two pages represent what are the needs or what are expected to be the needs within the next year or so. The other point I wanted to make is this. The one thing is where the money is spent and the other thing is where the equipment is going to be used. With regard to box cars and flat cars, is the management making any arrangements to have some of these, as many of them as possible, built in Newfoundland? They are a special kind of box car or flat car. They are not used elsewhere on the Canadian National Railways. I know that cars have been made in Newfoundland. Is the parliamentary assistant able to answer that question?

Mr. Benidickson: I have not any specific information on that matter. The hon. member knows that each year when this budget is considered by a parliamentary committee we have available some 25 or 30 senior officials of the railway, among whom are included operating people. That is the type of question that is usually asked and the kind of information that is usually extracted on that occasion. I am not able specifically to answer that question here. I will see that the hon. member's remarks are conveyed to the management.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was not a member of the committee on railways and shipping; perhaps I was on some other committees and could not attend its meetings. I have looked through these reports, however, and I see nothing along that line. I was hoping the parliamentary assistant might be able to give me that information.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to raise a question with respect to subsection (c) which gives authority to make capital expenditures not exceeding in the aggregate $50 million in the calendar year 1953 and so on. I draw the attention of the parliamentary assistant first of all to what was said by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance at page 3356 of Hansard, where that $50 million is referred to as an amount in payment for equipment. I draw his attention also to the budget presented to the committee in April last which says, at page 2:

> Authority is also desired, to the Minister of Finance, to make advances to the extent of $50 million against new equipment . . .

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Benidickson: It should include any capital requirement. I would point out to my hon. friend that for equipment alone, the bill provides some $81 million for equipment in the 1952 budget. Only a small portion of it—I think it is a little over $2 million worth—is actually expected to be delivered this year. The greater amount of it will likely be delivered between January 1 of the next calendar year and June 30, 1953. By then we usually are able to do some refinancing in this house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think that reply meets my point. As I understand it, and evidently as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance understood it, we are here to implement this budget. This is, I take it, the same figure of $50 million. It is perfectly clear in the budget presented to the committee and approved by it that this $50 million was against the equipment. Surely we cannot lightly change that and just say it is $50 million that we will use for what we like. What that committee approved was $50 million for equipment. I think the parliamentary assistant will agree that that is so; and if it is so, I suggest that this clause should be altered to agree with the budget.

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend will agree that this is $50 million to be applied for the purposes of the bill for that particular period. Anything that is appropriated under this provision has to be accounted for specially in the annual report to be presented to parliament next year. That is also part of the act and a full accounting of it will be given.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not know whether or not we are at cross purposes, but as I see it that is no answer at all. This budget which is presented to a committee of the house and is approved by it either means something or it does not. As far as I am concerned we do not just toss $50 million about as lightly as that. Am I stating it correctly? Here is the budget from which I am reading, and it refers to $50 million against new equipment. And as I say, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance described it in the same terms in his speech the other day at page 3356 of Hansard. This is how the item is described:

> Payment for equipment ordered but delivered in period January 1 to July 1, 1953.

That seems to me to identify it fully. If that is so then surely the basis, the very foundation, of this bill that we have is the budget of the Canadian National Railways, which was presented and approved. If that is so, it seems to me this clearly must be altered.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend is comparing the appropriate language of the section with the footnote to the budget reports which were received in the committee and which appear on page 129 of the railways and shipping committee report. I think he was quoting from the mimeographed document, but it also appears on page 129 of the official printed report of the committee. The wording is as he says: "$50 million against new equipment to be delivered in the spring of 1953 under the above authorization". I think we can accept that as being the purpose of the section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Wait a minute. Is this going to be right or not? Let me state again what I have said. My understanding is that this legislation is founded on the budget. We are in entire agreement as to what this budget means. I do not think we should have to act on an understanding between ourselves. I think this section should follow the wording of the Canadian National budget. Obviously that is what the Department of Finance thought, because this was said in this house on June 17 by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, and it follows exactly the language of this budget. Surely it would be the simplest thing in the world to make that section agree, and surely it ought to be done.

Mr. Benidickson: I think my hon. friend would be satisfied if the clause was amended.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the assistant read it as it now will stand please?

Mr. Benidickson: After the word "incurred" insert "for new equipment". Would that define it?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You are going to insert that in line 4 of subsection (c) of section 3 (1).

Mr. Benidickson: That is right, "in discharge of obligations incurred for new equipment".

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I so move.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CONSOLIDATE AND CLARIFY—TO PROVIDE LOANS TO IMMIGRANTS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 305, respecting immigration.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should point out that this bill has been carefully considered by a special committee and has been reported with amendments.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to make a brief observation in general. I think the minister will agree that the special committee to which this bill was referred after second reading has devoted very careful study to it. The committee held what I think may fairly be called some very intensive sittings last week; and as you have pointed out, Mr. Chairman, the bill is now reported to the house with a number of amendments.

May I say to the minister that he showed a willingness in committee on many occasions to accept suggestions from members of the committee. We do not always see that attitude reflected by ministers in the house or in committees, and when one finds that attitude displayed by a minister it is very refreshing indeed. I should like to make a comment on that fact now, Mr. Chairman, concerning the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I do not at all mean to convey the impression that the minister accepted all the suggestions that were offered, or indeed a number of amendments that were offered to the bill. Nevertheless it is indeed refreshing to find a willingness on the part of a minister to accept suggestions.

One other observation, Mr. Chairman: This is a very long bill. It runs to 72 sections and some 32 full pages. It was most appropriate, it seems to me, that a bill of this kind should go to a committee. It points the way, if I may say so, to a procedure which not only results in legislation being in better form when it comes back to the house, but in the legislation being better understood by hon. members; and it does save the time of the house. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that this evening we will see that much time of the house, at a stage of the session when time is very precious, is saved by this measure having been referred to the committee.

One final observation. We still have not yet had at this session the opportunity for discussion or debate on immigration policies which I know many members feel is due. At other stages of the present legislation it was agreed that the bill was not the appropriate vehicle for the discussion of immigration policy. It is a bill that relates to the structure of the department and the functions of that department and its various branches. I again express the hope, as I expressed it several times in earlier stages of the consideration of this bill, that when the minister brings in his estimates there will be a discussion of immigration policy, and I hope that occasion will not be long delayed. This is one of the most important departments of the government. Immigration is a lively subject of discussion throughout the country; and it is most desirable that there should be an effective opportunity for adequate debate on the subject of an immigration policy. I say to the leader of the house, the Minister of Public Works, that I hope he will use his charm and authority to expedite the introduction in committee of supply of the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Canadian citizens.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister knows that sometimes in connection with persons of oriental origin there is some difficulty in the matter of identification. A person who claims to be a Canadian citizen may not be truly identified as such. Has the minister in his mind or at hand the requirements with respect to the identification of a person who has been a long time absent. I am thinking of the sort of thing that would be required by an immigration officer at, let us say, Hong Kong.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I do not recall that we have had any difficulty in identifying Canadian citizens as such from Hong Kong or elsewhere. Everyone who is a Canadian citizen is on record in the citizenship branch. For that matter everyone who is a British subject is on record. We have had no difficulty identifying anyone as a citizen.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Apparently the minister is not thinking of what I have in mind. I am thinking of a person born in Canada of a Chinese father, who has gone back to China, who during his minority lived in China, and then returned to Canada. Such person would not be registered as a Canadian citizen. There would be a birth certificate, but would that be sufficient after an absence of, let us say, twenty years?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There would be a certificate of the birth in Canada, and we would be glad to examine such a case. Again I must say that I do not recall any difficulty of this kind.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Canadian domicile—acquisition.

Mr. Pearkes: Is this a change in the definition of domicile, and does it apply to a minor? My understanding is that, for the purposes of this act, Canadian domicile is acquired by a person having his place of domicile in Canada for at least five years after having landed here. Let us take the case of a boy of twelve arriving here and living for five years in this country, but whose parents might not have been Canadian citizens. Would he have acquired Canadian domicile?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): This section is the same as the one in the present act which reads:

> Canadian domicile is acquired by a person only by having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein.

There is no change, although the wording has been altered to some extent.

Mr. Pearkes: I think there is ambiguity. An immigrant might come to this country as a minor and live here for five years, making the claim that he was a person who had lived in this country for that length of time. Then he might go out of the country. Still he would not be granted Canadian citizenship, because his parents were not granted Canadian citizenship. I am thinking of a minor, but one who had lived five years in this country.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I hope the hon. member is not confusing domicile in the Immigration Act with domicile in the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Mr. Pearkes: I may be doing that. I wish I could get the two straightened out.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Prohibited classes.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to renew, on section 5, an argument I put forward in committee for some better definition of the expression found in line 29, "any crime involving moral turpitude". To most persons that expression suggests, in the first instance, offences of a type we have under the Criminal Code, and that are described particularly as crimes involving sexual offences. The minister indicated to us frankly in committee that the expression "any crime involving moral turpitude" would mean, as to crimes committed in Canada, almost every crime if not indeed every crime under the Criminal Code.

I offer now an example—and it may be a rather extreme example—by way of illustration of what this may mean. Bear in mind, if you will, that when this expression is applied to a person in Canada, as the minister has indicated, it would be treated as the equivalent of practically any offence, whether an ordinary offence or an indictable offence under the Criminal Code. As applied to an act of some person outside of Canada, as the minister indicated, the department will interpret it to mean any offence that would be regarded as an offence against the criminal law, according to Canadian standards of criminal law.

I put this extreme case as indicating the need, both in this and in one or two other sections we will come to, for a much closer definition of what is meant. I take the case —because it is fairly obvious—of a person who comes to Canada from Ireland. It is discovered after he has been here one day short of the necessary five years required to acquire domicile that prior to his departure from Ireland he got into an argument with his neighbour over the fence, and poked the neighbour in the nose. That would be a case of common assault, assuming that there was no aggravation in the offence. The magistrate before whom the unhappy man was haled might take a light view of the offence, and, while it would be within his power to register a conviction, he might impose nothing more than a nominal fine or, indeed, he might direct a remand for sentence, or might suspend sentence.

After the individual in question has been in Canada four years, eleven months and twenty-nine days it comes to the attention of the immigration branch that this person was convicted of the crime of common assault before his entry into Canada. This immediately makes him subject to deportation. That is the law as created by the bill before us.

If the expression "any crime involving moral turpitude" is to be considered in the way the minister has indicated—and that is the way the department will construe the expression in the present act, because it is not a new expression—then this individual has rendered himself liable to deportation. I do not suggest the present minister is going to do anything so arbitrary or, indeed, so foolish as to direct the deportation of a man under those circumstances. But the fact of the matter is that under this bill he could. That individual is liable to deportation.

I think when we are legislating we do not want to legislate in such a way as to make it possible to have a result as absurd as that. I had proposed in committee that we should seek some better expression, some clearer definition of the sort of thing we have in mind, than this broad term "any crime involving moral turpitude".

In the light of the position taken by the minister in committee, and the decision of the committee, the bill comes back to us with this expression remaining in it. I want to record my view that this is a defect in the bill and that something much more definite in the way of a definition is required.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Special inquiry officers.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to make an observation on subsection 3, clause (c) which permits the special inquiry officers to issue commissions or requests to take evidence in Canada. The committee has added the words "in Canada" and to that extent has narrowed the scope of the section in the original bill. But I wish to express the view that I sought to put forward in the committee about the care with which a power like this should be exercised.

There is no power in the present Immigration Act to permit any officer of the department to issue a commission to take evidence. As you well know, in legal proceedings in all the provinces the issue of a commission to take evidence is not something that is obtained as a right; it is something which the courts permit only where a sufficient case has been made out to justify it. For the first time this bill proposes to confer upon every special inquiry officer under this act the power to issue a commission to take evidence anywhere in Canada.

Something might be said for taking evidence in other parts of Canada for use in connection with deportation proceedings that are pending against an individual, but having regard to the position in which many of these persons will find themselves I think this is a power which should be exercised only in clear cases. Think of the position of an individual awaiting deportation. In the first instance, he may be suffering from the disability of language; he may understand neither English nor French. In the second place, he may be suffering from a state of confusion in which many immigrants find themselves when arriving in Canada. It seems to me that where evidence is being used against him which may result in his being deported the least he is entitled to is the right to have the witness cross-examined, to confront the witness face to face. That right should be most carefully preserved. The great difficulty about taking evidence on commission is that it may be taken far away from the place where the individual may be held while the deportation proceedings are continuing. He may be timid, he may be confused, and he may be unaware of his rights.

In such cases I think injustice could be done to the unhappy individual if any arbitrary use is made of the power to take evidence on commission. As I have indicated, the committee has circumscribed this power to the taking of evidence on commission within Canada only. But even with that limitation in many circumstances the power could be used to the detriment of the individual facing deportation proceedings. I urge upon the minister a very sparing use of such power.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We are quite conscious of what my hon. friend has said. This would be of advantage to the immigrant under certain circumstances. It is felt that we should have the power, but it will be used most sparingly.

Sections 12 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On section 19—Reports on persons in Canada.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to make an observation with respect to subsection 1, clauses (e) (ii) and (iv). I have no quarrel with this section as it stands. It requires that certain officials make reports to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in certain cases, and there can be no objection to having reports made even in cases of a simple breach of the Criminal Code by any person within the ambit of the section. But the real rub comes in later sections which in a number of cases refer to section 19. Section 19, subsection 1 (e) requires that reports be made by the clerk or secretary of a municipality to the minister in the case of any person other than a Canadian citizen or a person with Canadian domicile—that means five years' domicile in Canada after being admitted—if such individual is convicted of an offence under the Criminal Code or, under clause (iv), was a member of a prohibited class at the time of his admission to Canada.

A moment ago I referred to section 5 (d) of the bill which refers to the individual who had been convicted of a crime in the country from which he had come, and I cited the case of common assault. Clause (iv) refers to persons in that category, as well as the other categories referred to in section 5 because they are all within the prohibited class.

This would mean that in a case similar to the one to which I referred, if the individual had less than five years of residence in Canada and happened to get into an altercation with his neighbour over the back fence in Canada, punched that neighbour in the nose and was convicted of the crime of common assault, he would bring himself within the scope of this section 19. It does not matter that the offence is not serious; it does not matter that the offence may not be viewed by the magistrate as being serious; it is sufficient that the magistrate enters a conviction. In that event a report must be made by the clerk of the municipality to the department.

As we will see in connection with some later sections, the effect can be very serious. In the case of an individual who may have four years, eleven months and twenty-nine days' residence in Canada, if on the evening—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): With good behaviour, too.

Mr. Fleming: His record may have been immaculate in Canada, but the night before he completes his five years of residence in Canada in order to establish Canadian domicile he gets into an altercation with his neighbour over the back fence and commits—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He should have waited until tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming: —the rather simple offence of common assault and renders himself, as we shall see in a later section, liable to deportation. I express the view that I expressed earlier in connection with section 5. Legislation that could result in that absurd situation where the man could be deported is not legislation that a serious parliament should enact. I do not suggest that in a situation of that kind the minister would direct that the individual be deported; but the fact of the matter is that if the bill is passed in this form we are clothing the minister with power to direct the deportation of that individual in that situation. I say it seems to me that is not the way in which parliament should go about its task of legislating. This expression in 19 (1) (e) (ii), in so far as reference is made to it in a later section as being a basis for deportation, should in my submission be circumscribed so that use could not be made of it in the kind of case to which I have referred and many other cases that will naturally suggest themselves to hon. members.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think I should add to what my hon. friend has said that under the present act there is no discretion in the minister not to deport a person under the circumstances he has described but in this bill there is discretion not to deport.

Section agreed to.

Sections 20 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Decision after inquiry.

Mr. Fleming: This is the section to which I made reference in what I had to say a moment ago with respect to section 19 of the bill. We see in subsection 3 of section 28 that deportation may be ordered by a special inquiry officer of a person who falls within the various clauses of section 19 to which I made reference. The minister has indicated in the comment he has just made that provision exists in the present act that makes the individual in the extreme case to which I have referred liable to deportation. He has said that discretion is created by the new bill in favour of the minister to exercise clemency—and I think most of us would say common sense—in a situation of that kind and permit the individual to escape deportation. However, I think we ought to go further than that. The fact of the matter is that if this legislation passes in the present form we are legislating to this effect, that the individual who on the eve of completing five years' residence in Canada after lawful admission commits the offence of common assault makes himself liable to deportation, and only exercise of a discretion by the minister permits that individual to escape deportation.

In my submission the grounds upon which the individual renders himself liable to deportation are much too extensive. They are much too broad. We should raise the floor in a case of this kind. I am quite in accord with the idea that the minister should have discretion in proper cases because there is going to be need of discretion being exercised in many cases if the law is to be written in terms as rigorous as some of those we have before us. The fact of the matter is that in my submission no individual who has given a good account of himself in Canada for the period I suggested, four years, eleven months and twenty-nine days, after being lawfully admitted, should be rendered subject to deportation simply because he commits what is nothing more than a very simple offence. It is not an indictable offence, and in the case I mentioned it might be under circumstances as to which the magistrate, while feeling he might be obliged to enter a conviction, would take anything but a serious view of what had happened. I cannot think that parliament, in proceeding seriously about its task of legislating with respect to this very important subject of immigration, wants to place anybody in a position like that, where he is dependent upon favourable exercise by the minister of his discretion under the act to escape deportation.

On section 31—Where appeal allowed and how it is initiated.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There was some discussion at the close of our committee meetings as to redrafting subsections 4 and 5. We have been able to do that in the interval, and I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to move:

That subsections 4 and 5 be stricken out of the present bill and the following substituted therefor:

(4) "The minister may in any case review the decision of an immigration appeal board and confirm or quash such decision or substitute his decision therefor as he deems just and proper and may, for these purposes, direct that the execution of the deportation order concerned be stayed pending his review and decision, and the decision of the minister on appeals dealt with or reviewed by him or the decision of the majority of an immigration appeal board on appeals, other than those reviewed by the minister, is final."

Mr. Lapointe: I so move.

Mr. Fleming: I may say that I think the wording the minister now proposes is a distinct improvement on the former wording of subsections 4 and 5 as they appear in the bill as reprinted.

(5) Notwithstanding anything contained in this section, deportation costs shall not be paid by the transportation company concerned in respect of an immigrant who, upon his arrival in Canada, was in possession of a valid and subsisting immigrant visa required by this act or the regulations and issued to him, after the commencement of this act, by an immigration officer.

Mr. Lapointe: I so move.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say at once that I welcome this amendment. I unsuccessfully introduced a similar amendment in the committee, but I may say to the minister that I am very glad he has seen fit to propose this amendment. Having regard to the change that has developed in the set-up in handling our immigration cases in the last generation, this amendment is necessary to do justice to those engaged in the transportation of immigrants.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): May I say that this is not the amendment my hon. friend moved. It is different, although it is partially the amendment that he moved.

Mr. Fleming: I was not suggesting it was the amendment in the same words. We would not expect the government, knowing it as we do, to accept an amendment or proposal in the same words; but I see in this amendment the principle for which I was contending and which I pressed for in the committee unsuccessfully. I welcome the amendment and congratulate the minister.

The transportation company that brought to Canada a person seeking admission thereto shall pay all costs of his detention, except in the case of an immigrant who, upon his arrival in Canada, was in possession of a valid and subsisting immigrant visa required by this act or the regulations and issued to him, after the commencement of this act, by an immigration officer.

Mr. Lapointe: I so move.

Mr. Fleming: The same remarks.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The same remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming: The same reply, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

The Chairman: Perhaps I should say "the same question".

Mr. Green: Is the effect of this amendment to be that the government will have to pay for deportation of persons coming under the amendment?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The result, Mr. Chairman, is that the government will pay for more cases of deportation than it has up to the present.

I would just like to ask the minister if it is the intention of his department to make use of these funds up to the $12 million which is the limit that may be expended for this purpose.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): As I explained on second reading and at the resolution stage, this is giving statutory form to the vote which has been passed by the house for the last two years, for a revolving fund.

PENSION ACT

ADJUSTMENT OF CLOTHING ALLOWANCE IN CERTAIN AMPUTATION CASES, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 184, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: May I point out to hon. members that this bill has been carefully considered by the special committee on veterans affairs and has been reported without amendment.

On section 1—Wear and tear of clothing on account of amputation.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, while this bill was before the special committee on veterans affairs, as you have pointed out, and was reported without amendment, I might say that it was carried on division in that committee. This is an extremely important bill to a most deserving class of our war pensioners, namely the amputation cases. The reason it was carried on division was that many of the members of the veterans affairs committee felt that the increase provided by this bill with regard to clothing allowance was not enough.

I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no change in the allowances made to amputees for clothing since 1925. In that year, for any amputation of the leg above a Symes' amputation, so-called, the allowance for wear and tear on clothing was $54. Since 1925 twenty-seven years have elapsed. We all know of the great increase in the cost of clothing during that time. As a matter of fact, it was pointed out to the committee that since 1925 the cost of clothing has increased by about 100 per cent or more. Many members of the committee felt that the allowance provided in this bill, namely a 33⅓ per cent increase, was not sufficient and was not fair to these amputees.

In 1925 the allowance made to amputees other than those with Symes' amputations was $22; and with the increase of 33⅓ per cent as provided in the bill this amount will be increased to $30. There were three classes dealt with. First there were those with other than Symes' amputations. The second class were those with amputations at or above the wrist; and the third class were those who had to use other appliances. It was pointed out that the wear and tear on the clothing of these classes was very great. There is extreme wear and tear on the clothing of amputees and those who have to wear these other appliances.

The $54 provided in 1925 was equivalent to providing an extra suit of clothes for these men. To provide an extra suit of clothes for those same veterans in 1952 costs in the neighbourhood of $80 to $100. Many of us felt that a larger amount should be allowed than that provided in the bill.

I should like to point out that of these leg amputations above the so-called Symes' amputation, there are 3,070. This was brought out in the evidence before the committee. The annual liability to the country before the proposed increase was $165,780. The increase as proposed in the bill will mean $55,260. As to those with arm amputations, we were advised in the committee by the witnesses from the department that there were 1,294. The present cost is $28,468, and the proposed increase would mean $10,352. As to those with other appliances, there were 2,452. The present cost is $115,244. The bill means an increase of $61,300. The total increase under this bill will be $126,912. I might say that the total cost at the present time for these classes of amputees and those who wear appliances is $309,492. If this amount were even doubled it would mean a cost of only $618,984 or not quite two-thirds of a million dollars.

I point this out to show that, with regard to this class of veterans and with regard to this particular allowance, the cost is extremely small. I felt, as did other members of the committee, that we could very well have doubled the amount of $309,492 and not made the cost very great as far as the country was concerned. It is hardly necessary for me to say that this is a most deserving class of veterans. They are the most helpless class of veterans that we have. As we know, their clothing is subject to tremendous wear and tear during the year. I simply call this matter to the attention of this committee because, as I say, when the bill was carried in the veterans affairs committee, it was carried on division, and those were the particular reasons upon which we divided in that committee.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS

INCREASES IN BENEFITS TO OTHER THAN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 191, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Schedules I and II.

The Chairman: May I point out that this bill also has been considered in the special committee on veterans affairs and has been reported without amendment.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO TIME OF EXPIRY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 182, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: I point out that this bill to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1951, has also been carefully considered in the special committee on veterans affairs and reported without amendment.

On section 1—Expiration.

Mr. Brooks: I might say that this bill was carried unanimously in the committee without any amendment; but I am rather surprised that hon. members who were not in the committee are not anxious to learn more about the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They know you did a good job.

Mr. Brooks: Possibly that is true.

Mr. Mutch: I think that is deserved.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

PAYMENT TO ESTATES OF FULL AMOUNT OF POLICY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 183, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should say that this bill also has been considered carefully by the special committee on veterans affairs and reported to this house without amendment.

On section 1—Coming into force.

Mr. Brooks: It should be pointed out to the committee that there was some objection to this bill, not to what it contained but to what it did not contain. It was felt by certain members that section 10 of the Veterans Insurance Act should be either amended or deleted. I brought this matter up when the resolution was before the house.

I should like to point out to the committee that under section 10 of the act, if an insured dies and the widow or beneficiary is entitled to a pension, then certain deductions are made from the insurance that is paid to the beneficiary. Considering the fact there is a very substantial insurance fund, and that these veterans have paid in sometimes for many years, it hardly seems fair that deductions should be made from the amount of insurance that is paid to the beneficiary.

We had hoped there would be another clause in the bill following section 1, that deleting section 10 of the act. I might say that this has been a recommendation of the Legion for quite a number of years. It is also a recommendation from other veterans organizations, but no consideration has yet been given to it by any committee that has been set up or by the government. I really think they have a just claim, and in fairness to the veterans I hope that section 10 of the act, while not considered at this session, will be considered at some future date.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

INCREASES IN RATE OF INTEREST ON MINIMUM MONTHLY BALANCES

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 334, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: This bill has also been reported to this house without amendment, by the special committee on veterans affairs, where it was considered and studied carefully.

On section 1—Interest.

Mr. Green: Will the minister give a brief explanation of this amendment?

Mr. Lapointe: There is very little I can add to what is in the explanatory note of the bill and to the remarks I made when the resolution was introduced. There are two purposes to the amendments as my hon. friend knows. One is to increase the rate of interest on the fund from 2½ per cent to 3½ per cent on the first $5 million monthly balance and 2½ per cent on the balance of the fund. The second amendment is to permit the board to receive grants and bequests which are offered to the fund from time to time and which they have no authority to accept at the present time.

Mr. Green: Have any such bequests been made to the fund as yet?

Mr. Lapointe: I do not believe there have been any, but the fund has received inquiries as to the possibility of making such bequests. The second amendment also gives the board authority to receive repayments of grants which they have made. At the present time when a grant is made to a veteran, the act does not permit the board to accept repayment of that grant. The experience has been that many veterans, after they have received those grants and managed to get through the difficulties they were in, make an offer to the board to repay either the whole grant or part of it. The board does not accept it because under the present act the board would not benefit; it would fall into the consolidated revenue fund.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

CONSIDERATION OF FURTHER AMENDMENTS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That the following amendments be made to Bill 181, intituled: "An act respecting Allowances for War Veterans and their dependents";

1. That in paragraph (a) of subclause one of clause three the words: "sixty-five" be deleted and the word: "sixty" be substituted therefor.

2. That subclause one of clause six be amended by inserting after paragraph (h) the following: "(i) interest on bank deposits and bonds and dividends on shares in the capital stock of any company to the extent of twenty-five dollars per annum from all such sources;" and by relettering the present paragraph (i) as paragraph (j).

3. That subclauses two and three of clause thirty-one be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Every person who, immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, was in receipt of an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, may be paid an additional allowance equal to the amount that he would have been eligible to receive under this act in respect of the period between the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-two, and the coming into force of this act, if this act, except section four, had been in force during that period, less any amount that he was eligible to receive under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946 in respect of that period.

"(3) Every person (a) who was awarded an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, whose allowance was discontinued and was not being paid immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, for the reason that the amount of his income rendered him ineligible for the allowance, or (b) who, prior to the coming into force of this act, applied for an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, but was not granted the allowance for the reason that the amount of his income rendered him ineligible for such an allowance, may apply for and be granted an allowance in respect of the period between the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-two, and the coming into force of this act equal to the amount that he would have been eligible to receive under this act in respect of that period if this act, except section four, had been in force during that period, less any amount that he was eligible to receive under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, in respect of that period".

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that this resolution contains the amendments which were approved by the special committee on veterans affairs. I presume the intention is to have these amendments considered when we are considering Bill No. 181. If that is so, there will be an opportunity at that time to discuss these amendments, together with the other provisions of Bill No. 181; is that correct?

Mr. Lapointe: That is right. There will be an opportunity to discuss these amendments during the section by section discussion in committee of the whole on the bill. When the resolution is adopted I intend to move that it be referred to the committee of the whole on Bill No. 181.

Mr. Green: These amendments will be moved to the bill as we come to the respective sections?

Mr. Lapointe: As we come to the various sections I shall ask one of my colleagues to move these various amendments.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved that this resolution be referred to the committee of the whole on Bill No. 181.

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ALLOWANCES FOR WAR VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Chairman: This bill has been considered by the special committee on veterans affairs, and has been returned with an amendment.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, this bill was before the committee for some days. While there was very little controversy in respect of the other bills passed by the committee, there was considerable debate and considerable controversy so far as this particular bill was concerned.

The committee will recall that when the resolution was before the house many weaknesses were pointed out, and they were again emphasized in committee. Unfortunately the amendments were not made along the lines we had hoped, and the weaknesses in the act when it went to committee are still there. This, I may say, is a matter of great disappointment to many members of the committee, as well as to veterans organizations who presented the case to the committee on behalf of recipients of war veterans allowances. It is also a disappointment to all veterans across this country.

This is a most important bill. We had expected that the legislation before us in the special committee would have been before a committee on veterans affairs over a year ago. As a matter of fact we felt that when the Pension Act was being considered and amended, the War Veterans Allowance Act should have been amended as well. We were pleased, however, when at the last session of parliament we were told there would be a war veterans committee at this session.

We had every reason to believe that this most important legislation would have been corrected this session. However, the bill as presented to the committee made very few changes in the act. One of the benefits of having the bill before us was that it was a consolidation, a feature which met with the general approval of all members on the committee.

There is one section in the bill which has given general satisfaction, and that is the provision allowing veterans to receive allowances during certain months of the year and to work in other months. It was felt, however, that the encouragement given to some other veterans was not sufficient.

We were very pleased to learn that veterans employed in different types of work are giving satisfaction. In that connection I should like to read from the report of the work of the Department of Veterans Affairs. At page 18 I find set out a summary of welfare services, where there is reference to the employment of veterans and to the satisfaction they are giving their employers. At page 18 I find this:

> A review of the progress made during the year shows that the work of casualty rehabilitation and welfare has been efficiently carried out with many cases being closed as successfully re-established in civil life, and with fewer disabled veterans unemployed than ever before.
> It has also been ascertained that the incidence of dismissal of disabled veterans from work on the grounds of inefficiency is negligible, thereby proving that placements have been soundly made in jobs where, notwithstanding the disability of the veteran, his courage and determination has enabled him to turn out volume and quality equal to those who are not disabled.

That is a statement which I know will give great satisfaction not only to members of the House of Commons but to all veterans across Canada. On the same page, the welfare services branch reports on the older veterans as follows:

> The principal need of the older veteran in reasonably good health is steady, gainful employment and, when to obtain and retain such work becomes a problem, the branch is prepared to take an interest. In various ways the branch has stimulated the interest of employers and community groups in the value of the older veteran properly placed in employment and, in co-operation with national employment service, believes that substantial results have been achieved. During the year, national employment service recorded employment registrations by 45,756 older veterans and at March 31 the number unplaced was 9,519 as compared with 12,284 at the end of the previous year.

That indicates clearly to me, as I am sure it must to all hon. members, that not only is the older veteran capable of working in many instances, but also he is most anxious to get employment whenever it is possible. I was interested in a report made by Mr. Ryder of the research department in which he pointed out that from a research made it was found that the health of the older veteran was much better than had been expected. I do not know what the object of the research was, but he pointed out to our committee that men of the age of 55 years who were receiving war veterans allowance on account of some disability or on account of poor health had a greater death rate than civilians in the same age group. He pointed out also that the death rate of recipients of war veterans allowance 60 years and over was lower than that of the corresponding civilian age group. I think the inference which possibly was meant to be drawn was that the war veteran had not aged as much as had been expected due to his war service.

I think it should be brought out at this time that no such inference should be drawn. In the first place, as was pointed out in the committee, those men who are 60 years of age and over and who served in the first war were the best of the young men in the country at that time. They were more physically fit than any others; they were the cream of the crop, as it were. They were hardier than many of the men who were unable to pass the physical examination for overseas service and who on that account stayed home during the first war.

There is another argument that could be used for granting war veterans allowance. When these men came back from the first war they were not in the same position economically as were those who had stayed at home. As a matter of fact I believe the war veterans allowance was granted on that point as well. These men came back and found that there was not the employment for them they had expected. They found that those who had stayed home were well established and that it was more difficult for them to become rehabilitated. There is a great difference between the men who served in the first world war and those who served in the second.

Then again, no action had been made after the first world war to provide educational facilities as was done after the second war. Many of the men who came back took land under the soldier settlement board, and we know they had a very hard time. They went through two depressions and also the second world war, and it was more difficult for them to become established than it was for those who had stayed home.

This brings me to my criticism of the present act. We criticized the present act chiefly because it did not increase the ceilings to the extent we thought they should have been increased. Under the old ceiling a single man was permitted to earn $125 over and above his war veterans allowance while a married man could earn $250. Under the new ceiling, both single and married men are entitled to earn only $120 over and above their allowances. Instead of increasing the ceilings there has been a decrease in the cases of both the single and married man. We felt that there should have been an increase in both instances.

A number of cases were presented by the Legion where particular individuals would suffer. One case was that of the older veteran who possibly with the help of his wife or someone else was able to hold a position as janitor or do some job of that nature. The low ceiling would allow him to earn only an extra $120 a year; therefore it would be impossible for him to take a job of that kind. Then there was the case of the older veteran and his wife who might have a room to rent for perhaps $4 or $5 per week. Again he would be prohibited from doing this because of the low ceiling. There was also the case of the man who had been able to earn a retirement pension of from $20 to $50 a month. He would not be eligible because of the low ceiling. The worst case of all was the man with a disability pension, say 50 per cent. If this man was married and totally unemployable he would get very little assistance under the War Veterans Allowance Act; if he was single he would receive none at all.

It was felt that these few cases illustrated clearly the unfairness of leaving the ceiling or the permissible amount which the veteran was allowed to earn at only $120 per year. The matter was thoroughly discussed in the committee, and it is not necessary for me to dwell further on that point.

The second matter to which we objected strongly was the amount of the allowance, namely $50 for a single veteran and $90 for a married veteran. It was pointed out to us, as we have pointed out in the house on numerous occasions, that the increase should have been based on the cost of living. Since 1939 the cost of living has increased by something like 82 per cent, whereas the increase in the war veterans allowance is only 33⅓ per cent.

Those are the two main objections we have to the bill. We think veterans are not being treated fairly or justly in this respect, and we feel the attention of the committee should be called to these matters. I know there are other members who are going to speak on the bill along the same lines, and it is not my intention to take any more time.

Mr. Gillis: I too was a member of the special committee, and most of the things that we would ordinarily say we said there. However, there are a few matters to which I should like to refer. The minister has already indicated that several amendments are being made to the bill. In my opinion a lot of discussion will have to take place on the bill as we discuss it clause by clause. At this time the things about which I am concerned are the amendments that were not introduced and that we will not have an opportunity to discuss as we consider the bill.

The first amendment that I thought should have been made and which was not made is an amendment of the act to include the widows of imperial veterans whose husbands passed away before they were able to comply with the twenty-year residence qualification. I had figures indicating that the problem was not very big and there would not have been much money involved. After the many times this matter has been discussed in the house I am disappointed that the act was not amended at this session to include the widows of imperial veterans who did not meet the residence clause. We object strenuously to what is not done for those who are already getting something; but the position such a widow finds herself in is very difficult because she receives nothing. The fact that she lost her husband before he had resided in Canada for twenty years does not improve her position very much, because the widow has been here the necessary time. She still has to eat and provide a home for herself in Canada and, as somebody remarked in the committee, the body of her husband is still in Canada. As far as he is concerned his bones are interred here and will remain here. Rather than a strict legal application of the act humanitarian consideration should be given to the widow who gets nothing at the present time. As I said before the cost would not be so great, because the figures presented to the committee indicated that not many cases are involved.

My second disappointment with respect to the amendments that were brought forward arose because of the fact that no amendment was introduced to include veterans of world war I who saw service in England. There are a considerable number of them, and in my opinion when the government amended the War Veterans Allowance Act to include veterans of world war II who saw service in England they immediately created discrimination. That discrimination should have been removed. We argued the matter in the committee but the government appeared to be adamant at this time that that recommendation was not going to be followed. I was very sorry to see these two matters not dealt with in the amendments the minister is presenting at this session. In my opinion the act has been improved. The computing of the war veterans allowance on a monthly basis, without any reference to the income that may be earned by a veteran able to take seasonal employment for four, five or six months of a year, is a move in the right direction. There are many older soldiers who cannot take steady employment in heavy industry but who can do light work of a seasonal nature particularly in the summer months when the weather is good. Thus they are able to earn something, and then they can go back on the war veterans allowance when that type of employment is no longer available without the income they have earned being held against them on an annual basis. I think that is a big improvement in the act and gives considerable latitude to the ex-service man who finds himself in the position of not being able to work all the time.

There was a lot of discussion and several motions in the committee with respect to the schedule. Many of us thought the rates in the schedule were too low. They certainly did not meet the request of the Legion in their presentation to the committee, but again the government appeared to be adamant in the stand that this was as far as they were going at the present time.

We can have a lot of discussion on the clauses of the bill, but I want to say one thing now. There was a proposition made before the veterans affairs committee by a doctor from Vancouver. I spoke about the matter in the committee and I mentioned it in the house on second reading of the bill. I refer to the proposal that appears to have emanated from Vancouver where they have set up a geriatrics division in one of their institutions. The idea is that older veterans who are inmates of the institutions across Canada are going to be taken under the wing of this new organization and are going to be given some training. In the case of Vancouver the officials who are giving the training are working on a voluntary basis with the co-operation, as this gentleman told us, of the community chest people in that city.

I cannot agree with his presentation of the matter. We have to ask ourselves this question. To begin with why are these older veterans inmates of these institutions? Why was it necessary for any veteran to make application to the veterans affairs department asking that the department admit him to an institution and look after him so far as his meals, room and general maintenance are concerned? Why did he do that in the first place? He did it because he was no longer employable. He was certified as being unemployable by a medical authority or he was over 60 years of age. Otherwise he would not have been receiving the war veterans allowance.

Having the war veterans allowance, why did he seek to become an inmate of an institution? He requested to be allowed to enter the institution because he was not getting enough on which to live on the outside. That is the answer. Some of them have been veterans care cases off and on over the years throughout the country, but apparently this medical doctor has devised a scheme of instituting a geriatrics division. Older veterans will go into these institutions, and they have to be psychoanalysed. They range in age from over 60 to about 70 and they are broken down. They are not employable. They are in these institutions because they cannot live on the outside. In Vancouver under the program sponsored by the community chest organization—they are very benevolent people—a geriatrics division has been set up, and apparently with the general sanction of the veterans affairs department these older veterans are going to be psychoanalysed to determine what their aptitudes may be for employment. They are going to find employment for them.

The doctor told us that there was one old gentleman in the institution whom they rehabilitated. He could do a little typing, so they made his fingers nimble again and sent him to a bush camp to type for the office manager. That was one case, but to my mind the whole idea is ridiculous and as far as I am concerned I am opposed to it. In the first place the veteran who is in that condition, the older veteran who goes into an institution, has reached the end of the trail. There is nothing outside for him. If he received enough by way of war veterans allowance to pay for a room and a bite to eat he would not have to become an inmate of that institution. He is a definite charge on the Canadian people and a responsibility of the Canadian government.

I object to any system whereby it is proposed to take men in this age group and ascertain whether they should go back to work somewhere just to get them out of the institutions. I want the members of the veterans affairs committee to think about the matter. I definitely object to them becoming in any sense of the term linked up with the charitable organizations of this country. It certainly is not the prerogative of any charitable institution in this country to become involved in veterans affairs. For that purpose there is a special ministry of government. There is a large department of veterans affairs and it extends clear across the country. There are investigators, there are hospitals and there are staffs across the country which are adequate to care for the needs of veterans in any category. I object to any attempt to turn the institutions established for veterans of this country in the direction of working through some other scheme that involves charitable organizations across the country.

If you want to do something for the older veteran who has been necessarily institutionalized because he cannot find employment and live on the outside, the thing to do is increase the rate of war veterans allowance so that the men can pay for room and board outside, and you will not have any of them in institutions.

On that particular angle I speak to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the minister, because I can very easily see what is going to happen. If you have a hundred or two of the older veterans institutionalized in Vancouver, Halifax, London or Toronto, or any of our large centres, and you start on this system of geriatrics what you are going to see happen is just this. They will be picked as orderlies in the hospital—no pay, of course—and they will be required to sweep floors, polish wards, make beds and do the work of a general orderly. Somebody determines whether they are fit for that type of work and they will say: If you do not do that type of work, out you go. We were going to rehabilitate you by giving you a job mopping floors, but you would not do that.

Before we get into that kind of organization I strongly urge the Minister of Veterans Affairs to take a square look at the problem and determine whether he has sufficient staff to look after the needs of veterans. If he has not, then he should increase the staff rather than seek the co-operation of charitable organizations across this country and let them get into veterans affairs in any way, shape or form. Let the minister build the department up if he has not sufficient staff to find jobs for these older fellows.

With conditions as they are and with the average condition of these old soldiers who have had to become institutionalized, the idea here is far-fetched and ridiculous, in my opinion. If there is anything these men can do, if they have any aptitude and there is employment they will find it. I think they are in a better position to determine what their capabilities are than the average welfare officer whose intentions may be good but whose ideas in my opinion are pretty far-fetched.

I just wanted to make this statement because I notice that very few people have been saying anything about this angle. I got the impression that some of the members of the committee at least were impressed and thought this was a good idea. To my mind it is not a good idea, and before we conclude this discussion I want the minister to tell the house exactly what the department has in mind and to what extent they are considering the organization of this geriatrics proposition across the country.

There are a few other matters in the bill on which I wish to speak, but I will reserve my remarks for the clauses of the bill.

Mr. Thomas: I think I pretty well indicated my feelings on this bill when I spoke in the debate on the resolution. I agree that it is a great improvement over the act as it was before but, as I stated at that time, I do not think it goes quite far enough. I also stated that I believed any increases in war veterans allowance should be based on the cost of living index. The relationship of the present rates with those of 1939 is not in proportion at all when compared with the cost of living index today.

I also agree that section 4 is certainly an improvement. It does give the veteran who is able an opportunity to take seasonal or part-time employment. It encourages him to take employment when he can get it and contribute that much toward the welfare of the country. However, I do think they should get some sort of increase in allowance so they can have at least a reasonable standard of living. I think the maximum income allowed is too low. They can earn very little outside the actual allowance, and in my opinion that is an error. They should be encouraged to take what employment they can get because there are jobs open which do not pay enough to warrant a person working at them full time, and these men can handle those jobs quite nicely.

As previous speakers have indicated, we would like to see included wives of imperial veterans whose husbands died prior to having twenty years' residence. It does seem a shame that a woman should be penalized simply because her husband died before residing here for the required time.

As I said earlier when speaking on this bill, the property allowance could be increased to some extent without causing any hardship on the government. Although the present allowance is sufficient to cover a modest home, it should be increased, I think to such an extent that these people can at least live in a comfortable dwelling for the time they are receiving an allowance.

As I said before, this is an improvement and apparently the government are learning to crawl toward the ultimate goal. We just hope they will keep on improving this act as they go along, possibly speeding up the improvements at the next session.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Green: This bill is of great importance to the war veterans of Canada because it is a complete revision of the War Veterans Allowance Act. There has been no such revision for many years and the veterans of the country have been looking forward to a measure of this kind for a long, long time. It is important, therefore, that the measure as passed by the house now should be in the best possible form. One other reason that is the case is that it is very unlikely that there will be any changes of much consequence in the years that lie immediately ahead.

The bill as it comes back from the special committee on veterans affairs has been improved in several different ways, and I am extremely glad to be able to say that such is the case. There are, however, still two serious defects in the bill, and I come to them at once. The first is that the amount of the war veterans allowance has not been increased to the extent that it should have been increased. The second is that the permissive income or, in other words, the amount of income that a veteran may have or earn over and above the allowance, has not been made sufficiently high. I propose to deal briefly with those two defects.

First, as to the amount of the allowance, may I say this. At the present time the single veteran who qualifies for a full war veterans allowance can get $40.41 per month. Under the changes made in this bill he will be able to get $50 per month, an increase of $9.59. The married veteran drawing a full war veterans allowance will be able to get $90 per month whereas he now can get only $70.83. That is a difference of $19.17.

In addition to the war veterans allowance itself there is a special fund known as the war veterans allowance assistance fund from which a single veteran may draw an additional $10 per month and a married veteran may draw up to a maximum of $15 per month. Payments in many cases are not made in cash but by way of purchasing clothing, furniture or something that may be urgently required.

This assistance fund is based entirely on need. I have here the notice which was sent out by the department when the assistance fund was first set up two or three years ago. It stresses the fact that this fund can be drawn upon only in cases of need. This means, of course, that a veteran must first establish his qualification for the allowance itself which involves a means test, and it will continue to be a means test under this new bill. Then to get help from the fund he must pass a second means test.

The proposal made by both of the great veterans organizations of Canada—and I refer to the Canadian Legion and the National Council of Veterans Associations in Canada—was that there should be established in this new bill a war veterans allowance of $60 a month for the single man and $120 per month for the married veteran. I have here the brief filed with the special committee by the National Council of Veterans Associations. In dealing with this question they have this to say:

Supplementation of war veterans allowance rates through the assistance fund for those who are unemployable and unable to supplement through casual earnings was at the outset regarded as practical and justifiable. However, in practice, it would appear that the supplementation in addition to the original means test attached to the war veterans allowance assistance fund has carried a secondary means test which serves to confuse and discourage worthy applicants.

Then they go on to recommend that the assistance fund payment be absorbed into the war veterans allowance itself and that there be payable a total of $60 for the single veteran and $120 for the married one. The Legion have made exactly the same submission. It so happens that their great national convention took place while the sittings of this special committee were being held. At that convention the Legion officials received a unanimous endorsation of the brief which had been submitted to our committee. There is therefore no question whatever as to where these great veterans organizations of Canada stand on this question. They believe the figures should be $60 and $120.

Then to come to the second main defect which is the amount of permissive income; at the present time, under the law as it now stands, that amount is $125 for the single veteran and $250 for the married one. In other words he can earn or get by way of interest or in any other way up to $125 or $250 over and above his maximum allowance. For some strange reason this new bill we are considering tonight cuts that figure to $120 for both the single man and the married one. In their brief the Legion dealt with that change in the following way:

. . . the Canadian Legion feels that a retrograde step has been taken in proposing the reduction in permissible income from other sources to $120 a year for both single and married veterans instead of the previous $125 and $250. An increase, not a reduction, seems indicated.

The National Council of Veterans Associations also dealt with the matter. They said:

It is quite obvious that the extremely limited ceiling applicable at present and contemplated in Bill No. 181 now before the house and affecting war veterans allowance, has not been sufficiently realistic in facing the problems of living costs under present-day conditions. In fact, the extremely low ceiling is reminiscent of the traditional poor-law philosophy—that the unfortunate should be grateful for a pittance.

This question of the amount of permissive income is of great importance. The Legion pointed that fact out by giving examples. I am going to read these examples to the committee because they clearly show how important it is to allow a higher permissive income. Here is the first case they mention:

First, there is the individual not physically able to do a full day's work. He may be competent, or with his wife be competent, to handle a part-time job such as janitor of a school or church, watchman, or some other work which provides regular employment but the labour is light and the pay is small. He cannot qualify as a casual labourer for his earnings are regular, his income from this work may be smaller than war veterans allowance alone would give him, and neither earnings nor war veterans allowance taken separately is sufficient to support him.

Then they go on to quote from a letter written by the wife of a veteran in Alberta, as follows:

Whilst my husband was in hospital our minister offered us a three-room house with light and water and $50 a month. I told him we could not accept the salary, but would oe glad to accept the house and light free in exchange for caretaking of church property, but that we had better consult the W.V.A. board first. We have just received the letter tonight, and believe it or not, if we take this house and light and donate our work to the church the W.V.A. will deduct the rent value from his allowance.

Then the president of the Legion went on to read from the Legion brief:

I am quite sure the members of this committee will sympathize with the lady when she exclaims: "In the name of God what kind of system is this?"

Then the brief deals with another type of case, as follows:

In addition to recipients who can do work such as this, there are families who, finding it impossible to live on W.V.A. and the husband unfit for work, the women have to go out to work, and this at an age when that certainly should not be required of them, to earn enough to keep the home going. Meagre as their earnings seem to be they are more than W.V.A. would bring, but not a great deal more. Here the husband has a heavy psychic burden as well as his physical disability to bear.

Then they say:

Then there are individuals, thrifty and provident, who over the years have earned for themselves a small retirement pension of $25 or $50 per month. Not enough to live on, but enough to be a very great help if W.V.A. were permitted to bring their income up to a subsistence level.

In other words, if the ceiling on permissive income were raised, then these veterans and their wives would be able to get a decent income on which to live.

Then the Legion dealt with the case of pensioners in these words:

Finally, there is the disability pensioner, who is entitled to W.V.A.

Because, of course, his pension is so small. I continue:

The last pension increase he received did him no good, for he suffered a corresponding decrease in W.V.A.

That is what happened last year with these particular veterans, as we pointed out during the debates.

Many of these men find their war wounds an increasingly grave handicap, and these, coupled with their physical disabilities, may make them completely unemployable. Under the proposed legislation—

They are referring to this Bill No. 181.

—a 50 per cent disability veteran, if married and totally unemployable, can get but little assistance under the W.V.A.; the single man none at all.

I repeat, it is of the greatest importance that there be an increase in the permissive income allowed to these veterans.

All we need to do is compare the permissive income allowed under old age assistance. I hold in my hand the Old Age Assistance Act which was passed last year. It applies of course to people between the ages of 65 and 70. Both single persons and married persons are allowed a permissive income of $240 a year over and above the amount they get by way of assistance. There can be no justification for treating the veteran more harshly than the treatment given the recipients of old age assistance.

You may wonder, Mr. Chairman, why we did not have these changes made when the bill was before the committee, and of course that is a very proper question. Well, the answer is that we did our best to have the bill perfected in committee, but we were unable to make any progress. We ran into a government stone wall. I have here the proceedings of the committee for May 23. On that date we commenced to consider this bill by sections and my colleague, the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, moved this amendment:

That the committee recommend that the government give consideration to introducing legislation during the present session of parliament which will give effect to the representations submitted to the committee by the Legion and national council of veterans that the rates of allowance and the maximum total incomes set out in the schedules to Bill 181 should be increased.

There was an amendment to that motion moved by one of the government members on that committee. It was finally ruled out of order by the chairman, and a different amendment was substituted for it by another government member, which is to be found in the proceedings of June 5.

Mr. Mutch: On a point of privilege, the chairman did not rule it out of order. The amendment was moved and carried.

Mr. Green: The parliamentary assistant has not been listening.

Mr. Mutch: That is possible.

Mr. Green: The amendment was moved by the hon. member for Provencher.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Mutch: He withdrew it.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It was withdrawn; state the facts.

Mr. Mutch: On a question of privilege, the hon. member is a stickler for the book. I indicated, after the hon. member for Provencher had withdrawn his amendment, that I probably would have ruled it out of order on the grounds urged by the hon. member who is now speaking, in spite of the fact that he destroyed his first premise with his second one. The fact remains that I was not called upon to do it. The hon. gentleman did withdraw his amendment. I have to answer for what I did, not for what I did not do.

Mr. Green: My point is, whether it was ruled out of order or withdrawn, a new amendment was substituted by another government member, and it read as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question—

He was here referring to the motion moved by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough.

—be struck out and the following words be substituted therefor: the committee recommends to the government continued and sympathetic study of the needs and requirements of recipients of war veterans allowance keeping in mind the recommendations of the veterans organizations in that respect and particularly with regard to permissive income.

To that amendment the hon. member for Royal moved a subamendment as follows:

. . . by adding thereto the following words: and give consideration to introducing legislation accordingly at the present session.

That subamendment was ruled out of order by the chairman who is the parliamentary assistant, who just interrupted me. We appealed his ruling. It was supported by a straight vote of government members, with all the opposition members of all parties voting against the ruling and the hon. member for Fraser Valley abstaining.

When we got down to the sections of the bill an amendment was again moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Royal, recommending that the government give consideration to increasing the amounts in the schedules to this bill, which contain the figures both of allowances and of permissive incomes. That too was ruled out of order by the chairman of the committee. We again appealed his ruling. Again every Liberal member voted in support of the ruling with the exception of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, who voted with the members of the three opposition parties. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we did our best to see that these changes were made at the present session because time is of great importance to these veterans. These are front-line Canadian veterans having to exist on a subsistence level, and time means a great deal to them. They may die by next year if they cannot get a proper allowance.

Certainly they should not have to wait a year to have the ceiling raised. The amendment moved by government members in the committee would indicate that there is some possibility of the government making that change. Well, it will be a great tragedy if the change does not come before another year. We had that experience last year with pensions, the refusal of the government to make a proper increase in the pension rate. There was delay. Then last fall, finally, an increase was put through. It may be that we will have to go through the same procedure with regard to war veterans allowances.

I cannot urge upon the government and my fellow members too strongly that these changes should be made now, before this session closes. The rates should be increased to $60 and $120, and the amount of permissive income should be increased as well.

It seems to me that, for the first time, this war veterans legislation is now being influenced by social assistance legislation. Attempts are being made to place the veteran on the basis of the civilian social legislation. The Legion pointed that out in their brief when they said:

> It appears from the legislation before you that the government, in suggesting rates and allowances, has been influenced to some extent by legislation in the field of social assistance. However we would strongly suggest that this proposed legislation affects men and women who have served this country honourably and well in time of war.

Those words sum up the situation very clearly. If this legislation is not put into proper shape before the close of this session, the government may well find itself faced with a request to abolish the means test in connection with the war veterans allowance. After all, the means test was abolished for civilians at 70 years of age, and the war veterans allowance was made payable at 60 on the basis that the veteran who had front-line service was pre-aged to the extent of ten years. It will not be easy for the minister to justify a refusal to abolish the means test in the case of veterans on war veterans allowance and to allow the veteran at 60 to have whatever amount of income he can earn.

There is nothing more one can say. The case is there for a proper increase, and for a proper amount of permissive income. All we can do is leave the problem on the doorstep of the minister and the government. If they wish to be fair with these old comrades of ours, who in the first great war helped save this nation, and fair to the younger men who did it again just a few years ago, then there will be no hesitation in bringing the allowance up to the right amount at the present session, as well as bringing up the amount of permissive income.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, as a member this session of the committee on veterans affairs, let me say I agree in principle with everything said this evening by the hon. member for Royal, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

I fully realize that Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents, has been considered by the government, and sets out what the government proposes to do in respect of war veterans allowances at this session. That is clearly indicated. I hope, however, that the shortcomings of the measure pointed out in the briefs of the various veterans organizations, and by members on the veterans affairs committee, will be considered by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, by his department and the government, and that those shortcomings will be remedied.

I would hope that we would have another committee on veterans affairs at the next session of parliament, that these shortcomings would be rectified, and that the government would bring in a new act to include all the legitimate requests made by the various organizations interested in the matter. It has been pointed out tonight that the war veterans are receiving something far short of what they should get.

I would hope in particular that the widows of imperial veterans, who in many cases resided here almost the required 20 years, might receive proper consideration. We know of cases where husbands have died just before completing 20 years of residence. I think of one case in particular where there had been residence for 19 and a half years, just a few months short of 20 years. Yet widows in that position are denied any assistance. Surely that is something that should be rectified; indeed, it should have been done at this session.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, as a member of the veterans affairs committee may I support what has been said by the hon. members for Vancouver-Quadra and Royal, who have said many things I would have liked to say. I heartily support the proposals they have made, and trust the minister was listening carefully so they may bear fruit.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I was not a member of the special committee on veterans affairs at this session. Perhaps therefore I may be permitted to voice my disappointment at the results the committee was able to achieve.

The advantages and disadvantages of the bill have been explained. One is pleased to see that this seasonal allowance is being introduced. But I do venture to say that while a number of veterans who are recipients of war veterans allowances will be able to get some form of seasonal work during the summer months, far more recipients of war veterans allowances will not be able to get those jobs because, even in the summer months, jobs for elderly men are limited.

I regret to see that the increase in the allowance is not greater. The total income now permitted for a single man, as I understand, is $720 a year, and for a married man $1,200. Those amounts seem pitifully small. When one thinks of other pension schemes in existence and being considered at the present time, he cannot help feeling that the committee lost all sense of proportion. If the house approves of this meagre increase, and the meagre amount of permissive earnings, then I feel it, too, will have lost all sense of proportion.

The claim may be made that these veterans did not make any contribution to their allowances, pensions or insurance schemes, whatever they may be called. I say these men made their contributions by service. They have not been in a position to make large contributions to any generous pension scheme. I hope before this session closes the members of the House of Commons will bear in mind the amount that they are now "generously" allotting to these old soldiers.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, I do not feel I would be doing my duty if I did not get up and say a few words on this bill because in the last few years I have had considerable to do with veterans affairs. I want to thank the government for going as far as they have gone with this legislation, but in my opinion the bill still lacks some sections which should have been included. One of the sections which I think should have been included is one dealing with veterans who served in England during the first great war. Today many of those veterans who do not happen to be pensioners are unable to obtain this allowance because England was not considered to be a theatre of war.

Those men may have been kept in England through no fault of their own. I know from experience—this is a matter which we may have to face in future years—that many soldiers were kept in Canada during the second world war through no fault of their own. They were good, reliable soldiers but their commanding officers would not permit them to go over because they required good men here. Many veterans of the first world war may have been kept in England because of their ability to fill certain positions, because of their ability to carry on their jobs. I feel that they should be given some consideration in the legislation now before this committee.

Another point I should like to take up is that which has been dealt with by previous speakers. I contend that the ceiling, if you wish to call it that, is not high enough. In fact I submit there should not be any ceiling at all. We should permit these veterans to earn whatever money they are able to earn at whatever work they can get. They would then feel that they are contributing something toward their own support, that they are part of our economic life, that they are not just cast off and depending entirely on charity. That is the way you make them feel when you tell them that they can earn only so much.

If a married veteran has a family—I happen to know a few who have—$1,200 is not enough to permit them to more than barely exist. I do not know what the process is, but I would hope that this legislation could be reconsidered and amended, at this session if possible, so consideration could be given to veterans who served in England during the first war and to also raise the amount of permissible income a veteran may earn, either married or single.

There are many veterans who would like to do some work. They would like to think that they were at least helping to earn their own living. Under this legislation, if they are going to receive a war veterans allowance, they hardly dare go out and earn anything. It is like the story of the old woman related by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. Some of these men just cannot understand this legislation. They cannot understand why they are not permitted to work and have the allowance when they are willing to work.

On section 3—Veterans, widows and orphans.

The Chairman: The resolution which was carried a moment ago and referred to this committee contained an amendment to this section.

Mr. Lapointe: This is one of the sections to which an amendment was agreed in committee, and I would now ask my colleague the Postmaster General to move it.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I move:

That in paragraph (a) of subclause one of clause three the words: "sixty-five" be deleted and the word: "sixty" be substituted therefor.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Employable veterans.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the effect of this section?

Mr. Lapointe: This section was amended in the committee but the amendment contains no new principle. It was an amendment to facilitate administration in the case of recipients who wish to revert to the benefits under section 3 of the act. In their case it was found advisable to make such an amendment, and it was purely for clarification purposes.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should inform hon. members that the amendments contained in the resolution adopted earlier affect sections 3, 6 and 31 of the act. In the case of other sections there were amendments made in the committee.

Mr. Green: As I understand it, the amendment to this section was not included in the resolution passed earlier; it was made in the committee and will be found in the reprinted bill.

Mr. Mutch: That is correct.

Mr. Lapointe: When there is no new principle involved it is not necessary to make a formal amendment in the committee of the whole.

Mr. Gillis: Are you now proposing to deal with sections 3, 6 and 31?

The Chairman: I was merely pointing out that some clauses of the bill were amended in the special committee on veterans affairs, but this evening we passed a resolution providing for amendments to sections 3, 6 and 31, and that resolution was referred to this committee.

Mr. Gillis: We are now only dealing with section 3?

The Chairman: Section 3 as amended has been carried. Apart from sections 6 and 31, when I refer to a clause as amended I mean a clause amended in the committee on veterans affairs.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—What receipts not income.

Mr. Gillis: I think the minister should clarify the purposes of this section which deals with exempt income. Clause (f) reads:

(f) receipt of money or assistance from any province or municipality by way of mothers' allowance or by way of relief to dependent children.

Any outsider reading that clause will automatically assume that a widow in receipt of veterans allowance may also receive a mothers' allowance from the province. The minister will remember that I asked in committee whether this section dealing with exempt income was discussed with the provinces and if the provinces indicated they were willing to pay a widow a mothers' allowance if she was in receipt of a war veterans allowance. The answer I got, partially in the committee and partially off the record, was to the effect that there was consultation with the provinces and that in British Columbia and the western provinces generally there was some understanding. The understanding is to the effect that the total amount of the war veterans allowance as laid down by the War Veterans Allowance Act and the total amount of the mothers' allowance paid by the province will not both be paid. The war veterans allowance can supplement the mothers' allowance or vice versa. However, I understand that in the provinces from Quebec east no understanding was arrived at. I assume that a widow who may be on mothers' allowance in such a province and who can qualify for war veterans allowance will automatically cease to draw mothers' allowance when she applies for war veterans allowance.

Of course she is better off financially under the War Veterans Allowance Act. However, in the interest of saving members and departmental officials a lot of correspondence on this matter I should like the minister to make a brief statement explaining paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 6 so far as exempt income is concerned, because as it reads now the assumption is that one can draw both.

Mr. Lapointe: With reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, actually this subsection is simply putting into the act what has been the policy of the board. I know the hon. member will understand that the most that can be done under any legislation passed by this parliament is to put in the act the necessary clause to permit payment of war veterans allowance when there is legislation in a province under which the recipient may also receive assistance. However, the payment of needy mothers' allowance is made under provincial acts in all the provinces, and when a particular provincial act will not allow payment of mothers' allowance when she is already in receipt of war veterans allowance there is nothing much this parliament or the department can do to amend the provincial act which sets out the conditions under which their payment will be made. There are some provinces where mothers can receive both the war veterans allowance and the payment under provincial legislation. Others have not seen fit to do that, and we can do no more than pray that some day they will permit payment as is done elsewhere.

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly what I wanted to get on the record. That is the position in so far as the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned, and this legislation provides that that can be done.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: If the provincial statutes are amended to permit it being done, and some of the provinces have gone that far.

Mr. Lapointe: We pay anyway whether or not they pay. This is another clause concerning which an amendment was agreed to in the committee, and I would now ask my colleague, the Postmaster General, to move:

That subclause 1 of clause 6 be amended by inserting after paragraph (h) the following:

"(i) Interest on bank deposits and bonds and dividends on shares in the capital stock of any company to the extent of $25 per annum from all such sources;" and by relettering the present paragraph (i) as paragraph (j).

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I so move.

Mr. Green: That has the effect of putting back into the act the paragraph taken out by the amending bill.

Mr. Lapointe: Exactly.

Mr. Mutch: It is a little wider.

Mr. Brooks: The amount is exactly the same as it was in the old act.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 7 to 29 inclusive agreed to.

On section 30—Veterans described.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Cape Breton South raised the question of the widow of an imperial veteran who cannot qualify for war veterans allowance because her husband died before he had been here for twenty years. I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to having section 30, subsection 4 (b), which defines the residence qualification, changed to make it a domicile qualification. If it were worded to the general effect that the imperial veteran was domiciled in Canada before the 1st January, 1931, that would meet these cases and I think would be more in line with the actual wishes of previous veterans affairs committees. If the minister will recall, the group of imperial veterans who were intended to be covered were the group who came here in the twenties. They had all come here by the end of 1930. I think there were practically none who came here after that time. There may be some coming now, but there were practically none between 1930 and the end of the second world war.

What we really were trying to do was cover the group who came here in the twenties; but instead of wording the definition to provide for those who were domiciled here by the end of the year 1930 we put it the other way around because the provision was only made in 1950, and we said it would apply to those who had resided in Canada for a total period of at least twenty years. There is no similar definition in the War Veterans Allowance Act. In other cases the test of domicile is used. For example, the minister will find that expression used in line 4 on page 12 of the bill. It refers to the imperial who was domiciled in Canada before the first war and then went overseas and served in the imperial forces. He has had eligibility throughout, the test being that he was domiciled in Canada before he went overseas in the first world war. I believe the test for this other group of imperials who came here after the first world war should be based on whether or not they were domiciled here before the end of 1930. If that were done the widows would all be covered and no widow would be ruled out provided her husband was actually domiciled in Canada before the end of 1930. I would ask the minister for his comments on that suggestion.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of my hon. friend, I will be very glad to consider the suggestions he has made. I am not aware of the full implications of such a change, but to my mind it would involve a change in principle. I would not like to commit myself at the present time but I will certainly consider his remarks.

Mr. Green: The suggestion is that you strike out the words "has resided in Canada for a total period of at least twenty years" and substitute "was domiciled in Canada prior to January 1, 1931."

Mr. Mutch: This is an ingenious device conceived for the express purpose of breaking the ceiling which was put on the legislation when the imperial veterans were brought under the War Veterans Allowance Act. It is improper to suggest that was defined by the committee which wrote that legislation or the house which adopted it. The twenty-year clause was designed, perfected and brought forward by those people who sought that benefit. As my hon. friend knows, because he was on the committee, those people came forward and said that was their final proposition. There had to be some definition under which they could qualify for benefit.

As my hon. friend knows, and as all the members of the committee know, benefits of this legislation flow from the veteran himself. Consequently if he is not qualified his dependents do not qualify.

I do not want to elaborate at the moment, but it is not correct to say that a change in the qualifying period would not be a change in principle. It definitely would be a change in principle. I am not arguing whether it should or should not be done at the present time, but I am saying for the benefit of the house that it does involve a change in principle, an abandonment of the principle upon which provision was made for wives of imperial veterans.

Mr. Green: I do not suppose the imperial veterans association gave any thought whatever to the widows. The matter probably did not cross their minds. The twenty-year clause is primarily related to the year 1930. That is why twenty years was put in, because they were going back to the year 1930. The legislation was passed in 1950 and the twenty-year residence qualifications was made then.

I am not trying to bring in any ingenious methods to break any ceilings or do anything of that kind. I simply suggest the test should be on domicile here before the end of 1930.

Mr. Mutch: I do not dispute that, but my point is that we should not argue or pretend that it does not mean an abandonment of the original principle behind the legislation. It does.

Mr. Gillis: I do not agree with the parliamentary assistant's analysis of the proposal put forward by the member for Vancouver-Quadra, when he says that it would in any way change the principle upon which the War Veterans Allowance Act was established.

Mr. Mutch: I did not say that.

Mr. Gillis: The parliamentary assistant stated a few moments ago that all the benefits of the act flow from the veteran himself.

Mr. Mutch: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: Yes. If the act were amended to make the suggestion of the member for Vancouver-Quadra operative that would in no way change the principle. What we are arguing about now is the widows' position. If the veteran had lived in Canada for twenty years he would have been eligible for war veterans allowance.

Mr. Mutch: That is not in dispute.

Mr. Gillis: By an act of God he did not live in Canada for the full twenty years. He was short a few months and passed on. That does not in any way change the benefits that flow from him.

We have already amended the act to make it applicable to the Canadian soldier who passes away in Canada. The benefit of the act is transferred to the widow. The need of the imperial veteran's widow is exactly the same as the Canadian veteran's widow. The benefit is a right that flows from the soldier to the widow because she is in need at this time. We are setting up a discrimination as between the need of the ex-imperial widow in Canada and the Canadian widow; and the pension should go to her because of need as it goes to the Canadian veteran's widow.

If the minister took the proposal under consideration and it were enacted we would remove an injustice and a discrimination. I do not think the amount involved is sufficient to have us quibbling year after year about this. This did not start yesterday in the veterans affairs committee; it started a good many years ago. We have included here what amounts to a discrimination and an injustice, and changing it would not affect the principle as I see it. I cannot help but feel that the application of this suggestion would save a lot of time in the future. I know the member for Vancouver-Quadra is going to continue to talk about this, and I am going to help him. The committee even passed it up in their recommendations to the house. The committee did not recommend anything on it.

Can the minister say that his department will take this under consideration, and may we hope that at the next session we will be able to avoid this discrimination and injustice?

Mr. Green: It is eleven o'clock but I would ask the minister to give some thought to it this evening.

Mr. Lapointe: There are only two sections of the bill left and I do not think they are controversial. The house might carry on and let me ask for an amendment to the next clause which will only take a minute to read.

Mr. Brooks: I quite agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. We should make the amendment now.

Mr. Lapointe: I said very clearly that I would certainly consider the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, but it is not my intention to move any amendment to this act to put this proposal into force at the present time.

Section agreed to.

War Veterans Allowance Act

On section 31—Continuation of allowances.

Mr. Lapointe: I would ask my colleague the Postmaster General to move that:

Subclauses two and three of clause thirty-one be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(2) Every person who, immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, was in receipt of an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, may be paid an additional allowance equal to the amount that he would have been eligible to receive under this act in respect of the period between the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-two, and the coming into force of this act, if this act, except section four, had been in force during that period, less any amount that he was eligible to receive under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, in respect of that period.

(3) Every person (a) who was awarded an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, whose allowance was discontinued and and was not being paid immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, for the reason that the amount of his income rendered him ineligible for the allowance, or (b) who, prior to the coming into force of this act, applied for an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, but was not granted the allowance for the reason that the amount of his income rendered him ineligible for such an allowance, may apply for and be granted an allowance in respect of the period between the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-two, and the coming into force of this act equal to the amount that he would have been eligible to receive under this act in respect of that period if this act, except section four, had been in force during that period, less any amount that he was eligible to receive under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, in respect of that period.

Mr. Cote (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I so move.

Section 32 agreed to.

On schedule A—Table of allowances.

Mr. Knowles: Just before schedule A carries, and in just a word or two, I feel that I should express once again my regret that the figures set out in these schedules are $50 a month and $90 a month, single and married, rather than the figures of $60 a month and $120 a month which were proposed so often on the floor of this house and which were proposed by the Canadian Legion. It seems to me this parliament is not being fair to our burnt-out veterans by asking them at this time to accept these figures when the higher figures certainly were in order and should have been written into this legislation. I earnestly hope that even yet the government will consider the higher figures of $60 a month for a single veteran and $120 a month for a married veteran on the burnt-out pension.

Mr. Brooks: The schedule, of course, is the main part of this bill. It was the schedule which received the most opposition in the committee. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out, we asked that it be brought back and be reconsidered by the house. I do not feel that I could agree to the schedule passing without again registering a protest against it.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedule B agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Brooks: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Green: Next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of this house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the third reading of Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents; Bill No. 366, to incorporate the Belleville harbour commissioners; and the resolution of the Minister of Finance to introduce a bill entitled "An act respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund." Then we will consider the estimates of the Minister of Defence Production and the other items of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; then the estimates of national defence, veterans affairs and public works.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 24, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURES IN PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—AMENDMENT OF QUESTION

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): On a question of privilege, I should like to amend the second paragraph of question No. 18 on today's order paper standing in my name. I should like to change the figures "1951-52" to "1950-51" in the last line of the second paragraph.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GRAIN

REPORT ON TRANSPORTATION OF CROP

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am aware of the keen interest which the hon. members of this house have had in the transportation problem of the 1951 grain crop and I thought a brief report on the situation to date would be helpful. The figures which I will put on the record have reference to the period August 1, 1951, to June 12, 1952.

Latest estimates of anticipated marketings from the 1951 crop are 720·4 million bushels. Total marketings from the 1950 crop were 564·6 million. Actual marketings from August 1, 1951, to June 12, 1952, are 619·6 million bushels compared to 479·9 million bushels during the same period in 1950 and 1951 from the 1950 crop. Marketings this season have been greater than at any other similar period in the history of the Canadian grain trade. Car loadings at country points have increased 33 per cent over last year from 221,747 to 295,554 cars.

Total rail and vessel shipments from the lakehead for the present crop year total 370·3 million bushels compared to 223·4 last year, an increase of over 63 per cent.

Shipments to terminals on the Pacific coast this season total 104,947,000 compared to 50,-970,000 during the same period in the previous crop year, more than a 100 per cent increase over last year.

Total overseas clearances in the same period are 266·3 million bushels compared to 146·5 million bushels from the 1950 crop.

Clearances from the port of Montreal alone since the season opened this year have been particularly large, over 35 million bushels having been shipped compared to 17·7 million for the same period last year, an increase of over 100 per cent. Shipments this season are already greater than at any time in the past in a similar period. Total export clearances from St. Lawrence river terminals since the opening of navigation are 51·4 million as compared to 20·9 million for the same period in 1951.

It should be borne in mind that this last year's crop has been a most difficult one to handle. A seriously delayed harvest last fall, coupled with very poor weather, brought large quantities of out-of-condition grain to market. Salvaging this grain only aggravated an already serious transportation problem. In addition, there has been the problem of getting the immediately saleable grades and types into export channels to meet the excellent demand for our grain abroad.

I think all hon. members will agree that this is a tremendous transportation accomplishment, credit for which should be given in full measure to all the interests concerned, railways, shipping companies, elevator and government employees, not the least of which is the transport controller under whose direction this effort has been achieved.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): May I direct another question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) based on the statement he has just made in the house. I am sure that we all appreciate the tremendous efforts which the railway companies have made to move forward the present crop. Has the minister information as to the amount of grain presently in store in country elevators, the estimated amount on farms, and what the weekly loadings are at the country elevators? We would then have some idea of what the position might be on July 30.

Mr. Chevrier: The figures that I have on hand are comparative only and indicate that for the year August 1, 1951, to June 12, 1952, there were 295,554 box cars moving out of country elevators. I have no figures of the number of bushels in country elevators but I can get that information and send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Wright: Perhaps the minister could get it and let us have it tomorrow.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the present position of the commission on the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. Have any interim recommendations been made? When is a report expected, and is any consideration going to be given to that report in so far as early commencement of the work during the present session is concerned?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Earlier this morning the hon. member was kind enough to send to my office a notice of his intention to ask this question. The only answer I can make at this time is that for the last three months or more the work has been prosecuted very vigorously by the commission. About the middle of April the secretary of the commission reported orally and then confirmed in writing to the Acting Prime Minister that the commission had found it necessary to retain the firm of Mannix Limited of Calgary to prepare an estimate of the owners' cost of the project. On June 6 I received from the secretary a letter informing me that this would mean an increase over the previous estimate in the expenditures the commission would incur in performing its duties. For that reason in the supplementary estimates that have been tabled a supplementary item has been included in order to cover that additional expenditure. There has been no other recommendation than the one for the money necessary to cover what the commissioners considered it was necessary to do. There have been no other recommendations about it to date.

I know that the commission realizes the government's anxiety to get the report at the earliest possible date. From conversations I know that the commissioners are doing their best to meet that desire. I should not like to fix a date. They have not been able to tell me just exactly when their work will be completed. I can say that it will not be within the next few days, and there will not be an opportunity of receiving or of communicating their report to members of parliament just at this time. I can assure the hon. member that we realize that not only the public of Saskatchewan but the public generally do not like to see unexplained delays in the performance of these tasks that are considered of general public interest. The commissioners fully realize that fact, just as we do. The best efforts will be put forward to avoid any justifiable criticism in that regard.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Did I understand from the Prime Minister that the report is expected? I understood that the commission contemplated the holding of public hearings in the province of Saskatchewan. Are those public hearings to be undertaken, and are they to commence soon?

Mr. St. Laurent: I cannot say whether or not there will be public hearings. My understanding is that the commissioners expressed to the government of Saskatchewan their readiness to provide public hearings if that was desired. I do not know whether there has been from the government of Saskatchewan any indication in that regard. That is not something that is going to hold matters up. Everything is proceeding as fast as it can be done. I am sure that if the government of Saskatchewan felt that public hearings were not absolutely necessary and that they might be apt to occasion delay, they would waive that matter.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not understand that was the suggestion of the government of Saskatchewan. I understood that the commissioners themselves suggested that they hold public hearings.

Mr. St. Laurent: They suggested that they would be quite ready to have public hearings if the government of Saskatchewan felt that it would be desirable to do so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION AS TO PROROGATION OR ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position now to tell us whether, when we finish the business that appears on the order paper, this house will be prorogued or adjourned?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is a matter which is at present being actively canvassed and considered. Within the next day or two I hope to be able to make an announcement about it to parliament.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

COLLECTION OF CLAIMS BY PROVINCES AGAINST ESTATES—QUESTION AS TO REPEAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the Old Age Security Act came into effect on January 1 of this year, is it the intention of the government to continue in force the earlier Old Age Pensions Act under which the provincial governments are now called upon to collect claims against many thousands of pensioners' estates, some of which would, of course, have arisen just a day or so before the new act came into effect?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. As he knows, the Old Age Pensions Act was a co-operative measure in which the provinces as well as the dominion government paid contributions, the dominion government to a substantial extent.

The government has written to all of the provinces asking whether, from their point of view, there is any objection to the repeal of the Old Age Pensions Act. To date only one province has replied to signify that it has no objection. Two provinces, Ontario and New Brunswick, have, however, raised certain issues. Those issues are now being discussed. As soon as the clearance has been obtained from the provinces, it is the government's intention to repeal the act.

STRAWBERRIES

QUESTION AS TO IMPORTATION FROM HOLLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to make a further report concerning the importation of strawberries from Holland?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, in reply to a request made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and also by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), I promised to get the information with regard to strawberries and it is as follows:

In recent weeks various complaints have engaged the attention of officials of this department of the depressing effect on processors' buying prices of quotations on Holland strawberries in SO_2.

According to our information the delivered duty paid cost of SO_2 strawberries at Montreal is 12¼ cents a pound for one variety and 13½ cents for another; and 14 cents f.o.b. Rotterdam or approximately 17½ cents a pound delivered duty paid at Montreal for frozen strawberries in 30-lb. tins.

The SO_2 product is usable only for second grade or "pectin" jam. Fresh or frozen berries are required for "pure" jam or for canning.

We are informed that no orders have been placed for Holland strawberries by Montreal or Quebec jam makers, but that with an abundant crop in sight processors are buying at 10 cents a pound, with some purchases as low as 8 cents. Hail yesterday afternoon will have shortened the supply in one main source, the Isle of Orleans.

In Ontario, where the provincial marketing board has set a minimum processors' buying price at 15 cents a pound against 18½ cents in 1951, we learn that processors' purchases have been mainly at 17 cents to 18 cents a pound; that drought has shortened the crop in principal commercial acreages; and that the jam manufacturers are long on strawberry jam and even have some carry-over of SO_2 strawberries from 1951; but that various small orders have been placed for SO_2 strawberries from Holland.

British Columbia canners and jam makers are buying local strawberries freely at 12 cents per pound. The production of No. 1 or "pure" jam is higher in this province than in eastern Canada. One large operator contacted this morning replied that no orders for Holland strawberries have been placed or are contemplated by his company, and expressed doubt that competitors will buy any against good supplies of locals at 12 cents a pound. Another, an extensive jam maker, made the same statement of his company's intentions and of doubt that any orders have been placed or will be placed for Holland strawberries. I think the statement indicates that we have supplies in Canada to meet requirements.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ALLOWANCES FOR WAR VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the third reading of Bill No. 181, respecting allowances for war veterans and their dependents.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

BELLEVILLE—INCORPORATION

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 366, to incorporate the Belleville harbour commissioners.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement on this bill?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr.

Speaker, I do not think that this bill will be found controversial but perhaps a short statement would be in order. The bill was introduced in the Senate and referred to a committee of the other place. It follows generally the form and terms of other bills to incorporate harbour commissioners, notably the one recently before this house dealing with the Port Alberni harbour commissioners.

It repeals chapter 35 of the statutes of 1889, an act respecting the harbour of Belleville, in the province of Ontario. It is considered that that statute is not adequate to meet present needs. The boundary lines are extended beyond those now in effect and will include the whole natural enlargement of the bay of Quinte. The proposed commission will consist of the mayor of Belleville and two commissioners appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I presume that there will be no objection to this bill, but I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that it should be sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for consideration. That was done with the bill to amend the Toronto Harbour Commissioners Act and I think it is a good practice to follow in connection with any of these harbour commission bills.

There would be an opportunity in the committee to give the proposal more careful study and anyone who wished to make representations against the bill would have an opportunity to do so. I realize that it is most unlikely there will be any opposition, but I think it is a good practice to refer such bills to the committee. The parliamentary assistant has given only a brief and sketchy explanation from which it is not possible for us to really decide as to the merits of the bill and I suggest that it be referred to the committee.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to referring this bill to a committee, but on the other hand perhaps some consideration should be given to the members of that committee in view of the fact that even the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has suggested that the bill is not controversial. It was referred to a committee of the other place at which time interested parties had an opportunity to appear and express their views. I understand that there were no representations made.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

I have discussed the bill with members whose ridings are close to this particular harbour, the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell) and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), the latter a member of the hon. member's own party. I should like to hear from other members of that committee as to whether they feel that it would be desirable to refer this bill to the committee. There is no objection that I know of, either from the city of Belleville or from any other source.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Chevrier moved that the house go into committee to consider the said bill.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, if you leave the chair it will then be too late to have the bill referred to the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may just add a word to what has been so well said by the parliamentary assistant: The principal people concerned in this legislation are, first, the members of the harbour commission, the members of the municipal corporation of the city of Belleville, and the hon. members of this house who have been referred to. They are anxious to have this bill put through. There is nothing contentious in it as it follows the same pattern as earlier bills. I do not think that any good purpose would be served by sending it to the committee. I hope the house will find it possible to consider it in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Green: Could the parliamentary assistant indicate the difference betwen this bill and the bill being repealed? Apparently there has been a harbour commission for sixty-three years.

Mr. Benidickson: I mentioned that the boundaries are being extended. The personnel of the commission will be the same, being the mayor of Belleville and two members appointed by the governor in council. The real difference is that the old act did not really incorporate the commission as such. There has been some litigation and it was held that certain leases entered into by the so-called Belleville harbour commissioner were not valid because there was not an incorporation under the old act.

Mr. Green: Is there any change in the borrowing powers?

Mr. Benidickson: No, the powers are very similar.

Mr. Green: I presume under the old act the commission had no legal power to operate if it was not a legal entity.

Mr. Benidickson: They had the power to borrow over the years. They functioned and acted as a corporation but did not sign their documents as three individuals which it was held they should have done rather than as a corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The lawyers have grown more critical.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On section 13—Lawsuits.

Mr. Green: Under clause 13, what will be the position with regard to any claims arising for actions taken or omitted prior to the passing of this bill?

Mr. Benidickson: I believe there has been a settlement of the litigation to which I referred and it is not anticipated that there will be further actions. The new harbour commission will have the right to make new leases which must be submitted for approval to the governor in council. No doubt they will want to validate the former agreements they made which were held to be somewhat faulty so far as strict legality is concerned.

Mr. Green: The bill has no retroactive effect?

Mr. Benidickson: It has no retroactive effect, and the litigation to which I referred is the only litigation of which we have knowledge.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 and 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Revenues of corporation.

Mr. Fraser: Can the parliamentary assistant say what the revenues were in 1951?

Mr. Benidickson: In the year ended December 31, 1951, harbour dues amounted to $17,757. Ordinary operating expenses amounted to $8,346 and expenditures that were considered capital were an additional $10,161, leaving a net deficit of $750 which of course was made up from previous surpluses.

Mr. Fraser: How much of the $8,346 was paid in salaries?

Mr. Benidickson: Wages and salaries amounted to $600.

Mr. Fraser: That included the commissioners' salaries, if any?

Mr. Benidickson: It included payment to the harbour master and such.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Expropriation proceedings under the Railway Act, R.S.C., c. 170.

Mr. Green: Clause 17 is the one giving the corporation the power to expropriate. Was that power contained in the old act or is this a new provision?

Mr. Benidickson: I would think that would be in the old act. I have not got it before me, but of course that is similar to other acts that have been passed by the house, notably the port of Alberni act to which I referred.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Power to borrow and issue securities.

Mr. Green: There appears to be no limit on the borrowing powers of the corporation. Is it not customary to set some ceiling?

Mr. Benidickson: They are the usual powers, but you will notice that they must obtain the approval of the governor in council.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Chevrier) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FINANCE

ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES RESPECTING CURRENCY, THE MINT AND THE EXCHANGE FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure intituled, "An act respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund," providing therein for certain administrative changes, and repealing the Currency Act, part II of the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act, sections twenty-eight, twenty-nine and thirty of the Bank of Canada Act and the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Abbott: At the convenience of the house I thought I would make a short statement when we are in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill which this resolution seeks authority to introduce is essentially threefold:

(1) to bring up to date the provisions of the old Currency Act;

(2) to bring up to date the legislative provisions relating to the Royal Canadian Mint; and

(3) to repeal the Foreign Exchange Control Act and in its stead bring back into force the general provisions of the Exchange Fund Act of 1935.

While the resolution appears to cover a wide and important range of subjects, it is only to provide for the introduction of a bill that consolidates and brings more up to date existing legislation dealing with the related subjects of currency, the mint and foreign exchange. It is fairly technical in character but introduces no changes of major significance. When the bill has been given second reading I would hope it would meet with the approval of the house that it should be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce in order that the technical provisions of the bill may be more fully explained before that committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Before the bill goes to the committee I should like to ask the minister to say a word at this stage about that part of the resolution which refers to the exchange fund.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I should have added that when I move second reading of the bill I will make a slightly more comprehensive statement than I am doing at the resolution stage. I merely indicated that when it has been given second reading I would hope it might be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, does the bill include the abolition or rescinding of that part of the Bank of Canada Act which covers the purchase of gold at $20.67?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: I am delighted to hear that.

Mr. Abbott: There is a provision which deals with that.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister outline in some detail the exact effect of these changes to the Bank of Canada Act? He must have the act before him and would he just give us a general comment on the effects?

Mr. Abbott: I felt that it would be more appropriate to deal with the provisions of the bill and the principle of the bill when I moved second reading. That will not be today but certainly it will be at an early date.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 390, respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

80. To provide capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board, $85,000,000.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three questions I should like to ask the minister with regard to this item which is for $85 million. The general purpose as I understand it is to provide assistance to war industry and I notice that in the supplementary estimates there is what appears to be a further vote of $25 million.

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Green: That would make a total of $110 million.

My first question is this: Has any consideration been given by the department to using some of this money to assist in bringing to Canada industry which would be useful for defence production and which we do not have in the country at the present time? There must be specialized industry in Great Britain and on the continent which could be of great help if it were to become established here in Canada, and I am wondering whether the vote is wide enough to give the department power to make expenditures for that purpose, and whether the government has any policy along that line.

It always seems to me so perfectly clear that if conditions are as bad as we believe them to be, and if they should finally result in a third world war, then the industries in Great Britain particularly and also those on the continent would be subject to atomic attack; and it would be very, very difficult for them to carry on their production. Just as a matter of safety there seems to be a good deal of merit in transplanting as many key industries as possible to this continent.

I do not intend to go into the matter further but I would ask the minister if he would deal with this question. I have one or two other questions as well.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Chairman, it is the policy to bring firms from the continent, and particularly from the United Kingdom, to Canada provided their production is needed in the defence program. The vote is not wide enough to bring a firm to Canada and provide capital assistance if the company has no place in the defence program. If the full production of a new plant in Canada is required for war production we bring it—and we have brought several plants here. One is the Sperry plant which makes a special line of instruments never before made in Canada. SKF make special roller bearings used in aircraft work. Lucas Rotax of the United Kingdom make fuel systems not only for aircraft built in Canada but also for aircraft built in the United States. That is a big industry. Steel Improvement makes blades for the turbines in airplane jet engines. Peacock Brothers make special equipment used in the naval escort vessel program. One very large capital expenditure is being made to expand the turbine production of English Electric. We had a small turbine production here in Canada and that is to be expanded very considerably. The turbine designed by English Electric in the United Kingdom is to be built here in quantities sufficient to supply the turbines for the escort vessel program.

Those are the examples that occur to me at the moment but I would say there is no provision in this vote to bring English talent or continental talent if the facility is not required for defence work.

Mr. Green: But it can be done under this vote?

Mr. Howe: Yes. My hon. friend will understand that all property acquired under this vote is property of the crown. New arrangements would have to be entered into if the present operator wishes to continue on a peacetime basis. The equipment is installed for war production only and rental agreements or purchase agreements would be necessary if the occupant wishes to use the same equipment for peacetime production.

Mr. Green: I take it there would not be a great deal of difficulty in working out some arrangement that would allow these firms to carry on in peacetime.

Mr. Howe: No. We try to get the best competitive prices but we also try to work out an arrangement with the occupant of the plant if he gives an indication that he can carry on successfully in peacetime.

Mr. Green: What part does the Department of Defence Production play in deciding whether or not a firm shall qualify for depreciation? I realize there must be great difficulties in working out a fair plan to follow out the policy, but I have had some suggestions from the west coast that the time has now come to widen the power for taking depreciation. Apparently some of the smaller firms find that they are not able to qualify for the depreciation, and it may be that we are now in a position where some provision should be made for firms which, to date, have not qualified for such depreciation. Will the minister tell us what the situation is in this regard?

Mr. Howe: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the issuance of certificates providing for deferred depreciation is administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce, but probably that does not matter so far as this discussion is concerned. The regulations governing the issuing of certificates are fairly well outlined by the orders in council which have been tabled. There are certain types of production that are regarded as essential which automatically qualify a firm for the depreciation allowance. Then there are others that can qualify if they are essential to the defence effort; that is a qualification for the judgment of the minister. Some latitude is allowed in the case of a plant that can contribute, even indirectly, to the defence effort.

The list of conditions providing approval has been broadened from time to time, and I believe we are getting near a point where consideration can be given to repealing that legislation or at least rendering it inoperative. The situation has been recently made uncertain by the steel strike. The purpose of the regulations was twofold: first, to check the building boom which was contributing to inflation, and second, to conserve materials for the defence effort. Probably the first objective is no longer as important as it was at the time the regulations were issued, but the second objective becomes more important as a result of the stoppage of steel supplies from the United States. We shall have to re-assess the effect of the steel strike before we can arrive at a termination date.

I believe that at this time a termination of the regulations is indicated rather than a further relaxation. It would be difficult to be fair if the regulations are relaxed further. Within the limits of the regulations now, we can have an administrative staff that can establish a sharp dividing line between projects that qualify and projects that do not qualify. If the regulations were broadened it would be difficult to find that sharp dividing line.

Mr. Green: The minister thinks that once the steel strike is settled, it might be possible to remove the restriction altogether?

Mr. Howe: I would not like to indicate that that could be done immediately. I say that after the strike is over we can assess the supply situation, and probably determine a date at which the regulation would be removed. I would expect that termination date would be a few months subsequent to arriving at the decision.

Mr. Green: The situation was put very clearly by one of my correspondents. He said:

> . . . we feel the restrictions should be released to give all industry an opportunity to purchase capital equipment to keep their plants up to date and modernize their operations so they will be in a position to be at their best as far as manufacturing is concerned, in preparation for any eventuality which might come along.

I think that this particular firm—I have no doubt others are in the same position—is finding it difficult to keep equipment up to date because the depreciation is deferred. I would hope it would be possible fairly soon to do away with these restrictions.

Mr. Howe: I might point out that the penalty for not being able to write off depreciation immediately is not severe so far as equipment is concerned. A firm loses nothing in the long run because the equipment is eventually all written off. Nevertheless, as I have said, consideration will be given later in this year to removing the provision.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am interested in the statement of the minister respecting the encouragement to the introduction into Canada of industries that have been established in Great Britain and the countries of continental Europe. He has named a number of such industries, and it would appear to me that those industries represent a considerable amount of capital and employment, having regard to the volume of materials required in those industries. I would point out to the minister the special claim of the maritimes with respect to the establishment of new industries of this kind. The maritime provinces, and especially Nova Scotia, have not fared well in this respect in either of the wars—in fact, since confederation. Many of our native industries have been transferred to central Canada and in recent years we have suffered greatly from a lack of industry.

I recognize that the minister has given some encouragement to the establishment of defence industries in that part of Canada within the last few years. He has always expressed a willingness to expand that policy. I want to make an appeal again to the minister for special consideration by his department with respect to the establishment of such industries in the maritime provinces. If the minister has some statement that would be of interest to that part of Canada, I think it would be quite appropriate for him to make it now and I would be greatly interested in any statement relating to the transfer of industries from Great Britain or continental Europe to the maritime provinces.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, an effort is made to distribute capital assistance as widely as possible across Canada. I believe we have had some success in the maritime provinces. I have not a list before me at the moment, but Fairey Aviation of Canada has been established substantially through capital assistance. Employment in the plant is expanding. Cossor (Canada) Limited have had capital assistance in establishing themselves in Halifax, and that is an industry that was transported from England. It is thriving in the maritime provinces. In the town of Amherst, which my friend knows something about, substantial capital assistance has been given to Enamel and Heating Products Limited, to allow them to make aircraft components on a large scale which will give employment to people of the area. The Trenton Steel Works has been assisted to the extent of $2·9 million. That is for the production of rotor forgings for our shipbuilding program. The Saint John Drydock has been given substantial capital assistance. There are other firms, and I am sorry that I did not bring a list, but I think the hon. member will find that if there is any firm in the maritimes that is ambitious to undertake a defence contract, every encouragement will be given and capital assistance granted, if that is indicated as a requirement.

Mr. Thatcher: There is one matter I should like the minister to clear up for me, if he can. It is in connection with aircraft production, especially as related to T-33A. I noticed from the evidence given in the special committee that in the United States these aircraft cost about $93,500, and yet when we build them in Canada they cost us $277,000. It would seem to me that in most instances where we are building these in Canada, it is costing us about $115 million. If that is not correct I wish the minister would give an explanation of it, because it seems a pretty serious procedure to me.

Mr. Howe: It is very difficult to assess costs against aircraft. The tooling up has to be charged against the first quantity, and the costs then come down substantially. The costs here are shown as pre-production, $50,000; production costs, $90,648,000; tooling costs, $10,643,000; royalties $2,137,000. Then there is about $15 million more for spares and ground handling equipment. The cost per aircraft will depend entirely on the number that are required. At the moment we have an order from the R.C.A.F. It was not possible to purchase the planes outside Canada. They just were not available, and therefore to carry out our duties for procurement we are tooling up to manufacture the aircraft. If we can write the tooling costs off against twice the number of planes now on order the costs per plane will decrease. My information is that in another contract that Canada has for the Sabre aircraft our manufacturing costs in Canada are slightly lower than the manufacturing costs in the United States. I think probably when the final accounting is made on the T-33, it will show the same results.

Mr. Thatcher: May I add one more sentence? Mr. Drury said:

> Our known requirements at the moment do not extend beyond this figure of 576 for the three-year program.

I would take it from that there will not be any more of these planes built. It seems to me that we would be better off to go to the United States and buy these. I suggest that they could save money. The sum of $115 million is a fantastic amount to pay simply so that the planes may be made in Canada.

Mr. Howe: I would agree that we might be better off to go and buy them in the United States but there is an "if" there: if we could buy them. But we have information that the production capacity in the United States is fully booked for the foreseeable duration. Mr. Drury states the Canadian requirement. In almost every case of Canadian production there is a subsequent requirement from elsewhere tacked on to the Canadian production. For example, we have the Canadian production of Sabres; we also have production for the United Kingdom of Sabres and we also have the United States requirements for Sabres manufactured in Canada. It is very difficult to theorize about the production of aircraft because development of programs change the situation very materially. What looks to be an expensive aircraft at one stage turns out to be a low-cost aircraft at another stage, owing to the fact that the pre-production costs and the tooling costs are spread over a greater number of aircraft, and that the improving skills of the workers bring down the cost of producing subsequent aircraft.

If at some time my hon. friend is interested I shall show him a typical production curve which discloses a very sharp drop during the production of the first 100 aircraft and a decelerating drop carrying on throughout the length of the contract. Unless you can foresee at what point on the curve the production will be terminated, it is impossible to give an accurate forecast of the cost of the aircraft.

My hon. friend wants to close off at the Canadian requirements and say, that is it, that is what we are going to charge Canada, then it would be cheaper if we could buy them somewhere else. I would agree in theory, but I am not prepared to take that under the circumstances. Our experience is that if we have aircraft in production there is always a market for them during the defence build-up.

Mr. Low: Have we been able to get the engines?

Mr. Howe: Yes, we have the engines.

Mr. Low: Up until recently it was difficult?

Mr. Howe: We are only scheduling the building of aircraft to meet the availability of engines, but for the T-33 we are using a British engine which is in relatively good supply.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister, I think, is quite certain that we are going right into a war; at least we are getting ready to go into a war. In connection with providing for Canada's defence needs in case of war, while sugar supply is just a little off the beaten path, I think it is fitting that we bring it up here. The minister remembers something about our sugar difficulties during the last war. He remembers that instead of expanding our production of beet sugar, which we neglected to do, we had to depend on outside sources. The result was that sugar was rigidly rationed considerably below the ration allowed in the United States during the war.

It looks to me as though in all the fine things the minister is saying about defence industries he is making no provision for an adequate supply of sugar for the Canadian people if we cannot get that sugar from abroad. In case war breaks out no one can possibly foresee the difficulty which will be encountered. Any ships that we get from outside Canada will be carrying other things. The bottoms that we would ordinarily use to bring sugar into the country will be used for other purposes. All these considerations, it seems to me, should indicate to us the wisdom of making adequate provision for the production of our own sugar. It would not take any more than probably $50 million wisely invested all across Canada, in the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and the prairie provinces, where beet sugar can be produced, to provide the factories to produce the sugar that will be needed during the next war, rendering us secure.

It may be argued that we shall not have any need for this productive capacity after the war, but I would say that we shall have much more need for that kind of production after the war than we shall have for the type of production that is being envisaged in the factories that we are building for aircraft and other munitions of war. I am just wondering whether or not the minister has given attention to the advisability of expanding Canada's beet sugar production facilities to meet possible needs such as I have indicated.

Mr. Howe: While Canada is not self-sufficient in sugar, the British empire is self-sufficient in sugar. I cannot think of any worse calamity to the West Indies than for Canada to produce all her sugar requirements from beet sugar. The West Indies are dependent on this market. The market has been open to them and was open to them during the second world war. While we did have to be a little careful—perhaps it would be good for most of us to be a little careful about the amount of sugar we take—the Canadian food supply has not been seriously crippled by lack of sugar. Canada is a trading nation, and I think we should avoid trying to become self-sufficient in anything just for the sake of doing that. I think we should produce those things that we can produce most economically and furnish a market to other allied countries for the things that they produce in surplus, hoping that they will continue to furnish a market for the things that Canada produces in surplus. Of all the countries of the world Canada is in the least danger of being crippled in the matter of food supply, and I think it would be unwise to spend any part of this vote for stepping up Canada's food supply.

Mr. Blackmore: I appreciate the minister's position. It is the orthodox one that was told me fifteen years ago. I believe it is fallacious, nevertheless, and I will tell the minister why. It was not very long ago that he gave a talk in Montreal in which I thought he displayed much wisdom. In that talk he said we were endeavouring to decrease our vulnerability as a nation. That must mean that Canada is getting more and more to the point where she is able to produce what she needs. What other meaning could the minister have in mind in using the word "vulnerability"? While Canada is safe in the main in respect of food, the one important food in which she is not safe in the event of a serious turn in the world situation is this very item of sugar. For Canada to be vulnerable in respect of sugar is utterably fantastic when you consider the fact that Canada can economically produce sugar in large quantities in so many areas of the Dominion of Canada.

There is another respect in which I think the minister should qualify his position; it is this: He speaks of our keeping ourselves free from producing sugar in order that we may provide a market for some other countries. That is a fine, altruistic attitude to take, but it just happens that we do not take that attitude with respect to any other commodity than sugar, as far as I know.

Mr. Howe: Oh, yes; we do.

Mr. Blackmore: I would be interested to be instructed. But as far as I know sugar is the only food which we can easily produce and which we do not produce in adequate quantity to supply our own needs in case of war. That state of affairs requires quite a good deal of justification.

There is one more aspect to this thing. We are rapidly getting to the point—and I am sure the minister, with the breadth of vision that he has, sees that the time is coming when this will be the situation—when there are not going to be enough external markets for the production of goods in the Americas. No matter how we try to find external markets enough, we are not going to be able to do so. We must have some other means of distributing the production of this continent into the hands of the needy people through the world; by that I mean some other method than the one we have been using up to the present time. I am not going to go into details as to how that is to be done, but it must be done. If men like the minister are not thinking about how to do it, probably they will wish they had done so, and so will the people who are relying on them with such complete confidence as we are relying on the minister at the present time. We simply must find a way of getting the surplus production from America into the hands of the 1,500 million people who are obliged to go to bed hungry every night. When a means of that kind is discovered, it will not be at all difficult to distribute the sugar which is produced by the British commonwealth. Until a means of distribution such as the one I have indicated is discovered, there will be difficulty for everybody to find markets—in the British commonwealth as well as in the United States.

I do not think that the minister's argument there is particularly valid; I do not think it is nearly as valid as are most of his arguments. I still maintain that we would be well advised to make provision now, before we get into too many difficulties, for the production of at least all the sugar that Canada needs.

There is one more little aspect to this thing which is extremely important. As the minister knows, while the war was on we were told that we could not increase the ration of sugar for Canadians because we needed the sugar for various military purposes. The minister knows those military purposes quite as well as I do, or better. Those military needs for sugar were exceedingly urgent. They were extremely important. Why not have all of our sugar produced in Canada so as to assist in supplying our military sugar requirements? I think that is an argument which will appeal to the minister, as he thinks it over. So I say once more in this chamber, just as I said many times before world war II: Let us get ourselves ready to produce our own sugar. It will be a blessing to us from every standpoint and it can do us no harm whatsoever.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr. Blackmore: One hon. member says "Oh, yes". I shall be glad to take the hon. member on in a debate on this subject.

Mr. Hellyer: How will our friends get Canadian dollars to buy our products?

Mr. Blackmore: If I caught the hon. member's question correctly, he asks what the difficulty is. May I point out that one year it cost 28 million United States dollars to buy our sugar. I think my hon. friend will recognize that that is a serious item. If there is any one really serious anxiety to Canada, it is the danger of an adverse trade balance with the United States. Nearly every bit of sugar we buy from abroad works down to United States dollars in one way or another.

Mr. Hellyer: How?

Mr. Blackmore: A great deal of it is brought from areas that require United States dollars. The important thing is for the hon. member to read up on the subject and to come back here; then I will debate with him on this subject. I maintain that there is no single line of development economically in Canada that will be more in the interests of Canada than the development of the beet sugar industry all across this country.

Mr. Green: Has the minister checked the situation with regard to the manufacture of electronics on the west coast? Apparently about two weeks ago an eastern firm by the name of Canadian Aviation Electronics Limited announced, with quite a big splash, in Vancouver, that they would be providing all the electronic radar needs for west coast defence. There are already several firms there which I believe are well able to do this type of work. They resent this other firm walking in, presumably with the contracts. I do not know what the actual picture is; but perhaps the minister can tell the committee just what has happened there.

Mr. Howe: With regard to the firm mentioned, no order has been given for production on the west coast. I am told that the firm denied that they made the statement that was quoted in the paper. I read the first announcement with somewhat of a shock. There are several firms on the west coast which made a fine contribution in electronics in the last war. Those firms are being used in the present defence effort. The trouble with the electronic program has been that considerable time is required for design and development before equipment can be put into production. That program is really just coming into production now. I think that firms on the west coast which are capable of doing that work can look forward to the same sort of treatment which they received in the last war which I think they found to be quite satisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the defence estimates were before the committee on the last occasion, the minister was good enough to arrange for the deposit of the contracts which were discussed that evening. Among those contracts was one with Avro, and with regard to that contract I want to ask some questions. The contract actually was considerably earlier in date than, I think, the other contracts which were deposited. However, I do not know that we need to go into that matter. Actually I think the contract was made before the passing of the Defence Production Act. But again, as I say, I do not think I need to labour that point. What I want to do in general is to ask the minister some questions about the financing of Avro—that is A. V. Roe (Canada) Limited—and also to ask him some questions about the production.

First of all, my general objective is to find out how much public money has gone into Avro; how much, if any, private money has gone in, and the results achieved. One of the motives in working up the Avro enterprise was, I think, a natural and proper motive, namely doing our own construction here. Mr. Deisher, vice president and general manager of A. V. Roe Limited, speaking in February, 1946, said this:

> We are going to build aircraft designed to suit Canadian conditions. Canada has always built the other fellow's product. Now we are going to have aircraft that are Canadian from the drafting board to the stars.

Here are my questions. The first question I should like to ask is this. What were the arrangements with Avro in 1945 when the government made available the real estate, buildings and equipment previously controlled by Victory Aircraft? That is my understanding of the first transaction. I suppose it can be worked out in terms of investment. There must have been a figure at that time. Will the minister answer that question?

Mr. Howe: At the close of the war we were able to sell the Canadair plant to private interests and we were anxious to do something with Avro. The government was hardly in a position to enter into competitive aircraft manufacturing. The plant was called Victory Aircraft in those days. The Avro interests came out from England to discuss the matter and after a good deal of discussion we decided to let them operate the Victory plant on a temporary basis to see whether they could make a success of it.

An arrangement was entered into in 1945 that they would take over the management of the plant at a rental of 50 per cent of the profits on the operation. There was the usual peacetime amount of aircraft repair work to be carried out. At the same time we asked them to take over the work that the government had been doing in the development of a jet engine. The production of the jet engine was financed at the Avro plant. There were also supplies in the plant which had to be liquidated, and Avro took over that responsibility for government account. That arrangement carried on until 1948 and I think a modest profit was made in each year, 50 per cent of which was paid to the government as rental.

By 1948 the work in the plant had been liquidated; that is, the government stocks in the plant had been liquidated and we entered into negotiations with Avro to purchase the plant. The result was that the plant was purchased by Avro at a sum close to $2 million, which was paid in cash.

Then in 1949 the R.C.A.F. through the Minister of National Defence came forward with a proposal to undertake the design of a long-range, twin-engine, all-weather fighter, and of the jet engine to power the fighter. It was the wish of the R.C.A.F. that Canada be independent as far as the defence of Canada in the air was concerned. It was felt that there was no existing aeroplane suitable to meet Canadian requirements, which was the coverage of long distances without refuelling. Therefore that work was assigned to A. V. Roe and has been carried out by them subsequently. The engine and the aircraft are now coming into volume production.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I understand it, from 1945 until 1948 A. V. Roe was on a kind of agency-rental basis under which they paid rent out of the earnings. Then in 1948 they paid $2 million cash. How much was the government investment at that time? Presumably there would be a figure on your books indicating that.

Mr. Howe: It was about $6 million. The plant was bought for $2 million. My hon. friend will appreciate that a special purpose plant cannot be sold for the full value when there is no work in sight to justify the investment of $6 million. It must be sold at a discount. We were anxious to bring some United Kingdom designing experts in to Canada and it was decided that it would be good business for the government to sell that plant to Avro for $2 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What advances have Avro had since that time? One hears various figures, some of which I am sure are exaggerated, but there must be a specific figure of the total advances up to the present time.

Mr. Howe: Since Avro has been the agent of the government to build an engine plant there has been an authorized expenditure of $37,797,000 to date. That engine plant is separate from the A.V. Roe property, as my hon. friend probably knows. It is in Malton, but in a different area. That engine plant is wholly owned by the government. Expenditures have been authorized to the extent of $5,580,000 for the expansion of the aircraft facilities at the old plant that Avro own. Pre-production expenses at the present time stand at $35,492,050 and total capital pre-production and development $104,277,600.

Mr. Low: Does that include the $37 million?

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is the authorized expenditure for buildings and tools bought for government account and owned by the government; that is capital included in this vote.

Mr. Adamson: That is on the aircraft, not on the engine?

Mr. Howe: Both.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me see if I have these figures right. There was the original amount of $37 million. What is the operating arrangement in connection with that As I understand it, the government set up this plant and Avro was to operate it.

Mr. Howe: That contract has not been finalized. There will be a fee paid to Avro for operating the plant, but it has not been worked out as yet.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When was the plant begun?

Mr. Howe: It was begun about the summer of 1950 and is just being completed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me see if I have these figures correct. The first figure I have is $37 million; then there is a figure of $5 million; then there was the pre-production figure of $12 million, making a total of $54 million. Then I understood the minister added $73 million, which would give a total of $127 million. Am I right?

Mr. Howe: No; I think I can straighten it out. Capital investment to date is $27,163,200; development expenses for both engine and aircraft, $41,622,350; pre-production expenses, $35,492,050. There is a figure here of $17,182,000 for production of aircraft and spares. Total payments to date amount to $121,459,700.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I gather from the minister that apart from the actual expenditure payments there are certain authorizations outstanding.

Mr. Howe: I gave the authorization for capital account and I also gave the expenditures for capital account. The difference of about $12 million represents certain development work that was not paid for when these figures were compiled.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): So the expenditure up to the moment is roughly $120 million. Does that include the figure of $16 million which the minister gave us in the committee on May 30?

Mr. Howe: What was the $16 million for?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At page 2783 of Hansard for May 30 the minister said:

> This year the vote is $85 million, which includes a carry-over of $66 million from last year. That is allocated as follows . . .

Then among the various companies there is an amount of $16,176,000 for the A. V. Roe jet engine plant.

Mr. Howe: It does not include that. That was a forecast of capital expenditures for the new year. That has not been authorized yet. It is subject to review and it probably will be cut down materially.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But something of that $16 million should be added to the $120 million?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do these figures include the whole of the amount mentioned in the letter of August 18, 1950, which amended the original contract of May 9, 1949, and which increased the original amount from $6,450,000 to $19,876,000? Is that figure of $19,876,000, which is included in the letter of August 18, 1950, included in this $130 million?

Mr. Howe: It has been included to the extent that the money has been spent. I gave my hon. friend all the money that has been paid to A. V. Roe for every purpose up to date.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wanted to be sure that it covered that.

Mr. Howe: It is difficult to sort out the bits and pieces here but I have tried to give the over-all figure.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am interested in that figure. As a matter of fact it is twice as much as I thought. I want to find out something about production. I understand that originally the plant had two or three objectives. One was the Chinook engine which, for reasons we need not go into, was not proceeded with. Then there was the jet liner and the Orenda engine. I am interested in the Orenda engine. There were some flowery speeches made about it although not by the minister. He did not make any flowery speeches but some were made and I should now like to get some facts. When did the Orenda make its first test flight? First let me read an extract from the letter of August 18, 1950, addressed to the A. V. Roe company and signed by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. It reads as follows:

> It is contemplated that the additional capital expenditure authorized by this letter—

That is the amount to which I previously referred.

> —will permit the following increases in production but no authorization in respect to production is given in this letter.

Mr. Howe: I should like to point out to my hon. friend that that letter is marked "secret". It got into the file by mistake but there is no need to read it in parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is nothing I want to do less than to read a secret letter. I got it along with the contracts. Actually, with deference to the minister, I would not have thought this information was very secret but if the minister wants me to stop reading the letter I am agreeable.

Mr. Howe: I would prefer that it should not go on Hansard.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I will ask my next question. When did the Orenda make its first test flight?

Mr. Howe: It is difficult to say. The engine ran for a thousand hours or more in static tests and then was put in what is called a flying test bed. In other words, it was put in a Lancaster plane that had two internal combustion engines. It was flown there and finally was put in a commercial aircraft and flown about a year ago, I believe. I went to Toronto to see the first CF-100 powered with an Orenda engine fly about a year ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am informed that there were tests as far back as January, 1950. Am I wrongly informed?

Mr. Howe: The static testing of the engine or type testing was completed in 1950. The bringing of an engine into being from zero is a very lengthy process. If my hon. friend were to compare it with anybody else's engine from zero to full production he would find that it compares very favourably. If you try to get the story of this engine by itself it sounds like a long time, and I may say that it sounds like a long time to me.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can believe that.

Mr. Howe: However, if I look up the record of any other engine I find that the time is about the same.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not setting myself up as an expert. I am merely asking questions. I realize what the minister says is true, that it does take a long time, but there is such a thing as a long time being too long. Again I am only asking questions. When was the first actual order placed?

Mr. Howe: We were expecting to be examined on capital assistance. If we had expected to be examined on production we would have brought different documents. I am afraid I cannot give that information, but when you are moving from development into production contracts are not very important. You place a production contract when you are sure you are in production but before that you are working on development. I do not remember when the first production contract was made. I have something here with respect to ten pre-production aircraft but that is not a production contract.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to be un-co-operative but I am very anxious to get this information. I was interested in the minister's statement a moment ago when he said he was inclined to think it was a rather long time. I have forgotten his exact words. I am very anxious to know exactly what the time involved was. I have certain questions with regard to the contract and production situation and if the minister has not the figures I would suggest that this item might stand. There are other items with which we could proceed. I do want these figures and I think we should have them.

Mr. Howe: I may say in general that we are now in production although it is true we are not up to capacity. We are producing a commercial Orenda engine and we expect to be up to capacity by the end of the present calendar year. There is every indication that when we are at capacity the cost of the engine, including all development and pre-production costs, will compare with engines of the same thrust.

There is an active demand for this engine. We need it ourselves. We would like to power the Sabre with it and we intend to do so. When we can do that we will have a much better aircraft than the one we are producing now because the Orenda is more powerful than the American engines we are now putting in the Sabre aircraft. We also require Orendas to match the production of the Canuck, the airplane for which the engine was developed.

We believe we have a very useful engine. Our pre-production costs are not out of line we find, and everything indicates that the price of the engine will be in parallel with competitive engines and that the operation will develop into a profitable operation.

If my hon. friend wants to go into a complicated subject such as this is—and I am sure that no one else in the house does—then if he will sit down with our accountants I am sure we can go through it and check each stage. I cannot do that here. I sit down with my accountants and try to get the thing in my mind and to keep the situation in focus, but there is a great mass of detail and I do not think he can get the information that he wants by questioning me. I am sure that he cannot because I do not know all the answers. There is a very considerable amount of detail when you produce an airplane and an engine and go through the development, testing, pre-production, and tooling stages.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am very interested in what the minister says and although he does not know it he is making me more and more anxious to get some of these facts. I do not think he suggests that there is any difficulty in getting the answer to my question. It was: When was the first order actually placed? I want those figures and I suggest that the item stand until three o'clock. I want the figures and I have been surprised and interested in the figures we have received already.

I had in mind, after making the best inquiries I could, as I have said earlier this morning, the figure of $120 million, very different from which the minister gave us earlier. I had a figure about half that in my mind which was all I had been able to get up to the moment. I am interested in these figures and I am equally interested in the figures on production. I am grateful too for the information we have had.

Mr. Howe: I might point out to my hon. friend that he is talking about an engine made in a government plant for government account. Everything in that engine plant has been done for a government account. I do not know why he is anxious to know when the order was placed. I suppose we would give a contract to a privately owned plant if the work were performed there—but he is talking about Orenda engines built in a government-owned plant with which no one but the government is concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am rather surprised at the minister's last comment—that he does not know why I want to ask these questions. If I am the only one who is interested it is too bad. There are a lot of people who ought to be interested and I think this is a matter of importance. We should know what we have received for over $120 million. I accept the general statement that the minister has made that it takes a long time to produce a new type of engine. We have had very flattering references to this engine but I am just asking for simple facts. When did we give the first contract? What has happened since, and so on? Those are very simple questions which I am sure the department can answer and I suggest to the minister that I am not asking anything unreasonable when I ask to have answers to those questions. I suggest that the item stand until three o'clock.

Mr. Howe: I have no objection to that but I might point out that the questions asked have nothing to do with the item. The item is capital expenditure. I am prepared to give you every fact about capital expenditure but my hon. friend is asking about production figures and there is nothing in this vote that covers production. Production is paid for by national defence and they are the proper people to ask about production figures.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister surprises me doubly. I would have thought if I had asked national defence, they would have said: Ask defence production, they are looking after the carrying out of the contracts. I am also surprised that the minister should say that we should not be interested in what we are getting for our money. The minister in effect says that we should not ask that, or that if we should ask we should ask someone else. I find that a very great surprise.

Mr. Howe: Life is full of surprises.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am interested and I hope I am not wholly unreasonable in wanting to know what we have received for this $120 million. The minister has made some very general comments which I am sure are interesting but they do not answer these specific questions. I think I will understand the matter when I get the answers to these questions. If the minister agrees, I suggest that the item stand until three o'clock.

The Chairman: I understood that the hon. member for York West had a question to ask.

Mr. Adamson: Yes, my question concerns the assistance to machine tool production. I have had an opportunity to visit some of our defence plants in the last year and everywhere I went the one cry, which was I think universal, was that there is a shortage of machine tools.

Mr. Chairman, the economy of this country has now reached the stage where a growing machine tool industry must be part of that economy, and I want to ask the minister what if any assistance he has given to the establishment and the enlargement of machine tool industry in Canada. I realize that machine tools, like jet engines, are not something you can produce by turning a switch. They require a very great deal of tooling up and a very great number of experts.

In England there are some firms which have been at the production of machine tools for generations, and one firm, I understand, has now been in part at least taken over by the United Kingdom government. I refer to Herbert Alfred Limited of Birmingham, one of the major machine tool builders, and one of the very finest in the world.

I wonder whether it would be possible to have a subplant or branch of that factory or organization established in Canada. I mention this because all the production plants, almost universally, have a tremendously high opinion of the product of this firm. They just simply cannot get enough of those machine tools. As a matter of fact they cannot get enough of the United Kingdom machine tools.

I realize that everything has been done to pep up or step up production of machine tools and to get English machine tools in Canada, but apparently United Kingdom production is such that it is unlikely we are going to get machine tools from the United Kingdom in any great volume. Therefore, it would seem to me desirable, Mr. Chairman, to assist in capital expenditure for enlargement of our machine tool industry in Canada. I just wonder whether the minister has any information to give to the committee on this matter.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the machine tool industry of course is a private industry like any other. We have a healthy machine tool industry in this country. If any manufacturer of machine tools wishes to expand his plant to take care of government business only we will give capital assistance, and that has been done. My hon. friend will understand, however, that we do not just give capital assistance so that the machine tool man can build any kind of machine tool that he likes. If he receives capital assistance we own the machine tools, we own the plant and it can only work for the department. In other words, it must be used in business for the department. If the manufacturer wants to use it for something else, he must buy it or rent it. The machine tool industry is not the type of industry particularly adapted to capital assistance, though we have given capital assistance on two or three occasions.

The hon. member talks about the government bringing out plants from England. We depend on private industry. I think if the government brought out a machine tool manufacturer and set him up here in competition with existing industry, it might be a bit difficult. We do not do that. If a firm from the old country comes here and can do a job that we require to have done, that firm would qualify for capital assistance.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say how much capital assistance has been given the machine tool industry?

Mr. Howe: Not very much—it depends upon how you look at it. I do not want to be quoted by the opposition as saying a million is nothing. The capital assistance is probably around a million dollars. I take back that "not very much" and shall call it "that huge sum that weighs so heavily on the minds of the opposition."

Mr. Adamson: I only mentioned this one firm because I understood it was in rather peculiar circumstances. The control of this firm is now in the hands of the United Kingdom government.

Mr. Howe: They used to have a socialist government, but we are a free enterprise government.

Mr. Adamson: I entirely agree with the minister that it is not the business of government to own a plant, except where absolutely necessary.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Greenwood has asked to have this item stand—

Mr. Howe: A very unreasonable request, but perhaps we can agree to it.

[Mr. Adamson.]

The Chairman: The minister has said that some of the questions asked by the hon. member are not in order. This is a very important vote, and I should like to take the next few minutes at our disposal to examine the matter of order. It seems to me that this vote provides for $85 million for capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works—and so on.

Now, I understand the hon. member for Greenwood is trying to obtain some background information which would lead him to the capital assistance provided, perhaps to the company he mentioned, under this vote. If that is so, that is in order. But as the minister pointed out, when he gets into the details as to the record of the company on technical production, there may be some difficulties there in so far as relevancy is concerned. Perhaps the hon. member could enlighten the Chair on those points.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You flatter me, Mr. Chairman, but I shall at any rate express my views. When this matter was up before, we asked the minister for these contracts, which he was good enough to arrange. This was one of the contracts, and, quite apart from the contract to which we have reference, $16 million went to A. V. Roe.

The minister made quite a point of the fact that the money goes into property which remains the property of the government. It seems to me that the mere fact that this is government property which is being operated or used does not get away from the fact that A. V. Roe Canada is actually operating this property. After lunch, I hope we can find out a little of the basis upon which this is done, because it seems to me that the minister told us that no management contract had been entered into since 1949.

My point is this. Surely, when we are spending these huge amounts of money, we have not only the right but the duty to find out whether they are being successfully spent. This is a private company, but supposing it was absolutely at arm's length, which I do not think A. V. Roe is, but supposing it was, surely we would be entitled to ask something about the record of the company which is using this huge amount of government property. Actually, you cannot get any record of the A. V. Roe Company through any of the commercial agencies, because it is a privately-owned company. When you look it up, you find nothing. The only way we can find out about the efficiency of A. V. Roe, which I submit is quite relevant, is to ask something about the record of this plant which is using this very equipment running to the tune of $127 million.

Mr. Howe: Oh, no, the equipment did not cost $127 million. That is it, you see; we release a few wild figures and then spread them on Hansard quite out of context in a way that may be quoted in the papers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister will allow me, I checked the figures. I read them to him and asked if they were correct. The general figure we had was in the neighbourhood of $120 million.

Mr. Howe: For what?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have the figures which the minister gave us. First of all, there was $37 million which was to be put up for the engine plant; secondly, $12 million which he called pre-production figures; thirdly, what he called a production figure of $73 million. Those are the figures that the minister gave me. I do not like to use inaccurate figures, and I checked the addition. If the minister wants to go back and change those figures—

Mr. Howe: You referred to the facilities costing $116 million, and the facilities did not cost $116 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister correct it, then.

Mr. Howe: The facilities cost $37 million, which we have approved, and of which $24 million has been paid. That is all the facilities cost. The rest will be for work and materials which will be translated into finished planes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I say that one way or another $120 million of public moneys have gone into this operation, plants and facilities, which enable it to carry on. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. Howe: If you would say, facilities, materials and work in progress, I would be satisfied.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): All right, facilities, materials and work in progress. I am as anxious to be accurate as the minister is. If I may go back, then, and complete my argument, here is $120 million of public money which is to some extent ventured in this matter. We cannot get any reports on A. V. Roe Canada, which is a privately-owned company. I submit with great earnestness, the only way we can find out about the efficiency with which this money is being spent is to get the facts as to the records. I was asking when we gave the first contract, and I propose to follow that up by asking other questions concerning what has happened since and what the situation is at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: It is one o'clock.

The Chairman: Perhaps I may add a last comment. I do not wish the hon. member to infer that I was attempting to interfere in any way with his duty to scrutinize the transaction or examine the record of whatever firm has been dealing with the government. My duty is to see that the hon. member's duty is performed at the right moment. That is my duty, and that is the only one I am performing at the moment. What puzzles me is how the hon. member is investigating the expenditure of $120 million on an $85 million vote. There must be a certain amount of that vote which is capital assistance provided to the A. V. Roe Company. I do not know how much that is, but if for instance it were $20 million, to be strictly relevant to this item the only thing that should be examined is the $20 million of capital assistance provided to the A. V. Roe. I wanted to inform the hon. member of that.

If, as background information for the examination of this $20 million of capital assistance provided by this vote, the hon. member wants to ask the minister certain questions, which he did ask, I believe that is in order, but always coming back finally to the discussion of the $20 million provided as capital assistance under this vote.

There is this matter of production. There may be a place somewhere along the line where questions can be asked about production; that is, the time at which the order was placed and other questions pertaining to the production process. There must be a place where such questions can be asked. The Minister of Defence Production has said that they should not be asked on this vote. Well, let us find out which other vote. I am sure the hon. member will be able to wait until such an occasion arises to ask his question as to production.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I just reiterate what I said a moment ago very briefly? Surely the whole purpose of defence production, as I understand it, is to serve national defence in getting this very kind of thing done.

As to your comment, Mr. Chairman, how we can investigate $120 million in a vote of $85 million, I think you gave the answer perfectly. The money which is going in now is going into the same pot into which other large amounts have gone. I submit finally: We have no other test of the efficiency of the spending than to find out what is produced. There are people who say we have spent this money and got nothing at all. I do not say that. They say we have got nothing in the way of actual aircraft in action. I am not saying that. But I do want to find out, and I hope the minister will not maintain a contrary position, because I think he will acknowledge that these are fair questions.

Mr. Howe: The next logical question is, how many planes have you produced? And the next logical question is, how many engines have you produced? My hon. friend knows better than I do—he has been told repeatedly in committee—that there are security regulations covering these matters, and the answer cannot be given. He may dwell on it from three to six—and I am sure he will—but at six o'clock he will not have the information on how many planes have been produced and how many engines have been produced. Without these figures he cannot tell whether money invested there was invested wisely or otherwise. I mean the $116 million that he is talking about. He understands that I cannot give that information. Security regulations are decided by the army, and we have our instructions not to give numbers of products. He understands that. We will give him dates of contracts, but again I say that, where the government is contracting with itself, dates of contracts are less meaningful than they are if you are contracting with an outside firm.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Greenwood was questioning me about production at the A. V. Roe plant. I would call his attention to page 2743 of Hansard for May 30, 1952, in which I gave an analysis of the work being carried out at the A. V. Roe plant, in some detail. I have no doubt he has read that recently. I believe that in that statement is contained much of the information he desires to ask me to give at this time.

Then, as to contracts: I have a list of the contracts between the government and A. V. Roe which I shall be glad to place on Hansard.

First is a formal agreement made May 2, 1946, executed on April 24, 1947. This is file 18-26-28, covering design and development of gas turbine engines. It includes a provision for jigs and tools. Avro is to be paid its costs of the work plus a fee of 5 per cent, but Avro is only to get 3 per cent of its progress payments. This is amended by a formal agreement dated April 13, 1948, to provide for such capital equipment as the minister may approve.

This agreement provides that Avro will obtain an undertaking from the Hawker-Siddeley Aircraft Company Limited, that it and its subsidiary and allied companies will make available to Avro all technical information and processes which are available to any such companies in connection with the development of gas turbine engines.

This agreement also provides that the crown will make available to Avro all technical data, et cetera, relating to the design and development of gas turbine engines which are available to the crown from Turbo Research Limited. This is a former crown company, since wound up. Such data are to be used by Avro only for the purposes of this agreement.

Then, secondly, is a formal agreement made November 3, 1945, and executed on October 31, 1946. This is file 18-38-4540, covering design of jet type fighter airframes, prototypes, and spare parts necessary for the maintenance thereof during test operations. It includes a provision for jigs and tools. Avro is to be paid its costs of the work plus a fee of 5 per cent, but Avro is only to get 3 per cent of its progress payments. This is amended by three formal agreements dated January 30, 1948, November 3, 1948, and March 29, 1949, the provisions of which are covered earlier in this note.

The third is a formal agreement made May 17, 1949. This is file 18-38-87, covering the manufacture of ten only CF-100 jet fighter aircraft, known as pre-production aircraft, fitted with Orenda gas turbines, 30 spare Orendas and spares, publications, ground handling equipment, et cetera. It covers the cost of jigs and tools as approved by the minister. Avro is to be paid its costs plus a fee of 5 per cent, but is only to get 3 per cent on its progress payments.

Each of the ten aircraft was to be designed as a particular version, such as (a) dual control trainer, (b) tactical ground attack version, (c) P.R. version, special aircraft for airframe tests, et cetera.

By letter of authorization dated October 23, 1951, the ceiling of expenditure was set at $32,295,802.70 including acquisition of certain radar equipment and 2 Rolls-Royce Avon R A 2 type engines.

The fourth is a formal capital assistance agreement made December 9, 1946, file 51-R-37, covering $650,000 for equipment and office furniture for Malton and Nobel plants for use in production of gas turbine engines. Avro is to be paid its costs, but no fee.

The fifth is a formal capital assistance agreement made May 9, 1949. This is file 18-38-69, to provide machine tools and equipment and other facilities of a capital nature for the Malton and Nobel plants, for use in the production of CF-100 aircraft fitted with Orenda engines. All items of machine tools and equipment are to be approved by the minister before acquisition, and Avro is to be paid its costs of acquisition, including engineering, planning and development costs in respect of the additional equipment, and the costs of installation and re-arrangement of the existing plant and facilities incidental to installation. No fee is to be paid to Avro.

By formal amendment No. 1, dated January 5, 1950, Avro can receive accountable advances to cover estimated expenditures one month in advance.

By letter of authorization dated August 18, 1950, Avro was authorized to acquire the following in addition to the machine tools and equipment covered by the formal agreement: New engine plants; re-arrangement of plant; additional machinery and equipment; extension of aircraft plant by 100,000 square feet. The formal agreement was to be amended to include these additional items.

By letter of authorization dated January 3, 1952, the deputy minister authorized a ceiling expenditure of $44,352,000.

The next is a purchase order dated May 14, 1951. It is file B/18-38-14, serial number 2/B/112, CDEF-101, covering main production order for the CF-100 jet fighter aircraft incorporating Orenda turbine engine, and spare Orenda engines, together with spares of airframes and engines, ground handling equipment, special tools and technical publications. Then there was a purchase order dated March 19, 1952, covering metal shipping containers for Orenda engines, at a price to be negotiated.

Purchase order under file B/18-38-139 covers the overhaul and modification of approximately fourteen Lancaster aircraft on a cost plus basis.

Miscellaneous purchase orders covering the purchase of Lancaster and other spare parts on fixed catalogue prices.

Those are all the contracts entered into to date.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it that these contracts and figures to which the minister has referred would approximate the over-all figure that was given this morning.

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Reference was made to the CF-100 for training purposes.

Mr. Howe: No. I do not like to get the record muddled up; the pre-production aircraft were not all for training purposes. There was one typical training aircraft and one typical rocket firing aircraft; in short, each one is typical of a modification of the aircraft that is intended to be put into production. There were ten aircraft of different types, in connection with each of which there is to be a pre-production model for development purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I accept the minister's correction, but unless I misheard him he did use the word "trainer". Perhaps I took it up wrongly. Do I understand that the minister feels that the question I asked before recess as to the actual date of the order for the service plane is a matter of security?

Mr. Howe: No, I gave that; it is May 14, 1951. That was item 6 on the contracts I gave.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If there is no objection I should like the minister to tell us how many are on order, how many have been actually produced and whether they have come from an actual production line or from what was referred to in an aviation magazine as an enlarged model shop.

Mr. Howe: I cannot give that figure. My hon. friend knows from his experience in the committee on defence expenditures that the R.C.A.F. are very much against giving production figures or the total number on order. I cannot say why, but we have been informed that that is secret information and that we must observe secrecy.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I shall not pursue that. I take it however that there is no secrecy about what appeared in the magazine Aircraft, which is referred to as Canada's aviation news magazine. The issue of March last makes a comment on production which I think should be put on the record. Certainly it is public, and accordingly I read it. This is from the issue of March, 1952, a statement by E. V. Rippingille, Jr., federal director of aircraft production, who says:

> Avro Canada has developed not only a gas turbine but they have started to move into their new engine plant and before long they will be in production. Engines produced to date have come from an enlarged model shop. The CF-100 is still undergoing test and development but, like all aircraft, it will continue to be developed until it is fundamentally obsolete. Production is slow but is being gradually accelerated.

In the same issue there is what is termed an authoritative review of Canada's aircraft industry, from which I should like to read briefly as follows:

> It is unfortunate that engineering difficulties with the CF-100 have slowed its production and delayed its getting into squadron service. It is a fact that this is an aircraft under development and as such it can't be hurried along.

And then later:

With few Orendas likely to be available before the beginning of 1953, it is improbable that any of the Sabres will be powered with this engine. By this time, too, enough CF-100's should be coming along to absorb all the initial production of Orendas.

I pass from that to ask another question which I think has been discussed in the defence expenditures committee. Is the CF-100 being fitted with modern air-to-air armaments?

Mr. Howe: Again I am told that the armament on fighter aircraft is security information. I should like to make some comment on that subject, but I cannot.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not know what comment I can make on that except that there ought to be a caucus of the departments. I have one or two more questions and I know the minister will be glad to be told that I am not going to take three hours, but only a few minutes. I think it is clear from the record that a large amount of money has gone into this and that the results to date so far as pace is concerned have been disappointing. From the records I have read and from other things, unless something has happened within the last few weeks, it looks as though no production in a real sense of the term has been reached.

As I pointed out this morning, it is evident that the R.C.A.F. and the manufacturers had a proper desire to build our own engine. They have been going ahead with that with disappointments. As far as I can see it is true that we have not a supply of these engines available yet and I should like to ask the minister if there was an engine that we could have had. Were the Hawker-Siddeley people manufacturing an engine which would have been useful as a stand-by and which would not have left us in the position in which we now appear to be?

Mr. Howe: I suppose my hon. friend is asking whether it was wise to undertake the building of an engine?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have said that I think that that was a proper thing to do. I am simply asking whether it might have been wise to have had a stand-by alternative.

Mr. Howe: The position is that the production of jet engines is limiting the production of complete aircraft. There are airframes all over the continent waiting for engines. The production of aircraft in Canada is limited by the supply of engines that we can make available or that are being made available to us. The Orenda will be a valuable addition to the supply of engines for allied countries.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

We are hopeful that it will take care of the requirements of the two aircraft I have mentioned, the CF-100 and the Sabre; we believe that the timing of production will permit that to take place. We have reason to believe that the actual production of Orenda engines will be ahead of the quantity that was scheduled for production, in other words ahead of the rated capacity of the plant. I understand that expected production will take care both of the CF-100, for which it was designed, and the Sabre, which will be a greatly improved aircraft when the Orenda can be installed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Apparently there has been in the past a lot of unwarranted optimism and I hope the minister's optimism is more warranted because he has not indulged in it in the past as other people have. The minister does not seem to have answered my question. He said that there are airframes waiting for engines and I asked whether there was any engine which we could have had. I understand the Hawker-Siddeley people have the Sapphire engine in production which might have been available if we had wanted a stand-by and it might have been useful now.

Mr. Howe: The Sapphire engine has been licensed for production in the United States. I am told, however, that it will not be in actual production for several months. In other words, the Orenda engine, so far as this continent is concerned, is some months ahead of the Sapphire. There are only a few Sapphire engines being produced in the old country which are being used for United Kingdom planes, and it is impossible to obtain them for installation in Canadian aircraft.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I was aware that they were licensed for manufacture in the United States by the Curtiss-Wright people, but I did not know about Canada. He has added that. I come back to ask this question. He says that at the moment the Sapphire is not in production in England to an extent that would make any available here. Would that have been true two, three or four years ago if we had wished then to have an alternative?

Mr. Howe: There were no Sapphire engines two, three or four years ago. The development of the Sapphire engine has more or less paralleled the production of the Orenda engine. The two were started about the same time and the production of Sapphires is about as far advanced as the production of Orendas.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then am I wrong in my information that the Sapphire is and has been for some time in real production in England?

Mr. Howe: You are quite wrong.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister is satisfied that is wrong.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: I want to make one or two observations. I think the whole question of security so far as the Department of Defence Production and the Department of National Defence are concerned should be examined. In my opinion more information should be available because I am sure it will not be helpful to anybody. Information is published in technical magazines, trade papers and frequently in articles by commentators in the press. I realize that an official statement is an official statement and that upon it those who are hostile to us can base their plans, but I feel that secrecy in this regard is carried to too great an extreme. There is one other point I should like to mention with respect to the A. V. Roe company. The A. V. Roe company has a very advanced prototype of a jet liner—I think it is the only one in existence—which would give this country a tremendous advantage in the commercial production of a high speed jet short-range aircraft.

I realize that the project had to be abandoned temporarily owing to the lack of space, trained personnel and tooling. I realize that to go on with it would probably involve great expense. Far from criticizing the expense of bringing into production a new aircraft based on a prototype of this kind, particularly in conjunction with the Comet which is the long-range jet commercial liner, I think it was unfortunate to say the least that the project was abandoned. If it is at all possible I hope the A. V. Roe company will be encouraged to proceed with the construction of that aircraft.

Mr. Pouliot: Before the item is carried it is my desire to pay a well deserved tribute to the minister. I know of no man who could have organized Trans-Canada Air Lines as well as their operations now demonstrate. In addition, he organized the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and he provided a great impulse to Canadian business and industry to such an extent that Canada is one of the great industrial countries of the world. Therefore it is with great pleasure that I congratulate the minister on his numerous accomplishments and I hope he will stay with us long enough to make the country benefit from his wide experience and remarkable spirit of initiative.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad to be able to associate myself with a good deal of what the hon. member for Temiscouata has said but that does not affect the fact that I still have one or two questions to ask. I am not quite clear on this matter and I should like to ask the minister, particularly in view of what I read from the aviation magazine, whether the CF-100 is actually coming off the production line now. Before the minister answers, may I add that I ask that question partly in view of the speech of Mr. Crawford Gordon a short while ago in which I understood there was reference to a plant for a jet engine still under construction.

Mr. Howe: This is what I said on May 30, 1952, as found at page 2743 of Hansard:

> Deliveries of the CF-100 under the main production contract are scheduled to commence in August, 1952. For security reasons, it would be inappropriate to review our planned rate of production, but I have every reason to believe that A. V. Roe will live up to our agreed production schedule, as long as certain electronic equipment can be secured from the United States.

I might say that we are rather in advance of the production schedule. The first planes have already come off the production line. My hon. friend lives in Toronto. I suppose he visits that city occasionally and if he would spend an hour at Malton all these questions would be answered because there is a very healthy production line that can be viewed by selected personnel from the House of Commons.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can understand the minister so much better than I could understand things if I went out to the plant myself.

Item agreed to.

81. To provide for the liquidation of contracts, including commitments of previous years related to the acquisition of assets operated by the departments of munitions and supply and reconstruction and supply or an agency of these departments; the liquidation of the assets and liabilities of closed crown companies and crown plants; and for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $150,000.

Mr. Green: I presume this item refers to payments which will be diminishing each year. Will the minister give us an explanation?

Mr. Howe: Yes. We must keep a token item available for the reason that we have two or three lawsuits still before the courts. All the contracts that could be closed by negotiation have been closed and we are only providing this amount to await the result of actions before the exchequer court.

Item agreed to.

Crown companies—

82. To provide for expenses incurred by Defence Construction Limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence, $3,308,500.

Mr. Fraser: Why did the minister's engineers select the ground they did in Cobourg for the ordnance building there? It is swamp land. According to a return tabled in my name, I understand that it will cost $407,250 for drainage plus $70,000 for concrete slabs to be built underneath the concrete tile. That is practically half a million dollars.

Mr. Howe: The purchasing of land and the preparation of plans for development are functions of the Department of National Defence. The Department of Defence Production only takes over when national defence is furnished with the plans and the site. From there on the Department of Defence Production is responsible for the building. My department has nothing to do with the acquisition of land.

Mr. Fraser: Well, Mr. Chairman, is it not the minister's department that has the engineers who go over the land checking the soil to see whether it is suitable for building?

Mr. Howe: If the engineers are part of the army organization they are not hired by us. If it is a firm of consulting engineers doing the job we make a contract with the firm to perform the work and after that they report to the armed services until the design is worked out. We take no responsibility for design. The functions are very sharply designed and it is the duty of the army to say what it wants—and that involves the preparation of plans—when it wants it, and then the Department of Defence Production attempts to take over from that point and give to the armed services what they want.

Mr. Fraser: But is it not the minister's department which has the soil engineers who say whether the land is or is not suitable for a building of that kind? I understand that they have 80-foot piling in the building in this case but in the Royal York hotel, the tallest building in the empire, they used only 38-foot piling.

Mr. Howe: I do not think the length of the piling is significant. I have built grain elevators where we used 20-foot piling and in others we used 80-foot piling. I am told that the site is very suitable for the purpose but as I say it is not the function of the Department of Defence Production to acquire the land or plan the requirements of the building.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the manner in which Defence Construction Limited is required to make expenditures? As I understand it the money for these defence projects is voted by the Department of National Defence. Then, the actual work is done under the Department of Defence Production through this agency or crown company known as Defence Construction Limited. In what way is this vote of $3,308,500 to be used?

Mr. Howe: That is simply to pay for the administration of the work by Defence Construction Limited. If the army wishes to build a building it sends over to the Department of Defence Production the plans for the building and a certificate of encumbrance covering the estimated cost of the building. The department then operates through this crown company, Defence Construction Limited. Defence Construction Limited proceeds to process the building, to place a contract and to inspect the work through to completion until it can be turned over to the army in a condition that is satisfactory to the army. This item is to cover the cost of engineering and other services performed by the Department of Defence Production on the building through the construction period and until it is turned over to the services.

Mr. Green: Defence Construction Limited does not do any actual construction itself?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Green: The work would be let out by contract?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Green: There is an increase of $1,100,000 odd this year. Could the minister give us some idea of why the increase was necessary?

Mr. Howe: The increase is almost directly proportional to the amount of work the department has to handle. The more contracts there are the more inspectors and the more work generally is required. This is almost entirely payment of staff.

Mr. Green: Where does the Department of Public Works fit into the picture? If I remember correctly before the second war defence projects were built by the Department of Public Works very much in the way in which the Department of Defence Production now builds them. Does each department carry on in the same way but with the Department of Public Works being restricted to civilian projects—or just what are the respective spheres?

Mr. Howe: That is correct. In 1940 all procurement work for the services was turned over to the newly created department of munitions and supply. That included all building projects required for the services and all procurement for the services. That is the situation that has obtained since that time. In other words, in 1940 the work was transferred from the Department of Public Works to the department of munitions and supply. The Department of Public Works is responsible for building for other than the armed services and the Department of Defence Production is responsible for building for the armed services.

In the case of airports, since the Department of Transport has a trained staff familiar with airport work, at my request the Department of Transport has relieved the Department of Defence Production of building runways. Similarly, since Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has the necessary staff and is familiar with the building of housing, the housing work for the Department of Defence Production has, at my request, been turned over to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and is carried out by them. That is simply a matter of using the best facilities that the government has available.

Mr. Green: The minister said a few days ago that he did not expect the Department of Defence Production to be carried on indefinitely. I presume that in due course this work of building projects for the Department of National Defence will revert to the Department of Public Works? Is that the intention?

Mr. Howe: That is a matter that cannot be predicted at this time. When the work handled by the Department of Defence Production becomes so small that it does not warrant the overhead of a separate department, the work will be placed elsewhere; but I cannot predict at this time where the work will be placed.

Mr. Wright: Who carries on the day-to-day inspections on these various construction projects—the Department of Defence Production or the Department of National Defence? I would take it that it would be the Department of National Defence. They take over the projects and would have to pass on them.

Mr. Howe: The day-to-day inspection is carried on by the Department of Defence Production. When the work is ready to be turned over to the Department of National Defence, that department has to be satisfied with it or it will not accept the project; but up to that point, the inspection is the responsibility of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Low: I wonder if the minister has a statement of the projects that are being constructed in the province of Alberta?

Mr. Howe: No, I am afraid not.

Mr. Low: Perhaps I could get that.

Mr. Howe: You can get that at any time from the department.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

83. Administration and operation, $750,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the position of Canadian Arsenals Limited at the present time.

Mr. Howe: Canadian Arsenals Limited is a corporation formed to take over those installations of the last war which it was felt should be maintained as part of the permanent defence of Canada. A committee of the armed services and the department of munitions and supply studied the matter very carefully for a considerable period and made a report which recommended that certain plants be retained. It is the duty of Canadian Arsenals Limited to look after those plants, keep them ready for operation, and produce up to the capacity of the plants the peacetime requirements of the armed services.

Mr. Green: The peacetime requirements?

Mr. Howe: Requirements of the armed services between wars are of course peacetime requirements. At the moment the arsenal plants are working to capacity and they are accounting for a considerable part of the production of munitions of the present day.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say how much work is being done in Canadian Arsenals on NATO account?

Mr. Howe: It is difficult to say. The work on NATO account is an extension of the work on Canadian account. We are doing nothing for NATO that is not an extension of the work for Canada. At the moment, I presume the plants are working on Canadian production, although several of them have contracts for NATO which will follow on as soon as the Canadian requirements are met.

Mr. Adamson: I know they are doing work for NATO, but I wanted to know whether the contracts are paid for through NATO. Do we pay for the equipment, deliver it to NATO and take credit for our part in the NATO establishment?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Adamson: There is no monetary transaction from NATO to Canadian Arsenals?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Adamson: These things we produce form a part of our contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization?

Mr. Howe: That is true in part, although countries in the NATO group have placed orders in Canada for cash. For example, the United Kingdom is buying certain things in Canada and paying cash, but there is also certain equipment being furnished as a result of the Canadian contribution to NATO and that material is paid for out of Canada's appropriation for NATO. The finished material delivered to NATO forms part of Canada's contribution.

Mr. Adamson: And the charge to NATO, I presume, is at cost?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is one question which goes back to the previous item which perhaps the minister would answer. He told us that in 1946 and in 1947, one of those years, there was a sale to A. V. Roe for $2 million, and it was paid in cash. Has any money from outside gone into A. V. Roe since then, except from the government of Canada?

Mr. Howe: Yes, Mr. Chairman, from cash sent out from England or credits arranged in Canada and backed by Avro of England. The Avro investment in its Canadian operation is about $16·5 million at the present time.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

84. Construction, improvements and new equipment, $1,650,000.

Mr. Green: According to the details covering this item there was only $500,000 expended during the last fiscal year. The vote for this year is $1,650,000. Can the minister explain why there has been an increase of over $1 million?

Mr. Howe: Yes, Mr. Chairman; the vote for last year was $1,700,000. We are stepping up the capacity of the arsenal to take care of current requirements. For instance, we have reactivated the explosives plant at DeSalaberry, to fill orders for explosives for our own services and others. We are extending the plant at St. Paul l'Ermite to take care of shell filling, which in the last war was carried on at three or four plants. In Quebec, we are extending the capacity to make shell cases. At Long Branch we are setting up a new line for small arms.

Mr. Green: Apparently, the expenditure last year was only $500,000.

Mr. Howe: It may be—the payments, you mean, were only $500,000?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Howe: I presume a large part of the balance is a carry-over from last year.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Adamson.]

684. To provide capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board—further amount required, $25,000,000.

Mr. Green: This is an additional vote of $25 million for capital assistance?

Mr. Howe: That is right.

Mr. Green: It is really covered by the minister's earlier explanation?

Mr. Howe: Yes; it just changes the amount from $85 million to $110 million.

Item agreed to.

685. To provide for payment of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors, $250,000.

Mr. Green: Item 685 requires an explanation. It is to provide for grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes.

Mr. Howe: Yes. For example, the Orenda engine plant has just been completed, and it is on the tax rolls of the municipality for this year. The item covers the following list: Township of York, plant for occupancy by General Electric; Township of Etobicoke, Canadian Steel Improvement; Township of Renfrew, Cockshutt Aircraft Limited; Township of Lachine, Dominion Engineering Works Limited; Township of Scarboro, John Inglis Company Limited; Township of Ross, Light Alloys Limited; Township of Scarboro, Lucas Rotax of Canada; Town of La Salle, Peacock Brothers; Township of Toronto, A. V. Roe Limited. Those are all plants owned by the government and the provision there is to pay reasonable taxes on these crown-owned plants.

Mr. Green: Has the department arrived at the amounts which will be paid to each municipality?

Mr. Howe: No, it is a matter of negotiations.

Item agreed to.

National Research Council—

295. Salaries and other expenses, $12,198,684.

Mr. Green: This is the administration item for the national research council, and it shows an increase of a little over $1·5 million. Can the minister explain why there is an increase? I must admit that I am biased in favour of the research council, but perhaps the minister can tell us why there is that increase?

Mr. Howe: It is due to an extension of activities during the period of defence production. There are certain calls on the facilities of the research council that are abnormal and call for more staff and greater activity. The activities of the national research council are expanding from year to year, but the expansion is greater than usual this year.

Mr. Green: What progress is being made with the branches of the research council which are being established in different parts of the country outside Ottawa?

Mr. Howe: The prairie laboratory has been making great progress with research on agricultural wastes, attempting to find a practical use for them. It has a very active program which I believe is welcome so far as the prairie provinces are concerned.

The maritime laboratory was opened only on Monday of last week, but we expect a very active program there, concentrating on the problems of the maritime provinces.

Mr. Green: Can the minister give us any details of the problems which will be considered there?

Mr. Howe: A specialist on seaweed is, I believe, one of the staff. Seaweed can be developed into edible products that are considered quite valuable. I have a statement here which does not mean very much to me. I will send it over to my friend. It refers to problems of biology and chemistry and biochemistry.

Mr. Green: Is there any thought of establishing branches in any other parts of the country?

Mr. Howe: Well, the national research council has a working arrangement, for example, with a new chemistry building that I was privileged to open in British Columbia, part of the university of British Columbia, and also has arrangements with a number of universities. I know of no plans to build branch laboratories in other parts of Canada. I think the proposal is to work with existing laboratories.

Mr. Green: What is the situation with regard to bringing students and graduates to Ottawa for work under the research council? At the time that we had a special committee of the house on the national research council we were given details of that program, and it seemed to be an extremely worth-while one. Has it been continued? What is the situation at the present time?

Mr. Howe: There are about 60 students working in the national research council at the present time. Many of them are from other countries. They are working under special students' arrangements, and it seems to be working very well. Most empire countries are represented. I think other countries are represented as well. We consider it a very valuable part of the work of the research council.

Mr. Green: Is the council doing anything in connection with the Colombo plan?

Mr. Howe: No, I think not. I am sure the council would be glad to undertake problems related to the Colombo plan, if the problems were placed in its hands; but to date the Colombo plan has involved more practical development work. For instance, fisheries experts from Vancouver have been in Ceylon; cement experts from eastern Canada have been in India. The work of the Colombo plan to date is not work that is adapted to the national research council.

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy control board—

297. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $59,302.

Mr. Gibson: Will the minister say how the production of uranium ore is coming along in Canada? Is there anything he may usefully say about the mining of uranium ore in Canada?

Mr. Howe: The present Eldorado property at Great Bear lake is working at capacity. Unfortunately a fire at the mine last November burned down a number of the buildings. They were rebuilt during the winter months and were back in operation about the first of May. The mining did not stop, but delivery of ore was stopped owing to the fact that the crushing plant went out of action. During last winter a leeching plant was erected to work over the tailings of earlier ores. The tailings had been preserved and are now being put through the leeching plant, which means stepping up the output of uranium to a very considerable percentage.

As far as Beaverlodge development is concerned, the report of Eldorado, which I tabled yesterday, gives quite a detailed account of progress at that place. We are in process of building a mill. We believe that we have a very large deposit of low-grade uranium ore. We shall have a very sizeable production. Canada used to be the second largest producer of uranium. It has slipped down to third place, and we expect that when Beaverlodge goes into production we shall come back to second place.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to express appreciation of the work that is done under this department. We had a very gifted young lady from Fort William working for the government in New York. She was taken seriously ill with cancer. She was rushed to the city of London and was give treatment. She is now up and out of bed. I commend the minister and his workers for this type of work and we hope that they will continue and develop; we also hope that this young girl will be completely cured.

Mr. McLure: In the report of the Eldorado company, which we received the other day, I noticed that it is a paying proposition at the present time. It is really a good company. When we see it in the condition in which it is I often wonder whether that company will ever reimburse the shareholders who paid enormous prices for their stock and received only a small pittance for it. From time to time these complaints come in. No doubt they have come in to the minister, because when a backbencher like myself gets them by the score, indicating that some men paid as high as $11.75 for their stock and others more than that, and received only a small pittance when the government took over the company, surely he must get complaints as well. Now, since the company has commenced to pay, surely he will reimburse these men for what they paid for the stock.

Mr. Howe: When the government took over the property it was not in the condition that it is in today. It had never been a paying proposition. The government offered slightly more for the shares than the market price of that day. Whether the stock was delivered or not was quite voluntary. I think practically all the stock has been turned in. I know of only one shareholder who keeps alive the complaint, and I think his holding is something less than 1,000 shares, representing about $1,200. I hardly think that complaints from the shareholders are as serious as my hon. friend would suggest. Has he had complaints from great numbers or from just one?

Mr. McLure: No; I have had complaints from a great many more than one.

Mr. Howe: I do not know how it would be possible at this stage to reimburse each shareholder for what he paid for his stock. I do not think that it ever sold as high as $11. It might have sold for $4 and maybe $5. To determine what people paid someone else for their shares would be a very difficult proposition.

Mr. Adamson: What is the position of the shareholders? Do they receive the annual report?

Mr. Howe: There are no shareholders other than the government.

Mr. Adamson: I was just wondering.

Mr. Green: This is the first item on atomic energy and there are one or two questions I should like to place before the minister. First of all, with regard to the sale of isotopes, when the minister was speaking on a supplementary item of last year's estimates to be found at page 967 of Hansard for the current session he said:

> There are many who feel that the dividends from the isotope field alone may well repay all the money spent for atomic energy.

But in the report of Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited, which we received a day or two ago, there is a statement about the marketing of isotopes which is not so optimistic. At page 9 the president says:

> During the year, an increasing emphasis has been placed on the development of markets for other radioactive isotopes. While there is a growing demand for radioactive isotopes, it has not been possible as yet to establish this business on a profitable basis.
> There was a net loss of $63,521 on the sale of radioactive isotopes during 1951. In order that the isotope development and marketing program might be carried out with greater efficiency, it became apparent that a building was required to house research, development and processing facilities, and sales and servicing staffs. The building will be located at Ottawa since this location is in reasonable proximity to the Chalk River project, the source of supply of radioactive isotopes and, at the same time, is readily accessible to the company's customers.

I would ask the minister to deal with that situation.

Then a further question has to do with the use of atomic energy for power plants of various kinds. We do not have very full information on these developments, but we read stories of the United States government making arrangements with private corporations for the development of these power plants. I would ask the minister to tell us whether Canada has some plan of that kind in contemplation. It is only a few months ago that a new crown company was set up, known as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and we were told at that time that the main reason for the setting up of this company was the prospect for the early and useful industrial application of atomic energy. I am wondering what progress Canada has made along these lines, and whether it is the government's intention to use private industry to help in the development of these plants.

Then, finally, we read in the press that the Prime Minister of Australia is here primarily to try to make some arrangements for assistance in establishing an atomic energy plant or for the mining of uranium in Australia. Would the Minister of Defence Production make a statement in that connection?

Mr. Howe: When I spoke of some persons feeling that the dividends from isotopes alone might justify all the government's expenditures in connection with atomic energy, I did not mean a return in dollars and cents. I think the sale of isotopes can be put on a profitable basis, and at the present time there is a great deal of development work going on designed to interest Canadian industry in the use of isotopes.

What I meant was that the results to humanity, if we may put it that way, or to the over-all economy, might justify all the expenditure. For example, how can one place a value on the life of the woman to whom the hon. member for Fort William referred a short time ago. We have two cobalt-60 bombs in operation. I am told they are bringing about remarkable recoveries in cancer cases. We hope that during this year we will have six more in operation. I might say that the demand for the bomb is far beyond any likelihood of being met. At the present time Canada is the only country capable of producing cobalt-60. That will be a fine contribution to humanity.

Then there are plant studies taking place. These are efforts to trace the effect of the various components in the soil on plant growth. These studies might very easily contribute a result that would be a national benefit. It was these intangible values, intangible so far as dollars and cents are concerned, to which I was referring when I said that isotopes might justify all expenditures to date.

Then, answering the hon. member's second question as to the progress being made in the application of atomic energy for the production of power, we are approaching the stage where practical results can be obtained. For example, we all know that an atomic power plant is being put in a submarine.

Mr. Green: In the United States.

Mr. Howe: Yes, in the United States; at New London, Connecticut. We know that in the United States progress is being made in connection with pilot plants for producing useful energy from atomic energy. At Chalk River we are in process of constructing a larger pile which will permit wider development in the practical application of atomic power; and great progress is being made in working out the details of a process for transforming atomic energy into useful energy. At the moment we have not been active in building an actual and practical plant to convert one to the other; but we are well on the way toward that objective. I said before it is our belief that by 1960 atomic energy would be in practical use on a large scale for producing power from atomic sources.

Mr. Green: By 1960?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: The minister did not answer my question concerning the use of industry in this development.

Mr. Howe: On the directorate of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited we have placed practical men from industry. There are four or five men from the large electrical power companies, and one or two others from industry generally. We hope that as a result of their contact with atomic energy we will get a directive as to how best to proceed with the practical development of atomic power.

Mr. Green: There is no private industry helping at the moment?

Mr. Howe: No, not at the moment.

Mr. Green: Now, would the minister answer my question with regard to Australia.

Mr. Howe: I am sorry to say that I have not yet met the Prime Minister of Australia, though I hope to do so this evening. But so far as I can learn he has nothing to ask of Canada with regard to the mining or refining of uranium ore. I may be wrong in that; but that is my present information.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister suggested that by 1960 atomic energy would be available in substantial quantities for the production of electrical power. He also said that some of the directors of the company are associated with the electrical industry, and that he is hoping to get some directive from them.

I presume the minister has in mind the fact that the development of this power would present particular opportunities to the eastern part of Canada. In British Columbia there is an extensive development of hydroelectric energy in the mountains. Then there is the vast oil industry of the prairies. I presume the Minister of Transport would certainly say there will be additional hydroelectric energy from the St. Lawrence development.

This leaves a wonderful opportunity for hydroelectric development in the maritime provinces. I am not sure how many of the directors are associated with electrical energy development in the maritimes. I realize there may be some question raised by interests there as to what development should take place. But I do urge upon the minister the desirability and, indeed, the necessity for increasing power development in that area, if we are to have the industrial development we are seeking. Such development we all realize is dependent to a substantial extent upon additional power facilities.

Mr. Howe: I am well aware that areas such as the maritime provinces, that have not a plentiful supply of hydroelectric power, will benefit particularly from the development of atomic power. With that thought in mind I have put on the board a brilliant Nova Scotian, who was a student of mine at Dalhousie, in the person of Geoffrey Gaherty, one of the great engineers in this country. I am sure he will keep the needs of the maritime provinces in mind.

Item agreed to.

298. Researches and investigations with respect to atomic energy, $300,000.

Mr. Green: Can the minister explain how this money is expended? Is it paid to different universities which are carrying on atomic research?

Mr. Howe: This vote was formerly carried under the appropriations of the atomic energy control board and is for development work in the universities. There are various cyclotrons and other equipment in the universities.

Mr. Green: Could we have a breakdown as to how the amount is divided among the universities?

Mr. Howe: The following grants were made in 1951-52:

Capital
Dr. O. Maass, McGill university	$17,650
Operations
Nuclear physics and chemistry
Dr. J. S. Foster, McGill university	70,000
Dr. G. M. Shrum, University of British Columbia	20,000
Dr. H. G. Thode, McMaster university ...	18,000
Dr. J. A. Gray, Queen's university	15,000
Dr. E. L. Harrington, University of Saskatchewan	15,000
Physics department, University of Montreal	10,000
Metallurgical research
Professor F. A. Forward, University of British Columbia	20,000
Dr. K. A. Clark, University of Alberta ...	12,350
Professor M. Hewer and Professor S. E. Wolfe, University of Toronto	2,000

Mr. Green: The grants are made to the scientists direct?

Mr. Howe: The purpose is to make one man responsible for producing results. If you just made it to the university it might be dissipated in general activities, but when it is made to a certain professor in the university he is held responsible.

Mr. Green: Will payments in the present fiscal year be to the same scientists?

Mr. Howe: Yes, I am told they will be the same for this year.

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy project—

299. Operation and maintenance, $7,089,371.

Mr. Green: What is the reason for the increase in this vote?

Mr. Howe: Higher salaries and cost of materials. The revenue from the operation of the present pile is expected to offset its cost of operation in part only. When the new pile is in operation it is expected that the production project will be self-sustaining.

Mr. Green: I notice there is an estimated revenue for the present fiscal year of $900,000, whereas last year it was only $180,000.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: There appears to be a large increase in revenue.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: This is all for the plant at Chalk River?

Mr. Howe: That is right. The revenue is obtained from the ready sale of products, particularly plutonium. The purpose of forming the crown company was to put the operation on a commercial basis. While there will probably always be a vote for experimental work it is expected that the plant will operate on a commercial basis without cost to the crown.

Item agreed to.

Atomic energy project—

300. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, and to provide for payment to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing and other works to be constructed at Deep River during 1952-53, $3,141,850.

Mr. Green: Is this for housing at Deep River for the atomic energy staff?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: How many are there on the staff?

Mr. Howe: A total of 1,424 at Chalk River.

Item agreed to.

301. Construction of a new reactor and auxiliary buildings and services (revote, $4,300,000), $7,000,000.

Mr. Green: This is for the new reactor and only about $2,700,000 was spent last year. Can the minister tell us what the total cost will be and when it is expected the reactor will be completed?

Mr. Howe: The estimated cost of the finished plant is $30 million, including the heavy water which will cost $6 million or $7 million. The completion date is 1954.

Mr. Green: When the atomic energy project was under discussion last March I suggested to the minister that a special committee of the house should be set up to study the atomic energy plans of the government. At that time the minister said he was not against it, but he was not in favour of it, and he thought next year would be a preferable time to set up a committee. I did not press the matter then or discuss it with the other opposition parties, but I am wondering whether the minister would be willing to set up such a committee in the 1953 session.

It seems to me that the whole atomic energy development has gone ahead much faster than anyone expected. Obviously we are going to have atomic energy plants much sooner than anyone had hoped for, and they will be of great importance to Canada. I suggest that parliament should at least be trying to keep up to date with what is going on, and one way in which that can be done is to have a special committee. I must admit that none of us who were on the committee in 1949 knew very much about atomic energy or scientific developments, but at least the result was to make all those members who had the good fortune to serve on the committee ardent supporters of the atomic energy project. I believe it would be most beneficial to have a similar committee at the next session and I ask the minister to give his views on that point.

Mr. Howe: As far as I know there is no objection to having a committee next year, and I shall be glad to arrange it if the group of members that visited the plant and are somewhat familiar with the operation think that it is wise.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Exhibitions—

788. Canadian international trade fair, 1953—to provide for preparatory expenses of a Canadian international trade fair in 1953, the remaining amount required to be provided in the main estimates for 1953-54, $319,000.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary to vote this amount in advance?

Mr. Howe: The vote always comes in two sections. The preliminary work goes on between fairs, work such as advertising and other arrangements, and that is covered by the supplementary estimates while the expenditures of the actual fair will be covered in the estimates for 1953. We are simply following the usual practice.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—

Canadian government elevators—

789. Operation and maintenance expenses—further amount required, $192,909.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister explain this item, and in particular inform the committee what government-owned elevators are under lease to private grain companies. Some years ago the situation was that one or two government elevators were leased to private companies, and I was wondering whether or not that system still prevails.

Mr. Howe: Yes. The reason for the supplementary vote is the increased business that is being done. All branches of the board of grain commissioners' service are now operating at a profit. I believe the profit this year for grain handled in the government elevators was about $800,000, and I believe the fees collected by the board more than cover the respective expenses of the board of grain commissioners. That is due wholly to the very considerable volume of this year's crop. All elevators owned are operated by the board except the elevator at Fort William, which is leased to the McCabe Grain Company. The reason it is leased is that it is very difficult to operate an elevator at Fort William without a line of country elevators feeding it. We have discussed diversion charges at some length in the committee on agriculture, and the fact of the matter is that if diversion charges are paid to divert grain to a government elevator there is not much in it for the government. It seems a better arrangement to lease the elevator to the McCabe Grain Company which has its own feeder system and can operate the elevator profitably. The government has an assured income through rental of the elevator.

Item agreed to.

Special—

790. To provide hereby, notwithstanding anything contained in the Financial Administration Act or any other act or law, for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to the widow of the late Joseph MacLeod Boyer of an annuity at the rate of $1,248 to commence from February 1, 1952, and to continue during her lifetime, $1,456.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this vote?

Mr. Howe: We had a very sad calamity in the trade service several months ago. Our trade commissioner in Egypt was killed in terrorist activities there. This is a pension for his widow. He was new in the service and had very little pension accumulated through the department. This pension is based on the military pension payable to one with the rank of colonel, which is about equivalent to his status in the Department of Trade and Commerce. The widow was left in destitute circumstances and this provision is being made for her. Under the circumstances I think hon. members will feel that it is a matter of equity.

Mr. Green: We are very glad to approve a vote of this kind.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to say one word on this item. I have known the gentleman personally for many years. He was a classmate of mine and president of our class, and a gallant gentleman. I understand from reports that have been received that he might have saved his life on this occasion had he not acted as he chose to do in pursuance of his duty. I am sure this is a vote which will meet with the approval of all members of the house.

Mr. Knowles: What has been said is certainly true so far as all of us in this group are concerned. I hope that the minister or the people who dealt with this matter did the best they could. It would seem to us that the amount is not very high. Is this amount the best the minister felt could be done for Mr. Boyer's widow?

Mr. Howe: Treasury board went over the matter very carefully. They were somewhat reluctant about establishing the principle that payment on the scale of a military pension should be given to a civilian, but under the circumstances it was believed this was equitable, and it was the best I could do. I am very sympathetic. Mr. Boyer was one of our best trade commissioners. He was located in one of the most difficult posts and, as has been said, he acted very gallantly in trying to save other people in the building.

Mr. Fair: We in this group also agree with the decision made by the government and hope that the provision is satisfactory.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

248. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and notwithstanding section thirty of the Financial Administration Act, to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,988,568,232, regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $2,346,221,325 will come due for payment in future years); and to provide for the estimated actual expenditures in the fiscal year 1952-53, $1,642,346,907.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I hope it would meet the convenience of hon. members of this committee if there were an understanding along similar lines to that which we have had over the last four or five years regarding the method of proceeding with the discussion of these estimates. On previous occasions it has been understood, agreed, and generally followed that we should begin with a general discussion on this item and then when that is concluded proceed to deal with the navy, army and air force in that order, taking up the main subheadings, and then follow that with defence research and any other items. I take it that is the general view of the committee as to the most orderly way in which we can proceed.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

It is not my intention to make a speech covering the whole ground of defence. We have already had three days' discussion on a motion to go into supply. That discussion took place on April 3, 4 and 8. In addition, there have been other debates dealing with defence matters which occurred on May 2, 12, 13, 19 and 20. There was an extended and detailed consideration of defence matters in the committee on defence expenditures which made its report to the house on June 10. Here I should like to express my own appreciation to the members of that committee for the very hard work they did on this very important subject. There was also a white paper tabled last Friday which covers the ground in a general way and also deals with defence expenditure and the appropriations under various heads.

It occurred to me that the most useful thing I might do at this time would be to touch on the highlights of the events of the last two years and then discuss with hon. members some of the problems with which we find it most difficult to deal in the years that lie ahead. Before doing that, however, I think you would expect me to say a few words about the general international situation, the climate which determines the temperature of the cold war. You will agree that lately there has been some evidence of a general feeling that the tension has relaxed. The impression has apparently been created somehow that for some reason the international situation has improved. Subject to one important exception, which I will mention later, I can see no fact, no event, no development which would justify this more optimistic outlook.

As to what are the reasons for the change in public sentiment, one guess is as good as another. One view might be that it is due to the rash of elections here and elsewhere. People do not like to be taxed for anything, and that includes defence. In the atmosphere of an election, whether it be in the United States, Canada or elsewhere, the natural tendency is for it to be said that taxes are too high; and this leads by a perfectly natural process to the feeling that one of the principal causes of high taxes, namely defence expenditures, is not as necessary as we thought a few months ago.

What is the position? No one I know in a position of authority or responsibility believes that war is likely in the near future; but no one knows that there will not be war and nothing has occurred to make the danger of war less than it was two years ago except perhaps the very fact that we have been successful in avoiding war over a difficult period. Whether it be due to what our allies and ourselves have done in building up our strength to prevent aggression under the North Atlantic treaty, or whether it has been due to what our allies and ourselves have done to stop aggression under the United Nations effort in Korea; whether it be due to the industrial or economic strength—yes, the strength of the ideals of the freedom loving nations—the fact is that since the North Atlantic treaty was signed three years ago we have had three years of freedom from war.

Our experience before 1949 led us to enter into the North Atlantic treaty in order to build strong foundations for freedom and peace. That decision was entered into, that decision has been acted upon, the treaty was made, the build-up is occurring and we have succeeded in achieving that avoidance of war which was our original goal. There is no ground for discouragement; there is no cause for complacency; there is no reason for retreat. We are doing what we set out to do, and so far we are succeeding in our purpose.

Having set our hand to the plow, having tooled up the factories, recruited and trained troops, we must continue the difficult task of maintaining our effort. The necessity for taking this attitude, the need for continuing effort, and the difficulty we can expect to meet in obtaining continued support for what is needed have been pointed out by me on numerous occasions over the last three or four years. So I make two points at the outset. First, there is no cause for retreat, discouragement or complacency. Second, we must face the necessity of continuing this effort until some other foundation for security is found.

Now, against the background of these general remarks and the other discussions that have taken place, I would like to review in the briefest form some of the things we have been doing about defence since Korea —that is, just two years ago. Two years ago today, on June 24, 1950, we had a defence budget of $425 million. We planned to build up to a strength of possibly 50,000 officers and men of the three services and we had practically stopped recruiting because we were within sight of that goal. That was two years ago today; but two years ago tomorrow, on June 25, 1950, the communists ruthlessly made their unprovoked act of aggression on South Korea with the result that, under the leadership of the United States, the United Nations intervened to stop that aggression. Then and only then the United Nations and the North Atlantic treaty nations realized that they must speed up the further expansion of their defence activities.

Following the October meetings of the North Atlantic treaty defence ministers at which defence requirements and plans were agreed to for the first time, we arrived at a three-year program, just like all the other nations; and that was announced to this house on February 5, 1951, and has since been acted upon.

I should add, however, that no program is static, that already we are extending our defence programming to the end of 1955 and into 1956. We are now seeing the results of the speed-up of this expanded program as it was affected by the events which occurred two years ago tomorrow. We are now beginning to see the tangible results in forms which can be seen by the Canadian people. In those two years, in the navy we have had continuously on duty in Far Eastern waters three destroyers which have given a good account of themselves. Orders have been placed for 54 new vessels. Seven have been launched and 19 more will be launched this year. We are meeting our commitments under the North Atlantic treaty for the current year, having 24 ships employed in the North Atlantic regional group in addition to the ships we have for the defence of our coastal waters and harbours.

Over forty members of this parliament saw the ceremonies that took place at Sorel just ten days ago which marked further stages in our defence program with equipment for the navy and army. There was the sponsoring of two new vessels, H.M.C.S. Labrador, a new Arctic patrol vessel, and the minesweeper Chignecto. More striking was the delivery of the first 3-inch 50 calibre navy gun. Hon. members will be struck as those who went to Sorel were struck with the size of the plant and the complexity of the operation it had to do. Just three figures point this out. Each gun—each of these 3-inch 50 calibre guns—has 28,000 parts. It took 20,000 drawings and 30,000 different machine operations to bring them to that unusual state of acceptability remarked upon by the U.S. naval ordnance and referred to by the admiral representing the U.S. navy on that occasion as well as by the Minister of Defence Production on a previous occasion in this house.

Naval training is being pushed ahead for officers, tradesmen and ratings. A new school was opened at H.M.C.S. Montcalm at Quebec city for French replacements and it is now going ahead with its full planned quota.

As regards the army, since Korea we have raised the 25th brigade for service there. Its splendid work and reputation speak for it better than any words of mine could do. The 27th brigade was similarly raised for service in Europe and has just completed extensive manoeuvres. Meanwhile, in addition to raising men for these forces, we have raised men to provide for rotation and maintenance of the forces we have for the defence of Canada.

We have continued the airlift to Korea without fatal or serious accident and with indeed that remarkable record of performance which has characterized all the transport operations of the R.C.A.F. We now have three Sabre squadrons in England waiting to take their place in Europe. This represents a significant strengthening of the air defence of that part of the North Atlantic area. Other squadrons will be built up as aircraft and aircrew become available and as airfields are ready. The chances are that the limiting factor on the arrival and participation of our squadrons under the North Atlantic treaty will not be either aircraft or aircrew but airfields. All these had be timed in together, but it all has moved forward so that we hope to keep up, and I hope we are going to keep up, the rather difficult target I set of having a squadron brought into existence about every two months. The R.C.A.F. operates 31 training establishments, and I think 32 flying fields.

Territorial defence is moving along. We shall be bringing into operation in successive months some of the large permanent radar stations which will take the place of the temporary stations on which we have had to rely up to date. In addition to this contribution of practical assistance to the United Nations and North Atlantic organizations, we have in two years given or offered equipment and ammunition totalling $273 million, and provided training facilities at a cost of $48 million.

During the two years since Korea we have taken into the armed forces, that is the regular forces, a total of 70,000 officers and men. I do not believe the Canadian people have begun to realize just how big this whole operation has been, and how big it has become during this period. Consider it; 70,000 officers and men taken into the armed forces, and of course a considerable number have been lost through casualties and other wastage.

Having said something about the progress, I should like to say something about the problems that arise in connection with a program of this size and scope. The last figure I gave, of 70,000 men and women taken into the armed forces in the two years since Korea, has been in part made necessary by the principle of rotation. So far as I know this is the first time in Canadian history that we have had a considerable force abroad in peacetime, and have had to face the necessity of maintaining them at the same time. I announced that if the military situation permitted we would rotate men after they had served a year in the Far East. The announcement was in the following terms:

> As long as the military situation permits, men will be eligible for return to Canada who have approximately twelve months' service in the theatre, but no man should be required to serve more than one winter in Korea.

I am glad to say it has proved possible to carry this out as planned. Brigade headquarters opened at Pusan in Korea on May 5, 1951. The last unit of the original brigade arrived back in Canada June 5, 1952, and rotation will be completed when approximately 1,100 personnel who are to sail from Japan towards the end of June arrive in Canada on July 10. The men who have returned to Canada and stay in the armed forces, remain in the second battalions of the R.C.R., the Princess Patricia's and the Royal 22nd. Armoured corps men have been posted to the Lord Strathcona's and the R.C.D.'s. In Korea their places were taken by the first battalions of the infantry regiments and by the first regiment of the R.C.H.A.

We have formed in Canada another brigade, now largely at Wainwright training, replacing those now in Korea. Where before Korea we had in existence one battalion of each of the R.C.R.'s, Princess Patricia's, and Royal 22nd, a regiment of armour and a regiment of artillery, R.C.D.'s and Lord Strathconas, making a total of only six major units, today we have twenty-two major units either in Canada or abroad. This represents a considerable problem in rotating forces and in providing accommodation, about which I shall have something to say.

At the same time the 27th brigade is in Europe. It is a highly trained fighting unit in tip-top shape. The arrangement there is that married men will be returned to Canada after one year abroad and single men after two years. This will mean that rotation will be, in the first instance, on an individual or sub-unit basis. The men to do this are now training in Canada, mostly at Wainwright. The first of these men to return will be coming back around November or December. It does not seem very long since I saw them on their arrival at Rotterdam in November of last year.

Experience I think has shown that the period of a year for Europe is hardly economic, even when the men arrive trained up to unit standards. Also having different periods of rotation for married and single men complicates the operation. What we propose to work toward, and what we hope we will be able to work toward, is to have the period of service established at eighteen months for everyone, working into replacement by units so that men stay with their friends and keep the unit spirit. With the men at present abroad we shall adhere to the intention expressed—it was not an undertaking—when they went abroad.

One very useful result of rotation is that the Canadian armed forces will, to an extent never before possible, be increasingly composed of men who will have had post-war experience and training, either under combat conditions in Korea or under conditions which obtain in Germany where they are able to engage in large scale manoeuvres as a brigade or part even of larger formations. If war does occur, the Canadian forces will have a hard core of officers and men who will not be seeing active service outside Canada for the first time.

Then, in addition, we shall have available in Canada a considerable number of officers and men who, having seen service in Korea or Germany or in Canada, have since left the ranks for one reason or another. At the present time there are some 27,000 officers and men who have retired from the armed forces since the end of the second world war, and who to a considerable extent constitute a readily available reserve, adding to the reserve we always have in the reserve forces.

In order to carry out a policy of rotation, it is necessary to have a formation in Canada, or its equivalent, duplicating each formation abroad. It is necessary to have men in readiness, in a condition of training so that they can take their places in replacing their comrades either in action in Korea or in training in Germany. The intention is that the operation be carried on without a break. The performance of those returning will be equalled by the performance of those replacing them; so far that has proved possible. In the case of the army, as I said this means that for every formation abroad there must be a corresponding formation at home. In the case of the navy we have employed five ships to keep three in the field. In the case of the air force we have gradually worked through several hundred more officers and men, both aircrew and ground crew, than have been employed at any time on the air lanes to Japan. Meanwhile of course we have to maintain in Canada the mobile striking force. On previous occasions I have given reasons why this formation cannot be used for purposes of rotation; but this must not be regarded as in any sense a static formation. The men who returned from Korea and stayed on in the armed forces are largely now in the mobile striking force, and many of them are undergoing airborne and arctic training. All of them will have that in time. Altogether we now have in the armed forces more than 3,500 officers and men who have had airborne training, and you see them in all types of formations.

As I have said, where we had two years ago six major formations, today we have twenty-two; and this points up the problem of providing accommodation for the armed forces.

We will have to relocate a number of major units at various places across Canada, and this will enable us to give a much more satisfactory geographic distribution of major units than has ever been possible before. The great majority of these units will be established at existing camps not far from urban centres or at places to be built close to urban centres. It is not our intention to relocate the permanent headquarters of these major formations at isolated centres. Camps like Wainwright and Shilo, which are fairly isolated, will be used as training schools, but major units will not be located at those places. While they are fine training areas, Borden and Meaford no longer provide quite the range and variety of ground needed for the employment of artillery and tanks in all respects, and it would be costly, both in money and in the employment of useful agricultural land, to enlarge either of those areas very much. Accordingly we will be moving the armour school to Shilo, where the artillery school is already established and there, with the addition of some land at relatively little cost, we will have an area sufficiently large to enable us to train both armour and artillery on a considerable scale.

The school staffs at Shilo and the build-up of other formations at Borden will mean that all available accommodation will be used at both places, and indeed we will have to continue to construct more accommodation at Borden.

What I have said makes it evident that we will need assistance and widespread support to continue to secure the men we want. It is terribly important to make the young men of our country feel that they are needed in the armed forces; to make the members of the armed forces feel that they are members of the community, that they belong to the community, that they matter to the community, and that they are supported by the community. For every story of disorder or crime on the part of the armed forces that may be played up in the press, there are two hundred records of useful service that, unfortunately but naturally, are never noticed. Because of this we in national defence, yes, we in parliament, must do everything we can to ensure that the services deserve a good name and that they have a good name.

Closely associated with obtaining the men and women we want is their training in leadership. Increasing the size of the armed forces from 47,000 to 97,000 in the two years has meant a brand new problem in officer production. During that time we were able to add 6,500 officers to the regular forces. In the white paper reference is made to my announcement of February 5, 1951, that the planned peak of the regular forces was 115,000. The figure now works out, according to our plans, to something in the neighbourhood of 120,000 from 1954 on. This has created a continuing need greater than that which could be filled through the existing officer training establishments. Accordingly we worked out, and on June 12 I announced, three important changes or rather developments in the arrangements for training officers. These were, first, a two-year course at the service colleges or universities for officers not requiring technical qualifications; second, assistance to candidates who engage to serve for at least three years after they are commissioned, and third, the establishment of a new Canadian service college cadet school at St. Johns in the province of Quebec.

Through these means we should be able to get the number of officers required after the forces have reached their planned strength. In the meantime we estimate that we have about 50,000 veteran officers still fit to serve who could be available to meet, and so enable us to meet, an emergency without any difficulty if it occurred in the near future, pending the increase in the training facilities that I have referred to.

Our reserve forces continue to be of the utmost importance, and they receive all possible assistance and support. But it is no part of the role of the reserve forces to furnish front-line strength ready at any moment to fight a trained enemy abroad. Their job, and I refer to the army particularly, remains what it was in the first and second world wars in which they did so well. The strength of the reserve forces of the three services since Korea has increased from 50,000 to 57,000. The aspect of their role, to which I have just referred, is brought out by the fact that another 7,600 members of the reserve forces have joined the active forces during this period of two years.

I have mentioned the all-important question of manpower and leadership. We want men of the type we have, and they need the best kind of equipment. Here the problem of defence planning becomes most difficult during a period of transition, and this is a period of transition. If there were a war today the weapons used would be largely those of the second world war. The only substantial improvements would be in long-range heavy bombers, the effectiveness of radar, the better performance of anti-tank weapons and, perhaps most important, the great improvement in the performance of jet fighters.

It is always a difficult question in a period of rearmament to know when to cease development and commence production. The work of development must be carried on mainly by our larger partners, and for us the question generally is when to purchase or put into production in Canada a model of equipment developed elsewhere. If this is too soon, the weapon may be obsolescent when it is most needed. If it is left too late, we may lack the weapons we need.

It is of course out of the question for a country like Canada to keep re-equipping with each succeeding development. We cannot afford to introduce developments which represent only marginal improvements. In this field one can never be sure that one's judgment is right except in relation to the past and reasonably near future, and errors of judgment are possible. So far, however, we seem to have steered the right course. For example, had we gone into the production of aircraft like the Vampire Mark III or Mark V and certain types of other weapons, as was sometimes suggested, we would now have the armed forces equipped with weapons that were already becoming obsolete. As it is we are producing the latest types of equipment we know of, well up in line with the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mention of our two largest partners brings me to the question of standardization. The ABC committees, as they are called, consist of representatives of the United States, Great Britain and Canada, and they are continuing to work on standardization within the framework of NATO. One branch for which we are responsible has to do with all matters relating to mapping. This work is complete, and has been accepted. Very considerable progress has been made in the standardization of battle procedures. This has been agreed to for the navy, and agreed to in part for the army and the air force. There has also been an acceptance of standard practices regarding communications.

As regards weapons, steady but unspectacular progress is being made. As new weapons are on the secret list until brought into operational use, it is not possible to report in detail. But I can tell hon. members that the other countries concerned have shown very considerable interest in the developments we have been making in regard to light wireless sets, flame throwers, anti-tank weapons and vehicles for use in winter under arctic conditions, as well as in a number of other lines.

While experience in Korea has shown that it is possible without too great difficulty to supply troops using different types of weapons and ammunition, there can be no doubt that the advantages of all using the same type would be very considerable. The difficulties in this respect of the aggressors in Korea make this quite clear.

Here I may point out that the United States, the United Kingdom and ourselves are using 3·5-inch army rocket-launchers, 3-inch 50 calibre naval guns, 75 mm. recoilless rifles and various types of aircraft, machine guns, rockets, torpedoes and anti-submarine bombs. On a large range of weapons we have reached agreement on the desirable military characteristcs, and design and development are being pressed on by the various teams.

In the case of the rifle and small arms generally, I have previously reported on the position taken by Canada. When it was announced in April, 1951, that the United Kingdom would proceed with the ·280, our intervention resulted in a meeting at Washington in August and in further consideration of the problem by a committee of high ranking officers under North Atlantic treaty arrangements.

The present position is that the Americans, because of their large stocks, are prepared to continue to use the M2 semi-automatic Garand with the ·30 rimless cartridge for a considerable period ahead. They are continuing to work on design and development of a new round and rifle having the agreed military characteristics. The British are working towards the same agreed characteristics, largely with the ·280.

We hope that it might be possible to produce a round which would combine the characteristics of the British bullet and the United States cartridge, and accordingly we are doing research and development work on this with the support of both the British and United States partners. This work is being undertaken by a team representing Canadian Arsenals Limited, the defence research council and the Canadian army. We will keep in close touch with corresponding teams working in Great Britain and the United States. From discussions I have had in Washington with the secretary of the army, Hon. Frank Pace, and with Lord Alexander, secretary of defence in the United Kingdom, during the last week, it is evident that there will be a full interchange of information and a genuine effort to arrive at a common goal. As it is, the British and American weapons that have been designed and are in process of further development are very much closer to each other than they were a year ago.

Like the British, we are tooled up to make the ·303 rifle and round and have a sufficient number of these to enable us to meet any current requirements and, pending further production, to equip our forces. Should this become necessary in another world war we could go into production at a high rate on the existing ·303 rifle and round in a short time.

Until the end product of this development effort by the countries concerned becomes more evident, it would obviously be unwise for us today to go into the production of more than the minimum needed to fill immediate needs. Everyone at some time is going to adopt a new rifle and round. When that time may be, it is impossible to say.

As regards field guns, we are making the 155 millimetre American-type gun for ourselves, for the United States, and for mutual aid to North Atlantic nations. This gun, like the ships to which I referred and the 3-inch 50 calibre gun, is being produced at Sorel, and quantity production will begin before many months are passed. At Sorel production is also being undertaken on the 120 millimetre gun for the United States army.

Anti-tank weapons and mortars are largely accepted as standard and both weapons and ammunition are being produced in Canada today.

Another problem presented by our type of force particularly is the standard of living we are going to provide for our armed forces. We have set as the right standard the standard of living which men of similar education and aptitude would obtain in corresponding civilian occupations with good employers. The committee on defence expenditure went into this and I am not going into it in any detail now. Moreover, there are some interesting figures in the white paper.

There are one or two points, however, to which I should further refer, particularly on construction. I mention this because people are surprised at the amount of construction we are finding it necessary to undertake. This year we are seeking a total of $563 million for construction, part of it to be met out of cash appropriations for this year, and part out of commitments for future years. Of this we expect to spend $244 million in the current year, as compared to $92 million in 1940-41 or $152 million for the wartime peak year of 1943-44, and $173 million for last year.

The reason for part of this construction is doubling the size of the regular forces in the two years since Korea. An increase from 47,000 to 97,000 means that we have to find accommodation somewhere for the single men and the married men and their families equivalent to a city having a total population of 50,000. That is a lot of construction.

Wherever possible this is found through the renovation of wartime huts; but there is a limit, physical as well as financial, to what can properly be done along these lines. These huts were only expected to have a life of four or five years and for the most part were built in the cheapest and quickest way that could be found. A two-storey air force H hut cost $59,500 in 1941 and accommodated 304 men on a double-bunk basis. It now accommodates 168 men on a single bed basis after renovation. Today it costs about $100,000 to renovate such a hut; and that has been done with all the huts in locations where they can be used. That gives them an extra life of about 30 years.

To build a new R.C.A.F. barrack block for 250 men costs a total of $592,590. That allows about eighty square feet of space per man, which is about what is laid down by health authorities. This provides for four men in a room 16 by 20 feet, and it is contemplated that in an emergency we would have double decker beds and so double this accommodation.

In addition officers and men must have mess halls and kitchens. The standard mess hall seats 500 men and has kitchen equipment that can deal with 1,000. The type of building, the amount of space, the quality of furniture and the kitchen equipment are about what you will find in an average cafeteria. This building is done for us by Defence Construction Limited, as agent for the Department of Defence Production.

Married quarters are built according to designs worked out by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and provide similar standards of accommodation to those used by C.M.H.C. in housing projects and veterans' plans across the country. We collect for rent for these houses an amount which varies in proportion to the subsistence allowance for the married officer or man. If he gets a married quarter he does not get the allowance except for approximately $10. The amount collected for rent varies from $51 for a private to $103 in the case of a major, and there is not much difference, generally speaking, in the accommodation. I found recently in one Canadian city that they had a subsidized housing plan, assisted under the provisions of the National Housing Act, under which they were building 88 houses. The accommodation was about the same as our married quarters. However, the average rent was $41, with the lowest at $20, indicating an average lower than the lowest we charge private soldiers.

In addition to living accommodations there are operational buildings of all types, including depots, warehouses, workshops for all three services, as well as hangars and radar stations costing very large sums. Of the construction program this year we plan to spend roughly 30 per cent on living accommodation and the like and 70 per cent on operational buildings and services.

Obviously we must give the service personnel shelter and must provide this on a standard comparable to that they would enjoy if they were in equivalent positions in civilian life. It should be remembered that a good part of the service personnel spend a good part of each year living under conditions of considerable hardship, and virtually all of them are posted to another station every two, three or four years. This has a definite bearing on the type of accommodation and the scale of the furnishings provided. All this affects the morale of our armed forces. They must know that the treatment they get, the food they receive, the clothing they are issued and the weapons they use are as good as can be found. That is our intention. Everyone who has been in Korea or in Europe says that the morale of the Canadian forces is as high as it has ever been. I believe that is true also of the men in Canada.

We civilians, we people in parliament, can affect the morale of our forces. It must be remembered that this is a large operation. It is an effort by the whole people of Canada. Just think of it; we have in the armed forces, active and reserve, and their dependents, along with the civilians engaged in the work of the Department of National Defence; in those engaged directly in defence production, in defence industry or in support of those operations, just about a million and a half Canadian people or 10 per cent of the population of Canada. We are seeking in this vote an amount which represents about 10 per cent of the national income of Canada. Consequently it is right to say that this is an effort requiring the support of us all, indeed the support of all of Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, the policy of the government as far as national defence is concerned has been discussed on several occasions during the early part of this session. The minister called attention to the various debates which have been held. Only a few days ago a white paper was issued entitled "Canada's defence program 1952-53". Since very little new information has been given to us, either in the minister's remarks this afternoon or in the white paper, I do not intend to spend a great deal of time discussing policies upon which I have already offered my comments.

When the policy was outlined two years ago all hon. members supported the general principle of supplying strength in order to prevent aggression and playing our part by supplying such forces as were necessary under the United Nations agreement or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to prevent the spread of aggression where aggression had already broken out. I think all hon. members realize today that we must continue our efforts in that direction.

The minister referred to the developments which have taken place in the two years since the outbreak of aggression in Korea, and he took particular credit to the government for the development in the strength, equipment and organization of our forces during that time. If it was necessary to make such a great effort during the last two years since the outbreak in Korea, it must be realized that the same government was in power and had in pre-Korean days allowed the defence forces of this country to sink to a position where they were far below the point which would provide reasonable security; nor were they in a state of efficiency or strength to enable us to meet such international obligations as we might be called upon to meet. In the pre-Korean days members on this side of the house called attention to the state of our defence forces. There had been a rapid demobilization of equipment and camps, a depletion of units and a failure to keep up training strength so that when the actual threat of aggression did arise there had to be a rapid semi-mobilization, the sudden bringing into force of hastily organized units and reconditioning of camps which had been allowed to fall into disuse, and the hasty transfer of personnel from shore establishments to ships and from one unit to another in order to have something ready.

This government had allowed the defences of the country to fall into a perilously low state and, as the minister said, it was not until then, and only then, that the government woke up to the necessity of providing adequate defences for Canada. What has been the result of this hasty speed-up to which reference has been made? We see that in these quickly organized units there has been exceedingly heavy wastage of personnel compared with the numbers taken on strength. In the white paper tabled in the house a couple of days ago one finds that the total strength at March 31, 1952 was 95,394 and that during the previous year of 1951-52 the intake into the forces numbered 39,033 while the wastage was 12,066. The heavy wastage of one in three is indicative of the lack of foresight used in the hasty mobilization of such forces as were required.

Those of us who were members of the committee on defence expenditure realize that there have been exceptionally heavy losses due to theft, fire and other causes, losses which are costing the taxpayers of Canada many millions of dollars. In part that is also due to the speed with which it was necessary to build up our forces after the period of stagnation that had existed in the pre-Korean days. I am wondering whether we are really building up our forces along the right line. Are we not still building up our forces so far as their organization is concerned along the old traditional lines that have been in existence for many years? The minister used words to the effect that if war broke out today we would have to fight largely with the weapons of world war II. I can think of no more disturbing statement that could be made to the house eight years after the hostilities of world war II ceased.

With the threat of aggression today and the possibility of war almost around the corner, we are told that we would have to fight another war largely with the weapons with which we fought world war II. What concerns me even more is the fact that if we had to go to war today we should have to fight with very much the same organization we had in world war II. Have we really taken cognizance of modern trends? Are we really aware of the new concept of war today which consists so much of highly mobile hard-hitting units to which I have referred in the past? Surely the day of large formations of infantry soldiers is really past. The whole modern trend as visualized by modern military writers indicates that far more reliance will be placed on small, compact forces which are capable of being transported by air, are highly mobile and can be moved to any theatre of war.

A few years ago we heard a good deal of talk about the unification or integration of the various services. It seems to me we are drifting farther and farther away from the concept of a unified defence force. In the white paper to which I have already referred there is a discussion on page 5 of our contribution to the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We are told that the R.C.A.F. squadrons which are to be sent to Europe will be organized into an air division which is the air force formation normally adequate to provide air support for an army of four or more front line divisions. We are not relating our contribution as far as fighter forces are concerned to the contribution we are making so far as ground forces are concerned. We are supplying a ground force of one brigade, the 27th, to Europe; but so far as the air force is concerned we are making a contribution equivalent to the formation which would normally provide air support for four or more front line divisions.

We have not got four or more front line divisions. We do not plan to place four or more front line divisions in Europe; but it seems to me there should be some relation between the type of ground force and the type of air force that we are supplying. It seems to me we are still thinking in terms of world war I and world war II when we talk about the number of air force fighter squadrons which will support front line divisions.

Another indication of the additional expense which has been caused to the taxpayers of this country on account of the hastily organized forces is, in my opinion, this question of rotation. It has been found necessary to have this very expensive form of rotation; and it is very expensive if you are going to ship personnel across the Atlantic to Europe and leave them there for a period of only twelve months. For centuries the forces of Great Britain have been organized on the Cardwell system which provides for one regular battalion of a regiment to be stationed abroad and another battalion to be stationed in the United Kingdom, the two units being rotated periodically; but there never was such an extravagant form of rotation as that of transferring personnel of those units between the homeland and overseas every year.

Obviously the efficiency of the unit cannot be maintained with such rapid rotation of personnel; and though perhaps more men are gaining some experience, the unit cannot hope to maintain the same standard of efficiency as it would if there was a more extended period. Therefore I think the minister is wise to suggest that a change be made to extend the period of rotation, to somewhat reduce the enormous expenses which are now burdening the taxpayer; but I doubt very much if a period of an additional six months will meet the requirements.

The minister then referred to the question of the air force contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and indicated that the bottleneck might not be the actual raising of the personnel or the provision of aircraft but in the construction of airfields. That danger was brought to the minister's attention many months ago by the leader of the opposition who, at the last session of this parliament, called attention to the lack of technical troops in Europe and advocated the provision of engineer units which would assist in the construction of these necessary airfields in France and Germany. It is obvious that airfields are the most essential requisite for the efficient operation of any air force. We know that the airfields in France were largely destroyed and have not been rebuilt. Much of the big machinery which was available in France in pre-war days had been moved away into Germany. France suffered the experience of being an occupied power for many years and it would naturally take her some considerable time to once again build up her construction industry, which in France was faced with tremendous obstacles and with a tremendous task because there had been all the destruction of her cities and lines of communication. Those had to be restored in order to bring about an economic revival in France. That had to go on side by side with the reconstruction of military facilities which were essential for maintaining the forces of NATO, and it is therefore quite obvious that one of the first things that must be done before any R.C.A.F. component can work in Europe is to provide the additional airfields.

We are told there are to be two airfields constructed in Germany and two in France which will accommodate the twelve squadrons of the R.C.A.F. which are to be sent there. I believe that in this white paper the cost is mentioned as being somewhere in the neighbourhood of $22·7 million. That is a heavy expense to meet, and I wonder if there are not ways by which it might be reduced. I believe the paper mentions that the land for these airfields will be provided by the Republic of France but that the construction of the buildings, the construction of the landing strips and the general preparation of the airfield with all the necessary equipment will be paid for by Canada.

If that is so I cannot help feeling that Canada should approach the construction of these airfields along the most economical lines possible. If we simply tell the French government to go ahead and do the necessary work and we will pay for it, then we are not likely to have a very economical contract. It seems to me that if we are going to pay for this work we should have a good deal to say as to how this work is going to be done, the type of machinery which is going to be used, and if necessary what firms are to carry it out. I do hope there are plans extant which will see that the construction of these airfields which are going to cost the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars will be carried out in the most economical as well as the most efficient manner possible.

I say I think it is of the utmost importance that these airfields be constructed. In fact I would attach more importance to the construction of these airfields than to the dispatch of the actual fighter squadrons. I am not sure that it should be necessary for us to have all twelve squadrons located in Europe at one and the same time. I hope the minister will be able to tell us the causes which led up to the inclusion of the additional squadron and why that has become necessary, and will indicate the number of R.C.A.F. personnel who will actually be stationed in Europe. After all, it does not take very long these days to fly a squadron of jet planes to Europe. One sometimes wonders whether the actual stationing of those troops in Europe is essential. I have no quarrel at all with the provision of those squadrons, but I wonder if they could not get their training as efficiently here in Canada, where the facilities for flying are better than in Europe. Might that not be a sound reason for retaining some of these squadrons here?

I can see the advantage of having certain squadrons immediately available in Europe. I can see the advantage of certain personnel receiving training in Europe and becoming accustomed to flying conditions there; but we are placing practically all our eggs in one basket by sending by far the larger portion of our fighter aircraft and our trained air force personnel to Europe. We understand there will be a discussion on the various types available for such squadrons as remain here in Canada until such time as the CF-100 becomes available. I do not intend to discuss the question of policy at any greater length, because as I said before it has already been discussed.

I welcome the minister's suggestion that we deal with the estimates section by section as indicated in the details, starting off I presume with departmental administration and inspection. Before we go on to a detailed discussion, I should like to say a word of appreciation to the minister for the way he has accepted the suggestion which was made last year that more details be given in the pages of detail where, following the practice of other departments, the number of personnel in the various ranks has been set out. The only thing I think we might have had a little improvement in is the way in which headings are given. It was much easier to follow the various headings in last year's estimates than it is in this year's estimates. For instance, the navy, army and so forth were set out far more clearly, enabling you to find the various items for the services more easily in the details last year than in the details as shown in this year's book.

You will recall, sir, that when we were discussing these estimates last year you called every item. I think if we are to have an orderly discussion of these estimates, without limiting the powers of the members to ask various questions, it would meet my convenience at least if these headings, such as defence services, administration, navy, army, were called instead of going down through all these minor headings such as civilian salaries and wages, civilian allowances and so forth as was done last year. I think that would not only assist the minister but would give all members of the house a wider range for questioning. It would not limit them quite so much. I have some questions to ask, so if there are other members who wish to discuss policy, I shall sit down.

The Chairman: Is the procedure suggested by the minister, and as qualified by the member for Nanaimo, agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thomas: I am not going to make a long speech on the policy of the department, because earlier this session I made my stand abundantly clear. I should like to take just a few moments, though, and make some comments on the evidence brought out in the defence expenditure committee. Possibly the minister could make some reply later. I agree with the member for Nanaimo that the estimates of this department are much clearer and are put down in better form than they were previously. I agree with the minister that I think his department is wise in going rather slowly on orders for small arms until some measure of standardization can be attained amongst the various NATO countries.

I should like to mention briefly the fires and thefts that have occurred in the various establishments, as mentioned in the defence committee. I am not going to be critical at all, except to say that it appeared to me that in many cases the department was asking for trouble. For example the answers given to me in committee concerning 26 C.O.D. showed that in March 1950 the value of the building was estimated at $900,000 and the stores contained therein at $18 million. When the fire occurred in June, 1951, the stores were valued at $16,720,000. In January, 1952, the stores were valued at $23,850,000. It would appear to me that the average value of the stores contained in 26 C.O.D. would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $19 million.

The thing which struck me most forcibly during our investigations into the fires was the fact that, prior to the first fire and the recommendations made as a result of that fire, no sprinkling system had been installed and there was very little in the way of fire-fighting equipment. It would appear that in an establishment of this kind, where such tremendous sums of money were involved, every possible precaution against fire should have been taken. I agree that immediately after the investigation was made and recommendations were sent in, a good many steps were taken to eliminate the fire hazard in that particular building. But when we have a value somewhere in the neighbourhood of $20 million on the average, including the building and the stores contained therein, and particularly when no insurance can be carried, I would think every precaution should be taken at all times, and should have been taken before there were any fires whatsoever.

I did not have the time to dig into the various stores across the country, but I would imagine that very much the same condition could be found in all the various establishments that one might go into. I should like to know from the minister whether or not the same precautions and the same steps that are being taken at No. 26 C.O.D. and in some of the other places that we visited and investigated during the sittings of the committee are being taken in other parts of Canada.

I might suggest to the minister at the same time that even if it entails a little additional cost to the government or to the people of Canada, the whole thing might be speeded up. Those precautions might be instituted with a minimum of investigation, because in the long run we would probably save money, regardless of whether or not the thing were a hundred per cent perfect. We realize too that in the fall of 1951 a contract was issued to instal a sprinkler system in No. 26 C.O.D., which of course was after the second fire. I believe it is pretty well installed now. However, in my opinion it should have been done at the time the building was constructed.

I would not want to indicate that there is any doubt in my mind at the present time that they are doing everything they feel is possible to rectify the faults that are there. The point I should like to make is that in future, when any stores depot or other building that entails a lot of expense is constructed, all these fire protection devices should be installed at the time of construction. If that were done we would save a whole lot of money, particularly in installation costs, if there were any fire at a later date.

Speaking generally on the theft situation, I do not want to make it appear that I think it is a bad thing. You are bound to find a certain amount of theft anywhere, whether it be in the service, in private life or in any kind of establishment. I know; I was in business myself, and used to lose the odd article out of the store. But I do think that in many instances the security precautions are not stiff enough. So far as No. 26 C.O.D. is concerned, for the life of me I have not been able to find out how anyone could take anything of any value out of there. Therefore any thefts out of there, particularly in recent times, are bound to be of a minor nature. But at the REME training camp at Barriefield they have 1,216 acres. At the time of the thefts they had a security guard of only six men, which I think is entirely insufficient to cover a camp of that size, which would cover almost two sections. Perhaps the minister can indicate that these guards in the various establishments have been increased and that further precautions are being taken. I certainly hope so. I bring this to the minister's attention in the hope that he is considering some tightening up of the security regulations and some increase in the security guards. When the minister replies I hope he will tell us that that has been done.

Item stands.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. DREW—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. SINCLAIR IN DEBATE ON JUNE 23

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish on a question of privilege to deal with something which was said yesterday at a time when I was not in the house. I might explain that it was necessary for me to be absent at a funeral at the time the hon. member for Coast-Capilano placed on record, together with certain statements which I do not propose to deal with in detail, one statement I feel should be corrected without delay. In his remarks, as reported at page 3568 of Hansard, which I did not have the opportunity to read when the house met this morning because it was not yet in my hands, I find that he quoted what purports to be a Canadian Press dispatch reading as follows, and referring to speeches I had made:

> Speaking in French, he told audiences here, at Normandin, Mistassini and St. Felicien that family allowances should be increased, even doubled.

I feel sure, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was well aware that this statement had been corrected. I noticed in the report that he had used some typically complimentary remarks about those who corrected press reports at other times. I have no doubt that his remarks applied to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and other ministers who have found occasion to make such corrections in recent months. In this case, however, I am not relying upon any correction of my own. The remarks I made were well and fully reported in L'Action Catholique and Le Soleil which were represented at those meetings by reporters. They were in fact the only reporters present. The reports were accurate in every detail. They were based upon a written text which was strictly followed and which had been handed to them. I brought this to the attention of the Canadian Press when I saw their report on returning to Ottawa. I received a letter from the general manager of the Canadian Press, dated June 5, after they had an opportunity to inquire into the circumstances. That letter, in referring to this subject, had this to say:

We very much regret our inaccuracy and are issuing a corrective story for morning papers tomorrow.

I place that on record, Mr. Speaker, because the Canadian Press itself expressed its regret concerning this inaccurate report. I do not know yet what the source of that report was. There was no statement of mine made which by the greatest stretch of the imagination justified such a report. The papers which were represented there gave very full and very accurate reports, which indicated quite clearly that I had made no suggestion that family allowances be doubled. The Canadian Press very properly, and with the courtesy one would expect, after inquiring into the details, expressed to me their regret that they had on this occasion used an inaccurate report in their condensation of the dispatch they had received.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not see the apology by the Canadian Press in the papers. This statement of course received very wide coverage in the newspapers of Canada. I of course accept the statement of the leader of the opposition. But while I am on my feet I would like him also to comment on whether or not the quotation from one of his radio speeches in which he makes very offensive remarks about Quebec and the families of Quebec is accurate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to comment on offensive remarks of that kind, which have no relation to the subject.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: I was only seeking to keep the quotations accurate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members should know that when Mr. Speaker is on his feet they should, if they are standing, resume their seats.

Mr. Sinclair: I am sorry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think Mr. Speaker should have to call "order" several times to have hon. members resume their seats.

Bill No. 388, for the relief of Ruby Lydia Donnelly Champion.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 389, for the relief of Edna Edith Lily Caron Gourdie.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the house will not be surprised if I say that I still feel this is not the place to be dealing with these divorce bills, being Bill No. 363 and Bills Nos. 367 to 389 inclusive, or any other divorce bills. I have taken that view with respect to the two or three hundred bills that have been put through the parliamentary divorce mill at this session. I am sure that in expressing that view with respect to these bills and the others that have gone through I express the view of a great many people in this country.

These petitioners having gone through the rigmarole which is associated with applying for bills of divorce, I would not regard it as being fair to them to delay them further at this stage of the session, and for that reason I am not objecting to the request of the hon. member for Lisgar that this batch of bills be considered for second reading under the one motion. But I repeat my insistence that some day we must get divorce out of parliament.

Motion agreed to and bills read the second time.

BOUNDARY PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, June 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation—Mr. Larson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Chairman, when Bill No. 62, to incorporate Boundary Pipeline Corporation, was before the committee last Friday evening I took advantage of that opportunity to air certain of my own views. It just so happened that I was not given that opportunity until eight or ten minutes before nine o'clock, with the result that I was unable to conclude my observations during the time left to me. It was not my intention to talk out the measure, but it happened that I was speaking at the expiry of the hour allotted to private bills.

Last Friday I laid emphasis on the fact that what I was taking objection to was the procedure we follow in this house in granting charters to companies similar to the one we are dealing with at this time. I realize fully that objection to a company being granted a charter results in many cases from the conviction held by certain persons that gas or oil should not be exported from Canada. My personal view, as I have stated before, is that I have no objection, providing all the circumstances are as I think they should be, to the export of gas and oil from Canada.

I have indicated upon more than one occasion that I believe a province is justified in authorizing the export of gas and oil, particularly when it is concerned about seeing that the requirements of the people of that province are met as far as it is economically and physically feasible to do so. I would take the same attitude with respect to the export of gas and oil from Canada. I am fully convinced that when we contemplate the export of gas from Canada we should at all times be governed by the realization that as far as is economically possible the requirements of the Canadian people should be supplied.

If I were opposing this particular application for a charter on the ground that it might at some time engage in the export of either gas or oil, then in order to be consistent I would have had to do the same thing with respect to the other applications by companies which have been before us and which might possibly eventually export gas or oil from Canada. Once again I say that my principal objection is to the procedure for dealing with these matters.

I pointed out last Friday that for years we have held the view that such applications should not be dealt with by this parliament but by a semi-judicial body—we mentioned the board of transport commissioners—which should be given authority to do what we are presuming as a parliament to do at this time. I mentioned also that as long as we have applications from companies of this type coming before us, just so long are we going to find ourselves confronted with prolonged and protracted debates such as we have witnessed in connection with this application. In 1949 when the pipe line bill was being considered by a committee of the house we supported the idea that there should be a clause in the bill under which companies seeking charters would appear before a semi-judicial body, and that body could be the board of transport commissioners.

I rather fancy that much of the difficulty we have encountered in the house results from certain things which took place in the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Regardless of what anyone may say, regardless of what defences may be put up, to me it is perfectly obvious that there was an effective effort to cut off the hearing of evidence in that committee. I have been a member of many committees during the past dozen years. Personally I have never encountered a situation before where I could conscientiously say there was an obvious attempt to cut off the hearing of evidence. I am afraid, however, there is sufficient evidence to indicate that that is what took place in this case. I think the chairman of any committee and the government majority on any committee would be well advised to go all-out to see to it that no room is left for a charge that the hearing of evidence was cut off. I also think it is wrong to refuse to hear witnesses where it is earnestly believed, not necessarily by the majority but by a substantial number of members of a committee, that other witnesses should be heard. If such requests are not granted then again it contributes toward a situation such as we have in this case. In fact I think it is bad policy to indicate almost arbitrarily when a witness is before a committee that so much will be heard from him and no more; and that was also done in this case.

I agree with a good deal of what the leader of the opposition said last Friday night. He pointed out that by granting a charter in this way we are automatically conferring upon the company broad, sweeping powers which become automatic as a consequence of section 7 of the Pipe Lines Act. That becomes particularly important when one realizes that very few of the members of this house, conceivably none, know exactly where the pipeline route is to finally go. I think of the powers of expropriation and the broad powers conferred upon a company under section 7 of the Pipe Lines Act. When one realizes at the same time that in the final analysis we have no idea at all where the pipe line is actually to run, then I believe we are taking upon ourselves a responsibility which as members of this house we should not have to bear.

I agree fully with the leader of the opposition, and as I stated last Friday night I think the government should initiate amendments to the Pipe Lines Act of 1949 authorizing the procedure I have outlined. The company would then appear before the board of transport commissioners. Witnesses could be heard and all relevant evidence procured. As a further safeguard there is of course the right of the province from whence the product, be it gas or oil, must come in the first instance before it can be transported to any other part of Canada.

Once again I want to emphasize that I am not trying to filibuster the bill. I am not saying what I am saying because of any personal opposition so far as the question of export is concerned. Certain recent developments lead me to the conclusion that if we desire to procure external markets, particularly for gas, we may have to hurry. I realize fully that possibly the province of Alberta is not in a position today so far as gas production is concerned to authorize a great many companies who apply for permits to export gas to do so at this time, but they do anticipate adequate reserves to enable substantial export. However, the thing that worries me a bit is whether, when we reach the stage where we have the required surpluses to export, markets will then be open to us for that product. I am not going to make any further observations at this time. I hope the government will see fit to amend the Pipe Lines Act as I have suggested. I am sure the house would thereby be relieved of a heavy responsibility which I do not think belongs to this house. I think the whole matter could be dealt with in the best interests of the Canadian people by proceeding in that way.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to what the hon. member for Red Deer has said—

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member will allow the hon. member for Kindersley, who is the sponsor of the bill, an opportunity to speak. I see he has risen in his place.

Mr. Larson: Mr. Chairman, I know it has been said around the house from time to time that people have talked out their own bills, but in this case I see there are many others who are prepared to carry out that function and I feel I should be given an opportunity to say something on the bill.

I was approached some two years ago to sponsor this bill in the House of Commons. I considered the matter, and there were several points which immediately came to mind. One consideration was the fact that the proposed line was to go to Winnipeg. I probably felt that in going to Winnipeg it might not be serving the country to the best advantage. However, when I considered that the province of Alberta was obviously not prepared to be responsible for the amount of gas required to supply all Canada at this time, I felt some start should be made in supplying gas to the neighbouring provinces.

At the present time it would appear that the province of Alberta is not prepared to supply gas for export in any quantity until such time as the industrial development of Alberta based on a gas economy has been achieved. It is also quite possible that some considerable time could elapse before any major export from Alberta became a fact. It seemed to me that with this point in mind the province of Alberta might be prepared to make available for export a limited supply of gas much sooner than it would be prepared to be responsible for transcontinental supply. It seemed only justice to me that the very cold provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba should rate the same priority as Alberta's sister province of British Columbia.

In my opinion opposition to the bill has resolved around two major considerations. The first was put forward by the hon. member for Calgary West, who claimed that the economics of a line from Medicine Hat to Winnipeg were such that this parliament had no right to grant the company a charter. In his statement before the committee he made the point that he wanted parliament to make the final decision as to the economics of the line and in the process of making this decision a national gas policy should be evolved. He based his argument on the fact that the board of transport commissioners was too pressed with other matters to properly look into all phases of pipe line development in Canada. On this latter point I submit that a change of government policy would be involved and, as such, I do not propose to debate the matter at this time.

[The Chairman.]

As to the economics, I would suggest that this parliament is responsible first to see that the people financing the line are able to carry out their obligations if granted the necessary charter and the necessary permits. I think that point has been amply satisfied. Second, I submit this parliament should satisfy itself that the design engineers are competent to advise. That point should be amply satisfied because the engineers have vast experience in pipe-line construction in the United States; and if they are not competent to advise on this proposed company's operation, I do not feel that the advice is to be procured anywhere.

On the economic side I submit that if any money is to be advanced by any financial house their reputation will be ruined if they advance that money on an uneconomic proposal. After all, when the consideration of whether people are going to advance money on any proposition comes up, it is the financiers who finally settle the matter; and I say I think that point should be amply satisfied.

Then the hon. member for Calgary West stated that as yet he was not satisfied in his own mind—and I think quite rightly so—whether the eventual supply of gas to central or eastern Canada should properly come as an exchange with the United States or whether a pipe line across Canada was the solution.

There is another main point raised by those opposed to this bill. It is that if this line is built its eventual extension will be into the United States with no regard to the needs of those two great areas in Canada, first the lakehead and then central or eastern Canada. It has been mentioned that if this company is granted a charter it is horning in for nuisance value on somebody who has already been granted a charter to construct a trans-Canada pipe line; and that if it is granted a charter it will hold up that construction for many years.

It has been stated that this is a plot by the Fish Engineering Company to form a Canadian subsidiary to block us from ever having Canadian gas in eastern Canada. It was stated before the parliamentary committee that the Fish Engineering Company at present had no financial interest in the proposed Boundary Pipeline Corporation, and I think that statement can be substantiated.

Coming to the matter of the eventual extension of this gas line to the United States, a point which seems to cause great disagreement, I submit that in considering this bill that does not come into the matter at all because Western Pipe Lines has already been granted a charter to do the very thing these people are accused of intending to do. If that charter is already granted and the matter is already settled I cannot see how holding up this bill is going to satisfy any of the considerations which the opponents of this bill claim will exist. If gas is finally exported from Alberta in quantity I do not see how it is going to change the matter one little bit whether this bill is held up or not. The only thing that will do is give Western Pipe Lines a monopoly. I do not think that is Liberal policy, and I do not think it is the policy of others in the house who are opposed to this bill.

I feel that if gas can eventually be supplied to eastern Canada by a pipe line going across Canada on Canadian soil that should happen, and any person who has the interests of Canada at heart should think the same thing. I also suggest that the rule should not be so rigidly applied that gas would never be brought to eastern Canada or that it would be brought to eastern Canada at prices at which the interruptible industrial market could not buy it. I do not think that should happen at all. I believe the benefits of gas should be brought to eastern Canada by an all-Canadian route if that can be done. The hon. member for Calgary West said he was not sure that was the proper way to do it.

If we view this whole matter of the passing of this bill from a realistic standpoint, does it not all boil down to the fact that this company is merely asking for incorporation? It is asking for the right to become an entity so it can compete in a fair and equitable way with the people who have already been granted charters to build pipe lines.

Canadians have always felt, and history has shown, that much of our great advance is due to the fact that we have free competition in this country. Competition has demanded that the greatest economy be exercised so the producer gets the most for his product and so that the end consumer pays the least. I submit that principle applies here. By using this parliament to protect the interests of pipe-line companies already incorporated the Canadian public is being done a great disservice; and this parliament, in the way it is acting, is making itself a part and parcel of the disservice that is being done to the Canadian people.

If in the next year a supply of gas is available and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is ready to build this line across Canada with ample finances and all the other requirements of the board of transport commissioners, it will emerge as the only company in the field. I have no objection to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines getting the eventual right to build that line; but what incentive will there be on the part of the people sponsoring that company, of the principals, to give the maximum price to the producer in the field and charge the minimum price to the consumer at the other end, because they will have a monopoly from the producer standpoint, and a monopoly from the consumer standpoint. On the other hand if the economy of this pipe-line development dictates that there will be reciprocal exchange of gas between Canada and the United States, and if the economics of it dictate that gas should be sent into the United States and brought back into Canada, Western Pipe Lines have a monopoly in that field. It might be all right to protect what would eventually become a monopoly; but it has never been the policy of the supporters of any Liberal governments in this country —and those governments have been fairly successful—to support any monopoly.

I submit that if this parliament does its duty and allows any responsible group of individuals to incorporate themselves into a pipe-line company, the board of transport commissioners will be in a much better position to render proper judgment. That will be because every single company that appears before that board of transport commissioners will really have to have its pencil sharp and get down to brass tacks, because there will be competition. They will have to get their economy to the point where they are giving the absolute maximum to the producer of gas and charging the absolute minimum to the consumer. They will only be able to keep enough in the middle to carry themselves on an economic and proper business basis. The operating costs will have to be cut to a minimum, and the citizens of Canada will reap the greatest benefit. The board of transport commissioners can carry out this duty by giving the final go ahead to the pipe-line company which is prepared to pay the highest possible price and charge the lowest possible price at the other end. Instead of the pipe-line company being the master of the Canadian people, the Canadian people will be its master. That is the situation which I think should exist. I believe any fair-minded Canadian should be of the same opinion, because these companies are well able to look after themselves.

I want to refer for a moment to an issue of the Financial Post of June 14, 1952. The editorial on the front page is headlined "Ridiculous hold-up", and it reads:

> Parliament pays lip service to reform of its procedures, but until it acts on this important clean-up and modernization, the house will often make nothing but a foolish spectacle of itself and important business will be neglected.

That editorial goes on in the same vein for several paragraphs, and then it says:

> Even more important is the fact that even if Boundary gets the incorporation it wants, it can't do anything on its pipe-line plans without the sanction of the board of transport commissioners; a body much better equipped than the House of Commons to hear highly technical evidence and to allocate wisely route franchises.

It goes on to say:

> Let them have their incorporation. Let the house get ahead with its work. Let the fight as to what Boundary does next be fought in the place provided for such bouts.

I agree with that article. This is a paper which is highly regarded all over Canada. I do not see why this House of Commons should continue this business of holding up the normal incorporation of a company. The financial people can do the job. The engineers can do the job. I do not feel that any government in Canada can sit by and watch something like this go on, thus protecting what will eventually become a monopoly. It will mean that one company will appear before the transport board and there will be, therefore, no competitive evidence upon which that body can base a decision. I submit the Canadian people will suffer. I believe this incorporation should be granted. I feel that we are doing the Canadian people a great disservice by carrying on in the way we have for the last few weeks.

Mr. Brooks: I was pleased to allow the hon. member for Kindersley to take my place, Mr. Chairman, and I have listened to his remarks with considerable interest. At the outset I might say he has not convinced me that this house should pass the bill which is before us. Hon. members might ask why I, coming from the maritime provinces, should be interested in a pipe line which is to be constructed from Alberta to other western provinces. In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I think I can say that it is a general interest that we have as citizens of Canada. We consider that what is good for one part of Canada would be good for all of us.

We may be a little envious of Alberta which today has this great natural resource, of which we have none in our province. I might say also that our interest extends to the fact that when this Dominion of Canada was formed there were only four provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. At that time we did have a great interest in the public domain of this country. These great natural resources which have been found in other parts of Canada were then part of the public domain, and at one time we did feel that we should have more than a passing interest in them.

This matter of the incorporation of a company, and the building of a pipe line, is a big problem. I feel that it would be a mistake for us, at this early stage of the development of this great gas industry in this dominion, to grant charters indiscriminately to every company making application. It might be said that all we in the parliament can do is grant the application, and that the feasibility of building and operating the pipe line could be decided by the transport commission. However, that is a chance that possibly we cannot take. Once we allow the matter out of our own hands we have very little control over the building of the line or the transportation of gas or oil. I did not have the opportunity of hearing the arguments before the committee which dealt with this matter. I was not a member of that committee. I have read certain of the arguments, however, and I have read the reports of the committee. I have listened also to the debate in this house on many occasions. We have had ample opportunity to listen to debates on pipe lines, not only on this bill but on many other pipe-line bills during the last two years.

From reading the reports of the committee, and also from listening to the debates in this house, regardless of what the hon. member for Kindersley has said this evening I am sure we must have some doubt as to the economic feasibility of constructing this Boundary transmission line. First there is the doubt raised in our minds by the small size of the pipe line which is to be constructed, and also as to the advantages it is claimed will accrue to the people the line is intended to serve. Then there is a doubt raised in our minds, I think a very reasonable doubt, as to whether Canada should export gas until her own needs have been fully supplied. I believe that is a very important problem and one which we should carefully consider.

I have listened to applications for the incorporation of many pipe-line companies in this house, not only for gas but for oil as well. The thought has often occurred to me that if we granted incorporation to all pipe-line companies requesting incorporation and those pipe lines were built, we would have pipe lines running in all directions across Canada. They would look like great snakes running from one end of the country to the other. I am sure that is something we should carefully consider. We all remember that in the early days when Canada was building railroads we were very careless and built more railroads per mile than this country required. Oil and gas transportation by pipe line is just another means of transportation, and I think we should carefully consider the problem to ensure that we do not repeat the mistakes we made in years gone by. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Red Deer when he says that somebody other than the parliament of Canada should deal with this matter of granting rights of incorporation in connection with pipe lines. I believe that body should be the board of transport commissioners. I have faith in the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, and I also have great faith in the Alberta government and in their good judgment to say what pipe lines should be built and what should not. I believe we can very well leave this matter to the consideration of the board of transport commissioners and the government of Alberta.

We know that the board of transport commissioners has also refused the Prairie Transmission company the right to build a pipe line down through British Columbia to the Pacific coast. We have heard that the Prairie Transmission Company Limited is also a subsidiary of the Fish Engineering Corporation, the same as the company which is now seeking incorporation.

There are three main problems which I have heard mentioned, and which should be considered. The hon. members from Alberta have stated very carefully that, as far as Alberta is concerned, the first consideration is to assure themselves that Alberta has all the gas it needs not only for the present but for some years to come. Since we are all Canadians, it does seem to me that our next consideration should be to see that Canada is preserving for herself a proper amount of gas, and that we are protected so far as the future is concerned. The third and last consideration should be what we are to do with any surplus we may have so far as exporting it to the United States is concerned. As I said, we are Canadians, and our first interest should be to see that the people of Canada are protected not only at the present time but in the future as well.

The hon. member for Kindersley sort of cast a little doubt on the quantity of gas that may be found in Alberta. If there is any limit to the supply, then definitely that limited supply should be saved for our own people. I think we could take a leaf from the book of the United States as far as this great asset is concerned. We have had ample evidence that the United States will not supply Canada until she herself has been satisfied. There is abundant evidence already on the record of this parliament to that effect. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Greenwood and many other hon. members have placed on Hansard the attitude of the United States government and the American people toward the export of gas. In that connection I should like to read from a report of the federal power commission in the United States relating to exportation. This case had to do with the application of Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Company, dated April 12, 1946, to export gas from the United States to Canada near the city of River Rouge, Michigan, to be sold and delivered to the Union Gas Company of Canada, Limited. The judgment reads as follows:

> No deliveries of natural gas shall be made to Union during the months of January, February, March, November and December in any year during the term of this authorization. Delivery of natural gas to Union shall be curtailed or interrupted whenever, and to the extent, required for the protection of deliveries of natural gas, either for immediate consumption or for storage, to any and all of applicant's customers in the United States. The authorization hereby granted shall not constitute ground or justification for any refusal by applicant to transport or sell natural gas to any person or municipality at any time during the time hereof, either for consumption in the United States by such person or municipality or for storage, or for resale for ultimate public consumption in the United States for domestic, commercial, industrial, or any other use, it being the intent of this authorization that at all times, persons and municipalities in the United States are to receive preferential service over that to Union.

As we all know, Union is a company in Ontario. That is a clear indication, Mr. Chairman, of the attitude of the people of the United States and of the authorities there to the exportation of gas from that country. There is other evidence of their attitude. As a matter of fact, in section 3 of their natural gas act they set out very clearly the attitude of the government of the United States to the exportation of gas from that country.

Mr. Murphy: You do not blame them for that policy, do you?

Mr. Brooks: Not a bit; I think it is a very wise and sensible policy. It is a policy that we should adopt in this country so far as the export of gas is concerned. Gas is not like our forests; it is not something that can be reproduced. Gas is a very expendable commodity. If we expend all the gas we have in this country in a few years in order to satisfy the people of this and the next generations, what are the people who come after us going to do? The policy adopted in the United States is to protect not only their own people at the present time—

Mr. Boisvert: Where does the gas come from with which you drive your car?

Mr. Brooks: We can get a lot from you.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the hon. member a question? During the last war where did the gas come from that was used in his car?

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member is talking about gasoline, and I am talking about another kind of gas altogether. If he would just pay attention—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Where does it come from?

Mr. Brooks: As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the gas that is found in Alberta is an expendable commodity. I was reading what the United States does in order to protect gas production. I am not speaking about gasoline, I might inform the hon. member for Charlotte.

Mr. Wood: It is all the same.

Mr. Brooks: As far as gasoline is concerned, if they wish to protect that great natural resource for their own people and let our people have only what is surplus, they may do so. As I say, the policy of the United States is one that appeals to the people of the United States, and if it is a good policy for the United States I think it could be applied to the people of the Dominion of Canada in so far as the exportation of gas is concerned.

Mr. Macnaughton: I move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. Green: You cannot do that.

The Chairman: I am sorry. I saw the hon. member for Mount Royal rise, but I did not hear what he had to say.

Mr. Macnaughton: I would like to move the adjournment of this debate on the Boundary Pipeline Corporation. There are two important bills that follow which are really of national interest, although they are in the nature of private bills. I am sure hon. members would co-operate with us to that extent. Since this is the last week of parliament, we hope, it is important that these bills get before the committee on banking and commerce. I say they are in the nature of public bills, although they come under the heading of private bills.

The Chairman: Since the hon. member for Royal has the floor he should not be interrupted, unless for the purpose of being asked a question, and only then with his consent. However, it may be that he would consent to the procedure suggested by the hon. member for Mount Royal.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member for Mount Royal had spoken previously to me in the matter and, out of courtesy to him, I am prepared to move the adjournment of the debate, on the condition that this order of business will come up again on Friday in its proper sequence.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

CANADIAN SHIPOWNERS MUTUAL ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 364, to incorporate the Canadian Shipowners Mutual Assurance Association.

Mr. Green: Will the sponsor of the bill give an explanation?

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) for his co-operation.

May I say at the outset that, while I do not want to dramatize this moment, it is only fair to tell hon. members that this is an historic moment in that it is the first time in Canadian insurance history that Canadian shipowners have banded together to form a mutual assurance association for protection against war risks in the event of a war breaking out.

The reason is very simple, and I shall make my explanation brief because I understand there is another bill to follow. Under present conditions marine insurance companies do not insure Canadian shipowners against war risks. The regular marine insurance companies in their policies usually have a 48-hour clause by which they may terminate any insurance covering a ship, in the event of the outbreak of war. Therefore the shipowner has two choices: (1) to leave his ship in harbour or (2) to negotiate a new contract with an insurance company at of course a greatly increased rate. The method of procedure in this instance is to form an association by which all the shipowners in Canada have the right to join a mutual non-profit association so that, in the event of war breaking out, they may have policies covering the value of their ships. These policies, in turn, are reinsured with the Canadian government which, it is felt, in wartime must assume the unnatural risk, if I may so describe it, of protecting private shipowners against losses from war risks.

The bill sets out the details as to who the incorporators are and the method by which they propose to operate this mutual benefit association. I think at this stage it would be wise to refer the bill to the committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

OGDENSBURG BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds) moved the second reading of Bill No. 365, to incorporate Ogdensburg bridge authority.

He said: Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this bill should be non-controversial, and in the light of the fact that it is to be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, I shall be brief in my explanation.

The purpose of the bill is to incorporate a company known as the Ogdensburg Bridge Authority. This company is to work in closest co-operation and conjunction with the bridge authority already set up by the house of assembly of the state of New York. I hold in my hand a copy of the measure passed by that legislative body.

There is a precedent for this bill inasmuch as it follows closely the legislation passed by this House of Commons to incorporate the Thousand Islands Bridge Company. The bill incorporating the company was passed in 1934, and there was an amending bill in 1936.

I might point out that the Prescott-Ogdensburg Ferry Company is to be recompensed, as well as the land owners whose property must be acquired in order to complete proper approaches to the bridge. This bridge will conform to all the requirements pertaining to the proposed St. Lawrence seaway. Tolls are to be charged, and will be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act.

As in the case of the Thousand Islands Bridge Company when the bonds or other financial obligations are amortised the bridge will automatically become the property of the state of New York and Canada, the south half of the bridge going to the state of New York and the north half to Canada. In turn Canada, by order in council or otherwise, can designate to which province the bridge will accrue.

I do not think there is anything further to be stated about the bill. I do feel that the more bridges we have built, the more tourists will come to Canada, the better the Americans will know us, and the closer will be the bonds between our two countries. I urge that the bill be given second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion before the dinner recess.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The Chairman: The committee is considering item 248 of the Department of National Defence. Shall we now begin consideration of the details of the vote according to the procedure agreed to earlier? These details are to be found at page 289 of the estimates. I shall call the groups of details, subheading by subheading. Under this procedure, then, the first of these is, "defence services; departmental administration, including inspection services".

Defence services—

Departmental administration, including inspection services.

Mr. Pearkes: I notice an increase of $3 million in connection with civil staff. The white paper indicates that during the year there has been an increase in the strength of the armed forces from 68,426 to 95,394 which, roughly speaking, is an increase to the extent of about one third. But the increase in headquarters staff is practically doubled, namely from $3,393,842 to $6,024,852. I cannot help feeling that this is an indication of what has been described earlier in the debate as an inflated headquarters.

Would the minister be good enough to explain this large increase? I notice that as part of the increase there are additional assistant deputy ministers. The increase in expenditures in connection with assistant deputy ministers has gone up from $8,000 to $29,500. There is an increase in personnel from one to three. Perhaps the minister could explain the duties of these assistant deputy ministers.

The only other thing I should like to bring up under this general heading of departmental administration is to ask for an explanation of the $2 million to be spent on the acquisition and construction of buildings. I am wondering whether the department is going ahead with what has sometimes been referred to in the past as an Ottawa pentagon; whether they are going to build a large headquarters building with that $2 million.

Mr. Claxton: In connection with the increase in deputy ministers, there are two additional assistant deputy ministers: E. B. Armstrong, who was formerly with the treasury board, and L. M. Chesley, formerly vice quartermaster general. They were needed to cope with the increased activities of the department.

With regard to the increase in the civilian staff, almost all this increase is due to the increased activities of the inspection services which are in almost direct proportion to the amount of equipment orders that have been placed.

With regard to the proposed pentagon, I am sorry to say that we have not made much progress. There was some opposition last year which perhaps assisted in our not making any progress. We were unable to arrive at any position with regard to the location of the proposed building. This must be undertaken at some future time, and the sooner the better, but it is not being undertaken now.

The additional amount for construction is in connection with a range for long-range artillery at Lake St. Peter amounting to $1,850,000, and magazines and power at Valcartier, $160,000, making a total of $2,010,000.

Mr. Pearkes: I notice that under inspection services the number of inspectors of stores has been increased from 161 to 350, as indicated on page 290, but the increase in the amount is only from $450,740 to $991,200. That hardly takes care of the large increase of some $3 million which is taken up entirely with personnel. Is there any other increase directly connected with the dockyards services?

Mr. Claxton: The personnel in the inspection services has just about doubled and the amount being provided for salaries is also just about doubled. With regard to other operations, there has been an increase in civilian personnel, but this is hardly commensurate with that in the armed forces except in the inspection services and operations of that kind.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the total increase in the civilian personnel covered by this particular heading?

Mr. Claxton: I am informed that more than 75 per cent of the increase to which the hon. member refers is due to the increase in the inspection services made necessary by the greater activities.

Mr. Pearkes: They would all be civilian. No doubt the minister will recall that there was some question about the civilian personnel being increased from 30,000, which was authorized a year ago, to 40,000. Are the salaries of those extra 10,000 provided for in this vote?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, no. This item deals only with an increase from 1,230 in 1951-52 to 2,512 in 1952-53. As I have said, by far the greatest part of that increase is accounted for by the increase in the activities of the inspection services.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister cannot tell me the actual increase in personnel?

Mr. Claxton: The actual increase under this item of administration?

Mr. Pearkes: The increase in amount, not in number.

Mr. Claxton: I just gave the increase in number, which is from 1,230 to 2,512. The increase in the amount would be $3,489,842 to $6,105,650 if you included prevailing rates and casuals in that category.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Thomas: The minister said this afternoon that seven ships had been launched for the Canadian navy. Can he state whether any have been commissioned? If none has been commissioned, can he state when the first one will be commissioned and when he expects the last of the seven will be commissioned?

Mr. Claxton: A number of minor vessels, such as minesweepers, are being commissioned this year, while others now under construction will not undergo their trials until late in 1953 and certainly will not be commissioned until 1954. I refer particularly to vessels such as the anti-submarine vessels, which are a totally new type. It is not possible to give dates because there may be all kinds of developments which will intervene. These are highly complicated vessels costing up to $15 million each and have never been produced before in any country. We aim at the highest possible production rate. We have seven on order and seven more to be ordered and we hope for the best.

Mr. Thomas: Can the minister tell me how many of the ships that have been launched or are expected to be launched this coming year are small vessels, such as gate vessels, and how many will be anti-submarine vessels?

Mr. Claxton: I can give my hon. friend a reference to page 18 of the white paper. We have commissioned one of the gate vessels, which is a ship. It is not an auxiliary vessel. Four are expected to be completed during the year. Of the fourteen minesweepers two were launched in 1951 and we hope they may be given trials this year. The patrol vessel Labrador was launched in 1951, commissioned in 1952 and we hope it will be ready for trials in the latter part of 1952 or in 1953.

Mr. Thomas: I gather that the majority of those already launched or expected to be launched during the coming year are what you might call auxiliary vessels?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Thomas: The anti-submarine vessels are not being launched at the present time?

Mr. Claxton: Several of them are being launched this year, but the major part of our launchings this year will be minesweepers which are not auxiliary vessels. In connection with the naval shipbuilding program, we are now engaged on the current construction of 33 major vessels of four different types, the construction, current and immediately intended, of some 41 minor auxiliary craft of eight different types and the conversion and rearmament, in some instances to the point of reconstruction, of some 40 major vessels of ten different types. It is a pretty complicated program.

Mr. Thomas: I would take it that the minesweepers under construction are somewhat of a modified Bangor type which will be available not only for minesweeping but for escort duty to some extent.

Mr. Claxton: They are minesweepers which can be made available to do the job that it is customary for coastal escorts to do.

Mr. Thomas: Something similar to the Bangor?

Mr. Claxton: That is right, but much more modern in design. They are of entirely new construction with new equipment and armament.

Mr. Thomas: I realize that.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed to the next subheading?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. I am a little confused as to the order of precedence we agreed upon before the dinner recess. I was a few minutes late getting back to the house after this debate was resumed at nine o'clock, and I must say I was a little surprised to find that the hon. member for Churchill, who took the adjournment, was not speaking. However, I would gather from what I have just heard that on the first item of general administration a general questioning or debate is being carried on. I have no intention of repeating the speech I made some several weeks ago when this matter was under general discussion for two days. However, there are a few remarks I should like to make.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps in order to clarify the situation for the benefit of the hon. member, I might inform him that a general discussion took place, and it was agreed once the general discussion was terminated the details appearing at page 289 and following would be discussed. It was agreed that the chair would call each subheading separately. Once the general discussion was terminated I called the first subheading which is "departmental administration, including inspection services". Discussion must be relevant to the details as they appear under that subheading on pages 289, 290 and 291. Once the discussion is terminated on these details I will call the next subheading which appears on page 292 under "navy", namely "Royal Canadian Navy—active force and general". Then I will move on to the next subheading until we have completed all the details under this item.

Mr. Harkness: Under this item I see the salary of the Minister of National Defence and his motorcar allowance and the salary of the deputy minister whom I see sitting in front of the minister, and so on. When you rose, Mr. Chairman, I was just about to refer to one or two remarks the minister made this afternoon, and in view of the fact that these items are under the heading "departmental administration" I think my remarks would be perfectly appropriate at this time.

The Chairman: That is precisely why I rose and gave my interpretation of the agreement entered into this afternoon between the minister and the hon. member for Nanaimo. I understood from the opening remarks of the hon. member that he might have liked to take part in the general discussion, but unfortunately he depended upon the hon. member for Churchill making a speech. If the hon. member for Churchill had been speaking when the hon. member came into the house, then the hon. member could have taken part in the general discussion. He indicated that he was a bit surprised to see that the hon. member for Churchill, who had taken the adjournment, was not speaking. It is unfortunate, but now that the general discussion is over I know the hon. member will not want me to have to call him to order too often, and that he will follow the agreed procedure and make his remarks relevant to the details as they appear under this subheading.

Mr. Harkness: Absolutely, Mr. Chairman. I should like to make one remark in connection with what the minister said this afternoon. He stated that the impression had gone abroad that the general world situation seemed to have improved. He went on to say that nothing, except one thing which I do not think he specified, would lead him to believe this general impression was correct. I should like to say I was extremely glad to hear the minister say what he did. I have been somewhat alarmed during recent months at the growth of what perhaps might be called a sort of ostrich view of affairs. In other words, the general opinion seems to have become rather current in the country during the last seven or eight months that everything is on the mend and that therefore the necessity for national defence was reduced.

I hope what the minister said in that regard will receive very wide publicity and will have a good effect in dissipating the view that the general world situation now is very much improved over what it was. In my view the events of the last two or three weeks particularly have confirmed that the general world picture is not only not better than it was but is possibly even worse. It seems to me that if the majority of people in this country get the idea firmly in their minds that everything is on the mend so far as the world picture is concerned they will also be convinced that the necessity for national defence is not very great and will not be prepared to support the defence effort one hundred per cent, which the minister indicated was absolutely essential.

I should also like to make some remarks with reference to the defence expenditures committee. I do not know exactly under what item of these details that might come. Possibly, Mr. Chairman, you might help me out of my difficulty in that regard so that when the appropriate item comes up I may say a few words on that subject. I shall leave it for the moment. So far as the defence objectives outlined in the white paper we received a couple of days ago are concerned, I think nobody in the house or throughout the country who has paid any attention to the matter has any quarrel whatever with them. We are all behind them one hundred per cent. Where any difference of opinion arises it is with respect to the means to be employed to carry those objectives into effect. In that regard of course I suppose there is bound to be a considerable difference of opinion.

I am still convinced, for example, that the expenditures on this particular matter we are dealing with, general administration, are greater than they need to be. I think the expenditures in regard to the equipping of our forces, training our forces, for accommodation provided for them and so on are greater than they need to be. That excess, if I may call it that, does not in my opinion contribute to a better and more efficient service but probably detracts from the efficiency of our defence effort.

I will say no more, Mr. Chairman, because I can see you are getting a little restive and I will address myself to one or two specific questions under this item. First, on these travelling and removal expenses, I see they are up from $290,500 to $910,000. These expenses of course have to do purely with the civil end of national defence headquarters, and I would ask why that very large increase is going to be necessary.

Mr. Claxton: The two largest items in this increased amount are in the audit staff, $80,000, and inspection service travel cost, $760,000. Those two items account for practically the whole increase.

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry I did not quite understand the minister's last statement. Do the inspection services account for $700,000 odd of that $910,000?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: What does that mean exactly? Do you mean you have a large number of inspection personnel on the road?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. We have virtually doubled the size of the inspection service during the year due to the fact that the amount of equipment delivery has more than doubled, and a great part of the work has to be done away from the inspection service bases, which requires transportation.

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact the next matter I was going to speak about was miscellaneous equipment for inspection services which for the year we are in amounts to $1,400,000 and last year was only $104,500. I presume what the minister was speaking about in regard to travelling expenses is the same with respect to this further item, and I would ask him what these inspection services are which have apparently been increased to such a large extent. I will refer particularly to miscellaneous equipment.

Mr. Claxton: Equipment for the new artillery proving range at Lake St. Peter accounts for $400,000. Laboratory and miscellaneous equipment is set at $200,000 for 1952-53 whereas it was $104,500 for 1951-52, representing an increase of $95,500. In addition there is $800,000 for inspection gauges. Those items total $1,400,000 as opposed to $104,500 last year. The largest factor is the $800,000 for inspection gauges.

Mr. Harkness: Inspection what?

Mr. Claxton: Gauges. This increase covers the purchase of inspection gauges for U.S. type equipment. The change-over to United States type guns, ammunition, etc. has made it necessary for the inspection service to re-equip itself with inspection gauges. The bulk of the gauges the inspection service held before were those required during world war II for the manufacture of United Kingdom equipment.

Mr. Thomas: I would like to ask one more question having to do with naval personnel. During the war we had two separate departments of communications which at that time were known as W/T, wireless telegraphy and V/S, or visual signal. Immediately after the war they consolidated the two into the communications branch. Something like a year ago I was talking to a lieutenant in communications and he told me they were considering transferring back to the dual system where they had the dual set-up as they were having difficulty in handling both the radio end and the visual end, due to the difficulties of taking the signals.

I was wondering whether the minister could say anything about that, and whether or not they intend to continue the single communications branch or to again divide it into visual and radio as two separate branches, as they had been during the last war.

Mr. Claxton: I will have to look into the question raised by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. I think the general trend is for the visual system to disappear gradually, but beyond that I cannot go. I will have to get him the answer.

Mr. Thomas: I might tell the minister that, being in the communications branch during the war, I found it very difficult to master both visual and radio for the simple reason that in visual signalling you read word by word and in radio you read letter by letter. When one accustomed to visual signalling tries wireless he has a tendency to read word by word, and when the situation is reversed the wireless signaller gets so far behind in visual signalling that he cannot catch up; in other words he starts to read letter by letter and cannot form words. I wonder if the minister knew anything about the matter, because from my own experience it is pretty difficult for anyone to try to master the two of them. Although the codes are the same, the methods of receiving messages are entirely different. I would like to get an answer at some later date.

Mr. Claxton: I will be glad to get that.

The Chairman: Can we proceed to the next subhead?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Royal Canadian Navy—Active force and general.

The Chairman: The details are shown at pages 292, 293, 294, 295, and they conclude in the middle of page 296, the amount being $263,481,102.

Mr. Pearkes: In view of the number of army personnel serving overseas in Germany and Korea, has any consideration been given to transporting the replacements and general rotation personnel by naval vessels or by vessels manned by naval personnel? I understand from a debate which took place in the house a few days ago that certain vessels were required for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Are those being used for the transport of personnel or are we relying entirely on the commercial companies?

Mr. Claxton: Well, sir, the hon. member for Nanaimo has much more experience with transport matters than I have; also with the situation on Her Majesty's Canadian ships, particularly destroyers which he may see leaving from Esquimalt. There is not room on board one of those ships to put a single extra human body; they are loaded to full capacity of the ship. In order to use naval vessels for transport it would be necessary to put on special naval vessels. They are full of gear of all kinds and are very inefficient for the purpose of transporting troops, so except in most unusual circumstances are never used for that purpose. Our troops going to Korea are largely carried either in specially constructed troop ships operated by the United States navy or by air. While we have looked at other possible types of transportation, I am sure the way we are doing it is the most efficient and cheapest.

Mr. Thomas: Are the naval ships as crowded as they were during the last war?

Mr. Claxton: I think some of them are even more so, because in the Far East we have to carry equipment, officers and men, sometimes staying at sea up to fifty days, so that vessels which did not carry certain stores or types of equipment now have to carry them. I think they are about as crowded as they were.

Mr. Thomas: In other words, they get lots to eat.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: I had no thought that personnel would be transported in destroyers, but I did mention vessels manned by Canadian naval personnel being used as troopers. What does the minister know—perhaps he would not know much because it comes under another department—about what has happened to those ships which were acquired by us for the purpose of either moving immigrants to the North American continent or possibly moving troops to Europe?

Mr. Claxton: We made full use of the return voyages of the ships used to bring displaced persons or immigrants to Canada. They were used on the westbound trip to carry immigrants to Canada, and on the eastbound trips vacancies were used to carry the 27th brigade to Europe. That was done for a large proportion of the forces there, and we got very low rates indeed.

Mr. Pearkes: It is to those vessels I was referring.

Mr. Thomas: Can the minister tell me whether or not it is the policy now to have some sort of combined officer course such as there was during the last war, which enabled naval personnel to get a certain amount of training for shore action?

Mr. Claxton: On several occasions in the Far East the personnel of our ships have taken part in shore action. On a number of occasions, both in the Far East and on the north Atlantic, exercises have been held to give special training in that field. That is one of the things being taught in the regular shore establishments as well as on the ships of the R.C.N.

Mr. Thomas: It is the intention, then, that ships' personnel, as a general rule, will have a certain amount of training in shore action; is that right? Will they have more than during the last war?

Mr. Claxton: They have had more of that since the end of the second world war than they had during it, but it cannot be extended too far because of the necessity for sea training.

Mr. Thomas: I realize that, but I wanted to know whether or not, in their pre-sea training, they were given more instruction in shore action than they had been given during the last war. I take it that is true.

Mr. Claxton: They have very much more instruction ashore during peacetime than they had during war. The course at Cornwallis generally lasts for 26 weeks before they go to sea.

The Chairman: Shall we go on to the next item, "Royal Canadian Naval Reserve"? Then the next item is "Royal Canadian Sea Cadets". The next subheading is "Canadian Army—active force and general", at page 297.

Canadian army—active force and general.

Mr. Hees: I was glad to learn, a few days ago from press dispatches, Mr. Chairman, that the government had at long last decided to pay the veterans of the Korean force the same clothing allowance which had been paid to veterans of world war II. About three months ago I brought this matter to the minister's attention, and it is encouraging indeed to members of the opposition to see that occasionally the government puts through much needed measures such as this, largely due to the pressure we bring to bear.

The matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention tonight is the need for combat pay for those who serve under fire in an active theatre of operations. Several months ago I asked the minister about this, and he replied that the Canadian forces serving in Korea were already receiving combat pay. Combat pay is very different from the overseas pay which the Canadian army in Korea is now receiving, and which is paid to all servicemen who leave our shores for an active theatre of operations. Combat pay is extra pay which is given to those who serve in a special area, often under conditions of extreme discomfort and in constant danger from enemy fire and attack. The men who serve in the rear areas, such as clerks, artificers, driver-mechanics, motor mechanics and other tradesmen receive trades pay, which makes their pay higher than that of men of similar rank who do the actual fighting in the forward areas.

I believe the most important skill in any armed force is that possessed by those who achieve proficiency in handling their weapons under fire. I believe men who qualify in handling their weapons under fire should be paid combat pay in exactly the same manner as those who become proficient at their trade, and who are paid trades pay. I believe also that combat pay should be greater in value than any trades pay, because there is no skill in warfare that is comparable to that of handling weapons proficiently under fire. It is on that proficiency and skill that the outcome of any campaign depends. I believe that proficiency should be rewarded, with that importance in mind.

I would appreciate very much hearing the minister's comments on the need for paying this special kind of combat pay to those who become proficient in handling their weapons under fire while serving in an active theatre of operations.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the first point, I can assure the hon. member that while his representations were given every consideration, the matter had been actively considered for perhaps six or eight months before he mentioned the subject.

With regard to combat pay, this involves a good many factors. We introduced a new type of tradesmen's pay last December. Under this, for the first time a trained infantry soldier became entitled to tradesman's pay for the first time. It is our view we should not go beyond that. We are paying a special allowance to men serving in the field. Our rates of pay are as good as any; the rates of pension are better than any and the treatment we give is as good as any we know about. We think that, taking into consideration the traditional practice of those serving in the British armed forces of trying to deal fairly with all men and all ranks, this is about as far as we can go at this time.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the minister specifically, does he consider that the skill required to handle a rifle, machine gun or Bren gun under fire against an advancing enemy, which after all is the skill upon which depends the success of any campaign, should be less highly paid than that of the man who serves in the rear areas in comparative safety and comparative comfort at a trade such as clerk, artificer, motor mechanic or driver-mechanic, or one of the many other trades that receive trades pay? I have no objection to these men receiving trades pay. I think they deserve it for their proficiency. My whole contention is that the highest skill in any armed force is that of the man who handles his weapons proficiently under fire, because if he falls down the whole campaign falls down and all the tradesmen in the rear areas are simply mopped up by the enemy. I claim that the highest trade, the highest skill, should be paid higher than anything else, and I believe there is no problem in qualifying a man under battle conditions as being a man who can handle his weapons proficiently under fire. To me it is most important that that skill should be rewarded. Will the minister answer that?

Mr. Claxton: That is the case today.

Mr. Hees: Can the minister say specifically what a private who is a Bren gunner in a forward platoon receives per day as compared with a motor mechanic or an artificer? Will he give me that answer in the daily rate of pay?

Mr. Claxton: That was given in a release of the department in December when this new basis of pay was extended to qualified soldiers in the infantry and other formations. The qualifications and the rates are similar for all trades.

Mr. Hees: I am afraid that is not an answer at all. I have asked the minister the question, and I should think he would be familiar with these figures. I am asking him whether all trades pay is the same? It must be simple to give me the figure for the private who receives trades pay, and it must be simple for the minister with his knowledge to give me the figure of what the private—

Mr. Claxton: I do not carry these in my head. I can assure the hon. member that he flatters me when he suggests it; but the monthly rates of group pay for the tradesmen in addition to the monthly rate of pay set out for the rank are as follows: group 1, effective October 1, 1946, $4; effective December 1, 1951, $6. Now for the first time, subsequent to the introduction of this order effective December 1, 1951, the trade groupings were extended to infantry soldiers as well as others, in addition to what were ordinarily called tradesmen before.

Mr. Hees: Can we get right down to figures? The minister has his deputy minister and another official from his department in front of him. They ought to have these figures. They must know the figures I am asking for. I am asking specifically, what does a private who serves in the front line under fire, handling a Bren gun, receive and what does a private who serves in the rear areas as an artificer or a motor mechanic receive? These are two specific questions. The minister has all that information in front of him, and he must be able to answer me.

Mr. Claxton: It all depends. Surely I must have made myself clear to the hon. member. I ask hon. members if I have not. If he is entitled to trades qualifications, either as an infantryman, an artilleryman, an artificer or a driver, then he will get in addition to the ordinary pay of his rank, if he falls into group 1, $6 per month. That will be in addition to the pay of his rank, which will be the basic pay of $91 a month for a trained private.

Mr. Hees: Does that apply to a man who handles a Bren gun in the forward area?

Mr. Claxton: If qualified as a tradesman according to the rules laid down for an infantry soldier.

Mr. Hees: But, Mr. Chairman, I asked whether a proficient Bren gunner, a man in a forward platoon, qualifies as a tradesman if he is simply a Bren gunner or a rifleman.

Mr. Claxton: Right.

Mr. Hees: If he be proficient?

Mr. Claxton: Right.

Mr. Hees: Then he gets his $6 in exactly the same way as the motor mechanic gets his $6 extra?

Mr. Claxton: Yes; that is if the motor mechanic is a trained tradesman according to the standards laid down in the army service corps for motor mechanics.

Mr. Harkness: Since we appear to be on rates of pay there are two or three questions I should like to ask. Looking at page 12 of the white paper which was recently issued I see the rates of pay for various ranks, but I see nothing there in regard to rates of staff pay. Can the minister tell us what the rates of staff pay are at the present time?

Mr. Claxton: There is no staff pay.

Mr. Harkness: There is no staff pay whatever at the present time?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Harkness: Is there anything equivalent to staff pay as we had it during the last war?

Mr. Claxton: Could we have another question while I verify that? My recollection is that there is none. There might be some categories of what is called responsibility allowance which might fall within the category my hon. friend is asking about, although there is no staff pay as such any longer.

Mr. Harkness: Is that true of the whole service? For example, does the brigade major of the 25th brigade in Korea receive the same pay as, we will say, the major in command of A company, second battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry receives?

Mr. Claxton: He receives in addition overseas pay, and because he is serving in an active theatre of war he receives an allowance in respect of income tax, which is quite substantial.

Mr. Harkness: No; I think the minister has misapprehended my question.

Mr. Claxton: He does not receive any extra pay on account of his appointment.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps I have not made it clear. I will phrase it again. The first battalion of the P.P.C.L.I. is now in Korea. My question then would be this. Does the brigade major of the 25th brigade in Korea receive exactly the same pay as the major in command of A company of the 1st battalion P.P.C.L.I., which is also in Korea, receives?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Thomas: Does the minister consider that the brigade in Europe today is on active service in the same way as the brigade in Korea?

Mr. Claxton: No, not the same. He does not receive any allowance in respect of income tax, or for overseas service.

Mr. Thomas: I misunderstood the minister. In answering the last question I thought he said that the major in Germany today would receive overseas pay and active service pay.

Mr. Harkness: I have one or two other questions on pay and then I have some other questions on other matters. The next one in regard to pay is this. Are our paratroopers in the 1st battalion P.P.C.L.I. and the 1st battalion R.C.R., and the Royal 22nd Regiment who have now been sent to Korea to be cut off from their jump pay when they are posted to Korea?

Mr. Claxton: In order to continue to be qualified for the paratroopers' pay they have to belong to a jumping unit and $30 a month is paid while undergoing flying or parachutist training, or while filling a role requiring active or continuous flying. There are regulations laid down to require that in order to continue to qualify for this pay for these operations, they must take part in a certain number of operations within each period.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Harkness: As I understand the minister's answer it comes to this, that when a paratrooper is posted to Korea his jump pay is cut off; is that correct?

Mr. Claxton: If he is posted to an infantry unit which is not doing paratrooping, he loses his risk pay. But at the same time, having been posted to the 25th Canadian infantry brigade in Korea he becomes entitled to overseas pay and also to the income tax allowance, which may be more valuable.

Mr. Harkness: All I want is an answer yes or no. I take it from what the minister has said that his paratrooping or jump pay is cut off when he is posted to Korea. I presume the same thing applies if he is posted to the 27th brigade in Germany?

Mr. Claxton: Answering an earlier question: As I suspected, there is one case of responsibility allowance, and that is for officers appointed as adjutants, who receive $15 a month extra.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Adjutants?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, adjutants. Doctors and dentists receive an additional $60. Risk pay is paid with respect to continuous exposure to risk. Once that exposure concludes, the entitlement to that pay ends. But on the other hand, upon being posted to Korea, the officers and men become entitled to both the overseas allowance and the allowance in respect of income tax, which in most cases is at least as high as if not higher than the other amount.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask one or two further questions with regard to pay. Does the minister know how many members, if any, on the staff at national defence headquarters here, and on the staffs of commands, are still drawing jump pay?

Mr. Claxton: No. I would be glad to have any such cases drawn to my attention.

Mr. Harkness: I am not drawing any case to the minister's attention. I am asking him how many, if any, in those categories are drawing jump pay.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know of any.

Mr. Thomas: The minister says that any paratrooper assigned to an infantry group and sent to Korea is deprived of his jump pay. In the event that any such paratrooper were called upon or volunteered to jump into enemy territory, how long would that jump pay continue, or would it be of very short duration, added to his ordinary pay he would receive overseas? Would it carry on for a month, or any stated length of time?

Mr. Claxton: Except in most unusual circumstances of a rather hush-hush nature—and we would not expect this to develop—they would be attached to a paratroop unit, and then would be entitled to risk pay. It is the attachment to the paratroop unit and the exposure to risk which creates the entitlement to the risk pay.

Mr. Thomas: In other words if a man were a paratrooper and assigned to front line duty in Korea he would not receive his jump pay; but if he were assigned to a paratroop group behind the lines in Korea he would not only draw his overseas pay, but he would also draw his paratroop pay, whether or not he made any jumps.

Mr. Claxton: That has not happened.

Mr. Thomas: But it could easily happen.

Mr. Claxton: If we had a paratroop unit, taking part in activities in Korea, and if such a man had proceeded from an infantry battalion to a paratroop unit which was taking part in paratroop activities in Korea, then he would be entitled to the risk pay.

Mr. Thomas: That is complicated enough for me.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Purely as a matter of interest—and I cannot help being interested in the difference between a staff officer and an adjutant, having served as both myself—I should like to ask a question. I entirely approve of doing away with staff pay, but I am interested to know what the distinction is between an adjutant and a brigade major. I am not objecting to it, but I am just interested to know.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member was a major himself, as I remember it, in the first world war. He will recall that normally an adjutant in a unit, as I understand it, is a captain. For his rank he carries more responsibility and a heavier burden than is carried by the ordinary captain, but rather less than was carried formerly by the major.

Mr. Hees: I think that certainly a brigade major carries a great deal more responsibility than a major who is a company commander or a battery commander. I do not think the minister's argument holds good at all. If there is a differential between the second in command and the adjutant, then there is the same differential between the company commander and the brigade major. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. Claxton: The major, whether in a brigade or a company, is receiving $335 a month basic pay, whereas the captain would receive $255 basic pay; and that is a pretty big differential.

Mr. Hees: But what the hon. member for Greenwood and I are getting down to is this. We do not care which way it is, but we think it should be the same all the way through. There is the same differential in responsibility between the captain who is second in command of a company and an adjutant as there is between the major who is company commander and the brigade major. Why should the adjutant get extra pay over a captain who is a company commander, while a brigade major, who has the same increase in responsibilities, receives no increase over the company commander or the battery commander? What is the answer to that?

Mr. Claxton: Because the captain gets very much less pay than the major to begin with. And if the captain is doing work which is considered equivalent to that of a major, then it is considered that should have some extra recompense for his extra responsibility, whereas the major seems to be adequately paid anyway.

Mr. Harkness: I was rather interested in the first part of this white paper, which deals with the first objective, so far as our defence is concerned, and that is defence against direct attack. It goes on to speak of radar installations, fighter control and the like, but it makes no mention whatever of anti-aircraft defence.

In previous years I have referred to what I have considered to be a severe deficiency in respect of our anti-aircraft defences. Why is no mention made of anti-aircraft defence, and what provisions are there in existence, or being projected, for this type of defence?

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member raises on this occasion, and has raised formerly, one of the most controversial and difficult questions we have to face. We have a large number of anti-aircraft batteries in Canada. I do not want to say, any more than the hon. member would, anything that would indicate that they are not important, because the fact is that I regard them as of the greatest importance. But the fact is that in connection with anti-aircraft guns and anti-aircraft warfare we are in one of these transitionary periods where we are moving from the heavy and light anti-aircraft gun, particularly the heavy which existed at the end of the second world war, into the field of guided missiles. How soon that will come we do not know. How profitable it is for us to spend the amount of defence dollars necessary to have anti-aircraft forces, either in being or ready to be brought into being, is difficult to say in view of the prospect that there will be something quite different which will be far more effective within two or three years.

I have spoken with extreme frankness because the hon. member has raised the question. I think he knows the answer. This is a question of great difficulty. We must have anti-aircraft batteries, both light and heavy, in the number that we have. They are equipped, subject to some modifications by way of fire control instruments and the like, with as good equipment as there is available; but how much further we should go into the modification of anti-aircraft guns in the light of anticipated developments is difficult to decide.

Mr. Harkness: I must say that the minister has ascribed to me much more knowledge than I possess when he says I know the answer. I know very little about it. As he knows, I have been disturbed for a considerable time over our ack-ack defences and what ack-ack defences we are projecting. I must say that the minister's remarks have thrown a certain amount of light on this matter.

He said we have a large number of ack-ack batteries in Canada, but I know he must refer to reserve force batteries. There is no reason why I should not say that there are few permanent or regular force ack-ack batteries. There is no reason for not saying, because it has been said by many other people, that the reserve force ack-ack batteries have not their full complement of guns or anything like it, and they have much less than their full complement of men. To say that there are large numbers of ack-ack batteries in Canada does not mean a great deal from the defence point of view because those ack-ack batteries are not in a position where they could go out and defend targets.

The importance of anti-aircraft defence was impressed upon me strongly as a result of a trip I took with a large number of members over the week end to the industrial area in Quebec lying up from the head of the Saguenay river. It struck me forcibly that if there was any place in Canada that needed ack-ack defence, it was there. I know there are numerous other industrial areas which need it just as badly.

I know what the minister has said with regard to guided missiles is of extreme importance. I assume that along with our allies we have been doing considerable research in air-to-air guided missiles, rocket weapons and air-to-ground weapons. It is important to know how long we will have to wait to get into operation batteries of air-to-ground rocket weapons, and whether in the meantime we should not have in operation or existence the regular form of ack-ack weapons as we have known them in the past. I do not know whether the minister would care to elaborate on what he said before, but I would like to have his views as to what is proposed immediately as far as anti-aircraft defence is concerned.

Mr. Claxton: At the present time we have the guns to make a defence. Some of those guns are being modernized up to the latest standards. Our experience has been that to modernize such a weapon may not produce that margin of difference between what it was before and what it will be afterward which would justify the expenditure, in view of the fact that we expect that in three or four years there will be a much better weapon available. The cost of modernizing equipment of this kind is quite heavy indeed.

We are doing about one quarter of our guns, and we have a considerable number. Frankly we are hesitant about expending money in doing the rest in view of the time involved, and also when it is considered that the cost of modernizing each gun, despite the fact that the difference between what it was before and what it may be in the future is marginal, is about equivalent to the cost of a modern fighter. Our thought is that it is better to have more modern fighters than more heavy anti-aircraft guns in view of the fact that all anti-aircraft guns, especially heavy anti-aircraft guns, are expected to become obsolete within a limited number of years.

Mr. Harkness: I certainly agree with the minister that it is preferable to have a modern fighter than to modernize a last war anti-aircraft gun. Have any steps yet been taken or is it proposed to take them shortly to convert present ack-ack batteries into air-to-ground rocket batteries?

Mr. Claxton: We have no rockets yet. Experiments along these lines are being carried out in other countries and we are prepared to follow their experience. It should be very easy to catch up with them. I think the experience of all gunners is that it is possible to adapt themselves rapidly to new type weapons. For example, our gunners were able to use 105's or 25-pounders, and similarly during the first and second world wars our gunners quickly adapted themselves to the use of new type weapons. I am sure they will be able to adapt themselves quickly in the future to rockets.

Mr. Adamson: Since the question of anti-aircraft defence has come up I should like to ask the minister a question which he need not answer unless he thinks an answer is desirable. Has there been any hesitation in developing in Canada newer weapons such as the ground-to-air homing rocket, which has such a great potential for air defence, and the new air-to-air weapon which is colloquially known as the fabula and which apparently is a fragmentation homing weapon? I mention this because it is common knowledge, having been mentioned in the press, that these homing weapons have had outstanding success.

It seems to me that nothing would be more desirable for air defence than to concentrate on these new weapons. There is nothing secret about these things, as they have been referred to in the newspapers in the United States, in the technical journals of the United States air force and in our own journals. I realize the minister's difficulty in this regard, but I hope he can make a statement to the committee that something is being done along this line so we will at least have the protection of the most modern weapons available.

That brings me to the other question, and it is one of enormous difficulty. I refer to the standardization of ammunition. At the present time there are no less than five different calibres of small arms ammunition, and if you count the ·50 Browning machine gun as a small arms weapon there are six. There may be more, but those are all I know of. There is the ·280 of the United Kingdom, ·300 of the United States, ·303 of the United Kingdom, ·450 of the United States, ·50 calibre of the United States and the 9 millimetre which I gather is common both to the United States and the United Kingdom.

I realize that no problem has given the minister a greater headache than the standardization of arms, and there is no problem more important to us in Canada. It is not so much a question of standardizing the arms as standardizing the munitions because if, unfortunately, we have to fight, we will be fighting in association with groups of people who are already armed with various types of small arms to which their troops are accustomed. The situation presents difficulty as instanced by the prejudices of our own troops in Korea based on fighting experience for the rather old-fashioned Lee Enfield in preference to the more modern Garand rifle. It is a tremendous problem and the minister is beset with great difficulties, but it is no use for us in the house to say that we are faced with an impossible situation.

We have two warring factions, one favouring the United States type of ammunition and the other favouring the United Kingdom type of ammunition. The great challenge is to do everything we can humanly do to see that the types of ammunition, particularly for the same arms, are standardized. Even though the type of arm may vary from country to country we should try to see that the ammunition is useful and applicable to all arms. I know it is easy to get up in the House of Commons and say that is the goal. I know it is easy to say we should do this. I realize the difficulty, but I think it would be helpful to the committee if the minister would make a statement tonight on the problem of standardization of small arms.

I know it is one of the supreme headaches today in all armies; but I think the more we talk about it, the more we discuss it, the more it is brought out into the open, the more likely we are to find a solution. This is not a hush-hush problem. It is not a conflict between the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom. It is something that must be worked out with the good will of all concerned. I bring up the matter knowing it to be controversial, knowing it to be a headache, knowing it to be a problem that must be faced, merely to give the minister the opportunity to state his opinion, if he so desires, because I feel we in Canada occupy a unique position in this regard. What I am saying to the minister is not said in any critical way. It is said entirely to be helpful, because one of the great problems the United States has to face is the standardization of ammunition. I feel that no country occupies such a key position as Canada in this regard.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for York West brought up two questions. The first had to do with the position regarding guided missiles and the second concerned small arms and their ammunition. With respect to the first, it is a field in which most of the work of research is being done in other countries at the present time. I can assure him that hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent on it. In defence research and in the armed forces we have limited ourselves to keeping up with the progress in development, and also we have undertaken research in one special field, that of air-to-air missiles. We are doing special work in that field.

With respect to small arms, I am very glad indeed to have his encouraging words in support of the position I took this afternoon when I expressed the same view.

Mr. Adamson: There is another entirely different matter I wish to raise. I am sorry I was not in the house to hear the minister but I was attending a committee dealing with a subject which was at one time controversial. I hope there can be established in our armed services the counterpart of what is known in the British army as NAAFI, the navy, army and air force institute. I have had the privilege of visiting several military camps in the past year. The training officers as well as those on the G side in those camps complained to me that a great deal of the time of training officers, who had duties elsewhere, was taken up with the auditing of the accounts of the camp grocery or department store. People were telephoning the colonels, regimental commanders, adjutants and others saying that they had brought a tin of such and such at the camp grocery and it was no good. This may seem a comparatively small matter, but when one considers that in some of our large military establishments the gross turnover in these stores runs to well over $1 million or $1,500,000 a year I think it is most unfair to ask regimental officers who are dealing with the training of a unit, or camp officers who are dealing with administration in a major military camp, to deal with the petty irritations occasioned by the bookkeeping of the camp grocery store.

I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that some consideration would be given to the establishment of an organization such as is known in the British army, the United Kingdom service, as NAAFI. I know we may have had criticisms of NAAFI overseas. We may have thought NAAFI coffee was pretty poor and we may have had other criticisms of it, but the establishment of such an organization takes off the shoulders of your training and technical officers—your G officers, your A officers, and your Q officers—the frightful irritation of running grocery stores and department stores and all other civilian operations which go therewith.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member for York West has recalled to my mind an answer I should have given to the hon. member for Broadview. There is additional pay given to an adjutant as a responsibility allowance partly in consideration of his having to handle the funds for the regiment which, as the hon. member says, is quite a burden.

With regard to the institution of NAAFI or something equivalent in Canada, we have had the matter under consideration for quite a long time. There is a lot to be said for it. The main thing to be said against it is that it removes from the local unit, whether it be a ship, army unit or air station, the interest and incentive that assures efficient management and local interest through local control of the funds created. Those two things have to be balanced and as usual there are differing views, but all are being considered.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Harkness: On page 4 of the white paper which was issued, under army I see:

> The army is continuing to maintain a mobile striking force for defence against a surprise airborne attack.

[Mr. Adamson.]

During the past two or three years the minister has always referred to our armed force for defence against airborne attack as our "airborne brigade". Why is it that here in the white paper and in the speech made this afternoon there was no mention of the airborne brigade at all? What we had mentioned was a mobile striking force.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, it is essentially a brigade. The name was changed but I do not remember when, though I think it was about two and a half years back and "mobile striking force" is the term that has been used ever since.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman. We were still using the term "airborne brigade" last year when we were discussing the estimates. Whether it was changed as far as army nomenclature is concerned, I do not know. It appears to me that the reason it was changed, and I think rightly changed, is that we no longer have an airborne brigade. Our airborne brigade essentially has gone to Korea, and the people who have had training in Korea and have come back from there have not yet been trained as airborne or parachute troops. I do not think they are any worse troops, and I think probably their experience in Korea makes them more effective fighting troops than they otherwise would be. But the situation, I would take it, is that we no longer have an airborne brigade and therefore the term has been dropped.

There is another point in the white paper under army which I would like to ask about. It is mentioned on page 18 under army equipment that:

> Deliveries on orders of U.S. army equipment are proceeding. First deliveries from Canadian production of U.S. pattern equipment are anticipated in the last quarter of 1952.

In view of all the evidence we had in the defence expenditure committee that appears to me a very peculiar sort of paragraph. As I understand it United States orders have already been delivered. With respect to deliveries of Canadian production of United States pattern equipment being anticipated in the last quarter of 1952, I would like to ask the minister what United States pattern equipment it is anticipated we will be turning out from our factories in 1952.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, on the first point and the hon. member's suggestion that we have ceased to have an airborne brigade which we had before, I can assure him that is not so. The change in terminology has no reference to the strength or composition of the forces. The terms "brigade" and "mobile striking force" were used the year before last and last year according to my recollection, and there is no change in the constitution or the composition of the forces. We have the three battalions and the other elements that we always had.

With regard to delivery of United States equipment, we have been quite frankly disappointed in deliveries but that was due to circumstances over which we had no control and over which we do not think the United States had any control either. We have never said that we had delivered to us all the United States equipment that we expected. Events have prevented it, and we will get deliveries as the equipment becomes available. In the meantime we are undertaking the manufacture in Canada of 105 mm. guns and ammunition, 155 mm. guns, and various types of mortars and the like. That is proceeding. The 155's will be coming off the production line later this year and so will the 105's. Ammunition for the 105's is about to be produced in considerable quantities, I understand. That is the job of my hon. friend the Minister of Defence Production. The principal two items that we planned to get from the United States and on which deliveries have been suspended are tanks and small arms and the reasons for that have already been given.

Mr. Harkness: I do not want to enter into a controversy with the minister over the question of whether the mobile striking force is the same as it was before or not, but I do not think there is any question that it is the same or anything like the same. The term "airborne brigade" is no longer used, no longer appropriately used, because of the fact that the airborne brigade which was trained as such is now serving in Korea. The second battalions of the regiments which formed that brigade are in two cases just back from Korea. The members in most cases are still on their leave and are not back to receive training as airborne troops. There is no question but that the result is that we have not an airborne brigade at the present time and we will not have one for some months, under the very best of circumstances.

As I say, I do not want to enter into a controversy with the minister over that point, but I would just like to make that statement in explanation, considering what he said a few minutes ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand we are still on page 296 where there is a sort of summing up figure for the navy—$268 million. If I may anticipate for a moment we will have a figure later for the army amounting to some $500 million, I think it is, and for the air force a figure of some $700 million, all adding up to the figure which appears on page 38 of $1,642 million, which is broadly our expenditure or the bulk of our expenditure for the year. Looking at item 248 which is a sort of controlling item for these and other items we find that it shows an estimate for this year of $1,642 million but a total commitment of $3,900 million or nearly $4 billion. It is stated that of that total about $2,346 million will come due for payment in future years. My question is this. We are given very full details with regard to the expenditure of $1,642 million which is to be made this year.

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand the hon. member is directing his attention to the item "Canadian Army—active forces"?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

The Deputy Chairman: It seems to me he is directing his attention to a general discussion which has been concluded.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think I can satisfy you on that, Mr. Chairman. I am directing my attention primarily to the figure on the page we are considering, that is the naval figure of $268 million. I was explaining my question just by reference to the over-all figure. My question is this. There must be a figure corresponding to this $268 million, the figure of commitments, because we know that the commitment figure over-all is larger than the figure for expenditures this year.

My point is that I think we should be able to get general information with regard to this commitment figure. It is given in detail, so the department must have those figures. I presume they must have those figures available. They seem to me to be very important figures, because they indicate the policy to which we are committing ourselves. My question at the moment must be with regard to the figure corresponding to this $268 million, unless the minister considers it more convenient to answer the question for all three services rather than to have me ask this question now and then later for the army and still later for the air force.

Mr. Claxton: You are asking about the navy, and I thought we had finished the navy item.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, but I point out that my question is really a broad question. I do not care whether it is answered in three bits or over-all.

Mr. Claxton: I can give the hon. member the answer he wants. The commitments for the navy total $704,098,974, of which $427,213,488 are being carried forward to future years. The estimated cash requirement for 1952-53 is $268,224,932, which is the figure to which he referred at page 296.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question was not merely as to the actual figure, but the purposes covered by the amount.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt, but it seems to me the hon. member is referring to a section of item 248 which has already been passed. I do not think I should allow the question in respect of that section of the item.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think we can say it has been passed, because it enters into every item of the details which we will be considering under vote 248. We have no means of knowing, unless we ask the minister, which ones it enters into and which ones it does not. In other words, if we wanted to know whether it entered into 105 millimetre guns we would have to ask, and the same would apply to every one of these items. The presumption is that it enters into every item, but I think it would expedite matters considerably if the hon. member for Greenwood received a reply now.

Mr. Claxton: I think the hon. member for Calgary East has in mind the form of the estimates as they were last year. The figures that appear in the details for the Department of National Defence, beginning at pages 289 and following, and particularly the figure of $268,224,932 which appears at page 296 and is the figure which gave the hon. member for Greenwood occasion for asking this question, is for cash. Commitments do not appear in the details.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I realize that only too well. I am asking, even if there is not to be the same detail—and I do not suppose there should be—whether we may not be given some general indication. After all, $2 billion are being committed, and indeed judging from the detailed figures given I rather surmise they have largely been committed. Is it not reasonable that when we are being committed to this huge expenditure we should have some indication as to the purposes? I am not clear in my mind as to how much detail we should ask the minister to give, but it does seem to me we should have a general idea.

Mr. Claxton: The cash we are seeking from this parliament is the amount set out in the estimates as put before this committee beginning at page 38, and it totals $2,001,725,000; that is the cash appropriation we are seeking from this parliament. If this parliament sees fit to vote this appropriation and makes that amount of money available, that will be all that will be available to meet the expenditures, the details of which are listed at pages 289 and following; that is receipting cash expenditures, and the details of the votes total up to the amount of the cash which it is expected we will spend in 1952-53.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At the moment the minister is telling us, as I understand it and he will correct me if I am wrong, that there are commitments of $2,346 million in addition to that $1,600 million of expenditures for which the details are now being given. I am suggesting that we are just as much interested in that, because in due course we will be asked to provide the money for it. To put it theoretically and rather fancifully, supposing we found that in the details of the $2,300 million there were things we did not approve of, and we said we did not want any of those things. I have given a fanciful illustration, but I come back to ask whether it is not reasonable to ask that we be informed in some particularity as to what those details are? These are commitments.

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid the hon. member goes a good deal farther than the limits of the work of this committee, because if I understand him correctly what he really is suggesting is that we should have a multiple year budget, which is not what our system provides for at all. We would have to seek from each parliament in each successive year cash authority to meet the amount required for each year's expenditure as it is made.

The Chairman: Shall we continue to the next subheading?

Mr. Harkness: No. This item I notice includes tanks and armoured fighting vehicles, to which the minister referred a little while ago in another connection. The amount listed for last year is $22,500,000. The amount listed for this year is $22,250,000, approximately the same figure. How much of that $22,500,000 which is listed as the appropriation for last year was actually expended? What I am getting at is this. Is this actually what could be called a revote?

Mr. Claxton: Very largely a revote; only $7,500,000 of the amount voted last year was spent.

The Chairman: Is it agreeable to proceed with the next subheading?

Mr. Fulton: I wanted to ask the minister a question about the equipment of the 25th brigade in Korea, which I think comes under this item of armoured fighting vehicles. As I recall it, last year when we were discussing the estimates, or very shortly after the 25th brigade was sent to Korea, we were discussing whether or not that brigade should be accompanied by a squadron of tanks, and we engaged in a controversy with the minister as to whether anti-tank guns should be properly classified as armoured fighting vehicles or artillery. The minister told us at that time that all that was being sent over were anti-tank guns. We recommended that the brigade should be accompanied by a squadron of tanks.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the decision of the minister as announced at that time that they should not have tanks was reversed within about three months from the time this brigade arrived in Korea. Is that correct or not?

Mr. Claxton: I would have to refresh my memory on the details and dates. The fact is that the brigade went to Korea with the type of weapon which was considered suitable for it, which was 17-pounder self-propelled guns mounted on tracks, a tank chassis, which the hon. member I think at the time called the tank, but that was not the name given by the Canadian army.

Mr. Fulton: No, indeed; I said anti-tank guns.

Mr. Claxton: I forget what the details were, but there was some controversy as he says. Anyway, it is a tank chassis carrying a 17-pounder gun. Some people call it a tank; some people do not call it a tank, but call it an anti-tank gun.

When this unit arrived it was found that in order to have additional fire power and also for greater uniformity these should be replaced by the United States Sherman M-4 A-3 EH tank, which was very similar to these Sherman tanks we have in Canada but with later modifications. That was done, and the 17-pounder anti-tank guns on their self-propelled tracks were made available to and went to our North Atlantic treaty allies and have since been delivered. There is no mystery about it. It was done in accordance with the views of the army; it has worked out satisfactorily, and we do not know why there should be any fuss about it.

Mr. Fulton: The reason there should be some fuss about it is this. If the minister will look back at the discussion which took place in this house on his estimates, when the sending of the 25th brigade to Korea was being discussed, he will find that various members on this side, particularly including the hon. member for Calgary East and myself, suggested the brigade should be equipped with tanks. We raised a very specific question as to whether it was advisable to send that brigade over there without armoured fighting vehicles to support it.

Mr. Claxton: These were armoured fighting vehicles.

Mr. Fulton: Well, we raised specific questions as to whether they were adequate. We said, in our opinion, that they were not; that they should have tanks. I raise this question at the moment because it appears to me it has been proven by the experience of the brigade in Korea that the decision should have been taken in fact at the time the brigade was sent.

We have often heard in this house and in this committee criticism on the views put forward on this side. I am not attempting to say that we are always right and somebody else is always wrong. We have been advocating for some time as a policy, both with respect to the brigade in Korea and with respect to the brigade in Europe, that there should be more concentration on armoured fighting vehicles, that is tanks, in support of infantry. Indeed, with respect to the brigade in Europe, I know the hon. member for Nanaimo, the defence critic for the opposition has suggested that instead of concentrating so much on infantry we should concentrate on armoured formations.

The point I want to make is that it does seem to me that, based on experience in Korea, that criticism appears to have been fully justified. It seems to me the experience in Korea has demonstrated not only that the criticism was justified but that the decision of the military forces, which I presume was backed up by the minister, resulted in expenditure of a very considerably larger sum of money to acquire tanks on short notice to support the brigade in Korea than would have been necessary had the suggestions made by this party been adopted at the outset and tanks acquired and sent over with the brigade to Korea when they went.

The reason I make that statement is that we have an answer which was given to a question asked in the defence expenditures committee which shows that 20 M-4 A-3 EH Sherman tanks were first acquired for the 25th infantry brigade in May, 1951. One was subsequently acquired for the 25th reinforcement group for training reinforcements in June, 1951, and that was almost immediately after the brigade landed there. My recollection is that evidence was given in the defence expenditures committee that the cost of these Sherman tanks, particularly having to be acquired as they were on short notice, was considerably in excess of what it would have been had we acquired other types of tanks, particularly the British Centurion, and placed the order at the time it was being urged on this side of the house that we should concentrate more on armoured fighting vehicles.

Members of Parliament—Pensions

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSAL FOR LONG SERVICE PENSION PLAN—PRESENTATION OF SEVENTH AND EIGHTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton): Mr. Speaker, if I may have permission to revert to the order for motions, I present the seventh and eighth reports of the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of these reports recommends the introduction of a bill to establish a pension fund. Hon. members will recall that when giving notice of the motion to set up a committee I stated that if there was such a recommendation it would not be apt to meet with objection on the part of the government, but that any bill would have to be preceded by a resolution and the necessary constitutional recommendation to the house from the Governor General.

Having been informed of the report that was to be made to the house I had a resolution prepared, and had it submitted to His Excellency the Governor General. I have it here now for consideration, and would be prepared at this time to deliver the Governor General's recommendation for consideration.

Of course this could not be dealt with, except by leave of the house, without 48 hours' notice. But if I have leave of the house I would be prepared to move that the house do, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider the resolution.

Some hon. Members: Granted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave of the house to introduce the resolution at this time?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask if by giving consent it would merely advance consideration by a matter of 24 hours.

Mr. St. Laurent: By 48 hours.

Mr. Fulton: We would consider it tomorrow, instead of the next day; is that not correct?

Mr. St. Laurent: The resolution would be called and it would then be moved that the house resolve itself into committee on the following day. So it makes a difference of 48 hours, instead of 24.

Mr. Fulton: All right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROVISION FOR RETIRING ALLOWANCES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a pension plan after long service for members of the House of Commons of Canada; to provide also for contributions by all the said members to a special account for such purpose; and to provide further that the pensions payable shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and charged to the said special account.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will take up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister respecting a pension plan for long-service members of parliament; Bill No. 390, respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund. Then we will consider the estimates of national defence, veterans affairs, public works and agriculture.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 25, 1952

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Sixth report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

TABLING OF FRENCH TRANSLATION OF REPORT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when I tabled in mimeographed form, in both English and French, the report of the committee to study combines legislation, I referred to the fact that the French translation did not contain appendices setting out present and past legislation. I now table a French translation of these appendices.

GERM WARFARE

STATEMENTS OF DR. ENDICOTT—DECISION CONCERNING LEGAL ACTION

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at previous sittings of the house two members of the opposition have raised the question as to what action was to be taken with regard to Dr. James G. Endicott. I should like now to make a brief statement on the subject.

The Department of Justice has examined two issues of a communist publication entitled "Peace Review" and Dr. James G. Endicott's speech at Winnipeg of June 18, 1952, in order to determine whether Dr. Endicott and the publishers of this pamphlet should be prosecuted.

There is little in this speech of June 18 or these pamphlets which was not already contained in a speech of Dr. Endicott at Maple Leaf Gardens on May 11 last.

Dr. Endicott, as is well known, is an ordained minister of the gospel and a Doctor of Divinity. He is obviously permitting himself to be used as a tool by which the propaganda of the atheistic communist party is spread throughout the world, and I do not think that very many Canadians will be taken in by his statements. According to the information available to the Department of Justice, the activities of such people as Dr. Endicott and the promoters of the Canadian peace congress have had very little effect on public opinion.

It is probable that the ringleaders of the communist conspiracy would like us to prosecute their dupes and tools such as Dr. Endicott and the publishers and distributors of these peace pamphlets. Prosecution would give them more publicity and might give them the appearance of martyrs. It would probably not embarrass the communists if Dr. Endicott were prosecuted and convicted. On the contrary, it is altogether likely that their interests would be served by a conviction. So far as Dr. Endicott himself is concerned, a prosecution and conviction could add little to the discredit he has already brought upon himself by allying himself with the forces of oppression, terror and atheism. It is felt that the advantages of conducting a prosecution against him would be more than offset by the disadvantages.

The freedom of speech which Dr. Endicott has been so consistently abusing is the freedom of speech which all Canadian citizens enjoy. The freedom of the press which the Canadian peace congress abuses is the freedom of the press which every newspaper in Canada uses from day to day to discuss public events and criticize or defend government policy. These freedoms are what we regard as the fundamental rights of every citizen and of the press in a free society under democratic government. They are indivisible. In our consideration of Dr. Endicott's obvious abuse of these freedoms, we must be careful not to do anything to injure or destroy the freedom of all Canadian citizens and of all Canadian newspapers.

For these and other reasons, following the example of other free countries like the United Kingdom and France, the government of Canada proposes to take no action at this time against Dr. Endicott for his public support of the communist party line in the allegations, such as the libellous and false assertion that the United States, operating as part of the United Nations forces in Korea, is waging germ warfare.

Each of Dr. Endicott's statements and each act of publication and of distribution of these pamphlets is a separate episode in the operation of the tools of the communist party in Canada. The fact that the government does not think that it is upon balance wise to prosecute for these acts now does not mean, of course, that Dr. Endicott and the publishers are being absolved from responsibility for their acts. Each of these acts has been noted and if the time should come when it seemed wise to prosecute, each of them will be taken into account.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to preface my remarks by saying that there can be no disagreement with what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said with regard to freedom of speech, but is it not a fact that under the law as it now exists there would be no ground whatever for the prosecution of any person making statements such as Dr. Endicott has made, so long as they have to do with another country within the United Nations? In other words, there is no law at the present time that denies any person the right to say what he will in Canada about any other nation within the United Nations.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend had listened to the statement which I have just read he would have heard in it no admission of the proposition which he has just put forward. The statement which I have just read does not purport to be in any sense a statement of law. It is a statement of policy. I am not to be taken for a moment as agreeing with what I understood my hon. friend to state as his understanding of what the law now is.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I just say at this point that I think that what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has said is in the best traditions of democratic procedure. I want to congratulate him upon it. I think we all agree that what Dr. Endicott has done is detestable, but nonetheless I think it is well that, at this time when freedom of speech and freedom of the press is being destroyed in so many countries, we take the stand which the minister has taken.

The percentages range from 3 per cent to 4 per cent of the cost of the building designed. Fees paid for modification to a design to suit site conditions are paid on a daily rate basis in accordance with the schedule of the Ontario Association of Professional Engineers. Contracts for detailed supervision have been for the most part on a percentage basis, ranging from 1 per cent to 2½ per cent of the cost of the work supervised. In some cases, the fees are based in part on a percentage of the cost of the work and in part on actual field costs, in accordance with standard fee practice. For partial or occasional supervision, daily rates have been applied.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

PROVISION FOR RETIRING ALLOWANCES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a pension plan after long service for members of the House of Commons of Canada; to provide also for contributions by all the said members to a special account for such purpose; and to provide further that the pensions payable shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and charged to the said special account.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, hon. members will find in Votes and Proceedings of yesterday the report made by the standing committee on banking and commerce recommending legislation for the purpose of establishing a pension plan after long service for members of the House of Commons on the basis of contributions equal to the contributions required by the Civil Service Superannuation Act and to be matched by like contributions from the treasury as is the case under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Hon. members will recall that when I gave notice in the house of the motion to refer the subject matter of a pension plan for members to the standing committee on banking and commerce I stated that a number of hon. members had been working for a long time on the preparation of a plan which had been examined by the superintendent of insurance, his actuaries and by experts from the Department of Finance, and that the plan appeared to them to be actuarially sound. I pointed out that if it were felt generally in the house that the establishment of such a pension plan would strengthen our parliamentary institution by removing to a certain degree the feeling that long years spent in the public service made it impossible for a man to provide adequately for his later years such a plan would be of a nature to encourage the right kind of men to run for public office and afterwards, when they had acquired experience, to remain in public life as long as their constituents wished them to do so, it might be considered.

I said that if a sound scheme could be devised it would not be apt to meet with objections on the part of the government because I had made sure before making that statement in the house, by discussing the matter with the leader of the official opposition, the leader of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Social Credit group, that they felt as I did that it was something that should be envisaged not merely in the interests of those who happened to be members of parliament at the present time. It was our view that if it was something that was merely going to be in their interest it should not be considered. However, if the opinion was that it was something that would really strengthen our parliamentary institution and make it easier to get and keep in parliament the kind of representatives necessary for the health of a democratic system, then, on the assurance that it was not going to be a partisan football of any kind and was something upon which there was general agreement by those who were more concerned about the interests of the public generally than the interests of their colleagues, for whom of course they have great friendship, I said that I would put the matter before my colleagues and get their authority to have the matter referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Before that committee the actuaries could be heard and could report what past experience would seem to indicate would happen under this kind of fund, and if it was felt to be the right thing by the committee there could be a recommendation made as to the legislation required.

Of course I pointed out that any legislation would have to be preceded by a resolution and that such a resolution would have to be accompanied by the recommendation of the governor general as required by our constitution and by the standing orders of the house, but that if such were the development there would not be apt to be objections that could not be overcome so far as the constitutional requirements of the British North America Act and our standing orders are concerned. This resolution is the fulfilment of the implied undertaking I gave that if there was such a recommendation a resolution would be forthcoming. The purpose of the resolution is to enable the house to consider the legislation recommended by the standing committee on banking and commerce. I have gone over the bill. It is in print and I think it is already in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is ready to be put in the hands of hon. members as soon as the resolution is adopted, and the terms of the recommendation, with which the bill to be introduced conforms, are included in the committee's report in yesterday's Votes and Proceedings. I have looked at them and they appear to be in line with the proposal that I had seen before the matter was referred to the committee, and about which I had ascertained from the superintendent of insurance and from the experts of the finance department that it was apt to be actuarially sound and a matter that would operate without any further charge on the public funds than the matching of the contributions to be made by all the members of parliament.

If that be so, and I have every reason to believe that it is so, it means that something of the order of $60,000 annually would be required to be placed in this fund and would suffice, with the contributions of the members, to provide for this additional security quite substantially although it will not operate in favour of very many of our members. It is the result of everyone being a collaborator in creating this security that makes it possible; but past experience has demonstrated that there will not be a substantial portion of the members of parliament in whose benefit it is apt to operate. That is like all co-operative undertakings. One does not know who will be in a situation where the benefits from the scheme would be very desirable but one does know that the additional feeling of security will be shared by all.

That being the case I feel it is a privilege, not as Prime Minister but as leader of the house, to provide all the necessary requirements to make it possible for the house to give consideration to this plan. If it comes to the conclusion to which it is apt to come from the information I have received I think it is a good thing and in the public interest to have it made law and become operative.

Once again, had I not had the assurance that the leaders of all parties of the house objectively felt that this was a good thing and in the public interest generally I would not have taken the responsibility of getting the authority of my colleagues to sponsor it. I know there is one hon. member who feels otherwise about it and perhaps there are others. So far one hon. member has expressed the view that there should not be in the case of members of parliament any contribution whatsoever from the public treasury to this pension fund. With that personally I do not agree. I do not see why those who serve their fellow citizens in parliament should not be entitled to the same consideration from their fellow citizens as the gentlemen who administer justice on the benches of our courts and as the officials who serve in the administration of our public affairs.

I have heard the suggestion that this would somehow lower the dignity of members of parliament. With that I am not in agreement.

I know, and all hon. members know, that the dignity of the Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom has never been affected by the fact that on becoming Lord Chancellor he gets the assurance of an allowance to continue throughout the whole of his natural life. I do not think that the dignity of the present Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has in the least bit been affected by the fact that the legislation of the United Kingdom provides that a former prime minister is entitled to a pension from the public funds without, as I understand it, any contribution at all. Here is a contributory system which if it is set up shows the desire of each one of us to make his contribution, that will give a feeling of security to each and every one, although we all know there is probably not more than one in twenty who will ever be in a position where actual benefits to himself will materialize.

I am inclined to think that most of our people in Canada are reasonably minded and that they will feel that this is a laudable thing for members of parliament to do for each other, and that by doing it for each other they are performing a service to the public generally by strengthening our parliamentary institution.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution carries perhaps the Prime Minister would answer some questions in regard to this proposed scheme. Also, since the Prime Minister has referred to the views of a certain hon. member, obviously indicating myself, he will permit me to say that my questions stem from the views I hold.

If it is decided by parliament that the scheme should go through in its present form with the present benefits and with the present scale of matching contributions, I feel that it would be desirable to place it on a basis where it would be financed as far as possible by the contributions by members. Now I agree with, and I have said that I have no objection to, a pension scheme for members of parliament. I said that at the outset and still maintain that position, but my feeling is that we should if possible finance it ourselves. Even if this house feels that it is not possible for us to finance it ourselves and still have a good scheme I think we should lower as far as possible the contributions from the treasury. I am aware that the membership of the house seems to feel generally that this is a good scheme and I will therefore at this time at any rate confine my remarks to questions.

I want to point out to the Prime Minister, as a basis for the questions, that in every other parliamentary pension plan that was laid before us for purposes of comparison there is an age floor—that is an age before which no member can start receiving a pension.

We were given figures to show that if this pension were deferred to age 60 then on the basis of the same benefits as presently proposed the treasury contribution could be reduced to 4 per cent instead of the proposed 6 per cent. If the pension were reduced to 60 per cent of our payment, it would provide a pension of $2,400 a year and the treasury contribution would be reduced to 2·6 per cent. If the pension were deferred to age 55, on the basis of the same two sets of figures—

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Since there is no mention in the resolution of the type of contribution by either the individual or the state, is the member in order in discussing details of what he expects to be in the bill which has not yet been presented by the minister?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The bill is in today's Votes and Proceedings.

The Chairman: I am glad the hon. member has raised the point of order because, as I was listening to the hon. member for Kamloops I was just asking myself whether he was in order. The resolution is:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a pension plan after long service for members of the House of Commons of Canada;

The hon. member has said he is in favour of that. And > to provide also for contributions . . .

He has also said he is in favour of that. What he is objecting to is the last part of the resolution which provides:

> . . . that the pensions payable shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and charged to the said special account.

At this stage, as the hon. member knows, we are studying the advisability of allowing an expenditure to be made, and he would be anticipating the discussion in committee of the whole on the bill if he were to refer now to what he thinks may be in the bill itself. I know that the draft bill has been referred to the committee on banking and commerce, so he knows some of the details. At this stage, however, discussion should be limited to the advisability of allowing the expenditure to be made.

Mr. Fulton: The facts I was giving, Mr. Chairman, were to form the background of my question. I think I can ask the question without further reference to the details. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would accept, and view with favour, an amendment which would insert an age floor in the scheme, and whatever might be felt would be the best figure which would be arrived at.

Mr. Sinclair: I rise to the same point of order, Mr. Chairman. There is no mention of an age floor in the resolution. The hon. member is just as much out of order in talking about an age floor as he was in talking about a contribution.

The Chairman: The hon. member is, of course, anxious to obtain certain information. May I suggest to him he will have ample opportunity to do that. The bill is not before the house at the moment. A minister is not allowed to divulge the details of a bill. I do not have the citation at hand which is applicable in this instance, but there is one which I have quoted several times in this house and which is to the effect that at the resolution stage a minister may, if he wishes to do so, sometimes reveal details, but he is not supposed to reveal the details of a bill.

If the hon. member is, therefore, asking whether those provisions will be in the bill, I believe he is anticipating the discussion in the committee of the whole. Perhaps he might consider that.

Mr. Green: On the point of order, there is a report from the committee which is involved in this whole measure. The Prime Minister himself has referred to that report. I submit the hon. member is in order in bringing up anything either contained in that report or to which reference was made in the discussion in the committee.

Mr. St. Laurent: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the subject matter has been referred to a committee of the house, which committee has reported recommending draft legislation. The strict rule that applies to legislation, the form of which is still unknown, perhaps does not apply here because the subject matter and the manner in which it is recommended that the subject matter be handled is already in the possession of the house in the report that has been submitted. I am sure the hon. member does not intend to go beyond general questions, and will reserve his special arguments on his special views for the committee stage on the bill, if and when we get to that point.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the Prime Minister's attitude, and I should like to ask him if he will give his view on this question of the insertion of an age floor. If you like, I can relate it to the definition of long service which forms a part of this resolution. I particularly point out that the insertion of an age floor, according to the tables we were given in the committee, would have the effect of appreciably reducing the treasury contribution.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member said he would like to know whether the Prime Minister would accept an amendment having to do with an age floor. My position is that, as leader of the house, I am moving the bill recommended by the committee on banking and commerce. It will be for the members of the house themselves to decide whether that recommendation meets with their approval, or whether they see fit to modify it. Of course they would not be allowed, under the recommendation made by the governor general, to amend it in such a manner as to increase the charges on the treasury, but there is no constitutional objection to modifying it in any manner that would diminish the charges on the treasury.

Mr. Green: This resolution, Mr. Chairman, reads as follows:

Some hon. Members: We know, dispense.

Mr. Green: It is a strange thing that when we come to discuss a matter of this kind we hear shouts and catcalls from different parts of the house. Surely, as members of parliament representing the Canadian people, we have the sense of propriety to debate this measure without those interjections.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. When the hon. member said that he intended to read the resolution, I said: "Dispense", in order to be gracious to him and to give him an opportunity of saving his voice for future occasions. He said that it was a catcall. I want the hon. member to understand that I always listen to him with great pleasure, and if I said "dispense" it was not a catcall at all but a gracious suggestion for his own comfort and well-being.

Mr. Green: This resolution reads as follows, Mr. Chairman:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a pension plan after long service for members of the House of Commons of Canada; to provide also for contributions by all the said members to a special account for such purpose; and to provide further that the pensions payable shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and charged to the said special account.

In his opening remarks today the Prime Minister has made it clear that, in addition to payments to be made by members, there will also be payments from the consolidated revenue fund. He has told us that this measure will strengthen our parliamentary institutions, and also that the plan is actuarially sound, although I would point out that it could only be actuarially sound, if in fact it is, which I doubt, because of the contributions from the consolidated revenue fund. Then, he has stated that the money from the consolidated revenue fund will only be a matching contribution to that made by members of parliament. Again, my understanding is that that is not the case and that there will have to be more paid by the country than is paid by the members. He has said also that no increased payments will be required in the years that lie ahead. No one can foretell that, but I shall be surprised if his statement proves to be accurate.

I believe that the government must accept responsibility for this measure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Where is your leader?

Mr. Green: The government of this country—

Mr. Abbott: Where is your leader today?

Mr. Graydon: The leader is in Fort William, and there is no use casting aspersions against him when he cannot be here.

Mr. Abbott: I was not casting aspersions.

Mr. Green: The government of Canada, and of any other country governed under the democratic system, must accept responsibility for measures placed before the house involving the expenditure of public funds. This is a measure of that type, and try as the government will it cannot get away from responsibility for this measure.

Mr. Sinclair: You have obviously no respect for the word of your own leader.

Mr. Green: Well, that is just typical of the kind of remarks that are made from time to time by the member for Coast-Capilano. I often wish that his constituents could hear him in the house. If they were to do so, I think they might get a shock.

I believe that the stand taken by my good friend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in this matter has been right from the start. I think he has shown great courage. May I say, as a native of British Columbia, that I do not believe our province has produced a finer young man in public life than the present hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Martin: The leadership campaign is beginning.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member for Kamloops is blushing.

Mr. Green: I have never seen the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) blush.

Mr. Pouliot: I have no reason to do so.

Mr. Green: I believe that any pension plan for members of parliament should be paid for by the members themselves. In this plan the members are paying far less than half the total expenditure.

Mr. Cleaver: That is not true.

Mr. Green: The remainder will be paid by our fellow Canadians. I believe that the people of Canada should not have to contribute to any scheme of this type.

Mr. Cleaver: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Cleaver: The hon. member has made a statement which I believe, I know, to be untrue.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, that is an unparliamentary remark.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member wants to ask a question.

Mr. Cleaver: Mr. Chairman, I obtained the approval of the hon. member. Once the approval is given—

The Chairman: Order. What the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) seems to want to complain about at this moment is that he thinks the hon. member is going to make a speech. I think he consented to allow a question to be asked. The hon. member will ask the question.

Mr. Cleaver: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I understood distinctly that I had the consent of the hon. member.

Mr. Green: Ask the question.

Mr. Cleaver: The fact that the hon. member does not approve of the question I am going to ask does not detract at all from my rights.

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my approval.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cleaver: I believe I have the floor as a matter of right.

Mr. Green: The hon. member can make his own speech.

The Chairman: Order. I believe we shall make better progress if this discussion is conducted in an orderly manner. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra had the floor. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) asked consent to ask him a question. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra gave way by resuming his seat, thereby acquiescing in the hon. member's asking the question. When the hon. member for Halton began to ask his question it appeared to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that he was going to make a statement and not ask his question. The hon. member for Halton said that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra did not like to have a question asked to which he would be opposed. That certainly is not the manner in which an hon. member should ask the hon. member who has the floor for permission to ask a question.

Mr. Cleaver: My question is as to—

Mr. Green: I am not answering any questions from the hon. member.

The Chairman: If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra does not want to consent to the question being asked, that is his right. He has the floor and therefore may proceed.

Mr. Cleaver: That is on the record.

Mr. Green: As I was saying when I was interrupted, Mr. Chairman, the people of Canada should not have to contribute in order to provide pensions for members of parliament. The burden of taxation on our people is far too heavy now. It can only be described as crushing. Just to give one example, we have the 10 per cent sales tax, the highest rate there has ever been in the history of this nation. That tax is payable by everyone, poor and rich alike. Canadians should not now be called upon to help pay for security for members of parliament. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has put the matter in those words; he has said it would be a nice thing for members of parliament to have an additional feeling of security.

May I remind the committee that just today we shall be considering a vote of over $2 billion for defence purposes, in preparation to defend this country and to prevent a third world war which, if it comes, may well mean the wiping out of our nation. The taxpayers of Canada are having to provide over $2 billion in this very year for these defence purposes. I do not see how, under those circumstances, hon. members can justify calling upon the taxpayers to provide a further amount, no matter how small it is, in order to help members of parliament.

I would also point out that during this very week we considered the War Veterans Allowance Act which is a measure for the benefit of men who fought in the front line for this country. In my opinion the provisions made in that measure were entirely inadequate. In addition, these men are still subject to a means test. They have to pass a means test in order to get this miserably small amount. There is no means test, however, in this pension scheme for members of parliament.

What will probably follow the enactment of a measure of this kind will be that most of the provincial legislatures will bring in similar measures. They will take the attitude that if members of parliament are entitled to a pension scheme, then so are the members of provincial legislatures. That is exactly what happened when the house raised the indemnity for members some years ago; it was not long until the various legislatures were doing the same thing. We set an example when we enact a measure of this kind.

I see no reason whatever for rushing through a measure of this kind in the dying days of the session. The details of the scheme have been available to the public only since the last week end. There has been no opportunity for people across the country to consider whether or not the scheme is a wise one. I think if a fair scheme could have been brought down there would have been general support for it across the country. But there has been no opportunity whatever for the press of Canada or the people of Canada to form an opinion on this particular scheme. We are asked to debate it today when we have not even the reports of what went on in this committee. There was quite an extended questioning carried on in the committee, and various other proposals were discussed. Government officials explained other plans. Yet we have not the reprint of those proceedings.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that this plan should stand over until the next session. That procedure would give time for thorough consideration not only by the members of the house but also by the people. Nobody is going to be hurt if the plan stands over. The pension would not be payable to anyone before the next election which we all understand is not to take place until after the next session. I repeat that no one would be hurt by letting this plan stand over until the next session. I believe that if that were done a better plan could be worked out. There is altogether too much haste, too much anxiety to get this through in a hurry; and we usually find that when that condition exists the measure as finally enacted does not turn out to be as sound as it would be in the ordinary case.

Then, finally, I differ from the Prime Minister in his statement that he believes this measure will strengthen our parliamentary institutions; I believe it will do exactly the opposite. I believe the measure itself and the manner in which it has been brought into the House of Commons, and is obviously to be rushed through, can only lower respect for parliament across this country. I greatly regret that the measure is being brought in in this way, and at this time.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, there is one argument involved in this pension scheme that has not yet been touched upon. There is a general opinion among certain people that the salary of members is but a small part of their income. And, using the language of the street, they say, "Look at the pickings they get!"

I do not know anything about income that comes from pickings, nor do I know any member in the House of Commons who knows. That is a point of view that we should disregard. I have heard men speak after they have passed through the House of Commons and, if I may quote the opinion of a young lawyer who had that experience, the only thing they gained was a few hot enemies and a lot of cool friends.

I commend the Prime Minister for not going ahead with this scheme without the co-operation of the leaders of the other parties. It is the perfect right of any individual to disagree with this group and to oppose any scheme that, according to his conscience, he does not think is right. I think the plan is fair to members of the House of Commons, and I commend the Prime Minister again for not proceeding without the consent of the other leaders.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, as one of the older members in the house, and one who would benefit if this scheme or this plan were to go through—if I should live long enough—I wish to say that I am in favour of the plan. I am in favour of the way it was introduced. With all due regard to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I do not think it is fair to say that the Prime Minister should take responsibility for the measure, in view of what has happened in the matter of communications with the various parties—provided, of course, that the same procedure was taken with the official opposition as was taken with the C.C.F.

There is, however, one thing I would like to say, and that is to suggest to my many friends on the other side of the house that they be not too hasty, and that they do not interrupt and be impatient when there is discussion from this side of the house. Nothing could cause more discredit to the House of Commons than to have it considered that members on any side or on all sides of the house tried to force this measure through, without the most ample discussion.

In my opinion the proposal of a pension after long service for members is so reasonable that we can afford to consider it calmly and dispassionately. I have the highest regard for my hon. friend from Kamloops. If he feels that he should oppose the measure, then we should consider that he is doing a favour not only to himself but to this house in opposing it. We are here to give expression to our opinions and our convictions. If either the hon. member for Kamloops or the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra feels differently to the rest of us he should be allowed to state his opinion, and with the utmost of freedom.

Hon. members of this house have been quite generous with pensions for various categories, if I may use that term, of the public service. We have provided pensions for judges, pensions that are very ample. Not only have we provided pensions for judges, but they have been so arranged that those pensions may be divided for the benefit of their wives or widows, as the case may be. We have provided pensions for our civil servants, and the contributions to those pensions are, as I understand it, pretty much in line with the contributions provided by this bill. We have provided pensions for the various commissions we have set up. And not only do we provide them with pensions, but we provide good salaries for them, as well.

Now, surely any member who has given long service in the House of Commons, long service to the people of Canada, does not feel he is receiving too much if he receives a modest pension upon retirement, after giving that service. I have had the honour of representing a constituency in Vancouver for twenty-two years, I believe it is. I feel I have given of my best to the people of Vancouver.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has done the same. I do not believe the people of Vancouver would begrudge me a pension for the rest of my days—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: —and I do not know how long they will be. I do not believe they would begrudge me a pension after my service to them is finished.

Surely any member of the house who feels he has given service to his people can feel that he is entitled to assume that he will not be up against hard economic conditions when he is no longer able to give that service. I think that is the way the question should be approached.

The position of the Prime Minister is quite simple. If he finds there is opposition to the measure from members in the house, then he can very easily say, "All right; we will not go ahead with it." But I would like to see this matter discussed calmly and on its merits, and decided by a vote of the membership, so that we would not put the Prime Minister in a position where he would have to take that responsibility; and I would not suggest that he take it. I suggest that it be left with hon. members where it belongs.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I would feel that I was negligent in my duty if I did not at this stage say a few words in connection with this resolution. I want to begin by saying that I agree with everything the Prime Minister has said. I support him 100 per cent in what he has said. I want it understood that in saying that I do not hold the Prime Minister responsible for bringing in this measure although I honour him for doing what the members of the House of Commons asked him to do.

I have been studying this matter in my mind for many months. The general proposal has been known to me for at least four months and some of the details for six or eight months. I happen to know that a proposal for a form of pension for long service in the House of Commons has been under consideration for the past two years or more by members of the House of Commons, not by the government or by the Prime Minister aside from their positions as members in the house. That would apply to the members of all parties.

I wish to make it abundantly clear that I do not think this measure is being rushed through, nor do I wish the committee to take hasty action even now. I should like to see every member given the fullest opportunity to study it and to bring himself fully into knowledge of what we are doing.

I honour any member who feels that he cannot support this legislation, if he stands up and says so and gives his reason. He has that right. I do not hold it against the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra or the hon. member for Kamloops for taking the position they have. I have always found them to be men of great courage, men who were prepared to fight for their convictions, so I am not going to say one word now or at any other time against the stand they have taken. I believe that both of them are wrong, and I think time will show that they are wrong, but I shall fight for their right to be wrong at any time.

I have definite reasons for feeling that a scheme of this kind will strengthen our parliamentary institutions. I am not going to speak at length, and I have not asked my colleague, the hon. member for Lethbridge, if I could use this illustration. The hon. member for Lethbridge came into this house in 1935 when he was requested by his people to stand for election. I do not know of any time in his life when he has sought to represent his people. He did not seek to represent them; he was sought by his people and asked to stand. He did stand and was elected at a time when he was at the height of his earning powers.

He has been in this house seventeen years during which time he has passed the most lucrative earning years of his life. Anyone who thinks that a member can stay in this House of Commons and do his duty toward the people of the country and accumulate anything honestly just does not know anything about it. He just cannot do it.

In addition my colleague surrendered seventeen years of pension rights in the professional body to which he belonged in the province of Alberta. He did that in order to serve the public and he can never get back those rights. He is at the point of years now where it would be impossible for him to start over again. Such surrender of rights is a serious thing for any man, I do not care who he is. The same thing can be said for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who is in exactly the same position.

These are things which must be considered seriously. When anyone says that it does not strengthen our parliamentary institutions to have a measure of this kind, I do not think he has thought through the details. It is all right for a man who has a profession to which he can go back every week end and keep up his earning powers. That is true largely of the legal profession, but who wants this House of Commons to be made up of lawyers entirely? I think I speak for the general public when I say that we want some lawyers, but we do not want all members to be lawyers.

Then there are hon. members who belong to other professions which they can carry on and keep up their earning capacity over the years. By and large, if we are to have a parliamentary representation that is a cross-section of the people we must have some arrangement of this kind. Otherwise we are going to eliminate the possibility of having cross-section representation. It will end in a situation where only privileged classes will be representing the people in parliament and I do not want to see that.

I do not want to labour this, but I do want to say that I agree 100 per cent with the Prime Minister's statement that this will strengthen and give health and vigour to our parliamentary institution. I do not know whether I shall ever participate in this plan, but if I were going to retire tomorrow from this house I would still support it because I think it has merit. I want to absolve the Prime Minister from all responsibility for bringing forward this legislation and place that responsibility right where it belongs, on the members of all parties who agreed to have it brought in and who agreed to support it. As you no doubt know, I am supporting the measure.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to say that when my good friend, the hon. member for Vancouver East, spoke, he spoke for the whole of our group. This matter was discussed with the Prime Minister and after discussing the matter with my colleagues in the house I gave him the assurance that we were in favour of a scheme of this description. When I gave the Prime Minister that assurance I understood that a similar assurance had been received from the leader of the opposition to the extent that a substantial majority of the Progressive Conservative membership in the house was in support of a scheme of this description. Consequently I would take it that the opposition which has been indicated to this measure is from a minority in the Progressive Conservative party and we should regard it as such.

A minority has the right to express divergent views, but I do not think those views should be over-valuated at this stage of the discussion. I would hope that there would be a recorded vote on this proposal as that would clear the atmosphere and we would know just where every member stood.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that I think it was unfair to suggest that either the Prime Minister or the government should assume responsibility for a measure which has been brought before this house at the request of all parts and parties in the house, and after the assurance was given by the leaders of all parties in this house that a substantial majority of the members of the parties were in favour of this measure. This is a measure which is in the interests of all members of the house, and, if I may say so without being misunderstood, in the interests more particularly of the opposition members. It is generally known that the casualties in a general election on the government side of the house when the government is returned to power may be provided for by some other means, but it is very rarely indeed that when casualties occur among members of the opposition there are places vacant after all the casualties on the government side have been taken care of. Therefore I say we should not try to place responsibility upon the government for a measure so favourable to the opposition if there should be any criticism of it here or elsewhere in the country.

As one of the senior members of the house with some seventeen years' service, I merely wish to state that during that period of time —hon. members will probably know some of the personnel to whom I refer—I have seen men and women who have served the country long and well pass beyond the portals of the parliament buildings after a general election, or forced to retire through ill health, only to return to a condition bordering on relative poverty. I do not think the people of Canada want that to occur in the future. In the last eight months or more I have talked to people about a scheme of this description. The hon. member for Peace River is perfectly right when he says there has been a good deal of discussion of the matter among various members of the house over many months. When I have gone to my constituency or have been talking to people elsewhere in Canada I have taken the trouble to say privately that such a scheme was being discussed by the members of the house, and I have not found any citizen, who has given any consideration to the matter and to the welfare of the membership of the House of Commons and of the country, who has uttered one word against a scheme of this description. I rose to say that my hon. friend spoke for us but as I was one of the three in this house who had given the Prime Minister the assurance that a substantial majority of our colleagues were in favour of such a plan I felt I owed it to the Prime Minister, yes, to the leader of the opposition, as well as to myself to say what I have just said.

Mr. St. Laurent: In fairness to the leader of the opposition, who is not here this morning, I think I should state that when he told me that he personally favoured such a scheme and that he knew that the majority of his group favoured it he did say that there might be members who would not agree. Therefore the situation which has developed is one which was implied in what the leader of the opposition said to me when I spoke to him about the matter.

Mr. Adamson: I thank the Prime Minister for an eminently fair statement with regard to the leader of the opposition. As the senior member for the Conservative party on the banking and commerce committee, I wish to dissociate myself and the party from the remarks made by the two members from British Columbia. I do so with regret because I feel that an agreement was reached by members and all party leaders on this subject. That is why I am particularly pleased with the statement the Prime Minister has made, and if I were to indicate that the Conservative party was not prepared in every way to accept full responsibility for agreement on this measure I would not be doing my duty as a member of the house and a member of that party.

We are responsible for our actions as individuals and as members of parties. We cannot delegate that responsibility to others. I take full responsibility for what I am saying and doing now. We as a party agreed to this measure and the huge majority of the Conservative party is in favour of it. The question of representation in this house is one of vital importance to the country. The calibre and quality of the people who can be induced to give up the best earning years of their lives to come here and serve the country is of paramount importance to the well-being of Canada. I say that as a professional man because I feel that the more professional men we can induce to take their places in this chamber the better the representation we shall have.

Under the present situation you cannot expect a professional man to give up his practice to come here. I do not care how carefully he works at his profession during the recesses and week ends, no man can be a member of this house and even do the necessary reading to keep himself up to date in any profession today in our modern world. Therefore we are virtually asking the professional man to give up his profession when we ask him to come here. If we are going to induce more people of that type to become members of parliament there has to be some small measure of security after long service. At one time in the thirties there were seven Canadians who had formerly held the high office of premier in various provinces and who were not then in office or members of any legislature. Of those seven four were in receipt of charity and one was on direct relief. If we are not prepared to look after those who, as a result of the judgment of the people in a free election, are called on to write and administer the laws of the country, we make a severe reflection on the whole status of our Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that this discussion has taken place because I do not think it would have reflected any credit on this house had this resolution been passed without thorough consideration.

There is just one point that I wish to raise with the Prime Minister and possibly it may be considered as a personal point; I do not know. I happen to be in receipt of a government pension at the present time. There may be other members who are in receipt of government pensions to which they have contributed, as I have contributed for a period of some thirty years. It is repugnant to me to ask for a second government supported pension.

I wonder whether the question of all members of parliament contributing to this scheme has taken cognizance of the fact that there may be members of parliament who are already in receipt of a government pension. As I say, I feel that it would be objectionable to me to be placed in the position of accepting two government pensions because I realize that there are many of my old comrades who are in a far less fortunate position and never had an opportunity to contribute to a government pension scheme.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the attention of the banking and commerce committee was called to the particular circumstances to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. I know that an effort was made to avoid duplication and that is to be found in the draft report in Votes and Proceedings under Nos. 15 and 16.

When the matter is before the committee consideration can be given to the terms of sections 15 and 16 of the bill to see whether they are sufficiently extensive. It is provided, as I understand from reading the report, that one who would be enjoying a judge's pension, for instance, would not get any allowance under this scheme. It may be that when it is before the committee of the whole for consideration it will be found that the terms should be modified because I think the intention was that there should be no duplication. If it gets to the stage of the committee of the whole I think that the committee should then give consideration to the language used to see whether it is broad enough to carry out that intention in all cases.

(Translation):

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words—and I shall not detain the house very long—on the principle of the resolution now under consideration. As I do not belong to any of the political parties represented in the house, needless to say I have not been consulted. This enables me to express more freely my humble personal opinion.

I must say at the outset that I cannot approve entirely of the principle of this resolution. I should immediately add that I am not saying this with a view to gaining a political advantage; on the contrary, for the proposal I would put forward might be even less popular, since it would provide for an increase in the indemnity to members of parliament.

Until now only senior members of the house have expressed their views on the matter; I hope that a junior member might also be permitted to express his humble opinion.

I simply believe that a higher and more adequate indemnity than is now paid members of the house would tend to improve the quality of the representation. I do not object to members who have served their country for several years receiving a reward; reward is probably not the right word. I should rather say that the public should be grateful to those who have spent here, as members of this house, say, 12, 15, 20 or even 25 years, for the very valuable services they have rendered to this nation.

I was listening a moment ago to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) who has submitted the most straightforward, but, at the same time, the most convincing arguments that I have heard in this house. Besides, the unanimous approval from the members proves it and reflects the general feeling of this house.

Mr. Chairman, this is what happens: A great many of the citizens of this country would be ready to offer their services, first as candidates, then as members, but they are prevented from doing so because of their responsibilities, as their financial situation would become a complete mess should they have to come here and represent their constituents during a period of four years.

I do not think that an uncertain pension, payable after 10, 12, 15 or 20 years, would be likely to improve their situation. On the contrary, if the members' indemnities were raised to $10,000 a year, they would be sure of receiving that amount and most of them could save say, $1,000, $2,000, $3,000, $4,000 annually and so accumulate a little fund which would help them to straighten out their affairs. Such would unfortunately not be the case so far as a pension is concerned and the young man who seeks a mandate would not be in a position to depend upon it when making up his mind. Granted he has been elected, he will be a member for four years afterwards. If he is defeated later on what will be the use of a pension he will never receive? What can he do?

Precisely because he has been away from his home for four years, a larger indemnity would allow this member, at least in certain cases, should he be, for instance, a professional man, or a small businessman, to pay somebody a salary, to a manager for example who would keep his business going, who would see to it that his employees would give the best possible service. In this way the members' financial position would be protected until his return.

I therefore wish to say to all hon. members of this house—as a matter of fact I am just repeating what I was saying a moment ago—that I have absolutely no intention of making any political capital from this situation, since my suggestion will certainly be far less popular than the idea of a pension. All the same it seems to me that would provide a way to improve the calibre of the representation in the House of Commons. I am not a lawyer; of course, I would naturally like to be one but I have been denied this tremendous advantage. However, I wonder if a scheme could not be devised to allow the present senior members of the house, who are about to retire, to draw such a pension and to grant from now on a higher indemnity to the younger members who happen to be in the house at the present time and to all future members. Such a plan may not be feasible but if it were it would offer, in my humble opinion, a means of doing justice to the older members who have sacrificed themselves and it would tend to improve the quality of those who will seek in the future to represent their county in parliament.

(Text):

Mr. Ashbourne: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that I am strongly in favour of the measure now before the house and I give it my hearty support. I consider it a forward move, and I realize that it had to fall to the lot of some parliament to introduce such legislation as we are now called upon to consider.

In so far as the members from Newfoundland are concerned, I should like to point out that they could not have service in this parliament before 1949. There are some members here who did have service in the Newfoundland parliament and I think that, so far as Newfoundland is concerned, I can make out a special case for them. I think it equitable and right that Newfoundland members who served in the Newfoundland parliament before confederation in 1949 should be entitled to have the sessions which they served in Newfoundland counted as a basis for possible qualification. In order that there might be more parity in the matter so far as Newfoundlanders are concerned, I trust that when the bill is introduced a paragraph will be placed therein to cover the matter to which I have referred.

I should like to say that my seatmate, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, when he entered the house, relinquished his right to a pension after seventeen years of service. In so far as Newfoundland is concerned in this matter, I do not see how there could be exact equality since, as hon. members realize, a commission of government took office in Newfoundland on February 16, 1934. Any service rendered by members from Newfoundland would be prior to that date.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Before the resolution carries, I do not think I should allow the remarks of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay to pass without some comment. On the general question, I might say that when I first heard of it it seemed rather novel to me. I was brought up in the school that considered that members of parliament should be independent. Of course that idea has now been largely dissipated, and when we come here we are party members more than we are members of the House of Commons. Nevertheless, I have heard very eloquent speeches made on this subject today. During the past three years I do not think there has been any subject which has moved members to speak so fervently in the cause which they are representing. I have been much impressed by the arguments advanced today, and I can see that these arguments are such as would appeal to the great majority of members. Without any doubt, a very strong case has been made out in favour of pensions for members.

I think it was the hon. member for Beauce, as near as I could follow him, who pointed out that members' salaries have not been raised for a long time and that was a matter which certainly should have received consideration prior to the question of pensions. Nevertheless, if that were done it would not make provision for members of long standing who have given such valuable service to this house and to the country. It would only relate to the future, and would not provide any recognition of the valuable services which hon. members have performed. In regard to the special remarks which the hon. member who preceded me made in reference to Newfoundland, it is worth pointing out that Newfoundland was a separate country with a government of its own, and that it had members who are now representatives in this house. I should like to point out also that during the years 1934 to 1949 we had a commission of government, and there were members of that commission of government who may one day become members of this house. It seems to me reasonable and just that consideration should be given, as the hon. member has requested, to have the hon. members from Newfoundland enter into this scheme with recognition of the service which they have given in their own land.

Mr. Power: If I may be permitted to mention a personal element for a moment in connection with this particular resolution, I may say that I am probably the only member of the house who has a definite mandate on this question. It came about in this way. During the course of the last general election, the campaign in the constituency of Quebec South was based solely on the fact that the former member seeking re-election had grown old in the service of the state, had become decrepit, had lost influence in the House of Commons and, in fact, had been relegated to the doghouse where even his bark was not of very much interest. My political opponents carried on a campaign on the sole issue, as they put it in French, "mettez Power à sa pension", or in English "Pension Power off". Every telegraph pole in my constituency was covered with this slogan "Pension Power off".

The result of the election would appear to be that my electors do not approve of pensions for members. By a majority of 13,000 they decided not to "pension Power off". But adhering as I do to the old constitutional principle that a member of parliament is not the delegate of his constituency but is sent here to represent the interests of the whole of Canada, and to use his own judgment and discretion in matters that are placed before the house, I therefore feel that I could, were I so inclined, or convinced, entirely discard the mandate received from the electorate of Quebec South.

In a more serious vein, I should say that in view of the fact, if this legislation passes, that I shall be immediately placed in a beneficial economic position, I feel it would be more appropriate and more proper if I did not cast a vote, should this matter be brought to a vote.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Fulton: On division.

The Chairman: Carried on division.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 392, to provide retiring allowances, on a contributory basis, to persons who have served as members of the House of Commons of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FINANCE

ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES RESPECTING CURRENCY, THE MINT AND THE EXCHANGE FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 390, respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have a statement which I think will take me ten or fifteen minutes to make. Perhaps we might call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

REDISTRIBUTION

TABLING OF THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the third report of the special committee on redistribution.

INTRODUCTION OF NEW BILL—WITHDRAWAL OF BILL NO. 8

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): May I have leave to introduce a bill with respect to the Representation Act. The house will be aware of the fact that we now have on the order paper Bill No. 8 which deals with representation. At the committee meeting this morning—and this is incorporated in the report I have just tabled—it was decided to recommend to the house that another bill be introduced to replace Bill No. 8. The second bill would be ready and might be read a first time today. It could be printed, and then come up for discussion perhaps tomorrow—if that meets the wishes of those who arrange these matters.

This bill will be similar to Bill No. 8, except for the necessary amendments as a result of the passing of the amendment to the British North America Act. The intention is that if the bill is given second reading it would then be referred to the committee on redistribution in order to have the schedule of the constituencies added to it in the normal way. I presume that if leave is given to introduce this bill it will also be necessary to ask for leave to withdraw Bill No. 8.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to introduce the bill, and to withdraw Bill No. 8 on the order paper?

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think this should be allowed to stand for a while, because the leader of this party is absent at the moment and I would not wish to give consent. I would have to refuse consent until a decision were made. If it could be held over until a little later in the afternoon it would be satisfactory.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was understood by the various parties in the committee this morning that this leave would be given, so long as it was understood (a) that no schedule would be included in the bill to be introduced at this time and (b) that its introduction today would be without prejudice to the rights of members to debate second reading of the bill. On these conditions we are quite prepared to give leave. I thought it would be well to make this statement now, and what I have said at this time would apply at a later time in the day when the Progressive Conservative party may have decided what to do.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated the understanding we reached this morning. But, in view of what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, perhaps we could let it stand until later today.

[Later:]

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Earlier today I asked leave to introduce a bill but some hon. members did not find it possible to grant that leave and therefore I am giving notice that I shall ask leave tomorrow.

FINANCE

ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES RESPECTING CURRENCY, THE MINT AND THE EXCHANGE FUND

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 390, respecting currency, the Royal Canadian Mint and the exchange fund.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I explained at the resolution stage, the purpose of this bill is to bring together in a single measure a modernized version of our existing legislation relating to currency, coinage and the mint, together with the necessary provisions to continue and regulate the exchange fund when the Foreign Exchange Control Act is repealed.

The bill, as hon. members will have noted, is in four parts: part I dealing with currency and coinage; part II dealing with the mint; part III dealing with the exchange fund; and part IV providing for the repeal of old measures, and the coming into force of this new measure. I will say a few words about each of these parts in turn.

Part I provides a more up-to-date version, without significant change, of most of the provisions of the old Currency Act—the remainder of its provisions will be found in part II, relating to the mint, where they more appropriately belong.

The various clauses of part I, which are fairly technical, state that the monetary unit of Canada is the dollar, and then proceed to deal with the denominations of our currency, the characteristics of gold coins and subsidiary coins to be provided, what constitutes legal tender and in what amounts, the currency to be used in public accounts and in contracts, and some other minor matters.

In this connection there are only three points to which I think I should make special reference.

First, in regard to subsidiary or token coins, which are defined in the bill as all coins with a denomination of a dollar or less but which, more technically, are coins which have a metal content less than their face value, in contradistinction to standard coins which have an intrinsic value as metal equal to their face value, the house will note from section 5 and the schedule that the same coins with the same denominations, the same composition and the same standard of weight and fineness are being provided. In the case of certain silver coins the remedy allowance is increased somewhat to the United States level, in order to make possible a more rapid production of coins.

However, we have also thought it desirable to provide for a situation which has arisen seven times during the last ten or twelve years, namely, that in war or emergency there may be a temporary shortage of some of the metals used for coinage—silver, copper, nickel—and it may be urgently desirable to conserve supplies of these metals for defence purposes. Hon. members will recall the various changes we have had to make in the composition of our nickel coin in recent years. We have had to make these changes under our emergency legislation. If this bill is enacted, the governor in council will in future have the statutory power to issue a proclamation changing the composition of any subsidiary coin when considered necessary to conserve some of these basic metals.

My second point relates to gold coins. In the old Currency Act there was authority to coin $20, $10, $5 and $2½ gold coins with a standard weight and fineness which, at the old gold price of $20.67 per ounce, resulted in these coins having a gold content equal to their face value, and Canadian gold coins as well as British and United States gold coins were made unlimited legal tender for their face amounts. When in the mid-thirties the price of gold was raised to $35 per ounce, these coins had a metal content very much in excess of their value as coins. Consequently those held by private persons have tended to disappear from circulation. The house will realize that because at the present time we are not maintaining any fixed par for our monetary unit, it would be impossible to lay down at this time any fixed standard weight for our gold coins, in other words, any gold parity for the dollar. Whatever may be the varying view of hon. members on this general subject of the so-called gold standard, I am sure all would agree with me that for the present it is, to say the least, impracticable to fix a gold parity for our dollar.

In this bill, therefore, we are simply trying to maintain the status quo. Section 4 provides that as and when the par value of the Canadian dollar has been established by or under an act of parliament and is being maintained, that is to say the par is being made effective, then the governor in council may by proclamation authorize the issue of gold coins with denominations of $20, $10 and $5, with a fineness of nine-tenths, and with a standard weight necessarily not specified but it must, of course, be such that the value of the gold contained in the coins is equal to the face value of the coins.

I may add that we have dropped provision for a $2.50 gold coin because at the present price of gold such a coin would be inconveniently small.

The third point relates to legal tender. The bill provides that a tender of payment of money is a legal tender if it is made in gold coins issued under the authority of section 4, which I described a few minutes ago; in subsidiary coins, up to certain limited amounts, issued for circulation in Canada or issued for circulation in any province of Canada before it became a part of Canada and which immediately before the coming into force of this act were legal tender in Canada; and, of course, notes of the Bank of Canada. As compared with the present legal situation, we are merely dropping the provision that British and American and Canadian gold coins issued in the past, on the basis of $20.67 gold, are legal tender for their face value; there is no longer any point in retaining this provision, as obviously these coins will not be turned over by a debtor to his creditor at their face value—certainly not except in the rarest of instances.

Part II of the bill brings together the provisions relating to the mint presently contained in part II of the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act—part I of that act was repealed by the financial administration act passed last year—and certain provisions of the old Currency Act which are essentially related to the operations or functions of the mint.

This part provides that all coins of the currency of Canada intended for circulation in Canada shall be issued at and from the mint. It requires facilities for making coins and for the melting, assaying and refining of gold to be established at the mint in Ottawa—which is set up as a branch of the Department of Finance—and it permits the governor in council to establish an assay office or branch of the mint outside of Ottawa to provide facilities for melting and assaying gold or performing any other function of the mint other than coinage. Hon. members will recall that we have an assay office to perform these limited functions of melting and assaying gold in Vancouver, thus providing convenient access for gold producers in British Columbia and the Yukon.

The master of the mint and such other officers, clerks, and employees as are required are to be appointed in accordance with the Civil Service Act. The provisions of the old Mint Act protecting the retirement rights of certain old employees of the mint who were employed when the mint was a branch of the royal mint are being carried forward in this bill.

This part of the bill also includes the necessary provisions for the making of regulations governing the purchase of supplies of metal for coinage, the purchase, assaying, refining and storage of gold, the prices, charges and other terms upon which the minister may buy, sell, assay, refine and store metals, the making of coins for other countries, and all other matters relating to coinage. It also includes detailed provisions for the trial of the pyx, requires the auditor general to inspect the store of bullion and coin at the mint at least once a year, and requires the master of the mint to make an annual report on the operations of the mint.

I now come to part III. The house will recall that when I announced last fall the dropping of all foreign exchange control regulations, I intimated that it would be necessary at this session of parliament to repeal the Foreign Exchange Control Act and provide for successor legislation suitable for the continuing conditions of the post-war period. The Foreign Exchange Control Act is one of the measures to be repealed by part IV of this bill.

To take its place we are proposing to re-enact in part III of this bill the essential provisions of the Exchange Fund Act of 1935 which it will be recalled was passed at a time of fluctuating exchange rates not too much unlike the present. The whole purpose of that act was to establish an exchange fund to aid in the control and protection of the external value of the Canadian monetary unit.

This fund was continued by the Foreign Exchange Control Act. Provision for its further continuance and for the conduct of its operations is contained in part III of this bill.

All gold, currency, deposits and securities now held in the account will, of course, continue to be held and the Minister of Finance is given power from time to time to purchase or acquire, or cause to be purchased or acquired, with money in the exchange fund account, the following: (a) gold; (b) currency of the United States; deposits in currency of the United States held in the name of the minister with the Bank of Canada or any bank designated by the minister; treasury bills or other obligations of the United States; (c) currencies of any country other than Canada and the United States that are freely convertible into gold or United States dollars, and deposits in such currencies held in the name of the minister with the Bank of Canada or any bank designated by the minister; and (d) securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada.

The minister, of course, is also given power to sell or cause to be sold any gold, currency, deposits or securities purchased or acquired by him or on his behalf at any time with moneys in the exchange fund account, and the proceeds of the said sales, together with all earnings and interest, are to be credited to the account. The minister is also given power to make advances to the account out of the consolidated revenue fund on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve. Any expenses incurred in the operation of the account are to be paid out of the account.

As in the old Exchange Fund Act, the Bank of Canada is relieved of the obligation to maintain a minimum or fixed reserve ratio of gold or foreign exchange to its liabilities, and there are certain provisions designed to maintain the secrecy of the fund's operations. The provisions of the Financial Administration Act do not apply to the account, and while the auditor general must audit it and the transactions in connection with it, his certificate in general is limited to certifying whether the transactions in connection with the account have or have not been in accordance with the provisions of the act and whether the records of the account do or do not show truly and clearly the state of the account. No civil servant and no person employed in the Bank of Canada is permitted to allow any unauthorized person to have information in regard to the fund or its operations.

As I indicated at the time foreign exchange control restrictions were removed, it will be our purpose not to attempt to maintain any stipulated parity or fixed exchange rate for the Canadian dollar, at least under present conditions, but rather merely to operate so as to minimize extreme fluctuations—to smooth a trend somewhat rather than to attempt to resist a trend in either direction.

Part IV merely repeals the Currency Act, part II of the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act dealing with the mint, sections 28, 29 and 30 of the Bank of Canada Act, and the Foreign Exchange Control Act; and provides for the coming into force of the new act on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

Perhaps I should explain that sections 28, 29 and 30 of the Bank of Canada Act are those sections which give to the governor in council power to require gold coin or bullion to be turned in to the Bank of Canada and to direct that in such a case the price paid shall be the old mint price of gold, that is to say $20.67 per ounce. The first subsection of section 28, which gave this power in respect of gold held by the chartered banks at the time of coming into force of the Bank of Canada Act, is already spent, and some other features of these three subsections relating to accounting are consequential in character.

I think it will be generally agreed that the primary effect of these subsections is to impose an unconscionable penalty and I think the time has now arrived when this penalty can be forgotten.

After the bill has been given second reading I shall move that it be referred to the committee on banking and commerce where the officers of my department will be available to explain its detailed and technical provisions.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few comments to make as I think the proper place to deal with these matters at length is in the committee. However, there are one or two matters to which I should like to refer. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will realize how fully we are in accord with him when he says that the intention of the government is not to try to fix any parity to the dollar at the present time but to smooth out the irregularities.

It seems to me that perhaps the most important thing in this measure, although it will not create any practical difference at the moment, is that we now have legislative recognition of the fact that there is no fixed backing behind the Canadian dollar. The requirement of 25 per cent backing which was contained in the Bank of Canada Act is removed by this act. One question which I shall raise in the committee is in connection with the power being left to the governor in council to reassert it at their discretion.

Ever since 1939, and perhaps earlier, we have had nothing that could be referred to as a managed dollar. We did have the Exchange Fund Act, which was repealed by the Foreign Exchange Control Act. I take it that it is also true that there is no power now, short of legislation, to prescribe fixed rates of exchange as between Canadian and other currencies because that was contained in the Foreign Exchange Control Act which is now being repealed.

The third matter which is of importance will be dealt with by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). I refer to the removal of what seemed to be a very arbitrary provision for buying gold below the market price.

There is one other matter I should like to refer to which no doubt will be dealt with in the committee. I take it that by and large the responsibility of operating our gold and United States currency account lies with the minister, and I take it also that the minister's agent in these operations, both during wartime and probably now, has been and is the Bank of Canada. I leave the matter to the committee with those comments.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I of course welcome this bill, particularly those clauses repealing the arbitrary and wholly unjust sections of the Bank of Canada Act with regard to the enforced purchase of gold at $20.67.

Mr. Abbott: Let us call them out of date.

Mr. Adamson: Call them anything you like as long as you get rid of them and it will satisfy me. We have been pressing for the removal of these clauses for a number of years and welcome their disappearance. If anybody had any doubts on the matter I think the bill goes to show the use and effectiveness of gold as a monetary backing for paper currency. While the ratio of gold reserves to currency is done away with I do not see how you could have a fixed ratio of gold to currency without fixed parity. In fact I think it would be quite impossible. The point about gold coinage of course is not operative at the moment and will not be until such time as we return to a gold parity for our currency. As the minister says, when that will be no one can tell at the moment. I would hope that the bill would have the effect of restoring the use of gold as a backing for currency and would liberate a certain amount of the gold that is now being hoarded.

There is one other point in the bill which I think is a wise provision, the use of the exchange fund. At the present time with large capital movements particularly across the border it is necessary to have some fund that can prevent a raiding of currencies. When you have market manipulators you have to have some fund large enough to prevent any manipulation of the currency for the pecuniary ends of speculators. I think that is a wise and justifiable provision. With the immense amount of foreign investment in Canada it seems to me there must be some organization capable of neutralizing panic conditions which may exist from time to time. We know that stock market crashes, rumours of war and many other things have an extremely jittery effect particularly on the New York stock market, and the exchange fund is most necessary to prevent the full evil impact that such occurrences might have on our economy. When the bill goes to the committee we shall be able to discuss it in detail.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

248. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and notwithstanding section thirty of the Financial Administration Act, to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,988,568,232 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $2,346,221,325 will come due for payment in future years); and to provide for the estimated actual expenditures in the fiscal year 1952-53, $1,642,346,907.

The Chairman: According to the agreed procedure we were examining the details as they appear in the book of estimates at page 297. When we were last considering these details I think we were studying the subheading, "Reserve force, including Canadian officers training corps."

Mr. Pearkes: We had not finished with the army.

The Chairman: We had not finished with the army. Therefore we will consider the details as to the army.

Canadian army—active force and general.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, when the house rose last night the hon. member for Kamloops had just concluded some remarks about tanks with respect to which I should like to say a word. I believe his point was that we should not have sent 17-pounder self-propelled guns with the 25th infantry brigade to Korea but that we should have ordered Centurion or Sherman tanks before and supplied them to the brigade. He referred to a statement he had made on this subject in 1950. In the first place I should like to say that a 17-pounder anti-tank gun is a normal part of an infantry brigade group, and the decision to send a number of these guns with the brigade to Korea was arrived at for purely military reasons.

When the brigade arrived in Korea the brigade commander found he was to be associated with United States forces but working as an independent brigade. The commonwealth division had not yet been formed, and that was one of the reasons which led him on May 6, 1951, to recommend that we substitute Shermans of the M-4A3E8 type for the M-10's which are the 17-pounders. His message sent on that date to the chief of the general staff read in part as follows:

Because Centurions are not immediately available I have now decided to request permission to change the M-10's for the M-4A3E8. Cost of these tanks would be much less than Centurions or Pattons. My decision has been made with the advice of British and United States armoured men and commander C squadron.

That was before the brigade group entered into action so that none of the hon. gentleman's remarks bearing on that aspect of the matter had any relevance whatever. The brigade entered into action with the tanks which they have since used and employed very well. There is only one remaining point and that is whether it would have been possible for us, even if it had been desirable, to have acquired either Centurions or M-47 or M-48 Sherman tanks at the time he suggested, namely, on the 7th of September, 1950. The answer is that neither Centurions nor Shermans of that type were available for us at that time. Later we ordered Patton tanks, the M-47, just as soon as they could be delivered to us. Subsequently production of those tanks was suspended and we ordered Centurions; and we are having delivery of the Centurions as early and as quickly as we could have done by taking the course as early as September, 1950, which the hon. gentleman suggested—if that had been advisable. We submit that it was not militarily advisable and it was not possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I want to leave the subject that is being dealt with at the moment and bring to the attention of the minister a matter upon which I asked him a question about two weeks ago. It comes under the heading of acquisition of buildings and works, one of the items under this section of the army.

What I have to place before him are a number of suggestions regarding the Yellowhead route that have been made by the Trans-Canada Highway System Association which has its head office in Edmonton. This organization, representative of urban and rural communities in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, asks, now that the trans-Canada highway location has been definitely established as the south route—with which this organization has no disagreement—and having regard to the tremendous developments that are taking place in northern Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, that in the interests of our national defence the highway between Winnipeg, Saskatoon, through Watrous, Saskatchewan, and thence through Edmonton and by the Yellowhead route to the Pacific coast should be proceeded with and a military defence road built either in co-operation with the provinces or directly by the Department of National Defence. I wish to bring to the attention of the committee and through you, sir, the minister, the representations made by these organizations and in particular a reference that is made in a letter of the 14th of May, 1952, wherein is embodied in short summary form the reason for the need of this highway. In that letter it is stated as follows:

> In the case of a global war, northwestern Canada will very likely be one of the battlegrounds. Therefore, the Canadian National Railways must be supplemented—and with all haste—by a military highway in the same manner as the trans-Canada highway will supplement the Canadian Pacific Railway. In fact, northwestern Canada must have all three means of transportation—railways, highways and skyways. Even if the highways are knocked out at times as a rule they can be mended very much quicker and easier than railways.

I need not point out to the minister and the committee the development in northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba today in mineral production and in the production of uranium and other basic ores. That development makes northern Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba one of the most strategic places in Canada. Indeed, the minerals being produced and the minerals about to be produced there will I believe, as years go by, forge the shield of freedom everywhere among the freedom loving nations.

I am not going to go into the details of the mineral development nor of the tremendous oil development in the province of Alberta. Suffice it to say that, in so far as oil development is concerned, although only about three or four per cent of the total area available for production has as yet been investigated, the oil potential is twice as great as that in Venezuela, one of the great potential oil fields in the world, and it is within seven billion barrels of that still remaining in the United States of America.

I could mention too the vast supply of uranium and of other basic ores. Today in the event that war should come there is no means of those areas being protected unless there is available a military highway such as is suggested by the Trans-Canada Highway System Association supporting the northern or Yellowhead route. I want to refer particularly to some recent editorials on the subject and also to some speeches made with which I am in agreement.

One of the questions asked is this: Why is it that the federal authority has not been building military highways? And the answer given by the association is:

> In case of war there should certainly be a military highway over the Yellowhead route to connect the cities of Winnipeg, Edmonton, Vancouver and Prince Rupert and to supplement the Canadian National Railways.

On the 23rd of February, 1952, the Financial Post contained the following item:

> There appears to be some difference of opinion in Ottawa as to what should be the policy on roads. Finance Minister Abbott has implied that they are relatively unimportant in defence and that their financing could not be undertaken at the same time as other defence needs. On the other hand Defence Minister Claxton is said to have admitted the inadequacy of the highway system. High army officers are reported to be alarmed at the state of the nation's roads.

Then it refers in the same issue of the Financial Post to the speech given before the Canadian Construction Association convention by president Robert Drummond in which he declared:

> . . . that federal authorities have not fully recognized the vital importance of roads in time of peace or war.

Furthermore, a similar point of view was expressed by C. W. Gilchrist, managing director of the Ontario Good Roads Association who spoke in Toronto. He said:

> The federal government's failure to recognize the importance of roads in defence is a policy which may, in the long run, prove hazardous to defence and detrimental to the well-being of the nation.

Again, the Financial Post, issue of February 15, states:

> Mr. Gilchrist challenged a statement made by Finance Minister Abbott who had inferred that roads are relatively unimportant in defence.

Then he goes on to say this:

> Mr. Claxton said in the House of Commons that many bridges cannot carry the weight of even a medium tank. High ranking army officers have said that they are alarmed at the state of the nation's roads. Ottawa's plans for the proper use of roads and highway transportation in civil defence are also pitifully inadequate.

Finally, the Edmonton Journal of February 14, 1952, in an editorial dealing with Mr. Gilchrist's remarks, said this:

> Of all highway projects none is more vital for Canadian defence that the evergreen highway from Winnipeg to Vancouver, of which the Yellowhead will be the western arm.

I want to add as well some of the views expressed by leaders in western Canada. The commissioner of the North Battleford board of trade, Mr. Wright, set out the facts in a statement that he submitted to the department as to the vital need of this road for national defence. Mr. S. N. MacEachearn, commissioner of the Saskatoon board of trade, summed it up in these words:

> Our highway committee has given considerable study recently to the problems of defence as they affect prairie centres. All across Canada citizens are being alerted to the need for instruction in civil defence in case war on a world scale again breaks out. Despite the efforts of leading citizens, many citizens in many of our cities are still apathetic. There seems to be a feeling that, as in the case of the last two world wars, Canada in the event of another outbreak, would still be free from invasion.

Then Mr. MacEachearn goes on to say this:

> Canadians are now confronted with the possibility of an attack by a much more formidable enemy than the Japanese and by one at a much closer range. There is a feeling among citizens, particularly of the northern cities of the prairies, that there should be access to the Pacific coast and to Vancouver by a route additional to the ones now in existence. There may be a hurried need for the withdrawal of population from the Pacific coast to the prairies or for the supplying of defence equipment to coast points.

Then he goes on to point out that a highway such as this is necessary in the considered opinion of the Saskatoon board of trade, and the officials of that board of trade, many of whom had distinguished military records. The same applies to the Edmonton chamber of commerce and board of trade, and also to other boards of trade across northern Saskatchewan who are, as I find it, uniformly in support of action being taken in this regard.

A moment ago I mentioned something of the resources in northern Saskatchewan and Alberta as to minerals and oil. Let me also point out how necessary this road would be in connection with some of the defence projects that have recently been established in these four provinces. There is the vast aluminum plant at Kitimat, the estimated cost of which will be $550 million; an oil pipe line to Vancouver from Edmonton via the Yellowhead route, $82 million—the Yellowhead route follows in general the route of this oil pipe line; the chemical plant nine miles east of Edmonton, $54 million; the celanese plant at Prince Rupert, $24 million; the establishment at Edmonton of three new oil refineries, $20 million; the Sherritt-Gordon steel mills at Fort Saskatchewan, $17 million; the bombing site west of Cold Lake, $14 million; the new seaplane base at Lac la Biche, $12 million; a second chemical plant two miles east of Edmonton, $12 million. In addition to that, there is the establishment of the Greisbach barracks and ordnance depot at Namao, ten miles north of Edmonton, at a cost of $15 million. There is the housing and equipment for 5,000 men at Wainwright camp, at a cost of $15 million.

In other words, there has been a concentration in the northern part of these four western provinces of defence works, without taking into consideration the development and the expansion in connection with the northern radar chain. I make this statement on behalf of these various boards of trade and chambers of commerce in northern Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. I ask the minister whether or not consideration has been given to the building of this northern route as a military or defence project, having regard to the fact that billions of dollars' worth of necessary defence projects have been established in this area, and that in addition to that almost a billion dollars is now projected to be spent in connection with defence or quasi-defence projects necessary to the preservation of our freedom.

Mr. Claxton: This matter was brought up in the house before, Mr. Chairman, and I answered the question on June 11 of this year. The answer appears at page 3125 of Hansard. I have very little to add to the answer then given. There is no such thing, that I know of, as a military road of the character described by the hon. member. There is a road, and roads are the responsibility of the provincial and municipal governments, with the single exception of the trans-Canada highway where parliament has appropriated money to assist in the project because of its national significance.

The Alaska highway was built as a military project because at that time it served no civilian need and could not be justified on any civilian grounds. For the same reason, that road has been maintained by the Royal Canadian Engineers as a military project, which it is. The Department of National Defence is interested in any improvements, in communications or transportation. It all helps. As for assuming any part of the financial responsibilities we would have to consider that in the light of other defence needs. We cannot do everything we want. We cannot do one-tenth of what we want with the money available, which has to be spaced out in the program. So far that program has not contemplated assistance to provinces or municipalities to do what the provinces or municipalities would do anyway for local and civilian purposes.

Now, I cannot add anything more to that. It is a plain statement of our position. We have not got the money to do it, and it is not our responsibility to do it. If we had more money for defence, we would apply it on more urgent military needs than this one.

Mr. Gibson: I welcome the statement of the Minister of National Defence, because I know he realizes how important the defences of the west coast are. As the member for Nanaimo has pointed out, he feels that perhaps there has not been the same consideration given to the west coast as there has been to various other parts of this country. I am not going to say that is true. I am very pleased with the development of the great airport at Comox, which has been proceeded with by the minister, as well as the one at Tofino. At this stage, I should like to express my personal appreciation of the assiduous attention the minister has paid to his job. I do not think there is any minister in the cabinet who has had a bigger job or who has worked harder.

The minister mentioned the fact that the road systems of this country are the primary responsibility of the provinces. I believe that all hon. members can agree with that. However, I have often thought that with the tremendous sums of money we are spending in national defence for the establishment of these various projects, it might be well if the minister were to approach the provincial governments to see if there were any joint projects into which they might enter on a basis of mutual profit. I recall a very important road that has been suggested since 1943. As a matter of fact, it would link up the airport at Tofino, which is a defence airport, with the road system of Vancouver Island. The road would be about 30 to 35 miles long, and would cost something over $1 million. I believe the hon. member for Nanaimo was the officer commanding that area at the time it was first contemplated. Whether or not he has changed his mind since then, I still believe that it would be a valuable and important road. I like to think that if such a road were established it would not be entirely a capital investment with no profit, because after all if the minister will look over the record of the cost of transporting equipment, supplies and personnel into the Tofino airport during the war, he will find that it amounted to a substantial figure. One might offset the million dollar expenditure for that road against the continuing cost of moving supplies in and out. I think the minister might find that he had made a good bargain by investing that million dollars.

I should like to point out also that to get personnel and equipment into the Tofino airport during wartime it was necessary to send convoys down there. Fortunately we did not have an instance such as that at Estevan Point 50 miles north, where a Japanese submarine shelled the coast during the war. But actually, to move troops in there with any safety by water, convoys would have to be provided at considerable expense. I would therefore strongly urge the minister to ask his officials to look into the possibility of establishing that road. After all, not only would it be of great military worth but I think that the province could easily be considered as going in on an economic basis with the minister and assisting him.

Mr. Sinclair: A sound political project.

Mr. Balcer: Will the minister give us some explanation with regard to this new service college that he intends to establish in Quebec, according to his statement made on Thursday, June 12? Can he tell us what type of school it will be? Is it to be a college or just a military school for French-speaking cadets prior to their entry into Royal Roads or the Royal Military College? Will the minister give us a few more details with regard to the matter?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to do so. The purpose of this college is to supplement the officer training facilities we already have either at Royal Roads and the Royal Military College at Kingston, the Canadian services colleges, or at the universities and in other plans. In order to meet the particular needs and circumstances of the province of Quebec and of Canadians of French-speaking origin we have decided to establish a Canadian service college at St. Johns in the province of Quebec. It will be located in the present army barracks which are being substantially added to and renovated.

The intention is to open this college, in the first instance, for one year when students having the equivalent of junior matriculation will be brought up to the equivalent of senior matriculation, which is the requirement for entrance to Royal Roads or R.M.C. and is also needed for entrance to most universities in order to take a course having technical qualifications such as that of engineering. If the success of this operation warrants it, it would be our intention to carry on this particular college for a second and third year so as to have it on the same basis as R.M.C. and Royal Roads.

I should add that only a small proportion of the officers who enter the armed forces come from the services colleges. By far the greatest number do not come from college at all, but come in by direct entry, on short service commission or for aircrew in the air force. The second largest group comes through the universities, through the university training plan. It is only the third group that comes from the services colleges. We want the largest possible proportion of men coming from the services colleges to have technical qualifications, particularly as engineers or other classifications requiring similar educational qualifications. That is a main justification for having Canadian services colleges.

Mr. Low: What would be the target at the new college?

Mr. Claxton: I should not like to set a target figure because the operation is quite experimental; but on the basis on which we plan to begin, it would be estimated at 100.

Mr. Balcer: From the information the minister has given, are we to gather that it is the intention of the department to establish this college on a sort of permanent basis?

Mr. Claxton: It is on a permanent basis.

Mr. Balcer: And are we to gather that it will be of the same type as Royal Roads and R.M.C.?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. That is right.

Mr. Balcer: Can the minister tell me whether the cadets, if they have a three-year course at St. Johns, will go from there to R.M.C.?

Mr. Claxton: They could go either to R.M.C. or to a university.

Mr. Balcer: It would be on the same footing as Royal Roads?

Mr. Claxton: Yes; or the first two years of R.M.C.

Mr. Balcer: I should like to get a little bit more information. What will be the contribution of the Quebec universities? In his statement the minister said that this college would be carried on with the co-operation of the two universities. What contribution will they make? Will they supply professors?

Mr. Claxton: That is a matter that is still being worked out. I said that I had discussed this matter with the authorities of the university of Montreal and Laval university and that they had offered their co-operation which I was glad to accept. The department is now working out the detailed curriculum and the organization of the college. Before that is put into effect, we shall seek the views of the appropriate teachers and officials at Laval university and the university of Montreal. We may also go to them for assistance in supplying teachers as well as for advice and support generally in the operation of the college.

Mr. Balcer: As I understand it, this will be a French college?

Mr. Claxton: It will be primarily French speaking, but the English language will also be used there.

Mr. Brooks: The qualification for entrance to St. Johns college would be the same as to R.M.C.?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: No. It would be either junior matriculation or its equivalent. Generally speaking, it would be a year less than for entrance to R.M.C. or Royal Roads.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): In the first session of this parliament I pointed out the requirements for defence with regard to a highway which was under consideration in this chamber at that time and which was known as the trans-Canada Yellowhead route. In view of the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre I take this opportunity to draw the attention of the minister to the views that I expressed at that time. I believe they are as applicable today as they were then. Irrespective of a highway of national importance to serve the needs of the population, I believe that a Yellowhead pass highway would serve and meet the defence needs; I refer to a highway into Edmonton from the east and west of Edmonton through the Yellowhead pass. Were money made available, and consideration given to its early construction, I believe it would meet the defence needs. I am sure the minister is well aware of the situation with regard to representations that have been made from time to time to the effect that a defence highway in and out of Edmonton would serve the needs of the future and would also serve the defence needs for the present. I hope that every consideration will be given to some means of having that highway put over the Yellowhead route. It would serve not only the greatest number of people in western Canada and our defence forces but would be for the greatness of Canada in the years ahead.

Mr. Claxton: I appreciate what the hon. member for Edmonton East has said. I think he was the first to speak to me about this, and also about the highway to connect Edmonton with the Alaska highway. Hon. members from every province have made similar representations at one stage or another about roads in their provinces, and very good cases can be made for them. I can think of several in the maritime provinces, for example, as well as in Newfoundland and British Columbia, in fact in every part of Canada. But these roads are primarily for the use of the provinces and their inhabitants and, as such, are a provincial responsibility. If there are very unusual circumstances, where a highway would not exist and would not be practicable except for federal support, and if such a road were considered essential for military operations, then of course the situation would be different. But we do not know of any such road among those thus far suggested.

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with what has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Edmonton East with respect to the Yellowhead highway from Winnipeg to Edmonton and the northwest. I have spoken on previous occasions with respect to this highway, and I wish to state again, I hope this will be given serious consideration. I contend that highway No. 5 between Winnipeg and Edmonton is the link between the east and the great northwest. The hon. member for Lake Centre has referred to the many millions of dollars invested in the city of Edmonton, but there are one or two spots he may have missed. I would refer again, as I have on other occasions, to the oil fields in the Lloydminster district. There are two refineries there, and a new plant was built last year by the Sidney Roofing Company. There is a great amount of bunker C fuel oil going out of these fields in the Lloydminster area, as well as a large amount of asphalt.

Not only should we look upon this as a defence highway, but I believe it would pay dividends by the future development of the northwestern part of this country, commercially. As I said before, this is the real link. No chain is stronger than its weakest link, and I believe this link would strengthen our defences, as well as bolster the economy between Winnipeg and the vast area around and northwest of Edmonton.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this matter. Only a couple of weeks ago when the estimates of the minister in charge of federal highways were before the committee, I made reference to it. At that time I brought the Yellowhead pass route to the attention of the minister, pointing out that it would be important as a defence project, and asked him to bring it to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

I hope the Minister of National Defence will realize that all defence projects are not necessarily located in this part of the country. This is a big country, and a potential enemy might use roads farther west. The project mentioned by the hon. members for Lake Centre, Edmonton East and The Battlefords would take care of a problem out there. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of those hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I have one further reference to make. Apparently the minister has put a complete damper on the possibility of consideration of this matter. Let me point out to him that in the winter of 1950 the chief of the Canadian general staff pointed out, as it is reported, that the Jasper highway and its continuation through the Yellowhead pass to the Pacific coast is of high importance, to quote his words, "to the defence of Canada and the marshalling of military forces for the Pacific". The attitude taken by those who apparently know what the necessities are is that the chief of general staff was stating but the simple truth when he referred to the need of this highway as a strategic military highway. That fact has been accentuated by the development I tried to point out.

When the hon. member for The Battlefords suggested that I had neglected to refer to the oil fields at Lloydminster, perhaps he had not noted that my reference was not to the oil fields of any particular province. I realize that the development at Lloydminster was the first in the northern Saskatchewan or northern Alberta area. It was of course included when I stated that, while only a small portion had as yet been surveyed, the potential oil supply was little less than that of the United States. The information is that at the present time the potential oil supply is about 20 billion barrels, as compared with a potential still existent in the United States of 27 billion barrels. Certainly I had Lloydminster in mind, though I did not specifically mention it. My reference was to oil developments generally.

While the minister has spoken as if this were a provincial matter, my personal belief is that it is a development necessary for our defence. If we are going to develop the northern parts of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and British Columbia, then in the absence of an adequate military highway we would find ourselves in a serious situation if —and God forbid—we should ever find ourselves in a war. Certainly in the light of the vast potentialities and developments in that area, there is no comparison between the requests and demands for this highway as compared with the demands for highways in other parts of this country where the development does not serve the potentialities now apparent in those four provinces.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I think we must revise our thinking on this whole matter to make it include the provision of military highways, or a network of highways to serve the forces for purposes of defence, just as we now think of them in terms of serving our civilian needs. The United States has not left the whole matter of strategic highways to the states of that great country. They recognized long ago the necessity for integrating their highway system with their defence problem. In that country the federal government has proceeded not only to build a number of trans-United States highways, but they have gone further and have contributed substantially to a network of secondary highways within the states.

It looks to me as though many of our defence preparations would be rendered useless, or at least greatly minimized in their effectiveness, if we do not have ways of transporting overland some of the equipment that would be required at given places and times. What has been said by hon. members this afternoon ought to be borne in on the consciousness of those in the federal government who are concerned with the defence of the country.

If there is any doubt as to where responsibility lies, then it would seem to me to be wise for the federal authorities to confer with provincial authorities in an attempt to integrate the highways for defence requirements. I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre and others who have spoken this afternoon have made a strong point, and I support them in it.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, while we are on the subject of roads, I would suggest that the Department of National Defence should confer with the department responsible for the trans-Canada highway with respect to the routing of that highway as it approaches Victoria. I think the Department of National Defence would be vitally interested in the route, as they have many establishments to the west of Victoria and the bottleneck which will exist in the vicinity of Parson's bridge might cause some concern. I suggest that before the government decides to assist the province to that extent the department should confer with the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to look into that. When the trans-Canada highway was up for consideration I asked the chiefs of staff to advise me if there were any particular places where we should make representations that the routing of the highway might be more desirable from the defence point of view. Representations were made in connection with another location, but the province did not accept the view we put forth. While it will not make a terrific difference in our national defence it would have been preferable the other way.

The situation at Victoria is a local condition which I shall see is looked into. I know there are others, and I do not want to exclude from consideration at this time anything in which hon. members are interested. As I have said before, communications and transportation or anything that is useful in connection with defence will receive consideration.

Mr. Ferrie: The trans-Canada highway is far from being substantial enough to stand the wear and tear of military movements. The provinces could not afford to build a highway of that calibre. What we are asking for in western Canada is a highway for the protection of those provinces. We are not asking for a highway for tourist traffic or anything like that; we are asking for a highway which will give us protection in case of invasion from the north. It would be absolutely impossible to move an army with its heavy guns over this highway in the summertime. They just could not be moved through the western provinces. We feel that this highway should be built through the defence organization for the protection of the three western provinces.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we pass on to the air force?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the next item is air force; it is reserve army. Before we pass on may I ask the minister for an explanation of the item at the bottom of page 300, travelling and removal expenses, $12,100,000 as compared with $7,510,000 last year, and freight, express and cartage, $11,400,000 as compared with $5 million. In view of the fact that the brigade was moved to Europe last year and the additional fact that the other brigade was moved back and forth to Korea I cannot quite understand why there should be these large increases in the travelling and freight items.

Mr. Claxton: It is largely due to the increase in military strength and the amount of transportation that will be needed to replace the brigade in Korea and to provide for rotation in Europe. There will be a steady movement in the build-up of the air force in Europe during the year. The increase in the size of our forces during the year was some 30,000. There is an item for posting, $1,191,115; on cessation of service, transportation for a larger number of officers and men, $965,715; on intake planned throughout the year, $602,205. Then there is reinforcement and rotation in connection with the Far Eastern theatre, $2,058,365; by ocean, $990,870; disembarkation leave, $615,120; embarkation leave, $1,674,655. For the 27th Canadian infantry brigade there is an item for leave, $449,495; rail in Europe, $451,795; rail to units in Canada, $481,535.

It can be said that the increase was due partly to the increase in the size of the armed forces and partly to the fact that we have a brigade group in Europe and another in Korea on opposite sides of the world twelve thousand miles from each other.

I should add that while the estimate for last year totalled $7,510,000 it was found necessary to spend $12,808,870 because at the time the estimates were prepared it was anticipated that we would just have a battalion in Korea, instead of which a brigade group became necessary.

Mr. Harkness: I think the latter explanation is the one that will satisfy me. I could not understand, when the army had increased by less than one-third, why these expenses should be more than doubled.

What the minister said about the air division being built up in Europe would have no effect upon these figures because that would come under air. As far as I can see these figures relate entirely to army. I understand now that the estimate last year was less than was required, the amount spent being close to the figure for this year.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we pass on to air force?

Mr. Harkness: The reserve force is the next item.

The Deputy Chairman: When I took the chair I understood that the hon. member for Lake Centre was discussing the northwest highway system, to be found on page 302.

Mr. Harkness: No, he was not; we were dealing with army items.

The Deputy Chairman: Have we disposed of "Canadian army active force and general"?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Then shall I call "reserve force, including Canadian officers training corps"?

Mr. Catherwood: Before you do that, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say to the Minister of National Defence that while we do not always approve of some of the expenditures made by his department, so far as the army military vehicle depot at Hagersville, Ontario, is concerned it has been my privilege to visit that establishment on a number of occasions and I think it is operated in a very efficient manner. I should like to ask the minister to visit that vehicle depot some time in order that he may see for himself how well conducted that branch of the department is.

Mr. Claxton: Thank you very much. It is one of the few defence establishments I have not visited.

Reserve force, including Canadian officers training corps.

Mr. Harkness: On page 7 of the white paper recently tabled in the house there is a reference to the reserve army reading as follows:

The reserve army strength has increased by over 13,000 since March, 1948, to a present total of approximately 47,000. Despite the fact that 5,000 members of the reserve army joined the active force in 1951 . . .

I think that statement is likely to create something of a wrong impression because it happens that 1948 was the year in which the strength of the reserve forces, including the army, was at the lowest level that has ever existed. If one looks at the report of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950 one sees that on page 88 the strength of the reserve and active forces is listed. The strength of the reserve army in 1925-26 was 49,000 and by 1927-28 it had risen to 52,000. From then up to 1935-36 the strength remained in the 50,000's. In 1935-36 there were only 45,000, and just before the war the figure rose to 51,000. During the war of course their number greatly increased, so we will have to leave that out of consideration. In 1945-46, however, the figure was 56,000, in 1946-47 it was 37,000 and in 1947-48 it was 33,591. Then the figure rose until in 1949-50 it was 43,047.

I mention that because I think as the sentence in the white paper stands now it gives a wrong impression as to the way in which the strength of the reserve forces has increased. It gives the general impression that the increase in numbers has been extraordinarily good. I think one of the weaknesses in our entire set-up is the relative weakness of our reserve forces. It has been my opinion ever since I have been a member of the house that not enough attention has been paid to our reserve forces and particularly to increasing their strength so the units will have enough men with whom to carry on adequate training. I do not propose to take up the time of the committee now to go into the various ways in which that might be done, but I should like to urge the minister to use more energetic means than have been used so far to attract recruits into our reserve forces, not only the army which we are discussing at the moment but also the other two services.

Mr. Green: Would the minister give the committee an explanation of the present position with regard to that force which was to be known as the Canadian Rangers? As he knows, during the second world war a force was established in British Columbia known as the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers which did excellent work. The units were located in the rural areas of the province where there were no reserve force formations, and I think at one time over 10,000 belonged to the rangers. Their esprit de corps could not have been higher. Most of the members of the force were not of an age to be in the active forces. They were mostly men who understood getting around in the rural areas of the province, and they did a grand job. I do not think the minister will question that fact.

Some years ago it was indicated that this force was to be reconstituted, but very little progress seems to have been made. In fact I am wondering whether the idea has been abandoned. If that is the case I think it is a great mistake, because many of these men who did such good work during the war are prepared to carry on. There are functions for them to fulfil. For example, some of their functions were to assist in repelling any invader, to assist in anti-sabotage precautions, to assist the active forces in the isolated areas of the province, to do coast watching and to report any unusual occurrence. I believe that the numbers allowed for these formations are so small that it is going to be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to establish the units again.

I hope the minister can assure us that the intention is to drive ahead with this plan. There were to be units not only in British Columbia but also in the Northwest Territories and possibly in the Yukon. I believe there is a great work to be done. One aspect of the matter is that these units had a great influence on the young men in the districts. They got young men to join the active forces. They built up morale throughout the districts where the units functioned. Will the minister tell us the present situation with respect to this force?

Mr. Claxton: The force was reconstituted some four years ago under the name Canadian Rangers as an element in the reserve militia, and organization has been pressed forward. It was never the intention to secure a large number of men in any one locality. The object was to cover as far as possible every isolated part of Canada, and there are units in virtually every community in the more isolated sections of the country. I have seen maps showing where they are located, and I would be glad to have one shown to the hon. member from which he would see that there is very wide coverage not only of the coast of British Columbia, and to a lesser degree the Atlantic coast, but also the Yukon, the sub-Arctic, the Arctic and other localities where there are no other forms of organized police or military formations. Our object has not been to build up large units. We thought if that were done the men would get browned off and the effort of organization and maintaining interest would far outweigh the usefulness of the results obtained. On the other hand the object was to secure an organization of key personnel, and I believe that has been done.

Mr. Green: How many have been enrolled in the Canadian Rangers?

Mr. Claxton: I have not the figure. The establishment was set at some forty or fifty companies but no particular strength was set for each company. I will get the figure of enrolments for the hon. member.

Mr. Green: I am afraid the minister's approach is not the right one, because where there are just a handful of members in a community you cannot maintain interest. I have seen these maps too, and companies are shown as covering areas hundreds of square miles in extent. It might take a man a week to get from one end of the company area to the other—certainly that is true in British Columbia—and the idea of simply having a total of ten or twenty in a unit in an area of that kind means that the men never get together and there can be no efficient organization whatever. I believe many of the men who rendered such good service in the Rangers during the war are thoroughly discouraged about the picture, and it would be far wiser to set up a unit in a place where there could be enough men to keep up the interest. I hope the minister will look over this whole picture again to see whether some such plan can be worked out.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall reserve force carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Royal Canadian air force—regular and general.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister what the policy is in regard to promotions within the R.C.A.F. So he may know what I am getting at perhaps I had better give the background for this question. My understanding is that approximately 400 officers in the R.C.A.F. were promoted effective the 1st January, 1952, and a further 324 were promoted on the 1st June, 1952, making a total during the past year of 725 or thereabouts. I further understand that there are about 125 officers in the R.C.A.F. on the administrative staff who are known as administrative officers. Amongst the 725 promotions that took place there were none for administrative officers of the rank of flight lieutenant and above. In other words there was no promotion to any senior rank during this period for administrative officers. There were approximately 40 flight lieutenants and 25 squadron leaders who had long service but who were passed over for promotion.

I am led to believe that the result of this is that the feeling has become rather widespread amongst administrative officers in the R.C.A.F. that there is no future in that branch of service. I do not think the effect on morale needs any explanation. Officers serving in a branch who think they are going to receive no promotion or very little promotion naturally become disgruntled. I would think that if a policy of that kind is to be followed, and according to my information that seems to be the case, it would have a very bad effect on the administrative branch of the R.C.A.F. I would like the minister to tell us what is the general policy of promotion within the R.C.A.F. and how a situation of this sort could come about.

Mr. Claxton: This is the first I have heard of it, but I will be glad to look into what the hon. member has said. R.C.A.F. officers are divided into general list officers and administrative officers. Promotions take place in each section according to a scale that has been established, and they are very similar to divisions. It may be that at the time to which the hon. member refers there were no vacancies in the administrative list or that there was greater expansion in the work being done by the part of the R.C.A.F. that had to do with the general list. That might explain the discrepancy to which he refers, but I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Harkness: I would like to say further that my understanding is that there were appointments made to senior administrative posts during this period, but they were not given to officers who were in the administrative branch. These appointments to the senior administrative jobs were given to officers from other branches.

Mr. Claxton: That is not my information, but I will be glad to look into that too.

Mr. Dinsdale: There are just three things I would like to deal with briefly, if I may bring them up while I am on my feet now.

The first has to do with the question of fighter armament. I have been pursuing that question for some time and all I want to say at the moment is that I thank the minister for the information he has provided in this regard. I had the opportunity of discussing the matter personally with the armament officer, and I am now more or less fully satisfied concerning the present course of action.

The second item I refer to appears on page 302 and is concerned with the possibility of expansion of the air force training scheme. There is a slight increase in the estimate for this year, and I am wondering if it has any connection with information that has been published in air magazines of good standing to the effect that enlargement of training activities is being contemplated, which could possibly mean a further expansion of airport facilities over those already under development. I would appreciate having a statement in that connection.

On my final point I perhaps should wait until we come to the reserve force, as it concerns that force.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the question of armament I appreciate what the hon. member has said. Just recently I have received some additional information which I will be glad to pass on to him privately.

With regard to the expansion of the air training scheme, we have no present intention of increasing facilities for air training by adding to the number of airfields. At present some twenty airfields or training establishments are engaged in training under the present air training plan, and they are just about working at their fully planned rates. It will interest hon. members to learn that we are training more men per station than we did during the war, through a more efficient use of both aircraft and training facilities.

What we propose to do is increase the intake just as much as we can with the existing facilities. I have told both the North Atlantic nations and the United Kingdom authorities that if we can train more aircrew for them and if they have more applicants, we will be glad to do so. The main reason for an increase in the expenditure on this account, however, is that we are beginning to approach the peak of the operation.

Mr. Pearkes: During the past twelve months the recruiting for the women's division of the R.C.A.F. has been opened up. I want to raise a question with regard to the discipline of that force, and I refer particularly to the attitude of the service towards the women in it. I think I can best illustrate my point if I refer to a detailed case, but I would prefer to do so without mentioning the name of the party concerned.

A young lady who was brought up in a Victoria home recently joined the women's division of the R.C.A.F. She was posted to Aylmer, and during her service had written continually to her relatives in Victoria. Suddenly, on April 10, those letters ceased to reach the relatives. After a long period during which their own letters were not replied to and telegrams were not answered, they became very concerned about the whereabouts of this young lady. They therefore communicated with the chaplain on the station at Aylmer, Ontario and on May 17—please note the date, May 17—they received word that this young woman was absent without leave.

In the letter from the commanding officer he advised the relatives that the security police had been notified, and then he went on to use these words:

No further action was taken at this point, as it would be a waste of the taxpayers' money.

Then he went on:

> The practice of personnel absenting themselves without leave is not unusual in the service, and not too much weight is placed upon these actions.

I hardly like to put on record the words which were used by the relatives of this young woman, after suffering terrible distress during this period of her absence and then being told that further action would be a waste of the taxpayers' money. It certainly caused them terrible heartburnings, because no matter what value the R.C.A.F. might place on this young woman, her relatives' affection for her certainly could not be assessed in dollars and cents. I quote from the letter from the relatives:

> This young woman must be found no matter what the cost may be to the taxpayers. We have paid taxes for more than thirty years, and we demand this protection and consideration. In any case, whatever of suffering or misfortune has overtaken her, we hold the R.C.A.F. responsible. We feel that they have been guilty of gross neglect and brutal indifference regarding the welfare of our dear girl who was placed under their authority.

Personally I can think of no statements which could be made by a commanding officer which would show less consideration or be more brutal than to tell the relatives no further action was being taken because it was a waste of taxpayers' money. I know that is an isolated case; but I do think that, at a time when we are just taking women into the services, if the attitude expressed by that commanding officer is also the policy of the department or the general attitude of the R.C.A.F., then there must be a change in that attitude if the women's division is to attract the right sort of young women. While it may quite possibly be the attitude of some of the services in so far as a man is concerned who goes absent without leave or becomes a deserter, that is good riddance to bad rubbish, that attitude must not exist so far as the women in our services are concerned.

I feel that if a real effort had been made to locate this young woman, who to date has not been located in spite of inquiries I have made personally through the various police forces, surely the first people to communicate with would have been her next of kin. I do feel there may have to be a somewhat different attitude adopted, so far as the women's services are concerned, to that which is normally adopted with regard to a man. A man may go absent without leave and there is probably every justification for not notifying the parents or the next of kin about him; but where a young woman is in the service I cannot help feeling that a different attitude must be adopted. The first action to be taken should be to notify the next of kin that a girl is either absent without leave or cannot be accounted for.

There is just one paragraph in the letter from these people which I think describes the mental anguish that they are suffering. It reads as follows:

> Naturally, we fear that some dire calamity has overtaken our girl. She may be in dire need, and any number of dreadful things may have happened to her. This long silence from one who has always been so kind and considerate is very hard to bear and impossible to understand.

I am quite certain the minister will appreciate the anxiety of these people in this case. I am not raising any point about the particular case. I am simply saying that at this time when we are taking women into the services there should be a careful review of the attitude of the services towards the women for whom the senior officers are, in some measure, responsible.

Mr. Claxton: I must say I should think the normal procedure in a case of this kind would be for the unit concerned to get in touch with the home without any delay at all.

Mr. Pearkes: It was not done.

Mr. Claxton: Apparently it was not done. I know the hon. member will not mind my looking further into the case when he gives me the name privately afterward. I shall be glad to go right to the bottom of it.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister will recall that I have already given him the name. I did so when I spoke to him about it some three weeks ago.

Mr. Claxton: The letter is certainly most unfortunately worded, when the officer refers to the waste of taxpayers' money. Undoubtedly he was thinking in terms of steps to apprehend the person who was absent without leave. In that respect he was taking the ordinary military attitude, no doubt. I will be glad to look into the case and to follow it up. I might add that I have a close relative now engaged in the university training plan of the R.C.A.F. at London, and reports are that the treatment there is excellent in every way.

Mr. Harkness: I want to ask the minister something about the radar system which he speaks about at page 3 of the white paper, in which it is stated:

> . . . a number of the stations in Canada which are of primary usefulness in the defence of the United States will be manned by U.S.A.F. personnel, beginning this summer.

I should like to ask the minister if those stations are now manned by United States air force personnel and, if it is not undesirable to give the information for security reasons, how many of these stations the United States air force personnel are manning. Then in paragraph 7 at the top of page 4 we find this:

> In addition, the organization for a ground observer corps is being prepared. Its function will be to provide a body of civilian aircraft spotters and observers to plot and report low flying aircraft over Canadian territory.

This language "the organization . . . is being prepared" is a little ambiguous. I should like to ask the minister when it is anticipated that this organization will be in effect and there actually will be a spotter organization in existence.

One of the reasons I bring this matter up is that on the front page of the Montreal Gazette of June 17 there was a headline as follows: "United States orders 24 hours a day sky watch to guard borders against air raid." Following underneath that we find this: "Spotter system goes in force on July 14." Apparently in the United States they are sufficiently alarmed over the possibility of a raid that they are going to put this spotter system into effect in just about two weeks' time. It seems to me that under these circumstances possibly we are rather late in getting an organization of this sort built up.

These questions I have asked are all really in connection with what you might call warning against air raids. The radar stations and these spotters are for the same purpose or are complementary to one another. That is why I asked the questions together. Probably the minister could give one answer to these three or four questions I have asked.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the radar stations, the manning is beginning. The commanding officers of the stations are beginning to take up residence, and some men have arrived. The operation is therefore beginning and will be carried on during the summer.

With regard to the ground observer corps, this has recruited about 35,000 personnel. Filter centres are being set up at a number of points which may later be increased. Detachments of regular force personnel are being located at these points to provide a permanent nucleus and to organize and activate the corps in their respective areas. All the top civilian positions have been filled with volunteers. Despite the fact that no national call for volunteers to serve as spotters has yet been made, applications have been received from enough persons to fill about 65 per cent of the positions required at the outset which will number about 75,000. Consideration will be given to the timing and the extent of further expansion.

The main purpose of this corps, as the hon. member knows, is to supplement the R.C.A.F.'s early warning chain by reporting low flying aircraft seen or heard and aircraft in distress. The organization and the control of the corps is the responsibility of R.C.A.F. air defence command which also controls the early warning system. The air defence command is working closely with the other armed forces, R.C.A.F. association, air cadet league and civil defence officials in setting up the corps.

There has also been good co-operation from the provinces and organizations that employ people like fire rangers and the like. Reports from the observer posts which are to be set up would be funnelled in by telephone, telegraph and radio, which would pass on the information to the proper R.C.A.F. authority. This corps is to be organized so that in the event of an emergency it could provide a 24 hour service. But its peacetime activities will be limited to training exercises involving R.C.A.F. aircraft.

This is quite an experiment in a country having the low density of population that Canada has and we are proceeding step by step with the experiment. As the hon. member sees, it is being brought along.

Mr. Harkness: From what the minister said I do not gather that what you might call the preliminary part of this would actually be in existence. Possibly I missed it in the answer of considerable length which he gave. Can he tell us how soon any of this spotter system will be in operation? Might I also point out to the minister that he did not say anything with regard to my question as to how many of the radar stations are to be manned by the United States air force.

Mr. Claxton: As to the number of radar stations, that is information which I do not think it is in the public interest to give. As to the coming into effect of this organization, it is beginning. It has begun. We have a number of premises already belonging to either the Department of National Defence or other government departments and we are leasing a number of others. Equipment will be installed. Arrangements have been made with the Bell Telephone Company for communication, and all that work is proceeding. It is therefore a matter of weeks or a very few months before this system will be in effect.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask the minister whether this spotter system or ground observer corps is being organized entirely by the R.C.A.F. or whether there is a civilian organization of any sort involved.

Mr. Claxton: It is organized by the R.C.A.F. but using civilians both as leaders and spotters.

Mr. Harkness: As personnel?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the first heading carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Royal Canadian Air Force (Reserve).

Mr. Dinsdale: I am glad to see there is the intention of expanding the use of reserve personnel. In view of the fact that most of our active squadrons are going overseas, I conclude that it is the intention of the department to depend upon auxiliary squadrons to provide the backbone of our home defence. That is, of course, surmise on my part, but it seems to me to be a logical conclusion. Perhaps the minister could make some statement in that regard.

The second division of reserve activity is the Chipmunk training scheme. I understand there is some expansion in the Chipmunk scheme, which operates in connection with flying club organizations. I have had a personal interest in these particular reserve activities, because our flying club in Brandon has been endeavouring to come under the provisions of the scheme. Upon making inquiry I discovered that the reserve potential available in Brandon was insufficient for the inauguration of the Chipmunk plan at the Brandon Flying Club.

Since that time, through the facilities of the air force recruiting depot in Brandon, we have gathered together something like 36 or 38 names, and this information has been submitted to the proper authorities. I believe five additional units are being established, and I am wondering whether the Brandon Flying Club is going to have the opportunity to make use of the air force potential living in the western Manitoba area for participation in this scheme.

Finally, last summer a program was inaugurated which I believe will play an important role in making use of the rich resources of reserve personnel. I refer to the mobilization training scheme, whereby a double banking system will operate. There will be a reserve officer for every active force officer. I understand this program is being continued this year, and its activities enlarged.

I have only one question to ask concerning the scheme. Originally it was restricted to a ten-day period of service. I am wondering if it is the intention to make the period of service flexible according to the ability of the reserve personnel to serve. Further, there is the difficulty of uniforms for reserve personnel serving in this capacity. For some reason or another, since the war either their old uniforms have shrunk or the personnel have stretched. To equip themselves for this period of service would require an expenditure far beyond the limitations of the temporary pay provided.

Mr. Claxton: First of all, with regard to the use of the reserve formations in providing personnel to operate radar stations, the hon. member is quite correct in what he says. The organization of these reserve formations is proceeding satisfactorily. A considerable number have been added during the last year.

The Chipmunk training scheme was considered by the Royal Flying Club at their annual meeting held here recently, and a recommendation was made by them for the extension of the scheme to several additional communities. I understand this is being considered by the R.C.A.F. and by the Royal Flying Club with a view to making more effective use of the facilities they have so as to bring more communities into the plan. That work is being pressed on.

With respect to the length of training a man may take in a reserve unit, I am informed that in addition to the regular period of ten days there are a number of other possibilities, so that a man who is exceptionally keen or who has special requirements can usually find something which will enable him to take a further period of training.

I have not heard before about the need for the replacement of uniforms, but I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Royal Canadian Air Force—search and rescue.

Mr. Catherwood: I should like to ask the minister whether the search for the well-known hockey player Bill Barilko and his companion Dr. Hudson, who disappeared on a routine flight in the James bay area, has been abandoned. Has the department any estimate of the total expenditure involved in the search for these two men? Has the department given consideration to supervision or control of these flights, particularly in remote sections of Canada?

Mr. Claxton: The last matter is one for the Department of Transport and the air transport board, rather than for the R.C.A.F. I believe control is exercised through the licensing of aircraft and pilots. However, for further and more detailed information my hon. friend would have to go to the Department of Transport.

The R.C.A.F. co-ordinates search and rescue operations for all government and civilian services. I shall be glad to look into the particular case he mentioned, and give him full particulars at once.

Contributions towards the military costs of NATO.

Mr. Pearkes: Are any contributions contemplated in addition to those announced now? I presume there are not.

Mr. Claxton: There are not at the present time. The contribution to be made out of this vote covers what is called the third slice of infrastructure or, as was reported to the house before, the hard core of the third slice of infrastructure. But there will be a fourth slice, and we will be expected to contribute to that on about the same basis as to the previous ones.

Perhaps at this point I should answer one or two points raised by the hon. member in his opening remarks concerning airfields in Europe. As reported at page 3646 of Hansard he said that the danger of the lack of airfields was brought to my attention many months ago by the leader of the opposition who, at the last session of this parliament, called attention to the lack of technical troops in Europe and advocated the provision of engineer units which would assist in the construction of these necessary airfields in France and Germany.

The leader of the opposition did make that suggestion; but I do not think he referred to the danger of our not having airfields. In fact, as I remember the discussion, his observations were almost surprise at my having stated that we would need airfields in Germany.

I would point out that engineers, and particularly service engineers, are the class of men of which perhaps we are in shortest supply in Canada. We have an acute shortage of service engineers in this country. There is no shortage in Europe of civilian tradesmen, including construction engineers and the like. So it would be most uneconomical and wasteful for us to send engineers from Canada to do this job in Europe, particularly as I believe a rather moderate estimate would be that a Canadian would cost about five times as much per day to do the same amount of work as a European. It would be somewhere between five and ten, I would think.

With regard to airfields, our difficulty is to get the North Atlantic Treaty Organization through SHAPE to allocate to us airfields which it would be possible for us to use. That allocation has been made in respect of two airfields in France and two in Germany, but the location of only one, in France, has been formally settled. Arrangements have been made with the French government to handle the construction of that airfield, as was announced in the house some time ago. I understand that these arrangements are capable of being extended to other similar developments in France. In this I think we are a bit ahead of some other countries which have not yet made any arrangements whatever.

The arrangement is quite satisfactory. Under its terms the French government are calling for tenders for the construction of the necessary works at the airfield near Metz. The contractors are taking a good interest, and the matter is being handled in a businesslike fashion. When tenders are received they will be considered by representatives of the French government, of the Department of Defence Production and of the R.C.A.F. working together. The Department of Defence Production and the R.C.A.F. will be represented at all stages and will exercise the closest possible supervision over the awarding of contracts and the execution of the work.

The situation in Germany is still unsettled. As hon. members know, the state of occupation is being brought to an end and in consequence the operation of the occupation agreement. This is not the best time at which to negotiate either with the British, French and United States authorities or the German government. However, these negotiations are going on steadily and I expect will reach a satisfactory conclusion. The delays for which we were not responsible have postponed the construction and use of these air stations by several months.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister will appreciate that our suggestions have been made with the idea of assisting him to expend money as economically as possible. There is one matter which I think would come under this heading. We have a staff at SHAPE and in various other countries connected with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Is it necessary for us to continue to maintain a fairly large number of military and naval attachés in the various countries of Europe? Surely all the information regarding the European forces which would be co-operating with Canadians would be available through the various national headquarters connected with SHAPE. I do not want the minister to give a definite answer at this moment, but I do suggest that this matter might be investigated.

Mr. Claxton: I have asked the chiefs of staff to discuss with me the allocation of military attachés at all posts so we can make absolutely certain that the expenditure in any given locality is warranted.

Item agreed to.

Special—

249. To authorize and provide for additional expenditures under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and supplementary contributions towards the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in the amount of $324,000,000 and commitments against future years in the amount of $32,550,000, $324,000,000.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think we can allow this item of $324 million to pass without some general explanation.

Mr. Claxton: The 1952-53 program includes —perhaps I should not give the details— radar mark IV; 155 mm. howitzers; walkie-talkies; F-86 airframes—those are for Britain.

Mr. Pearkes: All these are for other countries?

Mr. Claxton: Yes; also aircrew training, as well as contributions to NATO over and above capacity to pay basis. That is a total of $191 million, of which $47,700,000 is for aircrew training. Then in addition we are going to continue transferring stocks of United Kingdom pattern equipment, $64,979,000. We have additional present pattern equipment of the navy and R.C.A.F. to a value of about $15,-300,000 which we are offering to various NATO countries. Then in addition we are considering the question of making available a quantity of bombs, shells, rocket launchers, depth charges, projectiles, cartridges and possibly some new minesweepers. These will bring the total to $324 million.

In so far as new equipment is concerned, we are offering to NATO the things we need ourselves in considerable quantity so we will have the advantage of an economic run. With regard to old-type equipment, we are offering things we think we should replace and which we can replace.

Item agreed to.

General services—

250. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $227,325.

Mr. Pearkes: A total of $82,925 is to be spent on rifle associations, of which $60,000, which is a considerable sum, is for the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association. I appreciate that it is nice to encourage this form of military sport and to send a team to take part in the matches at Bisley, but I wonder if in this time of changing conditions in the services, changes in armament and so on, we are justified in expending so much of the taxpayers' money in this direction?

Mr. Claxton: I think the hon. member knows that the character of the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association has changed considerably since the second world war. Now all firing is done with service rifles and service personnel are participating to a much greater extent than before. It is quite interesting to see members of the navy and air force taking part in the competitions. I think it is fair to say that these competitions have been most successful, especially with regard to the attendance of participants. It is regarded by all three services as being a desirable thing to encourage and consequently it is felt that this grant is justified.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might have the permission of the committee and, if required, of the house to follow a practice followed during the war. I should like to table and ask permission to print as an appendix to Hansard the list of orders, decorations and medals awarded officers and men of the Canadian forces for gallantry or outstanding service in the Far East.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For list of awards, see appendix, pages 3741-51.)

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

527. Departmental administration, $2,217,425.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to make any extended remarks at this time on this item. We have had a veterans affairs committee and we have discussed there matters having to do with the affairs of veterans. The main problem that has concerned veterans for the past year or so has been the question of war veterans allowances. As hon. members well know, this subject was dealt with by the veterans affairs committee and by the house a day or two ago. Whether or not it was dealt with satisfactorily is a question for the veterans themselves across the country to determine. Some of us felt it had not been dealt with very satisfactorily but it is a matter of history now, and I have no intention of saying anything further in that connection.

With respect to the work of the department in general, I would think that by now it must of necessity consist of a more or less routine carrying out of the provisions of the veterans charter which has been in effect for the last five or six years. The veterans of the second world war no doubt are well rehabilitated by now. So far as student veterans at our universities are concerned, I believe the university courses taken by different ex-servicemen are now completed, and I do not think it is out of place to say that I am sure the people of Canada have been well pleased with the splendid record made by the young men who took part in the second world war and who have taken university courses. They have shown that they can more than hold their own with students from civilian walks of life.

Another big rehabilitation problem that has confronted the department and the government has to do with the Veterans Land Act, where the success of the government perhaps has not been as great as in the case of education. I am not going to dwell on that point at the present time. In general I think the hospitalization of veterans has been very acceptable to the people and that the veterans themselves consider they have been well looked after. There is one problem that I think concerns us all and is of very great concern to veterans throughout the country. I refer to the matter of housing. It is not my intention to go into the question to any extent today realizing of course that perhaps it is only a problem of the veterans affairs department to a very small degree. However, I know the department is very much interested in it, particularly in view of the fact that 60 per cent of the people looking for houses in Canada today are veterans. It might interest hon. members to know that in Canada at the present time there is a shortage of some 700,000 housing units affecting an estimated two million people. This is a very serious situation indeed and one which is of great concern to veterans all across the country.

There are many reasons why the problem is not being solved more readily. One is the great shortage of building materials throughout the country. Another is the increase in the rate of interest for those who have to borrow in order to build homes, and the third is the scarcity of labour. I need not dwell on the necessity of houses. As I said a few moments ago it is a problem of which we are all aware and which we all understand. A house is the foundation of the home, and the home of course is the foundation of our society. In this connection I should like to read a paragraph from a report of the dominion housing committee of the Canadian Legion. The report is issued under the name of T. A. M. Hulse, chairman of the Legion housing committee, and in it there is the following:

> It is not an overstatement to point out that the moral basis of our system and our national security even, as well as health and welfare standards, could be influenced adversely by poor housing conditions. One of the leaders in social work study of the Toronto university has said: "Housing is the basic factor which underlies most of the problems which are faced by health and welfare organizations in this country. If we can do something about the housing problem we might actually do a great deal to reduce efforts dealing with problems of public and private welfare. Federal social security programs are now more significant than ever. These will continue to be frustrated in large measure by this basic underlying shortage."

As I said a moment ago, I do not think it is necessary to dwell on this very serious problem. I simply call it emphatically to the attention of the house, the people of the country and the different governments and departments of government throughout Canada. It is a most serious problem so far as veterans are concerned, and I hope something will be done to improve the situation in the coming year. There are other matters which might be discussed at this time, but we can discuss them as the items come up.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to say a brief word about the patience of the officials of the pensions and war veterans allowances branches. I have given them some pretty bad cases to handle, and I must say they have handled them with outstanding patience and with satisfaction to the veterans and their wives.

Item agreed to.

536. War veterans allowance board—administration, $178,347.

Mr. Knowles: There is one question I would like to ask the minister and if it has been answered in the last day or two he will understand that there have been a lot of committees sitting and we have not been able to keep in touch with everything that has been said in several places.

Would the minister say when the increases in war veterans' allowances authorized in the bill passed a day or two ago will reach the recipients? There are two aspects of this matter. One is: When will their current cheques be at the higher rate. The other is: When will they receive an adjustment cheque covering the retroactivity from January 1, 1952?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will of course realize that the operation of changing from one rate to a higher rate is quite complicated, particularly when the increase is made retroactive. This particular increase also brings back under war veterans allowance people who were not covered from the 1st of January to date because of their income which barred them. Because of the complication of the operation it is not feasible for the cheques with the increase and the adjustment to be issued before August. The August cheque forwarded will contain the increase and the adjustment retroactive to January 1, 1952, which means that the July cheque will be at the former rate.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the intention is to cover both points in the one cheque, the current increases and the retroactive adjustments?

Mr. Lapointe: In the one cheque.

Mr. Knowles: That will be the cheque the veteran receives at the end of August?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say whether it is the hope of his officials that all cases will be covered by that August cheque?

Mr. Lapointe: It is expected that all cases will be covered by the August cheques.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

537. Veterans insurance, $97,024.

Mr. Brooks: I would like to ask a question here. I note that the expense for item 537 amounts to $97,024. I would like to ask the minister if any part of the premium paid for war veterans' insurance goes to pay expenses in connection with war veterans' insurance and, at the same time, I would like to ask what is the amount in the fund at the present time, how much was paid out this year, and also the number of policies in force.

Mr. Lapointe: The answer to the first question, Mr. Chairman, is that no expenses are taken from the premiums. The amount in the fund, the balance as at the 31st March, 1952, was $10,124,989.32.

Mr. Brooks: How much was paid out last year?

Mr. Lapointe: The amount paid out in 1951-52 was $531,947.66. There are 32,142* policies in force.

Mr. Brooks: I assume it would be the expectation of the department that as time goes on the yearly amount which must be paid out would be more than it is at present; that is, as the veterans become older?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, but not for some time yet.

Mr. Brooks: The department is of course endeavouring to build up a large fund for that emergency later on?

Mr. Lapointe: The fund is under the control of the Department of Finance and is on an actuarial basis.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

538. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order P.C. 45/8848 of 22nd November, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act, $125,546,000.

Mr. Cardiff: I am not complaining, but I would like to ask the minister if he can explain the reason for the $26 million odd increase in this item.

Mr. Lapointe: The 33⅓ per cent increase which was made in the basic rate of pension in the fall of 1951.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brooks: I would like to ask the minister a question with reference to world war I veterans. Is there a decrease each year, quite a large decrease, in the number of world war I veterans receiving pensions?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes. There is a small and steady decrease every year, just as there is at the same time a small and steady increase in world war II veterans.

Mr. Brooks: What would be the percentage?

Mr. Lapointe: Perhaps my hon. friend will get the information he wants from this answer. As of 31st March, 1951, there were 66,001 disability pensioners and 16,141 dependents; that is for world war I. On the 31st of March, 1952, there were 64,438 disability pensioners and 15,863 dependents. That is the normal decrease from year to year.

Item agreed to.

540. War veterans allowances, $22,505,000.

Mr. Brooks: In connection with this item, I notice it is practically the same as last year. This does not include the proposed increase in veterans allowances as passed by the house the other day?

Mr. Lapointe: No. There is a special vote of $5,850,000 in the supplementary estimates to cover those increases.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask one other question with respect to the results of the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. In the case of a war veterans allowance recipient who was receiving the allowance prior to January 1, 1952, and who had his allowance completely withdrawn because of the subsequent receipt of old age security, will it be necessary for that former recipient of war veterans allowance to apply for reinstatement because of the increase in the allowance, or will that be dealt with automatically?

Mr. Lapointe: No, it will be dealt with automatically. Every one of these cases will be reviewed, and if the former recipient now qualifies he will receive his cheque automatically in August.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to ask the minister a question. When the recipient of war veterans allowance enters an institution and becomes a veterans care case he is now allowed $10 a month for comforts. Will the increase from $40 to $50 per month affect that $10 per month?

Mr. Lapointe: No, the amount of the comfort allowance bears no relationship to the payment of the war veterans allowance. It is based on the minimum price of the various articles which make up those comforts, cigarettes and so on.

Mr. Gillis: When he was receiving $40 a month and was taken into the institution, he received his care for $30 a month and $10 went to him.

Mr. Lapointe: Actually it is $7.

Mr. Gillis: That is worse. Now that the allowance has been increased to $50, is it the intention to still give him that $10 a month? If he were outside he would be entitled to an increase in the allowance, so you are really going to increase the cost of maintenance and care in the institution. I think he is entitled to that extra $10 a month.

Mr. Lapointe: This comfort allowance of $7 is payable to patients under class 5A, 5B and class 6 treatment. It has no relationship whatever to the war veterans allowance. These people are not necessarily under war veterans allowance.

Mr. Gillis: But many of them are.

Mr. Lapointe: Anyone who goes in for treatment under those classes is entitled to that $7.

Mr. Gillis: It very definitely has a relationship, Mr. Chairman. A person who is taken in under 5A or 5B, whichever it is, and who is in receipt of war veterans allowance while outside would be drawing $40 a month war veterans allowance. Then he enters an institution and the war veterans allowance is discontinued, but he is permitted to receive $7. The minister says that is for comforts. If that person were outside, or if he left the institution, he would go back on war veterans allowance. Under the new schedule he receives $50 per month, and this payment for comforts is definitely related to the war veterans allowance. I do not want to argue with the minister, but it has been a sore spot for some time. It is a small amount that is allowed the inmate of an institution for comforts and so forth. I would ask the minister to look at that angle to see if an adjustment cannot be made. I think the amount allowed is too small.

Item agreed to.

542. Unemployment assistance, $25,000.

Mr. Brooks: I wish to ask the minister the reason for the reduction to $25,000 in this item this year.

Mr. Lapointe: It is simply due to the fact that the demand on this fund has decreased considerably due to many of these people being able to qualify under war veterans allowance. It only applies to world war I veterans, who are mostly taken care of under other legislation.

Item agreed to.

543. Hospital and other allowances, $3,225,000.

Mr. Bater: With respect to war veterans who are receiving allowances on entering a hospital, is the amount of deduction while in hospital decided upon an individual basis or is there a flat rate right across the board?

Mr. Lapointe: It is, as a rule, considered on an individual basis, and the circumstances are looked into. In a case where a man has many dependents, that is taken into consideration.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to see if the minister can clear up a point for me. I received a return from him the other day showing that the ward maids in the Deer Lodge hospital were receiving $60 a month, while in other hospitals they were receiving $120 a month. There may be discrepancies due to wage rates and labour conditions in different parts of the country, but I do not think they should amount to $60. Can the minister explain how that is?

Mr. Lapointe: The rates paid to these particular employees are generally the prevailing rates in the locality, and are given to us by the Department of Labour following a survey by that department.

Mr. Bryce: I am going to appeal to the minister to review it. Surely, one woman in British Columbia is not worth $60 more than one woman in Winnipeg?

Mr. Cruickshank: Sure, she is.

Mr. Lapointe: I would not like to debate the point with the hon. member.

Mr. Bryce: I think it is an insult to the people of Winnipeg to offer them $60 when $120 is being paid in British Columbia. It is so late in the session that I cannot do anything about it, but I could not believe that it was true until I received the return from the minister. Since it is true, I think the minister should look into the matter right away and have something done about it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Have them all moved to British Columbia.

Mr. Bryce: I think you are going to have an awful lot on your hands in British Columbia, so you had better keep quiet.

I should like to ask the minister another question about the chauffeurs, the fellows who drive the ambulances. Recently, they received an increase of $8. Now, was that $8 a raise in wages or was it in lieu of not getting any uniforms?

Mr. Lapointe: I am informed it was a straight salary increase.

Mr. Bryce: What about the uniforms? They do not get any clothes now, so they should be entitled to a raise in their wages.

Mr. Lapointe: I will look into this matter. I am afraid I am not too familiar as to what clothes a chauffeur wears when he drives an ambulance. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Bryce: As long as I have the assurance from the minister that he will look into the matter and straighten it out, I am satisfied. I am not going to say anything more about it. In any event the minister must agree with me that Winnipeg will not sit down and take that sort of treatment.

Mr. Mutch: The hon. member who has just been speaking knows very well that both these questions have been under review at Winnipeg as well as here for the past two months, in conjunction with the Department of Labour. A decision has not been given, but it will be given in due course.

Mr. Bryce: I thank the parliamentary assistant. I know he told me that it was being reviewed, but so long a time has been taken in reviewing the matter that the men can go hungry.

Mr. Mutch: I can explain anything but that.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

548. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,780,354.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to ask the minister how many veterans of world war II had to give up their farms for one reason or another, and how many veterans of world war II are in arrears of payment under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Lapointe: I am afraid I have not the figures just at hand. I wonder if the question might be allowed to stand for the moment; I will give him an answer at eight o'clock.

Mr. Quelch: That will be fine.

Mr. Brooks: With regard to British family settlement, how many families come under this item? I might also ask why British family settlement is under the Veterans Land Act or under the veterans affairs department.

Mr. Mutch: It was under the soldier settlement.

Mr. Lapointe: It was under the old soldier settlement board.

[Mr. Bryce.]

Mr. Brooks: That does not explain why it was under the soldier settlement board.

Mr. Lapointe: As of March 31, 1952, there were still outstanding 389 veterans and 413 civilians settled under this particular scheme.

Mr. Brooks: Why did it come under the soldier settlement board?

Mr. Lapointe: Right from the start of the scheme it was administered by the director of soldier settlement.

Mr. Brooks: That is not the British settlement scheme in the province of New Brunswick, is it? There was one scheme there.

Mr. Lapointe: There are two different schemes, but both are administered by the department. The other scheme is the one I imagine my hon. friend has in mind, namely the New Brunswick family scheme.

Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Mr. Lapointe: One other reason the matter comes under this department is this. My hon. friend will recall that last year there was in the estimates an item to buy out the United Kingdom equity in these properties. That item was in our departmental estimates last year. The whole thing is now administered by us.

Mr. Cardiff: Is there an increase in the number of cases coming before this board?

Mr. Lapointe: That is applications for settlement under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. Cardiff: Yes.

Mr. Lapointe: The numbers are gradually decreasing.

Mr. Cardiff: But your administrative costs are increasing. Your administration costs are up by $180,000.

Mr. Lapointe: The increase in administration costs reflects the increase in salaries which took place during this year.

Item agreed to.

549. To provide for the upkeep of property, Veterans Land Act, including engineering and other investigational planning expenses that do not add tangible value to real property; taxes, insurance and maintenance of public utilities, $77,000.

Mr. Bryce: Will the minister make a statement as to what progress is being made with regard to sewage disposal in the Charleswood settlement? I think something is being done. The parliamentary assistant is quite well aware of what is going on.

Mr. Lapointe: I will ask my parliamentary assistant, who is familiar with this particular problem, to answer the question.

Mr. Mutch: Following the difficulties which took place in the Charleswood settlement and in St. Vital last spring as a result of freezing of the septic field, an undertaking was given by the department to make a survey, once conditions had been restored to normal, with a view to discovering whether or not the fields were properly laid, whether they had been properly maintained, and what caused the difficulty; and to determine what it might be possible to do to take care of it.

Within ten days I had a report by telephone that the examinations in those fields were taking place. I believe they began in Charleswood and were then going on to St. Vital. I am not certain as to which place they began, but that examination is in the process of being made. I am told that the fields which are being examined are test fields suggested by the tenants themselves—that is, by the occupants of the houses themselves—and that they are proceeding at the present time. We are awaiting a final report as to what the discoveries were. I believe the original commitment was to test five of these fields in each district in the presence of and in circumstances suitable and agreeable to the occupants of the houses. That is proceeding and we are anticipating a report shortly.

Mr. Bryce: Is it the case that the department has employed Mr. Scott, the water engineer who laid out the system to begin with, to give advice?

Mr. Mutch: At the time we committed ourselves to making an examination, the first suggestion which was made by the department as to officials to give expert opinion on it was as the result of a question by some of the veterans concerned. They wrote to the department—as a matter of fact, they wrote to me—and asked whether it would be possible to secure the services of Mr. Scott who, as the hon. member knows, is retired. He was the former water district engineer and the man whose advice was sought in the first instance as being an expert in these matters. I consulted officials of the department and the minister, and consent was given to employing Mr. Scott if he was available. My understanding is that at the request of the veterans themselves he is being called in as consultant to pass judgment upon the efficiency or otherwise of the fields as laid out.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Brooks: Six o'clock.

Mr. Bryce: Would the minister make the evidence available?

Mr. Mutch: When the report is available I will be glad to make it known.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Brooks: I think item 548 stood at six o'clock and there was a question or two I wanted to ask. Can the minister state how many veterans are settled under the Veterans Land Act and what the situation is with reference to keeping up payments?

Mr. Mutch: Is that farming, or is the hon. member including small holdings?

Mr. Brooks: Including small holdings. How many have kept up their payments in full; how many have kept up their payments in part and how many have made no payments at all during the past year?

Mr. Mutch: I doubt if we have the information in that form, but we can give you the number settled under the Veterans Land Act and the number in arrears.

Mr. Lapointe: There were 75,340 veterans who qualified; there were 55,464 who were approved for assistance, and there were 55,121 for whom disbursements have been made.

Mr. Brooks: Have the payments been satisfactory? Perhaps the minister cannot give full details, but he could give some idea of the situation.

Mr. Lapointe: In full-time farming there were 4,023 in arrears out of 24,155 who have been settled.

Mr. Brooks: Have any abandoned their holdings at all?

Mr. Lapointe: There were 37 veterans in full-time farming and 38 with small holdings whose cases have been referred to the provincial advisory board for consent to the recession of their contracts, as of March 31, 1952.

Mr. Brooks: I notice that on page 589 a large increase in the number of settlement officers, grade 2, is indicated. There are now 223 settlement officers as opposed to 64 in the previous year, which seems to be an increase of three and a half times.

Mr. Lapointe: As will be noted on page 590, the over-all picture shows a decrease. The present total is 1,198 as compared to 1,209 last year. With respect to settlement officers, grade 2, it is due to a reclassification of these employees by the civil service commission. Similarly a little lower down on the page under the heading "settlement supervisors, Veterans Land Act" there is a decrease from 209 to 46.

Mr. Brooks: I noticed that, and I also noticed they were all grade 1 with a salary of $2,436 to $3,240. In this case they were grade 2 with a salary of $3,240 to $3,888. It does seem like quite a wholesale promotion.

Mr. Lapointe: The reason is that we have been endeavouring to get the best possible calibre of employee. The great majority of these employees are university graduates who have specialized in agriculture, and naturally we have to pay to get the better class of man.

Mr. Brooks: They were already employed?

Mr. Lapointe: Not all of them, though most of them were. I am informed that many were threatening to leave the service unless a reclassification was made.

Item agreed to.

550. To provide for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, as amended, and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Resources and Development under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, as amended, $600,000.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister where these settlements are in the different provinces.

Mr. Lapointe: The total number of veterans settled on these lands is 4,655, made up as follows: British Columbia, 146; Alberta, 2,056; Saskatchewan, 1,541; Manitoba, 422; 84 in eastern Ontario; 333 in Quebec and 73 in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Quelch: Are these all on provincial lands?

Mr. Lapointe: Provincial lands and dominion lands.

Mr. Quelch: In what form are the dominion lands?

Mr. Lapointe: There are some in Yukon, some in Banff national park and some at Whitehorse.

Mr. Herridge: Under this item I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact, which of course he knows, that British Columbia is being developed at a very rapid rate. Provincial lands close to settlements are getting scarcer and scarcer. I suggest that his department should make a survey of the provincial lands available in British Columbia within a reasonable distance of small communities, get in touch with the provincial lands department and ask them to reserve any lands that are thought suitable. I find that more and more men are becoming aware of the opportunities for settlement on provincial lands, but then they find they are too late because somebody else has bought the land.

Mr. Lapointe: I will be very glad to keep my hon. friend's suggestion in mind.

Mr. Fraser: I do not know whether I am on the right item, but I should like to ask the minister whether he has considered further a question I have asked in the past regarding veterans whose small holdings are taken into cities. Will they be allowed to sell part of their property in order to save taxes? It is pretty hard on a man when his property is taken into a city, because taxes have increased so much.

Mr. Lapointe: There has been no final decision but the matter is being explored very actively at the present time, and there will probably be an announcement of policy in a short time.

Mr. Fraser: I am very glad to hear that because in every city across the country veterans are in the same position, and they are very much affected by the burden of heavy taxes.

Mr. Quelch: What are the veterans doing who have settled in the past on these lands? Are they small holdings? I take it they would not be farming?

Mr. Lapointe: They are small holdings.

Mr. Herridge: The minister mentioned small holdings. I do not think I am quite in order in saying this, but I have been so busy I have had to be out of the house all day. In the interior of British Columbia it is very difficult for men to find two acres or more in the form of small holdings on which to settle. As the minister knows there has been considerable demand for the return to the requirement of only half an acre. It is a serious matter. Land is scarce, and I wish the minister would see that the regulation is changed so these veterans may settle on a small holding of half an acre or a little more. It is a very serious matter in my constituency. Over 250 veterans were denied the opportunity to settle on small holdings because of the increase from half an acre.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are any of these payments made in Newfoundland?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, there are some settlements in Newfoundland. Some of the veterans devote their full time to their holdings, and there are some with small holdings who are engaged in commercial fishing. There are some settled on provincial lands also.

Mr. Goode: I wish to support the hon. member for Kootenay West. I think he has brought up a very important point. No doubt the minister has been giving a lot of consideration to it. British Columbia is peculiar—

Mr. Brooks: In many ways.

Mr. Goode: —in the nature of its territory, and I think we have a different situation from any other province in Canada. The hon. member for Kootenay West has talked about the interior of British Columbia. What he has said is not only applicable to the interior but also to the lower mainland including my constituency of Burnaby-Richmond. We have a large number of veterans there who wish to settle on the land but the acreage requirement is too high. I support the hon. member for Kootenay West in bringing this matter to the minister's attention.

Mr. Green: Has the minister given any consideration to these suggestions? I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond is quite right about the situation on the lower mainland of British Columbia.

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry, I did not follow my hon. friend's question. What was it exactly?

Mr. Green: Has the department given consideration to the suggestions advanced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond? I believe he has pictured a condition which certainly exists on the lower mainland of British Columbia.

Mr. Lapointe: We have considered the situation. Certain representations have been made at various times. I will keep in mind particularly the circumstances mentioned by the previous speakers with respect to British Columbia.

Mr. Goode: May I bring an example to the minister's attention and put a direct question to him. I do not expect him to answer now but I know he will consider it. Would the minister please investigate the situation so far as the riding of Burnaby-Richmond is concerned? There is a large amount of land which is mainly settled, but there are a lot of veterans in that part of the country who want small holdings. I should like to take this opportunity to ask the minister to have an investigation made by his officials and to let me have the answer as soon as possible.

Mr. Laing: Has the situation in this regard changed? I recall that close to Vancouver the department bought four or five farms, only one of which was developed. The other farms were resold, and that took place in recent years. I assume if there had been a demand at that time the land would have been subdivided. Were the veterans requesting small holdings at that time? Those farms were sold. The department did not develop them.

Mr. Lapointe: As to the instance mentioned by my hon. friend, I am informed that the reason the project was not developed was that it was found it would have been uneconomical to do so in view of the high cost of providing the necessary services.

Item agreed to.

552. To provide for the reduction of indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement of a settler under the Soldier Settlement Act, in respect of a property in his possession, the title of which is held by the director, by an amount which will reduce his indebtedness to an amount in keeping with the productive capacity of the property and his ability to repay his indebtedness to the director, under regulations approved by the governor in council, $150,000.

Mr. Fair: Before this item is carried may I ask the minister a question. What is the position of the old soldier settlers under this item? He will remember that about thirty-three years ago there was an act to provide for the settlement of farmers and others, many of whom were totally unqualified to settle on the land, and I think the object then was to get those people out of the towns and cities. Some fifteen years ago I started a campaign to get those fellows clear title because I felt they had all paid in full at that time. Only three years ago did we get some action, and an amount of $150,000 was placed in the estimates. That has appeared annually so the people who were most in need could get their accounts straightened out. That has been some little relief and I see that a similar amount is in the estimates for this year.

In my opinion these accounts are not being cleared up fast enough, and I would like to know the position of these people today. The last figure I got, some five or six months ago, showed that they still owed an average of over $1,100 each. At that rate they will all be dead, and in some cases their families as well, before the estates get clear title.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, at the time this scheme of debt reduction was started, and I think the first estimate was in 1948, there were 2,637 active soldier settlement accounts with a total debt of $2,842,534.30 and an average debt of $1,077.94. As of March 31, 1952, there were 746 accounts with a total debt of $799,729.69, so my hon. friend can see that nearly three-quarters of the accounts which existed when we started this scheme in 1948 have now been closed. The average debt of the 746 accounts which now remain is $1,072.02. Included in the 746 accounts are 225 in which reductions to a total of $108,-821.77 have been approved on a time basis not exceeding three years. This leaves 521 of the original 2,637 whose accounts have not been adjusted. My hon. friend can see that there has been considerable steady progress in the settlement of these accounts.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, it may be rather remarkable that the average debt in 1948 was $1,077.94 and at the end of last March that average debt had only been reduced by $5.92. I think we are still getting a certain number of these people who are owing a lot of money to the department. From the last figure of $1,072.02 it is going to take a long time to get the debt squared up. Instead of $150,000 I would like to see an amount to take care of the whole thing and let these people get clear once and for all. They have done their bit for the country and now I think it is time for the country to do its bit for them.

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, I know my hon. friend does not do it intentionally but the way he puts it does not give a true picture of the situation. It is true that the average debt has been reduced by only a few dollars, but I mentioned that of the 2,637 accounts which existed when we started this scheme more than three-quarters have been closed and settled. There are only 521 with whom there have not been adjustments. Their debt has not been reduced because these people have not paid.

It is all very well to say we would like to have just one large amount in the estimates and close up these books. However, in all fairness to all the other settlers who have met their obligations, and in fairness to all the veterans settled under the Veterans Land Act who meet their obligations, when there are cases of these older settlers who are quite capable of paying but who have refused to do so I hardly think it would be the proper thing to close out their account. I know they are not in the majority but there are cases which I can quote to my hon. friend. There is one settler who, besides the land on which he was originally settled, owns land which is fully paid for and is valued at $17,000. He owns $15,000 worth of machinery which is fully paid for; and when he came to the supervisor and asked for an adjustment of his debt which was under $1,000 he was refused. But he walked out and bought a new car, and informed the supervisor that he was going away for a three-month holiday. I hardly think the parliament of Canada should be asked to close out that account.

Mr. Fair: It is rather a funny case for the minister to put up.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. Lapointe: All right; I can quote you some more. I mentioned that these might be extreme cases but I think the mere fact that cases like that do exist justifies the procedure we have been following over the last five years which permits the reduction of debt and a grant of full title to the men who deserve it and who are trying to do their best to meet their obligations.

Mr. Fair: We have odd cases such as the minister has quoted, but I can point out others throughout the country—

Mr. Sinnott: Tell us who they are.

Mr. Fair: It seems the wind is blowing through and there does not seem to be anything to stop it over by the curtains.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fair: I think the minister might take this matter into consideration and clean up the mess. It has been a mess. We had the gentleman in charge of the department when this scheme was set up say it was a hastily improvised scheme to get these people out on the land. Having an admission like that from a gentleman who was there for a number of years prompts me to suggest that we might review the matter again.

Mr. Lapointe: I might add that when we are considering the supplementary estimates after the main estimates are through there is one vote, a dollar vote, covering this subject. At that time I will explain why the vote is there and my hon. friend will realize that we are even broadening the policy to permit more generous settlement of these cases.

Mr. Fair: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Pearkes: Might I ask the minister what is the basis of payment. Does the department put up one dollar for every dollar the veteran pays, or just what is the scheme?

Mr. Lapointe: The debt reductions have averaged between 40 and 50 per cent. As a matter of fact of the amounts which have been reduced, and which I mentioned before, 45·56 per cent has been paid by the department and 54·44 per cent by the settler.

Mr. Brooks: The soldier has to pay something himself.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, we reduce his debt according to the new terms over a period of three years.

Mr. Laing: Might I ask what the terms of this indebtedness are? In the rather extraordinary case recited by the minister, has the department no means of collecting such a debt? It would seem to me that would be the logical thing to do.

Mr. Lapointe: There are the normal legal steps that could be taken, but I do not think it has ever been done. I can just imagine what the reaction would be if at any time, even in extreme cases such as the one I mentioned, one of these men was evicted from his farm.

Mr. Laing: Is there any more fairness in allowing this debt to pile up than there is in writing it off?

Mr. Lapointe: We keep the title.

Mr. Fair: In the past there have been many cases where old men have been put off their land and other cases where settlers were compelled to sign quit-claim deeds. At that time the department had as director a Mr. Murchison who would have been much more in place working for some mortgage company instead of administering a soldier settlement scheme. I believe many more settlers would have been put off their farms if their treatment had not been exposed in this house.

Mr. Lapointe: There may have been such cases in the past, but there have been no evictions under the new scheme.

Mr. Fair: I should like the minister to tell us the cost of administration of this particular project during the past year.

Mr. Lapointe: Unfortunately it is not kept separately, but is part of the whole cost of administration under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Wylie: I want to support what the hon. member for Battle River has said. I think the cost of administration of this work should be kept separate. The case to which reference has been made is one of the extreme cases, and I know of many cases in the dried-out areas where the farmer cannot pay but the debt is still charged up against him. I am sure that the minister cannot refer to a case in the southeastern area of Alberta in which the same circumstances apply as the case to which he referred.
