"It is agreed by the High Contracting Parties that, in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the Convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American Colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this Treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell fish, on the sea coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks, of the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the Colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts, and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

"It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and the mouths of rivers are hereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen."

"ARTICLE XIX."

"It is agreed by the High Contracting Parties that British subjects shall have, in common with the citizens of the United States, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this Treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the eastern sea-coasts and shores of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, and on the shores of the several islands thereunto adjacent, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the said sea-coasts and shores of the United States, and of the said islands, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts of the United States and of the islands aforesaid, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that, in so doing, they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with the fishermen of the United States in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

"It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for fishermen of the United States."

States, as places reserved from the common right of fishing under that Treaty, shall be regarded as in like manner reserved from the common right of fishing under the preceding articles. In case any question should arise between the Governments of the United States and of Her Britannic Majesty as to the common right of fishing in places not thus designated as reserved, it is agreed that a commission shall be appointed to designate such places, and shall be constituted in the same manner, and have the same powers, duties, and authority as the Commission appointed under said first Article of the Treaty of the 5th of June, 1854."

"ARTICLE XXI."

"It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this Treaty, fish oil and fish of all kinds, (except fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil,) being the produce of the fisheries of the United States, or of the Dominion of Canada, or of Prince Edward's Island, shall be admitted into each country, respectively, free of duty."

"ARTICLE XXII."

"Inasmuch as it is asserted by the Government of Her Britannic Majesty that the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States under Article XVIII of this Treaty are of greater value than those accorded by Articles XIX and XXI of this Treaty to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, and this assertion is not admitted by the Government of the United States, it is further agreed that Commissioners shall be appointed to determine, having regard to the privileges accorded by the United States to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, as stated in Articles XIX and XXI of this Treaty, the amount of any compensation which, in their opinion, ought to be paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty in return for the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States under Article XVIII of this Treaty; and that any sum of money which the said Commissioners may so award shall be paid by the United States Government in a gross sum, within twelve months after such award shall have been given."

"ARTICLE XXIII."

"The Commissioners referred to in the preceding Article shall be appointed in the following manner, that is to say: One Commissioner shall be named by the President of the United States, one by Her Britannic Majesty, and a third by the President of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty conjointly; and in case the third Commissioner shall not have been so named within a period of three months from the date when this article shall take effect, then the third commissioner shall be named by the Representative at London of His Majesty the Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary. In case of the death, absence, or incapacity of any commissioner, or in the event of any Commissioner omitting or ceasing to act, the vacancy shall be filled in the manner hereinbefore provided for making the original appointment, the period of three months in case of such substitution being calculated from the date of the happening of the vacancy.

"The Commissioners so named shall meet in the City of Halifax, in the Province of Nova Scotia, at the earliest convenient period after they have been respectively named, and shall, before proceeding to any business, make and subscribe a solemn declaration that they will impartially and carefully examine and decide the matters referred to them to the best of their judgment, and according to justice and equity; and such declaration shall be entered on the record of their proceedings.

"Each of the High Contracting Parties shall also name one person to attend the Commission as its agent, to represent it generally in all matters connected with the Commission."

"ARTICLE XXIV."

"The proceedings shall be conducted in such order as the Commissioners appointed under Articles XXII and XXIII of this Treaty shall determine. They shall be bound to receive such oral or written testimony as either Government may present. If either Party shall offer oral testimony, the other Party shall have the right of cross-examination, under such rules as the Commissioners shall prescribe.

"If in the case submitted to the Commissioners either Party shall have specified or alluded to any report or document in its own exclusive possession, without annexing a copy, such Party shall be bound, if the other Party thinks proper to apply for it, to furnish that Party with a copy thereof; and either Party may call upon the other, through the Commissioners, to produce the originals, or certified copies of any papers adduced as evidence, giving in each instance such reasonable notice as the Commissioners may require.

"The case on either side shall be closed within a period of six months from the date of the organization of the Commission, and the Commissioners shall be requested to give their award as soon as possible thereafter. The aforesaid period of six months may be extended for three months in case of a vacancy occurring among the Commissioners under the circumstances contemplated in Article XXIII of this Treaty."

"ARTICLE XXV."

"The Commissioner shall keep an accurate record and correct minutes or notes of all their proceedings, with the dates thereof, and may appoint and employ a secretary and any other necessary officer or officers to assist them in the transaction of the business which may come before them.

"Each of the High Contracting Parties shall pay its own Commissioner and agent or counsel; all other expenses shall be defrayed by the two Governments in equal moieties."

"ARTICLE XXX."

"It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this Treaty, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States.

"Citizens of the United States may for the like period carry in United States vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the Possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in North America to another port or place within the said Possessions: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the territory of the United States by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of the United States and the Government of Her Britannic Majesty.

"The Government of the United States further engages not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article through the territory of the United States; and Her Majesty's Government engages to urge the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and the Legislatures of the other colonies not to impose any export duties on goods, wares, or merchandise carried under this article; and the Government of the United States may, in case such export duties are imposed by the Dominion of Canada, suspend, during the period that such duties are imposed, the right of carrying granted under this article in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty.

"The Government of the United States may suspend the right of carrying granted in favor of the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty under this article, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII."

"It is further agreed that the provisions and stipulations of Articles XVIII to XXV of this Treaty, inclusive, shall extend to the Colony of Newfoundland, so far as they are applicable. But if the Imperial Parliament, the Legislature of Newfoundland, or the Congress of the United States, shall not embrace the Colony of Newfoundland in their laws enacted for carrying the foregoing articles into effect, then this article shall be of no effect; but the omission to make provision by law to give it effect by either of the legislative bodies aforesaid, shall not in any way impair any other articles of this Treaty."

And, whereas, pursuant to the provisions of Article XXXIII of said Treaty, due notice has been given to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty of the intention of the Government of the United States of America, to terminate the above recited article of the Treaty in question, on the 1st day of July, 1885;

And, whereas, pursuant to the terms of said Treaty, and of the notice given thereunder by the Government of the United States of America to that of Her Britannic Majesty, the above recited articles of the Treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, will expire and terminate on the 1st day of July, 1885:

Now, therefore, I Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States of America, do hereby give public notice that Articles XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, XXX, and XXXII, of the Treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, will expire and terminate on the 1st day of July, 1885, and all citizens of the United States are hereby warned that none of the privileges secured by the above recited articles of the Treaty in question will exist after the 1st day of July next; all American fishermen should govern themselves accordingly.

REPLY OF
THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,

TO THE

Resolution of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1886, calling for an interpretation of the tariff law respecting the duties on fish.

JANUARY 10, 1887.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1887.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the resolution of the House of the 14th ultimo, making inquiry in regard to the "interpretation now given by the Treasury Department to the tariff law of eighteen hundred and eighty-three, which in one section declares that 'fish, fresh, for immediate consumption,' shall be free of tax on arrival at our seaports or lake ports, and in another section declares that 'foreign-caught fish, imported fresh,' shall be taxed at the rate of fifty cents for each hundred pounds," and also requesting me "to transmit to the House copies of all official correspondence, opinions, and decisions bearing on the subject, together with a statement of the duties collected each year, since eighteen hundred and sixty-five, on the several descriptions of fish caught on the lakes, or the Canadian tributaries thereof, and also on the several descriptions caught in the North Atlantic, or on the shores of the islands thereof."

FROZEN FISH.

A satisfactory reply to these inquiries will make necessary a preliminary statement, and an exhibition of certain details connected therewith.

By the tariff law of 1846, there was levied 20 per cent. ad valorem on the foreign value of:

"Fish, foreign, whether fresh, smoked, salted, dried, or pickled, not otherwise provided for."

The same schedule, and language, were preserved in the tariff law of 1857, but the rate was reduced to 15 per cent.

The tariff law of March 2, 1861, levied in the tenth section the following rates:

"On mackerel, two dollars per barrel; on herrings, pickled or salted, one dollar per barrel; on pickled salmon, three dollars per barrel; on all other fish, pickled, in barrels, one dollar and fifty cents per barrel; on all other foreign-caught fish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half-barrels, or whether fresh, smoked or dried, salted or pickled, not otherwise provided for, fifty cents per one hundred pounds."

In its twenty-third section that law declared that "fish, fresh caught, for daily consumption," shall be exempt from duty.

Then began a perplexity which has embarrassed this Department up to the present day. Some one at the port of entry must, under that clause, decide whether or not the fish, entered as free thereunder, is "fresh caught," and is "for daily consumption." Did the qualification "for daily consumption" refer to the "fish," or to the catching, and the purpose of the catching? Who can correctly pass judgment on the motive of the fishermen, or of the importer?

On June 18, 1866, this Department decided (see Appendix A) that the phrase included all fish imported for consumption, while fresh, and did not include fish imported fresh, but to be afterwards dried, or pickled, or cured for future use. "Daily consumption," said this Department, twenty years ago, means consumption "within a short time." That view seems correct, but, nevertheless, the law was intrinsically incapable of exact execution, inasmuch as it might be difficult for a customs officer to foresee, or foreknow, the intentions or purposes referred to.

I believe that the fish clause quoted above from the law of March 2, 1861, and which levied a tax on fish, stood till 1870, but the free clause was made in 1870 to read:

"Fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

The substitution of "immediate" for "daily" did not remove the perplexity.

The Tariff Commission did not report on the subject.

The tariff law of 1883 taxes fish at our seaports, our lake ports, and on the frontier, by these words in the schedule for "Provisions:"

"Mackerel, one cent per pound.

"Herrings, pickled or salted, one half of one cent per pound.

"Salmon, pickled, one cent per pound; other fish, pickled, in barrels, one cent per pound.

"Foreign-caught fish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half-barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried, salted, or pickled, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, fifty cents per hundred pounds."

A subsequent section declared that the following articles, when imported, shall be exempt from duty:

"Fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

"Fish for bait."

"Oil, spermaceti, whale and other fish oils of American fisheries, and all other articles the produce of such fisheries."

"Shrimps or other shell-fish."

"Fish-sounds, or fish-bladders."

The kinds of fish just described, having been "specially enumerated, or provided for" in 1383, were thereby taken out of the clause levying a tax on foreign-caught fresh fish.

What has happened in the execution of the free-fish clause during the last quarter of a century, whether the clause required "daily" or "immediate" consumption, is exhibited in the subjoined Appendix A. It is an unsatisfactory record of an effort to discover and execute an intention of the law-makers which was so ambiguously expressed as to lead to doubt and dispute. In 1877, and after the law of 1870, the difficulties were increased, partly by reason of new contrivances for the artificial freezing of fish.

At first it was doubted by collectors whether or not a fish caught in winter, thrown on the ice and frozen stiff while lying there, and imported in that condition, could be a "fresh fish," as if either a fresh fish cannot be frozen, or a frozen fish cannot be fresh. It was also insisted that a fish caught in summer, and frozen by an artificial method could not be deemed fresh, even though as fresh as one frozen by the natural coldness of winter air in a northern climate. Then it was said that the produce of American fisheries could not be carried into Canada, there artificially frozen, and afterwards be exempt from tax when entered at our ports. It was argued by customs officers that the quantity entered could be made a safe test of "immediate consumption," as if customs officers could correctly ascertain and decide on the "immediate" buying and consuming powers of the people. There were customs officers who urged the Department to make the distance of the probable place of sale from the place of entry a test of "immediate consumption," as if transportation from Portland in Maine to a market at Boston could be a legal test, and "immediate" referred to place rather than time. One collector thought twenty tons of fish on one entry, at a port on the lakes, could not be for "immediate consumption" by subsequent shipment and sale in the great markets of Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York. It could not be affirmed that the fish thus frozen, whether naturally or artificially, was either "smoked, or dried, or salted, or pickled." If freezing deprived the fish of freshness, it could not well be dutiable as "foreign-caught fish, fresh!" What sort of fish was it? Was it old, stale, and decayed fish that buyers and consumers sought, bought, and would eat? The contention has gone on for well-nigh a quarter of a century, nor has Congress intervened to tax frozen fish by other and explicit words!

In June last the interpretation of the law was referred to the Solicitor of this Department. His opinion, subjoined in Appendix A, does not relieve the enactment from difficulties in uniform application at each port such as the Constitution commands. If a collector shall, in order to secure such uniformity at every port, await the decision of this Department after an exhibition of the facts surrounding each entry, the fish might become anything but "fresh."

This fish clause of the tariff law affords a pertinent illustration of the need there is of revising our taxing legislation. The draughtsman of a great many of its sections, apparently unable to set down clearly his purpose, and his own idea of the method of executing it, has thrown upon appraising or collecting officers the work of ascertaining the intentions of importers, or the uses to which merchandise can be, or may, thereafter put, which those officers are unable to perform in any reasonable time, or in any satisfactory way. To appraising and collecting work in practical administration there is a limit, which our present law too frequently ignores, and then customs officers are unjustly criticised, or condemned, for not doing such work properly.

I have dwelt upon this incident in our tariff legislation because it makes clear, even to the superficial observer, how man's inventions, and improved methods of rapid communication by steam, not only crowd down prices, and extend the saleable area of one article after another year by year, and month by month, but even modify the necessary interpretation to be given to classifications in our taxing laws. One hundred and three years ago—when the Treaty of Peace was signed which apportioned the British empire in America and its rights of fishing, between the British Government and the thirteen independent American States—railways and steam-engines were practically unknown, and the use of ice as now applied in the fishing industry was also unknown. Even half a century ago the purchase and enjoyment of fresh fish as food were confined to places near the spot where the fish were caught. Thus it has come to pass that ice and railways have changed, even since 1870, the most obvious definition and the strictly literal application of the phrase in our tariff law, "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." Such causes of change are constantly occurring as to other articles, by reason of modifications in methods of production, new combinations of component materials, new nomenclature, and new commercial classifications, which enforce the need of frequent revisions of our tariff law, when that law, instead of taxing simply a few articles, requires the executive to levy and collect multifarious duties on so many hundreds and even thousands of articles.

The United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries says in his report for 1881:

"In the earlier years of the American fisheries, and in the greater abundance of inshore fisheries, with a comparatively slight demand in consequence of the small population of the country, and the difficulties of transporting the fish, it was quite possible to obtain, within easy reach of our coast, fish enough to meet all the requirements. Now, with a population of fifty millions of people, the great decline of the inshore fisheries, and the ability not only to transport fresh fish to any distance inland without deterioration, but with also the growing demand for salted, dried, and canned fish, it is of the utmost importance that every facility be furnished to the fishermen in the prosecution of their business."

In the report of the Commissioner for 1882 it is said:

"The work of increasing the supply of valuable fishes in the waters of the United States, whether by artificial propagation or by transplantation, although very successful, may be considered as yet in its infancy. It must be remembered that the agencies which have tended to diminish the abundance of the fish have been at work for many years, and are increasing in an enormous ratio. This, taken in connection with the rapid multiplication of the population of the United States, makes the work an extremely difficult one. If the general conditions remained the same as they were fifty years ago, it would be a very simple thing to restore the former equilibrium.

"At that time, it must be remembered, the modes of preservation and of wholesale transfer, by means of ice, were not known, while the means of quick transportation were very limited. Hence, a small number of fish supplied fully the demand, with the exception, of course, of species that were salted down, like the cod, the mackerel, and the herrings, (including the shad.) At that time a comparatively small quantity supplied the demand for fresh fish, and it was easy to more than meet the demand. Now, however, the conditions are entirely changed."

In Appendix A will be found "the official correspondence, opinions and decisions," on the subject of frozen fish, the record of which will disclose to your honorable body the vast amount of labor which even one ambiguous phrase in a tariff law throws upon your Treasury Department and its customs officers. Our existing drag-net war tariff law contains not only one, but hundreds of such phrases, and these at the least of its discreditable, scandalous, and easily remediable imperfections.

THE PRODUCTS OF AMERICAN FISHERIES EXEMPT FROM DUTY.

The clause, already quoted from the law of 1883, which exempts from seaport taxation all fish-oils of American fisheries, and "all other articles the produce of such fisheries," has a large bearing on the inquiry made of me by the House. That exemption stands in the law of 1883, as it stood in the Revised Statutes, excepting the immaterial addition in the former of the word "oils" after "fish." The enactment is in the law of March 2, 1861, which law secured the freedom of such articles from tariff taxes down to the Revised Statutes. The tariff laws of 1857, and 1846, contain the clause of 1861. The law of 1841 declared that "whale and other fish oils of American fisheries, and all other articles the produce of said fisheries," shall be exempt from duty. Before 1841 the clause does not appear in the statutes, and yet a man issued in New York by Deputy Collector Lyon in 1828, and another in 1832, put down as free; "Fisheries of the United States and their territories,—all products."

I also find substantially the same language in two compilations of the tariff laws—one by Meyer Moses in 1830, and one by E. D. Ogden in 1840; and still another compilation, in 1828, by "James Campbell, entry clerk, custom-house, New York," in which he enumerates "fish of the fisheries of the United States or its Territories, free." Mr. Ogden was for many years chief entry clerk at the port of New York, and a compiler of the revenue laws. In his edition for 1840 he cites as authority for the phrase the acts of July 14, 1832, 1840, and 1841. The explanation is probably this: The final clause of the first section of act of August 10, 1790, levies duties on a plan unlike that now used. It taxes at five per cent. ad valorem certain classes of merchandise, and then rescues from taxation certain specified commodities, "and, generally, all articles of the growth, the product, or manufactures of the United States." The two sentences next to the last in the first section of the law of April 27, 1816, impose duties "on spermaceti oil of foreign fishing, (and) on whale and other fish oil of foreign fishing." The language in that law, as to the products named, is precisely the same as that used in the present tariff, with the single substitution in the latter "of American fisheries" for the words "of foreign fishing" in the former. My conclusion is that only the products of foreign fishing having been provided for as dutiable, the products of American fisheries were by a clear implication exempted from duty as the products of the United States. That they were the products of the United States is, it seems to me, put beyond question by the fact that bounties were paid to vessels engaged in American fisheries.

In 1836, it was decided by Mr. Justice Story that when whales have been caught, and oil has been therefrom produced, by the crew of an American vessel, the oil is not the product of "foreign fishing" and not dutiable, even although owned by aliens when entered at our ports. He said that the inquiry whether or not the oil was of "foreign fishing" depended upon the nationality of the vessel when the whales were caught and the oil extracted, and not upon any subsequent events.

In a series of comparatively recent decisions by this Department, copies of the text of which will be found in Appendix B, Fisheries have been defined as "American" within the meaning of our revenue laws, although the taking of the fish be on the high seas, or within a foreign jurisdiction. That should in part be so for other reasons than were assigned in those decisions, inasmuch as customs duties are, in general, only imposed on articles when imported from a port, or place, within the exclusive dominion of a foreign State, which could not be said of fish, or their products, arriving from the ocean where the fish were caught.

The phrase "fisheries of the United States" is in the first tariff law enacted by the first Congress which sat under the Constitution, and the test of American fishing has, from that day to this, uniformly been the nationality of the vessel, regardless of the place where the fish were taken. Even the Treaty of Washington, which admitted free of duty into each country fish of all kinds being the produce of the fisheries of either country, excepting fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, left fish caught therein by American vessels entitled to free entry in our ports as formerly. Our Supreme Court declared in 1876 that, subject to the paramount right of navigation (the power to regulate which is in the Federal Government), each State owns the bed of the tide-waters within its jurisdiction, and may appropriate them to be used exclusively by its citizens as a common for cultivating and taking fish if navigation be not impeded; but the treaty of 1854 gave, nevertheless, to British subjects, in common with American citizens, the liberty to fish on our coasts north of the 36th parallel of north latitude, and the treaty of 1871 gave the liberty north of the 30th parallel. Those treaties having fallen, and the fishing rights of Massachusetts on her coasts having returned to her, she may permit British vessels to fish on her coasts, but then it could not be said that the fish, if entered at our ports, had been imported from a foreign port. But apart from such an improbable incident to complicate the proposition, it may be safely affirmed that all fishing-grounds, whether on the high seas or on the Canadian coasts, secured to us by treaty stipulations, are "American fisheries," if the fish are caught by vessels regularly documented by the Treasury Department. In that sense and to that end, the ocean and certain Canadian coasts are (under the treaties of 1783 and 1813) our "fishing-grounds."

WHAT VESSELS ARE AMERICAN VESSELS?

In this relation—which concerns the freedom from taxation at our ports of fish products taken in the sea or on Canadian coasts, and also concerns our pending serious differences with the British Government—it is important to realize what constitutes an American vessel that is capable of enlarging the area from which free fish can be entered at our ports. Congress, notably by the enactment of July 5, 1884, has committed to the head of this Department the supervision of the commercial marine and merchant seamen of the United States, and of the decision of all questions relating to the issue of registers, enrollment and licenses of vessels, and to the preservation of those documents. Whether or not a private vessel, claiming to be American, is American and entitled to carry and display that flag, depends solely on the character of the ship's papers that it carries by the permission of Congress given under the attestation of this Department. The only question is this: Has the vessel conformed to the laws, not of a foreign country but of the United States? In the decision of that question her papers must be prima facie evidence against all the world. These considerations are elementary, but they are important now as defining what are "American fisheries," whose products are in our ports exempt from customs taxes.

contrivance for modern exigencies, as Canadian local officials intimate, but has been on our statute book since 1793. As literally reproduced in section 4364 of the Revised Statutes, it gives the permission of this Department to any vessel, so licensed for carrying on the fisheries of the United States, to enter British or other foreign ports, as a commercial vessel, and to there enjoy the rights and privileges accorded to vessels of the United States sailing "foreign" under a register, and not engaged in the fisheries. The permission thus given to fishing vessels to "touch and trade" has been understood by this Department for nearly a hundred years as conferring upon the vessel a right to land, and to receive on board a cargo of merchandise, in the same manner as if she were not engaged in the fisheries. On the return of the vessel to the United States, she is required to make regular entry, and to be in all respects subject to the regulations prescribed for vessels arriving from foreign ports.

MEDIEVAL RESTRICTIONS ON FREE NAVIGATION.

The stipulations of the treaty of 1815 only applied in our favor to British territories "in Europe." If they were applicable now to British territories in America, the present differences in British North America should not exist, for the first article of that convention declares that "the inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty, freely and securely, to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers, in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories, respectively."

The second article stipulates that, as to "the intercourse" between the United States and British possessions in North America, "each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights."

In 1827, when the treaty of 1815 was extended for an indefinite time, the United States struggled in vain with England for a more liberal agreement, or a more liberal interpretation of that of 1815, but could obtain neither.

Such liberty of access by American vessels to British colonial ports on this continent was the subject of fruitless negotiation by each of the first six Presidents. The endeavor was continued during forty years, and was only successful in the hands of General Jackson, as President, Mr. Van Buren as Secretary of State, and Mr. McLane as Minister to London, and then by concerted legislation relating at first only to the British West Indies. It having been arranged that there would be legislation at London opening to us the British colonial ports to the south of us on this continent, Congress, on May 29, 1830, authorized President Jackson to proclaim our ports open "indefinitely, or for a fixed term," to British vessels from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent," and north, south, or east of the United States.

Soon thereafter, and on October 5, 1830, President Jackson did issue the proclamation, and on June 26, 1834, Congress again reduced tonnage dues on Canadian vessels of all sorts entering our ports. By such concerted and reciprocal legislation, the mediæval barriers around colonial possessions in America by which the mother country had so long endeavored for her own benefit to hamper and restrict the trade of the colonies, and to levy differential duties in favor of colonial produce, have been broken down. The Privy Council, and the Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada, while conceding that Canadian ports are now open to American trading vessels, attempt to apply that mediæval and discarded restrictive system to American fishermen on the high seas.

In 1845, after many years of effort by the United States, England again relaxed the rigor of the restrictions of her ancient laws of transportation, as applied to her colonies, and the two countries entered upon a new period of prosperity flowing from the unhindered carriage of merchandise in bond by land and water. That legislation covering the British North American provinces began, on our part, on March 3, 1845. In 1846 came the comprehensive system of warehousing, the general features of which are now in force, devised and perfected, during the administration of President Polk, by my distinguished predecessor, Mr. Robert J. Walker. In 1849, 1850, 1854, and subsequently, that system of warehousing, and transportation in bond by railway and steamboat, has been amended and improved so that to-day we of the United States and they of the Dominion of Canada are reaping the advantages of an international organization by which merchandise, whether dutiable or free, and if dutiable without payment of duties in transit, can if entered at one of our ports proceed immediately over our territory to Canada, or, if landed at a Canadian port, can come freely to its destination in the United States, or can pass from one of our own ports to another over Canadian soil, and, in like manner, from one Canadian port to another over American soil. It is to be regretted that the British North American provinces impede and impair the full fruition of this beneficent system of international intercourse and transportation by unworthy and petty spite in their ports against American deep-sea fishermen.

From 1812 to 1832, the aggregate annual traffic between the United States and the British North American provinces averaged only $3,257,153; from 1832 to 1845 it rose to $6,313,780, but, under liberal transportation arrangements, it rose from 1846 to 1853 to no less an annual average than $14,230,763, leaving in our favor, during that period of eight years, a balance of trade of over 40½ millions of dollars.

It was in 1845 that England, changing her colonial policy, empowered the Canadian provinces to make a tariff on imports to suit themselves. During the next year those provinces removed the barrier against American products which existed, in the form of differential rates in favor of British products, and admitted commodities from one side of the line on the same terms as commodities were admitted coming from British ports. In 1849, England, having by her Minister at Washington previously communicated with the Treasury Department presented a further proposition for a further reciprocal relaxation of commercial restrictions which impeded trade across the boundary line. The administration of President Fillmore endeavored to promote the object for which my predecessor in this Department, Mr. Robert J. Walker, strove, in 1846, in his correspondence with the British Minister.

This good result of only a partial experiment of reciprocal comity naturally led to negotiations for a more comprehensive international arrangement, and such a one was concluded in 1854 by negotiations conducted at Washington, on our side during the administration of President Pierce by a wise and illustrious statesman and citizen of New York, Mr. Marcy, who was then Secretary of State. That reciprocity treaty was in force till 1866, a period covering our civil war. Under its influence, the aggregate interchange of commodities between ourselves and the inhabitants of all the British provinces—numbering not as many as those of the State of New York—rose from an annual average of a little over 14 millions of dollars, in the previous eight years to over 33½ millions in gold in 1855, to nearly 50 millions in 1856, and to 84 millions in the last year of its existence. During the thirteen years the British provinces, according to their official returns, purchased from us articles valued at over 359½ millions of dollars in gold, and we bought from them 197 millions, thus making an international traffic of nearly 556½ millions of dollars on a gold valuation. I can but think that if that treaty of 1854 had remained in force till this day, the two peoples—divided by a boundary-line which can only with difficulty be discerned from the Arctic ocean to the Pacific, from the Pacific to Lake Superior, and from Lake Ontario to the Atlantic—would now be one people, at least for all purposes of production, trade, and business.

During the past summer, while American vessels, regularly documented, have been excluded from the hospitality and privileges of trading in Canadian ports, Canadian fishing-vessels have been permitted freely to enter and use American ports along the New England coast, have been protected by this Department in such entry and use, and have not been required to pay any other fees, charges, taxes, or dues than have been imposed upon the vessels of other governments similarly situated. The hospitality elsewhere, and generally extended in British ports to American commercial vessels has not been less, in quality or quantity, as I am informed, than the hospitality extended to British vessels in American ports; but there is this marked difference, that, while this Department protects Canadian fishermen in the use of American ports, the Dominion of Canada brutally excludes American fishermen from Canadian ports. This dependence on port hospitality, as between this Government and the British Government, in respect to vessels of either, is emphasized by the nineteenth section of the law of June 19, 1836, empowering the President to suspend commercial privileges to the vessels of any country denying the same to United States vessels. That section is in harmony with a section in the British navigation law which authorizes the Queen, whenever British vessels are subject in any foreign country to prohibitions or restrictions, to impose by order in council such prohibitions or restrictions upon the ships of such foreign country, either as to voyages in which they may engage, or as to the articles which they may import into or export from any British possession in any part of the world, so as to place the ships of such country on as nearly as possible the same footing in British ports as that on which British ships are placed in ports of such country.

REVENUE LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

The head of this Department, having the responsibility of enforcing the collection of duties upon such a vast number of imported articles, under circumstances of so long a sea-coast and frontier line to be guarded against the devices of smugglers, should not be inclined to underestimate the solicitude of the local officers of the Dominion of Canada to protect its own revenue from similar invasion. The laws for the collection of duties on imports in force in the United States and in the Dominion of Canada, respectively, will be found, on comparison, to be on many points similar in their objects and methods. They should naturally be similar, for both had, in the beginning, the same common origin. In the United States, Congress has divided the territory of each State by metes and bounds, usually by towns, cities, or counties, into collection districts, for the purpose of collecting duties on imports, and in each collection district has established a port of entry and ports of delivery. In that manner all our sea-coast frontier is subdivided for revenue purposes. The object of our law is to place every vessel arriving from a foreign port in the custody of a customs officer immediately upon her arrival, in order that no merchandise may be unladen therefrom without the knowledge of the Government. The Canadian law is much the same as our own in that regard, and in comparison with our own does not seem to me to be unnecessarily severe in its general provisions. Our own law provides, for example, (sec. 2774, Rev. Stat.,) that—“Within twenty-four hours after the arrival of any vessel, from any foreign port, at any port of the United States established by law, at which an officer of the customs resides, or within any harbor, inlet, or creek thereof, if the hours of the business of the office of the chief officer of customs will permit, or as soon thereafter as such hours will permit, the master shall report to such officer, and make report to the chief officer, of the arrival of the vessel; and he shall within forty-eight hours after such arrival make a further report in writing to the collector of the district, which report shall be in the form, and shall contain all the particulars required to be inserted in and verified like the manifest. Every master who shall neglect or omit to make either of such reports or declaration, or to verify any such declarations as required, or shall not fully comply with the true intent and meaning of this section, shall for each offence be liable to a penalty of one thousand dollars.”

Condemnation does not, in the opinion of this Department, justly rest upon the Dominion of Canada because she has upon her statute-books and enforces a law similar to the foregoing, but because she refuses to permit American deep-sea fishing vessels, navigating and using the ocean, to enter her ports for the ordinary purposes of trade and commerce, even though they have never attempted to fish within the territorial limits of Canada, and intend obedience to every requirement of the customs laws, and of every other law of the port which such vessels seek to enter. American fishing-vessels duly authenticated by this Department, and having a permit "to touch and trade," should be permitted to visit Canadian ports, and buy supplies, and enjoy ordinary commercial privileges, unless such a right is withheld in our ports from Canadian vessels. That right is denied by the Privy Council and the Governor-General of the Canadian Dominion, upon the ground that it would be in effect a pro tanto abrogation of the treaty of 1818. That contention is an error, in the opinion of this Department, because the treaty of 1818 has no application to the subject-matter. If the right claimed by this Department for American vessels authenticated by this Department were conceded by Canada, it would only apply to a few ports established by law for the entry of foreign vessels, and would merely enable United States fishing-vessels to pursue their regular business after entry into or departure from such ports, under the same rules and regulations as are applied to the commercial vessels of other nations. We ask that American fishing-vessels shall enjoy hospitality in such Canadian ports as are set apart for the entry of foreign vessels, for the unloading and shipment of merchandise, and generally for foreign commerce.

This Department has had occasion in the past, and may be compelled in the future, to seize and prosecute for forfeiture foreign as well as domestic vessels violating, in our own ports, the customs law, but I believe there never has been in the past, and I hope there never will be in the future, such passionate spite displayed by the officers of this Government as has during the last summer been exhibited in the Dominion of Canada toward well-meaning American fishermen. Congress has forbidden the Head of this Department to prosecute even for evasion of tariff law unless satisfied of "an actual intention to defraud."

TONNAGE OF VESSELS ENGAGED IN AMERICAN FISHERIES, AND THE NATIONALITIES OF THE FISHERMEN.

During the periods of the inquiry made of me by the House, the tonnage of American fishing-vessels of over twenty tons burden, other than whalers, will be seen in Appendix D.

That tonnage reached its maximum (203,459) in 1862, and during the subsequent seven years diminished by more than 70 per cent. The lowest number of tons was touched in the middle of the period between the expiration of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 and the conclusion of the treaty of Washington of 1871. The falling off is perhaps to be attributed in great part to the repeal in 1866 of the laws allowing bounties to the vessels engaged in the fisheries. By the law of 1813 there was paid to the collector of the district where such vessels belonged, to the owner thereof if the vessel had been employed at sea in fishing for the term of four months, and for each ton burden, a specified sum, not to exceed $272 on any one vessel for one season, of which bounty three-eighths accrued to the owner and the other five-eighths to the several fishermen. In 1817 it was enacted that the bounty shall be paid only to vessels whereof the officers and at least three-fourths of the crew shall be citizens of the United States, or persons not the subject of any foreign prince or state. In 1819, soon after the conclusion of the treaty of 1818, the bounties were increased, but not to exceed $360 for each vessel. In 1864 it was enacted that the bounty shall not thereafter be paid to any vessel until satisfactory proof shall have been furnished to the collector of customs that the import duty imposed by law upon foreign salt has been paid on all foreign salt used in curing the fish on which the claim to the allowance to the bounty is based, and the law was repealed on June 28, 1864 (U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 13, p. 201), which required two-thirds of those on board to be American citizens. On July 28, 1866, all laws and parts of laws allowing fishing-bounties to vessels thereafter licensed to engage in the fisheries was also repealed, but under the condition that duties shall be remitted on all foreign salt used by such vessels in curing fish. It seems quite probable that anticipation of the enactment repealing bounties induced, in great part, the great falling off in tonnage between 1862 and 1869.

The best estimate that can be made by this Department of the relation of aliens to citizens engaged in American fisheries, in the North Atlantic, other than whalers, is that during the last year (1886), of the 14,240 employed, seventy-eight per cent. were American citizens.

PRESENT CONDITION OF AMERICAN FISHERIES, AND THE SUM OF DUTIES COLLECTED ON FOREIGN FISH.

On May 28, 1886, and in furtherance of a suggestion made by our Fish Commissioner, this Department issued a circular letter of instruction to collectors, a copy of which will be found in Appendix E. The replies received have been transmitted to that Commission, and therefrom valuable facts respecting our fisheries have been obtained, some of which the Commissioner has kindly grouped and placed at my disposition. They are respectfully submitted to the House in Appendix E. In Appendix C will be found such an exhibition of the duties collected on fish as the records of this Department, for reasons set forth in the Appendix, make available for immediate presentation to the House.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

FROZEN FISH.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BOSTON,
Collector's Office, June 10, 1866.

Hon. HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary Treasury :

SIR: The act of March 2, 1861, relating to duties on imports, provides in section 10 for a duty on "fresh fish foreign caught not otherwise provided for." Among the articles enumerated in section 23 same act, as exempt from duty is, "Fish, fresh caught, for daily consumption."

Fresh salmon and halibut in small quantities are daily brought into this port in British vessels from the Provinces undoubtedly for "daily consumption," but without any formal evidence of that fact, such importations have been admitted free of duty.

The appraisers hold that all fresh fish, so imported in British vessels, is subject to duty by virtue of said section 10.

The question is constantly occurring, and there being a difference of opinion amongst ourselves here as to the construction of the act, we should feel much relieved if you would give a decision upon the question.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. FISKE,
Special Deputy Collector.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1866.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Boston, Mass. :

SIR: Your communication of the 16th instant is received, relative to the duty to be imposed on "fresh fish, foreign caught, imported from Canada in British vessels."

In reply thereto, I would respectfully state that it is the opinion of this Department that by that provision of the tariff which admits to free entry "fish, fresh caught, for daily consumption" (section 23, act of March 2, 1861), is understood to embrace all fish imported for consumption, while fresh, in contradistinction to such as might be imported fresh, to be dried, pickled, or otherwise cured for future use.

By the phrase "daily consumption" it is not understood that the fish must be used on the day they are imported, but if there is reason to believe that the fish are to be used within a short time, then they would be entitled to free entry, notwithstanding the fact that there may be no formal evidence that they are intended for daily consumption.

By order:

I am, very respectfully,

J. F. HARTLEY,
Assistant Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1869.

THOMAS RUSSELL, Esq., Collector of Customs, Boston, Mass. :

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 19th instant, the following dispatch has been this day sent you by telegraph:

"Release the schooner Scud. Further by letter."

In the letter referred to, transmitting a communication from Lorenzo Wilson, charterer of the fishing schooner Scud, you state that the schooner arrived at your port on the 14th instant with 800 barrels of American-caught herring, salted, and that the facts of the case are as follows:

That after taking a fishing license of Eastport, with liberty to load and trade, the schooner sailed to St. John, New Brunswick, where her master purchased salt for the voyage (550 sacks), with twenty-five "fishing anchors," used for herring nets, and manufactured in New Brunswick.

She then cleared from St. John, bound on a fishing voyage. On arrival at Boston, the master sold the herring and landed them without a permit.

The master, however, reported at the custom-house, where he was informed by the clerk, that he was not required to enter his vessel, she being under a fishing license.

You state that you are perfectly satisfied that the parties interested acted in good faith, and that they believed they had a right to land their cargo without entry or permit, or payment of duties, and you recommend that the schooner be allowed to clear at once without any proceedings against her.

In consideration of the alleged causes of her detention and of your recommendation the order for the release of the schooner is hereby confirmed, and you will take no steps against any of the parties to enforce legal penalties for landing the cargo without permit.

You say further that the claimant has, by your direction, made entry of his fish, and made special deposit of the amount of duties, viz, $826, on the ground that by purchasing salt in a foreign port and mixing it with the fish he rendered his whole cargo dutiable.

The Department has hitherto decided that if foreign salt is used without the limits of the United States, in curing fish of American catch, the fish are not thereby rendered dutiable, nor is the salt so consumed liable to duty.

If salt purchased abroad for the curing of fish is not consumed in the curing, but is brought into an American port, the salt would then be liable to duty, but the fish on board cured with such foreign salt before importation are free of duty.

You will accordingly refund the sum deposited with you by the claimant in payment of duty supposed to have accrued on the fish imported in the Scud.

Very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., June 4, 1875.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Marquette, Mich.:

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, inquiring whether fish which are caught in Canadian waters, and after being brought into the United States are salted and packed in barrels or packed in ice, are subject to duty, and if so, at what rates.

In reply, I would state that it being assumed that the fish you refer to are caught from the inland lakes separating the Dominion of Canada from the United States, or from the Canadian tributaries thereof, the same are not exempt from duty by virtue of the treaty of Washington of July 4, 1871, and section 2506, Revised Statutes, in pursuance thereof, inasmuch as fish, the products of the inland lakes and tributaries, are not admitted free of duty under said treaty and law.

The general provisions of the tariff, however, allowing free entry of fresh fish for immediate consumption, would, under the ruling of the Department giving construction to the law, apply to fresh fish imported into the United States to be consumed within a short time thereafter, as fresh fish. It will be observed, however, that as the question whether the fish are for immediate consumption can be absolutely verified only in the light of facts occurring after they have been admitted to free entry and have passed from the custody of the Government, great care and circumspection will be required on the part of officers of the customs to see that there is no abuse of the privilege conferred by the law in question. If you have any valid reason to believe that fish are being admitted to free entry which are not entitled to such privilege, you will deny free entry thereof, report the facts to the Department, and await further instructions.

As regards the fish salted and packed in barrels, I have to state that if, as the Department infers from your communication, the fish are so salted and packed after importation, they would, unless coming under some one of the special provisions for different kinds of fish, including that above referred to for fresh fish, be charged with duty at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 21, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, inclosing a communication from John O'Malley, of La Pointe, Wis., making the following inquiries in regard to American vessels fishing upon Lake Superior, viz:

(1) Can an American vessel engage in fishing upon the northern shores of Lake Superior in Canadian waters, with American twine and American labor, salt the fish upon the vessel and bring them into the United States free of duty?

(2) Does an American vessel engaged in fishing or the coasting trade, on clearing for a Canadian port, become liable to tonnage tax?

In reply to the first question, I have to state that neither the treaty of Washington nor any other treaty with Great Britain authorizes American fishermen to fish upon the northern shores of Lake Superior, or provides that fish there caught shall be entitled to free entry into the United States. Such fish, however caught, by permission of the Canadian government, express or implied, on American vessels, and salted therein, would be duty free on entry under the provision in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes for "the produce of the American fisheries," and the decision of this Department, contained in a letter to the collector of customs at Boston, under date of the 22d of January, 1869, to the following effect:

"If foreign salt is used without the limits of the United States in curing fish of American catch, the fish is not thereby rendered dutiable, nor is the salt so used liable to duty."

"If salt purchased abroad for the curing of fish is not consumed in the curing, but is brought into an American port, the salt would then be liable to duty, but the fish of American catch, cured with such foreign salt before importation, are free of duty."

To the second question I answer, that a vessel engaged in fishing or the coasting trade does not become liable to tonnage tax on clearing for a foreign port.

But a coasting vessel so clearing directly, or a vessel entering a Canadian port on the lakes during a fishing voyage, would be required to pay the tax on her return to the United States, provided it had not been paid within a year.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHAS. F. CONANT.

Acting Secretary.

Hon. T. W. FERRY,

President of the Senate.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, DETROIT, MICH.,

Collector's Office, December 29, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to represent that the question has been raised at this office as to whether fresh fish frozen into a particular shape for the preservation of the fish and convenience in their transportation to all parts of the United States are dutiable upon their importation into the United States or entitled to free entry under the provisions of section 2505, Revised Statutes, for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." The preparation of the fish is made under a patent process owned by Messrs. S. H. Davis & Co., of this city, which patent was issued from the Patent Office of the United States April 6, 1875, and numbered 161596, and also under patents issued by the Governments of Canada and Newfoundland. The fish are frozen at any time of the year into round cakes the thickness of one fish, with backs up, so as to exactly fit into a barrel, seven of said cakes exactly filling one barrel. In this condition the fish are preserved from decay and in a fresh state for any length of time required, in rooms of a low temperature, and shipped to any point desired in refrigerator cars and vans, the patent on which is also owned by Messrs. Davis & Co. Fish so prepared are, although fresh, in no sense intended for immediate consumption, but on the contrary are intended to be retained in a fresh condition for shipment and future consumption. I was yesterday shown a cake of fish prepared by the process above mentioned over one year ago, and they had the appearance of being as fresh as if newly caught.

A large quantity of fish are being prepared by the process mentioned at Amherstburg, Ontario, and it is the intention of the owners to import a portion of the fish so prepared into the United States at this port for sale in the markets of the United States.

In view of the foregoing facts I have to request that I be instructed at as early a day as possible as to what course to pursue upon the importation of fish prepared in the manner above referred to, whether I shall admit them to free entry as "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," or demand a duty of 50 cents per 100 pounds.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. V. BELL, Collector.

Hon. L. M. MORRILL,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Fish frozen for transportation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT. January 3, 1877.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 29th ultimo, in which you ask for a decision as to whether fresh fish, frozen in barrels, imported from Canada, are exempt from duty.

It is understood that the fish referred to are caught in the inland lakes, and consequently that they are not exempt from duty under the Treaty of Washington and section 2506 of the Revised Statutes.

From your statement it appears that the fish are frozen in barrels under a process which has been patented in the United States and Canada, and that by such process they are preserved fresh, and in a condition fit for use for an almost indefinite period of time, when they are kept in a low temperature. It is also understood that such fish are not imported for daily consumption at or near your port, but are intended to be transported in refrigerator cars (also patented for the purpose of carrying these fish) to different parts of the country for sale and future consumption.

Under these circumstances, the Department is of opinion that the fish, when imported in the condition specified, are not exempt from duty under the provision for "fish, fresh, for daily consumption," which, by Department's decision of June 18, 1866, was intended to apply only to fish in the natural condition, intended for use at or about the time of importation, but are dutiable at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds, under the provision in Schedule F for "all other foreign-caught fish, * * * fresh, * * * not otherwise provided for."

Respectfully,

L. M. MORRILL,
Secretary.COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,

DETROIT, January 11, 1877.

Hon. L. M. MORRILL,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have this day filed protest with the collector here against the payment of $18.94 coin assessed by him upon 3,788 pounds fresh fish imported by me this day. They are caught in the Thames River near Chatham, and sent here for immediate shipment to New York for consumption. It seems to me very unjust that duty should be charged upon these fresh fish for immediate shipment to New York, Philadelphia, or Cincinnati, while (as the collector informs me) they are admitted free for Detroit market. These fish are thrown into barrels and left out to freeze before they are shipped. I am also occasionally shipping some which are frozen by patent process in barrels and shipped to same points that these are, and claim they should all be free, same as heretofore. It being, as before stated, very unjust to discriminate between this and other markets.

In view of the foregoing facts, I trust you will authorize a refund of the amount exacted and also instruct the collector to admit future shipments upon free entry.

Very respectfully,

T. R. MERRILL.

DETROIT, January 11, 1877.

Hon. L. M. MORRILL,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have this day filed protest with the collector of customs here against the payment of $47.58 coin assessed by him upon 9,510 pounds fresh fish imported by me this day, claiming they should be free as they are imported for shipment at once to Philadelphia for immediate consumption. Another reason for claiming free entry on the particular shipment is that they were caught in American waters and taken to Windsor and placed in refrigerators, where they are withdrawn as required for shipment to New York, Philadelphia, and other points, as well as this market. It seems to me a very unjust discrimination against citizens of New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, &c., that they must pay duty upon same fish that citizens of Detroit would be allowed free of duty, as the collector here allows free entry upon all fresh fish which are to be placed upon the market here for consumption.

We are bringing in both foreign and American fish daily, some fresh caught and some from the refrigerators. They are all frozen. Those that come from the refrigerators will not keep as long as those fresh caught, and must of necessity be consumed

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BUFFALO, N. Y.,
Collector's Office, January 15, 1877.

SIR: Messrs. Jones & Trevallee, of this city, desire me to submit for your decision the following inquiry: During the season of 1876 certain fish were caught by fishermen in their employ at Whitefish Point and Marquette, Mich., in the American waters of Lake Superior, brought in vessels to this port, and by them exported to Port Ryerse, Ontario, fresh, for the purpose of having them frozen by a similar process to that mentioned in letter of Department to collector of customs at Detroit, under date of January 3, 1877 (H. B. J.).

They now desire to return them to this port, and ask if they can be brought in free of duty, under section 1687 of the tariff, which provides for the free entry of the products of American fisheries. They have undergone no change of condition except the process of freezing named.

An early reply is respectfully requested.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
January 22, 1877.

R. W. DANIELS, Esq.,
Collector of Customs, Buffalo, N. Y.:

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, inquiring whether fish, caught in the waters of Lake Superior within the jurisdiction of the United States, and consequently of domestic production, can be carried to Canada and be there subjected to a patent process of freezing for the purpose of preservation, with the privilege of free entry on being returned to the United States.

The process referred to, you state, is similar to that mentioned in Department's letter to the collector of customs at Detroit, dated the 3d instant. In that case the Department held that the fish, being the product of the Canadian fisheries, was not entitled to free entry either under the treaty of Washington or the provision of the free list for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," which, under the rulings of the Department, applies only to fish in the condition when caught, and intended for use at or about the time of importation.

This process being thus recognized as effecting a change in the condition of the fish, they cannot, on being returned to the United States under the circumstances detailed by you, be admitted to free entry as American production returned to this country "in the same condition as exported."

By order.

H. F. FRENCH,
Assistant Secretary.

J. M. S.]

CUSTOM-HOUSE, DETROIT, MICH.,
Collector's Office, January 17, 1877.

SIR: I submit the protests and appeals of Mr. T. R. Merrill and Mr. J. B. Jessop, respectively (Nos. 3024e and 3025e), from the decision of this office, assessing duty at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds on certain 3,788 pounds fresh fish imported by said Merrill on the 11th instant, and on 9,517 pounds fresh fish imported on the same day by said Jessop.

Referring to Department's decision No. 2285, dated June 4, 1875, and to your letter of (H. B. J.) January 3, 1877, addressed to me, I have to say that said rate of duty was assessed by me upon the importations referred to for the reason that the fish were not imported in their natural condition, and were not intended for immediate consumption at or near this port, but were intended for shipment to New York and Philadelphia. A large portion of the fish included in the said importation by Mr. J. B. Jessop had been originally frozen in particular shapes by the patent process referred to in my letter of (J. M. S.) December 29, 1876, and the casks of fish so prepared, afterward, and just previous to importation, broken up with a view to evading the payment of duty under the decision in Department's said letter of January 3, 1877, but not so broken and separated as to render them unfit for shipment and preservation for a reasonable length of time. The remainder of the fish in Mr. Jessop's importation and all of Mr. Merrill's importation had been taken from the pens in which they were kept, packed in barrels, and then exposed to the cold and solidly frozen for convenience of shipment.

My understanding of Department's decision in said letter to me, dated January 3, 1877, was and is that the provision of law authorizing the free entry of "fish, fresh for immediate consumption," is intended to apply only to fresh-caught fish in their natural condition, and in such quantities as is reasonable to suppose are for immediate and daily consumption at or near the port where imported, and that all fish imported in such condition and quantity as to warrant the belief that they are intended for shipment to other points must pay duty at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds, whether they are frozen under a patent process or in any other manner that will preserve them for and during shipment.

I have the honor to report that the requirements of the fourteenth and fifteenth sections of the act approved June 30, 1864, have been complied with by the appollants.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. V. BELL.

Collector of Customs, Detroit:

DEAR SIR: I hereby protest against the assessment of one-half cent per pound on 3,788 pounds fresh fish imported by me this day, claiming they should be free, being for immediate consumption on arrival at New York.

They are caught in the Thames River, near Chatham, and sent here for immediate shipment to New York for consumption. I therefore claim the amount exacted ($18.94 gold) should be refunded.

Very respectfully,

T. R. MERRILL.

I claim also they should be free for another reason, viz, that they are fish caught in American waters in Detroit River, and are placed in refrigerators in Windsor and withdrawn as we require them for shipment. In view of the foregoing facts I claim the amount exacted should be refunded.

It is admitted by Messrs. Jones & Trevallee that under decision of the Department, in letter to collector of customs at Detroit, under date of the 3d instant, such fish cannot be returned under 1482 of the free list as American productions returned to this country in "same condition as when exported," but claim they should be admitted to free entry under the provisions of section 2505 of the Revised Statutes for the produce of American fisheries, and Treasury decisions (S. TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, Buffalo, N. Y.:

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, renewing the question whether fish caught in the waters of Lake Superior within the jurisdiction of the United States, exported to Canada, and there frozen for the purpose of preservation, can be returned to the United States free of duty.

You state that Messrs. Jones & Trevallee, the parties at whose instance the inquiry is made, concede that the fish, under such circumstances, are not entitled to free entry as being returned to the United States in the same condition as when exported, but claim that they should be admitted to free entry under the provision of the free list for the produce of American fisheries, reference being made to Department's decision of January 22, 1869, and June 21, 1876 (S. S., 342 and 2872), authorizing the free entry of fish caught and cured without the limits of the United States, as sustaining such claim.

In reply you are informed that the fish in the case supposed, being caught in the waters of the United States, the decisions referred to do not apply; and being of domestic production there is no provision of law authorizing their free entry on their being taken to Canada, and thereafter returned to this country in a condition different from that in which they were at the time of being taken to Canada.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I hereby wish to call your attention to the collection of duties on fresh fish, which I call illegal, and demanded of me at the ports of entry in Detroit, Mich., and at Suspension Bridge, N. Y.

I imported at the places set opposite the following entries fresh fish upon which was exacted a duty of one-half cent per pound in gold, which I paid or caused to be paid under protest, to wit:

	1877.	Cent.	Pounds.

The within fish were all fresh fish, and were intended for daily consumption and were dried to be sold and disposed of with least possible delay, as they would spoil in a short time. The entry of the 12th January, with exception of 1,717 pounds of the 7th February and 4,476 pounds of the entry of February 20 at Suspension Bridge, were fish fresh from the river Detroit. I know that other parties are importing fresh fish free of duty at Detroit. I hereby pray that the duty so unjustly collected may be returned to me, and, if required, can send additional affidavits to substantiate what I now say, that all of these fish were fresh fish and liable to spoil and become of no value in a short time.

I remain, yours truly,

C. W. GAUTHIER.

I, John L. Neur, United States consular agent at Windsor, Ontario, do hereby certify that I know Mr. C. W. Gauthier to be a truthful and reliable person and the person whose name appears as above subscribed, and the statements above set forth as far as my knowledge and belief I believe them to be true.

JOHN L. NEUR,
Consular Agent, United States.UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN,
Detroit, June 13, 1877.Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury:

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith compared copy of the decision of Judge Brown, of the United States circuit court, in the case of Gauthier v. D. V. Bell, collector of the port, in relation to the importation of frozen fish. The case was fully argued, and, as you will see, the decision heretofore arrived at by the Department was sustained by the court.

Very respectfully,

S. M. CUTCHEON,
United States Attorney.

"BROWN, J.:

"Although the fish in question are frozen in barrels or in large pans in a solid mass or cake, I think they are still to be considered as fresh fish. This term is obviously used in contradistinction to fish which are cured, salted, smoked, dried, pickled, or otherwise rendered capable of preservation for an indefinite length of time. The testimony shows clearly that frozen fish retain their flavor so long as the temperature is preserved below the freezing point, and that they are sold in the market and known to the trade as fresh fish.

"The only difficulty in this case arises from the use of the words 'for immediate consumption.' While I am strongly inclined to the opinion that fish imported in their natural state, whether to be sold upon the market at the place of importation, or to be shipped to distant towns, would still be for immediate consumption, I think the fact of their being frozen in cakes prior to their importation evinces a manifest intention that they shall not be immediately consumed. While they were sometimes broken up and placed at once upon the market at Detroit, they were more frequently shipped to Cincinnati and Philadelphia, in common cars, and there put upon the market and sold. It was shown that fish so frozen could be kept for months, and even years, with no material loss of flavor or perceptible decay, and that, in the winter, it was no uncommon thing for them to be kept for two or three months, the length of time, of course, depending upon the state of the weather. Under these circumstances, I think they cannot be classified as fresh fish for immediate consumption.

"A portion of these fish were originally caught in American waters, carried to Canada for the purpose of being frozen, and a bond given for their re-exportation to the United States. It was claimed that even under Schedule F, section 2504, these were exempt. As this schedule applies only to 'foreign-caught' fish, I think the fish in question fall within the provision of section 2505, page 486, viz: 'Articles of growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States, when returned in the same condition as when exported, but proof of identity of such articles shall be made under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.' These regulations are contained in the printed copy of the general regulations, articles 373-4-5-6 and 377, and it was admitted these regulations had not been complied with. This was an indispensable prerequisite to their admission free of duty.

"It was not the intention of Congress, by the use of the words 'foreign-caught,' to place domestic fish in a category distinct from that of other articles of home production, or to dispense with the proof of identity required in all other cases, and so necessary to prevent frauds.

"There must be a judgment for defendant."

Hon. LOT M. MORRILL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, DETROIT, MICH.,
Collector's Office, March 8, 1877.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of H. B. J., March 6, 1877, inclosing appeal (No. 3420e) from my decisions assessing duty at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds on certain fresh fish imported by C. W. Gauthier into this port between January 12 and February 16, 1877, directing me to report thereon.

In relation to the eight different importations included in said appeal, I have to say that the first mentioned ("January 12, 1877, paid $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound on 9,439") does not appear on the records of this office, but on January 11, 1877, there was imported by J. B. Jessop, a partner of the appellant in the present case, 9,517 pounds of fresh fish frozen under a patent process, upon which duty was assessed, and protest and appeal filed. The appeal was transmitted from this office under date of January 17, 1877, to which you replied in letter of T. B. S., January 23, 1877, sustaining my action. The two succeeding importations ("January 28, 1877, paid $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound on 19,459 pounds; February 1, 1877, paid $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound on 2,110 pounds") do not appear on our records, but are evidently intended to represent two importations of fresh fish made on the dates mentioned by J. B. Jessop, of 19,550 pounds and 2,457 pounds, respectively, upon which duties were assessed, and against which action no protests have ever been filed in this office. The fourth importation mentioned in said appeal ("February 7, 1877, paid $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound on 8,343 pounds") was made as represented, protest and appeal filed in accordance with law, and a refund of the duties exacted ordered in your letter of H. B. J., February 17, 1877.

The four succeeding importations referred to in said appeal were made as alleged, viz: 25,677 pounds on February 8, 14,780 and 1,327 pounds on February 15, and 2,210 pounds on February 16, against the exaction of duty, on which protests were filed in this office in accordance with law, on February 9 and February 21, 1877, and are herewith submitted.

With the exception of the first three importations mentioned in said appeal, none of the fish were frozen under a patent process, but were all more or less frozen in the packages in which they were imported, and were shipped to New York and Philadelphia in that condition, where they may have been put on the market for immediate consumption, or they may have been sugar-cured or pickled for future consumption. The large quantities of fish shipped from Canada during the winter to New York and other points East, via this port, Suspension Bridge, and Buffalo, is a probable indication that the fish are intended for preservation and future use, and not for immediate consumption.

The statement by Mr. Gauthier, in his appeal, that the fish mentioned therein were fresh fish from the Detroit River, is calculated to mislead. No fish are taken from the Detroit River in the winter, from the fact that said river is entirely frozen over during the winter. Mr. Gauthier and other fishermen along the Detroit River catch their fish during the summer and fall, confining them in pens along the river bank until such time as they may be wanted, when they are taken therefrom and disposed of. I exacted duty on these fish imported by Mr. Gauthier, and upon importations of a similar nature by other parties, for the reason that I held that the provision of law (sec. 2505, Rev. Stat.) exempting from duty "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," and the various decisions of the Department thereunder, applied only to importations of fish, fresh-caught, in their natural condition, and in such quantities as would be reasonable to suppose were for immediate consumption, and acting upon such construction of the law and said decisions, I have exacted duty upon all importations of fresh fish frozen under patent processes, and all such as were otherwise frozen and imported in such quantities as to raise the presumption that they were not intended for immediate consumption at or near this port. The only fresh fish I have admitted to free entry within the past two months have been such as were imported in quantities that could be consumed while fresh in this market, and upon the entry of which the importer should subscribe an oath to the effect that the fish were fresh in their natural condition, and were intended for immediate consumption at or near this port and not for shipment.

The said appeal by Mr. Gauthier, together with two protests covering the four importations mentioned in said appeal as having been made on the 8th, 15th, and 16th of February, is herewith inclosed.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. V. BELL,
Collector.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Detroit, Mich. :

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, reporting upon the appeal (3420e) of C. W. Ganttler from your assessment of duty at the rate of one-half cent per pound on certain fish imported by him into your port January 28, February 1, 8, 15, and 16 last, and claimed to be entitled to free entry under the provision in the free list, Revised Statutes for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

It appears from your report that it has been the practice at your port to admit to free entry, under the provision of law above cited, such fresh fish only as were imported in quantities that could be consumed while fresh at or near your port, and that the immense quantities of fish imported from Canada at your port, Suspension Bridge, and Buffalo for shipment to New York and Philadelphia is an indication that they are intended for preservation and future use and not for immediate consumption.

The appeal of Mr. Ganttler covers the importation of 162,200 pounds of fish during the months of January and February last, and, upon consideration, the Department is of opinion that such large importations would probably not be consumed immediately.

Your assessment of duty on the importations of February 8, 15, and 16, 1877, is hereby affirmed.

In consequence of the failure of the importer to file protests in due time on their entries of January 28 and February 1, 1877, the Department declines to entertain so much of his appeal as relates thereto.

By order:

Respectfully,

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, reporting further on the appeal of C. W. Ganttler from your assessment of duty at the rate of one-half cent per pound on certain fish imported by him into your port on the 12th, 17th, and 20th ultimo, and claimed to be entitled to free entry under the provision in the free list, Revised Statutes, for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

It appears from your report of the 8th instant that the fish in question were packed in barrels and frozen by some artificial process, and that duty was assessed thereon in accordance with Department's decision of January 3, 1877 (S. S. 3062).

Your assessment of duty on the importations of the 12th and 17th ultimo is therefore affirmed.

It appears from your report of the 20th instant that no protest was lodged for the entry of the 20th ultimo, and the Department therefore declines to entertain so much of the appeal as relates to that entry.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, DETROIT, MICH.,
Collector's Office, June 15, 1877.

SIR: Referring to the appeal (3420e) of C. W. Ganttler from my assessment of duty at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds on certain fish imported by him into this port January 28, February 1, 8, 15, and 16 last, and claimed to be exempt from duty under the provision in the free-list, Revised Statutes, for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," and to Department's decision thereon, sustaining my action (S. S. 3181), I have the honor to report that after said decision was made known to him (Ganttler), he commenced suit in the United States circuit court against me for recovery of the duties so paid by him. Under stipulations between counsel a jury trial was dispensed with, and the case presented to the court (Judge H. Brown) in chambers. The decision of the court ordering judgment for defendant is herewith inclosed. It will be noticed that Judge Brown, in said decision, inclines to the opinion that fresh fish imported in their natural condition (not frozen by patent process or otherwise) would be entitled to free entry, without regard to quantity imported, or whether they are intended for consumption at or near the port of importation, or intended for shipment to distant parts of the country.

I have to request that I be instructed as to whether or not the Department concurs with such opinion, and if I shall admit to free entry all fresh fish imported in their natural condition.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. V. BELL, Collector.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BUFFALO, N. Y.,
Collector's Office, June 20, 1877.

SIR: Unofficial information has been received at this office that the United States district court at Detroit, Mich., has decided that imported fresh fish packed in ice are not entitled to entry as fish intended for immediate consumption.

I respectfully ask to be informed if the decision above referred to applies to all fresh fish packed in ice imported from Canada.

Dealers in this city import fresh fish for use in this market within a short time, while fresh, which are caught in the waters of Lake Huron contiguous to the Dominion of Canada, and which are packed in ice for preservation while in transit from Goderich and other places in Canada to this port, this being the port of importation.

It has been the practice at this port to admit such fish free of duty as being "fresh fish for daily consumption" at or near the place of importation.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. TYLER,
Collector.

JUNE 27, 1877.

COLLECTOR CUSTOMS, Buffalo, N. Y.:

SIR: This Department is in receipt of your letter dated the 20th instant, stating that dealers in Buffalo import fish, for use in the market of that city, caught in the waters of Lake Huron, contiguous to the Dominion of Canada, and packed in ice for preservation while in transit from Goderich and other places in Canada to such market.

In reply to your inquiry whether these fish are subject to duty under the decision recently rendered by the United States circuit court at Detroit, Mich., you are informed that said decision related in express terms to fish only which have been frozen in barrels or in large pans in a solid mass or cakes prior to importation.

In this case it was shown to the satisfaction of the court that fish so frozen could be kept for a long period of time without material deterioration.

The mere fact that fish are packed in ice on importation ought not to exclude them from the operation of the provision in the free list for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." Satisfactory evidence is presented that they are intended for immediate consumption.

Fish, Fresh, for Immediate Consumption.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 23, 1883.

The attention of the Department has been recently brought to the fact that fresh fish are sometimes admitted free of duties, on the northern frontiers, in excessive quantities.

Under the existing regulations, importations of fish which will not probably be consumed immediately must be treated as dutiable; thus, in the case of the importation by a person of 162,269 pounds at Detroit, the action of the collector in assessing duties was affirmed.

The Department is informed that at Sandusky, Ohio, fresh fish caught in Canadian waters, varying in quantity from a few hundred pounds to several tons, are received and sold to dealers for shipment, or for consumption, and that such as remain on their hands are either frozen or salted for future use.

It has heretofore been the custom at the port last mentioned to allow such importations free of duties, and it is surmised that a similar practice has prevailed at other ports.

As the law authorizes the admission free of "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption" only, duties should be paid on any considerable surplus which may be preserved as aforesaid.

On the entry of such fish in any considerable quantity, if the collector of customs is in doubt whether the quantity is excessive, and therefore dutiable under the regulations established, he will require the importer to file an affidavit in the following form:

"I, _____, solemnly _____ that the fresh fish imported by me, and mentioned in the annexed entry, are for immediate consumption, and that no portion thereof is intended for preservation by salting, freezing, or otherwise.

"Sworn to before me this _____ day of _____, 188-.

"_____.

"Deputy Collector of Customs."

If in any case the quantity is so large as to repel the conclusion that the fish is for immediate consumption, duties will be levied; and when it shall appear to the collector that a portion only of any importation should be admitted free, he will exact duties upon the residue.

The attention of importers of such merchandise will be invited by the customs officers to the fact that any fraudulent action on their part, whereby such fish shall be illegally imported free of duties, will subject them to the penalties denounced by the statutes governing such cases.

H. F. FRENCH,
Acting Secretary.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS AND OTHERS.

CHICAGO, December 26, 1885.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,

Secretary of the United States Treasury, Washington D. C.:

Will you kindly inform what the duties (if any) on fresh fish from Canada? We are called on to pay at Port Huron $90 on a car load of frozen smelts, from New Brunswick; former years it was only an entry fee. Manitoba for past two years has flooded the western country with their fresh-water frozen fish duty free to injury of dealers and home fishermen, and propose doing the same this winter. We have never heard or read that there is any tax imposed by our Government on Canadian fish imported for "immediate consumption," but in fact they do not go into quick consumption, but are held in "freezers" for speculation, to injury of fish caught in United States waters. Many of these imported last winter were salted at Detroit and other points; some here. We understood last winter Canada intended to impose a one-half cent pound export duty to prevent her waters from being exhausted. American fishermen cannot fish in Canadian waters; the rights are all lot to Canadians, but they sell immense quantities of fish in this country to the great damage of American fishermen at different points on the lakes. At the Sault Saint Marie, Michigan, large quantities of fish were shipped from there caught by Canadians, at the Lizarda Islands, that were imported here, Detroit, and as far as Buffalo. The shippers swear they are for "immediate consumption," when in fact their condition is such much of it has to be salted in this country to save it from being a total loss. Will you kindly give us proper information if any duties have been imposed, and conditions if free fish?

Yours, truly,

LAFLIN & CO.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 29, 1885.

Messrs. LAFLIN & Co.,
40 State Street, Chicago, Ill.:

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your letter of the 26th instant, you are informed that while fresh fish imported for immediate consumption are entitled to free entry, yet that it would seem that such provision does not extend to a car load of frozen smelts, which it is understood are imported in a frozen condition for the purpose of preservation. Fish thus imported and not intended for immediate consumption are dutiable at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds, under the provisions of schedule "G" T. I., new 280, for "foreign-caught fish, * * * whether fresh," &c.

In case, however, you desire to have the question definitely decided by the Department, you can submit it by protest and appeal under section 2931 Revised Statutes, when it will be duly considered.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary.

CHICAGO, December 31, 1885.

DEAR SIR: We protest against your collection of Grand Trunk Railroad on or about the 26th this month, of a duty of $90.70, and express 50 cents on a car load of natural frozen smelts shipped by W. S. Loggie, Chatham, N. B., and consigned to us, the same being intended for immediate consumption. We have forwarded a duplicate to the Treasury Department at Washington.

Yours respectfully,

LAFLIN & CO.

UNITED STATES COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,

CHICAGO, December 31, 1885.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Sec'y of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: In accordance with letter dated December 29, 1885, from the Treasury Department, numbered 2296 e, we protested to the collector of customs at Port Huron, Mich., against charging duties on smelts consigned to us, and inclose a copy of protest to your Department for consideration. While we do not claim that the fish will be or are immediately sold for consumption on arrival at their destination, they are as much so as any natural frozen fish that comes in from Canada in the east, or Manitoba in the west, in large quantities, and if the fish from Manitoba are free fish the smelts should be, as each are frozen by weather and not in pans by ice and salt. Frozen fish imported from those places it is impossible to go into immediate consumption. They are preserved fish really by freezing, and are bought so, that different handlers can hold them in "freezers" until they can be sold at a profit, or during a supposed scarcity of fresh-caught fish, and they pass through several middle-men's hands before reaching the consumers. We would be glad to see a heavy duty on all Canadian fish, but if other importers get their duties remitted by protesting in time we wish to be one of them.

Yours, respectfully,

LAFLIN & CO.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, PORT HURON, MICH.,

Hon. D. MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 4th instant (J. G. M.), transmitting the appeal of Laflin & Co. from my assessment of duty on certain natural frozen smelts imported from Chatham, New Brunswick.

In this case the requirements of section 2931, Revised Statutes, have been complied with, and I have the honor to report the appeal is apparently based on the fact that the fish are "natural frozen."

I hold that the particular method of freezing for preservation can have no bearing upon the question whether fish can be imported free of duty. These importations are never in less than car-load lots of from 20,000 to 30,000 pounds; being in such quantities, therefore, as to preclude the idea of "use at or about the time of importation"—(S. 3062); which I hold properly construes the term "immediate consumption."

In both that and Laflin's case the object was preservation and future use. (S. 3181.)

But it seems unnecessary to pursue the subject. By section 6970 collectors of customs are instructed that fish of all kinds, the produce of the Dominion of Canada, imported after July 1, 1885, are liable to duty.

Inclosure returned.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1886.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Port Huron, Mich. :

Sir: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, reporting on the appeal, 9340m, of Messrs. Laflin & Co. from your assessment of duty on certain frozen smelts, imported by them from Chatham, N. B., on the 26th ultimo. You report that importations of this character never embrace less than from 20,000 to 30,000 pounds of fish, and that the quantity imported, and the fact that they can be kept for months in this condition, precludes the idea that they are intended for immediate consumption and entitled to free entry under the provision in the free list, act of March 3, 1883 (I. L. new, 699), for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

Your assessment of duty being in accordance with the Department's decisions of January 3, 1877 (S. 3062), and June 27, 1877 (S. 3280), is hereby affirmed.

The fact that the fish in question are frozen naturally and not by artificial methods, does not affect the question as to their being intended for immediate consumption.

Respectfully yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary.

LAFLIN & Co., No. 40 STATE STREET,
Chicago, January 22, 1886.

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Esq.,
Assistant Secretary Treasury :

DEAR SIR: Yours, 340 m, received with copy to collector at Port Huron on our appeal. We have another car in to-day the owner of which wishes us to protest against paying duty, but we think it useless. There are small lots of 1 ton and upwards that come in and are claimed to be for immediate consumption, but are not, as they are sold to smaller dealers, or held till retailed by importers, and cannot claim to be used up for food on their arrival. We ship oysters to Manitoba; the parties there claim they pay a Canadian duty of 10c. per gallon; the quantity taken at a time is for more immediate consumption than any lots of Canadian fish imported into this country.

Will the same ruling apply to the fresh fish caught in the lakes of Manitoba, naturally frozen there and shipped into this country via rail at Saint Vincent, Minn., or the other line of the Saint Paul, Minnesota and Manitoba Railroad? The Manitoba people seem to be posted, as they want offers for their fish in Winnipeg against their delivering here last winter. Some parties from there claim they pay no duty on deliveries in the East via Canada Pacific Railroad and Toronto; large quantities are claimed to be imported into Buffalo, to the damage of our lake fish.

During the summer heavy fishing is done in Canadian waters at the Lizzard Islands, north of Sault Ste. Marie, and on Huron and Georgian Bay, and imported in too large quantities to go into immediate consumption, but is held in this country as merchandise from three to ten days awaiting buyers that sell again to dealers before it reaches the consumer—many of them having to be salted here instead of on Canadian ground, to escape the duty on salt fish, and some of the stock is artificially frozen and held for winter use or sale. This class of fresh fish is packed in ice, when it comes in cars holding from 1,000 to 2,400 pounds, and sometimes as high as twenty large cars at one shipment. When they escape duties they are bad competitors from our own fisheries; as they get a class of labor cheaper and get their twine cheaper, they can undersell American-caught fish. During the winter contracts are usually made with the heavier fishermen on both sides for their season's catch, and the price paid the fisherman depends partially on whether those fish pay a duty or come in free.

The Manitoba fish mostly come in during winters in car-lots of 20,000 to 30,000 pounds, but they are gradually working in to shipping in summer packed in ice in fish cars like those via Sault Ste. Marie. If you can give us any information regarding duties now about the Manitoba frozen or the summer caught fish, it will help and benefit us and fishermen in our waters. We are in no way interested in fishing, and buy all we handle. We heartily wish the duty was 1 to 2 cents per pound.

Those Canadians flood us at times, making dealers and home fishermen alike lose money, while they do not benefit the consumer only for a few days at a time.

Yours, truly,

LAFLIN & CO.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,

Saint Vincent, Minn.:

SIR: The Department is in receipt of a letter, dated the 26th ultimo, from Messrs. Laflin & Co., No. 40 State street, Chicago, Ill., from which it would appear that large quantities of fresh fish caught in the lakes of Manitoba, and naturally frozen, are imported at your port free of duty as fresh fish for immediate consumption, whereas they are not in fact for immediate consumption, but are intended for sale to smaller dealers, or to be held for retail to consumers, by the importers. In connection therewith, I inclose for your information and guidance a copy of a letter addressed by the Department to the Collector at Port Huron, Mich., on the 20th instant, from which you will perceive that the fact that fish are frozen naturally, and not by artificial means, does not affect the question as to their being intended for immediate consumption.

Your attention is also especially directed to the last two paragraphs of Department's decision of May 23, 1883 (S. 5729), for your further guidance in such matters.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1886.

Messrs. LAFLIN & Co.,
No. 40 State street, Chicago, Ill.:

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your letter of the 22d instant, you are informed that the Department cannot pass upon the classification of "Manitoba frozen" and "summer-caught" fish in advance of their importation, and in the absence of protest and appeal from the decision of the collector of customs.

The question whether fish are fresh and for immediate consumption must be decided in each case by the collector in accordance with the rulings of the Department, and the facts as they can be ascertained.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary.

LAFLIN & CO., CHICAGO, February 4, 1886.

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: We inclose protest sent United States collector at Port Huron, to save Leggio the shipper, should other parties succeed in getting their duties refunded. We are in receipt of yours affirming the decision of collector at Port Huron; also yours of January 30, stating, in answer to our inquiries, that it was for the collectors at the Manitoba boundary and Sault Sainte Marie to decide if fish (fresh or frozen) in large lots were subject to duty. We do not know how to get at it unless we import fish, and if a duty is imposed appeal to the Department; but as the sellers want to sell at home, we cannot agree on a price unless we figure a duty same as on a lot of smelts. This the sellers are not willing to do. They claim they are shipping fresh fish in 20,000 lots into this country free of duty. We do not know where the customs are collected on importations from Manitoba into this country, or would write to collector; but it seems to us if the Port Huron collector is right, then all other custom-houses would be instructed to collect same duties on same class of goods. One importer claims he could bring his fish from Port Huron in bond to here. In such case, should the Chicago collector decide they were entitled to free entry, they would come in free, while those that pass at Port Huron would be at a disadvantage of one-half cent per pound (a large disadvantage to a wholesale dealer). There can be no such thing as tons of fish being for "immediate consumption." Fifty or a hundred pounds fish might be for immediate use, but larger quantities usually pass through many hands before reaching the consumer. Cannot this matter be taken up by the Department and a decision reached that will apply to all places of entry from Canada, either in fresh or frozen fish? We, and other dealers as well, cannot conduct our business intelligently when the matter is left for different collectors to determine what fish shall cost us, or what we shall sell at, as Canada fish are heavy competitors at times. A large amount of capital is invested in this country in boats, tugs, nets, freezing-houses, and large bodies of men are employed; all of which is useless if Canada fish can come in free and undersell us.

The lake fishing industry of the United States is much larger than most people are aware of, as no reliable statistics have ever been published. The men are hardy, fearless sailors. Their business is a precarious one, and none of them average more than a living for themselves and families, excepting those having large capital that fish heavily; they have successful years, and make some money in the long run.

Yours, respectfully,

LAFLIN & CO.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to call the Department's attention to the decisions which have been made upon appeals from the assessment of duty at Port Huron and elsewhere upon fresh fish imported during the cold weather in a frozen condition, from Nova Scotia and Canada, for immediate consumption in the large markets of the country.

The collector at Port Huron has been following a decision of January 20, 1886, upon an appeal of Laffin & Co., Chicago, on frozen smelts from Chatham.

Certain clients of mine, Messrs. A. Booth & Son, J. D. McNab & Co., G. S. Sloan, and R. B. Boak, being largely interested in the importation of fresh fish for immediate consumption, have brought in several large lots of smelts, trout, and herring at Port Huron, on all of which a duty has been collected, principally, as I am led to believe, on the ground that the importations "never embrace less than 20,000 to 30,000 pounds of fish, and that the quantity imported and the fact that they can be kept for months in this condition precludes the idea that they are intended for immediate consumption." (See letter of collector, Port Huron, January 19, 1886.)

One of the principal difficulties experienced in securing from the Department a proper decision upon an appeal, is believed to be the failure on the part of appraisers and collectors to inform the Department of the facts in any particular case fully and in such a manner as to enable the Department to come to a proper understanding of the question presented. In this case the Department has been led into error, it seems, on account of the collector having stated conclusions formed favorable to the assessment of duty rather than a fair arrangement of facts, from which the Secretary could come to a decision within the meaning and intent of the law.

With a view to obtain, if possible, a reconsideration of this fresh-fish question, I have the honor to suggest that the decisions cited in Department letter on Lafin's appeal, viz, 3062 and 3280, do not apply to the facts as they exist in these cases to which I desire to call attention. S. S. 3062 is a case of fish frozen by a patent preserving process, by means of which they may be kept for a long time. S. S. 3280 and Judge Brown's decision are upon a case disclosing the fact that the fish had been frozen "in barrels or in large pans in a solid mass or cake." We import many thousand pounds of such fish so frozen every year, and have never objected to the payment of duty thereon. The fact is, and the collector should have so stated to the Department, that the fish of Lafin, Booth, McNab, Sloan, and Baak are taken in the waters of Halifax, and as soon as they are out of the water freeze stiff on the ice, from where they are picked up and merely thrown loose into barrels and boxes. They are not covered with water and frozen in the barrels or boxes, but, as I say, each individual fish, already frozen, is thrown into the barrels like so many pieces of kindling wood.

Of course, it is only during very cold weather that the fish for immediate consumption can be so transported and got to market in large quantities. Almost all of these fish are sold for consumption in the various markets which are supplied from Chicago long before they arrive, and the shippers have to run the risk of getting them into the market in weather cold enough to preserve them fresh. It is very rare that we have seven days of continuous freezing weather here, and as the fish are caught in a much colder climate, a slight thaw often ruins large quantities of them even before arrival in Chicago.

The collector at Port Huron is in error in stating that the quantities are too large for immediate consumption, as the facts will show. Messrs. Booth & Son are believed to be the largest fish dealers in the United States; they have fish houses in all of the large cities of the West, supplying therefrom the hotels, restaurants, and public generally, and the supply at no time during the coldest weather is more than equal to the demand. They ship from Chicago as high as forty tons of fresh fish by rail during a single week, and the other dealers whose names I have given are very large dealers in fresh fish. They never salt a single fish, and it is fair to assert that not a hundred pounds of the fish imported by them in the manner I have stated are kept on hand for more than a day or two. They are not sold to curers of fish, but go immediately to the tables of the consumers in every city and town accessible by rail from Chicago to Denver. These importations are but a small part of the fresh fish daily consumed in this and adjacent cities. This is the main distributing point, and of course the cold weather is availed of to import the fish in the freshest condition possible.

This is not a doubtful question, and one which justifies a decision in favor of the Treasury, thus to compel the importer if aggrieved to appeal to the courts for correction. The law doubtless means just what those in trade and commerce mean when they say that fish are fresh, and for immediate consumption, viz, that they are to be eaten before undergoing any process calculated to preserve them for future consumption, either of salting, freezing, or smoking. It cannot be that Congress intended fish for immediate consumption should be consumed within the immediate precincts of the custom-house. They are brought many hundred miles before being passed through the custom-house, and the law does not limit the extent of territory which they many traverse, after having been passed through the collector's office, before being consumed. These fish are treated as perishable and are not admitted to the benefits of the immediate-transportation act; hence it is quite clear that there is no consistency between such treatment and the report of the collector. It cannot be supposed that the law is so absurd as to refer only to an occasional string of fish caught with a hook in the waters about Port Huron, or within range of the custom-house there. The importers of these fish are merchants employing enormous capital in their business, and are disposed to deal fairly and honorably with the Treasury Department, and do not think that the great extent of their business should be made a ground for depriving them of the privileges enjoyed by those who are able to import only a few pounds of fish for their immediate use at the place of importation.

There is no uniformity of practice in this business, it seems, from a case which I am informed was brought to the Department's attention on the Massachusetts coast. Last summer the cargo of the schooner Nesketin, of Lockeport, Nova Scotia, was entered at Gloucester, Mass. It consisted of fresh halibut for immediate consumption, and the collector assessed duty upon it, but the Department ordered a reliquidation of so much of the fish as were found to be fresh. Some portions which were sold to smokers were assessed a duty. We hear of fresh fish for immediate consumption being imported in the eastern parts in large quantities, compared with some of which our importations are quite insignificant. They are passed as free, and very properly so. And we do not believe the Department would have applied the decisions 3062 and 3290 to these cases of ours if the collector had not thrown up his hands in holy horror at the idea of any nation being able to consume 20,000 pounds of smelts in one importation.

We do not want to resort to the courts in these cases. They are too plain for argument; but if the Department will consider them I will procure sworn statements of the extent of the fresh-fish traffic in Chicago carried on by my clients, and transmit them to you in order that you may be able to judge whether in this case the "punishment fits the crime."

Awaiting your reply, I am, very respectfully,

PERCY L. SHUMAN,
Attorney for A. Booth et al.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1886.

Mr. PERCY L. SHUMAN,
12 Borden Block, Chicago, Ill.:

SIR: The Department duly received your letter of the 9th instant, relative to the assessment of duty by the collector at Port Huron, Mich., upon certain fresh fish, so called, imported in a frozen condition from Nova Scotia and Canada, for alleged immediate consumption in the large markets of the country. After a careful consideration of the arguments submitted, the Department sees no occasion for any action in the matter.

The question as to whether fresh fish are for immediate consumption is one to be determined in the first instance by the collector at the port of arrival, who must be guided in such cases by the circumstances surrounding each importation and Department's decisions heretofore rendered in similar cases. It is the opinion of the Department that the term "immediate consumption" cannot be construed to have a different meaning for the several reasons, and an importation of fish, so extensive in quantity as to require days for its distribution to the various markets, and which accordingly could not be considered as for immediate consumption in the warmer season, cannot, by reason of continued low temperature at another season, be considered as entitled to additional privileges in consequence thereof. As stated, the collector at the port of importation must be the judge in the first instance as to whether any particular importation falls within the provision of the free-list, and the Department cannot undertake upon a general statement of the practice in such matters to establish any other rule for his guidance.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Assistant Secretary.

Sir: On the 18th of December, 1885, we imported from the British Provinces 100 barrels mackerel by the Boston and Maine Railroad, entering the same at the custom-house here and paying duty, and at same time filed our protest and appeal, as has been our custom on all entries of fish since July last.

On the 1st of this month we were notified by the custom-house authorities that by a recent decision of the Treasury Department no more protests would be received until final liquidation of the entries, and then only within ten days of said liquidation.

To-day we are notified that the protest made on the above entry is rejected, and as the entry was liquidated February 1, we are barred from renewing the protest, the ten days having expired. We have not yet received from your Department the customary notice referring us to the collector here for a decision on our appeal in this case.

We would respectfully ask whether we should be barred from our right of protest and appeal under the above circumstances.

On the 20th January, 1886, I made a shipment of fresh frozen fish for immediate consumption to Chicago, Ill.—invoice No. 40, value $330.10; Mr. Ingalls, collector at Port Huron, through whose care car was sent, as per instructions from your consul-general and railway authorities. On the car arriving at Port Huron it was detained and duty demanded, which my consignee in Chicago had to remit to Port Huron before your authorities would allow car to proceed. This caused a delay of several days, which will be a heavy loss to me beside the duty which was unlawfully collected; but I presume it will be promptly returned to me or my agent in Chicago when it is properly brought to your notice. An early reply is solicited.

DEAR SIR: We have no answer from you to ours of February 4. We have written to collectors at Saint Vincent, Minn., and Sault Saint Marie, Mich. The former decides that fish in large quantities are subject to duty of 50 cents on the 100th. The latter says "he will likely continue the practice of passing fresh fish free for immediate consumption until otherwise ordered by the Department." The fish entered at that place for import to United States are in such quantities as to preclude the idea of immediate consumption, their shipments from them ranging from 1, 2, and 3 tons to 20 tons, twice a week, to this port, and probably as much more for Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland, and other places, all of which do not go into immediate consumption, but pass through several hands before reaching consumers. Next month many fishermen come in to contract their season's catch, and it is important to both buyer and seller to know if Canadian fresh fish packed in ice in large quantities are subject to duty or not.

Hoping for an early reply, we are,

Sir: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, in regard to the importation at Port Huron, Mich., of frozen fish and of duties levied thereon.

In reply I transmit herewith a copy of a letter dated the 20th ultimo, addressed to the collector of customs at Port Huron, in regard to a similar case, and have to inform you that, as understood by the Department, the action of the collector at Port Huron, in assessing duty upon your importation, was in accordance with the usual practice in such cases.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Port Huron, Mich.:

Sir: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, submitting the following appeals from your assessment of duty on certain frozen fish, imported at your port, viz: 29440, C. A. Ingalls, January 9, 1886; 29450, E. W. Bromilow & Co., January 26, 1886; 29460, G. C. Sloan, January 30, 1886; 29470, R. B. Boak, January 30, 1886; 29480, R. B. Boak, February 3, 1886; 29490, C. A. Ingalls, February 8, 1886. You report that the importations are similar in character to that of Mr. C. A. Ingalls, covered by the Department's decision of the 20th ultimo (not published).

The claim of the appellants that the fish in question are exempt from duty under the provision in the free list, act of March 3, 1883 (T. I. new 699), for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," is therefore rejected, and your assessment of duty thereon affirmed.

Respectfully, yours,

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Marquette, Mich.:

Sir: I transmit herewith a letter from Messrs. Ladin & Co., of Chicago, dated the 20th ultimo, in which it is stated that the practice at Sault St. Marie, in your district, is to admit free of duty as "fresh fish for immediate consumption," large quantities of frozen fish, ranging from one to twenty tons per importation, for transportation to Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland, and other places.

I also enclose, for your information and guidance in such matters, copy of Department's letter of January 20, last, to the collector of customs at Port Huron, Mich., on similar importations at that port, and I will thank you to return the first-named enclosure, with a report thereon, at your early convenience.

MESSRS. LAYLIN & CO.,
40 State street, Chicago, Ill.:

GENTLEMEN: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 4th ultimo, with inclosure, and also your letter dated the 28 ultimo, in the matter of the alleged illegal importations of frozen fish at Sault St. Marie.

The inclosure (appeal) has been forwarded to the collector at Port Huron, Mich., for his report thereon, on receipt of which the matter will be duly determined.

Respecting the allegation that fish are illegally imported at Sault St. Marie, you are informed that a communication has this day been addressed to the collector of said district at Marquette, Mich., calling for a report as to the practice in question, on receipt of which such steps will be taken as are necessary to secure uniformity at the various ports of importation in such matters.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: Respectfully referring to Department letter (J. G. M.) of the 27th ultimo, inclosing a copy of the Department's decision of the 20th of January, 1886, on the appeal (9340^m) involving the classification for duty of certain frozen smelts imported into the port of Port Huron, I desire to be instructed whether, under said decision, fish imported in a frozen condition are to be excluded from the category of "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," under T. I., new, 699, irrespective of the quantity contained in any given importation.

The Department cites S. S. 3062 and 3280 of 1877. Was it the intention of the Department in its decision of January 20, 1886, to overrule that of May 23, 1883 (S. S. 5729), or is that to be regarded as still operative under which it is understood that fish, although frozen naturally, are entitled to free entry, provided the quantity is not "so large as to repel the conclusion that the fish is for immediate consumption"?

I would add that the requirements of S. S. 5729 have been rigidly enforced at this port.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. SALTONSTALL,
Collector.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 9th instant, you are informed that it was not the intention of the Department's decision of the 20th of January last, concerning the classification of frozen smelts imported into the port of Port Huron, Mich., to revoke the decision of May 23, 1883, under which fish, although frozen, are entitled to free entry (when imported in limited quantities) as fish, fresh, for immediate consumption. It is only when fresh fish in the frozen condition are imported in excessive quantities, and for purposes other than immediate consumption, that they are excluded from free entry.

SIR: I shipped a car-load of frozen herring on January 15, consigned to Messrs. E. W. Brownlow & Co., of Chicago. After they arrived at Port Huron the collector would not allow the car to proceed until the duties, amounting to $101.60, were paid, which I did pay under protest. At the same time frozen herring were being admitted into the United States at Eastport free.

I therefore cannot see why a distinction should be made between an inland port and a sea-board one.

I would respectfully ask for a return of the amount of duties paid by me.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

G. L. YOUNG, Esq.,
St. John, N. B. :

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 14th inst., alleging a difference in the classification at inland and seaboard ports of frozen herring, you are informed that the action of the customs officials at the several ports is governed by the provision of the existing tariff acts, and that importers aggrieved thereby have ample remedy by protest and appeal, as prescribed by section 2931, Revised Statutes.

I will state, however, that frozen herring are not ipso facto dutiable either at Eastport or at Port Huron, their non-dutiable character being dependent upon the fact of their being fresh and for immediate consumption.

Otherwise they are dutiable, and the question in each case must be determined by the collector at the port of importation, subject to review by the Department, on protest and appeal as aforesaid, if importers so desire.

Respectfully, yours,

Also that while imported herring are assessed for duty when imported in lots larger than 500 pounds each, whitefish and trout are admitted free.

C. H. CALL, Esq.,
Collector of Customs, Marquette:

DETROIT, MICH., April 19, 1886.

DEAR SIR: We are informed by your deputy at the "Soo" that he has been instructed to collect a duty of 50 cents per 100 pounds on all consignments of fresh fish imported at the "Soo" over 500 pounds in weight.

Is this order intended to cover whitefish and trout for immediate consumption, or only for fresh herring? We were led to believe from the tone of his letter that it also covered the former, but we think he has misconstrued your instructions.

It is the custom of the collector at this port, Mr. Livingston, to levy one-half cent per pound on herring in larger than 500-pound lots, but he informs me that whitefish and trout will be this, as in former years, admitted free of duty. He also informs us that the same rule is observed at Port Huron and the districts east of here.

SIR: Paragraph entry of "fish, fresh" provides that "for or provided for." Under the former, admitting to free entry or packed in ice, country, where the out further processes considered as for importation and in this connection such proportions, termination by the collector for immediate consumption at the provision in article rate of fifty cents imported otherwise been suggested to be preserved in ice which are not intended for the port of arrival. Each has not been taken into which the action is respectfully.

Respectfully,

We were well aware of the law exacting a duty on herring, but our collector knows of no Department order directing a duty on fresh white and trout in any quantity.

We are quite extensively interested in importing fish (white and trout only) at the "Soo," and naturally wish to have this matter adjusted before we commence operations there, as it would be a serious disadvantage to us to be compelled to pay a duty there while our competitors are entering them here free.

Trusting that if your deputy at the "Soo" has misconstrued your order, you will have it speedily rectified, we remain,

Respectfully, yours,

S. H. DAVIS & CO.

DETROIT, MICH., April 16, 1886.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington:

DEAR SIR: We have been informed by your deputy collector at Sault Saint Marie that he has been instructed to collect a duty of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound on all consignments of fresh fish entered at that point over 500 pounds in weight and coming from Canada.

We wish to know whether this order is a general one at all ports of entry or simply confined to this one port? We ask because fish are now being entered from Canada at this port in 4 and 5 ton consignments free of duty.

We are extensively interested in the "Soo," and naturally protest against paying duty there unless the same tax is levied at all other points, viz: Cheboygan, Port Huron, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, &c., all of which ports are now entering fish free of duty.

Last season all of our fish from Canada (that is, fresh and for immediate consumption) came over free of duty; and, if not asking too much, would like to know the cause of this reversal.

This is a matter of serious importance to us, and an early solution of our trouble is earnestly solicited.

Very respectfully,

S. H. DAVIS & CO.

J.G.M.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., June 16, 1886.

TO THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY:

SIR: Paragraph 699 of the "free list," act of March 3, 1883, provides for the free entry of "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," while paragraph 280 of the same act provides that "foreign-caught fish, whether fresh," &c., "not specially enumerated or provided for," shall be dutiable at the rate of fifty cents per one hundred pounds.

Under the former provision a practice has arisen, at most of the frontier ports, of admitting to free entry quantities of Canadian fish imported in cars and vessels, frozen or packed in ice, which are intended for distribution to the various large cities of this country, where they are either immediately disposed of or placed on ice to be sold without further process of preservation. The question as to whether fish so imported can be considered as for immediate consumption is respectfully submitted for your consideration, and in this connection I desire to state that the practice has at several ports grown to such proportions, ranging from 500 pounds to several tons per shipment, that the determination by the collector in such instance of whether such quantity can be considered as for immediate consumption is extremely difficult, and has resulted in a wide range of decisions at the several ports, unsatisfactory alike to officers and importers. The provision in article 280 for foreign "caught fish, fresh," assessing duty thereon at the rate of fifty cents per hundred pounds, would seem to indicate that such fish when imported otherwise than for immediate consumption should pay duty. A rule has been suggested to the effect that all importations of fresh fish which are intended to be preserved in ice and sent in refrigerator cars or otherwise to other localities, and which are not intended for consumption on or about the time of importation, and at or near the port of arrival, should be held as dutiable under the paragraph last named. Such has not been the practice heretofore, but in view of the unsettled condition of affairs into which the present practice has brought the importation of fresh fish, your opinion is respectfully requested as to what rule can safely be adopted in the premises.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

The TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: On the 14th of April last I wrote you concerning a car-load of fresh herring shipped by me to Chicago for immediate consumption on the 15th of January, present year.

They arrived at Port Huron on 26th and were entered for immediate consumption, and duties amounting to $101.60 were paid.

On January 28, C. A. Ingalls, acting as agent for the consignees, E. W. Bromibon & Co., of Chicago, filed protest and appeal, which the collector at Port Huron informs me were forwarded to the Department at Washington on February 12, 1886.

As you have given me to understand in your favor of 24th April that the duties would be refunded if the fish were entered for immediate consumption and protest duly filed;

That being the case, and not having received any remittance, Mr. Murray, our A. M. consul, advised me to write you again, and consequently have taken that liberty.

Yours, respectfully,

G. L. YOUNG.

D 144-279.] Washington, D. C., July 20, 1886.

Mr. G. L. YOUNG,
St. John, N. B.:

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 15th instant, you are informed that the protest and appeal of Mr. C. A. Ingalls, covering an importation of frozen herring by E. W. Bromibon, of Chicago, January 28, 1886, was duly received, and the action of the collector at Port Huron in said case affirmed by Department's letter of February 27 last.

You are also informed that the "immediate consumption" required by the tariff in order to enable fresh fish to be imported free of duty is not complied with by the withdrawal of fish under a "consumption" entry, but, as stated in said letter, the question whether such fish are for immediate consumption must be determined in each case by the collector at the port of importation, subject to review by the Department, as in this case, on protest and appeal.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C., September 7, 1886.

SIR: I have considered the question presented by your letter of June 16 last, in regard to the rule that should govern in the admission to free entry of fresh fish for immediate consumption.

In the free list of the act of March 3, 1883 (T. L., 699), provision is made for the free entry of "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." By another clause of the same act duty at the rate of 50 cents per 100 pounds is assessed (T. L., 280) on "foreign-caught fish imported otherwise than in barrels or half-barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried, salted, or pickled not specially enumerated or provided for in this act." It is stated that a practice has arisen at most of the frontier ports of admitting to free entry quantities of Canadian fish imported in cars and vessels, frozen or packed in ice, which are intended for distribution to the large cities of this country, where they are either immediately disposed of or placed on ice to be sold without further process of preservation. It is also stated that a rule has been suggested to the effect that all importations of fresh fish intended to be preserved in ice and transported as above stated, with no intention of consumption on or about the time of importation and at or near the port of arrival, should be held dutiable under the provision last mentioned herein. The question as to the meaning of immediate consumption within the intent of the act of Congress is a difficult one in this connection. Foreign-caught fish imported fresh are dutiable, and fresh fish imported for immediate consumption are free of duty. These two provisions must be reconciled. In the tariff act of 1870 the language applicable to the free entry of this article was "fish, fresh, caught from daily consumption." This continued until the act of 1870 included it in the free list as "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." It was brought into the Revised Statutes according to the latter description, and was so re-enacted in the tariff act of 1883, now in force. By the use of the term "immediate" no change was intended from the former condition expressed by the term "daily." These two terms are interchangeable as here used. They both relate to current time. Where Congress has not defined the meaning of terms used, or has not limited or qualified them, it does not become the executive officers of the Government to limit or qualify them beyond their ordinarily accepted or popular meaning. The fish to be imported free must be fresh, that is, not salted, smoked, pickled, or preserved. The fact that they are packed in ice has no significance in determining this question. Neither does the quantity in any one importation signify anything, nor the distance to which it may be the purpose to transport them. The collector at the port of arrival should judge from all the circumstances as to their character and whether they are for immediate consumption, that is, whether they are brought into the country to supply the present demand of the market; whether they are to become at once a part of the daily food supply for the people; not that they are to be eaten the same day of arrival or the next day, but are brought in with this expectation or possibility in view. The illustration given by the collector at Detroit of large importations of whitefish, lake trout, &c., at once dispatched to different large cities, viz, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Saint Louis, &c., in fish cars packed with ice, to be laid down in the market of those cities and sold at the earliest possible time, seems to me to afford a circumstance favorably disposing of the question in the particular case. The evident object of the special provision is a beneficent one, namely, to supply the immediate necessities of the people with an article of subsistence easily and cheaply procured. And this consideration may go far toward solving the question.

Whatever doubt there may be, however, from want of comprehension in the language used must be solved in favor of the importer and consumer, for taxes are never to be assessed on a doubtful interpretation of the law.

I conclude with the remark that no precise rule can be laid down which limits the quantity of the fish imported or the time in which the fish are to be consumed. The evident purpose, the character of the article, and the circumstances alone must be considered as governing the customs officer.

Very respectfully,

A. McCUE, Solicitor.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., September 10, 1886.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Port Huron, Mich.:

SIR: The subject of the free importation of fresh fish for immediate consumption (T. L. new, 699) has been carefully considered by the Department with a view to securing uniformity in the practice thereunder at the several ports on the northern frontier.

Referring to your letter of April 29th last, reporting the practice at your port in such cases, I have to state that it appears from a report received from the collector of customs at Detroit (copy herewith) that the limitation of 500 pounds, as established at his port, applies only to herring, larger quantities of which, when imported at his port, are presumed to be intended for salting or preserving, as they cannot be disposed of for immediate consumption. The reasons governing his action would appear to be sufficient at his port, but may or may not be equally applicable at ports in your district or elsewhere on the northern frontier.

The same is true regarding the rule at that port admitting whitefish and trout to free entry when imported in "any quantities." No positive rule can be established for the guidance of customs officers at the several ports. They must in each instance be governed by the facts surrounding the importation and the practice of importers at their particular port.

The Department, however, is of the opinion that where fish cannot be utilized in the quantities imported for food purposes without salting or some process of preserving which will take from them their distinctive character as "fresh fish," duty should be assessed. In such condition they are not fish fresh for immediate consumption, under paragraph 699 of the free list, but are foreign-caught fish * * * fresh, * * * within the meaning of T. L. new, 289.

In other cases, customs officers must be governed as stated by the facts surrounding the particular importation, but it is suggested that in assessing duty in such cases care should be taken to make the practice correspond as near as possible at the several ports.

As a general rule, fish which are to be consumed in the condition as caught, without salting or preserving, may be considered as falling within the provisions of paragraph 699.

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

L., new, 749).

No other or further rule for your guidance in the matter of the classification of fresh fish for immediate consumption, when imported by others than American citizens, can be given than is contained in Department's instructions to you of the 9th instant. (See par. 5, Cir. No. 124, Sept. 11.)

CUSTOM-HOUSE, PORT HURON, MICH.,
Collector's Office, September 16, 1886.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of Department letter (J. G. M.), dated September 10, 1886, inclosing letter received from the collector at Detroit upon the subject of free importations of fresh fish for immediate consumption, the object of the communication being to secure uniformity of practice thereunder at the several ports on the northern frontier.

In reply, I have to state that the practice at this port and at Detroit appears to be the same so far as affects the importation of herring, viz, to permit free importations, for reasons stated, of any quantity not exceeding 500 pounds.

But, contrary to the practice of my predecessor here, the collector at Detroit permits free entry upon proper oath of any quantity of white fish or trout, upon the ground that these fish are more valuable in a fresh state, and therefore not likely to be disposed of in any other condition.

He further states that they are imported in large ice-boxes, placed in refrigerators and shipped to all parts of the country, and he considers fish so preserved and shipped to New York, and sold on the markets there, to be as much "fresh fish for immediate consumption" as if retailed on the streets of Detroit.

I fail to find any regulations to sustain this opinion. On the contrary, S. S. 3062 and 3181, directed to the collector at Detroit, as well as S. 5729, seem to me to preclude such idea.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Port Huron, Mich.:

Sir: The Department duly received your letter of the 16th ultimo relative to a variance existing between the practice at the port of Detroit and that hitherto in vogue at your port regarding the importation of whitefish and trout in a fresh state, and for immediate consumption.

The Department is unable to give any more positive instructions than were contained in its letter of the 10th ultimo, the concluding paragraph of which states that as a general rule fish which are to be consumed in the condition as caught, without salting or preserving, may be considered as falling within the provisions of paragraph 692, T. Collector's Office, October 19, 1886.

Sir: Messrs. Abbott Brothers, of Dexter, in the State, are engaged, or are about to engage, in the business of importing into the United States fresh fish of different kinds in a frozen state.

Their process of preparing the fish is to store them in rooms which are kept at low temperature by galvanized iron pipes which are filled with salt and ice. This mode of freezing is not patented, and is an invention of their own.

They operate at Mangaree Harbor, Cape Breton, and they wish to be informed whether fish prepared in this manner will be liable to a duty of one-half a cent per pound, the same as those prepared or frozen by patent process in Canada.

I would respectfully ask for the decision of the Department in relation to this matter.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Bangor, Me.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 19th instant, relative to the dutiable character of fresh fish frozen by a new unpatented process which it is proposed to import at your port from Cape Breton, you are referred to Department's decision of the 10th ultimo (S. 7746), in which it is stated that customs officers must be governed by the facts surrounding each particular importation, but that, as a general rule, fish which are to be consumed in the condition as caught, without salting or preserving, may be considered as falling within the provisions of paragraph 699 for "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

The fact that these fish are to be frozen by a process different from the patent process heretofore in vogue would not seem to affect their dutiable character. Frozen fish which have been intentionally frozen in order to preserve them have been heretofore held to be subject to duty—see Department's decisions of January 3, 1877 (S. 3062) and June 27, 1877 (S. 3280)—the United States circuit court, in its decision therein cited, having expressed the opinion that such fish, while undoubtedly fresh, could not be considered as intended for immediate consumption.

This rule would seem to apply to the fish covered by your letter of inquiry.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

No. 65 WALL STREET,
New York, November 5, 1886.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: As attorneys for several importers of fresh fish, we desire to be informed, if not inconsistent with the practice of your Department, of your decision touching the matters hereinafter referred to.

A large fleet of American fishing schooners leave Gloucester, Mass., early in December and rendezvous at the fishing grounds in open sea off Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, to catch herring. The crews are employed in catching the fish, and the master, if opportunity offers, purchases from the fishing yawls surrounding the fleet. The temperature ranges about 20 degrees below zero, and the fish as they are caught are allowed to remain on the deck, and in a short time are frozen stiff, and at nightfall are shoveled into the hold. As soon as about 700 barrels in bulk of these "fresh frozen herring" are on board, the schooners leave perchance for this port, where the fish is immediately unloaded and sold to hucksters for about 2 to 3 cents per pound.

We have given you above an account of how the "fresh frozen herring" are caught and brought to this market, and we desire to be informed if you do not consider these fresh frozen herring "fish fresh for immediate consumption," and as such free of duty.

Your Department has lately made several decisions as to fresh fish, and the trade are naturally somewhat nervous. They have been for many years past admitted to free entry. Do you know of any reason why they should be deemed dutiable?

Thanking you in anticipation, we are sir,

No. 65 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.:

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your letter of the 5th instant, in which you enquire as to the dutiable character of herring, which may be brought to American ports in American fishing schooners in a frozen condition, the result of the fish having been left over night on deck, I have to state that the Department does not make a practice of answering hypothetical questions of this character.

I enclose, however, a copy of Department's decisions of September 10, 1886 (S. 7746), and invite your attention to the last paragraph thereof.

The circumstances surrounding each importation will have to be taken into consideration by the collectors at the ports of arrival, but the fact that fish are frozen is not sufficient in itself to make them dutiable if the other circumstances surrounding the importation are sufficient to establish the fact that they are imported fresh for immediate consumption (see S. 7837).

WHAT ARE AMERICAN FISHERIES?

No. 1.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., August 13, 1873.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Salem, Mass.:

SIR: In reply to your letters of the 8th and 9th instant, requesting instructions in regard of the dutiable character of the cargo of the American fishing schooner Isaac Rich, which cleared from your port on the 21st of April last, I have to say that the portion of the fish caught by the crew of said vessel or by men employed by the captain for that purpose, as well as the oil extracted therefrom, is free of duty under the act of March 2, 1861, which exempts from duty "Oil, spermaceti whale and other fish of American fisheries, and all other articles the produce of such fisheries." The herring and other portion of the cargo purchased by the captain, and not caught by men employed by the captain for that purpose, cannot be considered as the produce of American fisheries, and are therefore not exempt from duty; neither is the salt used in curing the same exempt from duty, as said herring, &c., where not taken by a vessel licensed to engage in the fisheries.

A copy of this letter will be sent to the collector at Boston, where the salt was withdrawn, for his information.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

No. 2.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1873.

HON. T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, inclosing a communication from John O'Malley, of La Pointe, Wis., making the following inquiries in regard to American vessels fishing upon Lake Superior, viz:

(1) Can an American vessel engaged in fishing upon the northern shores of Lake Superior, in Canadian waters, with American twine and American labor, salt the fish upon the vessel and bring them into the United States free of duty?

(2) Does an American vessel engaged in fishing or the coasting trade, on clearing for a Canadian port become liable to tonnage tax?

In reply to the first question I have to state that neither the treaty of Washington nor any other treaty with Great Britain authorizes American fishermen to fish upon the northern shores of Lake Superior, or provide that fish there caught shall be entitled to free entry into the United States.

Such fish, however, caught by permission of the Canadian Government, express or implied, on American vessels and salted therein, would be duty free on entry under the provision in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes for "the produce of American fisheries," and the decision of the Department contained in a letter to the collector of customs at Boston under date of the 22d of January, 1869, to the following effect: "If foreign salt is used without the limits of the United States in curing fish of American catch, the fish are not thereby rendered dutiable, nor is the salt so used liable to duty."

"If salt purchased abroad for the curing of fish is not consumed in the curing, but is brought into an American port, the salt would then be liable to duty, but the fish of American catch, cured with such foreign salt, before importation, are free of duty."

To the second question I answer that a vessel engaged in fishing or the coasting trade does not become liable to tonnage tax on clearing for a foreign port.

SIR: The question has arisen in regard to what proof is accepted by collectors of customs to show that oil and bone, claimed to be the products of American fisheries, are really such products, when brought into American ports by vessels other than those employed in the catch.

Vessels entering Saint Lawrence Bay, on the Siberian coast, laden with the products of American fisheries, there transship their cargoes to other vessels. There is no consular officer and no American citizen resident there. It is proposed to have the captain and mate of the vessel actually catching the cargo certify upon the transshipment the facts in the case, and the question is whether such certificate can be properly accepted as conclusive.

I will thank you to report your views in regard thereto at an early date.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
San Francisco, Cal. :

SIR: I inclose herewith a copy of a letter dated the 30th ultimo from Mr. J. M. Bartlett, stating that certain cargoes consisting of the products of American fisheries are expected to arrive at your port.

The following telegram has been sent to you to-day in regard to the matter:

"Allow free entry of merchandise per barks Legal Tender and Jenny Pitts, if satisfied it is product of American fisheries, and that regulation evidence is unattainable."

The application is favorably indorsed by the collector of customs at New Bedford, and the parties concerned propose to furnish evidence substantially complying with what required by circular of the 13th of June last.

Should there, in your opinion, be any good reason why free entry of the merchandise should not be allowed, you will please report the fact to the Department.

Very respectfully,

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1878.

Mr. T. W. FERRY,
United States Senate:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 15th instant, inquiring whether a citizen of Michigan engaged in fishing in Lake Superior can cure his fish upon Canadian soil, and afterwards send them to the United States upon steamers plying between the United States and Canada.

The right to cure fish on a foreign shore in certain cases is recognized by the act of Washington, and such curing would not be considered by this Department as depriving fish of their right to free entry as the produce of American fisheries under section 2505 of the Revised Statutes.

The free entry of the produce of American fisheries brought into the United States from a foreign place, in a vessel other than the one in which the fish were taken, is authorized by the Regulations of this Department, of which a copy is inclosed herewith, for your further information.

Fish caught, cured, and imported as you describe may therefore be admitted to free entry if, as is presumed to be the case, they were taken in a vessel enrolled and licensed for the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Chelsea, Mass.:

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, stating that you propose to fit out a vessel to engage in taking turtle in the Gulf of Mexico, and inquiring whether turtle so taken would be subject to duty on importation into the United States.

In reply you are informed that the free list of the Revised Statutes exempts from duty spermaceti, whale, and other fish oil of American fisheries and all other articles the produce of such fisheries.

Turtles caught by vessels properly documented under the laws of the United States would be regarded by this Department as the produce of American fisheries, and therefore free of duty.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Duluth, Minn.:

SIR: This Department is in receipt of a communication from Special Agent John Douglass, stating that fish caught by United States fishermen in United States vessels will be imported at your port from Prince Arthur's Landing, Canada, in steamers, and their free entry requested. He therefore inquires—

(1) Whether vessels of 25 feet in length may engage in the business?

(2) What proof is necessary that the fish were caught in American vessels, there being no United States consular officer at Prince Arthur's Landing?

(3) Whether, if the fish are cured with foreign salt, they may be admitted free?

The Department has to state: (1) that if the vessel is properly documented as a vessel of the United States her length is not material; that if not so documented the fish would be dutiable; (2) that the proof necessary that the fish were caught in a vessel of the United States is specified in the inclosed circular of the Department, dated the 13th of June, 1877; and (3) that the fact of the fish being cured with foreign salt will not render them subject to duty.

Very respectfully,
By order:

H. F. FRENCH,
Assistant Secretary.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, in which you inquire whether lobsters caught in Canadian waters by fishermen on board an American vessel licensed for the fisheries may be cured in domestic tin cans on board the vessel and brought to the United States free of duty.

In reply you are informed that, in the opinion of the Department, neither the shell-fish nor the packages in question would be subject to duty under any provision of law.

Very respectfully,

By order:

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Boston, Mass. :

Sir: The Department has duly considered the appeal (7648 g) of Messrs. Wendell & Phillips from your assessment of duty at the rate of one dollar per barrel on 132 barrels of herring imported into your port from St. Pierre, Miquelon. The appellants claim that the fish in question were caught in Fortune Bay, Newfoundland.

The only evidence in support of the claim that the herring were the product of the Newfoundland fisheries consists of memoranda on a certificate from the foreign customs officer that the fish were of English catch.

This evidence is not satisfactory to the Department.

It must be made to appear by competent evidence from Newfoundland by what vessel the fish were caught and what her nationality was. Also that the fish were the produce of the fisheries of the colony of Newfoundland, by which term is meant fisheries carried on by the people of that colony, or by persons authorized by its laws.

Sixty days from date will be given to the appellants to produce the desired proof. If not produced within that time, your assessment of duty will stand affirmed.

Very respectfully,

H. F. FRENCH,
Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1885.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, requesting my opinion as to the questions presented by the collector at Eastport, viz:

1. After July 1 next, when the treaty with Great Britain of May 8, 1871, shall have terminated, will fresh fish caught in foreign waters in open boats of less than five tons burden owned and manned by citizens of the United States be free of duty, under paragraph 749 of the tariff act of 1883?

2. Will fresh fish taken from weirs in foreign waters by boats of the class referred to be free of duty under that paragraph?

It is provided by the act aforesaid that the following articles when imported shall be exempt from duty: "Oil, spermaceti, whale, and other fish oils of American fisheries, and all other articles the produce of such fisheries."

I understand the term American fisheries, as used in the paragraph cited, to characterize those carried on by citizens of the United States.

It may be remarked that vessels of less than five tons burden engaged in the occupation, if unlicensed, are not subject to the penalties of this statute.

Whether the first are taken from weirs along the shore or caught in the open sea, I think they are equally the product of American fisheries if so taken by American citizens engaged in the business.

Accordingly, I answer the inquiries of the collector in the affirmative.

Very respectfully,

A. McCUE,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. SECRETARY OF TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: The schooner Arthur D. Story, which sailed from this port, under a register, bound on a fishing voyage to the western coast of Newfoundland, has returned with a cargo of salt herrings. The vessel carried salt, barrels, some nets, and part of a crew. Seven men and nets were hired in Newfoundland to assist in catching the cargo. I am of the opinion that the fish, having been salted on board an American vessel, with American salt, became the product of the American fisheries, and as such should be admitted duty free, and I think was so decided by Secretary McCulloch in 1867, 1868, or 1869; but finding no decision to that effect on record in this office, I have assessed duty, subject to your decision, which the owners have paid under protest.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

D. S. PRESSON,
Collector.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 7th instant, asking whether fish brought into your port by the schooner Arthur D. Story, which sailed from your port on a fishing voyage to the western coast of Newfoundland, and has returned thence with a cargo which had been taken by the crew of the vessel, with the assistance of men and nets hired in Newfoundland for that purpose, would be free of duty, you are informed that such fish, having been taken by an American vessel licensed for the fisheries, are entitled to entry free of duty as the produce of American fisheries, under T. I. new 749, and the principles enunciated in Department's decisions of February 9, 1860 (S. 353), August 13, 1873 (copy herewith), and February 28, 1877 (S. 3131).

DUTIES COLLECTED ON FISH.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1886.

SIR: Please prepare for me, at your earliest convenience, a statement showing the sum of money collected as duties on fish (discriminating between fresh and not fresh), at each Atlantic port, each year during the five years before 1854; for each year during the term of the reciprocity treaty of 1854; for each year during the period between the termination of that treaty and the beginning of the treaty of Washington, in 1871; for each year during the term of the treaty of Washington, and also for the year 1886, caught in North Atlantic or on Canadian or Newfoundland coasts and imported in foreign vessels, specifying the kind of fish.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau of Statistics.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., December 17, 1886.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury:

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, asking for the amounts of duty collected on imports of fish caught in North Atlantic or on Canadian or Newfoundland coasts, with the following distinctions:

- (1) Discriminating as to the amounts of duty collected on imports of fish fresh and fish not fresh.
- (2) Distinguishing as to the amounts of duty collected on each kind of fish imported at Atlantic ports each year.
- (3) Specifying the duties collected on each kind of fish imported in foreign vessels each year.

PERIODS COVERED BY RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

The period covered by your inquiry extends from 1850 to 1886, inclusive. During this time there were two reciprocity treaties between this country and Canada: First, that of 1854, proclaimed September 11 of that year, and terminated March 17, 1866; second, the treaty of 1873, proclaimed July 1 of that year, and terminated June 30, 1885. It will be observed that a portion of the fiscal years 1855 and 1867 is embraced within the provisions of the reciprocity treaties.

AS TO THE WATERS WHERE IMPORTED FISH ARE CAUGHT.

- (1) Referring to the branch of your inquiry as to the imports of fish caught in North Atlantic or on Canadian or Newfoundland coasts, I have to state that the records of this office furnish no information as to the waters in which imported fish are taken. Therefore, the statements furnished embrace the imports of fish from the British North American Possessions (excluding British Columbia when the imports therefrom have been separately shown in the records), as being the nearest approach to the information asked for.

MANNER IN WHICH RECORDS OF DUTIES COLLECTED ON IMPORTS HAVE BEEN KEPT.

(2) Prior to 1867 no complete records were kept of the amounts of duty collected on each article imported into the United States, nor have records been kept since that period as to the amount of duty collected on the various articles which are imported from each country, the accounts of duties collected on the respective articles imported being only kept so as to show the amount of duty collected on each article imported into the whole country.

To keep an account with respect to the duty collected on each article imported from each country would be a work of great magnitude. It has therefore been found necessary to estimate the amounts of duty received on the gross imports of fish of the various kinds imported from the above-named provinces. A portion of this imported fish is subsequently exported, but it is believed that the amount is inconsiderable.

AS TO DUTIES COLLECTED ON FRESH FISH.

(3) I am asked to discriminate in the statements furnished between the amounts of duty collected on fish fresh and fish not fresh. Since 1861 fresh fish imported for daily consumption has been free of duty. Just prior to that date it was dutiable at the rate of 15 per cent. ad valorem, but the records of the imports of fish prior to 1861 do not distinguish between the fresh and cured.

AS TO THE RECORDS OF IMPORTS BY CUSTOMS DISTRICTS.

(4) Inasmuch as the accounts of imports distinguish only as to the aggregate value of all imports brought into each district in American and foreign vessels, respectively, and not as to the value of the respective articles brought in American and in foreign vessels, the information as to the duty collected on fish imported in foreign vessels cannot be given.

STATEMENTS SUBMITTED.

(1) Table A shows the estimated amount of duty collected on imports of fish into the United States from the British North American Possessions during each year from 1850 to 1886, except when the reciprocity treaties of 1854 and 1873 were in force.

(2) Table B shows, by customs districts, the estimated amounts of duty collected on imports of fish into the United States from the British North American Possessions, other than British Columbia, during the year ending June 30, 1886.

REMARKS ON TABLES.

During the period of the reciprocity treaties, there being no duties collected on fish imported from the British North American Possessions, those years do not appear in the tables.

Probably a small portion of the herring and all of the sardines and anchovies should not be included in the tables, as a small portion of the former and perhaps all of the latter come from Europe through the British North American Possessions, but the amounts of duty collected thereon are inconsiderable, and would not materially affect any deductions drawn from the tables.

INFORMATION ASKED FOR NOT FURNISHED.

With respect to your inquiry as to the duty collected on imports into each port, Table B contains all the information that I can furnish at the present time. This information for prior years not being in printed form, it is necessary to compile it from the manuscript records, which is a tedious process. The information cannot be given from 1850 to 1855. Such of the records as antedate the organization of this Bureau in 1866, are incomplete, having been kept in a careless manner and allowed in great part to go to destruction.

To collate similar information to that in Table B, from the manuscript records, for the period from 1866 to 1873, will require the work of several clerks for two or three weeks, as only those skilled in the accounts can work upon them. Possibly, however, the information here furnished may be deemed sufficient. If it is still desired the information similar to that in Table B be compiled for the years from 1866 to 1873, I will undertake the work and perform it as best I may with the limited clerical force I have fitted for the work.

Department No. 63, }
Bureau of Navigation. }

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 28, 1886.

To the collectors of customs and others :

It is represented to this Department by the Hon. Spencer F. Baird, Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, that, in view of the questions arising as to the shaping and negotiating of a new fishery treaty with Great Britain, affecting colonial waters in North America, and for other reasons, it is desirable to have at hand, available for reference, full and accurate information regarding our fisheries.

A large percentage of the product of the fisheries of the United States is taken by vessels licensed for the fisheries, or the coasting trade, and the owner or master in each case is thoroughly informed relative to the movements of the vessel and the quantity of fish, shell-fish, and other products obtained.

It is, therefore, directed that whenever the owner, master, or agent of any vessel of over five tons burden, engaged in the capture or transportation of any kind of fish, shell-fish, crustacea, or other products of the seas, rivers, or lakes, shall present himself at the custom-house for the purpose of obtaining or renewing his marine papers, the collector or his deputy will question him regarding the information required by the blank appended hereto, and will fill out the blank for the details thus obtained and certify that it is correct. The statistics should include the period covered by the papers about to be surrendered.

On the first day of each month the collector will forward by mail all such blanks filled out during the preceding month, addressed to "The Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, Washington, D. C."

Such additional copies of this circular as may be necessary for your use will be furnished by the Bureau of Navigation on requisition.

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

[U.S. Commission of Fish and Fisheries. Spencer F. Baird, Commissioner.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 29, 1886.

Sir: Referring to your letter of the 16th instant, asking for information regarding the vessel fisheries of New England and of British North America, I take pleasure in forwarding herewith answers to the various questions propounded, with the exception of number five, which asks for the total tonnage of American vessels employed in the North Atlantic fisheries in 1886, the total number of men thereon, and the total value of their catch. The compilations necessary for intelligent estimates in answer to this question are nearly completed, and the results will be forwarded at the earliest practicable moment.

Very respectfully yours,

SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Commissioner.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

No. 3.

Question 1. "What do you estimate to have been the value of the products of the British North American fisheries for 1885?"

The Canadian fisheries in 1885, as shown in detail by the accompanying tables, furnished occasional or continuous employment to 59,493 persons, with 1,177 vessels and 23,472 boats. The value of these, together with that of the other apparatus and capital, including shore property, gives a total of $6,697,459 employed in the fisheries industries, with a total value of products amounting to $17,722,973.18. The tables from which the summary is obtained have been compiled from the annual report of the Department of Fisheries, Dominion of Canada, for the year 1885.

In using the figures it should be remembered that the tables include not only the commercial fisheries, but also the persons, apparatus, and capital employed in fishing for local supply; and probably a large number who fish only to furnish food for their own families. This class, owing to the lack of manufacturing interests and the character of the soil, composes in many localities a large part of the population.

Total number of men and total amount of apparatus and capital employed in the shore, boat, and vessel fisheries of the Dominion of Canada for the year 1885.

Question 2. "What are the descriptions of the fish—in consequence of the present habits of the fish, the present methods of catching, drying, curing, and preserving—American fishermen desire to take either in the jurisdictional waters of British North America, or in the open sea or open bays near the British colonial possessions?"

Prior to, and during the first half of the present century, many of the New England vessels engaged in the offshore cod fisheries, being of small size, found it desirable to fish in the vicinity of the shore, where they could make a harbor in case of severe storms. Owing to their small tonnage, they found it difficult to carry sufficient quantities of codfish to make a trip to the more distant fishing grounds profitable, and many of them found it desirable to land and dry their fish upon the shores, thus enabling them to bring home a much larger quantity as a result of the voyage. At that time the majority of the fish were exported to Spain and the West Indies, and the methods which our fishermen found it necessary to adopt in drying their fish on the provincial shores made them especially adapted for these markets.

Since 1850 the small vessels engaged in the offshore fisheries have been gradually replaced by larger ones, and thus the privilege of fishing for cod in the vicinity of the shore has become less important, and as the codfish are more abundant on the offshore Banks, twenty to two hundred miles from land, vessels engaged in this fishery now prefer to visit these localities; and they have been doing so, with comparatively few exceptions, for the past fifteen or twenty years. The catch of these vessels, instead of being exported, is now to a great extent consumed in this country, and our market at present calls for fish cured in a different way, so that the privilege of drying and curing fish on Canadian soil, now that the vessels are large enough to readily carry the undried fish, is no longer of any advantage whatever to our fishermen.

Formerly vessels employed in the mackerel fisheries were provided only with hand-lines, and the crews caught the fish from the vessel's deck. When fishing in this way they found it desirable to grind up fish and clams, which they threw in large quantities into the water to attract the mackerel and keep them in the vicinity of the vessel. The best results were then obtained by fishing in shoal water, as the bait thrown overboard could not sink to any great depth, and the entire body of fish were thus kept near the surface, where they were within reach of the hook and line. About 1865 purse-seines were introduced for the capture of mackerel, and in a few years they came to be generally adopted by vessels employed in the mackerel fishery. These are fished to best advantage at some distance from the shore, and the fishermen usually avoid shoal water, as the seines are liable to be ruined when set in depths where the lead-lines may chance to come in contact with the bottom.

During earlier years the halibut fishery in the vicinity of provincial shores was of some slight importance to the American fishermen, but this has been confined wholly to deep water, many miles from land, since 1875.

The shore herring fisheries, and the occasional capture of certain species for bait, were also at one time of value to fishermen from the United States; but such a decided opposition on the part of the resident Provincial fishermen was manifest to the exercise of the privilege of taking fish, accorded by the treaty of Washington, that the practice of catching their own supply was practically abandoned, and the fishermen have almost without exception, since the well-known difficulty at Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, about ten years ago, purchased their cargoes of herring from the local fishermen, and, where these had no suitable apparatus for obtaining same, have carried their own apparatus and hired the provincial fishermen to manipulate it.

The mackerel is, then, the only species of any importance visiting Provincial waters which American fishermen at present desire to catch within three miles of the shore, or indeed within a much greater distance. This is practically the only Provincial shore fishery in which our fishermen have had any considerable interest since the ratification of the treaty of Washington, as the great majority of our vessels employed in other fisheries on the banks off the Provincial coast seldom fish nearer than twenty-five or thirty miles from land, and a majority of them secure their cargoes from one to two hundred miles from shore.

At the present time the advantage to be derived from any privilege of fishing within three miles of the Canadian coasts even for mackerel is comparatively insignificant, as the results of the season which has just closed show conclusively that our vessels which have fished wholly outside of the three-mile limit have done fully as well as the Canadian vessels, which have had the opportunity of fishing everywhere, without restriction as to distance from shore.

Question 3. In the method of fishing on that open sea, or in those open bays, of preserving the catch and sending it to our ports for a market now desirable for our American fishermen, of what importance is the right to enter, in a commercial way, British colonial ports in the neighborhood?

The nature of the occupation of fishing, when the size of the vessel is considered, renders it impossible for a fishing vessel to provide against all contingencies. On leaving the home ports the vessels are ordinarily provided with what is supposed to a fall outfit of provisions and apparatus, but a scarcity of fish may render it defirable that it should remain on the fishing-grounds longer than was expected, or it may be delayed by head winds, storms, or floating ice, until the supply of provisions or water is exhausted. It then becomes convenient, in order to prevent actual suffering, that the vessel should make a harbor and obtain additional quantities.

Instances have occurred during the present year when vessels short of provisions have attempted to reach one of our own ports to obtain a supply rather than incur the risk of seizure by entering those of Canada for that purpose.

Again, portions of the vessel's equipment, such as anchors, cables, fishing boats, and apparatus of capture, are liable to be lost during stormy weather, and it is a great inconvenience to be able to purchase new material in the nearest provincial port rather than to incur the loss which must be sustained, provided the vessel is obliged to return to American markets to purchase same. This is true both in the fisheries carried on near the land and also in those on the more distant fishing grounds. This season much inconvenience was experienced by many of the vessels engaged in the mackerel fishery from the tearing of their seines and the loss of their seine boats in heavy weather, owing to the refusal of certain Canadian officials to allow them to land their seines for purposes of repair or to buy new boats for continuing their fishing operations. Many of them were provided with two boats and some carried two seines to guard against such contingencies, but in a number of cases vessels so equipped were equally inconvenient with the others.

The only occasion that vessels would have for entering the harbor, due to the methods of preserving fish, would be for the purpose of obtaining either salt, barrels or ice. It sometimes happens that the salt is damaged by a leak in the vessel, or that a detention beyond the expected time causes the melting of the ice, and it is important that our fishermen should be permitted to purchase additional quantities in Canadian ports, rather than run the risk of losing the entire cargo of fish or of returning with only a partial trip. The present interpretation given to the treaty of 1818 by the Canadian authorities, while it might allow a leaking vessel to enter a port for repairs, would not allow it to replace the salt that might have been rendered worthless by the leak.

The privilege of landing cargoes of fish at provincial ports for shipment to the United States is of considerable importance to vessels engaged in the mackerel fishery, of little value to those employed in the capture of other species. Vessels are thus enabled to land trips for shipment and to immediately resume their fishing operations, thus saving the two to four weeks necessary for making the homeward and return passage; but with the privilege of transshipping cargoes should be coupled that of refitting at the port where the fish are landed, otherwise the vessel might be short of provisions or apparatus, which would render it impossible for it to continue its fishing operations.

Most of the vessels from Gloucester, Mass., engaged in the offshore cod fisheries have made a practice of obtaining fresh bait in provincial ports; but a majority of vessels similarly employed from other places carry salt bait, thus being entirely independent of the Canadian supply. The chief difference between the two classes is that the Gloucester vessels fish with trawls, while the crews of most of the other vessels catch their fish with hand-lines. It is claimed by certain of the Gloucester fleet that they get more and larger fish by the use of fresh bait, but the fishermen from other ports have found their own methods profitable and have not felt disposed to follow Gloucester's example even when they had free access to Canadian ports for the purpose of obtaining bait.

A few of the vessel-owners in Gloucester have long maintained that the time lost in going to and from Provincial ports to secure bait, and the temporary demoralization of the crews resulting from a visit to these ports more than offset any advantages that are to be derived by the use of fresh bait, and urge that salt bait would be found, on the whole, more profitable; but as a considerable percentage of the men employed on the vessels have families or relatives in the Provinces they have continued to urge upon the owners the necessity of obtaining bait in these localities, and it has been difficult to dissuade them. After the experience of the present year quite a number of other Gloucester owners and fishermen as well are convinced that it is on the whole better to substitute salt bait than to continue the old practice of leaving the Banks in the midst of the fishing season to obtain other kinds in the Provinces. That this opinion is shared by the Nova Scotia fishermen is proven by the fact that for some years they have been in the habit of purchasing large quantities of salt bait from dealers at Portland and other towns in the State of Maine to be used by them in the cod-fisheries.

Since the introduction of the purse-seine the mackerel fishermen have required no bait.

In the halibut fishery it is only necessary to take a sufficient quantity to last one or two days, as the remainder of the catch can be obtained on refuse fish taken on the trawls with the halibut, or, if necessary, small halibut can be cut up and used for baiting the hooks.

In the past the cod-fishermen frequenting Georges Banks have at certain seasons of the year obtained their bait from Canadian ports, but the experience of the present year has proven that they are not dependent upon them, as most of the vessels have obtained their supply on our own coast with comparatively little difficulty, and frequently with less loss of time than was customary when visiting localities in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

It will thus be seen that, though the privilege of obtaining bait and the ice necessary for preserving it in British North American ports has been in the past and may even still be considered a convenience to certain classes of vessels, it is not of vital importance.

The agitation of the question of bait supply has had a very beneficial influence upon our own fishermen, and has resulted in the development of extensive shore bait fisheries along the coasts of Maine and Massachusetts, which give promise of being able to supply in large part, if not wholly, the demands of our entire fleet. During the past summer the experiment of shipping bait to Boston from the more remote localities on the coast of Maine has been made with success, and the cost of transportation is not high enough to be a barrier to the continuance of the business. If this practice increases, as at present seems probable, it will doubtless result in a great saving of time to our fleet, which has often in the past been seriously inconvenienced in its fishing operations, owing to the time consumed in sailing from port to port in search of a supply. The United States Fish Commission has recently begun a series of experiments with a view to determining the practicability of preserving fresh bait long enough to admit of its shipment from New England ports to the fleet fishing on the more distant banks, but the work is not yet sufficiently advanced to warrant an opinion as to the probable result.

Question 4. "The same question in regard to the fishing on the permitted coasts, and the commercial entry in the prohibited bays and harbors, but not for fishing."

There is at present comparatively little fishing by American vessels on that portion of the coast to which free access is given by the treaty of 1818; but vessels fishing in that vicinity should have the same privileges in other ports as are accorded to other vessels, as it would seem unwise to discriminate, and it would, perhaps, owing to the few settlements of any importance on the permitted coast, be more convenient for the vessels to enter ports in the prohibited districts to purchase the necessary articles than to go out of their way in an opposite direction, where there might be any uncertainty of securing them.

Question 5. "What is your estimate of the total tonnage of the American vessels, the number of fishermen thereon, engaged in the Canadian and North Atlantic fisheries in 1886, and the total value of their catch?"

A careful estimate of the extent and importance of our New England vessel fisheries, indicates that during the present year there have been 1,956 vessels, aggregating 115,130 tons, with crews numbering 17,996 men employed in the various sea fisheries. The fleet is estimated to have been divided as follows: 1,530 vessels in the food-fish fisheries, 215 in the shell-fish and lobster fisheries, 177 in the capture of whales and seals, and 34 in the menhaden fishery.

The 1,530 food-fish vessels aggregated 71,200 tons, and furnished employment to 14,240 men. The vessels, with their equipment, were valued at nearly $5,000,000, and their catch is estimated to have sold at prices to fishermen for $4,590,000. Of the fleet 350 sail were engaged in the off-shore mackerel fisheries, 200 in the cod fisheries on Quersan, Grand, and Western Banks, 165 others in the cod fisheries of George's and Brown's Banks, and the remaining 750 in the miscellaneous shore and off-shore fisheries.

The off-shore mackerel vessels are the only ones that have engaged to any extent in catching fish in the vicinity of waters under British jurisdiction. Of this fleet, about one-half, or possibly a slightly larger percentage, have fished in the Gulf of St. Lawrence during a portion of the mackerel season, the remainder of these vessels having remained off our own coast.

Below are given two tables, showing in detail the extent and character of our New England vessel fisheries in 1886. The figures as there explained are estimated from partial statistics furnished by collectors of customs on Treasury circular No. 63, Bureau of Navigation, and from special, but as yet unfinished, investigation by the United States Fish Commission. The statement in both tables are therefore subject to revision; but, as due allowance has been made for the statistics not yet received, it is believed the totals will not be materially changed by the final compilations.

Question 6. "What change has, in your view, come to American fisheries since the last full year of the Washington treaty in regard the character, quantity, and general features of that industry?"

There has been little change in the fisheries other than the mackerel fishery during the past year. In this fishery the scarcity of mackerel has been very marked and the catch has been much below that of the average year. The decrease, however, can be in no way attributed to the abrogation of the treaty of Washington, but must rather be accounted for by natural causes which have affected the abundance, movements, and locality of the species.

For several years prior to 1886 mackerel appeared in more than average quantities, and for eight or ten years, ending with 1885, they have been much more plentiful on our own coast than on any portion of that of British North America. For this reason the fleet of American mackerel vessels visiting waters in the vicinity of British territory has of late been very small. In 1885, out of a total of about 380,000 barrels caught by our fleet, only 26,000 barrels, or less than seven per cent., were taken in the vicinity of Canada, the quantity obtained within the three-mile limit being only 3,564 barrels. The fact that, during a season when permission had been given to allow American vessels to fish anywhere in the waters of British North America without restriction as to distance from shore, less than one per cent. of the catch of our mackerel fleet was secured within three miles of British territory, and that more than ninety three per cent. of the total catch of mackerel was obtained in the vicinity of our own coast, is certainly significant.

During the present year mackerel have been peculiarly scarce in all localities, though for the first time in eight or ten years they have been more abundant in the Gulf of St. Lawrence than off the New England coast, and a large percentage of the American vessels employed in the fishery have visited that locality. The catch has, as a rule, been unusually small, but the price has increased in proportion, so that the season for some of the vessels has not been wholly unprofitable. The limited catch cannot in any way be accounted for by the restrictions placed upon our vessels within the three-mile limit, for their catch, as previously stated, has been equal to that of the Canadian vessels that fished without restriction as to distance from the shore.

The vessels engaged in the cod-fishery have met with more than average success. This is partially attributed to the fact that the squid, used for bait, have been very plenty during the summer and fall months on the fishing grounds. It has not unfrequently occurred that vessels have sailed without any bait, depending upon the supply that they could catch on the Banks upwards of a hundred miles from shore.

Question 7. "Your Commission has, in its annual reports, alluded to the diminished necessity on the part of American fishermen to go to British North American ports or waters for bait. What are the new features of that necessity?"

A few years ago the United States Fish Commission obtained from Norway a number of gill-nets suitable for catching codfish, and used them with success in the cod fisheries about Gloucester, Mass. Similar nets are now made in this country, and are extensively employed by the shore cod-fishermen of that vicinity, who obtain large catches by their use. These fishermen formerly depended in large part for their bait upon frozen herring, brought from New Brunswick and Newfoundland, but where gill-nets are used bait is no longer required. Thus far, however, gill-nets have not been extensively employed in the capture of codfish on the more distant fishing Banks.

The development of our shore bait fisheries, referred to in answer to a previous question, also renders our people less dependent upon the Provincial supply, and the growing sentiment upon the part of certain Gloucester owners in favor of substituting salt claims purchased in American markets for fresh bait obtained in the Provinces, seems destined to decrease still further our dependence upon the Canadian supply. It cannot be denied, however, that there are still a large number of vessels that would consider it a convenience to obtain bait in the Provinces, provided commercial privileges, under proper restrictions, are accorded to our vessels.

Question 8. "Your Commission has also alluded to inquiries presented by it in respect to the general value of the inshore Canadian waters to American fishermen, and the yearly value of the liberties given to American fishermen by the Washington treaty. Have you ascertained new facts of public interest in that regard which you can conveniently communicate to me?"

The decreased importance to American vessels of the inshore Canadian fisheries has resulted—

(1) From the increased size of our vessels, which did away with the necessity of fishing close to land, where harbor could be made in case of storms, and of landing in the vicinity of the fishing grounds to dry their fish before sailing for home;

(2) From the substitution of the purse-seine for the hand-lines in the capture of mackerel, which has necessitated the fishing in deeper water and at a greater distance from shore; and

(3) From the change in the location of the mackerel fisheries, which has for the past few years enabled our vessels to obtain full cargoes in the vicinity of our own coast, instead of going to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where they formerly met with better success, but where of late years—prior to the present season—they have found fishing unsatisfactory.

This recent return of the mackerel to the more northern waters should, however, not be considered as indicating a permanent change in the location of the fishery, for within a short time, and possibly next season, they may again appear in greater abundance on our own coast; and, indeed, the study of the movements of other fishes renders it not wholly improbable that mackerel may at no distant day disappear entirely from the Gulf of St. Lawrence and from other portions of the Provincial shores, where they are now abundant.

J. R. L.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 30, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your request of the 28th instant, in which you desire to be informed of "the value of merchandise sent during the last fiscal year in bond—(1) through any port of the United States to the British North American Provinces; (2) of merchandise sent in bond from one of our ports to another over territory of the British North American Provinces; or (3) sent in bond through any of those Provinces to the United States," I have the honor to report:

(1) That the statistics, compiled for the last fiscal year, show the transit of dutiable merchandise to British North American Provinces amounting in value to.....	$18,556,763
And also of non-dutiable merchandise amounting to.....	1,684,316

Making a total of	20,241,079
-------------------------	------------

This represents merchandise arriving at United States seaports en route to Canada, and also merchandise arriving at frontier ports for shipment across the territory of the United States to other frontier ports.

The report of the Bureau of Statistics shows $20,241,079 worth of "transit" merchandise shipped to British American Provinces, and besides $10,861,020 worth of "in transit" merchandise received from the British American Provinces. What proportion of the latter amount was simply transported across United States territory to another Canadian port does not appear. It is probable, though, that the greater portion of it was transported to our seaports for shipment to foreign countries.

In reply to your second and third questions, I have to state that in the absence of any data to be found in the records of the Department the annexed telegram was sent to the collectors at the various frontier ports therein named, and from their replies it appears that no sufficient records of such matters have been kept to enable them to give satisfactory reports in all cases.

The collectors at Portland and Suspension Bridge alone give any values in response to the second interrogatory (viz, $960,284 at Portland, and $1,414 at Suspension Bridge), while the collectors at Suspension Bridge and Burlington are the only ones failing to report as to the third question, the others reporting as follows:

Plattsburg	$37,498
Portland	1,229
Detroit	175,000
Buffalo	47
Port Huron	1,194,000
Total	1,408,824

I may state, however, in explanation of the incompleteness of these reports, that under the regulations of the Department, merchandise of domestic origin, and imported merchandise in bond in transit from one port in the United States to another by bonded routes through the Dominion of Canada, are allowed to go forward in sealed cars without special bond or any record of values being kept, and on arrival at the second port, if the seals are found intact and the provisions of the regulations in other respects have been duly complied with, are permitted to go forward to final destination without hindrance, no record of values being deemed necessary at the port or any further formality than the due inspection of the seals and comparison of the contents of the cars with the manifests.

Respecting merchandise covered by your third inquiry, that is, sent in bond through any of the British Provinces to the United States, it would appear that the customs officials at the frontier ports can have but little means of ascertaining how the mer-

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., January 7, 1887.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir: In reply to yours of the 28th ultimo, I have the honor to forward to you tables showing the quantities and values of foreign-caught fish imported into the United States from the British North American Possessions, other than British Colombia; also showing the quantities and values of the fish brought into each port of the United States in American and foreign vessels, respectively.

Table No. 1 shows such imports of fish in American vessels and in foreign vessels, respectively.

Table No. 2 shows the aggregate imports of each kind of fish brought by all means of transportation, to-wit: in American vessels, in foreign vessels, and in cars.

From these tables it appears that the value of fish imported into the United States from the British North American possessions, other than British Colombia, was as follows:

In foreign vessels:
Into northern border districts	$89,654
Into Atlantic districts	1,093,820
Total in foreign vessels	1,183,474
In American vessels:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS IN RELATION TO THE RIGHTS AND INTERESTS OF AMERI-CAN FISHERIES AND FISHERMEN.

JANUARY 19, 1887.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following

REPORT:

[To accompany bill S. 3173.]

The Committee on Foreign Relations was at the last session of the Senate instructed to make inquiry into the matter of the rights and interests of the American fisheries and fishermen by resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the rights of American fishing vessels and merchant vessels within the North American possessions of the Queen of Great Britain, and whether any rights of such vessels have been violated, and if so, to what extent; that said committee report upon the subject, and report whether any and what steps are necessary to be taken by Congress to insure the protection and vindication of the rights of citizens of the United States in the premises; that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to sit during the recess of the Senate, either as a full committee or by any subcommittee thereof, and that any such subcommittee shall for the purposes of such investigation be a committee of the Senate to all intents and purposes.

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of said committee in said investigation be paid out of the appropriation for the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman thereof.

Pursuant to this authority the committee has proceeded to make the inquiries directed by the Senate, so far as it was practicable to do during the vacation, and has taken a considerable amount of testimony which the committee believes to be of much value and importance to a proper understanding of the difficulties that have arisen between citizens of the United States and the authority of Her Majesty's dominions in North America, and which also, as the committee thinks, bears upon other questions of public policy that can be readily understood by those reading this testimony.

The questions touching the right of our citizens engaged either in the operations of fishing or commerce in the North American waters contiguous to Her Majesty's dominions depend, of course, not only upon public law, but upon the conventional arrangements that have hitherto been entered into between the United States and her Britannic Majesty's Government.

Without going into a general review of the discussions that have in former years taken place concerning these matters, it is, as the committee thinks, sufficient to now treat these questions as they are affected by the principles of public law and by the presently existing treaty between the United States and Great Britain bearing upon the subject.

This treaty was concluded in the year 1818. To understand its just and true application it is perhaps proper to refer, by way of inducement, to the state of things theretofore existing.

The treaty of peace concluded at the end of the Revolutionary war, which acknowledged the independence of the United States, provided in its third article that the people of the United States—shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish. And also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use, but not to dry or cure the same on that island, and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

This article, it will be observed, recognized an existing right and practice in respect of American fishermen exercising their calling not only at sea on the banks of Newfoundland, but in all places in the sea within what would be strictly British waters. And it will be observed also that this treaty said nothing on the subject of commercial intercourse between the people of the United States and those of the British provinces.

The next treaty was that of 1794, by the third article of which it was provided as follows:

It is agreed that it shall at all times be free to His Majesty's subjects and to the citizens of the United States and also to the Indians dwelling on either side of said boundary line [being the land boundary line between the United States and the British Provinces of North America] freely to pass and repass by land or inland navigation, into the respective countries of the two parties, on the continent of America (the country within the limits of the Hudson Bay Company only excepted), and to navigate all the lakes, rivers, and waters thereof, and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other. But it is understood that this article does not extend to the admission of vessels of the United States into the sea-ports, harbors, bays, or creeks of His Majesty's said territories; nor into such parts of the rivers in His Majesty's said territories as are between the mouth thereof, and the highest port of entry from the sea, except in small vessels trading bona fide between Montreal and Quebec, under such regulations as shall be established to prevent the possibility of any frauds in this respect; nor to the admission of British vessels from the sea into the rivers of the United States, beyond the highest ports of entry for foreign vessels from the sea.

A later article in the treaty of 1794 (Article XII) provided that for a limited period, named in the treaty, citizens of the United States might engage in carrying trade to any of His Majesty's islands and ports in the West Indies under certain conditions named. A later article (Article XIII) provided that vessels belonging to citizens of the United States should be admitted into all the sea-ports and harbors of the British territories in the East Indies, &c. A later article (Article XIV) provided that there should be between the dominions of His Majesty in Europe and the territories of the United States a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation, &c. Another article (Article XIII) provided for admitting American vessels in distress into all of His Majesty's ports on manifesting its necessity to the satisfaction of the government of the place.

So far as the present question is concerned the foregoing represents the state of the treaty arrangements between the United States and Great Britain down to the close of the war of 1812. By the treaty of 1815, following the treaty of peace of 1814, it was provided in Article I that there should be between the territories of the United States and all the territories of his Britannic Majesty in Europe reciprocal liberty of commerce, &c.

In a later article of the same treaty (Article II) it was provided that the intercourse between the United States and His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and on the continent of North America should not be affected by any of the provisions of that article, but that each party should remain in complete possession of its rights with respect of such intercourse.

No other article of the treaty touched the question of intercourse between the United States and His Majesty's dominions in North America.

The next treaty bearing upon the present question was that of 1818, which is now understood to regulate, so far as it goes, fishing interests of whatever kind of the citizens of the United States in the territorial waters of the British dominions in North America.

All of this treaty that bears directly upon the present subject is contained in Article I, which is in the following words:

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty, claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors and creeks of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company: And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks, of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, above described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

This article sets out with stating the precise subject with which it has to deal, viz: that differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

Thus it will be seen that the matter to be dealt with was a claim in favor of the inhabitants of the United States to do certain things within the territorial dominion of His Majesty, and not a matter touching the right of the inhabitants of the United States to cruise, fish, or do any other thing in waters that by the public law of nations did not belong to the territorial jurisdiction of His Majesty. The matter to be dealt with being, then, simply that affecting American fishermen coming within the territorial dominion of His Majesty, it was provided that American might fish on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; and on the western to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits; provided, however, that the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, and of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

The committee is of opinion, in view of this history and of the plain language above quoted, that this article was intended to deal and did deal only with the subject of the admission of American fishermen within the territorial jurisdiction of his Britannic Majesty as defined by the public law of nations.

The first question for consideration, then, is whether the pretension that has been sometimes asserted by the Government of Great Britain, that American fishing vessels or others have no right, except at the pleasure of the British Government, to be in or to prosecute lawful pursuits in the great arms of the sea extending between parts of the mainland belonging to the British and which are more than 6 marine miles broad, is well founded?

The committee cannot doubt that any such pretension is ill founded. It is plain that such a pretension is an invasion of the principles of public law now almost universally recognized by all civilized powers, and one which, it is believed, the British Government would be indisposed to concede to when applied as against its subjects. It would seem to be clear that by the universally recognized public law among civilized nations, territorial jurisdiction of every nation along the sea is limited to 3 marine miles from its coasts as they may happen to be, whether embracing long lines of open coast or embracing great curvatures of sea-shore which may and often do almost surround vast bodies of the waters of the ocean. The phrase of the treaty, therefore, speaking of bays, creeks and harbors of his Britannic Majesty's dominions, must be understood as being such bays, creeks, and harbors as, by the public law of nations, were and are within the territorial jurisdiction of the British Government. The committee is, therefore, clear in its opinion that any pretension that exclusive British jurisdiction exists, either by force of public law or of this treaty, within headlands embracing such great bodies of water and more than 6 marine miles broad, must be quite untenable.

Another question may arise, in respect of whether American fishing vessels or other American vessels may lawfully traverse the Gut of Canso (a narrow strait connecting the waters of the Atlantic on the northeast of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton with the waters of the Gulf of Saint Lawrence on the northwest). This strait is a few miles long, and much less in some of its parts than 6 miles wide. It is naturally navigable for sea-going vessels, and always has been navigated and used for the passage of vessels from the southward into the Gulf of Saint Lawrence and back again southward by vessels finding it convenient so to use it.

The committee is of opinion that, in the absence of special treaty arrangements, such straits as the Gut of Canso are free for public and peaceable navigation in the same manner that the seas which they connect are. A comparatively recent and notable instance of the application of this principle is found in the case of the Simonoseki Strait, in Japan, connecting the Korean Channel, to the northwest of Japan, with the Pacific Ocean on the southeast. This strait at one of its points is very much less than 3 miles in width; and the passage of mercantile vessels of the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands having been interrupted there by Japanese batteries, &c., Japan was compelled by these four Governments to make reparation, after both British and American vessels of war had forcibly destroyed the Japanese batteries.

Of course, the right of peaceful passage through the Gut of Canso by unarmed vessels is entirely distinct from any right to fish or do any other thing there than merely to pass through. And if, in such an instance, a purely fishing vessel of the United States, having no other character whatever, should wish to pass through that strait from one part of the sea to another, it is presumed that it would hardly be insisted by the British Government that such a passage for such a purpose was prohibited by the first article of the treaty of 1818, which, as we have before stated, was applicable only to the matter of taking fish, &c., on the specified coasts and to the prohibition of American fishermen as such to enter the British bays or harbors for any other purposes than those of shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water. The general right of passage for all vessels entitled to sail the seas was not in any way mentioned, and it must be presumed it was not intended by the language used in the treaty to limit or modify such rights.

On the termination of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 the fishermen of the United States were remitted to the first article of the treaty of 1818, already cited, for the definition and regulation of their rights in the British waters therein mentioned. Between the period of the termination of the treaty of 1854 (namely, 1866,) and the treaty of 1871 some considerable difficulty and discussion took place concerning the question whether the 3-mile line should be ascertained by drawing the same from headland to headland (as across the Bay of Fundy and the Bay Chaleur), or whether it should be drawn 3 miles from the actual shores of such bays and headlands. The general result of those discussions would seem to have been an acquiescence by the British Government in the right of American fishermen to fish within those bays and exterior to a line 3 miles from the shores. By the treaty of 1871 it was agreed that the fishermen of the United States should have the right to fish inshore under certain limitations therein stated. This last treaty was terminated through the action of the United States on the 1st day of July, 1885, and the first article of the treaty of 1818 again came into operation.

Concluding, then, from what has been before stated, that there is no serious difficulty in respect of the question where American fishermen can carry on their operations, it would seem to be easy to know precisely what our fishermen may and may not do in the territorial waters adjacent to the British dominions.

What they may do may be stated, as follows:

(1) They have the liberty to take fish "on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland, which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands."

(2) They have the right to take fish "on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands."

(3) Also "on the shores of the Magdalen Islands."

(4) "Also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joly on the southern coast of Labrador to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast," subject to any exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company.

(5) The right "to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland," before described, and of the coast of Labrador, without interfering with the rights of settlers, &c.

(6) The right of American fishermen in their character as such to enter the bays and harbors of Great Britain in America for the purpose (a) of shelter, (b) of repairing damages, (c) of purchasing wood, (d) of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever.

But they are to be under such restrictions in respect of their entry into bays and harbors where they are not entitled to fish "as may be necessary to prevent their taking and drying or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

The things that by this article American fishermen must not do are:

(1) Fish within 3 miles of any of the shores of the British dominions, excepting those specially above named.

(2) Enter within this 3-mile limit except for the purposes last stated. The American fishermen, in their character as such purely, must not enter the prohibited waters other than for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water; and in doing so they are subject to such reasonable restrictions as shall be necessary to prevent their fishing or curing fish in prohibited waters or on prohibited shores, and thereby abusing the privilege of entering those waters for the necessary purposes stated.

What, then, are such necessary restrictions?

Following the treaty of 1818, Great Britain passed the act of June 1, 1819 (59 Geo. III, ch. 38), on the subject of American fishing and other vessels within the waters of the British dominions in North America, which provided:

(1) That the British King might make such orders in council, either directly or through the governor of Newfoundland or others, as should be deemed proper and necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of the fishery article of that treaty.

(2) A prohibition and punishment of fishing, &c., within the 3-mile limit, other than the coasts in respect of which the treaty provided that Americans might fish.

(3) Forfeiture of vessels, &c., found fishing, &c., within the prohibited limits. This forfeiture was to be enforced in the ordinary course, in the case of forfeitures under the revenue laws.

(4) That American fishermen might enter any of the bays and harbors of the British dominions in America for the purposes named in the treaty, subject to such restrictions for preventing abuse of that privilege as His Majesty, or the governor, or person exercising the office of governor in any part of the British dominions in America, might make.

(5) That if any person should refuse to depart from such bays, &c., on the requirement of the governor, &c., or neglect to conform to any of the regulations so made, he should be punished by a fine of £200.

The next legislative act touching American fishermen appears to be the act of Prince Edward's Island, of 3d September, 1844, which provided that the officers of Her Majesty's customs, &c., or any person specially holding a commission for that purpose, should have authority to go on board any ship, vessel, or boat, within any port, bay, creek, or harbor, in that island, or "hovering" within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, &c., thereof; and in either case freely to stay on board such ship, vessel, or boat as long as she shall remain within such port or distance; and if any such ship, vessel, or boat be bound elsewhere and shall continue so hovering for the space of twenty-four hours after the master shall have been required to depart, it shall be lawful for any of the above-enumerated officers, &c., to bring such ship, &c., into port and to search and examine her cargo, and examine the master upon oath touching the cargo and voyage; and if there be any goods on board prohibited to be imported into this island, such ship, &c., and the cargo laden on board thereof shall be forfeited; and if said ship, &c., shall be foreign and not navigated according to the laws of Great Britain and Ireland, and shall have been found fishing, or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing, within such distance of such coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of this island, such ship, &c., and its cargo shall be forfeited; and if the master or any person in command thereof shall not truly answer the question which shall be demanded of him in such examination, he shall forfeit the sum of £100.

The act then provides for the methods of investigation, condemnation, &c.

The Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia of 1851, chapter 94 (which may have re-enacted some earlier act), provided:

(1) That officers of the colonial revenue, sheriffs, magistrates, or any other person duly commissioned for that purpose, "may go on board any vessel or boat within any harbor in the province, or hovering within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts or harbors thereof, and stay on board so long as she may remain within such place or distance."

(2) That "if such vessel or boat be bound elsewhere, and shall continue within such harbor or so hovering for twenty-four hours after the master shall have been required to depart, any one of the officers above mentioned may bring such vessel or boat into port and search her cargo and also examine the master upon oath touching the cargo and voyage; and if the master or person in command shall not truly answer the questions demanded of him in the examination he shall forfeit £100; and if there be any prohibited goods on board, then such vessel or boat with the cargo thereof shall be forfeited."

(3) That "if the vessel or boat shall be foreign and not navigated according to the laws of Great Britain and Ireland, and shall have been found fishing, or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing within three marine miles of such coasts or harbors, such vessel or boat, or cargo, shall be forfeited."

It then provides for the method of procedure, &c. This provision was re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia by the provincial act of May 7, 1858. This re-enactment contained in its twenty-second section of title 25, chapter 94, a provision suspending those parts of the act relating to American fishing vessels during the continuance of the treaty of reciprocity of 1854.

The committee has not been able to discover any orders in council made by the British King, as authorized by the act (59 Geo. III, ch. 58), and, so far as we have been able to examine, the regulation of the entrance of American fishermen within the limits wherein they were not entitled to fish has been made by colonial statutes such as have been above recited. That of Prince Edward's Island, of 1843 (6 Vict., ch. 14), the committee thinks fairly illustrates the nature of legislative regulations on the subject down to the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and so, in effect, until the expiration of that treaty in 1866. This act provided:

(1) Proper officers were authorized to go and remain on board an American fishing vessel during her continuance within the waters where she was not entitled to fish.

(2) If the vessel was bound elsewhere, and should continue hovering within the 3-mile limit for twenty-four hours after she had been required to depart, then the officer might take her into port, search her cargo, examine the master, &c.

(3) If, on such examination, any goods should be found prohibited to be imported into the island, there should be a forfeiture.

(4) If the vessel should have been found fishing, or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing, in prohibited waters, a forfeiture should follow.

It will be seen that this provision carefully excludes the right to seize and proceed against an American fishing vessel that had come within British waters, where fishing was not allowed, for the purposes named in the treaty, and only authorized British officers to require the vessel to depart, if, instead of coming into a bay or roadstead and coming to anchor, she was "hovering" on the coast and within the prohibited limits, and provided for her forfeiture when so "hovering" only upon its being discovered, on an examination, that she had contraband goods on board, or had been violating the provisions of the treaty by abusing the privilege of her entrance and shelter, by fishing, &c. And in all these cases the ordinary modes of judicial investigation and fair play were provided for, except: (a) That the burden of proof was thrown on the claimant of the vessel in case of dispute as to whether the seizure had been lawful; (b) that no suit should be brought for an illegal seizure until one month after notice in writing had been served on the seizing officer of an intention to sue and the grounds of action; (c) and, further, that a statute of limitations, in respect of all such illegal seizures, of three months only, was provided.

The committee does not see any just ground of criticism of those parts of this act that relate to the conduct of American fishing vessels coming within waters where fishing was prohibited; but when it comes to the matter of just and reasonable judicial determination of any question arising, the committee does think that the methods and limitations of procedure were harsh and unjust, and beyond the right of the British government to provide, under its authority by the treaty to make only such restrictions as should be necessary to prevent the abuse by the American fishermen of their right to enter non-fishing waters.

But the foregoing species of legislation has been considerably improved upon, in an unjust direction, by the Dominion act of the 22d of May, 1868 (31 Vict., ch. 61), which authorized the officials to require any vessel, which was not hovering on the coast but which had come within a harbor, to depart from such harbor on twenty-four hours' notice, and, on failure of such departure, to bring her into port, for that cause, and without any suspicion or ground of suspicion that she had violated or intended to violate either the treaty or the laws of Canada, and without any limitation as to the length of time she might be detained in port, or any security for just and fair treatment of the American fishing vessel which might have sought shelter in such harbor or come there for any of the lawful causes named in the treaty.

It also provided for punishing the master if he failed to answer any question put to him touching the cargo or voyage.

It also provided that the consent of the seizing person should be necessary in order to enable the judge of the admiralty court to release the vessel on proper security.

It also, as in the case of the former act, put the burden of proving innocence on the claimant.

It also provided that no suit should be brought for any illegal conduct of those officers until after a month's notice in writing, and that the notice should contain the cause of action.

It also provided that "no evidence of any cause of action shall be produced except such as shall be contained in such notice."

It also provided that every such action should be brought within three months after the cause of action had arisen.

It also provided that if in any such suit judgment should be given against the seizing person and there should be a certificate of probable cause, then the plaintiff should only recover $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents damages and no costs, and that no fine beyond 20 cents should be imposed upon the respondent.

On the 12th of May, 1870, the Dominion act of 33 Vict., ch. 15, was passed, repealing the third section of the last-mentioned act on the subject of bringing vessels into port, &c., and provided in lieu thereof that any of the officers or persons before mentioned might bring any vessel, being within any harbor in Canada, or hovering in British waters within 3 miles of the coast, into port, search her cargo, examine her master on oath, &c., without any previous notice to depart, which had been required by the former act. So that an American vessel, fishing at sea, being driven by stress of weather, want of wood or water, or need of repairing damages, which should run into a Canadian harbor under the right reserved to it by the treaty of 1818, the moment her anchor was dropped or she was within the shelter of a headland was at the discretion of the Canadian official, to be immediately seized and carried into port, which might be, and often would be, many miles from the place where she would have her safe shelter or could obtain her wood and water or repair her damages.

The committee thinks it is not too much to say that such a provision is, in view of the treaty and of the common principles of comity among nations, grossly in violation of rights secured by the treaty and of that friendly conduct of good neighborhood that should exist between civilized nations holding relations such as ought to exist between the United States and Her Majesty's dominions.

This last provision was substantially re-enacted, with the royal approval of the Queen, given on the 26th of November, 1886, with the addition that if any such vessel had entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or Canada, for the time being in force, she should be forfeited, &c.

From all this it would seem that it is the deliberate purpose of the British Government to leave it to the individual discretion of each one of the numerous subordinate magistrates, fishery officers, and customs officers of the Dominion of Canada to seize and bring into port any American vessels, whether fishing or other, that he finds within any harbor in Canada or hovering within Canadian waters. The statute does not even except those Canadian waters in which, along a large part of the southern coast and the whole of the western coast of Newfoundland, they are entitled to fish, to say nothing of the vast extent of the continental coast of Canada.

The committee repeats its expression of the firm opinion that this legislation is in violation of the treaty of 1818, as it respects American fishing vessels, and in violation of the principles of comity and good neighborhood that ought to exist in respect of commercial intercourse or the coming of the vessels of either, having any commercial character, within, the waters of the other. Had it been intended to harass and embarrass American fishing and other vessels, and to make it impracticable for them to enjoy their treaty and other common rights, such legislation would have been perfectly adapted to that end.

The instances in which this sort of legislation has been applied during the last year, to the great embarrassment and injury of American rights and interests—although in some of them it may doubtless appear that there has been some merely formal or technical violation of some Canadian customs statute or regulation—are the following:

Vasla denied the right or privilege of purchasing coal or ice or of transshipping fish at ports of the Dominion, or refused other rights or privileges therein.

Torosity (steamship) denied the right to take in coal, or purchase ice, or transship fish in bond to the United States, at Pictou, N. S., July, 1886. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 24-25, 49-50-51. This Rep., 3, 15, 105, 106.)

Golden Hind, of Gloucester, Mass., was refused the right to take water in Port Daniel, Bay of Chaleur, July 23, 1886. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 43, 47, 192-193. This Rep., 162.)

Mollie Adams, of Gloucester, Mass., Solomon Jacobs, master; his water supply having become exhausted by accident, Captain Jacobs put into Port Mulgrave, N. S., on the 31st of August, 1886, to replenish the same, but was refused the privilege of buying barrels, and notified that if he did purchase barrels his vessel would be seized. A serious loss was occasioned through this action. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 45-46, 61-63. This Rep., 88, 146.)

E. Crittenden, of Gloucester, Mass., Joseph E. Graham, master. Stopped at Steep Creek, Strait of Canoe, July 21, 1886, homeward bound from the open-sea fishing grounds, to obtain supply of water, which was refused, the customs officer notifying Captain Graham that if he took in water his vessel would be seized. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 47, 48, 152. This Rep., 153, 196.)

Carl Nelson, of Provincetown, Mass., Murdock Kemp, master. Was seized in the harbor of Arichat, N. S., September 8, 1886, and compelled to pay commercial fees, but was denied privileges which such fees are paid to secure. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 54-61, 193-197. This Rep., 54, 66.)

Maria Hayward, of Gloucester, Mass., Medo Rose, master. Was, on the 6th of October, 1886, while in the port of Shelburne, N. S., refused permission to buy provisions, &c., sufficient to last the crew on the homeward trip of the vessel; the vessel's papers were retained by the collector for an undue length of time, &c. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 58-59.)

Jeannie Seaverns, of Gloucester, Mass., Joseph Tupper, master. While in the port of Liverpool, N. S., Captain Quigley, of the Dominion cruiser Terror, prevented Captain Tupper from landing to visit relatives in Liverpool, and forbade Captain Tupper's relatives from going on board the Jeannie Seaverns, placing a guard aboard of her while she was in that port. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 58-59, and 60.)

Martha and Julia, of Eastport, Me., W. H. Farris, master. While in Digby Harbor, Nova Scotia, April (1) 18, 1886, was denied the privilege of buying herring. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 169-170.)

James A. Garfield, threatened with seizure on opportunity; charged with having purchased bait or ice in Dominion port or ports. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, p. 171.)

Miss A. Snow, of Gloucester, Mass., Jeremiah Hopkins, master. Subjected to constant surveillance in harbor at Shelburne, N. S., by Captain Quigley, of Dominion cruiser Terror, who finally boarded her with an armed guard, took Captain Hopkins ashore under armed guard, and threatened him with trouble if he revisited Shelburne. (This Rep., pp. 135-136, 138.)

Highland Light, of Provincetown, Mass. Seized off the northeast point of Prince Edward Island for catching fish within 3-mile limit. (This Rep., pp. 34, 153.)

Eliza A. Thoms, of Portland, Me., having gone ashore at Malpeque, laden with a cargo of fish, the owners were not permitted to ship home either the fish, boats, or seizures by vessels, but were, after delay, compelled to ship them by rail. (This Rep., pp. 259-260.)

Vessels seized by Canadian authorities on the charge of violating the fishery regulations of the Dominion.

The Druid, of Gloucester, Mass., John McQuinn, master. Sailing under register to buy fish, not to catch, and having on board no apparatus for fishing, was boarded by the captain of the Dominion cruiser Honlette, with armed men, and once detained two nights and a day under armed guard at Malpeque on a charge of technical violation of customs regulations; subsequently released. (This Rep., pp. 129-132.)

(H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 52, 53, 54, 56, 153. This Rep., p. 216.)

Annie M. (or H.) Jordan, of Gloucester, Mass., was refused entry at the port of Andrews, New Brunswick, although licensed to touch and trade. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 15, 171-172, 175-176. This Rep., p. 163.)

Martha A. Bradley, Rattler, Eliza Boynton, and Pioneer, of Gloucester, Mass., were warned by the sub-collector of customs at Canso to keep outside an imaginary line drawn from a point 3 miles outside Canso Head to a point outside St. Esprit, on the Cape Breton coast, a distance of 40 miles. This line, for nearly its entire continuance, is distant 12 to 25 miles from the coast. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 16, 42, 44, 48-49, 56-57, 120-123, 190-191. Vessels subjected to hostile treatment by Dominion officials.

The Shiloh and the Julia Ellen.—While these vessels were entering the harbor of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, Captain Quigley, of the Canadian cruiser Terror, fired a gun across their bows to hasten their coming to, and placed a guard of two armed men on board each vessel, which guard remained on board until the vessels left the harbor. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 44, 122-23. This Rep., 168.)

Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., Alexander Landry, master; was in port of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, October 11, 1886, under detention for alleged infraction of customs regulations, and while so there Captain Quigley, of the Dominion cruiser Terror, compelled Captain Landry to haul down his (the United States) flag; upon its being run up a second time Captain Quigley went on board the Grimes and hauled the flag down with his own hands. (H. R. Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, pp. 124-25, 153-63.)

It will be seen, from the correspondence and papers submitted by the President, in his message on the subject, of the 8th of December last (Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session), and from the testimony taken by the committee, that some of these instances of seizure or detention, or of driving vessels away by threats, &c., were in clear violation of the treaty of 1818, and that others were on such slender and technical grounds, either as applied to fishing rights or commercial rights, as to make it impossible to believe that they were made with the large and just object of protecting substantial rights against real and substantial invasion, but must have been made either under the stimulus of the cupidity of the seizing officer, sharpened and made safe by the extraordinary legislation to which the committee has referred, whereby the seizing officer, no matter how unjust or illegal his procedure may have been, is made practically secure from the necessity of making substantial redress to the party wronged, or of punishment or else they must have arisen from a systematic disposition on the part of the Dominion authorities to vex and harass American fishing and other vessels so as to produce such a state of embarrassment and inconvenience with respect to intercourse with the Provinces as to coerce the United States into arrangements of general reciprocity with the Dominion.

In respect of general reciprocity the experience of the United States during the existence of the treaty of 1854 was such as to lead Congress, with great unanimity, to terminate it; and the experience of the United States, under such so-called reciprocity as was provided for by the treaty of 1871, was such as to lead both houses, with very great unanimity, to terminate that. Each of these instances continued long enough to show fully the general working of the arrangement. The great balance of gain and advantage appeared to be in favor of the Canadians, while the great balance of loss and disadvantage fell on the people of the United States.

Indeed, the treaty of 1871, so far as it related to the fisheries, &c., was based upon the idea that the right of American fishermen to fish within 3 miles of the Dominion shores was of some considerable value, which the United States thought would be fully compensated by admitting Dominion fishermen to the waters of the United States and admitting their fish free of duty. Notwithstanding this, by the methods and results of settling the balance of pecuniary advantages by the Halifax Commission, the United States paid on the award of that Commission (waiving the serious question of its irregularity) $5,500,000. So strong was the opinion of the United States, even at that time, that this award was wholly unjust in fact that it is understood that steps were taken to invite the British Government to terminate the fisheries clauses of the treaty of 1871 immediately and before the positive period of ten years had expired, but it could not be accomplished.

From the investigations made by the committee during the last summer and fall, and as the result of the great mass of testimony taken by it and herewith returned, the committee believe it to be clear, beyond all dispute, that the right to fish within three miles of the Dominion shores is of no practical advantage whatever to American fishermen. The cod and halibut fishing has been for many years almost entirely carried on at long distances from the shores, in the deep waters, on banks, &c.; and it is believed that were there absolute liberty for Americans to fish, without restriction or regulation of any kind, within three miles of the Dominion shores, no such fisherman would ever think of going there for the purpose of catching cod or halibut.

As regards the obtaining of bait for this class of fishing, the testimony taken by the committee in its inquiries clearly demonstrates that there is no necessity whatever for American fishermen to resort to Canadian waters for that purpose. Clam bait is found in immense quantities in our own waters, and there have been instances, so frequent and continuous as to amount to a habit, of the Canadians themselves resorting to American waters or ports for the purpose of obtaining it. The squid bait is found on the very banks where the fishing goes on. So that the instances would be extremely rare when any American fishing vessel would wish to resort to a Dominion port for the purpose of buying bait for this kind of fishing.

It was also proved before the committee that, with the rarest exception, it would be absolutely injurious to the pecuniary interests of all concerned for American vessels to resort to Dominion ports or waters, except in need or distress, for the time taken in such departures from the cod and halibut grounds, or from direct sailing to and from them, is so great that, with or without the difference of port expenses, time and money are both lost in such visits.

In respect of the mackerel fishery the committee finds, as will be seen from the evidence referred to, that its course and methods have of late years entirely changed. While it used to be carried on by vessels fishing with hook and line, and sometimes near the shores, it is now almost entirely carried on by the use of immense seines, called purse-seines, of great length and descending many fathoms into the water. This gear is very expensive, and a fishing vessel does not usually carry more than one or two. The danger of fishing near the shore with such seines is great, on account of striking rocks and reefs, that it is regarded as extremely hazardous ever to undertake it. Besides this, the large schools of mackerel, to the taking of which this great apparatus is best adapted, are almost always found more than 3 miles from land, either in great bays and gulfs or entirely out at sea.

There will be found accompanying this report (see Appendix) statements showing the total catch of mackerel during certain years and the parts of the seas where they have been taken; and it will also be seen from the evidence that in general the mackerel fisheries by Americans in the Gulf of Saint Lawrence and in the Bay of Chaleur have not been remunerative.

In view of all these facts, well known to the great body of the citizens of the United States engaged in fisheries and embracing every variety of interest connected therewith, from the wholesale dealer, vessel-owner, and outfitter, to that portion of the crew who receive the smallest share of the venture, it must be considered as conclusively established that there would be no material value whatever in the grant by the British Government to American fishermen of absolutely free fishing; and in this conclusion it will be seen, by a reference to the testimony, that all these interests fully concur.

It will also be noticed, on reference to the evidence, that it appears to show that when by force of the treaty of 1871 Canadian fish, both salt and fresh, were admitted to the markets of the United States free of duty, no fall of prices to the consumer took place, and that the abrogation of the duty simply redounded to the advantage of the foreign fishermen or the foreign dealers in fish exporting the same to the United States; and that when, on the 1st of July, 1885, the duty on salt fish was revived, no part of this duty was borne by the consumers in the United States, and that the cost of fish in the United States was not at all affected. It would follow that the sums received into the Treasury from these fish duties were paid and borne by the Canadians alone. A parallel instance is also found, on reference to the testimony, in the statements of gentlemen engaged in exporting salt fish from the United States to other countries where duties are imposed, these gentlemen stating that the duty thus imposed upon fish came out of their pockets and not out of the pockets of the foreign consumers.

As regards commercial and other friendly business intercourse between ports and places in the Dominion and the United States, it is, of course, of much importance that regulations affecting the same should be mutually reasonable and fairly administered. If an American vessel should happen to have caught a cargo of fish at sea a hundred miles distant from some Canadian port, from which there is railway communication to the United States, and should be denied the privilege of landing and shipping its cargo therefrom to the United States, as the Canadians do, it would be of course a serious disadvantage, and there is, it is thought, nothing in the treaty of 1818 which would warrant such an exclusion. But the Dominion laws may make such a distinction, and it is understood that in fact the privilege of so shipping fish from American vessels has been refused during the last year.

It is also inconvenient and injurious that American vessels of any character, whether engaged in fishing, or licensed to touch and trade, purely mercantile vessels, should be unable in cases of occasional necessity to resort to Canadian ports for the purpose of buying supplies of any commodities that the ordinary laws of the Dominion allow to be imported at all. Several instances of such injurious and unfriendly action appear to have taken place.

The treaties between the United States and Great Britain on the subject of intercommunication and the rights of the citizens and subjects of one in the ports and territories of the other have not included the British dominions of North America (with possibly certain exceptions to intercourse by land), and such intercourse, strangely enough, still remains the subject of legislation merely in the two countries. Such legislation to be tolerable must be mutually friendly and reciprocal, and laws upon the subject must be administered fairly and generously, and not in a spirit of carping at small matters or in any other wise in an unfriendly way. The committee is pained to believe that such has not been the course of British legislation or of administrative practice.

In view of all that has taken place, the committee thinks it to be the duty of the United States, in a firm and just way, to protect and defend the just and common rights of the people of the United States, whether fishermen, or traders, or travelers, or all, by all such measures as may be within our power. The measures the committee propose to this end rest upon a principle universally recognized as right and necessary in the intercourse of nations, and it has often been resorted to in one form or another by many nations.

It is recommended that the President of the United States be invested with the power, and that it be made his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that unjust, unfair, or unfriendly conduct is practiced by the British Government in respect of our citizens and their property within the ports or waters of the British dominions in North America, to deny to the subjects of that Government in British North America and their property, or to any classes of them, such privileges in the waters and ports of the United States as he may think proper to name, and to suspend in respect of such vessels or classes of vessels or such property or classes of property of the subjects of such Government the right of entering or being brought within the waters or ports of the United States, so that he shall be able from time to time, as each emergency may arise, to preserve the intercourse between the United States and that Government in a state of fair equality. The committee therefore recommends the passage of the bill (S. 3173) herewith reported.

The committee also recommends that the papers, documents, and maps herewith returned be printed.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
For the Committee.

[49th Congress, 2d session, S. 3173.]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places

Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

AMERICAN FISHERY INTERESTS.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Testimony taken by a subcommittee (consisting of Senators Edmunds, Frye, and Saulsbury) of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, under the following resolutions of the Senate, of the 25th of July, 1886:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the rights of American fishing vessels and merchant vessels within the North American possessions of the Queen of Great Britain, and whether any rights of such vessels have been violated, and, if so, to what extent; that said committee report upon the subject, and report whether any and what steps are necessary to be taken by Congress to insure the protection and vindication of the rights of citizens of the United States in the premises; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer, and to sit during the recess of the Senate, either as a full committee or by any subcommittee thereof, and that any such subcommittee shall for the purposes of such investigation be a committee of the Senate to all intents and purposes.

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of said committee in said investigation be paid out of the appropriation for the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman thereof.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE H. WATTS.

BOSTON, MASS., September 30, 1886.

GEORGE H. WATTS sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Forty-nine last April.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. In Charlestown, Mass.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Wholesale fish dealer in Boston.

Q. How long have you been in that business?—A. It will be seventeen years the 1st of December coming; I think that is about the time.

FRESH FISH.

Q. Do you deal in both salt and fresh fish?—A. No, sir; exclusively in fresh fish.

Q. What kinds of fresh fish chiefly?—A. Cod, haddock, halibut, mackerel, bluefish, sword-fish, hake, cusk, pollock, and flounders. Those are the principal fish we have. Of course we have eels and perch and all those small fishes, that we deal in to a small extent, as well as herring in the winter.

Q. About how many different vessels, in round numbers, come to deliver their catch to you in a season?

The WITNESS. That is, taking in all varieties of fish?

Senator EDMUNDS. All varieties.

A. I should say at least four hundred. You will understand, gentlemen, that I don't mean to say that they run continuously, but we have that many different vessels.

Q. About what would be the average number of persons employed on a vessel, including captain and all hands?—A. They will average, I should say, fifteen men to a vessel; some will not carry more than twelve, while others might carry twenty; I don't think the average would be far from fifteen.

Q. What portions of the sea-coast—and by "coast" I mean all the Banks from the south to the extreme northeast—do all those vessels cover?—A. They cover all the fishing territory between the North Bay, Nova Scotia, and the Grand Banks, Georges, and all the intermediate fishing grounds to the south of us.

Q. How far south does that go?—A. They go as far as Pollock Rip and Cape Hatteras. Perhaps I may be in error about that; I refer, of course, to the southern border of the mackerel fishing.

Q. What is the southernmost trip taken by any vessel that comes to you here?—A. Cape Hatteras. Fishing is only of short duration in the spring.

EXTENT OF FISHERIES.

Q. About how many, should you think, of these different vessels fish at some time during the season in waters to the north and east of United States territory?—A. I should say at least two-thirds of the whole fleet during the year. Perhaps I can explain that a little further, so that you will understand it more readily. Some parts of that fleet will go in the winter after frozen herring; many of them will go down to what is called Fortune Bay and Bay of Islands; others will go down to Grand Manan, opposite Eastport, Me.; then there are others that in the spring of the year will go off on some of those grounds adjacent, after codfish, on what is called the Cape Shore; Cape Negro is another point they make; and others, of course, will go on to the neutral grounds, the Banks. The mackerel fleet will go all along the northeast coast down as far as North Bay. I think that is about the terminus. They also catch some halibut in these waters.

FISHING SEASONS.

Q. What is the mackerel season in those waters?—A. Generally from about the 1st of July until the 1st of September; that is what they call the mackerel season, but they often catch them later. They have caught them this year until the last part of September.

Q. What is the halibut season up there?—A. On the Banks that is generally the year round. Of course they catch more in the summer than in the winter, but when the weather is not too boisterous they go the year round.

Q. Are any other kinds of fish taken there except mackerel and halibut?—A. Yes; they take salmon and some shad. I suppose you would not call them ocean fish, although many of them are caught in the bays.

FISHING LOCALITIES.

Q. They are caught within three miles of the shore line?—A. Yes, sir; great many salmon are caught in St. John Harbor.

Q. You do not get any salmon or haddock to speak of in those waters?—A. No, sir; I don't think they get any haddock down there to speak of; they may get a few around Digby.

METHODS OF TREATMENT.

Q. The codfish our people catch up there are salted there, are they not?—A. Yes; most of them are cured in the vessel.

Q. Is not that true also of mackerel?—A. Yes, sir; though no mackerel come from there except by steamer. We have had one steamer called the Novelty, that has run four or five courses. She was built for that business, and generally runs four or five trips.

THE CASE OF THE NOVELTY.

Q. The Novelty is the vessel, is she not, about which there has been some difficulty?—A. There has been some controversy; I hardly think there has been any difficulty. Captain Jones says he has not been molested to any extent, but they would not allow him to land to get coal. They claimed that coal was not provided for by the language of the treaty allowing vessels to land for wood, water, shelter, and to repair damages. They claimed that wood and water were all that was allowed to be landed for under the terms of the treaty, and they would not allow him to take in coal. He tried to land on the Magdalen Island for coal, claiming that that was neutral ground, but they would not allow that.

Q. Is Boston the home port of that vessel?—A. No, sir; her home port is Portland.

THE THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Tell us what you know and think as to what proportion of the fish, before the expiration of the last treaty, were caught within the three-mile limit, saying nothing about the headland question.—A. I have made some inquiries at different seasons in regard to the fish caught within the three-mile limit, and although I do not speak by authority, yet, as nearly as I can ascertain, the amount of fish caught during the term of the last treaty, twelve years, did not exceed $764,000 worth in the markets.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you mean as sold in the markets?—A. Yes; that was the market value.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What do our vessels have occasion (supposing they are not to fish inside the three-mile limit) to go inside for?—A. A vessel might get out of ice when fresh fishing, or it might get out of stores, or water, or something of that description. Aside from that, nothing but stress of weather, I should suppose, would drive them in.

BAIT.

Q. How is it as to the question of bait?—A. Of course that is a contingency to be looked at; still I think there is no trouble about our vessels getting all the bait they want in our own waters, if the Canadian ports were closed entirely so that they could not go in there at all.

Q. Take mackerel, for instance; what is the bait used for them?—A. They are not taken with bait, but with seines.

Q. The great mass of mackerel are now taken in purse seines?—A. Yes; you might say the entire lot.

Q. What kind of bait is used for halibut?—A. Herring to some extent, but squid almost entirely. Sometimes they take out salt bait if fresh bait is not plentiful. My theory in regard to that subject is that our vessels have been so used to go into Canadian ports for bait because they can get it there so cheap, that it has done away with them taking a supply of bait with them when they sail. They are afraid to go for bait, for fear they cannot find a market for it. I think herring can be taken in our own waters all the year round.

MENHADEN.

Another important point in that connection is the menhaden question. If our Government would look at that question as we look at it, and prohibit those steamers from catching menhaden for oil, which has driven them off of our shores almost entirely, we would have plenty of menhaden all the time. But these steamers begin in the spring and catch them at all seasons, and grind them up for oil, and that has a strong tendency to drive the menhaden from our shores.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Are they good bait?—A. Splendid bait.

Q. You would prohibit that entirely?—A. I don't know as to that. But it seems to me really that if this controversy is going to continue between the two countries in regard to the fisheries, we ought to use every endeavor and every resource we have to procure our own bait. These steamers go out and catch menhaden and porgies expressly for oil purposes; the steamers are built for that purpose; they take them in large quantities, and have done so for years, until the last year or two, when they have scarcely been able to get any. They take all that comes along and grind them up for oil. Our fishermen of course have to go without that bait, from the fact that they cannot find any. If something was done by legislation to prevent those steamers from catching menhaden for a certain length of time we would have them back on our shores.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Would not the effect of that also be to bring in the bluefish, mackerel, and all other shore fish?—A. I should not be at all surprised if that would have some effect on those other fishes. We now get almost no bluefish.

BAIT.

Q. What kind of bait is found on the Banks and up to the northeast?—A. I do not know really in regard to that. I think you will get more information on that subject at Provincetown than I can give you, as I have never been engaged in that kind of fishery. I suppose, however, that they use the same bait that we do in our business—squid, herring, and those small fish.

Q. Are the codfish taken with salted bait?—A. They are very loth to bite salt bait.

Q. They have salt enough in the sea for their purposes?—A. Yes. They do not bite herring even as well as they do squid.

THE MARKET FOR FRESH FISH.

Q. Where do these great quantities of fresh fish go that pass through the hands of yourself and your fellow-dealers here in Boston?—A. They are shipped all over the country, far and near. We ship them as far west as Saint Louis, and even at times as far as Kansas City. We ship them all through the western part of New York, to Michigan, Wisconsin, and through the Canadas, and north through our own eastern and middle States.

THE THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Can you tell me in general what you think is the relative proportion, say of mackerel, that, before the three-mile treaty expired, were caught within the three miles, to those caught without?—A. No, I don't think I can tell you perhaps as well as some gentlemen can at Gloucester on that point. My opinion, however, would be that the proportion caught inside would be very small; in fact, according to the statistics, that must be so. Again, it is very seldom that our vessels go down in the bay for mackerel when we have mackerel in our own bays. The bay is regarded by our fishermen as the last resort for mackerel when they cannot be taken nearer. It is only when the mackerel are driven inshore by dog-fish or bluefish, or some of the larger fishes, that you can catch mackerel close to shore. They mostly keep out unless they are driven in by some fish obnoxious to them.

Q. How would that be with the cod?—A. I don't think that our men go there often for cod; I do not think there are many cod on the shores down there; I never heard of many being caught along shore; they are mostly taken on the banks and out to sea.

Senator EDMUNDS. I know that the fishermen on the north shore of the Bay of Chaleur and along that coast go off into the bay as much as ten miles to catch their cod.

The WITNESS. Go down to Yarmouth, and you will find them out ten to twelve miles from shore.

Q. Taking the results of your observation and information, what would you consider the real value to our fishermen of the right to fish within the three-mile limit, saying nothing about the bait question?—A. As far as I can ascertain, from talking with our most intelligent fishermen, I think there would not be one dissenting voice if they were excluded entirely from the three-mile limit; that is, that they should not go within three miles of the shore; I do not mean within a line drawn from headland to headland. The bluefish that are caught within the three-mile limit are no account at all.

Q. Are not all the fish along our coast that amount to anything caught outside the three-mile limit?—A. Yes, pretty much.

DUTIES ON FISH.

There is one thing perhaps I ought to state in regard to the duties on fish.

Senator EDMUNDS. That has a bearing upon the international question, and we would like to hear your views about that.

The WITNESS. I have studied this question somewhat, and have followed the legislation of Congress with some particularity as far as it has gone, and I have found that there was no one before the committee in Washington to explain to that committee what effect the duties on the from a foreign port would have upon the consumer. I think I saw that Mr. West and Mr. Blackford, of New York, and I think one or two from Boston—I think Mr. Jones was one of them—stated to that committee that they wanted free fish because it would cheapen food-fishes to the consumer. In my opinion the result would be entirely different. The imposition of a dollar a hundred as duty on fish coming into our market would not have the effect to cheapen fish to the consumer. Everybody should understand the question as we see and know it to be. The retail markets all over the country—south, west, north, and east—always have a stated price the year round for fish—a certain price for codfish, for haddock, for halibut and for mackerel, and that is the price that they continue to have whether they buy cheap or dear. They buy, of course, at wholesale, like myself, as a rule. But whereas we rise and fall with the market, as the market is sustained by the quantity that is brought in, they have a steady price the year round. If they are worth $1.50, the addition of $1 duty would make them sell for $2.50. If there was no duty, they would sell for $1.50. But the consumer has to pay the same price with or without duty. The same principle holds good with reference to cod, haddock. I think the parties who made that statement before the committee, that free fish would tend to cheapen fish to the consumer, were laboring under a mistake.

Then, again, there is another thing which is going to be of very great importance to the fishers off our coast, if our Government gives them the free right to come into our markets with fresh fish as well as salt. I say if there is going to be duty on either let it be on both. Duties on salt fish will not help you if you leave the markets open for fresh fish. Halifax, St. John, Montreal, and Quebec are great railroad and steamboat centers. Now, if fish are allowed to come into our country free it will be the easiest thing in the world to distribute those fish from the first of November to the first of April from all those points all through our country at a good deal less price than we can buy them for from the vessels and at a less price than our vessels can afford to catch them for.

FRESH FISH SHIPPED TO THE WEST AND SUBSEQUENTLY CURED.

The duties on salt fish being so much, fresh fish might be shipped through to Chicago, and other points west, and there cured. How are you going to stop it?

Q. That is, they are shipped as fresh fish and cured afterwards?—A. Yes; shipped for immediate consumption, according to the construction of the law, but when they get there they are put into salt.

CANADIAN DUTY.

The Canadian Government last summer passed a law imposing a duty of 50 cents on fish, and yet I ship to Quebec or Montreal, having to pay only 50 cents a hundred. I can illustrate this by stating a transaction that took place at Yarmouth last spring. One of our vessels went out haddocking on the Georges and got blown out of her course.

Q. You mean Yarmouth, Nova Scotia?—A. Yes; he made port at Yarmouth. He had from 12,000 to 20,000 fish. Of course he did not want to keep them while going back to the Banks, for fear of losing them, and so he sold them in Yarmouth; I think he got $92 or $93 for what he had. Before he got paid for them and got away the custom-house folks came down on him and made him pay a little more for duty than he got for his fish. The purchasers boxed them up and sold them here in the Boston market.

Q. The same identical fish?—A. The same identical fish.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you know what he got for them?—A. I think it was $2.56; they were scarce at the time when they happened to come in. It is quite a large question, of course, but the interest at stake here all along our coast I think is large enough to justify our Government in taking hold of it with a proper degree of earnestness. We have $37,000,000 invested in our fisheries, and it seems to me we have some right to protection at the hand of our Government.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What is the nationality of the majority of these fifteen or twenty men to the vessel who come to this port?—A. So far as I understand it I should say that they are about half Nova Scotiamen; perhaps the proportion is even larger than that. You can ascertain that more definitely in Gloucester. There are some very progressive men in Gloucester, and, if you are not acquainted with parties there, I can give you the names of some gentlemen who are large owners, and who are interested in the question accordingly.

Senator EDMUNDS. Before you leave the room, please write their names down and give the list to the clerk.

The WITNESS. You will also be able, I think, to obtain much information at Portland.

THE FISHERMEN'S SHARE OF THE PROFITS.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What proportion of the estimated price of fish do the fishermen themselves get?

The WITNESS. You are speaking of our own fishermen and of fish caught in our own waters?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. To-day, for instance, the market is bare and prices are high. Haddock sold to-day as high as $5 a hundred.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Do you mean a hundred pounds, or a hundred fish?—A. A hundred pounds. We paid $5 to the fishermen, and we sell them for $5.50.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What does the retailer get?—A. Different prices in different places; 7 cents a pound is the price for haddock, and 10 cents for cod.

Q. What proportion will the retail price bear, on the average, to what the fishermen get? Will the fishermen get half?—A. Oh, no; suppose they do not get over one-third. As a rule the fishermen get within half a cent of what the dealers get, whether the price is high or low. Sometimes they get more than the dealers, if the dealers happen to buy too high.

FROZEN FISH.

Q. What do you know about the freezing processes that have obtained in the last ten or twelve years?—A. I think they have been of great detriment to the business.

Q. What are the processes?

The WITNESS. You mean the way they are cured?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. The cold air acts on the fish so as to preserve them, the same as salt does. Refrigerating houses are built in which the fish are hung on hooks until frozen. The interior of those houses is intersected with cold-air pipes, and over the top of the interior are placed ice and salt. These pipes run into the freezing-room and reduce the temperature down to a point considerably below zero sometimes, but as a rule from five to ten above zero.

Q. How long can those fish be preserved in that way?—A. Just as long as they can be kept from thawing.

Q. Suppose a cargo of those frozen fish were to come from St. John, New Brunswick, in a car?—A. When the weather is not too warm you can keep them all winter.

Q. Do you keep them in refrigerators?—A. Not in the winter time.

Q. In the summer they have to be transported in refrigerator cars?—A. Yes; going west, they generally go in refrigerator cars.

Q. So that a cargo of fish might arrive here in Boston in the summer and be distributed all over the country?—A. Yes.

Q. And be preserved for a considerable time?—A. Yes. There is no trouble about keeping fish after they are once frozen; they will continue to keep as long as they can be kept from thawing.

Q. Do most of the vessels take ice?—A. Yes, but the ice does not freeze the fish, it only serves to keep them.

Q. What do you do with them after you get them in the Boston market?—A. We take them out and put them in ice-boxes, and immediately ship them to the parties who order them.

Q. And you can send them all over the country?—A. Not in the summer time. It costs more to ship them in the summer than in the winter.

Q. What is the average time that they are kept fresh in the summer, from the time they are taken up to the time they are consumed?—A. I should say about six days from the time they are taken from the water; that is, averaging right through, all kinds of fish.

Q. Then it is six days after they are taken before the consumer gets them?—A. Yes, on the average.

Q. In the winter how long is the average?—A. That depends on the state of the fish. Sometimes fish are caught in extremely cold weather and the weather freezes them; such fish you can keep a long time. Fish that are brought in in ice in the winter will not keep any longer than in the summer.

Q. Suppose a cargo of halibut frozen comes into Gloucester?—A. They do not come in frozen. You cannot freeze halibut with any advantage; that has been tried.

Q. Suppose a cargo of frozen hake comes to Gloucester?—A. We may take frozen hake and put them into a freezer, but no hake are handled from Boston. We have had cargo after cargo from the Grand Banks in the middle of January, and we had to keep them until the middle of March before they were cleared out.

Q. You spoke of supplying the West as far as Kansas City with fresh fish. What time is consumed from the time those fish are taken out until they are consumed in Kansas City?—A. Probably ten days.

Q. They can by their freezing processes keep the fish for months and months before they send them out?—A. Yes.

Q. And supply the market as they please with frozen fish?—A. Yes.

EXTENT OF FRESH-FISHING INTERESTS.

Q. Have you any idea as to the extent of the fresh-fish market in this country?—A. No, sir; I cannot give you any reliable information except as to our own market. We handle here in Boston about 60,000,000 pounds per annum; that includes all kinds of fresh fish.

CURING OF FRESH FISH AFTER LANDING.

Q. Your idea is that that item of our tariff law which says "fish fresh for immediate consumption" ought not to apply to any of these frozen fish?—A. Yes. I do not see why frozen fish cannot go on the list as cured fish as well as salt fish. They are certainly cured for preservation, are they not? They are not cured for immediate consumption.

Q. Suppose a cargo of halibut comes into Gloucester fresh, and is shipped from Gloucester fresh to Boston; is there anything to prevent those fish being cured in Boston?

The WITNESS. You mean foreign fish, from Nova Scotia?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. Well, no, sir; there is nothing that I know of. I did hear this summer of a Nova Scotia vessel coming in, and they had to pay duties, but I am not sufficiently versed in that matter to give any accurate information about it.

Q. Is there any way, under the present tariff law, which admits free of duty fish fresh for immediate consumption, by which you can prevent the landing of fresh fish and their subsequent curing?—A. I do not know any possible way. Take this case: We had shipped to us from Halifax on last Monday's steamer between 113,000 and 114,000 mackerel; they were bought at Halifax by telegraph. We buy mackerel according to their lengths, those from 13½ inches up being considered large. They telegraphed that the fish were from 11½ to 13½. We ordered them, and they were shipped. When they arrived we found that there were 370 barrels of those fish that would not measure ten inches. Those fish could not be kept 48 hours after they arrived here unless there was something done with them. What was the consequence? Those fish were canned. Then we had more large mackerel than we could sell fresh. What were we going to do with them? They cost us a high price, and we could not afford to lose them. We bought them for immediate consumption, but the market would not take them. There were more fish than we expected, and we were obliged to salt those fish or throw them away. A man will not throw fish away if he can save them, and so we salted them. I think that is a good illustration of how that law can be evaded.

FISH, FRESH, FOR IMMEDIATE CONSUMPTION.

Then, again, how can they make a man responsible for fish bought for immediate consumption when he cannot sell them at all? How can the law compel payment of duty in such a case? The object of this law, as we look upon it, is not to compel the American people to pay duties, but it is to make the people who ship the stock here pay them. Is not that the construction of the law? The fish come here for immediate consumption, and we have either got to be at a loss by throwing them away, or salt them, and it seems to me that under such circumstances it would be pretty hard if we were compelled to pay duty on them.

Q. Have you in fresh for immediate consumption?—A. No. I know of many must be quite a Q. Do you know port with a cargo cured subsequent ing that can come from a Canadian vessel nor do I know vessel is allowed

No, sir; I could not give you any direct information. I know of many lots, and there are many lots going to other places. There must be quite a large percentage that are subsequently cured.

Q. Do you know of anything which prevents a Canadian coming into port with a cargo of fresh fish, admitted free, and the whole cargo being cured subsequently?—A. No, sir; I do not know of any law now existing that can compel a dealer in Gloucester who buys a cargo of fresh fish from a Canadian vessel, and cannot use them fresh, from salting them; nor do I know of any law that can compel the payment of duty, if the vessel is allowed to enter and sell her fish, by the man who buys the fish.

PROPORTION OF DUTY PAID BY FOREIGNERS AND BY AMERICANS.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What proportion of this fish duty, while in operation, do you think falls on the foreigner, and what proportion on the buyer from the ship?

The WITNESS. The fresh fish, you mean?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

A. I do not think there is any falls on either; I do not think there has been any duty paid on fresh fish. So I say that is where the law worked badly.

Q. Take the salt fish?—A. With reference to salt fish, I don't see how the duty has made one cent's difference to the consumer.

Q. That is what you stated; but suppose there is a duty of half a dollar a hundred, who pays that half-dollar? Does it come out of the profits of the wholesale dealer, or of the man that brings them in?—A. It comes out of the foreigner who brings them in, because he has to pay the duty before he lands, and then he has to sell his fish at the market price here.

Q. You cannot see that part of it would be a contribution that the dealer makes, and the other part would be a contribution made by the fishermen?—A. Well, I don't see how that can be; I don't see how the dealer can contribute.

Q. Does not the man who brings in the fish say to himself, "Now, what I have got to pay half a dollar a hundred on these fish, I must charge the dealer a quarter of a dollar a hundred more than I otherwise would?"—A. I don't think that would hold water; I never saw a fisherman that wouldn't ask all that he could get, duty or no duty.

Q. Do you know whether the wholesale dealers in salt fish have paid any more on the average since the duty revived than before?—A. I think they have bought them for a great deal less. I think the duties that the Canadian people will pay on the fish they take out of their own people.

PRICE OF CODFISH AS AFFECTED BY THE TREATY OF 1873.

Q. What was the average price of codfish at wholesale during the existence of the treaty of 1873?—A. I can't give you the exact figures; but Georges codfish ran all the way from $3.75 to $7 per quintal, and Bank fish in the same proportion, only a little less; they don't bring quite as much.

Q. Since the treaty terminated, how was it?—A. Since the treaty terminated fish have never been so low as they have been in the last three years, on account of the market being glutted all the time; there has been more than could be consumed. Georges codfish have sold as low as $3.25, and Bank at $2.75, and I have known them to sell as low as $1.25.

Q. You say the market has been glutted?—A. Yes; there has been either less demand or more fish, I don't know which. I think the demand for salt fish has fallen off a great deal, from the fact that the canning business has increased and the facilities for shipping fresh fish have increased. Of course there are only about so many fish consumed of all kinds, and whichever kind increases the other kinds will be decreased to that extent in the quantity sold. It is my opinion that the increase in canning fresh fish has been detrimental to the sale of salt fish and has decreased the quantity that would otherwise have been salted.

EXPORTATION OF FRESH FISH TO CANADA.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. During the winter months of last year how large a sale of fresh fish did you make in the Canadas?—A. I should say about 38 tons per week.

Q. How large during the summer months?—A. In the summer months I should say about 10 tons or 20,000 pounds a week.

DUTY.

Q. On all that you pay a duty of how much?—A. They pay the duty.

Q. There is a duty?—A. Yes, sir; of about 50 cents a hundred of fresh fish.

Q. When you send it there you pay the duty?—A. No, sir; they pay their own duty.

Q. That duty is 50 cents a hundred?—A. Fifty cents a hundred.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Is that an import duty?—A. It is an export.

Q. If you export them they are subject to the Canadian duty, are they not?—A. We never had to pay it; they have always paid their own duties. We telegraph the price of our markets in the morning, and they know that they have got to pay half a cent duty on it when they buy. We ship at that price, and they pay their own duties.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. But there is a duty on all fresh fish shipped to Canada, under the tariff law?—A. Yes; a duty of fifty cents per hundred pounds.

Q. Of course that exportation is all to the Upper Canadas?—A. Montreal and Quebec.

Q. Do you send there any cured fish?—A. Very little; once in a while just a little; not enough to take any account of. I think you will find

CLOSE TIME.

Q. There is pending before Congress a proposition to make a close time on mackerel, from March, I think, until the middle of June or first of July?—A. The first day of June.

Q. You have had pretty large experience in dealing with mackerel; what is your opinion of that proposition?—A. I think it would redound to the benefit of the fishermen, the dealers, the vessel-owners and all, more than most anything that could be done, from the fact that the mackerel caught in the spring are of very inferior grades. They are caught from the time they start from the Gulf Stream and are destroyed by the seines. The schools are broken up, so that the fish are driven off, and by the time the fish reach their destination they are to a large extent unfit for food, and they only cumber the ground, as you may say, and take the place of nice stock that could be sold if they were not in the market. A close time would also give the mackerel a chance to get back on their old spawning ground where they used to spawn years ago. I can not find any one who disagrees with me on all these points with the exception of two or three parties in New York. This testimony is going to be confidential, I understand, but I would not like to make any more statements, on account of New York, for I deal very heavily in New York. Mr. Blackford, who is one of the fish commissioners in New York, is a large retail dealer, and very much interested about getting the first fish of the season. Then there are two or three firms that sell on commission, to whom the largest part of the fleet always consign their cargoes for that market, and they sell for 12½ per cent. commission, so that of course all the fish they can handle is for their pecuniary benefit.

Q. What time do you say the mackerel spawn?—A. As far as I can learn, from about the middle of April to the end of May.

Q. And you would interdict fishing during the whole spawning season?—A. Yes; I think such a measure would be of great benefit. The mackerel begin to get in good order and become healthy about the 1st of June. I do not think any fish is so healthy in the spawning season as afterwards. Then, if we could have close time, it would make the market better, the people would be better pleased with the fish they buy, and there would be more general satisfaction.

Q. So your opinion is very decidedly that both consumer and fisherman would be benefited by a close season?—A. Yes; that is my idea, because the fish are not good in the spring. I have known millions to be taken in the spring, and I have known thousands of them to be carted through the streets so nearly decomposed that their entrails were hanging out. This practice is something that we here have been talking against for years and years. The fact is just this, and anybody can see it: They never used to think of going south any further than No Man's Land for mackerel, and then about the time they had got through spawning; but one would become a little more energetic than another and go farther south, and that has been kept up until they have gone south of Cape Hatteras, and of course the further south the poorer the fish are. In consequence of going so far south the percentage of large fish taken has been reduced from 56 down to 6. The percentage of large fish in our catches of mackerel the last two years has not been far from 6 per cent., while in 1868 and 1869 it was 56 per cent.

Q. You charge that reduction to taking them in the spawning season?—A. Yes; I cannot think of any other reason for it.

Q. Do you know what is the general feeling in regard to that proposition among the men who are dealing in fish and among the fishermen themselves?—A. I can tell you in regard to our folks here. We have an association, called the Fresh Fish Association, of which I am chairman. I called a meeting of that association last spring for the express purpose of getting the voice of the people on that question. We took a vote on it, and the vote was unanimous in favor of having a close season to the first of June, and there were forty-three firms represented in the meeting.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You speak of the fishermen here. What is the opinion of the fishermen who are engaged, not in the same line of fishing that yours are, but who are engaged principally in the summer fisheries along the coast?—A. As far as I know I have not yet found a fisherman of any grade, with one exception, who was not in favor of a close season, and he was a Nova Scotian, one of those men who want to get ahead of everybody else. But the cod-fishermen, the halibut, and blue-fishermen, and all the New York fishermen, are in favor of a close season, because it helps them more, and by having it these poor mackerel are kept out of the market, and they have a better chance. I saw a report that some New York gentlemen had stated before some committee of Congress that New York vessels were largely engaged in the spring mackerel catching. That is entirely erroneous; New York has not one of all those vessels are from Gloucester, Portland, Cape Cod, and Boston.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That you know positively, from your business?—A. Yes; they haven't got a mackerel boat in their New York fleet.

PRICES OF THE EARLY CATCH OF MACKEREL.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What is the difference in price to the consumer between those fish caught in the spring and those which are caught by your fishers here in the regular season?—A. There is no difference in the price to the retailers. I have seen thousands and thousands sold in New York where the same price was charged to the retailers.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. I understand you to say that you are familiar with the New York market. Have you spent a good deal of time there?—A. Yes; I have spent ten consecutive springs there, and bought for dealers here, including myself. I am as well acquainted in Fulton Market as in Boston, I think.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Your opinion is that the spring catching does not make fish cheaper to the consumer at any season?—A. Not at all. If, as I said before, the retail dealers would rise and fall with the market as the wholesalers do, it might make a difference, but where they have a stated price it cannot.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. And they do have that?—A. Yes. Go to our market to-day and inquire the price of mackerel, and you will find that they are from three to five times as high as a retailer has got to order to live; he has to buy it from the wholesaler, who can only sell an un-

The WITNESS. I was called upon, but under duress, I have felt in my mind that I should influence the thing the whole trend was in a direction. We sent on a commission to me as if it were a matter of fact that committee were in that position where there are some difficulty or some solution. I certainly am interested in vessel they were to be protected in any other way could suppose I should say they be protected.

to five times as high as we sell them. I cannot find any fault with that. A retailer has got to get considerably more than he pays for them in order to live; he has to dress them and get them up for sale, and then he can only sell an uncertain quantity.

Q. He must provide for losses every day?—A. Yes.

METHOD OF SHIPPING.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Mackerel always reach the country in barrels. Are they put up in this market in that shape, or is that done by the dealers to whom you make your consignments?—A. They are put up by the dealers to whom we sell. Country dealers are generally supplied with barrels and half barrels. They will order cod, mackerel, halibut, and bluefish all in one package, and then they are put up in barrels. We ship 90 per cent. of our stock in cases, about 500 pounds to the case, because we ship altogether by wholesale. The fish are put up iced in boxes and shipped as freight. We use in our store from 35 to 50 tons of ice per week during the summer season in which to pack those fish.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES W. WRIGHTINGTON.

BOSTON, MASS., September 30, 1886.

CHARLES W. WRIGHTINGTON sworn and examined.

The WITNESS. I want to say at the beginning that I come here very reluctantly, but under special pressure on the part of Mr. Merritt. I have felt in my mind that it is perfectly useless for me to attempt to influence the thing the other way, for it has seemed to me just as if the whole trend was in a direction against reciprocity, whereas I am in favor of it. We sent on a committee from Boston to Washington, but it seemed to me as if it were a useless thing to do, in consideration of the way that committee were met at Washington. So that I have found myself lost in that position where it would seem that the only way out was to have some difficulty or some trouble come up, and then it would find its own solution. I certainly am in favor of doing justice to all people who are interested in vessels; but it has seemed to me all the time that if they were to be protected they ought to be protected in some other way, any other way could be devised. If I were interested in vessels I suppose I should say that because other people are protected I ought to be protected.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. Will you be good enough to tell us where you live?—Answer. I live in Brookline, Mass.

Q. And you are in business in Boston?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your age?—A. I am 47.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. In the wholesale fish and canned-fish business.

Q. Salt, or fresh fish?—A. Salt.

Q. What classes of fish do you deal in?—A. Every variety of salt-water fish.

Q. And canned fish?—A. Yes. Of course those are fresh fish, and the others are cured fish. I deal in no fresh fish except canned fresh

CANNED FISH.

Q. Where do your supplies come from mostly?—A. The bulk of what we use are domestic fish.

Q. What kinds of fish?—A. Codfish, haddock, mackerel, herrings, halibut, and salmon—almost every variety of fish.

Q. Are all these kinds canned as well as cured with salt?—A. No, sir; the principal fish which are canned and canned here are fresh mackerel; fresh mackerel is about the only fish we get canned here. Of course, we can them in a great many different forms.

Q. For the domestic mackerel—that is, those taken in American waters or off American shores—what is the mackerel season when your fish come in to be canned?—A. The vessels sail southward, generally along in March or April, for the fishing grounds, and they bring them in in the early part of the season, generally to New York and some times to Philadelphia.

Q. What time does the fishing season begin that brings fresh mackerel here to you to be canned?—A. Some seasons we have mackerel brought from New York along in April, I should think.

Q. Unladen at New York and shipped here?—A. Yes; and then the fish come farther along on our coast we get them in Boston direct.

Q. What is about the usual size of mackerel that are canned?—A. Generally the small mackerel, mackerel that would be classed as medium No. 3.

Q. How long are they?—A. From 10 to 11 inches, perhaps.

Q. And that is the chief canned fish?—A. That is small mackerel. Of course, we do can other mackerel when they are selling at a price that will enable us to do so. Last year when mackerel were so plentiful on our coast we canned larger mackerel.

Q. Do you can them yourselves?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you put up cargoes or catches from what may be called British waters, off the North American coast?—A. You know we are obliged to have fish fresh, so that we are dependent upon near-by places of getting fish in order to really have them fresh enough. For canning purposes we have to have them fresh, although now that they have this steamer they can bring fish from the British waters in time.

Q. By "this steamer" you mean the Novelty?—A. Yes; there have been fresh fish canned this year that have come from Nova Scotia.

Q. But all the canned fish of the mackerel kind are the small fish are they not?—A. Yes, generally, you can say that, with some exceptions.

FREE FISH.

Q. Then how does the question of free Canadian fresh fish affect your interests or the interests of those with whom you deal?—A. It may affect us somewhat in our sale of these American sardines. We furnish capital to some of these factories along the coast of Maine, and take mortgages on them.

Q. But I am now on the mackerel question.—A. On the mackerel question, I should not think the matter of free fish would affect us very much.

SARDINES.

Q. And what do you say about the sardine business?—A. The factories engaged in the sardine business, you understand, are up along the coast of Maine, at Eastport, Jonesport, and along in that section.

Those fish come from the people do.

Q. And the herring.

Q. And they are always the small herring?—A. Yes; the small herring.

Q. Never the small menhaden or other kinds of fish?—A. No, sir; I understand not.

Q. How many factories do you own along the coast of Maine or elsewhere for sardines?—A. You go down to Eastport and they seem to be innumerable; I don't know actually how many there are, but every wharf has its factory. Perhaps Mr. Frye is better posted on that subject. There are a great many factories that are putting up these herring or sardines.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Further and further east?—A. Yes; and this way. Of course there are other factories all along the Maine coast.

SALT FISH.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Do you deal in all kinds of salt fish?—A. Yes.

Q. Where do your salted cod usually come from?—A. What we call pickle-salted come from Provincetown. I suppose you understand the distinction between dry-salted and pickle-salted; they are all cured. The dry-salted come from Gloucester, and also from Portland and along the coast of Maine; and then this year we have had cargoes of French fish cured on the island of St. Pierre.

Q. Do the most of these codfish that you deal in come from those northeastern waters?

The WITNESS. You mean from the Nova Scotia waters?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes; and the British Provinces.

A. We have a great many fish from Nova Scotia; but, as I said before, the bulk of the fish we use are domestic fish.

Senator EDMUNDS. I am now speaking of salted fish.

The WITNESS. Well, I am speaking of salted fish.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Do you know, from your information and your business, what proportion of the salted fish that you deal in are taken within the three-mile limit?—A. That is a question that I can't answer; I do not know. One side claims one thing and the other another; I don't know what the truth really is.

PRICE TO THE CONSUMER.

Q. How has the price of fish from the retail dealer to the consumer been affected since the termination of the treaty?—A. At present it must be very much higher, because this year the mackerel, the principal fish that have been caught, have been very small in numbers. I was in Europe six weeks, and I do not believe that there were 500 barrels of mackerel caught on our shores all the time I was away.

Q. How does the price stand as compared with two years ago?—A. On codfish—

Q. I am now asking about mackerel.—A. I should say that it must be very much higher, because the prices have more than doubled this year.

Q. What are the present prices of salted mackerel?—A. Salted mackerel would be rated somewhere in the neighborhood of $13 to $14 per barrel of 200 pounds.

Q. And what was the price of salted mackerel two years ago?—A. I should think somewhere in the neighborhood of $4 or $5, perhaps.

Q. Can you tell us what the retail price is now compared with two years ago?

The WITNESS. You mean to the consumer?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes. I go to my grocer and call for mackerel No. 1 or extra, or whatever you call it; can you tell me what I now pay for such?

A. I don't know; I could not say.

Q. Do you know what it was two years ago?—A. No, sir; I would not know what the retail grocer or fish dealer would get for his mackerel.

Q. Then you do not know how the changed condition of things affected the consumer himself, the man who buys his fish to eat?—A. As a matter of actual knowledge I have not bought, and so do not know. But I can see that if a retail dealer cannot to-day buy mackerel from me under $15 that I was selling last year at $8, he must charge a higher price for it.

Q. How much of this rise in price, if any, do you think has been affected by the changed condition of things since the termination of the treaty?—A. That certainly must have had its effect; how much I do not know. You understand that this year our vessels have done little or nothing along our shores; there has been a dead falling away, and they have had to go away up the Bay to get their mackerel, so that it has made a large shortage in the amount of mackerel, and that has caused a very large increase in the price.

DUTY.

Q. Take the question of duty. When there is duty on salt fish, who bears that duty? Do you and the people you deal with, or the man who eat the mackerel, and do they bear it all, or what part of it?—The consumer must bear it all, I should think.

Q. You think the producer of the fish does not bear any part of it?—A. If I get the fish I should say I have to charge my profit, and the man who buys from me has to charge his profit, and I should think it would all come upon the consumer.

Q. Upon the purchaser?—A. Upon the purchaser and not upon the seller. In consequence, of course, we have not suffered, because we have our prices established according to the prices we pay.

EFFECT OF THE TERMINATION OF THE TREATY.

Q. When this treaty terminated you were dealing in imported salt fish?—A. Yes; and domestic.

Q. Did the prices instantly advance after that?—A. No; they did not advance. Of course, there are other things that come in to influence the price you know.

Q. I understand that, but I want the fact.—A. The fact is that there was no advance; there may have been in some kinds of fish, but in general there was not, I think.

Q. Immediately after the 1st of July you paid precisely the same price that you did before?—A. I think there was a large quantity of codfish caught—

Q. I am not on the reasoning about it; I want the fact.—A. I was trying to think of the different articles, so as to answer your question. I think that, on account of other things, the prices did not advance.

Q. Who bore the difference of duty that was paid in that case?—A. I don't think the fish came; if they had come the parties in Nova Scotia would have had to bear it. Of course, we know that in the long run it must have affected the price, but in the main it was not affected, as a matter of fact.

Q. In the long run, of course, it affects some. What we want to get at from your knowledge is which side of the line was affected—whether it was the Canadian catcher and curer of fish, or whether it was the American purchaser and consumer—and one point in that would be to know whether, when the duty was put on on the 1st day of July, when the day before the price of cured codfish was so much, the wholesale price in your market advanced or receded, or what happened.—A. I think, as a matter of fact, that it did not advance because of the large stock of fish that was caught here, and those people could not send their fish here in competition unless they stood the duty, and of course they would drop out of the business if they could not.

Q. Or else they would reduce their prices and make less profits?—A. They could not afford to do that. They would have to get out of the business. But these people who desire protection certainly would feel that they would be protected with the duty on, and in the long run it must be that the consumer must pay for it. The thing would have to regulate itself in the end.

DUTY.

Q. What we are trying to find out is where, so far as you can understand it, the actual burden of the impost duty falls in this case. For ten years or so fish came in free, and now for a year and a little over they have not come in free, and somebody has had to pay the duty, and the question is whether it was the catcher of the fish and the man who cured and dried it, barreled it, and shipped it, or whether it was you, the wholesale dealer, who purchased it, and whether when you purchased it you charged the duty to the retail dealer, and so on down to the consumer, or made less profits.—A. Of course it does not come upon us, because we sell according to what we pay; so it does not come upon us. Where there is a large stock—as, for instance, of codfish at the present time—the price is not affected at present by the duty, because there is a large catch of codfish here on hand, and the price does not advance on the codfish, because there is so much of it caught.

Q. The price does not advance, then the Canadian—and I take that the short one—is out of pocket 50 cents a hundred, or whatever the duty is?—A. Practically they are not sending their codfish here.

Q. There has been no importation since the 1st of July, 1885?—A. We will not do to say no importation, but the present price is so low, that the Canadians have been sending only special kinds of fish, which are the what we call shore fish. The Nova Scotia shore fish are better fed than those we get here, a better class of fish, and will bring a higher price. Those are the fish we have been buying from Nova Scotia. But an ordinary Bank fish, such as we get from Provincetown, will not bring so good a price.

Q. Did the prices which you paid on these previous to the 1st of July, advance by the amount of the duty?—A. I should think so.

Q. You being a dealer, do you not know?—A. I think so. If I had a book before me I could tell just exactly what I did pay last year, but I do not remember now.

STATEMENT OF PRICES OF IMPORTED FISH.

Q. Will you be kind enough to send to us by mail, to save you any further trouble, a statement which shall show the prices you paid for each kind, by itself, of imported salt fish, between July 1, 1884, and July 1, 1885; and, secondly, on exactly the same kind of fish since the 1st of July, 1885?—A. Yes.

Q. During those years have your newspapers given daily or weekly the wholesale prices of imported fish?—A. Yes; I suppose they professed to do that. But I think you could depend better on the Boston Fish Bureau of Statistics for information in regard to prices, as shown in their annual reports.

Q. Are you a member of that bureau?—A. Yes.

Q. Could you send us those reports?—A. Yes.

RECIPROCITY.

The WITNESS. Before I leave the stand I would like to state that I want reciprocity.

Q. State why you want reciprocity, what effect you think it will have upon the country, and what you mean by it; whether reciprocity is everything, or only in fish. State in your own way.—A. I should say on fish. I think the country ought to get cheap fish, and my idea, as I have already expressed, is that the consumer must pay for the duty eventually. I believe that fish are for the poorer classes. Why, during the last two or three years, during the business depression, we have had a good business, because the fish go to the poorer classes, and I think those poorer classes have to pay the duty.

SENDING FISH TO CANADA.

We have had a trade with Canada, sending our fish into Canada from Boston, but that trade has all gone, as you may say.

Q. Where were those fish caught?—A. They were caught in our own waters; they were principally domestic fish that we sent into Canada.

Q. What is the theory of that? Why is it that we import Canadian fish and also send to them American fish? They are all the same kind, cod, mackerel, and so on?—A. We put them up in attractive shapes. We put them into boxes under attractive brands and in shapes that make them attractive to those people. They do not know how to do down there. They are getting on to it lately. Down there in Nova Scotia they are now supplying Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Brockville, and towns all through Canada. These people have come up here and into our factories and discovered our methods, and have gone back there and are now supplying their own markets with fish put up somewhat after our methods. At the same time I understand that the people of Montreal are not satisfied.

RECIPROCITY.

Q. Go on with what you were stating about the whole reciprocity question as it appears to you.—A. It seems, as I stated, that the consumer would have to pay the duties on the fish. I believe that the people have a right to ask for protection, under the circumstances, because they have to pay protection prices for things that enter into the construction of their vessels. feel the same way. But I think this is a question with reference to which we are liable to get into trouble with a friendly power. It seems to me some other way ought to be sought for protection, which would still allow us to have reciprocity. Of course, as far as we are concerned in Boston, it must be of advantage to us, because we are more distributors of fish than we are producers; that is, we do not so much fit out vessels in Boston.

Q. The larger the source of supply you have, the better it is for your business?—A. Yes.

EARLY CATCH OF MACKEREL.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You spoke of canning mackerel. What is the effect of the early catching of fish down the coast? How does it affect the fish trade generally?—A. I think that in ordinary seasons it would be better for them not to go South to catch mackerel. In the first place, early in the season they are poor; it is their spawning season. There is always a demand, however, for the poorest fish; and of course the country gets the poorest fish in that way because of the fact that they want the cheapest thing they can get. If they did not fish South early in the season, then when the mackerel come on Northward they would be of better quality and fatter.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. And more of them, I suppose?—A. I don't know that there would be more.

Q. Would there not be more if none were caught in the spring?—A. Yes. In that way you may say more of them, and the fish that would be caught and inspected would be a better class of fish, and of course the country would have the benefit of consuming better fish. If they could not get poor fish they would take these finer brands and pay the price for them, and that would create a better demand. The consumer would like a better class of fish more; he would be better pleased with the taste and quality, and he would buy more, and there would be more sold, it seems to me. I think that would be an advantage.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You say the country wants cheap fish?—A. Yes.

Q. That is, of course, the poorer classes of the country?—A. Yes.

Q. How would the abandonment of the spring fisheries affect those people in reference to the supply of fish? Would they buy the dearer fish if they could not get the cheaper?—A. Of course. The past season has been unprecedented in regard to mackerel; there has been a great scarcity along our shores. Of course codfish are different. I think that in ordinary seasons we would get good fish and enough of them, especially if we had a chance of getting codfish from Nova Scotia too, because the fish from there would help. I think the advantages would be more than the disadvantages. Of course, in one way you would get cheaper fish perhaps to have the Southern fish, but I think in the long run it would be better for the country not to take those fish.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Is there as much nutrition per pound of these poor fish as per pound of good fish?—A. What makes a fish good is not size but quality. Fish 11 inches long may be better than one 15 inches long, because the larger fish when dressed may all dry up.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Is the price of these spring fish as dear to the consumer as of the better fish which are put up later in the season?—A. The fish are generally very cheap. They often catch large quantities of them. There are thousands, I was going to say—yes, there must be thousands—barrels that are thrown away because they cannot get price enough for them really to pay for the trouble in getting them.

Q. Then I understand you to mean that the spring fish are sold at cheaper rates than the fish caught later in the season?—A. Yes, sir. Of course, that might not be; it might be that there would be so few caught then that they would bring a higher price.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you think that any fish that is bearing spawn is good to eat?—A. It doesn't seem so to me. The herring that come to our shores are poor; we do not get any fine ones except those that come from Nova Scotia and that section.

TESTIMONY OF THOMAS A. RICH.

BOSTON, MASS., September 30, 1886.

THOMAS A. RICH sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. You reside in Boston?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fish business.

Q. What is your age?—A. Fifty-nine.

Q. How long have you been in the fish business here?—A. Since 1844.

Q. Do you deal in both salt and fresh fish?—A. No, sir; salt fish together.

Q. Do you deal in all varieties of salt fish?—A. About all.

Q. Where do the fish you deal in come from chiefly? Where are they caught and cured?—A. They come from New England and Nova Scotia.

Q. About what proportion comes from Nova Scotian waters?—That I cannot say.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What do you mean by "Nova Scotian waters"—within the three mile shore line?—A. Oh, no; I mean the Northern waters. The statistics show, I believe, that 4 per cent. of mackerel were taken in Nova Scotian waters.

EFFECT OF THE ABROGATION OF THE TREATY OF 1870.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Can you tell us what has been the effect of the abrogation of the treaty of 1870 on the price of salted fish in this market?—A. As a general thing, I do not think it has had any effect at all.

Q. What becomes of the question of duty that has had to be paid since?—A. I think the duty is borne by the Nova Scotians entirely; I think there is no question about it.

Q. What makes you think so?—A. For many reasons. The price is governed by supply and demand, largely by supply. There may be two kinds that are possibly affected by the duty, but I do not believe that any one kind is affected to the extent of the duty. Neither do I believe, as Mr. Wrightington has stated, that the consumer pays the duty. The consumer buys of the retailer, and the price of the retailer varies very little. There is one case that I have cited a number of times which illustrates it as well as any. Last season there was a customer of ours in Baltimore who made the inquiry particularly with this object in view in regard to retailing. Among other articles she sold—I say “she,” because she is a woman—were a great many of No. 2 shore mackerel, which she sold, I think, for 25 cents; 320 mackerel in a barrel is $40 a barrel. Now, it makes no difference to her in her retail business whether she pays $6 a barrel or $12, for $40 a barrel will cover all the profit she wants. It is just about the same with every other kind of fish that is retailed.

EFFECT OF WHOLESALE PRICES UPON RETAIL.

When I was in Washington last spring with the committee from Boston, before the committee of the House, there was a gentleman present, I think he was a Western Senator, talking about cheap fish. Said he, I cannot understand this cry about cheap fish. Here we have had cheap fish for years, and yet I find when I go to market in the West to buy fish for my family, the cheapest thing is a herring for my servant girls, and that is 12½ cents a pound, and I want to know where the cheapness comes in.” That illustrates what I said before—that the wholesale price of fish has very little to do with the retail price. The retail fish business is peculiar; in fact, it is all retail to the consumer for the reason that it is largely used only on certain days. That practice has come to us from Europe. With all Catholics over here Friday is fish-day, and there is always some kind of fish on the table; and every one who has gone to sea knows that it is the same on shipboard. For that reason, as a general thing, fish do not enter into daily consumption as many other kinds of food do. So that it comes to this: that the retail dealers have only two or three days in the week when they sell many fish. This tends to make the retail price of fish excessive, more so, I think, than any other kind of goods. And it is invariably so. I know one retail fish dealer on a street close by the Tremont House, whose price for halibut is 25 cents, year in and year out, no matter whether he pays 3 or 30.

Q. He takes his average?—A. He takes his average. I have looked into that thing with some care, and I do not believe that the duty affects the consumer except, as I say, once in a while on some particular article it may affect the price to the consumer slightly, but not to the amount of the duty.

SALT FISH.

Q. Do you buy these salt fish, that you deal in, directly from the vessels that bring them in, or do you buy from dealers in the provinces?—A. The imported fish come here principally to commission merchants, in fact you might say all of them. The opposition to the duty on fish made in Boston principally by commission men and dealers and their aids.

CORRECTION OF MR. WRIGHTINGTON'S TESTIMONY.

Right here I would say that Mr. Wrightington made the remark that I am interested in vessels, supposing that what he said was true. But he did not know; I am not. During the time of free fish we had 15 or 18 vessels; quite a number of them we owned. We sold them all, and to-day we have not a thousand dollars interest in any vessel.

RECIPROCITY.

But my opposition to reciprocity is that it is ruinous to the fish business of New England. You gentlemen can be but little aware how delicate a question that is to the fishermen of the coast—not the larger fishermen. But I will say that there are thousands of families from Block Island to Eastport, living on the islands and inlets to the coast, that never see $200 in a year, and many of them never see $150. But, with a little garden spot and with the fish that they can catch and sell and consume, they will give their children a good school education, dress them decently and comfortably, and this reciprocity question is a serious one to them. Mr. Wrightington has said that they ought to be protected in some way. That is a very strong admission. I do not think any opposer of reciprocity could make any stronger argument against it than that. They must be protected in some other way, says Mr. Wrightington. This is a serious matter to these families living on a small competence, as I have described.

Q. You call it a serious matter to them. The inference is that with either salt or fresh fish they are not able to get the same prices for the fish that they catch and sell to the wholesale dealers that they otherwise would?—A. That is it, generally.

Q. Of course, they would not care if they got the same price for their fish?—A. It is not a market for their fish, but if that market is supplied even at the same price they cannot afford to go out.

Q. If it is supplied at the same price, and all the fish they bring are purchased, then what would you say?—A. But that is not always the case. Last spring the fish were rushed into market and left over on Nova Scotia account, a great many of them; I mean mackerel. Another mackerel we sent here before the duty was put on than Mr. Wrightington has sold together with what are on hand now in this city. I have bought them as low as $2.50 a barrel.

Q. The salted imported fish you buy, do you purchase through commission houses here, or by correspondence?—A. By correspondence almost entirely.

Q. And they are the agents of dealers in the Provinces or agents of fishing vessels?—A. No; they are agents of merchants and vessel owners both, and in some instances of catchers largely of both mackerel and codfish.

THE INSHORE FISHERIES.

Q. I presume you have not much knowledge on the subject of the source of this supply that comes in to you, whether it is taken inshore as I call it, or outside of the municipal lines of the British Provinces?

The WITNESS. You mean fish caught by Americans?

Senator EDMUNDS. No; these imported fish.

A. No, I think the imported fish are largely caught on the Grand Banks and other banks outside where our vessels go. I know, as I know anything that is told me, that they come from the Grand Banks from the Western Bank, St. Peter's Bank, and other banks up in the region.

Q. What portion of the salted fish that you get from American vessels and dealers do you think comes from the inshore fisheries?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes; and all along the British Provinces.

A. I should say not any.

Q. Substantially not any at all?—A. Yes. I don't know how close inshore the fish are caught in Labrador.

Senator EDMUNDS. It is not very close, for the coast is dangerous.

The WITNESS. Fish are caught on the fishing banks; there are their haunts. There are a few fish caught near inshore all along the coast from Hatteras as far north as you please to go.

Q. That is a small proportion of the catch, you think?—A. Yes.

BAIT.

Q. Have you any information on the subject of the supply of bait and of the desirability of getting it within the British Provinces?—A. Only general knowledge, but my opinion is that we had better be without that privilege than to have anything like reciprocity.

Q. How could they get their bait?—A. They could take it with them or catch it on the banks.

Q. Do you think bait enough could be caught on those shores, together with what they could take from here?—A. Yes; why not? There are different kinds of bait. Vessels formerly took salt mackerel, and they took clams. Of late years, however, they think fresh bait is better, and I suppose it is.

Q. The mackerel are taken almost entirely in purse seines, are they not?—A. Yes. But even if the subject of bait arises, and all is admitted that they assume, it always seems to me that the seller is the party chiefly concerned, more than the buyer generally in trade. If the bait is bought from the poor people on the coast I do not see but that they receive as much benefit from it as we do. I cannot see that the bait question, even if it is all that they claim, is any better for us than for them.

SALT FISH.

Q. How many tons of all kinds of salted fish do you deal in in a year?—A. I could not tell that.

Q. State the gross amount in round numbers.—A. I do not know what it would amount to; it would be a mere guess.

Q. Is it very considerable, or very little—that is the object of my inquiry. We do not want to pry into your private affairs.—A. It is a large amount.

Q. Where do you sell your fish that you deal in?

The WITNESS. Where do they go?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

A. All over the United States, the West Indies, and Cuba.

Q. What kind of salted fish come to this market to the greatest extent?—A. Mackerel enter largely, I should say.

Q. Are there more tons of mackerel than of codfish, or haddock, or halibut?—A. I should say so, now; it must be the case; though when figures come along they often surprise us.

Q. And the mackerel are substantially now all taken in nets?—A. In some.

BAIT.

Q. So that, as you understand it, as to the largest proportion of the catching, or at least in one kind of fishing, the bait question would not arise at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. Because they do not use bait?—A. I should say that it does come in a little, because they want bait from us; they have been to Portland this year and bought thousands of barrels of bait.

Q. But not for mackerel?—A. I think they used it for both mackerel and codfish, but principally for codfish.

INTERNATIONAL TROUBLES.

The WITNESS. I would like, if there is no objection, to make some reply to what has been said by Mr. Wrightington.

Senator EDMUNDS. State anything you wish.

The WITNESS. I took some notes of Mr. Wrightington's remarks; he says "I was rather glad that trouble came up."

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. No, you misunderstood me entirely; I am very sorry that any troubles have come up.

The WITNESS. I understood you to say that you were glad that troubles came up to settle this matter.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. Oh, no; I said that the only way that we seemed to be able to get at any settlement of it was just from the troubles.

The WITNESS. That is a little milder way of putting it.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. That is the way I did put it.

The WITNESS. Then I will assume that.

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes; that is what he said.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. It was perfectly useless to talk about the thing on any other basis. I said that it seemed to me that the committee that went to Washington were treated in such a way that it appeared to me that the thing was all cut and dried the other way, and that it was only other troubles to come, and which we knew must come, that would bring the matter under discussion in a way to settle it. That was my idea.

The WITNESS. I think that parties here knew that they were going, and I have no doubt egged it on.

Senator EDMUNDS. Never mind about that; that is of no consequence. Any considerations you wish to present on the general question we shall be glad to hear.

PREMATURE MACKEREL FISHING.

The WITNESS. There is one question that I take considerable interest in, and have, and that is this southern fishing question, which I am glad to see Mr. Wrightington and I agree upon.

Senator EDMUNDS. I forgot to ask you about that. I would like your views upon that question.

The WITNESS. He says he canned those mackerel. They are a very poor fish. He would not eat them, and neither would you or I. The premature catching of mackerel is a question that is going to be presented to Congress, and I think it will enter somewhat into the consideration of the reciprocity question. When I was at Washington I stated to the committee that it had been said, rather jocosely, that the menhaden left the coast because of the restrictions that had been put upon them, and that it would probably be so with the mackerel. I stated that menhaden were becoming so scarce on the Maine coast that parties interested were taking measures to remedy the difficulty, and that a law had been passed by the Maine legislature looking in that direction, but that it was too late, I said. I stated that what we wanted to do in regard to this southern fishing was to stop that before we were also too late on the mackerel question, and that from the outlook at the time, which was in the spring, I began to fear that we were a little late as it was. The result has shown that we are too late, that is, to prevent the thing. The thing has happened. The mackerel coming on our coast have been taken and driven away. Some Senator asked me if the ocean was not wide, wide enough for them to go to another point when driven from one place. That may be when the fish are feeding, but not when they go to the spawning grounds. They have regular spawning grounds, which are narrow and restricted, and if they are driven or frightened from there, the number continues to get less and less every year, and finally they cease altogether. This is the bearing that it has upon the questions before you: that it drives away the fish from our shore. It does not affect the Nova Scotia catch so much, for the reason that, so far as is known, the bodies of mackerel on the whole Atlantic coast do not come up by Hatteras and Block Island and along our shore, but they come in as far down as Sable Island at about the same time they strike in here. So it is thought, and it is generally believed, that there are bodies of mackerel north in the edge of the Gulf stream during the winter, where the water is warm, because they strike in on the southern coast at the same time they do here. But there is no question about that school that we depend upon, nor when or how they will come. The time of their coming hardly varies three days year after year at Cape Cod.

Q. Where do you think they come from?—A. From the south; how far south we do not know.

Q. Do you think as far south as Hatteras?—A. Oh yes, because they are caught there, and they have been followed up.

Q. The fishing fleet that begins at Hatteras follows the school northward along the coast until they get up around Cape Cod?—A. Yes, and come into our bay. There is a school that first strikes Cape Cod that does not come into our bay usually. That strikes the Nova Scotia shore at about Barrington. But as regards the southern fishing it can be shown conclusively that that enters into this question before you to-day, that it is driving the fish away from our coast and putting us more and more into the hands of the Nova Scotia people.

Senator EDMUNDS. But you must consider that the coast of the Carolinas about Hatteras is as much our coast as the coast of Massachusetts Bay; so that would not seem to be much of a point.

The WITNESS. I do not understand you exactly.

Senator EDMUNDS. You say that the catching of these fish down at Cape Hatteras so early prevents their coming up to Cape Cod.

The WITNESS. Yes.

Senator EDMUNDS. What if it does? The fish that are caught there are used by our people.

The WITNESS. In the first place, they are good for nothing.

Senator EDMUNDS. That is another question.

The WITNESS. And in the next place it prevents the fish coming in here in the summer time when they are feeding, and when they would be good fish. The case is so plain to me that it may be that I do not elaborate it sufficiently. The proposed law restricting the catch of fish names the 1st of June as the limit. As far as I am concerned I should have preferred the 1st of July as the limit. The argument was brought up by Mr. Miller, of New York, before the committee, and also by Mr. Benjamin, that we were very anxious to have them stop catching until the 1st of June, and then we could catch them in June when we knew that they had not all spawned and were equally poor. But I should have preferred to have the close season up to the 1st of July.

Q. Are they good for anything immediately after they have got through spawning?—A. They recover in ten days so as to be quite passable.

SPAWNING SEASON OF MACKEREL.

Q. About when is the spawning season?—A. About the last of June.

Q. When they are engaged in the performance of that function they are not within reach of the nets?—A. Not when they are spawning; they are then usually on the bottom.

PRICE, QUALITY, AND QUALITY OF MACKEREL.

Mr. Wrightington said that he thought that mackerel were high on account of the duty, and that two or three years ago they were $4 or $5 lower. If I had the tables here you would see that two years ago we had a very large catch of very poor mackerel, and there was not a demand for so many of so poor a quality. That was what affected the price largely. At the same time it cannot be denied that the scarcity of fish this year has been an element in determining prices, although the prices are not excessive. The rise that has taken place in the last six or eight weeks is not altogether by any means owing to the scarcity so much as to the quality. The quality has improved, and therefore the price has also improved; at the same time it is improved some on account of the scarcity.

Q. Do you think the general quality for this whole fishing season has been better than that of two years ago?—A. The general quality has been, although some were a great deal better and some a great deal poorer than this year so far. The best mackerel are caught on our coast when we catch any, and we have always caught a before this year. The Nova Scotia mackerel are not particularly good fish this season; they are of fair quality but nothing remarkable.

Q. How late are the mackerel caught on this coast?—A. I have known them to be here until the middle of September, though sometimes they leave in the latter part of October.

Q. There are great quantities down about Vineyard Sound and Gay Head?—A. Yes; small mackerel.

Q. Following immense shoals of herring?—A. Yes.

Q. Please give us the various names that you give to the different kinds of mackerel, and the different numbers, describing the quality of each kind, from the poorest to the best.—A. The inspection law of Massachusetts—like all laws, it is rather ambiguous—speaks of No. 1 mackerel, the best mackerel, that are 13 inches and over; those are the best and fattest. No. 2 is the next quality of fat mackerel, and that is from 11 to 13 inches. The next lower quality is No. 3, from 10 to 11 inches. And the rest are No. 4's. I don't think that the law of Massachusetts specifies any other kinds.

Q. Except Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4?—A. Yes.

Q. And No. 4's are all below 11?—A. No; below 10.

Q. Does that grade really, in the trade or under the law, come down to mere tinkers, as you call them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. All below 10 inches are tinkers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. As a fact, do they pack in salt a fish that is under 8 inches long?—A. I have seen them pretty small. I have had them this year 1,400 to a barrel. Now, as to the trade. There are many qualities of mackerel more so than of any other fish, I think. The trade has an extra mess

Q. No. 2 is poorer than No. 1?—A. Not always; it may often be only difference in size, the quality being the same. Then there are medium No. 3's, and small 3's, tinkers, and No. 4's; then there are large 3's, large mediums, and large 2's. It takes all those distinctions to meet the demand that is made. Two or three years ago, under free trade, large 3's were sold to go to Hayti for $11 and $12 a barrel.

Q. How large would those fish be?—A. Thirteen inches and over. Afterwards the smaller fish were more abundant, in this time that Mr. Wrightington speaks of, and those were rather preferred, so they do not like large 3's now.

DUTY ON FISH.

Under reciprocity, those large 3's sold for $11 and $12 a barrel; while now, under duty, they are selling for $8.50. So that I do not see that the duty has affected those much. It is only three years ago that they sold for $11 and $12.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. Of course, the quantity has something to do with it, as well as the demand. I claim that this must be so.

The WITNESS. Now, he says that Nova Scotia people will have to go out of the business. Excuse me for quoting Mr. Wrightington. If duty is going to drive the Nova Scotia people out of the business, who live much more cheaply than our people can, what is going to result to our fishermen if we have free trade? It seems to me that we shall suffer as much under free trade certainly as Nova Scotia will under the duty. I do not see how he can argue any differently.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. With a large supply of fish, of course, until things get regulated all around, those people must get a low price; but eventually, of course, they must get a fair price, and we must get a fair price. The business must regulate itself on the basis of supply and demand. People will not go for fish unless there is a fair price awaiting them on their return. The ability of the West India market to consume fish affects our market, and the low price of fish has a bearing on the ability of those people to use these Nova Scotia fish.

Senator EDMUNDS. Has either of you gentlemen been down on the fishing coast of the British Provinces?

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON and Mr. RICH. No.

The WITNESS. I do not think Mr. Wrightington has answered this question in regard to the relative effects of duty and free trade to my satisfaction, but that is not for me to say.

CODFISH.

As Mr. Wrightington states, codfish were never sold so cheap as they are now.

FISH IN BOND.

There is one question that arises there, in regard to fish in bond. The construction put upon it by the Department is different from what it was a few years ago. Formerly we were allowed to pack codfish in bond, as also mackerel and alloways, although they came in bulk. If I recollect aright, the theory is that they can be put into packages, when required, for immediate preservation. The English Government always construes the law in favor of the merchant; our Government sometimes, nearly always, seems to construe the law against us. We were formerly allowed to pack codfish and other kinds in packages, where they came in bulk, for shipment in bond; but for the last few years that has been stopped. It has resulted in this: that the Nova Scotia people send their fish here in bond packed for shipment. That can be done. But they are very unreliable. In fact, all Nova Scotia packages are unreliable—codfish, mackerel, and herring. If the labor question enters into it, they get all the labor and get paid for it, and we get nothing; it simply passes through our hands. Whether any change will be made in that respect, I do not know. It does not seem to me that it would affect our fishing interests here at all.

NOVA SCOTIA PACKING.

Q. What do you mean when you say that the Nova Scotia packing is unreliable?—A. I mean that no kind of fish that Nova Scotia puts up can be relied upon without a thorough examination.

Q. Relied upon how?—A. As to the quality and kind. I have seen a thousand barrels of herring landed here, and sold at one time, that had 300 barrels of them half full of eel grass, paving stones, &c. I have also had packages that were all right at each end, but were filled up with eel grass and the like in the middle.

Q. Do you open and repack these Nova Scotia packages before you put them upon the market?—A. Yes, as a general thing, or else we examine them thoroughly.

HERRING.

In the matter of herring, it is true that the herring we have on these shores are not fat; neither are the majority of Nova Scotia herring. We take nothing on these shores as poor as Georges Bay herring or Dalhousie; they are the poorest that can be put up.

Q. Do herring enter largely into the consumption of the United States?—A. Yes; quite largely.

Q. They are consumed chiefly in the large cities?—A. Yes.

Q. They do not get into the country stores?—A. They are consumed chiefly in the large cities, but they are sold all over the country; they are sold largely in Virginia and North Carolina and the West.

Q. Are they smoked?—A. O, no; pickled. They are sold largely in the extreme Northwest; also among the Norwegians, who have been accustomed to use herring at home. The best herring we get here is the Labrador herring, and their shore splits are very good.

Q. Did the price of Labrador herring rise immediately after termination of the treaty?—A. They were never so low as this last winter and spring; they were very low. Here is the same argument as in the other matter, and that is there was an excessive catch, a very excessive one; they were sent here in large quantities, and the parties who managed the business managed it very unskillfully. They sent not only large quantities to the commission men, but to the men that like to make a large outlay, and consequently they damaged themselves and us, too. This season the Labrador catch so far has been an entire failure. I have not heard up to this day of a barrel of herring being caught on the Labrador coast. There were a few brought in yesterday that were caught on the other side of the Straits; consequently, the being none to speak of they are high. They are worth $6 a barrel, instead of a year ago at this time, I should say, $4 or $4.50.

Q. Then the $6 a barrel much as it is?—A. Do you mean prices?—Mr. W.

Q. That is, a barrel of 200 pounds?—A. Yes; but the duty was on them the same as now; and yet to-day Labrador herring would sell for $6 a barrel, just because they are scarce; they would sell for just as much as if they were free.

Q. Do you not think that your fish bureau tables will show all these prices?—A. I think so.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. I think so.

STATISTICS.

Q. As a matter of information, we would like you to send us reports for three or four years, in order to get a general average.—A. If you go to Gloucester, there is also a fish bureau there, and you can compare our figures with theirs. I think those for Boston, however, will give closer prices.

CLOSE TIME.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You refer to the spring catch of mackerel, and I understand you are in favor of restricting that?—A. Yes; I am, decidedly.

Q. They are caught on the Southern coast, from Hatteras northward?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long do the mackerel remain on the Southern coast?—A. We do not know where they go in the winter season. They leave these waters about the last of October, their leaving depending to some extent upon their feed, or, as Professor Baird says, the temperature of the water, or both. They leave from the last of October to the middle of December, which is very late.

Senator EDMUNDS. Mr. Saulsbury was asking you about the Southern coast.

The WITNESS. They leave here and go down the Southern coast and up by Hatteras, and we do not hear of them again until the next season.

Q. (By Senator SAULSBURY.) How long does the fishing last on the Southern coast?—A. About the last of March they are found off Hatteras, and are followed by our vessels up the coast, getting up off New York the last of April or the first of May, and around into Massachusetts Bay by the middle of June. So they last about two months from Hatteras to Block Island.

Q. If these fishermen be deprived of the opportunity of catching fish during those seasons of the year, what other opportunity would they have?

The WITNESS. What fishermen?

Senator SAULSBURY. The men engaged there.

The WITNESS. By asking you a question I only want to get at what you want.

Q. You do not know where the fishermen are from, who are engaged in those fisheries?—A. I am not aware that there are any fishermen on that coast. There are a few fishermen on the Jersey coast who fish in boats.

SEINE vs. HOOK AND LINE.

Now, I do not object to catching any of these mackerel with hook and line. It is catching them with deep-sea seines to which I object. With these seines you surround a body of mackerel of, may be, 500 or 800 barrels; of those 500 or 800 barrels 200 or 300 are saved, and the rest are thrown away; those 200 or 300 barrels are brought in and half of them spoil and are thrown away. When I was before the committee in Washington the bill under consideration, I think, allowed fishing in row-boats on the New Jersey shore with hook and line of perhaps 25 feet. The Senator from New Jersey asked if I had any objection to hook and line. I said no, not if people chose to catch the fish that way and eat them, but what I did object to was going down there with seines, and the reason I gave was that the seines frightened the fish and drove them away when they were on their way to their spawning grounds. The large vessels fishing with hook and line have bait ground as fine as can be, and that is thrown overboard and they fish alongside. The fish in that case are fat, and if anybody chooses to so catch them I have no objection. As our people here in New England and in the North are the only ones who fish exclusively with seines, I do not think I am asking anything against any one South. I have said that our people are the only ones who fish exclusively with seines; I should make one solitary exception; he is in New York; and he is opposed to Southern fishing. Under these circumstances I do not think I am asking anything against any one in the South. Do you think I am?

Senator SAULSBURY. I do not know, of course, where these fishermen live. I simply desire to know whether the fishermen who desire to fish on these shores would have any opportunity to catch on these shores again.

The WITNESS. Yes; every opportunity with hook and line.

Q. I understood you to say that these fish are on that shore from March to the first of May?—A. Yes; and off Block Island there is a seine that stays set all summer. It is not only the destruction of the fish and driving them away to which I object, but it is also our own fishing with seines that I wish to prevent.

Q. I suppose if there was a market down there the fishermen would have seines, and many have them already?—A. From my knowledge of the business I should not suppose they would.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. It is a pretty expensive business?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. If the men down South found it profitable, they would go into the business?—A. This is no shore fishing, you understand. This deep-sea fishing requires large vessels and an expensive outfit. A vessel's outfit would cost from $10,000 to $18,000. It is too precarious, and it has been called a lottery.

UNCERTAINTY OF DEEP-SEA FISHING.

Gloucester has within the last two years lost, in provisions, vessel and boats, several hundred thousand dollars in Southern fishing. But once in a while one vessel will make a good stock. It is like a lottery; one loses and another makes a fortune.

THE QUESTION OF LOCALITY.

There is nothing against any locality that would enter into the case on one particle. There is no feeling among the fishermen. There is no desire to deprive any man in any locality of his rights.

Senator SAULSBURY. I was not thinking so much of the fishing interest as I was of the community who consume. I understand that caus of spring fish are sold cheaper than those which are put up at a later season, and are better fish. If, therefore, you take away the privilege of a certain class of supplying poor people, the question is whether you would not deprive them of the opportunity of purchasing any fish and force them to do without.

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. The quantity of these Southern fish canned is very small. The principal use they are put to is to salt them in barrels and packages.

Senator SAULSBURY. You mean that in that form they are sold better and at a lower figure than the fish caught at a later season?

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. Yes, sir.

The WITNESS. I would like to ask Mr. Wrightington if the better quality of mackerel are not sold as cheap and often cheaper than the early ones. That is the case, isn't it?

Mr. WRIGHTINGTON. No; I don't know that it is. Of course, the price of fresh fish is determined to some extent by the quantity on hand, as well as by other considerations.

TESTIMONY OF EDWIN P. COOK.

PROVINCETOWN, MASS., October 1, 1836.

EDWIN P. COOK sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Forty-three.

Q. Where do you live?—A. Wellfleet.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fish dealer.

Q. What kind of fish do you deal in?—A. Mackerel, at the present time.

Q. Have you ever dealt in any other kinds?—A. I have.

Q. How long?—A. I was in the codfish business one year.

MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. Where do the mackerel come from that you deal in?—A. The shores of St. Lawrence Bay.

Q. Have any vessels from your place been up there this year?—A. Very few.

Q. Did they have much of a catch?—A. It was not a successful voyage to them this year. There was only one vessel that brought in full fare.

INSHORE FISHING.

Q. Where are the mackerel generally caught up there, in respect of the inshore line, as it is called?

The WITNESS. Where I have been in the Bay myself? Do you mean my knowledge?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes, your knowledge, and information as well.

A. I have been up there three years. One year we caught the most of our fish off Magdalen Islands. One year our voyage was off Cape Escuminac and off Cape Prince Edward's Island.

Q. How near the shore were your catches made?—A. Within about five miles of shore. Off Escuminac we fished very near the shore.

Q. Did you fish near the shore because the fish were there, or because it was more convenient, or why?—A. The schools were there at that time, and that was the best fishing, of course.

Q. How long was that ago?—A. That was 18 years ago.

Q. You have not been up there since that time?—A. Not since.

Q. What is your information as to where our people fish up there?—A. They fish on the same grounds I have named, except Magdalen Islands; they haven't fished around there this season.

BAIT.

Q. What do you do up there for bait for mackerel, or do you fish with nets entirely?—A. We fish entirely with seines.

Q. So that the bait question is not a disturbing element?—A. No, sir.

CODFISH.

Q. Where are the codfish caught up there that you deal in?—A. I am not dealing in codfish at the present time. I believe the last I have caught on the Grand Banks.

Q. You do not deal in codfish now?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Where are most of the codfish taken that come to Provincetown?—A. I have the only vessel in the place, and the only one for some twenty-five or thirty years.

MACKEREL.

Q. Your vessels are all mackerel catchers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is the character of the mackerel that you catch up there compared with those caught off our coast, in respect of quality?—A. They are not so good as our shore mackerel.

Q. What is the reason? Are they not so large or so fat?—A. They are sometimes larger, but not so white and fat as our shore mackerel.

Q. But they are precisely the same fish, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

FREE FISH.

Q. What is your information from all these fishermen, and what your own knowledge gained from experience in the business, in regard to the effect that the treaty of 1870 had upon your fishing interest, that treaty giving the British people the right to bring in fish free?—A. I think it was ruinous to the business. It drove me out of one branch of the business entirely, and caused me to lose every dollar I had put into it.

Q. What was its effect upon the retail market, so far as you know?—The WITNESS. Shall I state what I sold my fish for?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

A. I had a fare of fish that averaged me $2 a quintal, and from the best information in regard to the fish as I sent them into the market—that is, without being prepared, skinned or anything of the kind—that brought from 5 to 8 cents a pound; and the fish that I sold that was skinned and put into boxes the parties told me they got 10 to 12 cents a pound for at retail. I was selling at an average of 2 cents a pound when they cost me 3 cents a pound to catch and get them home here.

Q. The effect of the treaty was to drive me out of the business, but I understand you to say that the British people have the opportunity to catch the fish.

Q. The effect of that treaty and the practice under it, then, if I understand you, was not to make the fish any cheaper to the people who ate them, but only to undersell you in your trade with the wholesale dealers?—A. Yes, sir; and to overstock the market and give us no opportunity to combine, as other industries of the country have done.

EXTENT OF THE FISHING BUSINESS OF PROVINCETOWN.

Q. About what quantity of fish come into your place per season?
The WITNESS. Of mackerel?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

A. This year probably there will not be 4,000 barrels.

Q. Take it for ten years together, what would be the average?—A. As our fleet has been cut down nearly one-half during the last ten years, I could not give a fair estimate. During the past five years we landed about 30,000 barrels of mackerel.

Q. About what fleet have you?—A. About thirty sail.

Q. About what tonnage?—A. They will average about 70 tons apiece.

Q. How many men to the vessel?—A. From 13 to 17.

Q. Do they make more than one voyage a year usually?—A. In the mackerel business it is according to the catch. Some years we have made only one trip to the Bay shores, and come home and quit it.

SEIZURE OF THE HIGHLAND LIGHT.

Q. Have they fished in the Bay of Chaleur this year?—A. Part of the fleet.

Q. Were any of them interfered with in any way?—A. One of them has been seized.

Q. What was her name?—A. The Highland Light.

Q. Where was she, according to your information, when she was seized?—A. Off west of East Point, at a place called the Chapels, I think.

Q. In the Bay of Chaleur?—A. No; on the north side of Prince Edward's Island. The northeast point of Prince Edward's Island is called East Point.

Q. Was she seized at sea, or where?—A. She was seized, as we understand, within the three-mile limit.

Q. Have any of her officers come back here?—A. Yes, sir; her captain came home.

Q. He is not here to-day?—A. No, sir; I don't know as he is in town.

Q. Was she seized on account of fishing within the three-mile limit?

—A. She was lying to, as vessels usually do to catch mackerel on the hook, as I understand, and was throwing bait, and one of the crew was catching codfish.

Q. Is that the only vessel from your place that has been interfered with?—A. Yes, sir.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. They did not undertake to seize any of them for fishing outside of the three-mile limit in the Bay of Chaleur?—A. No, sir; they were never interrupted in their business.

Q. So you have known of no instance this year where the headland theory has been insisted upon?—A. No, sir; not a case.

AVERAGE QUANTITY OF MACKEREL TAKEN.

Q. I do not know how you answered my question—if you answered it I did not hear—as to the average quantity of mackerel taken by your fleet in ten years.—A. I said that I could not give the exact average, but there was one year that we landed in the neighborhood of 30,000, and this year 4,000. Mackerel fishing is very uneven fishing.

SALT MACKEREL.

Q. Do you bring any fresh fish from up there?—A. No, sir.

Q. All salted?—A. All salted.

Q. All salted on board, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

PRIVILEGE OF LANDING.

Q. You do not go ashore for any purpose except for supplies, I suppose?—A. No, sir, and they are not allowed to get those.

DUTY ON FISH.

Q. What has been the effect of the termination of the treaty last year? Do you get any better prices for your fish?—A. Last year at this time I could buy fish packed for $6.50, or $7 for uncultured fish. This year I have paid for the same kind of fish, uncultured, perhaps not so good, from $13 to $14.

Q. You say the catch is not nearly so great?—A. It has not been.

Q. Has the retail price of fish, according to your information, risen on account of this duty?—A. Yes, correspondingly. There is not so much profit made on fish this year in my business as there was last, fish being so high.

Q. I understand that. But taking the people who buy salted mackerel from the grocer in Boston or Provincetown, or anywhere, how much more, if anything, do they have to pay on account of this duty?—A. I think, in proportion to the price of the fish, the dealers are not getting so high a profit as they did last year.

Q. We understand from the dealers in Boston that the retail price to the people who actually buy the mackerel from the grocery are pretty much the same all the time; that there is a pretty large margin, as you describe, with the retail people, so that they do not follow the rise and fall of the market much?—A. I think it is more like that in the fresh-fish business; they have but one retail price for fresh codfish the year round.

CLASSIFICATION, REPACKING, AND SHIPMENT OF MACKEREL.

Q. Where do your mackerel go that come to this port?—A. New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and some few to Baltimore.

Q. Do you take them out of barrels and repack them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are they assorted at the time they are first taken on the fishing ground?—A. No, sir; they just catch them and put all sizes in one barrel.

Q. Then all the classification is done when they are repacked?—A. Yes, sir. If I buy them I recall them.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What nationality are the people who are engaged in your fleet?—A. The captains are mostly natives of the town or of Cape Cod.

Q. What I mean is whether they are citizens of the United States, or foreigners?—A. The captains are obliged to be naturalized citizens, and most of the crews are not natives of the town; a great many are foreigners.

Q. Where do you get them?—A. We pick them up in Boston and some in Nova Scotia.

COMPENSATION OF CREWS.

Q. Are the crews paid in money, or do they receive a share of the fish?—A. They are paid in different ways. Some are paid by the thousand on the stock; that is, some are paid $25 a thousand, some are paid one forty-fifth of the whole stock, and the remainder goes to the owner and the vessel.

DECREASE OF FISHING.

Q. Is the fishing business at your place reviving at all?—A. No, sir; it is declining every year.

Q. What is the reason for that?—A. The scarcity of fish. Previous to this year we had a winter business, which we have not now. If we still had a winter business we could weather these bad years, and get through them better than we do. Last winter was discouraging.

Q. You lost your winter business on account of the fact that there were no fish off our own coast?—A. No, sir; we never had anything to do with the Grand Bank business, but we had a run of oysters from Virginia to New York in the winter, and that is entirely gone.

Q. That is gone entirely on account of the railroads and steamships, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

MACKEREL SEASON.

Q. What time in the year do you begin mackerel fishing?—A. We began about the 1st of June this year.

Q. Where?—A. Off our coast.

Q. How far south?—A. I think none of the fleet went farther south than Block Island.

Q. And then they fished northward?—A. Yes; worked to the northward with the fish.

Q. What time does the mackerel season begin up in the Bay of Chaleur and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and around there?—A. They begin to catch fish in there as early as the middle of June.

Q. And how late does it continue?—A. They fish in that vicinity for fish to can, around Cape Breton and Sydney, as late as Thanksgiving and the last of November. The shore-men catch fish there late every year.

Q. I mean the large fishing by the fleet. How late, ordinarily, would you expect to get a fare?—A. Our people usually come away about the middle of October if they spend the season in the Bay.

Q. Do they carry supplies enough to last them the whole season?—A. Yes, sir; for the trip.

Q. In an ordinary time, a fair, average fishing trip, how long would the vessel be gone from your port to make her fare and come back?—A. I have been gone on a 500-barrel trip three months, and made a successful voyage of it.

OUTFIT OF PROVISIONS.

Q. Do you ordinarily fit out your fleet with five months' provisions?—A. No, sir; three months is the longest I have known.

- Q. Is that the usual time?—A. Yes; about three months.
 Q. So that the mackerel vessels would have very little occasion to touch for supplies of food?—A. Only for fresh provisions, potatoes, and such things.
 Q. And water?—A. And water.

RECIPROCITY.

By Senator FRYE:

- Q. Do you, as a fisherman, want a treaty with Canada?
 THE WITNESS. Do you just want me to give my opinion?
 Senator FRYE. Yes.
 A. I either want a treaty of the freest sort with them, or I want the highest tariff placed upon fish, one or the other, no half-way.
 Q. Which do you prefer, high duties on fish, or a treaty which admits fish free?—A. I would take my chances with a duty on fish, so that the Canadian fish could not be brought into our market.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

- Q. Is it any special object to you to fish for mackerel within the three-mile limits?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. But for no other fish, of course?—A. I am not engaged in the cod-fishing.
 Q. They do not take any codfish in there, do they?—A. No, sir.
 Q. You would like the privilege of fishing within the three-mile limit?—A. I would rather have a high protective tariff, and let them have their three-mile limit.

EFFECT OF TREATIES OF 1854 AND 1870.

- Q. You spoke about the decline in your fisheries and of the cutting off of your winter business; do you know what effect the treaty of 1870 and the reciprocity treaty of 1854 had on the fishermen?—A. No, sir.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN SWETT.

PROVINCETOWN, MASS., October 1, 1886.

JOHN SWETT sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

- Question. Where do you live?—Answer. Wellfleet.
 Q. How old are you?—A. Sixty-eight.
 Q. What is your business?—A. Grocer, at present.
 Q. Do you deal in fish?—A. No, sir.
 Q. Have you ever been a fish-dealer?—A. I haven't been a fish-dealer; I have been a fisherman for thirty years.
 Q. In what capacity?—A. From cook to captain.
 Q. What kind of fishing?—A. Mackerel fishing principally.
 Q. From what year to what year?—A. I came ashore about 1845; before that time I was engaged in fishing from the time I was a boy.
 Q. From 1845 forward you were engaged in the fishing business?
 A. From 1845 back.

Q. So that you have not been engaged in the fishing business since either of these treaties went into force?—A. Not actively, but I have lived in a fishing community, and of course have heard of everything going on.

EFFECT OF TREATIES.

Q. What, in your opinion, was the effect of those treaties upon our fishing interests?

The WITNESS. Do you speak of this last treaty of ten or twelve years' duration?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. It has built up the Nova Scotia fisheries to the detriment of the New England fisheries, in my opinion.

Q. Why do you say that?—A. Because, in my opinion, the duties taken off of fish gave them the same privileges into our ports that we have in theirs, and they being a people that live cheaper than ours, their vessels were built cheaper and manned cheaper. They saw that that was their chance. They could outdo us in our own markets, for the reason that their materials were cheaper. They were people that had not got up to the highest standard of living, you might say, that we in New England had. They lived coarser, and they could come in and outdo us in our markets.

Q. That is, they could afford to sell cheaper than you could afford to sell?—A. Yes, and live by it. It is probably known to you that they have built up large fishing interests in the last ten or twelve years.

EFFECT OF DUTY UPON THE CONSUMER.

Q. Do you know anything about the retail market for fish?—A. Not especially; I have a general knowledge of how it is conducted.

Q. In your opinion, would taking off the duty make the fish cheaper to the consumer? I do not mean to the wholesaler.—A. That is a hard question to answer. There are so many ways of doing things that it would be doubtful to me if they would be furnished any cheaper to the consumer. I think the business would be very apt to be so managed through the traders and dealers that they would not get their fish any cheaper.

Q. Who is the direct purchaser from the Nova Scotia fishermen; the wholesaler, is he not?—A. The wholesaler, yes, in these large ports like Boston.

Q. Both fresh and salt fish they sell to the wholesaler?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then the wholesaler distributes them over the country?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in your opinion the effect of the duty is rather upon the wholesaler than upon the retailer or consumer?—A. Yes, sir.

THE FISHERY INTERESTS OF WELLFLEET.

Q. Do you know how many vessels belonging to Wellfleet are engaged in mackerel fishing?—A. I think we have about thirty sail at the present time.

Q. How many have you ever had?—A. We have had as high as eighty to one hundred. At that time they did not average so large as they do now. But our fleet is very much reduced. The low class of mackerel taken these last two or three years has made the business very unprofitable.

FREE AMERICAN MARKET.

Q. State whether or not the liberty of our market to the Canadian does not render the business a little more uncertain and hazardous than it was before?—A. It operates in this way: If there is a large catch of mackerel on the Nova Scotia shores or in the Bay of St. Lawrence, those fish are so numerous in places up and down the Nova Scotia shore that they are brought into our markets and crowd the price of our fish down from a fair remuneration to a price that is not a living one. If the catch is small in the Nova Scotia waters, our market is kept at a fair kind of rate; but just as soon as they have a large catch, the depressing effect is felt on the prices of our fish.

Q. So that the tendency is to break the market between the fishermen and the wholesaler?—A. Yes, sir; so that the fishermen cannot get a living out of the business.

REMUNERATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Do you know what portion of the retailer's price for fish the fisherman actually gets?—A. We will say, for instance, that a vessel comes in with a trip of mackerel of 200 barrels. The captain will sell his cargo to the wholesaler, say, for $10. If the wholesaler can get fifty cents or a dollar above that he considers he has made a good trade. That is about the way it goes. Then after they get into the retailer's hands I don't know much about the business; they get what they can, I suppose.

Q. In your opinion does the fisherman get over two-fifths of the ultimate price of the fish?—A. I don't know as I understand the bearing of that question exactly.

Q. Suppose I pay ten cents for a mackerel, as a consumer; in your opinion does the fishermen who originally caught that mackerel get over two-fifths of that ten cents?—A. I should hardly think he did; it has to go through two or three hands.

THE REMEDY.

Q. What is your remedy for this?—A. So far as the interests of the fishermen of New England are concerned, my remedy is that they should have the control of their own market; that is to say, they should have the preference of catching fish for the United States over foreigners.

THE THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Suppose they should let you go in and fish within the three-mile shore line if you let them send their fish in here free; would not that be a fair trade?—A. I don't think that would help the price of fish any for our fishermen. Our fishermen must get a certain amount for their fish in order to make it remunerative enough to follow the business; if they can't do that they must abandon it. The supply of our market by foreigners tends to depress the market to such a low standard that our fishermen cannot survive.

Q. In your opinion is it to-day specially desirable to fish within the three-mile shore line? I do not mean measuring from headland to headland; I mean within the 3 miles, following the sinuosities of the shore.—A. I think it amounts to very little to us. As far as I have heard the reports this season, I think the fishermen say they have caught very few fish within those limits, and really there have been very few fish within those limits.

SEINE vs. HOOK AND LINE.

Q. When you fished for mackerel you fished with hook and line?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you take them with hook and line now at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. You take them with purse seines?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. As a matter of fact, is it not dangerous to our giant purse seines to fish within three miles of that rocky coast?—A. It is very dangerous; the seines are apt to be torn badly.

Q. Do you know what those purse seines cost?—A. They cost from $600 to $800 or $1,000.

Q. If they are damaged on the bottom it causes serious trouble, does it not?—A. Yes, sir; it is almost ruinous to the voyage. We had one of our vessels that went down into the Bay of St. Lawrence this season; she arrived there just in the nick of time, when mackerel were plenty. But the first time the seine was thrown they tore it all to pieces. There they were down there in the Bay of St. Lawrence without any means of procuring a voyage.

Q. As a matter of fact, has not the invention of the giant purse seine and that method of fishing entirely broken up the old system of fishing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it has taken away the usefulness of fishing within the three-mile shore-line off the Canada coast?—A. It has really, in my opinion.

CLOSE TIME.

Q. Our fishermen, as I understand it, start early in March down on the North Carolina coast, and use their seines from there northward.—A. Yes, sir. Probably it is known to you that there have been but very few mackerel caught on the New England or Southern coast this season. We attribute it in a great measure to casting so many of these seines early in the season down on the Southern coast. That has a tendency to turn the mackerel farther from the coast, and in consequence they have been driven down into the Bay of St. Lawrence.

Q. Your opinion is that there should be a close time on mackerel?—A. I think so.

Q. From March to June?—A. That is their spawning season. The theory is that where fish spawn there they are likely to return.

SPAWNING SEASON.

Q. I suppose that you do not regard mackerel as good in the spawning season?—A. No, sir; they are very poor.

Q. What time do you think they get through spawning?—A. In the month of June they are pretty well through.

Q. When they are really spawning they are on the bottom, are they not?—A. That is a question I can't answer.

Q. You do not ordinarily take many mackerel from the first of June to the first of July?—A. Well, yes; considerable many. Some seasons not so many. They are then considered to be about on the coast of Maine.

BAIT.

Q. How do you regard the importance of buying bait in the Canadian waters?—A. That seems to me to be a privilege that ought not to be denied.

Q. How important is it to you?—A. It is more important to the cod-fishers than to the mackerel-men.

Q. I am talking now about cod-fishing.—A. I am not really prepared to answer that question. These Provincetown people can answer that question better.

DUTY ON FISH.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. I understand you to say that your opinion is that the American fisherman ought to have and control the American market for fish?—A. That seems to me to be reasonable.

Q. This year, you say, there has been a very small catch of fish on our coast?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What would be the effect upon the demand for fish if the Canadian fishermen were prohibited from selling here by such a tariff that they could not afford to do it?—A. You see that it has operated very favorably for the Canadians this season. The scarcity of mackerel on our own coast has caused the price of mackerel to be quite high. Therefore the Canadians have been able to pay the duties and bring their mackerel into our market and realize a fair remuneration. If the fish had been plenty on our coast this season they could not have done such a thing; nor, if the prices had been low, could they have afforded to pay duties; it would not have afforded them a living remuneration.

Q. I want to inquire whether you think that the catch of fish in our waters would be sufficient to supply the demand of the country at all seasons for mackerel?—A. Well, I don't know about that, I am sure. Of course we shouldn't have so many fish as we should if the foreigners were allowed to bring them in.

Q. And that would necessarily enhance the price of the fish?—A. Well, yes; that would probably bring fish up to a living business for our fishermen.

MACKEREL FISHING ON OUR SOUTHERN COAST.

Q. Who are the parties that do the principal part of the fishing down on the Southern coast? Is it the Northern fishermen?—A. Yes, sir. Gloucester furnishes the large part of the fleet in that business; the principal part. Portland also furnishes a part.

Q. And your opinion is that that work drives the fish out so that they do not strike our coast again soon?—A. Yes, sir; that is one theory we have. Not only so, but we think that destroying so many mackerel when they are full of spawn has a tendency to diminish the quantity of fish.

FISHING INTEREST OF CHATHAM.

Q. Can you state generally about the fishing fleet?—A. Well, so far as this question under consideration is concerned, our fishermen come there very little.

Q. I mean how large is your fleet?—A. About twenty vessels.

Q. Was it ever any larger?—A. No, sir; not within my knowledge.

Q. Are those vessels mackerel-fishing?—A. At this season of the year, yes; but cod-fishing earlier in the season.

Q. So they carry on both kinds of fishing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where do they take the cod?—A. On George's Shoals, near by.

Q. They do not take the cod within the three-mile limits, I take it?—A. No, sir.

BAIT.

Q. The codfish are taken with bait?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind?—A. Clams.

Q. Where do they get their bait?—A. At home.

Q. So your fishermen from Chatham do not desire the privilege of touching in the British Provinces for bait?—A. No, sir.

MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. Where do they commence fishing for mackerel?—A. They commence on the coast and work down to Block Island, and then on down the coast of Maine a little ways.

Q. Commencing when?—A. In the middle of summer; I should think about July.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Do they fish within the three-mile shore line?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why not?

The WITNESS. Do you mean within three miles of our own coast? Senator FRYE. No, the Canadian coast.

The WITNESS. No; they do not, because they do not go there at all. Only one of our fleet has been there this season.

Q. What was his catch?—A. He caught sixty-two barrels.

Q. Would that pay for the voyage?—A. No, sir.

SEINE FISHING.

Q. In your experience within the last ten years, since the invention of giant purse seines, is there any profit in fishing within the three-mile limits of the shore line?—A. I don't think there is. The damage that would be occasioned to the property would be sufficient, so far as I have understood, to make it unprofitable.

Q. There is great risk of damage to the seines on account of the rocks in the shoal water?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And only one of your fishermen has been in there this last year?—A. Yes, sir; he just arrived this morning.

TREATIES.

Q. Do you know how it was when the treaty was in force?—A. They have never been in the habit of going there, to my knowledge.

Q. So that there is nothing that your fishermen of Chatham want of Canada?—A. Not anything at all.

Q. Then I take it that your opinion is that no treaty is necessary?—A. No treaty is necessary.

Q. In your judgment, what would be the effect of any treaty that would admit fish free?—A. I only gather my information from the fishermen themselves; they all say that it would make the price of fish so low that they could not remain in the business.

Q. I suppose you mean the price that the wholesaler pays to the catchers?—A. Yes, sir; what they realize.

COST OF OUTFIT.

Q. Have you any idea what it costs your fishermen for an outfit?—A. No, sir; I don't know as I could make a very explicit answer to that. We had a new vessel built last year, which I think cost about $7,000.

Q. What was her tonnage?—A. She was about 75 tons.

Q. Have you any knowledge of a Canadian vessel like her?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know the difference of cost between Canadian fishing vessels and ours?—A. I do not.

COD-FISHING.

Q. What is the length of a codfish voyage of your vessels?—A. They go out Monday morning and come in Saturday night, right along through the fishing season. They go from home off on to Nantucket Shoals.

Q. They do not fish up on the Banks?—A. No, sir; not on the Grand Banks at all.

THREE-MILE LIMIT, ETC.

Q. Do you know the length of a voyage for a fishing cruise to the Grand Banks?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is there anything special that you know about these fishery matters that you desire to state?—A. No, sir; our fishermen at Chatham were all away, and they wanted somebody to come up from Chatham, and so I undertook to come, although I don't profess to know much about it.

Q. In what you say here do you express the views of your fishermen?—A. I do, so far as I know them.

Q. The views that you have learned from them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you heard any expression of a desire on their part for the privilege of fishing within the Canadian three-mile limit?—A. They don't want that. I put down the words that the captain told me who arrived this morning. I asked him about that, and he said that the mackerel were mostly caught by the fleet this year outside of the three-mile limit, and that he caught none of his sixty-two barrels inside of that limit.

Q. That is to say, outside the three-mile limit when they were taking them off the Canadian coast?—A. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. HENRY COOK.

PROVINCETOWN, MASS., October 1, 1886.

Capt. HENRY COOK sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you live?—Answer. Provincetown.

Q. How long have you lived here?—A. I have lived here 76 years next November.

Q. You were born here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What has been your business?—A. My first business was going to sea in the fishing business and in the whaling business; for the last 35 years I have staid ashore, owning a fleet of whaling and fishing vessels. I once had four whaling vessels, but Semmes took them and destroyed them. Previous to that I had some mackerel fishermen, but that business seemed to all run out. Since 1871, the commencement of the reciprocity treaty, it was not a profitable business, and I did not have many mackerel fishermen; I had only two or three, and as it was not a paying business, I took them out. Since that time I have been in the codfish business, which was a profitable business until after the beginning of the reciprocity treaty; since then it has been dying out by inches.

RECIPROCITY.

I believe we have had but one year since the beginning of the reciprocity treaty that we have made anything to speak of, and that was in 1882. I think in 1882 we averaged about $4.50 per quintal for our fish, and we made a good, fair business; we didn't need anything better than that. But since that time and for the last three years my vessels are every one in debt a good deal. I think I haven't paid the captains a dollar for the last three years, and they owe me $4,500. They are not able to pay me anything, and I suppose I shall have to lose that.

COST AND OUTFIT OF VESSELS.

Q. Select one of your best vessels and give me her name.—A. The largest one of them is the Lizzie W. Madison.

Q. What did she cost?—A. Seventeen thousand dollars.

Q. What is her tonnage?—A. Since the tonnage has been cut down her tonnage is 187 or 188 tons.

Q. How many men does she take?—A. Twenty-two.

Q. Please state the length, on the average, for one of her cod-fishing trips.—A. They average about three and a half to four months.

Q. What is the cost of her outfit?—A. That is about $3,000; the wages are about $3,000, that is, for this year; one year I paid $5,200 wages; that was the highest, and this year is the lowest.

Q. What would they be paid per man?—A. They would be paid $140 for the three months.

BAIT.

Q. Do your vessels fish on the Banks?—A. Yes, sir; on the Banks of Newfoundland altogether.

Q. What are your necessities about bait there?—A. We never went in without bait; I always put aboard all the bait we wanted.

Q. What kind of bait?—A. Clams. I put 130 barrels of bait aboard the Lizzie W. Madison and 55 barrels on the smaller ones.

Q. So that you never found any necessity for buying bait on the Canadian waters?—A. No, sir.

Q. Squid are better than clams, are they not?—A. Squid are better than anything.

Q. Can you obtain those squid outside the Canadian waters?—A. Yes, sir; on the Grand Banks. This year they threw away all the bait they took from here, and which cost me $3,000 or $4,000. Some years there are no squid up there at all; so that we have to carry the clams from here, even if we afterwards throw them away. We cannot get clams without great expense. If the squid should fail any one year, and we had no clams for bait, it would ruin the voyage.

Q. Suppose the squid did not fail on the Banks, and you had your clams on board with which you had furnished your vessels, would you not want to go ashore and buy squid?—A. No, sir; never.

Q. Then, in your opinion, there is no necessity of our fishermen buying bait?—A. Not at all. Our Bank fishermen have no use for them. Our people used to set trawls on the bottom. About 25 years ago quite a number of our vessels set trawls on the bottom, with a line and hooks attached. The clams were not very good. Our people haul fish in with a hand line. When the clams were not good then they would have to go in and get squid. They bought these squid in Newfoundland. But they don't get any now.

Q. Your opinion is that the privilege of buying bait is not worth anything?—A. Not anything at all.

Q. So you would not give Canada anything for it?—A. No, sir.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. What occasion do you have to go inside of the three-mile limit?—A. None at all. My charge always was not to go inside of the line if they could avoid it.

Q. Then you would not have them go in except in case of a storm?—A. No; unless an accident of some kind happened, or it became necessary for them to go in for repairs. They do not go within a hundred miles of Newfoundland or any of the land.

LENGTH OF FISHING VOYAGE.

Q. How long does it take to go from Provincetown or Gloucester to the Grand Banks?—A. Owing to the weather; I have known them to go in four days, and I have been myself in eighteen days and fifteen days.

Q. Do you make more than one trip during the season?—A. Our vessels here do not.

Q. Do you know whether the Canadians make more than one trip a year?—A. I never was on the Banks since they came along there, but I know from my captains' reports that they do make two or three trips. They do not get very heavy trips. They live so much nearer the Banks than we do that they go in and discharge their fish and go out again.

RELATIVE EXPENSES OF VESSELS.

Q. Do you know how the cost of the outfit of Canadian vessels compares with ours?—A. I do not; but I know that their vessels don't cost them nearly so much.

Q. Do you know the difference in the cost of the two kinds of vessels?—
A. Yes, sir. I have paid $48 a ton and $45 for building vessels, and they only pay $18.

Q. But you do not know about the outfit?—A. I don't know about the outfit.

Q. Do you know about their sailors' wages?—A. I do not. They don't go on wages; they go on shares.

Q. Has it not been usual with our fishermen to go on shares?—A. They do in Gloucester, but not here. The captain takes the vessel from us on shares. He takes the responsibility, and we have to furnish the funds to fit her out.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. The captain hires the men?—A. Yes, sir; and if there is a mate, he draws a share with the captain. The captain draws one-half and the vessel the other half.

EFFECT OF THE TREATIES.

Q. You have been in the fishery business for a long while; during the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and also during the treaty of 1870, down to the present time. What has been the effect upon the fishery business of those two treaties admitting fish free?—A. The 1854 treaty did not affect us at all, and I will tell you why. We educated those people for fishing, as we have educated every nation on God's earth. Even Portugal to-day has to get her education from us, and the French to-day fish in the same way we do, with the same gear and with our boats. We have educated the whole world to fishing. In 1854 those people were mostly educated in Gloucester, and they remained in Gloucester; they did not go home. But in 1871, when the duties were taken off and fish were allowed to enter free, pretty much the whole of Gloucester went down home, and they built over 500 vessels in one year that they sent down to Nova Scotia. That has done the whole business for us. They were educated here, and then went home and built a whole fleet of fishing vessels; and when they got more fish than they knew what to do with, they shoved them in here to choke us.

Q. What was the effect upon the general fishing interests of Massachusetts, so far as you know, of that treaty of 1870?—A. The effect is that it has driven us all into debt, and we want to get out if we can.

DUTIES ON FISH.

Q. Then you do not want free fish?—A. No. We get more fish than we know what to do with, even at 13 cents a pound, when we can sell them for that. I wrote to France to know if I could sell a cargo of fish there. What was the answer? "Duties are so high that it would be no use." And therefore they starve their fishermen. Season before last we sent four or five cargoes of fish to Portugal and sold them at a fair compensation. They brought about $7 a quintal. But we did not get our money for nine to twelve months, and we could not do without our money so long. Their way is to sell their cargo to merchants, and then they have to wait there until the fish are all sold, and it is sometimes three months before they will give you your money.

Q. How much duty did you have to pay?—A. Two dollars and fifty cents in Portugal, and two dollars and fifty cents in Hayti.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you know what the duty is in Canada on cargoes from here?—
A. Fifty cents.

Q. Did you ever send any into Canada to sell?—A. I have carried fish to Halifax, small fish, and sold them there, when fish were free.

Q. Not since there has been a duty?—A. No, sir.

Q. What country is open to your fish without payment of duty?—A. I can't find any, and I have written all over the world. I can't find anybody but what wants to be paid for them, instead of paying for the fish. We can send some to Martinique; I believe the duties there are not very high; but that is a French port and is crowded with French fish.

Q. How large a fleet is the French fishing fleet?—A. I don't know they have quite a large fleet, and their vessels are large, 8,000 to 10,000 quintals.

COMPETITION WITH FRENCH FISH.

I had some nice fish this voyage, which I cured about a fortnight or three weeks ago. (I want to say this just to show you how these things operate with us.) I went to Boston with those fish; they were dry fish, not in pickle. I went to the dealers. They didn't want any dry fish at all; they wanted green pickled fish to cut up and put in boxes. Said I, "Why?" The answer was, "We have got plenty of French fish in our store-houses over to East Boston." They pay 50 cents per quintal and deliver them in Boston. Those dealers in Boston want to kill me out; they are bitter against us. I have a good deal to do with them. They want free fish. They gather those French fish and put them in store-houses. So I had to sell my dry fish for $2 a quintal, and they bought theirs for $3, and the French paid 50 cents duty. But the Frenchman goes home, and his Government pays him a bounty of $2 a quintal. So the Frenchman gets $3 here for his fish and $2 at home, which makes him $5 gross; and that is more than we ever got, I was going to say.

BOUNTIES.

Q. Our fishermen do not get any bounty now?—A. No, we don't want any. I always went against a bounty. We don't want to fare any better than the rest part of our people. Give us the same privileges as our farmers. Put duty on our fish, the same as you give protection to beef, pork, and potatoes.

Q. Canada pays a bounty to her fishermen, does she not?—A. They say so—out of what she got from us.

Q. Out of that $5,500,000?—A. Yes, sir. That was all thrown away. I was down to that court at Halifax, and I never saw such work in my life. It made me so mad I didn't know what to do, and I was just as saucy as I was mad. There wasn't anybody in Halifax, none of the merchants there, but what told me before the case was decided, "Yankees have got the weather of us this time." But instead of that we had to pay them five millions and a half.

TREATIES WITH ENGLAND.

Q. What do you want us to do with Canada in behalf of the fishermen?—A. Do nothing with Canada; leave her out. She only wants to get all the gold from us to send over to England.

Q. What do you want us to do with Great Britain?—A. Let her alone.

Q. You do not want any treaty?—A. What do we want with Canada? Treaty! No. If I had it my way I would make a treaty and get something out of them for that five millions and a half. What have they that we want?

Senator FRYE. I do not know of anything.

The WITNESS. England is putting railroads through Canada, so that she can draw $20,000,000 gold a year out of this country to go right back to England. She is in Mexico, on the south, and in Canada, on the north, drawing gold out of this country, the same as she did out of Egypt and every other country. She has got a little colony here and there all over the world to draw the gold out of every nation and send it home. We just want $2.50 duty on codfish brought into this country.

FRESH FISH.

Q. How about the duty on fresh fish?—A. There ought to be a strong duty on fresh fish, too.

Q. What do you know about importations of fresh fish from Canada?—A. I don't know much about it. I only know that it affects our market. There is not much of their fresh fish comes in, except mackerel from the shore of the Bay of Fundy, and lobsters.

Q. And halibut?—A. I guess there is some halibut comes in. I never knew of any codfish brought in; but they would fish for codfish and drive out our fishermen any time; I know that.

Q. Do not our vessels that go for fresh fish take ice to keep the fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they bring them in in ice?—A. Yes, sir.

REFRIGERATING PROCESSES.

Q. Are they then deposited in refrigerators and sent all over the country in refrigerator-cars?—A. Yes, sir; they are put into sugar-boxes.

SALT FISH vs. FRESH.

Q. What, in your opinion, is the effect of the great increase of fresh fish upon the demand for salt fish?—A. It affects it very much indeed, because people will use a fresh article before they will a salt one.

Q. You mean it reduces the demand for salt fish?—A. Yes, sir; the demand for salt fish to-day is not as large, in proportion to our population, as it was forty years ago. I was then in the fishing business, and there was a demand for all our salt fish. There were very few fresh fish then. Our population has increased threefold in the last forty years, and yet we do not use much more salt codfish than we did then.

Q. The fresh fish have increased, and the salt fish have decreased?—A. The salt fish have not decreased, but their increase has not been in proportion to the increase of the fresh fish.

FREE FISH.

Q. These fresh fish all come in free now, as you understand it, from Canadian waters?—A. I never knew them to fetch in any codfish.

Q. You have known them to fetch in fresh fish, have you not?—A. Yes, sir; smelts, herring, and mackerel.

Q. They come in free?—A. Yes, sir. That is done away down on the western shore, I guess. The Southern fishing business is a pretty fair business nowadays for us.

DIFFERENCE IN COST OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You spoke about the difference in cost of Canadian vessels, as compared with ours, as one reason why they could fish cheaper than we can. To what do you attribute the difference in cost between Canadian vessels and ours?—A. There is just about a difference of one-third in the cost of both vessels and outfits.

Q. What is the cause?—A. It is because their country is not so much advanced as ours in their manner of living, and also because of the difference of cost of material and labor. We want to hold up our labor. We don't want a man to work for 50 cents a day. I have hired men to work for me down there for 80 cents a day, and they would work all day long and half the night. For such labor here I would have to pay $1 or $2.50. There is the difference. If you want a good vessel built here you must have good workmen and you have got to pay them good wages. A man can't live in this country on 50 or 75 cents a day. Their material don't cost them anything hardly. They have an abundance of the kind of wood of which they build vessels.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. They build them largely of soft wood, do they not?—A. The frame work of the vessel is hard wood, but in a great many of them the planing is spruce, soft wood. I have been aboard of them down there and talked to the boss workmen. It costs $18 a ton down there to build those vessels, while I can't get one built here in these hard times short of $40 or $45 a ton. We don't want to come under the lash to live and be compelled by our Government to live just as they are. I can remember when we here in Provincetown did the same kind of work they are doing at about the same cost. The first vessel I knew my father to build here only cost him $24 a ton. But it is very different now. It did not cost me half as much to live forty years ago as it does now. What are we going to do? Have we got to fall back and bring up our children to not go to school, or not give them clothes fit to go in, and give them hardly anything to eat? We can't stand that. We will clear out if we can't do better.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. WILLIAM MATHESON.

PROVINCETOWN, MASS., October 1, 1886.

Capt. WILLIAM MATHESON sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. I live here in Provincetown.

Q. What is your age?—A. Fifty-nine.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fishing business.

Q. How long have you been in the fishing business?—A. I have been in the fishing business for thirty-five years.

Q. What kind of fishing?—A. Cod-fishing.

Q. In what capacity are you now in the business?—A. I am now agent here for vessels.

Q. How many vessels?—A. Five.

Q. How long have you been acting as agent for vessels?—A. About ten years.

Q. During the last treaty and since it expired?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What class of vessels?—A. Schooners.

Q. Good ones or poor ones?—A. Considered decent good.

AVERAGE COST OF FISHING VESSELS.

Q. What is the cost of any of them?—A. About $15,000.

Q. What is the average cost per ton of good fishing vessels?—A. I haven't built any for the last four years. The last one I built I paid for at the rate of $43 a ton.

Q. You think that is pretty near an average for a good, first-class fishing vessel?—A. It was at that time.

Q. What does that $43 include?—A. The hull and spars.

Q. What does the finishing up, the rigging, and all that, add to that?—A. One-third more.

Q. What does an outfit of one of these 75-ton vessels cost?—A. The outfit would be about $1,500 to $1,700.

Q. For how long a trip?—A. Four months.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. How have you managed those vessels for the last ten years, as to crew and all that sort of thing?—A. I hired crews by the trip.

Q. How much a trip?—A. Different wages,

Q. State approximately.—A. According to the quality of the men. Sometimes we give them as high as $150 and $160; and then again we would hire a poorer class man and give him $125.

Q. For the voyage?—A. For the voyage.

Q. You do not catch any fish on shares?—A. No, sir.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What would be the average wages for a voyage?—A. For such vessels as you ask me about, the wages would be about $1,500 to $1,700.

Q. That does not enter into what you call the outfit?—A. The outfit is one thing and the wages another.

Senator EDMUNDS. That is what I supposed.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do not the owners prefer the old style of going on shares?—A. We can't hire men very well to go on shares; business is so bad they are liable to fall in debt.

Q. Formerly did not nearly all the fishermen sail on shares?—A. Yes, sir; when times were good they liked to go that way.

Q. But business has now become so uncertain that you say you have to hire your men instead of taking them on shares?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What effect has that had upon vessel owners?—A. The owners have to bear all the losses.

Q. Has it had any tendency to drive them out of the business?—A. Yes, sir.

BAIT.

Q. Where do you do your fishing now?—A. On the Grand Banks.

Q. What do you use for bait?—A. Clams.

Q. Have you any occasion to buy bait of Canada?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have any of your captains bought bait of Canada?—A. Not of late years.

Q. Is clam bait suitable?—A. Yes, sir.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Suppose you could get squid by running within the three-mile shore line of Canada?—A. We always get squid on the Grand Banks whenever they are there.

Q. Then what occasion have your vessels to go inside the three-mile limits?—A. They don't go there.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY OF 1870.

Q. What was the effect, upon the fishery business, of the treaty of 1870 during its continuance?—A. It has been a ruinous business for us for the last four years. Before that we were getting along very well. The last four years have been hard ones for us.

Q. The treaty expired in July, 1885. How did it affect you the last four years differently from the first six years of the treaty?—A. We had it about as bad to-day for prices as at any time.

Q. What happened four or five years ago?—A. The business kept declining year after year.

Q. Did the Canadian fleet increase?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did the supply of fish they brought into this country increase?—A. Yes, sir. That is what used us up. For two years, in particular, they built a terrible sight of Canadian vessels down there, and all went fishing two or three trips a year, and put their fish against us. Every time we sent fish to Boston, New York or anywhere else, the news would come back "Here is fish from English vessels selling for such a price, and if you don't sell for less you can't sell at all."

Q. So the Canadian fleet commenced increasing largely about 1880?—A. Yes, sir; about 1880 largely. I don't think they are building many for the last year or so, but before that they went into it rapidly.

Q. And broke you down rapidly?—A. And broke us down rapidly. It filled our markets full of fish.

EFFECT OF DUTY UPON THE CONSUMER.

Q. To whom do you sell fish?—A. Different ones.

Q. Wholesalers?—A. Wholesalers.

Q. You do not retail?—A. Nothing of any account.

Q. Do you know whether the duty on fish affects the price to the consumer, the man who buys of the retailer?—A. I couldn't say so much about that.

Q. What do you want of Canada, captain?—A. We want them to pay a fair duty on their fish, and give us a chance.

FRESH FISH AND MODERN REFRIGERATING PROCESSES.

Q. How about fresh fish?—A. We don't want fresh fish free of duty either.

Q. Why not?—A. Because we have got enough of our own.

Q. State whether or not the importation of fresh fish and its increased consumption do not decrease the consumption of salt fish.—A. Yes, sir; I think the more fresh fish there is the less salt fish we shall use.

Q. Does not the fact that, under modern processes, fresh fish can be sent all over the country in refrigerator cars, affect the salt-fish trade?—A. Oh, yes; there is no question about that.

Q. So that your desire is a duty on both salt and fresh fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How large a duty? Is the present duty large enough?—A. No, sir. They have the best of us every day with duty only at 50 cents a quintal.

COMPARATIVE COST AND RUNNING EXPENSES OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. How do they get the best of us?—A. Their vessels do not cost more than about half as much as ours, and their expenses are low all the way through to what ours are.

Q. Do you know about their wages?—A. They generally go on shares, and if they make $50 they are satisfied. Fifty dollars is no account to our men. A man can't keep a family on that. Down there they have their farms, and they go out fishing in summer, and if they get $50 in cash for their fishing, they can get along very well.

Q. So your idea is that on account of the low prices of wages there, their manner of living, and the low cost of vessels, together with the nearness of the Banks to the coast, it is impossible for us to compete with them?—A. No, sir; it is not impossible, but we ought to have at least a dollar duty in order to enable us to compete with them on fair terms to us.

Q. A dollar on both salt and fresh fish?—A. A dollar on both salt and fresh fish.

Q. Do you know where you can find a market where there is not a duty?—A. I don't know of any. We have to pay a duty everywhere.

BOUNTIES.

Q. Do you know whether or not nearly all other nations pay bounties to their fishermen?—A. They do in Canada, and they do in France.

Q. Do you know how much bounty is paid in Canada?—A. I have often heard them telling about the bounty they were getting.

Q. So much to a boatman, and so much per ton to the vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

CONSTRUCTION OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. Are the Canadian vessels built of poorer material than ours?—A. Yes, of soft wood. Then most people down there have large tracts of land, and they cut their ship timber from their lands.

Q. They plank their vessels with spruce?—A. Sometimes with hard wood. It don't cost them but $27 a ton to construct their vessels, while we pay $45 and $48 and $50.

Q. A great many of our fishing vessels are built of the best white oak, are they not?—A. Yes, sir; most of them.

Q. What is the average cost per ton of, say, a 70-ton fisherman, rigged and all ready for sea?—A. If they were as high to-day as they were three years ago, I suppose it would be somewhere in the neighborhood of $3,000 to $3,500, or $100 a ton.

Q. Do you know about the rigging and fitting of Canadian vessels?—A. I suppose that costs pretty near as much as ours, because they get a great deal of that material from this way. I don't think they buy it at any less cost than we do. Where they make the great saving is on the hull and spars.

MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. Do you have anything to do with mackerel fishing?—A. No, sir.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Is there any mackerel fishing going on from Provincetown?—A. Yes; there are three firms in this town.

CANADIAN COMPETITION.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. If you could buy your vessels as cheap as the Canadians, do you think you could compete with them in the fishing business?—A. We can't get men here as low as they do. Men are cheaper that way, on account of their way of living. When we come to fit our vessels our fitting costs a good deal more.

Q. The cost of wages and provisions?—A. Yes, sir; that would be a great deal more. So, really, if fish were $4 a quintal, we ought to have a dollar duty to compete with them, for they would do as well on $3 as we would on $4.

Q. If that $1 duty was sufficient, so that Canadians could not afford to send their fish, how would it affect the market?—A. The fish would not rush in so freely as they do now, so that there would be a chance for us, when we sell fish, to get something for them to pay us. But as it is now, they put their fish in so low that we sell at a loss every time. If their fish did not compete with ours, there would be a chance for us to live.

EFFECT OF DUTY UPON THE CONSUMER.

Q. I am sorry that the increase of duty does not inure to the benefit of the fishermen here, but my inquiry had reference to the consumer of the fish. How would he be affected by this tariff of 50 cents or $1 upon Canadian fish?—A. I don't think it would make much difference to the fellow that uses the fish. I guess he has to pay about the same any way.

Q. The middlemen put it up on him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is the present price of fish to the wholesaler—that is, what do you get for your fish?—A. We get about $2.25.

Q. What does it cost you to catch them?—A. It costs us about $2 to catch them.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Two dollars and seventy-five cents for what quantity?—A. For a hundred pounds. That is the way we are doing business.

BAIT.

Q. What is the bait you use?—A. Clam bait.

Q. Did you ever have occasion to go in to buy bait?—A. Not of late years; not since we commenced carrying clam bait.

Q. How long have you carried clam bait?—A. For the last six years.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Did you ever have any occasion to go within the three-mile shoreline for anything?—A. No, sir; no more than for harbor.

Q. In a storm, or to repair damages?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you done so this season?—A. Yes, sir.

SEIZURE OF THE PEARL NELSON.

Q. What vessel?—A. The Pearl Nelson.

Q. Please give an account of that affair.—A. On our way home we went into Arichat, Nova Scotia, for harbor.

Q. In a storm?—A. There was a heavy breeze of wind, and some of my crew that belonged there landed there that night. I anchored about 11 o'clock at night. I went ashore the next morning to report at the custom-house, and of course the custom-house officers stopped my vessel.

Q. Seized her?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For what reason?—A. For letting my crew land before I entered the custom-house; that is all the reason he gave me.

Q. What caused you to allow them to land?—A. I didn't know it was any harm. I have never seen or heard of it being stopped before.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Had you ever done that before?—A. I had done it time and again, and seen everybody else do it.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. And never before heard of anybody being troubled about it?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was the result?—A. I paid $200 and got clear.

Q. You paid the $200, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they give you any law, regulation, or rule?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In writing?—A. Printed.

Q. Have you it with you?—A. It is down to Mr. Cook's store.

EFFECT OF THE LAST TREATY.

Q. What was the effect of the last treaty upon the fishery business?

—A. The effect with me is that of course I can't get a living at it.

Q. How many men do you take?—A. Seventeen, all told.

Q. Do you pay them wages?—A. Yes, sir. Last year my wages averaged about $130.

Q. For a voyage?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long a voyage?—A. I was gone about three months and a half.

Q. What was your outfit?—A. I suppose Mr. Cook can tell you that better than I can; I don't know as I know real well.

Q. What was the result of your operations for the season?—A. I got a full fare of fish.

Q. How did they pay you?—A. None of them are sold yet, and from the outlook now it is not likely they will be.

COMPARATIVE WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES AND IN CANADA.

Q. Do you know what the difference is between the wages of your men and Canadian wages?—A. The difference is that my men are sure of something and Canadian men are not sure of anything, for they only get according to what the fish fetch.

Q. They sail on shares?—A. They sail on shares.

Q. Will not your men sail on shares?—A. We can't get them to, and they haven't done so since I have been going out of this town—that is, for the past fifteen or sixteen years.

Q. Have you any idea how much the men who do the fishing get out of a season's fishing up there?—A. They get from $200 down to $100 to a man for the fishing season.

Q. Our men averaging about $130, as you say?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then do they not get about as much as your men?—A. There is no great difference.

MARKETS FOR CANADIAN FISH.

Q. Where do those Canadian vessels carry their fish to?—A. To the ports where they belong.

Q. And then where do they carry them?—A. There is a big pile of them going to Boston, New York, and other American markets; some go to the West Indies.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. They do not run them straight down here from the Banks?—A. No, sir; they first land in the ports where the vessels belong.

Q. And are sent off afterwards?—A. Yes, sir; by the vessels that catch them.

Q. Then the vessels that catch them do bring them down here sometimes?—A. Yes, sir; after they are dried.

COST OF CURING FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You bring your fish in here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you pay your men for curing?—A. The cost of curing here is one-eighth of the fish.

Q. Do you know what the cost of curing in Canada is?—A. As far as I can find out, about 20 cents a quintal.

Q. About what proportion would that be?—A. There is no great difference as the prices are now.

Q. Do they not employ women and children to do their work?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you employ?—A. The vessel-owners here employ what they see fit.

Q. You do not know what the difference in cost is between the wages actually paid here and the wages actually paid there in the curing of fish?—A. No, sir; I don't know.

DYNAMITE FOR CANADA.

Q. What do you want Congress to do with Canada for your benefit?—A. Blow it up with dynamite.

Q. You do not want free fish?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is there anything they can give you for which you will be willing to give them free fish?—A. No, sir.
Q. Is there anything that your fishermen, the men like you, want of them?—A. No, sir.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Did you ever fish for mackerel up there?—A. No, sir.
Q. Did you ever fish for cod inside the three-mile limit?—A. When I belonged there I did.
Q. But I mean since you left there?—A. Never since I left there.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES A. SMALL.

PROVINCETOWN, MASS., October 1, 1886.

JAMES A. SMALL sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. In Provincetown.

Q. How long have you lived here?—A. Seventeen years.

Q. What is your business?—A. Outfitter; I do a general outfitting business for fishermen.

Q. What kind of fishermen?—A. Mackerel, principally; some cod.

EFFECT OF THE TREATIES, ETC.

Q. State generally to the committee what you know about the mackerel fishing during that 17 years, and the effect of the treaties, and matters connected therewith pertinent to our investigation.

Senator EDMUNDS. And where the fish are caught, whether inside or outside of the three-mile limit.

A. The mackerel generally, for the last 17 years, have been caught on the New England coast, and but few, as far as my experience goes, in the Bay of Chaleur, and a large proportion of those caught there have been caught outside the three-mile limits. My personal experience on that matter consists in having gone perhaps a half dozen trips during the 17 years, those trips having resulted in perhaps a thousand barrels of mackerel caught, half of which have been caught outside the three-mile limit.

Q. (By Senator FRYE.) What is the reason it is not prudent to take the fish within the 3-mile limit?

Senator EDMUNDS. That is, while the treaty was in force that made it lawful for you to do it.

A. While the treaty was in force we could not do it lawfully.

Senator EDMUNDS. I mean while the treaty was in force which allowed you to fish inside the three miles.

The WITNESS. We did fish inside the three miles when we wanted to, but as a general thing we fished outside.

Senator EDMUNDS. We wanted to know the value of the deprivation of the privilege of going inside.

The WITNESS. That is very little.

Q. (By Senator FRYE.) Why? Is it not because the method of fishing has been changed?—A. In a great measure, yes. They fish with seines now, whereas formerly they fished with hook and line.

VALUE OF THE FISHING PRIVILEGE WITHIN THE THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. How many vessels have you in the business?—A. We have four in the business now, and we have averaged, I should think, about eight sail in the mackerel business.

Q. When your vessels have fished within the three-mile shore limit what has been the profit on the mackerel which you have taken?

The WITNESS. I don't understand the drift of your question. Is it what has been the profit on these particular mackerel that we caught there?

Q. What has been the result of your fishing operations within the three-mile limit?—A. They have not been in any way satisfactory or useful to us; they have not been to our advantage.

Q. In other words, then, your mackerel cost you more than you got for them?—A. My experience is such as to cause me to believe that if we had never seen the Bay of Chaleur, or North Bay, it would have been better for us and all concerned in this town. I think it would have been better for us if that bay had been closed up to us 50 years ago.

COST OF FISHING VESSELS IN UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Q. What kind of fishing vessels are those mackerel vessels?—A. They average 70 or 75 tons.

Q. What do they cost?—A. The last one we put in new in 1883 cost us $10,000 equipped.

Q. How would Canadian vessels cost compared with that?—A. I am not able to say.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. By the way, how many trips have your vessels made within the 3-mile shore line in the last 5 years?—A. I should say that in the 5 years we have made five or six trips to the North Bay, with a product of a thousand barrels of mackerel, one-half of which were caught within the three-mile limit.

Q. During the whole 17 years?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What value do you place upon that privilege of fishing within that limit to-day?—A. No value comparatively. We can get along without it.

Q. What are you willing to give to Canada for the privilege of fishing within that limit?—A. Not a cent. They should pay us rather than we should pay them. It is no privilege to us.

BAIT.

Q. How about bait? Is it not a privilege to buy bait?—A. We have never had occasion to buy bait there.

Q. Do you think it is necessary for cod-fishing to go in there to buy bait?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is there anything that our fishermen need there except shelter, food, and water and chances to repair?—A. No, sir. We ask no privileges.

FREE FISH.

Q. Have our fishermen been in the habit of drying any fish there for the last 10 or 15 years?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Do you know any of our fishermen who have?—A. There may have been some, but I know of none positively.

Q. What do you think Canada has that she can give us for the right of our market free for her fish?—A. She has nothing that will offset that privilege, in my estimation.

Q. What, in your judgment, has been the effect of free fish under the treaty?

The WITNESS. Reciprocity of 1870?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. Its tendency has been to open a market to them and to increase their fleet to such an extent that, in one sense, they take the large part of our market for their fish. They have seen the value to them of the open market, and the consequence is they have increased their fleet, from the fact that they have had these inducements held out to them.

Q. Why cannot you compete with them?—A. Because they are nearer to the fishing grounds, in one sense, and they can build their vessels, if I understand the matter correctly, very much cheaper than we can. Everything that goes into the making up of a voyage comes to them cheaper. Everything that enters into the construction of the vessel is cheaper to them than it is to us.

Q. What effect upon the fresh-fish market has the importation of fresh fish free, under the construction given by the Treasury Department, had?—A. I think it has been injurious, as far as my observation goes, and as far as I am able to learn.

Q. Have you any idea of the extent of the fresh fish market in this country?—A. No, I have not. I know it is enormous, not only on the sea coast but on the lakes.

Q. What do you do with your mackerel?—A. Salt them.

Q. You do not sell fresh mackerel?—A. No, sir.

INCREASE OF CANADIAN IMPORTATIONS.

Q. You know the condition of the market after the Canadian fleet increased so for the last five years. Have you any knowledge as to how much the importation of fish was increased from Canada year by year?—

A. No, sir; I couldn't give the amount. I am not versed in the statistics.

Q. Suppose the same condition of things should continue for the next ten or fifteen years that has been in force for the last five years; what would be the effect upon our fishery business?—A. We should be driven out entirely. It has been going down for three years steadily. We have not made both ends meet in any branch of the business.

Q. Is that true of all the fishery business with which you are acquainted?—A. That is true of all that we have any interest in and all that I know anything about.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Have you information as to the number of Canadian vessels engaged in bringing fish into this market?—A. I have not.

Q. About what percentage, should you suppose, were brought here in Canadian bottoms?—A. I have no means of knowing that. I have never studied that question.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES GIFFORD.

PROVINCETOWN, MASS., October 1, 1886.

JAMES GIFFORD sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. What is your business?—Answer. Deputy collector of customs.

Q. And have been for how long?—A. For 18 years.

Q. Where?—A. At Provincetown.

Q. During that time have you had any interest in, or made any investigation of, this fishery matter?—A. I have.

STATISTICS SHOWING THE EFFECT OF DIFFERENT TREATIES.

Q. Will you state, in your own way, to the committee your knowledge of the fishery business, the effect of the treaties upon the business of this country, &c.?—A. I will state that I have examined the official reports of Canada, the annual reports before and during the treaty, and also the annual reports of our Government during the same time, and I have compiled from them some statistics. I have the reports for each year with me, but for the sake of making a brief statement to the committee I have computed my figures, the result of which I will give you. I will first give you the products of the British fisheries, to show the effect of the treaty from 1872 to 1884, and the amount of importations into this country.

In 1872 the value of British products was $7,532,200. We imported that year into the United States $1,20,081 worth.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That is fish products?—A. Yes, sir. The intervening years I will not give, but give them for 1884.

Q. Have you the figures for the intervening years?—A. I have them. Senator EDMUNDS. Then make up a table and give it to the stenographer to be made a part of your testimony.

The WITNESS. In 1884 the value of British products was $17,852,521; we imported that year $5,633,566; the gain being in products of Great Britain $10,320,521, and the gain in importations, from 1872 to 1884, inclusive, into this country was $4,613,455.

The increase of Canadian fishing vessels and boats during the same time was as follows:

In 1873 the fishing vessels numbered 402, and fishing boats 9,009.

In 1884 they had 992 fishing vessels and 12,772 boats, a gain of 590 vessels of fishing vessels and 3,763 boats.

In 1883 the Province of Nova Scotia alone added 143 fishing schooners, chiefly bankers, and 1,526 men, to her already large fleet.

And in this connection I refer the committee to Report on the Canadian Fisheries for the year 1883, page 21. I have that report with me.

I will now state the decrease in American tonnage during the same period.

In 1873 the fishing tonnage of the United States was 109,519 tons.

In 1884 it was 82,565 tons, the loss amounting to 26,954 tons.

I will now state the decrease in the number of fishing vessels in the six ports of Cape Cod, that is, in this county.

Q. That is, the district of Barnstable?—A. That includes the whole district of Barnstable.

In 1873 the number of vessels belonging to Provincetown was 100 sail. (I would say that this is taken from the official records at Barnstable, from the latest authority.) In 1885 there were 118 sail.

In Wellfleet in 1873 there were 71 sail; in 1885 there were 47 sail.

Dennis had in 1875 46 sail, and 19 sail in 1885.

Chatham had 18 sail in 1873, and 20 sail in 1885, being a gain of two, and the only one that has gained.

Plymouth had one in each of those years.

Hyannis had one each year.

The total for the six ports in this district was 266 sail in 1873, and 206 sail in 1885, a loss of 60 sail and 2,000 tons during that time.

I will now state the catch of vessels belonging to Barnstable County that fished in British waters during the treaty.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What do you mean by "British waters"—within the three-mile shore line?—A. No; inside and outside altogether, in British waters.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That is, the waters of the Canadian Provinces?—A. Yes, sir; over which they claim jurisdiction.

One from Dennis took 240 barrels of mackerel in 1879.

Six from Wellfleet took 70 barrels in 1880, none in 1881, none in 1882 and 1883. The product altogether there in 1884 was 185 barrels.

Five from Provincetown in 1884 took 500 barrels. One from Provincetown took 206 barrels in 1885.

During this term of four years from those six ports there were 16 vessels that made voyages to the British waters, and they took a little over 110 barrels. I should say that this year we had several, but there was but one that made a successful trip.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Can you tell as to the cost of that mackerel, whether they paid for the 16 vessels?—A. No, sir.

Q. State as nearly as you can as to that.—A. There was a loss. Amongst the 16 voyages there may have been two or three that were profitable, but the rest suffered serious loss, and during that time two vessels were lost from this port, one with an entire crew, the loss exceeding by far the gross stock caught in those waters during that time.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. You spoke of one vessel this year fishing in British waters; what did you mean by that?—A. There was more than that.

Q. Do you mean inside the three-mile limit?—A. No, sir; there were five vessels from this port this year in the British waters, all fishing off shore, and they brought in 1,426 barrels, an average of about 153 barrels to each vessel.

Q. You do not call the Grand Banks British waters?—A. No, sir.

Q. You mean in the neighborhood of the islands at the mouth of the St. Lawrence?—A. No, sir; in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. But not within the three miles?—A. No; none of our vessels have fished within the three-mile limit this year. There was one of those vessels I speak of that made a very successful trip.

Q. Did those 16 vessels during that time fish within the three-mile shore-line when they had that privilege, or did they take most of their fish outside?—A. They took most of the fish outside.

CANADIAN ESTIMATE OF VALUE OF INSHORE FISHERIES.

But just allow me to quote to show the estimate of the British themselves in regard to the value of those inshore fisheries:

Q. What do you quote from?—A. From the official report of J. Hunter Duvar, inspector of fisheries for the Province of Prince Edward's Island in 1883, before this treaty was made or had been mooted. This is in reply to an accusation made by the fishermen there that the seines were destroying the shore fisheries to the hook-and-liners. The inspector examined the complaint, and says:

At the very time that the committee of the International Fisheries Exhibition is about to induce an American fishing vessel to visit British waters for the purpose of teaching British fishermen the art of seining, continued complaints are made to me by a certain class of line fishers against seining, on the plea that the use of the seine scares mackerel from the hook.

After showing these complaints to be groundless, Inspector Duvar continues:

It is true some Americans seined successfully this season within sight of land, but as a general rule they prefer sea-room, and usually find their schools beyond the shallow waters of the hook-and-liners. * * * Further inquiry shows that hook-and-line in shallow water, or inshore fishing, must be abandoned by British fishermen, and that seining must eventually be the recognized practice for the main mackerel fishing.

He adds:

More seine-boats, and merely picking up stray schools within the three-mile Canadian limit, will be found quite inefficient. Schooners of some burden would take the place of shore boats, and would scatter themselves over the Gulf, as do the Americans.

That is, if the British fishermen would pursue the mackerel fishing efficiently they must leave the inshore shallow waters, and, like the Americans, fish off shore, in the deep waters of the gulf, where the body of mackerel are to be found.

BAIT.

The matter of bait has been alluded to. Provincetown is the second port in importance in amount of tonnage and number of vessels that visit the Grand Banks, Gloucester being the first of New England; and I would say that there has not been a single vessel of the entire fleet of this port that has touched a Canadian or British port for bait this season, and that within the last five or six years there have been perhaps on an average two vessels that have gone into Newfoundland to purchase squid. It will not exceed two vessels.

I also wish to call attention to the fact that the Canadians are indebted to United States for bait, as well as our vessels to them. There is a large amount of bait purchased by them from Maine; most of it goes from Maine; and when the gentleman who furnishes this bait was here this spring I questioned him about this matter, and he told me that the total yield of clam beds in Maine was about 18,000 barrels; that the average annual sale to the British Provinces was 6,000 or 7,000 barrels, and that the average price for the last five years was 20.50 per barrel. That amount will go a great ways towards baiting any convenient we derive from not being allowed to procure bait from them. There is a class of vessels making short trips for fresh fish that run in there for bait, but they could be supplied from Eastport if necessary; they could stock up with bait at Eastport and ice it, and get it there in good condition.

Q. So that in your opinion there is no necessity for any American vessel going in there?—A. No, sir.

Q. The privilege of going in for bait is not worth anything?—A. No, sir. There is another inconvenience and sometimes damage connected with it, and that is that while they are in there the crews frequently spend their money and draw upon the owners; so that it is generally considered undesirable by owners for the vessels to go in for bait.

TRADING LICENSES FOR FISHERMEN.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Have any of the fishing vessels that have left this port or this district, so far as you know, since the treaty terminated, taken out any other than mere fishing papers? Have they taken trading papers?—

A. Yes, sir; we have five fishing vessels that are now laid up, and one of them has been laid up for two years, a good vessel, because of her running in trade.

Q. What I am speaking of now is the custom-house papers issued to these vessels. They ordinarily take a fishing license?—A. Always.

Q. Have any of those vessels having these fishing licenses that have gone there this year taken what I will call commercial papers—that is, the same sort of papers as a vessel would take that wanted to go to Nova Scotia to trade?

Senator FRYE. What you call a permit to trade.

A. There are two kinds of papers. Fishing papers permit them to fish, of course, and then if they wish to go coasting they take out a coasting license. If they are going to trade to Nova Scotia or any foreign port they take out a register. The fishermen who thought they were liable to go in for any purpose whatsoever, to repair damages or for other causes, have taken permits to touch and trade.

Q. (By Senator EDMUNDS.) As well as being registered?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You speak of their being registered. If they are going in for the purpose of buying ice, for instance, would you call that trading?—A. No, sir. We consider a fishing vessel has authority to procure bait or anything that is necessary for the fishermen.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Under the permit to trade?—A. Under the fishing license. There has never been any question raised on that point.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Have any of these vessels taken out any different or more papers this year than before?—A. More of them have taken out permits to touch and trade, but very few have used them. Perhaps there may have been half a dozen vessels that have been in, either going to or coming from the Grand Banks; I think the number will not exceed that, and probably will fall short of it.

RETAIL AND WHOLESALE PRICES OF FISH.

I have some statistics in relation to the retail and wholesale prices of fish.

Senator EDMUNDS. We should like them very much.

The WITNESS. I took pains to write to New Orleans, to O Milwaukee, New York, and Philadelphia, and saw some parties from Concord, N. H., and some fresh fish dealers of Boston, who were here, in regard to these prices. Generally we know here what the wholesale price of fish is in New York. The prices thus asked for and given were for December in 1872 and 1873, and up to 1885, so as to include the years before and after the treaty.

Q. Have you the prices for every month in the year, or only December?—A. I got only for December. It is a very difficult matter to get at these prices, and I had a good deal of trouble to get them.

Q. You have the prices for the same months in all the years for purposes of comparison?—A. Yes, sir. I thought December was perhaps as nearly a representative month as any.

In Boston fresh cod sold in 1872 from 8 to 10 cents retail; No. 1 mackerel from 20 to 25 cents.

Q. Twenty to 25 cents a piece?—A. Yes, sir. But the other item was 8 to 10 cents a pound.

In 1885 I found the prices the same as they were in 1872 and 1873.

In Philadelphia in 1872 cod sold for from $6 to $8 per quintal; the retail price of No. 1 mackerel was 18 cents.

Q. Do you mean salt mackerel, or fresh?—A. I mean salt mackerel. In 1873 the prices were the same.

In 1878 cod sold at from 5 to 6 cents a pound, and mackerel 15 cents. I will state that in that year the quality of the mackerel was exceedingly poor, and that accounts for the low price.

In 1885 cod retailed at 5 to 6 cents a pound, and mackerel were 18 cents.

In Concord, N. H., in 1883 and 1884 cod sold at 10 cents, as also in 1885; mackerel sold in those three years at 20 to 22 cents.

Q. Every time you speak of the price of mackerel do you mean by the piece?—A. Some were returned by the piece and some by the pound; but most of them by the piece.

Senator EDMUNDS. Then when you speak of the price of mackerel hereafter and mean to speak of the price per pound, say so, and then we will understand when you give the price of mackerel only that you mean the price by the piece.

The WITNESS. In Milwaukee in 1873 and in 1878 cod sold for 8 cents a pound, and mackerel at 20 to 25 cents each.

In 1885 the prices were precisely the same—8 cents for cod and 20 to 25 for mackerel.

In Chicago in 1873 cod sold at 10 to 12 cents a pound, and mackerel 20 cents each.

In 1878 they sold the same.

In 1886 they sold for 10 cents a pound, and mackerel 18.

In New Orleans in 1872 cod sold for 12½ cents a pound, and mackerel at 23 cents a pound.

In 1873 cod sold for 10 to 12½ cents a pound, and 20 cents a pound for mackerel.

In 1874, 10 cents a pound for cod, and 20 for mackerel.

Q. How much will No. 1 salt mackerel ordinarily weigh?—A. A good mackerel ought to weigh a pound and a quarter.

Q. That would be the average in half a barrel?—A. They ought to weigh that.

In 1878 in New Orleans the price of cod was 10 cents a pound, and mackerel 17½.

In 1879 and 1885 the price of cod was 10 cents a pound and mackerel 20 cents a pound.

The average during the treaty for No. 1 mackerel was $16.01 per barrel.

The average price of No. 1 mackerel in Boston in 1871, 1872, and 1885 was $12.84½.

Q. For each of those years?—A. Yes sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Less than the average during the treaty?—A. Yes. It was $16.01 during the treaty, and was $12.84½ before and after the treaty.

During the present season, to show how this thing operates, our vessels have been to Boston with fresh cod, and could not obtain 25 cents a hundred pounds for them.

Q. Fresh cod in good condition?—A. Fresh cod in good condition. At the same time they were retailing for 8 to 10 cents a pound. The truth is that they have all over the country been kept up at the high prices that were established during the war.

Q. You mean the retail prices? A. Yes.

It may be that some of the gentlemen present can give you better than I can the average prices for codfish in Boston, but according to the best information I have, I judge they have not been over $2 a quintal, that is, 112 pounds.

Q. That is the wholesale price?—A. That is the wholesale price during that time. I had a minute somewhere showing what the wholesale price was in Philadelphia during this time; but the wholesale price was not half these last three years in Philadelphia what it was from 1873 up to 1884, and the retail price is unchanged, or is a trifle lower.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON THE CONSUMER.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Then your idea is that the duty has nothing to do with the consumer?—A. Nothing at all. The fisherman cannot realize the cost of his catch, while the consumer has to pay these large prices. Of course that tends to destroy consumption and operates to cut it off largely.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Your conclusion is, then, from your information and observation in this business—and your opportunities certainly have been very good—that the provisions of the treaty of 1870 and 1871 did not operate at all to the actual advantage of the people who ate the fish?—A. No, sir; I think that is fully demonstrated.

Q. And that it operated to the disadvantage of the men who fitted out fishing vessels and the men who sailed in them?—A. Yes, sir. The profit is really reaped by the middlemen, by the dealers. It is for their advantage, undoubtedly, to have free fish; they invest a good deal less money and get larger profits.

THE COST OF CANADIAN OUTFITS, ETC.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You have investigated somewhat the cost of outfits, and of supplying vessels, and generally the advantages the Canadian has over us?

—A. I have a little statement here that I took from a Canadian captain who happened in here with a load of salt fish last winter, and that will perhaps give you as good an idea in reference to that as I could give you in any other way.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What kind of salt fish was it?—A. Cod.

Q. Dry, or pickled?—A. Dry fish, exported in bond. They were bonded here and exported, because they could get them so much cheaper than they could get our fish, although the fish were rather inferior to ours in quality. In this statement I do not give the name of the vessel, because I thought if I gave the name of the master and vessel it might annoy the captain when he reached home, for of course the statement I make would be known, and consequently I thought it prudent not to state the name of the vessel.

The vessel belonged to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and was of 79 tons burden. She made two trips to the Banks in the season of 1885 and returned with 2,400 quintals of codfish. The American schooner Benjamin F. Rich, of Provincetown, of 65 tons, owing to the greater distance from the fishing grounds, made one trip the same season, and brought into port 1,600 quintals of codfish.

The cost of the British vessel, prepared for fishing, was $4,000, or $50.63 per ton. The cost of the American schooner—17 tons less than the other, prepared for fishing—was $6,500, or $100 per ton. The outfits of the former—salt, bait, provisions, and fishing-gear, together with wages paid the crew—amounted to between $1,900 and $2,000. The same items cost the American vessel $3,025. The wages paid the British crew were $75 to $82 per man. Those paid the American crew were from $125 to $190 per man.

Q. That is for the whole season?—A. Yes, sir. The season is one voyage with us. If our vessels are gone but two months it makes no difference, they get the same pay.

Q. The British vessel made two trips to the Banks?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that $75 per man for each trip?—A. I understand that is for the entire season.

The Canadian crew were required to prepare the vessel for sea, to receive and stow cargo, and to discharge her, and wash and stack or store the fish on her return to port. The American fishermen did not perform this service. The crew on the former vessel were obliged to wait for their pay until the fish were sold and money for them received, whereas the latter, the American crew, were promptly paid and discharged on arrival in port.

The curing, drying, and handling of the Canadian fish was done by women and girls, who received 6 cents an hour and 25 cents by the day. The curing, drying, and handling of the American fish was done by men, who received from 20 to 25 cents per hour, and that is always so.

WAGES, HOW PAID.

Q. When these men from this port on the fishing vessels are paid, are they generally paid in cash?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They do not have to run up what is called a store account?—No, sir.

Senator EDMUNDS. From my experience in Canada—and by "Canada" I mean the whole of that eastern region—I understand, in general, that nine-tenths of all these British fishermen hardly ever see a dollar of their wages in cash; that they have a store account, just as is customary with some operative establishments, where goods are sold at very high prices, and the operative comes out at the end of the year with nothing due him. The consequence is that the outfitter has a lien on the fishermen all the time, and the amount of profit that is made by that Canadian outfitter and vessel-owner is enormously greater for that reason, and the actual wages of the fishermen are very much less in proportion than the figures you give, because for every $75 that they earn they get not more than perhaps half of that amount in real value in goods, whereas our men, being paid in cash, can buy, like everybody else, at the lowest cash rate.

The WITNESS. Our men are generally paid in cash. This vessel I spoke of, the Pearl Nelson, arrived one day and the men were paid off the next, and that is the custom. Your statement confirms precisely what this captain told me, that they were obliged to take a considerable portion of their wages in stores. It is to the interest of the vessel-owners for the men to go on shares, but it is found impracticable to get them to do so. They usually carry one or two sharemen, and sometimes others of the crew will go on part shares. But the men here generally have families, and they don't want to take the risk. They prefer a fixed sum, so that they will know how to make their calculations, and so that when there is a loss that loss will fall upon the owners, as it has the last few years.

SUBSEQUENT CURING OF FISH BROUGHT IN FROZEN.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. I want to call your attention to this fresh-fish business.—A. It is a very serious matter in connection with the fisheries.

Q. Their admission free of duty?—A. Yes, sir; there is a very large amount brought in.

Q. You remember the language of the tariff act, "Fish, fresh for immediate consumption"?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Under that, your experience shows, does it not, that all fish come in in a frozen condition?—A. Yes, sir. That has not come directly within my jurisdiction, because we do not have entries of that sort. But I know, from the general business, and our own reports too, that that is the fact.

Q. From your experience in the custom-house, is there the slightest difficulty in bringing in a cargo of fresh halibut, for instance, in a frozen condition and transporting them to Boston, New York, or anywhere else, and subsequently curing them?—A. None at all; there is nothing to hinder it. The only question to settle at the custom-house is whether that fish has not been salted or cured in some way. If it is fresh, that is all we have to consider.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Suppose I come to-day with fifty tons of frozen salmon into this port and want to make a regular entry, what would you do?—A. Under the ruling of the Department and precedents, I should be obliged to enter them free.

Q. You would consider that they were for immediate consumption?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Suppose, further, that, having made my entry and paid my duty, I take my fish ashore, put them into ice-houses, and come back and say to you, "Now, Mr. Gifford, I have got clear of you; 'immediate consumption' to me means that I am going to carry that stock of fish to supply the shoresmen here just as long as I can keep them frozen; the last one probably will not be eaten for six months"; what would you do then?—A. It would be beyond my jurisdiction.

Q. Although I told you that I intended to do so?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Take that same cargo, and is there any difficulty in transporting it to any point in the country under the present system of refrigerator cars?—A. Oh, no.

Q. Is there any difficulty in keeping them for months?—A. No, sir; they are just as much preserved as though they had been salted.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Practically I understand you to mean then—it is obvious enough—that the words in the law, "for immediate consumption," as to fresh fish, do not amount to anything at all?—A. Not to anything at all for fish that come fresh.

FRESH FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Has not this modern process of freezing fish and transporting them over the country in refrigerator cars immensely increased the consumption of fresh fish?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. What effect has that had upon the consumption of salt fish?—A. It has decreased it very much. For the past three years they have been running fish through to Chicago, both dried and fresh. They used to have a pretty large market in Chicago for our fish, but in the last three years that market has been principally supplied by the Canadian fish run right through.

GRAY AND WHITE HALIBUT.

Q. Is it a fact that the gray halibut is the halibut that is smoked?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the white is marketed fresh?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is it also true that the same cargo of halibut will have portions that will be gray and ought to be smoked and other portions white that ought to be marketed fresh?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then would not the result be that part of an ordinary cargo ought to be sold as fresh and part as smoked?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What means would you, as a custom-house officer, have of knowing that half of a cargo of halibut was subsequently smoked and half of it was sold fresh?—A. Even if I did I don't see how I could interfere. The question is whether, when the entry is made, the cargo comes within the terms of the law admitting it free, and if it does, that is as far as I can go with it.

Q. Under the decision of the Treasury Department in the case at Gloucester you understand that it is fresh fish?—A. Yes, sir.

TARIFF ON BOTH SALT AND FRESH FISH.

Now, in relation to the tariff, I don't know of any good reason why we should not have a tariff on fresh fish as well as salt. The Canadians have a tariff on all fresh fish that come into their country, just as they have on salt fish. Their tariff is a cent a pound, and it is only a fair tariff as compared with the duty on other products. Three dollars and fifty cents would only be an ordinary and fair price for cod. That amounts, I think, to only about 13 per cent.

Q. That is "a tariff for revenue only"?—A. A tariff for revenue only; that would perhaps be as high a duty as would be judicious to place upon it.

IN-SHORE FISHING AND OTHER CANADIAN PRIVILEGES.

Q. Do you know anything that our fishermen desire of Canada?—A. No, sir. They have only just one thing that is of any sort of value to us, and you have heard what that is—the privilege of going in there and of perhaps purchasing some little thing that they may be out of, as a matter of convenience; but that is a trivial matter. So far as transportation is concerned, I think we have in some cases availed ourselves of the privilege of transporting home the catch of mackerel.

Q. Through Canada?—A. Yes; to Boston. But, so far as the in-shore fishery is concerned, it is not worth any contention. You will find that when Mr. Johnston was Canadian secretary of marine he stated that the shore fishermen who are pursuing this in-shore fishery, as a class of men, are constantly poor and are really paupers; their Government is continually compelled to help them. He says they spend their lives in mending old nets and dogging around the shores without accomplishing anything.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Do you know the fact that it is shown by the statistics that during the twelve years of the treaty the average number of our vessels going within the three-mile limits was 93½ a year?—A. I have not examined that.

Q. Do you know that the statistics show that the actual cost of all the mackerel taken within the three-mile shore line was double the price obtained for them?—A. I should judge it would be, from what experience we have had in the ports on the Cape here; I should think it would cost all of that.

AVERAGE PAY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. It strikes me that you told me at Washington—can you tell me now?—about the average pay that fishermen all through this section get for a year's fishing.—A. No. I think likely it was Mr. Babson gave you that.

INSHORE FISHING.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Has any vessel from this district been interfered with?—A. I think Captain Kemp's is the only case. In fact, they have had very little chance to interfere with our vessels, because they have been kept away. This inshore fishery, you perfectly understand, is of advantage to the mackerel catchers only, and the mackerel interest is the smaller interest of the two. So that with our fishermen that privilege is perfectly valueless. We have never sent a vessel to fish inshore. During the treaty we had on an average about ten codfish vessels that fished those British waters, but just out of sight of land.

Q. Mackerel vessels go from this port, do they not?—A. We have eighteen mackerel vessels; nine of them, on account of the scarcity of mackerel on our own coast this year, have gone there, and one of them made a full trip, but only one. We have averaged about one vessel a year.

TESTIMONY OF OTIS M. KNOWLES.

After the adjournment of the subcommittee at Provincetown on October 1, 1886, Otis M. Knowles, agent for the Union Fish Company, located at Provincetown, made the following statement, not under oath, which was ordered to be embodied in the testimony:

That his company is the owner of several mackerel fishermen; that during all the time of their ownership none of them have ever taken a mackerel within the three-mile shore line of Canada; that in 1884 the fishing schooner Emma P. Curtis, Captain Rich commanding, made a nine weeks' trip in the Bay of St. Lawrence, fishing outside the three-mile shore line, and caught 125 barrels of mackerel, on which she stocked $916.79; that during the same time and the same length of time the schooner Alice captured on the American shore 956 barrels, on which she stocked $6,000; that also during the same time and the same length of time the schooner Stowell Sherman captured 700 barrels on the American shore, stocking $5,000.

TESTIMONY OF S. S. SWIFT.

S. S. SWIFT also appeared under the same circumstances and made the following statement:

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM F. JONES.

BOSTON, MASS., October 2, 1886.

WILLIAM F. JONES sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Forty-four years.

Q. You reside in Boston?—A. I reside in Boston.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I am a member of the firm of T. Jones & Co., commission merchants, dealing mainly in fish.

Q. How long have you been in the fish business?—A. I began in 1861, but was out of it for a time, being in the army during part of the war; then I have been in it since 1864 continuously.

Q. Do you fit out vessels?—A. No, sir. We are commission merchants, selling fish mostly from the British Provinces, though we deal to some extent in American fish.

Q. Where do your principals mainly reside in the British Provinces?—A. In Nova Scotia, principally.

Q. In what kinds of fish do you deal?—A. All kinds.

Q. What is the largest part?—A. Mackerel, codfish, and herring.

Q. Fresh, or salt, or both?—A. Salted mainly; a little in fresh fish but not very much.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY OF 1870.

Q. What was the apparent effect, on the fishery trade that you were engaged in, of the treaty of 1870-71, when the laws had been passed put it into effect, which, I believe, was about 1873; was it not?—A. It began July 1, 1873. You mean if there was any change at that time?—Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

A. I am not aware that there was very much, except that certain of the cheaper grades of fish could not afford to pay the specific duty. It does not make any difference to my firm whether there is a duty on fish or not, provided trade is good and fish are bringing good prices.

Q. I am not speaking of its effect on your business, as to personal profits, but as affecting the quantity sold, the prices obtained, and so on.—A. The larger prices for fish were obtained about the close of the war, during the inflated period, when all kinds of goods brought high prices. The prices of mackerel, particularly, change greatly from one year to another, without reference to the duty. For instance, the price this year has been double that of last year.

Q. But you did not observe on the occasion of the free fish coming in in force that the prices fell?—A. They fell just before that time, and reaction came in 1871-'72. Prices had been exceedingly high up to that time—too high; but a reaction came, and there was a very large decline, and very heavy losses were sustained both in the winters of 1871-'72 and 1872-'73, just before this treaty came into operation. So that I don't think that any difference would have been shown by the introduction of fish free. In fact, I remember particularly the testimony before the Halifax Commission, wherein it was said by many Nova Scotians and the fishermen of the Provinces down there that to them it was a very good thing to have a duty, because they got so much better prices when fish were free. That was simply due to the natural operation of the courses of trade; but they thought they had better have duty on because they got so much better returns from their fish during that time. That, however, was the inflated period during the war and just afterward, when prices of all kinds were exalted.

Q. That, I suppose, is not your opinion?—A. No; it had nothing to do with it.

Q. That was a delusion?—A. Take this year and last year. Last year prices of all kinds of fish were exceedingly low, and there was a surplus. This year everything except codfish is very scarce, and the prices of everything have advanced a great deal. In many things we are obliged to-day to go to Halifax or St. John, and to pay whatever prices they choose to ask.

Q. For what kind of fish?—A. For herring, mackerel, salmon, and for shad. However, the capture of shad does not amount to much this year. In fact, the capture of pickle fish of any kind this year is the smallest ever known.

Q. That is true of salmon?—A. That is true of salmon. Mackerel which last year brought $5 at this time are worth $10.

Q. Then how is it that the fishermen think that they are having a hard time?—A. I don't know. I think the figures prove that the fishermen are not injured by duty on fish, because during the—

By Senator FRYE:

Q. By the freedom from duty you mean?—A. Yes, sir. The fishermen are not injured by the freedom from duty, because during the thirty-one years before 1885 the American fishermen made all their profit. I have jotted down a few figures—

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Wait a moment. I want to ask you one or two more questions. I do not think you quite understood, or have not answered my last question. You say that the prices of fish, they being scarce, are higher this year than last?—A. Yes, sir. That has been because there have been fewer fish caught.

PROFITS OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Have the fishermen been making more profit this year than last?—A. No. A few of them have done fairly well, but the greater part of them have made very heavy losses, that is, in the mackerel fishing. In the cod fishery the catch has been large, and it remains to be proved what the result will be. My own opinion is that, all kinds of pickle fish being scarce, the consumption of codfish will be increased, and there is a hope, which there was not a month or two ago, that they may come out and make both ends meet.

Q. But at this moment the fishermen's operations for this year have not been fortunate?—A. Very unsuccessful as a whole. Most of the mackerel fleet will lose a great deal of money; it won't begin to pay; some of them have got nothing.

Q. Although the prices have risen?—A. Yes, sir.

FISHERIES STATISTICS.

Senator EDMUNDS. Now you can go on and give the figures you spoke of a moment ago.

The WITNESS. The United States census for 1880 gives the capital invested in the New England fisheries at $19,937,607; the product was $14,270,293. I deduct ten per cent. for the expense of doing the business; that is an ordinary allowance in general business; that leaves $12,843,264. Take 40 per cent. for the share of the vessels; that is the general settlement for the shares of vessels. That 40 per cent. would be $5,137,305, or nearly 26 per cent. dividend on the investment in the New England fisheries. That is from the last census report I have seen, for 1880. But the years 1881, 1882, and 1883 were better years. There were larger profits made, and the business will probably show better results.

Q. Why do you stop at 1883? Why not bring your statement down to this time?—A. Because in 1884 there was an excessive catch of mackerel, the largest catch ever known, and that was a poor year, owing to the large catch.

Q. How much did they make that year?—A. I don't think they made anything that year.

Q. How much did they make in 1885?—A. I don't know; there has never been any statement made.

Q. Do you mean to say that you can get figures for 1883, and cannot for 1884?—A. I have given you figures for 1880, and I say those are the last figures I have seen.

Q. You spoke of 1882 and 1883.—A. I say I know that they were better years in the fish business, but I cannot give you the figures. I merely say, in giving you the result for 1880, that $5,137,305 would amount to a dividend of about 26 per cent. on all the capital invested in the New England fisheries, and that was considered a fair year. But the years 1881, 1882, and 1883 were better years; prices were higher and more profits were made.

Q. The figures you have given us for 1880 were, after all, probably really those for 1879?—A. No; I got them from the census report for 1880.

Q. But the census was taken in June, 1880, and it must have been taken on the product of 1879.—A. If that is so, that makes it stronger for 1879 was a poor year. I had taken it to be 1880,

Q. It can hardly be possible, I should think.—A. From 1877 to 1879 were poor years, I know, in the mackerel business.

Q. You have evidently given the figures for 1879, notwithstanding you got them from the census report for 1880; and then you say that the succeeding years up to 1883 were better still?—A. Yes, sir; I say that in those four years the profits, particularly of the mackerel fisheries, were exceedingly large. The schooner Edward E. Webster of Gloucester, stocked $104,000 in those years ("stocked" is the term used in the business), and, in dividing, 20 per cent. is taken for expense of fittings, &c., 40 per cent. for the crew, and 40 per cent. for the vessel; there is over $40,000 for those four years for a vessel that cost some $10,000 or $12,000. But there were many other vessels did as well.

Q. What fishing was she engaged in?—A. Mackerel.

Q. Where?—A. She sailed from Gloucester.

Q. Where did she catch her fish?—A. Wherever they were; they might have been on our shores or in the bay, probably on our shores.

Q. Were you agent for that vessel?—A. No.

Q. Have you been, from that time down to now, the agent for any American fishing vessels?—A. No.

Q. So that whatever your information is, it is not information derived from your personal knowledge of business transactions?—A. No, it is derived from the statements of the owners of these vessels made to our organization.

Senator EDMUNDS. I ask you this question, because, when we go over to Gloucester, which is the grand headquarters of these people, we should call their attention to the alleged very heavy profits that are being made in the business, and therefore I should want to know precisely what you mean and what your sources of information are.

The WITNESS. During the time these vessels were doing so well they were very good to give out for publication the results of their trips.

Q. Was the case of the Webster, which you mention, a case of extraordinary luck, or did that luck apply to the whole fleet?—A. The case of the Webster was probably a case of skill on the part of her captain. He has got a positive genius for catching fish, but there were other vessels that did nearly as well. The Nellie M. Rowe was fishing the last two years and she made $55,000, which was really better in proportion.

Q. Supposing the whole number of vessels to be a thousand, what would be the average?—A. That we do not know.

Q. What do you think it would be, taking the whole business together?—A. I haven't any means of knowing what it would be for the whole.

Q. You do not mean to say, then, that you state the instances of the Webster and the Rowe as being fair samples of all the vessels engaged in the business?—A. Not at all; I merely wanted to show that it was possible to make such a large quantity of money. And I remember that the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, in his report published in 1883—I cannot quote from memory—after mentioning some of these large stocks of vessels, made a remark something like this: If it is remembered that these vessels fish only eight months in the year at the utmost, and most of them only from four to six months, it appears that the business has been very profitable for many, and that the greater part of the fleet made fair returns.

Q. That is the Canadian Commissioner you speak of?—A. No, the United States Commissioner. He makes that statement in the Report of the Fish Commission for 1883.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES.

Q. How do the retail prices of fish in this market compare with the wholesale prices? What has been the advance per pound, or per cent., or any way you choose to state it, so that we shall understand it?—A. I don't know much about the retail prices.

Q. Do you know anything about it?—A. Well, I know that that is one of the things which do not vary very much. The mackerel market now is a fluctuating one, down one day and up the next, varying constantly.

Q. Take it last week, or to-day; what is the retail price of No. 1 mackerel in Boston?—A. There is hardly any mackerel eaten in Boston. Codfish—

Q. Do you think there is no retail price?—A. I suppose there is, but I don't know what it is; I never had occasion to inquire, I know that very few mackerel are eaten in Boston.

Q. Take codfish; are codfish eaten here?—A. Yes, sir; I should say that the retail prices of codfish would be probably from 6 to 8 cents a pound.

Q. What grade or number?—A. There is no number on codfish. It is simply a question of bank fish or shore fish.

Q. You do not mean those that are skinned and put up in boxes?—A. No; I mean the whole fish.

Q. What is the wholesale price?—A. The wholesale price to-day is about $2.75 for bank fish and $4 for the best shore fish per quintal of 112 pounds.

Q. Then the retail price is more than double the wholesale price?—A. Yes, sir; when I speak of the retail price I mean selling the fish singly.

Q. That is what you mean by "retail"?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that, if I went to you as a wholesale dealer, and bought 112 pounds, supposing you would sell me a package at the wholesale price, and then I sold it right back to you—if you traded with me as a grocer—you would pay me double what I paid you for it?—A. About double; but you must remember that they go through two or three or four different hands, and consequently there are that many profits on the goods. Then as to the retail price there is a difference. You may go to Blackstone street, where the dealers sell to the poor people, and they do not get the profits that the dealers do up town where they pay high rents and expect to get a good deal more. The retailers who sell to the poorer classes would vary the prices of fish more in accordance with the wholesale prices. I have seen them quoted down there at very reasonable retail prices.

EFFECTS OF THE TREATY OF 1870-'71.

Q. You did not observe any special effects upon the market from taking off the duty under the treaty of 1870-'71?—A. It resulted probably in an increased importation of the cheaper grades of fish.

Q. Now let me come to the termination of the treaty in 1885, when the duty was put on. Did you observe any effect on the market from that?—A. There was a very considerable falling off in the importations during the first three months of the year.

Q. How as to the prices?—A. The prices were not affected. We had here last year a large supply left over.

Q. I am not on the reason; I want to stick to that particular point at this moment. We will assume then that the price immediately after wards was not affected, and we will assume that there were some importations, as I suppose there were?—A. Yes.

Q. Then the foreign importer, the producer of fish, had to pay his 50 cents or $1 on a certain number of pounds—I have forgotten what it was; out of whose pocket did that dollar finally come? If the price in this market was not affected, it did not come out of the consumer or American middleman; then it must have come out of the foreign producer, must it not? He did not make as much by that sum, did he?—A. It came out of him for the time being.

Q. In that case it would be clear, would it not, that it must have been that much loss to him?—A. It came out of him on the things which we have on our shores. You must understand that there are some kinds and grades of fish that come from the Provinces that we do not get on our shores at all.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES OF HERRING.

Q. Such as—A. Such as herring. All the fat herring consumed in this country are importations from the Provinces.

Q. We will speak of herring. Are herring graded?—A. They are graded as large, medium, and small.

Q. Take the larger herring, which are the best, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the wholesale price of herring during the season of 1884 and down during the winter of 1884?—A. I haven't looked up those points, and I could only speak from memory. I should say $4.50 per barrel.

Q. How many pounds?—A. The Massachusetts law does not provide for any number of pounds. Say 200 pounds. That is the way we sell mackerel.

Q. Have you the retail prices for herring?—A. No.

Q. What was the wholesale price of that same kind of herring in the summer of 1885?—A. It began at $5 and went down during the spring to the exceedingly low price of $3.

Q. Which spring?—A. This last spring. There was a very heavy supply of herring last year.

Q. So that on herring, so far as it appears from your testimony, the putting on of the duty did not affect the wholesale price in this market?—A. No.

Q. And you have said that it generally does not affect the retail prices at all as to any kind of fish?—A. I speak more of codfish. I do not know what the retail price through the country is.

Q. I am talking about Boston; and Boston, we think, is quite a considerable part of the country.—A. Not as a consumer of mackerel or herring.

Senator FRYE. I suppose that when this witness speaks about the market for mackerel, herring, or anything of that kind, he refers to the wholesale price, and not to the retail.

The WITNESS. That is all I know about. We sell to the large shippers, and I have no knowledge of retail prices.

Senator EDMUNDS. Now you can go on and state anything else you desire to. You spoke about some reports.

FISHING TONNAGE.

The WITNESS. I was going to say that the statement has been made that our fisheries were injured, and the illustration that has been given to show it was the decline in the tonnage. The decline in the tonnage was owing entirely to different causes. According to the statistics of the United States Commissioner of Navigation, the average tonnage during the years 1854 to 1866, which was the period of the reciprocity treaty, was 155,179 tons.

From 1866 to 1873, when the duty was imposed, it fell to 89,034 tons.

From 1873 to 1885, during the operation of the treaty of Washington, it fell to 82,988 tons.

Now, the average tonnage fell during the time that we paid duty something over 60,000 tons, and when we had free trade again it only fell 6,000 tons.

Q. Since the duty was reimposed has the tonnage increased, or diminished?—A. It has decreased a little and will probably decrease a good deal next year, owing to poor success. If you follow the thing up you can see very closely that the tonnage engaged in fisheries varies up and down from year to year during a period of three or four years, according to the success or failure of the fisheries. I remember that in 1877, 1878, and 1879 we had very small catches of mackerel, and the fleet fell off a good deal. In 1880 we had a good catch. In 1881, and up to 1884, the fleet increased considerably. The mackerel fleet in 1881 was 298 vessels, with crews numbering 4,258; that is, New England—Massachusetts and Maine.

In 1884 it had increased to 361 vessels and 5,617 men.

The cod-fishing fleet in 1881 was 604 vessels, 6,402 men.

In 1884 it was 759 vessels and 8,778 men.

Now, I think 1881 and 1882 were the profitable years on account of the high prices of codfish. In 1883 there was a very considerable increase of the cod-fishing fleet, an increase of between fifty and sixty vessels and 900 men. That was the improvement for one year.

EXPORT TRADE.

One reason why I think our fishermen will receive more damage than benefit is on account of the export trade. We are going to sell all the fish that are exported, and we have a very considerable trade in provincial fish with Hayti. Within the last three days I have sold 3,000 quintals of codfish in bond to be landed here to be packed in Nova Scotia. That is a distinct injury to the interests of American labor, to do the packing of goods and to furnish the casks out of the country. That falls particularly upon the Maine fishermen rather than the Massachusetts. Massachusetts cod-fishermen pickle the codfish. That swells them up and makes them look white, and they sell some salt and water with them when they are sold. The Maine fishermen dry their codfish very largely, and in previous years they have relied largely upon this export trade, and have sold a large part of their codfish to be exported. We are now competing with them. My firm has been working up that business, and we are selling very large quantities. Mr. Nickerson, of Booth Bay, a member of one of the largest fishing firms in Maine, told me three days ago that he thought the effect of having a duty on fish would cause him a loss this year of $5,000. He realizes the fact that it is going to hurt him very seriously in his sales of codfish.

Senator EDMUNDS. Just explain how that is.

CANADIAN COMPETITION IN LABOR AND MATERIALS.

The WITNESS. They can do the packing a little cheaper down there in Nova Scotia; they get their casks cheaper and their labor cheaper. On codfish it is a very close thing, and a matter of 10 to 12½ cents per quintal will result in turning the scale.

Q. If there were no duty, and if packing can be done cheaper there, why would they not do it still?—A. Because the customers here don't like to buy Nova Scotia packing; they prefer to do the packing themselves, and then they know what they are packing. They fear that if they trust it to somebody else some inferior fish may be put in.

Senator EDMUNDS. Taking the case you have stated, I do not see—probably it is because I do not understand the business—if you can find a market for your fish in Hayti, and if it is cheaper to pack them in the British Provinces than to pack them here, irrespective of the question of duty, why the temptation of the man who wanted to make the most money out of it would not be exactly the same.

The WITNESS. It is just as I tell you. They prefer to do their own packing. It has been a very difficult matter within the past year to get them to buy these Nova Scotia fish in bond, but we have now succeeded and are now selling them very large quantities. It may work that way again, supposing the duty should be taken off. But in the past, before the duty was imposed, the Maine and Nova Scotia fishermen were exactly on a par in regard to the sales of fish in this market.

HAYTIAN DUTY ON FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Is there any duty on fish in Hayti?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. How much?—A. I don't know what the duty is; it is quite large.

Senator EDMUNDS. Their duty is the same, whether the fish come from Nova Scotia or from Boston?

The WITNESS. Yes; it makes no difference. The duty this year has had a distinct effect in raising the prices, because the catch has been light.

IMPORTED AND DOMESTIC HERRING.

We are obliged to get the most of our herring from the Provinces, because we don't seem to get a supply. I have compiled some figures for five years, and I find that the only year in which the receipts of domestic herring in this port were anything like those from Canada was in 1880, when we had 26,492 barrels from domestic ports against 29,000 from Canadian ports.

The next year is 1881. In that year the American fisheries only produced 12,000 barrels against 44,000 in Canada.

In 1882 there were 10,500 barrels from domestic ports against 41,900 from Canada.

Eighteen hundred and eighty-three furnished 9,121 barrels from American ports against 84,650 Canadian.

In 1884 the domestic receipts were 7,885 barrels against 55,060 from Canadian sources.

Senator EDMUNDS. When you say that this year the duty has had "a distinct effect"—I believe that was your phrase—in raising prices upon herring, you mean that the American fish product and fish catch made the market price?

The WITNESS. No, not on herring at all. We only catch the cheaper grades of herring on our shores. All our best herring must be imported from the Provinces. We have no other sources of supply. Last year, as I told you, there was no supply. This year they have got a moderate catch.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON PRICES.

When we want to buy any goods we have got to give the prices that they name there, and then add the freight, duties, and other expenses; then they say to us, "If you want fish at that price, you can have them;" otherwise they won't ship.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. So in that case you think that the duty is paid either by the wholesale dealer here, or by the retail dealer, or by the consumer, or by all of them together, as the case may be?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know what effect the wholesale price has had this year upon the retail price?—A. No, I don't know. It must be higher.

HERRING.

In New England, as I understand, the herring are only eaten by the Irish population; I don't think anybody else eats them. They are in the habit of buying herring by the barrel, I fancy. The very small shop-keepers buy a single barrel of herring and peddle them out by the piece.

Q. So you do not know whether the peddling out to separate families of half a dozen a day has raised the price or not?—A. No. I don't come in contact with those people at all. The wholesale dealers and jobbers in Boston could probably give you information, because they are in communication with these people who make these sales, but I don't sell in that way. I sell to the wholesale dealer.

Q. You sell to the jobber?—A. I sell to the jobber. I do not come in contact with these people, and do not know anything about it.

Q. You think that the retail prices are higher?—A. I think the retail prices must be higher; herring are now selling at $6.50 that were selling at this time last year at $4.50, an advance of about 60 per cent. So I think the retail price must be higher.

Q. The retail dealer, however, who sold out his supplies in very small lots to families and was making 150 per cent. profit, might make profit enough on the whole business by not raising his prices, following the wholesale prices, and consequently having more sales?—A. Possibly.

Q. How that is you do not know as a fact?—A. All I know is that the jobbers tell me that it is difficult to sell the fish at the high prices; that it diminishes the consumption; that people cannot afford to pay those high prices. The Southern trade would certainly be very much affected. There is a cheap grade of herring that is used in the South. Herring worth last year $1.40 per barrel in Halifax would cost here about $2.75. We could not sell those; they would not take them off our hands; and the Southern people must have eaten something else. This year we know that they are beginning to want them. Herring are a little higher in Halifax. When business is generally good these fish come here and pay duties, and a profit is made. More than half the fish we import are of kinds that we do not get on our shores.

CODFISH.

In the pickle-cured codfish Massachusetts has no competition with the Provinces at all. Their fish are nearly all dried, and of those dried fish we are selling this year the larger part in bond. No Bank fish are coming here duty paid.

Q. The pickle-cured are all dried before they are sent to this country, are they not?—A. They are dried a little, not much.

Q. They are dried enough to pack in bales?—A. Oh, yes; they put them in boxes. They are the fish that a great many people like because they look white. They are really not so good a fish to those people who really know what a good codfish is. There is a market for all we can bring into this country of the best class of fish from the British Provinces, and no matter how low the prices of other fish may go, those best class of fish will always bring a good price. The best grocers in the city want those fish, and will pay for them, and will have them; and if there is a duty on them we have to make a larger price.

MACKEREL.

So with large mackerel. My firm has sold a great deal of mackerel to Gloucester and Portland, and even to Provincetown. Only the other day I sold $1,000 worth of mackerel to go to Provincetown. We have always had a large trade with Gloucester. They would not come to Boston to buy fish and take them down there, paying freight on them, if they could get such mackerel from their own vessels.

Q. What are those mackerel?—A. Larger mackerel. The mackerel on our shores have run small of late years.

Q. What grade?—A. They are No. 1's or large 3's.

Q. Take that $1,000 worth you sold lately to Provincetown; what grade were those?—A. Those were fat mackerel, mostly 1's and 2's, some 3's.

Q. What did you get for them?—A. We sold one lot, unculled, at $10.50.

Q. You do not speak of unculled mackerel as large mackerel?—A. They are large and medium, not inspected—mackerel just as they were caught, large and small, the larger part of them being medium size. I sold some to Provincetown for $15 a barrel.

Q. Were those sold for consumption?—A. Yes.

Q. For the home trade?—A. Yes, for the home trade. The Provincetown party we sold to is an owner of fishing vessels; he had no luck, and some one of his partners has been scouring the coast of Nova Scotia.

BOSTON TRADE WITH PROVINCETOWN AND GLOUCESTER.

Q. As I understand it, that Provincetown sale was for consumption at Provincetown and along the Cape, and the party who bought from you wanted to fill an order?—A. He wanted to pack them and sell them to wherever his orders may have come from.

Q. Is not the same true as to Gloucester?—A. Certainly. This is not a question of this year, because they have been doing it for the last six years. But I mean to say that when they come to Boston to buy Nova Scotia fish it shows that the American fishing vessels don't catch all the fish required for the trade of the country, not even mackerel.

Q. Or else it shows that those dealers at Gloucester and Provincetown want to fill orders, and not having the fish for that purpose, they send to where they can find them?—A. Exactly; that is all I say. It shows that they do not catch them. If their own vessels caught them, and they could get them from their own vessels, they would not come to Boston to buy them.

Q. If they had them at the particular time when they had an important order?—A. This is lasting right straight through the season.

We have had large customers in Gloucester, owners of fishing vessels, who have been customers during the year and at all seasons of the year.

Q. A steady trade?—A. Yes.

Q. Who are these gentlemen of Gloucester?—A. The largest firm and the one we sell the most to is the firm of George Perkins & Sons; and we have sold John Pew & Son some mackerel, but not very recently; I don't think we have sold them anything this year; I believe they are the largest vessel-owners in Gloucester; they certainly claim to be the largest fish dealers in the country; I don't know that they are, and I don't think they are quite so large as one or two Boston concerns, but that is the claim they make. Those two concerns buy the largest quantity of mackerel in this country. John Pew & Son are commission merchants.

DUTY.

Q. Suppose the duty that now exists had been taken off on the first of July last past, would you have sold these fish to those Gloucester people for any less?—A. I presume I should; yes, I think so.

Q. You would have been willing to break the market, take a less price, and make less profit?—A. I think the mackerel from Nova Scotia would have come here at an earlier period. The duty prevented them from sending the mackerel here in the early part of the season, but if the duty had been taken off that would have brought them here earlier, and they would have sold at lower rates. They sold them there because they thought there was no chance to do better. If there had been no duty we could have had the usual supply earlier in the season, but they could not afford to pay the $2 duty, and so they did not send their fish here. If they had been sent here our dealers would have all got them at the lower prices, and consequently could have afforded to sell them at lower prices, and the consumers could have had them at lower prices.

Q. When the prices rose sufficiently to enable the Province people to afford to pay the duty, then they sent them here?—A. Yes.

NATIONALITY OF THE FISHERMEN.

Q. Now state anything else that you want to.—A. I don't know that there is anything else that I have in mind to say, unless it is on the question of the nationality of the fishermen.

Q. Vessel owners and officers, of course, are all Americans?—A. A good many of the captains are Americans, as a matter of form, but they reside in Nova Scotia.

Q. But they are American citizens?—A. They are American citizens; they have been naturalized as a matter of form, but a great many of them go home when the fishing season is over and live in Nova Scotia. I suppose 75 per cent. of the crews of American vessels are not natives of the United States. The two counties of Inverness and Cape Breton, in the island of Cape Breton, and Shelburne and Yarmouth, in Nova Scotia, furnish about five thousand men to our fleet. As to what other localities furnish I do not know. The cry was made last year that the fisheries were a training-school for the Navy, but that was so absurd that I thought it worth while to mention it.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. How much, if you know, do these fishermen of the Province, fishing in British vessels, make in a season? I mean the crew.—A. The crews of mackerelmen go on shares. The cod-fishing crews are paid about $125. There is another point: The claim is being made that this is in the interest of American fishermen. During the time of free trade, before duty was put on, the fishermen were paid from $225 to $240 for a season, but that has been cut down to about $125; it has certainly been cut down 40 per cent. That was justified by the condition of the business. Trade was languishing, and fish were bringing low prices, and they had to cut down their prices. So this shows whether or not it was in the interest of the fishermen to have the duty put on.

Q. You know a good deal about this Nova Scotia business and the prices paid to the crews of British fishermen. Do you know in what form their wages are paid, whether they are paid in cash when they arrive in the ports of Shediac, Charlottetown, Halifax, or wherever; or does the fisherman have a running account with the fitting-out man, and have goods charged against him for the use of his family and himself, and then settle at some time or other?—A. I suppose he has an account in some cases; it may be one way or the other.

Q. Have you any knowledge about that?—A. No; I haven't any special knowledge.

Q. The British mackerel crews, if I understand you, go on shares?—A. Yes, and their cod-fishing crews, too.

Q. I thought you said the cod-fishing crews were paid in cash?—A. In the United States.

Q. I am talking about the Provinces.—A. In the Provinces very few of them, so far as I am aware, are paid wages.

Q. When you were speaking of codfish just now, did you mean American?—A. I meant American; I meant the American vessel-owners had reduced the compensation 40 per cent.

Q. Then what you said about it being reduced from $225 to $125 applied to American vessels?—A. Yes, sir; that is about what they have been paid, so I have been told.

Q. Now I understand you to mean that all the provincial fishermen go on shares?—A. Almost entirely.

Q. Substantially?—A. Substantially.

DIVISION OF PROFITS.

Q. Leaving out the officers now, what share do the crews get?—A. The usual division is 40 per cent. for the vessel and 40 per cent. for the crew.

Q. Then what becomes of the other 20 per cent.?—A. The 20 per cent. is expenses of fitting.

Q. How is that 40 per cent. for the crew divided between captain and mate, if there is a mate, and the regular fishing hands?—A. I don't know. I don't think there is any universal rule about it. I think some captains who are better fishermen than others—and there is a vast difference between them, you know—get better pay.

Q. That is according as they can make the lay?—A. Yes; that is the usual and ordinary division.

REPORTS SUBMITTED.

Q. You had some reports you wanted to submit, did you not say?—A. I will leave them with you if you would like them.

Q. What reports are they?—A. They are reports of our fish bureau,

INCREASE AND DECREASE OF CANADIAN FISHERIES.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You are engaged in the fish business with the Provinces. I would like to ask you whether there has been, within your knowledge, any very large increase in the Canadian fishing fleet for the last few years?—A. I tried to get statistics on that last year from the inspector-general of fisheries for the Provinces; I have forgotten his name. He did not have any very complete record. Their fleet increased considerably about the beginning of the treaty of Washington, but last year it had fallen off considerably since 1879; 1879 was the highest point it reached, and it is considerably smaller to-day than it was. From 1879 to 1883 it increased, and since that time it has fallen off. But they had not got it figured up in the Dominion of Canada, and did not seem to have full and complete particulars. So far as he did give me information, however, I should say that it increased for a time and then decreased.

Q. Do you know whether the cause of that decrease was by reason of their sales of fishing vessels to French fishermen, or whether it was on account of any falling off in their business? Do you know whether they have made any large sales?—A. I don't know whether they have made any large ones or not. I have known of instances of vessels being sold to the French, because I have had drafts sometimes on that account, but I haven't particular knowledge as to the number. There are very few Nova Scotia vessels now engaged in mackerel fishing; that has fallen off very much; they used to send a great many vessels into the Bay. They now catch them with hooks, nets, and traps from the shore. Their mackerel fleet has fallen to almost nothing. I don't believe that there are twenty-five mackerel sailers in Nova Scotia to-day, when they used to have quite a considerable fleet.

PACKING IN BOND.

Q. If I understand you aright, you attribute the fact that you make sales of fish in bond here, which are packed in Nova Scotia, to the tariff that is imposed upon the fish?—A. Certainly.

Q. You think that the present tariff on fish has had the effect to prevent the shipment of fish here for the purposes of packing?—A. Yes. The Treasury laws do not allow packing in bond. That is a strict construction of the law, made by the present Secretary. Formerly, when the duty was on, and at the time when Judge Russell was collector at Boston, he took the responsibility of allowing fish to be packed in bond. The law says that neither fish nor anything shall be repacked except for the purpose of immediate preservation. I hold that it was for the purpose of immediate preservation, inasmuch as the fish could not be shipped to the West Indies in bulk. But the Treasury construction of the law is different.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. That is a new construction?—A. Yes. Their construction of "immediate preservation" means that the fish would spoil unless packed. We could not say that. We simply say they could not be shipped to the West Indies in bulk. Being shut out from that, by that ruling, they are now having fish packed in Nova Scotia and delivered here in bond in casks.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. If I understood you aright, the result of that is that it deprives American labor of what it ought to have?—A. Yes; it deprives coo-

Q. If you can form any idea I would like you to state what amount of labor is thus taken away, by the operation of this construction of the law, from these coopers, packers, and other laborers you mention.—

A. That I do not know. The fishing business is not a very large business compared with many other kinds of trade. The whole of the fish business of Boston is perhaps not more than that of one wool house. It is a small business in itself, but then, so far as it goes, this ruling does deprive these men, who have been engaged in packing, of their labor.

EFFECT OF INCREASE OF TARIFF.

Q. What would be the effect upon the fish business of an increase in the tariff?—A. It would make it easier to sell in bond. As far as the export trade is concerned, the higher you put the duty the easier it is to advance the price in bond and the more facilities you have for underselling American fishermen. For instance, the duty being now 56 cents, we can sell codfish packed at about the price in bond that they would get duty paid. If the duty was $1 we could sell them 50 cents per quintal cheaper than they could produce them duty paid.

FISH EXPORTATIONS.

Q. About what percentage of your sales of fish is to the West Indies and other points in the foreign trade?—A. We have no foreign trade ourselves, but we sell to exporters. I have never made any estimate of the amount of fish exported, and do not know what it is.

Q. You do not export, yourselves?—A. Very rarely. We have not done so for several years. We sell to exporters. There are certain houses in Boston and New York that have this business with Hayti. That is the only West India trade we have here. The Hayti trade is the main foreign trade, and there is considerable of that in Boston and New York.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. To what countries do we export fish?—A. I say to Hayti.

Q. Do we not send some to France?—A. No.

Q. Do we not to Canada?—A. We did export some to Canada before the duty was put on.

Q. Do you know of any country to which we export fish where fish are free?—A. No. As I say, our export is mainly to Hayti.

BOSTON FISH BUREAU.

Q. I want to ask you a few questions about the fish bureau; I think Mr. Edmunds did not ask you about that. What is that institution?—A. It is a trade organization. I do not belong to it at present, but did last year. I went out of it thinking I was going to change my business. It is an organization composed of fish dealers and commission merchants. Anybody that is interested in the fish trade can become a member.

Q. Then it is not limited to commission merchants?—A. The majority of them are dealers; the commission merchants are in the minority.

Q. It is a general association?—A. A general association of the trade, comprising most of the principal dealers and commission merchants; some have belonged to it at one time and at another.

Q. Mr. Rich does not belong it?—A. Not at present; he went out some two or three years ago, I think.

Q. No fishermen belong to it, I suppose?—A. No. At one time, a few years ago, it was more general, and we had members in Wellfleet and Provincetown. Then this Gloucester bureau was gotten up, and those men wanted to go into that, and we concluded to keep ours separate from the Gloucester bureau; but for a few years anybody could come in who was interested in the fish business.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Q. With whom is the bulk of the commission merchants' trade conducted? For whom do they sell?—A. Some of us almost entirely for provincial shippers; others more largely for American shippers.

Q. Take the commission merchants altogether, and is not the bulk of the trade with the Provinces?—A. I cannot say exactly. The domestic trade of commission merchants was increasing until within a few years, and the fishermen had to go to market and sell their own fish, but they are giving it more and more to the commission merchants here.

Q. Are not a good many of your commission fish merchants Canadians?—A. No, sir.

Q. Are some of them?—A. One or two very small dealers who do not amount to anything.

LETTER IN THE BOSTON HERALD.

Q. Who was that gentleman whose letter appeared in the Boston Herald after your visit to Washington, in which he gave instruction to the members down there in the Provinces as to what they ought to do?—A. That was a private letter.

Q. It was published in the Boston Herald.—A. It was a private letter, and its publication was a great breach of confidence.

Q. Then you would not like to say who wrote it?—A. I would not; I do not think there is any occasion to do so.

Senator FRYE. I do not require it. I thought I would like to know, as a matter of curiosity.

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD T. RUSSELL.

BOSTON, MASS., October 2, 1886.

EDWARD T. RUSSELL sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. You reside in Boston?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your business?—A. General produce and fish commission merchant.

Q. Are you a member of the bureau?—A. Yes.

Q. How long have you been a member?—A. Since its organization.

Q. How long have you been a fish commission merchant?—A. Forty years nearly.

FREE FISH.

Q. With whom is the bulk of your business conducted?—A. It is about equally divided between the Provinces and the domestic ports of Massachusetts and Maine,

Q. Please state whatever you desire to, touching the relations between United States and the Provinces with reference to the fish business.—A. I would like very much to see fish from the British Provinces come in free. I think, from the experience I have had during the existence of the two treaties, that the general business has been good. The prices obtained for our domestic fish have been good. With perhaps a few exceptional years the fish business has been paying about the same as any other business. That continued until 1883, I think it was, when there was a culmination of very high prices, particularly on codfish. Then came a rapid decline, just as there was in everything else. Low prices have not been confined to fish by any means, but have applied as well to sugar, flour, grain, iron, and everything. Prices have been phenomenally low. I would not go so far as to state that I would hold out very strongly for fish to be absolutely free, if it was thought that our fishermen needed protection, but I hardly think they do. I do think, however, that they need to be relieved from taxation on articles that enter into the construction of the vessels and many other things. I would rather go back to what the duty was before we ever had a treaty, and then it was 15 per cent: I think 15 per cent. is a pretty wide margin for competition to overcome, and that is fair.

Q. That was on all fish?—A. On all fish, dried fish and pickled fish of all kinds, as you will see by the old tariff act. That act did not prohibit, as the duty does now, the importation of low-priced fish. There are a great many kinds of fish we cannot produce, and I cannot see the necessity for the duty.

HERRING.

Q. Such as what? Name them.—A. All kinds of herring—not all kinds, there may be some exceptions; but all kinds that are what you call food-fish, particularly for this part of the country. You can't catch a fat herring on the coast of the United States; that is my experience; I never knew of one or heard of one. The herrings they are catching on our shores and bringing into this port by the thousand barrels every day are not the kinds of fish people would call eatable; they do eat them, but they are consumed principally among the manufacturing population that want something cheap. On the coast of Labrador is caught the finest herring in North American waters. Last year there was a very large catch, upwards of 50,000 or 60,000 barrels, of which I suppose nearly 25,000 barrels came into the port of Boston, and we sold 13,000 barrels of them.

Q. At what prices?—A. We began at $1.75; then with the depression on account of the great quantity and with the depression of everything else, they went down until we finally sold this spring at $2.25, which brought the shipper in debt; one of the shippers owes me to-day. This year there is no catch, that is, we have heard that the catch of the Georges did not exceed 5,000 or 6,000 barrels. I sold one little cargo this week at $6 a barrel. There is a certain quality they will have if they pay $10.

EFFECT OF DUTY.

Q. You do not charge that at all to the duty?—A. I charge it to the scarcity of the market. Of course, the duty makes my business harder to do, but there is a certain quantity of business to be done here, and I am going to have my share of it.

SALMON.

We can't get any salmon in this country, unless we bring them across from Oregon or San Francisco.

Q. Do we not get them from the Pacific coast?—A. Oh, yes; I say we do. But those salmon do not compete with the northern salmon. They are used for almost an entirely different purpose, that is, a different class of people buy them. It may perhaps be a mere fancy, but the great bulk of northern salmon imported here are smoked. It is a little peculiar that a man will buy a whole salmon because it looks better, that is, a salmon that has a head and tail on, before he will the salmon that comes from the Pacific coast that is cut in pieces and pressed, with the head and tail cut off, and that will never bring as good a price although it is just as good to eat. There are some few exceptions, but that is the rule, which, in fact, is getting to be absolute.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Do the Oregon canned salmon come into this market?—A. Oh, yes, very largely.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you deal in frozen salmon?—A. We do to a limited extent, for some people who ship them to us. We take anything that comes to us from the Provinces.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON THE CONSUMER.

Q. What is your idea of the effect of the duty on the prices to the retailer and to the consumer?—A. It is pretty hard for me to answer that question; in fact, I have never been able to fully make up my mind. Sometimes it stands out very evident to me that the consumer pays it, and then again it looks the other way. I don't want to express any opinion about it. On general principles I do not like to see high duties. The duties we have on fish were imposed at the beginning of the war, and they are too high.

Q. Your general idea is that duties should be low, not only on fish but everything else?—A. Yes; but I say particularly so on fish. I think the duty is altogether too high; I think $2 a barrel is too much.

FREE FISH.

Q. The Canadians desire our market, of course; that is, they desire to send in fish free. What do you think they have in Canada to give us as an equivalent; I mean for the benefit of the fishermen?—A. I think entire freedom of fisheries. Here are some figures that are authoritative. This is the weekly summary of the fish bureau, something we get every Friday. It shows the importations for the week, and, of course, the importations up to this date for the season. Here are the figures for the New England catch of mackerel to date, from the beginning of the season up to yesterday.

Q. The season beginning in March?—A. In April. The catch was 62,111 barrels; of that quantity 51,825 barrels were caught in British waters.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. State what you mean by "British waters."—A. I mean in the Bay of St. Lawrence.

Q. Not within the three-mile shore line?—A. Oh, no. I call it American waters from Block Island to the Bay of Fundy. The fish caught our shore we call shore fish, though you might say, with the same propriety, "fish caught in American waters." Of course, the great bulk of these fish are caught almost in sight of Prince Edward's Island.

Q. But not within the three-mile shore line, following the sinuosities of the shore?—A. They say a great many of them do go within the limits, but I never saw it done.

Q. Do you think as good fish are caught within the limits?—A. About Prince Edward's Island I do not think as good fish are caught within the limit, following the coast line. This is my individual opinion, which I have formed after talking with people down there and with fishermen.

CANADIAN IDEA OF RECIPROCITY.

Q. I will ask you what their idea was as to what they had to give us in return for free fish?—A. I think that if they give us free fish, fish as we have had them under the last two treaties, and also the privilege of landing fish and refitting, it would be an immense benefit to our fishermen.

Q. Simply landing and refitting?—A. Refitting and landing fish. I am speaking particularly of the mackerel fishermen landing their fish at ports like Georgetown or Charlottetown and letting them come on by steamer to Boston, and then taking their salt in barrels and going back again.

THE MOLLY ADAMS.

I had an instance that came to my knowledge last year. The captain of the Molly Adams is a famous mackerel fisherman. Last year they had the privilege from the Canadian Government of landing their fish and forwarding them, and that man sent to Boston I think some 1,500 barrels in that way, and then finally came home with his last fare. This year I think he has made but two trips, and he has had to lug his trips home, and I think he might have done just as well this year if he had that privilege that he had last year.

Q. The season has not been so good, has it?—A. There have been a good many mackerel caught down there; I think you will find when the vessels get back that the Prince Edward's Island catch will be double the quantity caught the year before.

CANADIAN PRIVILEGES.

Q. Then there is the privilege of transportation through Canada?—A. Yes, and of getting their supplies, their barrels, salt, and ice. When you come to the question of bait for fishermen frequenting ports in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, I am not so familiar with it. Quite a number of correspondents of mine in the British Provinces, notably in Nova Scotia, have been in the habit of supplying American fishermen. In fact, one man, who has been in the habit of coming here every fall with his collection of fish that he has caught, and which I sell for him, said to me last fall, "Mr. Russell, what am I going to do? I have got a big ice-house full of ice, and what am I going to do if your fishermen can't come in and get it?" I said, "You will manage to sell it some way; they will get in."

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. I want to inquire whether, if an American ship had the privilege of landing her fish to be transported by railroad through Canada to the United States, she could not make a better catch in a whole season than she can now, when she has to bring her fish home herself?—A. The chances are that she might quadruple her catch. A vessel can run in from the fishing grounds into Souris, the nearest harbor, within an hour and be alongside of a wharf, and in three hours more she can land the fare of mackerel she may have; perhaps it is 300 or 400 barrels. Three days afterwards those fish can be on the pier in Boston, and that vessel may not have been in harbor over three or four hours.

Q. What is the locality of the fishing ground you refer to?—A. Right off Prince Edward's Island, the northeast corner of it, and between there and Cape Breton. The fish are plenty there; they are now moving that way at this season of the year, and according to reports in the last week they have been very plentiful.

HOOK AND LINE AND SEINE.

Q. How are these fish caught?—A. By seines. Occasionally some of the vessels are fitted out this year with hooks and lines.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What proportion of your business is with Canada?—A. I think it is about half.

TABULAR STATEMENT SHOWING WEEKLY SUMMARY OF RECEIPTS BY BOSTON DEALERS.

Q. Do you desire to make the report to which you have referred in your testimony a part of your statement?—A. A gentleman came into my office to-day and said that some of the members of the committee here would like to have some of these reports.

Senator EDMUNDS. I think Mr. Jones gave us those.

The WITNESS. I heard Mr. Jones testify. I will leave these papers with the committee, any way.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Was that table you have in your hand prepared by yourself?—A. No, sir; it was prepared by the secretary of the fish bureau; it is prepared every Friday, and this is what was sent to my office yesterday.

Q. That covers what period?—A. From the beginning of the fishing season up to yesterday.

The witness then submitted to the subcommittee, as part of his testimony, the following tabular statement:

CODFISH.

The WITNESS. There is one other point: We receive from the Provinces from 500 to 1,000 barrels of codfish—a thousand may be rather high, though I don't know that it is—every ten days from Newfoundland. They mostly go to New York. That is a variety of fish not made within the limits of the United States. There is scarcely any salt put on them. They are very dry and very hard, and are mostly used for ship's stores on long voyages, and for shipment to such places as Central America and Aspinwall.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Is there any special name for them?—A. They are called Newfoundland hard-cured fish, and they do not come in competition with anything that is made in this country. I have just ordered some from Halifax. Those fish will cost the man I ordered them from $4.50 a quintal. We are selling these domestic fish all the way from 2½ to 3½; 3½ for Georges and 2½ for pickled bank.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Would it not be possible to cure fish in the same way on our coast?—A. It would be possible, but it will be one or two generations before that is done. It is only because customers have got in the way of liking these green fish that they are not cured on our coast. That is all there is to it.

Q. What is the duty on that kind of fish?—A. The same as on the other kind, half a cent a pound.

EXPORTATION OF FISH TO CANADA.

There is one other point I would like to touch upon; it may be that you have had some information in regard to it at Provincetown. I think I am safe in saying that every year up to 1882, perhaps, we have exported codfish from Boston and Provincetown, mainly from Provincetown, to Halifax, showing that there has been a higher range of prices for codfish in the Provinces than there has been in the United States. That is a fact which you can easily prove by statistics, because you can find the clearances of fish mainly from Provincetown.

Q. How would the imposition of our duties affect that?—A. They impose the same duty.

Q. Yes; but when we export there we have to pay it.—A. Yes; but there was no duty then; that was under free trade, of course.

Q. There have been no such exportations since the treaty?—A. No, I think 1882 was the last.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. They imposed duty before the Washington treaty terminated, did they not?—A. There was a duty in the interim.

Q. That was in their original tariff act, was it not?—A. I think so. I think the duty they impose now is the same as ours.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Leaving the question of duty entirely out of view, how do you explain it, as a mere matter of business, that fish should be exported to the Provinces from Boston, precisely the same kind of fish that they catch and cure in the Provinces? Is it merely because there happened to be, on account of their shipments and all that, a special order or want that they were not able to fill at that moment, or for what reason?—A. Probably the catch had not been so large as to enable them to supply all their demands.

Q. In short, their market was bare at that time?—A. Yes, they had not caught enough.

THE WEST INDIA MARKET.

The British Provinces supply all the West India markets, probably every one of them, with the exception of Hayti and San Domingo, and that trade is with the United States.

Q. Nearly all the other markets are theirs?—A. We can send there with the same propriety that they can; it don't cost us any more; but they have had that business.

Q. Do you mean that British fish go into Jamaica, for instance, at just as high a rate of duty and charge of every kind as American fish?—A. I do. Not any higher.

Q. That is the way you understand it?—A. I know so. I have tried it in Jamaica, Barbadoes, Trinidad, and Demerara. Their duty is exactly the same on shipments, whether from the Provinces or from the United States.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. In all of them there is a duty?—A. Yes, though it is very low in some places.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. So that we, with our provincial neighbors, stand on exactly the same footing?—A. Exactly the same footing; there is no difference.

TESTIMONY OF EDWIN R. DE LONG.

BOSTON, MASS., October 2, 1886.

EDWIN R. DE LONG sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am nearly 52 years of age; reside in Boston; my business is commission business.

Q. In what?—A. In fish and general merchandise.

Q. Both salt and fresh fish?—A. Yes; largely, though, with salt fish very little fresh fish.

Q. Are you engaged in the fishery trade as a vessel-owner or anything of that sort?—A. No, sir; I am not.

Q. Who are your chief principals in your commission business?—A. At this present time the fish I deal in come largely from the Provinces.

Q. Your principals, then, are Canadian dealers, vessel-owners, and so on?—A. Yes.

CURING FISH.

Q. State anything that you desire to the committee.—A. We are in favor of having free fish, and I do not consider that it would be any injury to our fisheries here. A large part of the fish that are brought here from the Provinces are cured differently from our methods. Their codfish are what are called kench-cured (dry-cured), suitable for the West Indies trade. The fish cured in the United States are pickle-cured fish, and not suitable for export trade.

Q. That is to say, they are pickled in barrels or tubs aboard the vessel, and are brought here and taken out and dried?—A. They are kept in pickle until nearly the time of shipment, then taken out and given about three days' sun, which simply dries the surface. Those fish are then shipped. That one thing has done more to injure the salt-fish trade of New England than anything else that has ever happened to it, unless it is the fresh-fish trade.

Q. Is there any reason why our people cannot dry them dry?—A. No reason whatever, only our fishermen pickle them, and give them about five pounds of salt instead of three. The bulk of them cured that way become sour and stinking before a great while.

Q. What is the object of pickling them in that way?—A. They want to sell as many pounds as they can.

Q. When the fish are caught by the provincial fishermen on the Banks they pickle them there in the same way, do they not?—A. No, sir; they are dry-cured. The provincial people take those fish out of the hold of a vessel without putting them in pickle, but the Americans pickle them.

Q. When they are first caught on the Banks they are treated in the same way by both?—A. I don't know of any other way they could treat them.

Q. But when they are carried ashore in the Provinces they are thoroughly dried?—A. Most of them. There are a few pickled fish there. A few years ago Gloucester had all the fish. They wrote to my customers in the Provinces asking them to pickle cure there, and bring them to Gloucester instead of to Boston, and they would buy them; and there were a great many cargoes carried to Gloucester.

Q. So that the difference in the fish of the two countries is merely a difference in treatment after they get ashore?—A. Largely; yes. The kench-cured fish, as they used to be treated fifty years ago in New England, were sweet and sound, and could be sent to the West Indies or anywhere; but by this new process they are not suitable to be exported. If they get quite dry, the first moist day that comes they will get wet; they take the moisture very quickly.

PACKING AND EXPORTING IN BOND.

Boston formerly did a very large export business in fish; we supplied the West Indies very largely. But by changes of the law and by allowing provincial fish to come here in competition with our pickle-cured fish we have largely lost our trade. When Mr. Benjamin F. Butler was a member of Congress he got a bill passed forbidding the packing of foreign fish in bond here. The fish were brought in bulk in the vessel and carried to store-houses, and previous to that time they had been packed in bond, put into packages, and exported to the West Indies. Mr. Butler got a bill through Congress forbidding that. The effect of that has been to drive most of the West India trade down to the Provinces. We have not had the benefit of it here.

KENCH-CURED AND PICKLE-CURED FISH.

Q. But that, if I understand you correctly, really results from the circumstance that the fish are not properly treated when they get here?—A. Our American catch. Only a few years ago Provincetown or Cape Cod used to kench-cure a large amount of her fish. But a man told me recently that there probably would not be this year 2,000 quintals of kench-cured fish. Gloucester has kench-cured her fish for many years. Some are kench-cured in Maine yet, though they are going into pickle-curing, as they get the same price for 5 pounds of pickle-cured as for 3 pounds of kench-cured. Many people don't know the difference, and servant girls really prefer pickle-cured, because they are always soft and ready to pick easily, while dry, hard fish would be hard to get ready to cook.

NATIONALITY OF THE FISHERMEN.

Q. State anything else that you desire.—A. In my dealings with the Provinces I have been made acquainted with the nationality of our crews to some extent. We have a great many orders sent us from the Provinces. These American vessels leave America with a sufficient number of men to go to the Provinces, and there they ship new men, and then after the catch they land that part of the crew before returning home. Those men that are landed down in the Provinces send orders here on the American fishing houses for their shares of the proceeds of the catch, as they fish on shares largely. So I know that a large number of men in our vessels, both masters and sailors, are simply provincial people.

Q. How can the masters be so?—A. They take out papers to become American citizens, but whether they ever complete their citizenship I do not know. Some claim to be natives of the United States when they are not. I have known a great many masters of vessels to make that claim when I knew that they came from the Provinces.

CURING AND EXPORTING FISH.

At the present time our fish are all pickle cured. There is a large export demand for fish to go to the West Indies, and we haven't got any.

Q. Why do they not take them out of pickle and dry them?—A. They would have to soak them all out again; there is so much salt in them that they cannot dry them. After a fish is once pickled it is difficult to be dried properly. They claim that by soaking out the salt again it can be done, but I think they are never so good as the original kench-cured fish.

TRADE RELATIONS.

THE WITNESS. We ship during the year down there about $900,000 worth of goods.

Q. Of all kinds?—A. Of all kinds; manufactured goods, flour, beef, pork, lard, butter, crockery-ware, fishing-tackle, and fishing-gear. There is no place in the world that I know of where a vessel could be fitted out so cheaply as at Boston or Gloucester. The cod-lines are made here; the only place in the world where they are made. I don't know of another place where they make cotton cod-lines that are used by our fishermen; they formerly used hemp lines that came from Europe, but they are not used at all now. Their cotton duck and cordage are bought here; their beef is bought here entirely, and pork and flour largely; also lard, and the oil-cloth which the sailors wear, and their rubber boots; fish-hooks, more or less; in fact, everything used aboard a vessel is bought here. We ship them ourselves.

Q. To be used by British vessels?—A. Yes, sir; entirely.

ARTICLES EXPORTED TO CANADA.

I can give you some of my orders during this last spring.

Q. You can state them in a general way.—A. I take them alphabetically: Apples and vegetables, alcohol, fishermen's leather boots, ship-bread, butter, beans, brushes, rubber boots, stove-polish, coffee, candles, corn, chocolate, cotton duck, dry goods of all kinds, essences, flour, furniture, canned goods, groceries of various kinds, hardware, tinware, lanterns and the like, jugs, kerosene-oil, mackerel-lines, cod-lines, cod-hooks, sole-leather, Seychelles and Manila cordage, molasses, nails of all kinds—oak-nails and ordinary cut-nails; oakum, naval stores, sails, pitch and tar, oars, pork, beef, lard, hams, linseed-oil, paints of all kinds, copper paints (for copper-painting vessels), peppers, spices, hats, caps, oil-cloth, sugar, what you call patent brass bushings for blocks, salt, tobacco (manufactured and unmanufactured), tea, tea-caddies, trunks, tallow, all kinds of biscuits, crackers and such like, brooms, pails, and wooden-ware, lamps and glassware, crockery-ware, dory-boats, paper, and paper books. Those are about the leading things.

CANADIAN CANNED FISH.

Q. You were speaking of canned goods; are there any fish canned in Canada and imported into the United States?—A. Yes; in the Provences.

Q. What kinds?—A. Principally mackerel and lobsters; those are the two main articles.

Q. Do you operate in those things yourself?—A. Yes; we have some consignments of them, but that trade is very small with us.

Q. Are the processes of canning goods down there equal to ours?—A. The people there who can goods are mostly Americans who have started factories. I think you had a gentleman here yesterday or to-day, Mr. Pickett, who has a canning factory in Cape Breton. I suppose those men have their operatives from here, and I should suppose the work would be done in the same manner as it is done here.

TRADE RELATIONS AND PROFITS.

We sell about $700,000 worth of goods where we receive perhaps $200,000.

Q. Through your house to Canada?—A. Yes; we have sold about $1,100,000 worth of goods every year lately.

Q. What is the general rate that commission merchants get on their operations?

The WITNESS: The profits?

Senator EDMUNDS: The commissions generally charged.

A. Not far from 5 per cent. on the average; sometimes we get less than that.

Q. Do you deal in American fish at all?—A. I have not recently; that was the first thing I did when I came to Boston. My first experience in the fishery business was fitting out Cape Cod fishermen, and I followed that for nearly eleven years.

Q. How long ago did you leave it?—A. I commenced in 1855.

Q. And continued down to 1866?—A. Yes, sir; I was originally in the ship-chandlery and ship-store business, but after the war prices went so high that our American vessels did not do well, and I was obliged to seek other business. That is how I came to get into the provincial business.

EXPORTS NOT REPORTED TO THE CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Q. Is there anything else you wish to suggest?—A. I would like to speak of exports. Formerly, under the reciprocity treaty, many vessels would go to the Provinces, carrying flour and other merchandise, amounting perhaps in bulk to 1,000 barrels. Those vessels were very similar to our State of Maine coasters; the captain and crew all had orders, and each was ashore buying goods. The same thing is done to-day, more or less. So that our custom-house here has no correct record of the export of goods from here to the Provinces.

Q. Do you mean that those things that the captain and crew had orders for would not appear in manifest?—A. Yes; and a large amount of goods shipped even to the merchants down there do not appear to-day.

Q. How does the vessel expect to clear without a true manifest of her cargo?—A. I will explain that to you: Say we have a vessel ready for sea to-day. You may say there are a hundred barrels of flour on her. The captain will go into the custom-house and get a clearance on the merchandise simply. After he gets his clearance something may happen preventing him from sailing immediately, and he may lie here three or four days before he gets off, during which time he may take on board a number of articles of merchandise, but he will not go near the custom-house again; he simply goes to sea with his manifest.

Q. When he comes back will he not be picked up?—A. No, sir. It would not really make any difference if he should happen to be boarded after he had obtained his clearance and had taken on board the additional articles, because his clearance only says "merchandise." It don't say whether he has one barrel or ten; it simply says "merchandise."

Q. That clearance does not contain a copy of the manifest, but does he not have to present a copy of his manifest to the custom-house before he clears?—A. He is supposed to do that. But there will be perhaps twenty merchants making shipments by that vessel; hat and cap men, hardware men, and different merchants here, who have had orders to send goods by that vessel; the captain don't know what is coming.

Q. His owners and agents ought to know what they take on board.—A. When the captain comes to get ready to go to sea he knows, but he never takes the trouble to go to the custom-house and make a full and complete statement of any additional articles that he may have taken aboard.

Q. Then he does; but t

Q. What is the c out the country?—

Q. Then he does not obey the laws, does he?—A. No; I don't think he does; but the captains don't know much about the law.

Q. Suppose they were taught a little by being arrested the next time they come back, would not that be an advantage, if the law is a good one?—A. If you wanted to carry it out; but still they commit no crime.

Q. What is the use of having a law if it is not carried out?—A. I don't suppose he commits any crime when he goes to the custom-house and obtains his clearance for everything that he knows that he has on board.

Q. But he has no business to take anything afterwards under that clearance. The idea of a clearance is that the vessel is ready to depart with that amount of goods.—A. That is supposed to be the idea. But the coasting business between here and the Provinces is the same as the coasting between here and the State of Maine; it is done in a very easy and loose way; the captains are not educated men.

Q. Yes; but do not their owners know something about it?—A. No; some of the owners are farmers, and don't know anything about it; sometimes the captain owns his vessel, and sometimes it is owned by the fishermen. A great deal of that business is done by people who don't know how to make up a good, complete invoice, and that is often a great inconvenience to us, because they have so little business knowledge, a great many of them. Perhaps a saw-mill owner owns the vessel, by which he ships a little lumber, or fish, or potatoes, or cord-wood, or bark, or whatever it may be. Their invoices are very different from invoices coming from Europe. I do business in the island of St. Pierre. There are regular French houses there with whom we do quite a large business. They are regular mercantile houses, and their invoices are all straight.

Q. This home business I can readily understand, but I am speaking of the export business; though you have explained that sufficiently, perhaps?—A. The people in the Provinces who run these vessels have very little business knowledge.

Q. Is there anything else you think of that you desire to state?—A. I don't think of anything else.

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE UPON WHOLESALEERS AND UPON CONSUMERS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. I would like to hear your reasons for the effect of free trade with the Provinces, as stated by you. I want to call your attention, first, to the effect of free trade upon the fish business here, and, secondly, upon the consumers of fish in this country.—A. I have been in the fish business since 1855, and from my recollections I should say that there has been greater prosperity in the fish business under reciprocity, or what we call free fish, than there has ever been under the tariff.

Q. Do you mean to apply that also to the fishermen as well as to the fish dealers?—A. Yes; I think our fishermen have had larger returns, because I think the quantity of fish caught has been greater, and we have had a larger export trade. We have done some business in fish; we have supplied the West Indies, instead of Halifax or some other provincial port supplying them.

Q. Your idea is that it applies to the fishermen and the merchant engaged in selling them?—A. Yes; all through. What I mean is that a quintal of codfish of the same quality has brought as much or more under reciprocity than it has under tariff.

Q. What is the effect of the tariff upon the consumers of fish throughout the country?—A. I was also going to state, before answering the question, that the law of supply and demand seems to regulate the prices largely. Two or three years ago we had fresh fish, and we were selling codfish at $6 to $7 a quintal. Now we have a tariff, and it is difficult to sell them at more than $2. There seemed to be a great demand for fish about two or three years ago, and I could sell five cargoes of fish more easily at $6.50 or $7 a quintal, according to quality, than I can to-day, with a tariff on fish, at $2.25 or $2.50; there was a greater demand for them and it was easier to sell them then.

FISH, KENCH-CURED vs. PICKLE-CURED.

Our people are getting these pickle-cured fish cheaper than they got them two or three years ago, but I don't consider that the fish they get are fit to eat. These pickle-cured fish are just about the same quality as a piece of salt beef would be after it had been taken out of a barrel on a hot day and laid around for two or three days; it would stink. A piece of thoroughly dried beef might lie around six months and be perfectly sound; that is different. I was at the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago last April; being very fond of fish, and seeing fish-balls mentioned on the bill of fare, I called for them; but when I put a piece in my mouth I got it out as soon as possible the fish was actually rotten. The fish I carry home to my house are dry, kench-cured fish, and they are just as sweet as anything can be.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Do you carry them home from your store?—A. After I sell a cargo I get some from the man I sell to.

Q. Do you get them at the same price that everybody else pays?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you pay?—A. From three to four or five cents a pound; different prices. I have just sold three cargoes of kench fish in the last sixty days; the first cargo I sold at $3.

Q. Do you mean to say that the price of good, sound codfish, kench-cured, at the groceries in Boston is only three or four or five cents a pound?—A. I sell to wholesale dealers; the retail dealers probably get about five or six cents a pound.

Q. And you sell for how much?—A. We do not get over $3 a quintal.

Q. That is, the retail price is about double the wholesale?—A. Yes; just about double.

NUMBER OF FACTORY EMPLOYÉS GREATER THAN THE NUMBER OF FISHERMEN.

I would like to say one thing more. There are more than twice the number of people in the United States manufacturing the kind of goods that I ship to the Provinces that there are American fishermen coming in competition with the Provinces. The goods they buy of us for fishing vessels and such like, and for other purposes, give twice the number of men employment here in their manufacture—give them labor and wages.

CANADIAN TARIFF.

Q. Do you know the date of the Canadian tariff act, when they adopted what is called the protective system?—A. I can't tell the date; it was some six or eight years ago.

Q. What effect did that have upon your exportations of American goods to the Provinces?—A. It affected dry goods more than anything else, I should say there.

Q. Suppose adopted that h tations fell off trade has incre say. I have a did not have a else, I should say; hardware and agricultural tools still continue to go there.

Q. Suppose it was six years ago, which would be 1880, that they adopted that heavy tariff; can you tell us how much your own exportations fell off in consequence?—A. They haven't fallen off any; our trade has increased there, for we have made greater effort, you might say. I have a man traveling there all the time, whereas formerly I did not have a man traveling there.

Q. But under the same conditions you think it would have fallen off?—A. Some. Take it within a short time; I have sold in Nova Scotia two car-loads of what they call James Kirk's Chicago soap, although they have a 30 per cent. tariff on it.

Q. Kirk advertised himself into glory?—A. Yes. He makes great effort, of course, and sends out show-bills and the like. We still sell manufactured goods there.

PROFITS OF COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

Q. Do you do all this exportation business on commission?—A. No, sir. We get a profit on a large share of it.

Q. A profit aside from your commission?—A. No, sir; we don't charge any commission at all on what we sell; but when they send a cargo here we sell that on commission.

Q. And you actually sell to them the return cargo and make a profit?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have your profits fallen off on the same kinds of goods since the passage of the Canadian tariff act?—A. They have, some.

Q. How much?—A. I cannot say that it has been on account of the Canadian tariff; it was on account of competition; there are so many in the business; they are cutting finer and closer every day. It is just the same here.

Q. If you choose to, merely for our information, you may state what the profits are in your business, and what you would consider a fair profit to make in the export trade; or, to make it straight as between us, how much do you make on your exportations of these goods you sell? You need not answer if you do not want to.—A. I fear we do not average over $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; on some goods we get 5. On these job cargoes we perhaps get 8 to 10 per cent. A man will spend as much time in selling 8 or 10 barrels of flour as he will on 125 barrels.

Senator EDMUNDS. I should think it would take more time if he talked it up well.

The WITNESS. If a man buys 500 barrels of flour from me and I get $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. profit, I should be satisfied. Take the article of kerosene oil; we have shipped during the month of September perhaps 2,500 barrels of that, and perhaps we got 6 or 7 per cent on that.

Q. When you say $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on flour, if you had had that flour in stock six months there would be the question of interest to consider?—A. We have to figure that.

Q. How long do you generally keep flour in stock? When you receive an order for a thousand barrels of flour do you generally have that amount on hand, or do you have to go out and buy it?—A. We always have more or less on hand; we carry a stock of flour, and then order what we have not on hand.

Q. In making your $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. profit you charge interest, storage, and all that?—A. Yes, sir; we put that all in.

Q. So that your $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is absolutely good?—A. Absolutely good profit. Of course, we try to get 5 per cent. on flour, but we don't always get it.

TESTIMONY OF HEKBERT C. HALL.

BOSTON, MASS., October 2, 1886.

HERBERT C. HALL sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Thirty-five.

Q. What is your residence?—A. Somerville, three miles out of the city; I do business in Boston.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Shipping and commission merchant.

Q. You deal in what sorts of goods?—A. We receive most of the products of the Provinces, and send goods down there.

Q. Do you deal in fish?—A. Yes, sir; we run a line of steamers down there.

Q. What kind of fish do you deal in?—A. We receive all kinds of salt fish.

Q. Not any fresh?—A. Generally not any fresh.

Q. Then you get salted mackerel, herring, codfish, pollock, hake, and all that sort of thing?—A. Yes, sir.

RECIPROCITY.

Q. State to the committee what occurs to you on the subject that you understand we are considering. You may state your views and give facts within your knowledge bearing upon the fishery question with Great Britain and the Dominion.—A. I am in favor of a reciprocity treaty between the two countries; I do not think it would interfere with our fishermen here very much, even if free fish were allowed, because a large part of the fish from the Provinces are different from the fish that are produced here.

Q. Different in the way Mr. De Long has stated, in being kench-cured?—A. Most all the fish from the Provinces are kench-cured and dried, and most all here are pickle-cured. We get large fat mackerel from the Provinces, and the most of the large split herring come from the Provinces.

Q. And they are the finest varieties of each kind?—A. Yes. We rely on that country for our supply of the best fish.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES.

Q. How much higher is the wholesale price in this market, for instance, for these large, fat mackerel, than the price for the ordinary No. 3 mackerel?—A. I don't know what they retail for.

Q. I am speaking about the wholesale price.—A. No. 1 is worth $14 to $17.

Q. What are the fat ones worth?—A. The extra-fat ones are worth all the way from $20 to $35.

Q. Is that the kind you are speaking of as coming only from the Provinces?—A. Very few are procured from any other place; a large portion of the No. 1's come from the Provinces.

Q. When you come down to No. 2's, what are they worth?—A. From $9 to $12, according to the fatness.

Q. Where do the largest part of these come from?—A. The American vessels catch most of them down in the Bay of Chaleur, and down that way, and some are caught around here.

Q. Before Ju

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Before July, 1885, do you know where the largest part of these provincial mackerel came from, whether inside or outside of the three-mile limit?—A. I could not say. I have asked a great many from the Provinces, but have not been able to ascertain; a good many of those provincial people have been in my store, and I have often asked them about that; they say they catch a large number of them within the three-mile limit. But that is only hearsay.

Q. The great-bulk of the mackerel are now caught in purse seines; is not that so?—A. Yes, I think they are. For the next month they will catch them at the Bay of Chaleur and around in that region in traps; I do not know whether they will do much seine-fishing or not, but I should think they would for a fortnight yet.

PRICES UNDER RECIPROCITY.

Q. Do you know anything about the retail prices of the three varieties of fish you have named—the extra fine, No. 1's, and No. 2's?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you observe any difference in the prices of fish in this market following the treaty of 1870-71, which made them free?

The WITNESS. Difference in the price?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes, the price at which you sold them to the jobbers,

A. Every year the price changes according to the supply and demand.

Q. But you were not able to detect anything that the change in the law effected?—A. As it has happened, the prices of fish have been higher during reciprocity; I presume that was on account of the smaller number of fish caught.

Q. You do not suppose that reciprocity made them higher; it was a question of quantity, was it not?—A. I should think so. But I should consider that reciprocity in times when fish were scarce would equalize prices better, that there would be no extremely high prices.

Q. That is, there would be a larger field to draw from?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But whether that would affect the actual consumer you do not know, if I understood you a moment ago?—A. I think it would tend to keep prices so that they would not reach any extremely high limit.

RETAIL PRICES TO CONSUMERS.

Q. But I understood you to say that you did not know how the actual retail prices, to the great body of the people who go to the corner groceries to get their fish, are related to the wholesale prices at which you sell?—A. Fish are not worth so much in the Provinces as they are here; if we could import fish from the Provinces now, fish would be lower, I should think, but not much lower.

Q. Do you think they would be any lower to you or to me if we should go to Pierce's grocery down here, if there is any such man—and I believe there is—and wanted to buy six mackerel for breakfast to-morrow morning?—A. I don't know; I should think they might.

Q. You think he would fall accordingly?—A. It is pretty hard to tell that, but I should think he would.

Q. Do you know what is the general custom, rule, and practice among these retail men who sell to families, whether they regulate themselves, as jobbers and wholesalers do, by the general tone of the market, in all goods, like cottons and everything else, or whether they have a standard price, making enormous profits at some times and smaller at others, without regard to the wholesale price at any time?—A. I should say they would fluctuate with the prices of the wholesalers, but not so much as the prices of the wholesale dealers.

Q. Have you any knowledge, or have you observed about that, or is that only a logical deduction that you make?—A. No, only where I live I often ask the price of fish.

Q. You find that the prices do go up and down some?—A. Yes. I think the fluctuation with the wholesale and jobbing prices would affect the consumer to a degree, but I do not think the fishing interest is the only interest connected with this matter. We run steamers down East, and we take everything—all lines of goods of every description.

TRADE RELATIONS.

Q. What is the name of your line?—A. Yarmouth Steamship Company.

Q. To what provincial ports do you go?—A. Yarmouth; that is the nearest provincial port to Boston.

Q. Is Yarmouth nearer than St. John?—A. Yes, sir; Yarmouth is about due east from here.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What is the distance from Boston?—A. Two hundred and forty miles.

Q. How large a town is Yarmouth?—A. About 7,000 or 8,000 inhabitants.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What products do you bring chiefly from Yarmouth?—A. Fish, lumber, and potatoes.

Q. Pine lumber chiefly?—A. Very little pine; about all their pine lumber is shipped to the West Indies from there. We get some pine from there, and very little hard wood.

Q. You get fish, lumber, and potatoes?—A. And spiling-wood.

Q. And what do you send out there on your return voyages?—A. We send flour, meal, provisions, and most everything. We do not have quite such a variety as Mr. DeLong, but we have orders for everything. The business has changed very much, however, within the last ten years. Before I went into the business my father was dealing with the Provinces about forty-five years.

Q. Have you observed any particular change in the last four years?—A. Not a great deal, only I think the amount of manufactured goods going down is growing less.

CANADIAN TARIFF.

Q. They put on a heavy protective tariff?—A. They put on a duty, yes, sir.

Q. And you think that has caused a diminution of our exportation of goods there?—A. Oh, very much indeed. I know that the lower Provinces are very desirous to deal with the United States; they do not like Canada. I know they express great dislike to the Dominion, and would rather deal with this country, sending up their goods here and taking back cargoes of anything they want, rather than to get anything from Canada. I know the boot and shoe trade between here and the lower Provinces they get from Canada everything, all the goods. Still the demand is shipped from there. That is on account of the fact that we could sell them if we have it.

Q. And yet I come to the United States. Does that come from the United States? The WITNESS.

Q. And yet you and shoes, for instance, made, they take time to feel bound to be much their duty is to see a boot and shoe having nothing but the boot and shoe.

AMERICAN

Q. It is a question to the price he pays.

Q. If he would for Canadian boots would sell at a higher price the same grade.

Q. Yes; and I see absolute free trade can goods would sell at a higher price, because of the goods of Canadian a better finish and the lower Provinces has almost died out; all their boots and shoes they get from Canada now, and their dry goods and the larger part of everything, although they get more or less here of all kinds of goods. Still the demand, of course, is limited. A large part of their flour that is shipped from here now is Canadian flour; it comes here in bond. That is on account of the duty there. If it was not for the duty there we could sell them American flour altogether, and they would rather have it.

Q. And yet I suppose you know that a great deal of Canadian wheat comes to the United States?—A. Well, I shouldn't suppose much. Does that come across duty paid?

Senator EDMUNDS. It comes across from Manitoba and is ground in the United States.

The WITNESS. I did not know there was much; but I should think that the importation of wheat would be a benefit to the Western country instead of a detriment to all the dealers there, because it would draw the trade into the United States which goes to Canada now.

Q. You think that would have a tendency to diminish the Canadian production of flour, boots and shoes, and all that?—A. I think it would, because the Canadians are not up in manufacturing like we are here; they cannot compare with us at all.

Q. And yet you say that rather than pay the duty on American boots and shoes, for instance, which are very fine, although they are machine-made, they take the Canadian manufacture of those articles?—A. They feel bound to because they are so much less in price. I forget how much their duty is now, whether it is 17 per cent. or 35, but you often see a boot and shoe store down there selling Boston goods entirely, having nothing but American manufactured boots and shoes.

Q. I understood you to say that the boot and shoe business dropped off on account of the Canadian tariff?—A. It dropped off almost entirely, but I know they buy more or less boots and shoes from us yet. A great many of their people will not have Canadian goods at all. There is a certain demand for all kinds of American goods, even with the duties paid.

AMERICAN GOODS PREFERRED IN THE PROVINCES.

Q. It is a question, is it not, as to which the man prefers in regard to the price he pays?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If he would rather pay $3 for a pair of American boots than $2 for Canadian boots, he does it?—A. Yes, sir; I think American boots would sell at a higher price down there than Canadian, even if about the same grade.

Q. Yes; and I suppose it is true, is it not, that, supposing there was absolute free trade between the two countries, a great variety of American goods would sell in Canada at a higher price than the same kind of goods of Canadian manufacture?—A. I think so; they will pay a better price, because they like the American manufacture better; they are a better finish and are a better style of goods.

Q. Better made every way?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Made with more skill and better adapted to their purpose?—A. Yes, sir; the Canadian manufactures are all rough.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Do you know what is the average duty upon such products of our country as go into the Canadian country?—A. I think the lowest is 17½ per cent. I have a copy of a book down at the store that I will let you take, and that will give you all such information.

Senator EDMUNDS. We have the Canadian laws.

DECREASE OF EXPORTATIONS OF FISH.

The WITNESS. I might say here that the export of fish has almost died out; not altogether died out, but very much diminished.

Q. Because before you exported Canadian fish which were kench-cured?—A. Yes, sir; the American method of curing fish is not desirable.

Q. You have lost that export trade because of the difference between kench-cured and pickle-cured?—A. Yes, sir. We often bring up a lot of codfish from Yarmouth and send them south on the Metropolitan line of steamers to the West Indies. But formerly the trade was from our American houses here direct.

FREE FISH.

I think a treaty could be made with the Provinces to allow our goods to go in there free by allowing free fish here, and I think it would be as much benefit to the United States as it would be to the Dominion. I cannot see how it would very much affect the fishermen. Several of the Gloucester dealers have told me that they are more afraid of fish from the Provinces being sent out West directly to Chicago than they are of fish coming in here. A man told me—I think it was Mr. Babson—that if he was sure of the fish coming to Boston or Gloucester through the dealers' hands here, and not going out West, he would not care anything about it.

Q. You think that was Mr. Babson, of Gloucester?—A. I think that was Mr. Babson; it was either Mr. Babson or a man with Mr. Pew, I forget which.

Q. Who was the man with Mr. Pew?—A. It was one of the gentlemen who were in Washington.

Q. (To Mr. E. R. DELONG.) Do you think it was Mr. Babson?

Mr. DELONG. I think it was one of the Cunningham firm.

The WITNESS. It was one of the gentlemen sent on to Washington.

Q. I suppose he meant by that, so far as he was concerned individually, that if they could control the whole business here he would not care?—A. If they could control the business here they would not care.

Q. That they would make more money under free fish than they would under the present state of things, I suppose?—A. They were only afraid that, in case of free fish, fish would be sent from the producers in the Provinces directly to the consumers out West or to the jobbers out West.

Q. And that the dealers here would lose their profit?—A. Yes, sir, he thought if the duty was kept on it would keep them out.

RELATIVE ADVANTAGES OF BOSTON AND THE WESTERN PORTS OF DELIVERY.

Q. But as the duty is the same at Chicago or Detroit as it is at Gloucester or Boston, the Chicago or Detroit man would get his consignments direct, just as well under the duty as without it, could he not?—A. He could really; but when a person is sending goods through the country in that way, and there is a duty on them, there is a great deal more trouble, expense, &c., in getting them there.

Q. How is it at

Q. How is it any more trouble and expense to pay duties at Detroit and Chicago than it is at Boston?—A. Suppose the fish go through on railroad and pass through some intermediate port on the line—

Q. You know that Chicago is a port of delivery, and so is Saint Louis; so it could not make any difference so far as that is concerned, could it?—A. I think it could.

Q. How?—A. For instance, there is a merchant in Saint Louis whose goods come to him in bond at the custom-house; he has to put those goods through the custom-house. Supposing he has only three or four barrels, it will cost him from 25 to 50 cents a barrel to do it, whereas if they are free goods they are entered by the railroad company and go through just the same as they would to Boston or New York.

Q. But I am on the point of the tariff as it is now. Mr. Babson—taking him to be the man you refer to—wants to keep it so because it will keep Canadian goods from coming to our people in any case. My point is whether it would make any difference, with the law standing as it now does, whether the goods were sent to the Saint Louis or Chicago port of delivery in bond after they had crossed the line at Port Huron, so far as the duty is concerned, instead of coming here, the custom-house laws and regulations being precisely the same?—A. If you had been through the custom-house you would know the reason.

Q. I wish you would tell it to me.—A. A man in Saint Louis perhaps orders 10 or 15 barrels of fish, and he probably knows nothing about the custom-house rules and regulations; the custom-house business has to pass through the hands of different clerks, and may consume a couple of hours, or else it will cost him something to get somebody to attend to it for him.

Senator EDMUNDS. That I can understand.

The WITNESS. But if they go through free the entry is made at the border, and the goods are delivered the same as they are here.

Q. Yes; but if they are free at Chicago or Saint Louis they are free here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then, being free, what is to hinder the Chicago and Saint Louis men from getting their fish directly from the Banks instead of from here?—A. Nothing at all.

Q. They stand on equal ground, the Saint Louis and Chicago men, with the Boston men?—A. Not exactly; a Boston man receives a whole cargo of fish, one or two thousand barrels; if that many fish were shipped from Halifax to western ports of delivery they would, perhaps, be shipped to fifty different people, and each of those persons would be obliged to go to the custom-house, pay duty, and spend time.

Q. That is a question of concentration of business?—A. Yes, sir. The receivers of fish here who would have the large cargoes would put their cargoes through the custom-house, knowing all the ins and outs and what is required; whereas the man out West who takes fish as a kind of supplementary article to his general business knows nothing about the custom-house ways of transacting business, and has either got to make inquiries and spend time, or else get some clerk or broker to do it for him.

CUSTOM-HOUSE BROKERS.

Q. Do your people here attend to their own business with the custom-house directly, or do they employ a broker?—A. We attend to it ourselves.

Q. Most of the large houses do?—A. A good many do.

Q. A good many have a man in their employ for that purpose?—A. Yes, for nothing else; but as for ourselves we put everything through ourselves.

Q. You do not employ any broker?—A. No, sir. We have so many entries at the custom-house that we are pretty well acquainted with it.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. H. B. JOYCE.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

Capt. H. B. JOYCE sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Thirty-nine.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. Portland, Me.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fisherman.

Q. Of what vessel are you in command at this time, if any?—A. The steamer Novelty.

Q. How large a vessel is that?—A. Two hundred and ninety-seven tons gross.

Q. How long have you been in command of her?—A. I had her the first of September last year.

Q. Had you been engaged in fishing before that time?—A. Yes, sir; always since I was old enough.

Q. What kind of fishing?—A. Up to the age of twenty I was mixed in with both cod and mackerel fishing in the season, and since that I have followed mackerel fishing altogether.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Where did you fish for mackerel?—A. Usually in the Bay of Fundy and along the coast of New York and New Jersey.

Q. Did you fish up there in provincial waters during the existence of the treaty of Washington, from 1873 to 1885?—A. I was there in 1877 for three weeks; I was there in 1878 for seven weeks; I was there in 1880 for five weeks; and I was there in 1883 for two weeks.

Q. Was that the last time you were there in a sailing vessel?—A. I was there this season about eight weeks, I think, altogether, including the passages home.

Q. Before last year you were in a sailing vessel, I suppose.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. During all these years you have named where did you get your fish up there, as respects the inshore three-mile line?—A. I imagine I didn't fish much different from the way we fished this year. We fished anywhere, and didn't take any notice. This year we haven't fished within that three miles, so far as I know.

Q. A sea-faring man can judge tolerably well, can he not, whether he is inside or outside of that limit?—A. If he takes the trouble he can measure from his vessel, but it is quite a little operation; you have to make a line and get your bearing, and work it up by table, and if a man is very busy he wouldn't take the time.

Q. Can you not judge by the eye pretty well?—A. We can tell within half a mile.

Q. If you allow as to your locality

Q. If you allowed half a mile for errors you would feel pretty sure as to your locality, whether it was inside or outside?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What proportion of the fish you took up there this last year did you take, or what proportion do you know of being taken by other fishermen, inside of the three-mile limits?—A. I don't suppose over a tenth part.

BAIT.

Q. What has been your way of getting bait for cod? You do not fish for mackerel with bait now, I believe?—A. All the fishing I ever done, what we call Bank fishing, was always done with salt bait, and I think that is mostly used now. It is cheaper and saves time, and as a rule the fishermen get as many fish as with fresh bait.

Q. Then, if I understand you, there is really no object in going into the British ports up there for the purpose of getting bait?—A. Our mackerel fishing is nearer the coast, and it is often necessary to go inside for shelter in bad weather.

Q. I am not speaking of shelter; I am speaking of bait.—A. O, no, sir; we don't have any occasion to get bait up there.

THE CASE OF THE NOVELTY.

Q. Now, tell us your experience with the Novelty this year; how many voyages you have made, where you fished, what happened to you, and so on?—A. We started from Portland the 1st or 2d of July, I think, and went to the Gulf of St. Lawrence for mackerel. At that time it had been circulated in the newspapers that we could buy supplies of one kind and another there without any restriction; so we left this coast to go up there with only the balance of ice and coal that had been left on a cruise on this coast, and we were some thirty to forty tons short of coal of what we needed, and with only ten to fifteen tons of ice when we ought to have had thirty tons. We went directly to Pictou to get coal, and went to the dock, not apprehending any trouble. It was Dominion Day when we got there, so all business was closed that day. The next day I went to the custom-house, and they gave me warning, as they call it, and I was notified that we could not get coal or anything else, and that we must proceed to sea within twenty-four hours from the time we got our warning.

Q. What kind of papers did your vessel have?—A. A fishing license.

Q. Was that all?—A. I had a permit to touch and trade; I carried that over to the custom-house, but they did not recognize it; they said the United States had no authority to claim any privileges of that kind for our vessels.

Q. You did not have any clearance from Portland or Gloucester to Pictou?—A. No, sir; except simply that.

Q. Did you get the coal?—A. No, sir; we went away without it. We went to Cape Prince Edward's Island to a telegraph office and reported to the custom-house here, and telegraphed to the Department at Ottawa to know if we could not have coal delivered us outside of the three-mile limit; we did not get any answer to that. Parties there were very anxious to furnish coal to us, of course expecting pay for it; one man had a vessel load of coal there, and he said he would deliver us coal outside the three miles if he couldn't inside, and in case that was contrary to law he would take it over to Magdalen Island for us. The captain of the cutter there informed me that Magdalen Island was a free port and that we could buy and trade there. So I made arrange ments to that effect, and went off to the fishing grounds, and waited a week or so, but our supply of coal being so short we couldn't wait very long. After we got a fare, and the coal not yet having come, we bought some twelve or fifteen cords of wood to make our coal go as far as possible, and in that way we managed to have enough to get home with. When we got home we took in all the coal and ice we could carry.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. The second time?—A. The second time.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Did you deal at any Canadian place on that second trip?—A. Yes, we were in two or three places, and in every instance we went to the custom-house and reported. At Boston I notified the man of whom I had agreed to take coal delivered at Magdalen Island that I would call at Magdalen Island, and if he was there would take all the coal we could get. But when we got there we found a vessel there, and we were notified that we couldn't have any more privileges there than anywhere else.

Q. Is there a British custom-house at Magdalen Island?—A. Yes, sir; they have two or three custom-houses. They have a custom-house at almost every place that has anchorage. So I told the party that I would take the coal of him if he would take it outside the three-mile limits, but he seemed to fear that he might be compromised in some way if he did so, and we went off without it. We managed to get a small fare that time without using all the coal. We fished in the gulf twelve days on the last two voyages.

Q. Did you meet with any further difficulty than the three instances you have spoken of?—A. We went back again on the fourth voyage, and on account of some neglect on the part of the dealers in Boston we didn't have as much coal as we had been carrying. We found after we had been there a week that we were not going to have much time to stay with what we had, and so I had an idea that I could get around them any way and would get some more coal. But the authorities mistrusted something of the kind, and the new cutter met us and ordered us not to transship any cargoes in British waters nor to touch at any Canadian port whatever; if we did our vessel would be seized. There wasn't much of anything there to stop for, and so we came home and haven't been there since.

Q. What did you understand him to mean by "British waters"—inside the three-mile limit, or anywhere in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?—A. He intended to convey the meaning to me that he meant anywhere in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; what he had to back it up with I don't know.

Q. That is what you understood him to mean?—A. That is what I understood him to mean, although he might have meant to mislead me.

Q. What was the name of that cutter?—A. The one they bought in New York. I didn't see any name on her, but I believe she is called the Acadian.

Q. Do you remember the name of the captain?—A. His name was Scott, I think. He didn't come aboard; he hailed us.

Q. How far were you from land at that time?—A. We were in the Strait of Canso, probably half a mile from land.

Q. He met you passing through the strait at the time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Under way?—A. Yes, sir; he followed us part way through.

Q. Does your vessel carry sails so that you could sail her in case you were without engines, practically help.

Q. The cod you caught was three miles off?

Q. How many?

Q. How many? ninety-seven groups.

Q. What does a fishing cruise consist of?

Q. What would be ordinarily used?

Q. Are your men?

Q. What share of the catch do you get?

half, but they pay for the fuel, furnish their own provisions, because the fishermen wish the steam engine.

Q. Suppose the vessel had been embargoed?

you understand the law?—A. I don't know.

because sometimes they go still further out when the weather is in the Gulf of off shore.

Q. How long does it take to get from Gloucester to the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

about four days, but the distance in four days.

Q. What would be the cost of a trip?

About three days.

Q. Do you bring back any fish?

was fitted for that.

Q. What is the value of the fish?

series of shelves, for them from the water and we run on and will hold from 600 to 800.

Q. How thick would the fish be?

inches.

Q. Then you have the bottom, and use the edges, too.

Q. Have you found any other fish?

dition?—A. It keeps being brought in five days before.

Q. What is the value of the fish in the Islands here?

were without coal?—A. Not enough to make much headway; we were practically helpless without coal.

Q. The cod you were fishing for are taken at the Banks more than three miles off shore, are they not?—A. It is hardly in sight of land.

Q. How many in your crew?—A. Altogether from 35 to 40.

Q. How many tons burden is your vessel?—A. Two hundred and ninety-seven gross.

COST OF VESSELS, AND WAGES.

Q. What does it cost in round numbers to build a vessel ready to sail on a fishing cruise?—A. Mine cost $36,000.

Q. What would be the cost of a 75, 80, 90, or 100 ton schooner, such as is ordinarily used?—A. All the way from $8,000 to $10,000.

Q. Are your men on your vessels paid on shares?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What share does an ordinary crew get?—A. They usually take half, but they pay certain bills out of their part. In our own case they furnish their own board and bait, and pay the wages of the cook and firemen, because that pertains to their part; and then the vessel furnishes the steam fishing outfit.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Suppose the treaty had still been in force, so that you would not have been embarrassed within the three-mile limit, would you, so far as you understand the fishing this year, have fished in-shore to any extent?—A. I don't think I could with any profit. I might have done so, because sometimes it is more convenient to fish in-shore, but if we go still further out we are very apt to find it better. In fact, the best fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence this year was from 5 to 15 or 20 miles off shore.

PRESERVING FRESH FISH IN ICE.

Q. How long does it take your steamer to come from Magdalen Islands to Gloucester; take an average voyage?—A. We generally use about four days, but we are obliged to save on coal. We could make the distance in four days with much less coal than in three.

Q. What would be the average time if you had plenty of coal?—A. About three days if we had plenty of coal.

Q. Do you bring in your fish fresh?—A. We did ours. Our vessel was fitted for that purpose.

Q. What is the contrivance you have for that purpose?—A. It is a series of shelves, from the bottom to the deck, to run the fish on, taking them from the water-line. When we get one set full it is taken away, and we run on another, and so on until we fill the space full. The space will hold from 600 to 1,200 barrels.

Q. How thick will they lie on those shelves; how deep?—A. About 18 inches.

Q. Then you have those shelves surrounded by ice?—A. With ice at the bottom, and usually one or two courses of ice between and around the edges, too.

Q. Have you found by experience that that keeps them in good condition?—A. It keeps them first rate. The first we brought here we brought in five days, and they compared favorably with those taken the day before.

Q. What is the ordinary length of a schooner's voyage from Magdalen Islands here?—A. I think somewhere from eight to ten days.

Q. Do they bring fresh mackerel that far?—A. I have only heard of one instance, and the fish in that case arrived in very poor order. The inhabitants there ship their fish overland. By that means they arrive in the market in very good condition. If they had any facilities and were used to it, they could get them around here in less than four days. We cannot do that on account of the restrictions.

TRANSSHIPMENT OF FRESH FISH OVERLAND.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You used to transship?—A. Oh, yes.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. You have been in the habit before of landing your fish up there and sending them around by rail?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did you usually land them?—A. At a place called Point du Chene, the terminus of the Intercolonial road.

Q. How far is it from the fishing grounds into Point du Chene? How far is it from Magdalen Islands?—A. It is much nearer the fishing grounds than Magdalen Islands. The fishing grounds are on the north side of Prince Edward Island.

Q. So it makes a short run?—A. Yes, sir; it is very convenient there.

Q. How much does it cost per hundred pounds to send fresh fish from Point du Chene to Boston?—A. I think about 80 cents a barrel.

Q. In that case the fresh fish are put into barrels?—A. Yes; or boxes.

Q. With ice?—A. With ice.

Q. And those barrels are headed up so as to hold the ice and other contents tightly, I suppose; or are they allowed to leak?—A. They ship them in flour barrels and boxes, and they must leak more or less.

Q. The continuance of the treaty would be an advantage to the mackerel fisheries in the Gulf of St. Lawrence in respect of the fishermen being able to send their fish by rail to Boston, assuming that they had not any right to send their fish in that way now?—A. As far as salt fish go, I don't think it would make any difference.

Q. I am speaking of fresh fish.—A. It would enable us to have an equal chance with them. As it is, they have the advantage of the railroad, which is denied us.

Q. Under duty you stood equal in that respect, for the reason that you could ship and they could ship, and neither of you paid any duty. When they ship salt fish to come that way they have to pay a duty, but they ship their fresh fish now with an advantage, of course.—A. There is no occasion to ship salt fish, because they keep well enough.

Q. It is cheaper to bring them home in the vessel than it would be to send them around by rail?—A. About as cheap, yes.

HALIBUT AND HERRING.

Q. Is there any halibut fishing up there within the three-mile limit that would amount to anything?—A. I don't think there is a great deal. They did some fishing about the isle of Anticosti and about St. Paul's Island, but the best halibut are caught on the Banks in very deep water.

Q. They get a great many on the coast of Labrador nowadays, do they not? Do you know how far off shore?—A. I don't know much about that.

Q. Do you know anything about the herring fishery up there?—A. Very few of our vessels fish for herring; I don't know of any. As a rule, the herring are all caught by the inhabitants on the shores there.

REFRIGERATOR PROCESS.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. When you brought in your cargoes of fresh fish where did you sell them?—A. In Boston.

Q. What did you get for cod?—A. We brought no cod; our vessels brought mackerel.

Q. What did you get for them?—A. We got 7 cents apiece. It takes about 200 for a salt barrel, which brings the price somewhere in the neighborhood of $20 a barrel.

Q. What do they do with the fresh mackerel in Boston?—A. They sell them in Boston, New York, and the manufacturing towns, and I don't doubt but they ship them as far west as Chicago.

Q. Is there any difficulty about shipping those fresh fish all over the country in refrigerator cars?—A. Oh, no, if they can get them below the freezing point; but in hot weather it is difficult to keep them enough below.

Q. But they do send them all over the country in that way, do they not?—A. Yes, sir; they do in the winter when the weather is favorable.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON CONSUMER.

Q. Do you know anything about the retail prices of these mackerel?—A. We sold our first fare for 7 cents, and they were retailed for 25.

Q. So far as you know is the retail price affected at all by the prices you get?—A. I don't think it is.

Q. Then if there was no duty on fish, would it, in your opinion, make any difference in regard to the price which the consumer pays for his fish?—A. I don't see how it could. The supply is short anyhow this season, and perhaps will be for years.

Q. Take it in an ordinary season, and would the duty make any difference in the price paid by the consumer?—A. I don't see how it could. The difficulty with the market for fresh fish is that we can't get anything for them hardly; we have sold them as low as 25 cents a barrel, and in the best condition too. But this year they have been very scarce, and the price has been correspondingly high, and very few people could use them. We have taken all that could be had.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Twenty-five cents a barrel would be how much apiece?—A. It would be considerably less than a cent apiece; it would be about seven or eight for a cent.

Q. There are two or three hundred fish in a barrel, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. These fish that you got 7 cents apiece for, that were put up on these shelves that you have described, were they great and small just as you took them out of the sea?—A. They ran very nearly all one size.

Q. What grade would you call them by the numbers they have in Boston market?—A. They were about the size of No. 1 mackerel.

PURSE-SEINES.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You use the purse-seine, do you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is it not rather difficult and dangerous to use the purse-seine within three miles of the Canadian shore-line?—A. It is dangerous for the seine, but parties that are used to it and understand the tides can fish in quite shoal water. In other instances, however, parties who might be called experts lose their seines entirely.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. How deep into the water do those purse-seines go?—A. They take bottom at 130 to 140 feet.

Q. From 20 to 25 fathoms?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do these purse-seines close over a school of mackerel?—A. Oh, no, sir; it is just the same as a web of cloth. You take one end over and take the other end around, and it makes a circle around the edge of the fish; then it sets up edgewise, because one side is floated and the other sinks; the loaded side has a gathering string, a purse line, and that is drawn at both ends until they meet; then after the circle is completed it is pulled until the bottom is closed together and the whole seine is bowl-shaped, with the fish in the bowl.

COMPARATIVE COST OF FISHING BY AMERICANS AND CANADIANS.

Q. What are the reasons why American fishermen cannot compete with Canadians in this fishery business up there?—A. Those people up there do most of their fishing from shore; besides being fishermen they are usually farmers; their fishing is done with hooks morning and evening, while during the middle of the day they attend to their crops. They take these little boats, that only cost from $10 to $15 apiece and carry three or four men, and go offshore and fish mornings and evenings. The fish up there don't bite in the middle of the day any better than they do in a brook or pond. They salt the fish that they catch in this way, and the business is carried on in that way all along the coast, except that in the spring they fish with gill-nets. They have fished there for years with nets in much the same way I have described, and those fish, after being salted, are sent to our market.

Q. Then their fish do not cost them so much as yours, do they?—A. Not so much.

Q. How do their vessels compare with ours in cost?—A. I think they get their vessels up about 30 per cent. cheaper than ours; but the other expenses they have are not so different from ours, only they can get their crews cheaper.

Q. How much cheaper do they get their crews?—A. I think they can man their vessel for 60 per cent. of what we can man ours for.

Q. How about their living?—A. They don't live as well as our people. Our fishing people come in contact with those who live in manufacturing towns, and of course our fishing class want to live as well as anybody else, and if they can't do it by fishing they want to do something else.

BOUNTIES.

Q. Do they not pay bounties?—A. I understand they do in some of the lower Provinces from that $5,500,000 that they got from us; I don't know just how much the bounty is.

SHARES.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Are not the fishermen employed on their vessels paid on shares?—A. Similar to ours; in fact they are the same men. They engage in the same business here, they go that way.

same business here as boys and grow up, and if they do not settle here, they go home and get vessels there and carry the business on in that way.

Q. The owner of the vessel, when the cargo is brought in up there, takes the whole cargo and sells it, and the crews get their share?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he, or not, usually a man who has a store, where he sells to the families of the fishermen what they want?—A. Yes, sir; that is mainly the case about the Labrador coast.

Q. That is the case around the Bay of Chaleur?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And those people are usually in debt to the store-keepers, are they not?—A. Yes, sir; they are a more dependent class than our fishermen, and do not compare with them at all.

Q. Are the lower Province people chiefly of English or Scotch descent? Most of those on the other side are of French descent.—A. Most of those Provinces were settled by the French to some extent, and Cape Breton, I understand, was settled largely by the Scotch who were turned out by the landholders in Scotland. In Prince Edward Island there are a great many of Scotch descent.

FREE FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. According to your experience as a fisherman, what has Canada to give us for a free market for her fish?—A. I will tell you what the county treasurer of Richmond County, Cape Breton Island, told me: that of the taxes he gathered in he took $15 of United States money to $1 of Canadian; so I suppose that represents where they get their income from.

Q. Undoubtedly their income comes from American fishermen, but that is not exactly what I ask you. What can Canada give us to-day that the fishermen want in exchange for the free market of the United States? What do you want of Canada for which you are willing to give Canada the right to send her fish to the United States free of duty?—

A. I don't know of anything, unless it would be the right of transporting our fish overland, and they might let us get coal at a lower rate than we could buy it at home and take it there for. But this is only one year out of thirteen; in the other twelve years we could have done much better on this coast; even those who have fished on our own shores have done better.

STEAM MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. And so far as coal is concerned yours is the only vessel that is engaged in mackerel fishing with steam?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It is an experiment?—A. It is an experiment.

Q. How does it operate?—A. Perhaps it bids fair to operate favorably, but the circumstances this year have been against it.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What are the shares of those fishermen who go on sailing vessels?—A. They give the crew half, only their crews are not subject to their board bills or fireman's account the same as ours.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. On sailing vessels you would not have any fireman's account, I suppose?—A. No, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. The owner furnishes the outfit, and all that sort of thing, and the boarding?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the sailors get half?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Does that include the captain?—A. No; the owner of the vessel furnishes the captain, I believe. In some places the crews are paid partly in cash, but it is not customary.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. About how many men go in sailing vessels from this port?—A. From 15 to 20 for each vessel.

Q. How much do they ordinarily make in a year, taking ten years together for an average?—A. I think during the season they average somewhere about $30 a month for good seasons; this season they hardly made $5.

Q. Take an average of ten years.—A. The average would be in the neighborhood of $30 a month.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Have you any idea of the profits of the owners?—A. In many places they have been out of pocket in the last ten years.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. For how many months would the average of $30 run?—A. For seven months.

Q. That would be $210 a year?—A. Yes, sir.

WINTER OCCUPATIONS OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What occupation do these fishing men pursue when their voyages are over?—A. A very few of them keep at the winter fishing; perhaps about one-third of the whole number only keep at it during the winter as it is extra hazardous.

Q. Do the others find employment in the winter?—A. As a rule they lie by.

INCREASE OF CANADIAN FISHING FLEET.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What effect has the treaty of 1870-'71 had upon our fisheries and upon the Canadian, within your observation, as to the increase of the fleets, &c.?—A. Nearly all their fishing fleet has been built since that. Several years ago there was a treaty similar to this, under which they prospered, and built up quite a fleet of vessels; then there came a change. In the mean time, between the old treaty and the new, the fishing industry died out and their vessels were sold or made way with so that at the commencement of this last treaty they had a very small fishing interest outside of the States. The people of that country come here and engage in fishing during the summer, and then take their profits home and live during the winter. But free trade gives them a chance to live and do business at home.

Q. Has that increased their fleet immensely?—A. Yes; I judge two-thirds, if not nearly all of it, has been built up since that treaty went into effect.

Q. Have you noticed the result upon our fisheries since that treaty went into effect?—A. I know that there is nearly a whole year's catch ahead that they cannot sell; an absolute failure, like this year's failure gives a chance ahead for three

Q. How about years?—A. I have seen fifteen firms in the figures, but I shall not do business in Boston.

REFRIGERATOR PROCESS.

Q. How about the increase in the fresh-fish business in the last 15 years?—A. I believe 15 years ago there were in Boston some ten or fifteen firms in the fresh-fish business, and now—I haven't the exact figures, but I should say there are fifty to seventy-five in the same business in Boston.

Q. So that it has increased immensely?—A. Yes.

Q. By reason of the processes of freezing and transporting in refrigerator cars?—A. Yes, sir; and the market has improved, and transportation is much more perfect, and they reach markets that formerly they did not reach.

Q. What effect, in your judgment, has that had upon the salt-fish business?—A. It has greatly reduced the demand in the Northern States, but in the Southern States it must remain nearly the same, because they cannot get at the fresh fish.

Q. But on the whole it has reduced the demand for salt fish?—A. Yes, sir; and in time I think it will still further reduce it.

Q. The fresh-fish business has increased very heavily during the last six years of the treaty?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In your opinion it will continue to increase, and thus still further affect the salt-fish business?—A. Yes, sir.

FREE FISH.

Q. Then, in your judgment, what would be the operation upon our fishery business of allowing them, under the item in the tariff bill, "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," to bring in all these fresh fish?—A. In ten years from now you will see quite a change if the past treaty arrangement should go into force again, and they would undoubtedly conduct the whole of the fishing industry of the continent, because they don't have to live under the same conditions we do.

Q. So that you would look, if they had our markets, to see the gradual extinction of our fishery business?—A. I would. In fact, if I continued in the business under new treaty regulations, if I had nothing else to turn to in this country, I would move there and carry my business over there, because I could do the business there so much better.

Q. Do you think that would be the result to our fishermen?—A. I do.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What proportion of the men from New England engaged in the fishery business are American citizens?—A. I don't really have any chance to get at statistics to find out. I think the most of them go from the State of Maine. During the season in the Bay we had three that were formerly natives of the Province of Nova Scotia, but they now live in some part of the States.

Q. They are naturalized citizens of the United States?—A. Yes, sir.

TRANSHIPMENT OF FISH OVERLAND.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. If you had the privilege of landing your fish and shipping them by rail do you think you would be able to compete with the Canadians?

—A. No, sir; that wouldn't make any difference, I guess, as long as the privilege remains; and in fact it is said now that we are no better off by the abrogation of this treaty, so far as fresh fish go. This is an exceptional year, however. Nobody was prepared for this year. Nobody was in any condition to manage fresh fish except myself, because I have this steam vessel, and by means of the quicker transportation given by that steamer have saved time which amounted in the aggregate to some 30 days or more.

Q. What advantage would that be to the men engaged in fishing in schooners? Could, or could they not, if they had that privilege, make more trips than they do make?—A. I don't know. It would require considerable preparation to have the salt, barrels, and other necessities at the railroad terminus, and those things they would be obliged to buy from Canada. They might save sometimes. They use up from 12 to 18 days on the round voyage between the fishing grounds and home, and they would only use about 4 to 6 days the other way; but they would have the transportation to pay as well as the large profits on the supplies they would have to buy there. So that the gain to them would not be so very much. On the other hand, as a rule, they get better prices at home when the fish are handled from the vessel than they would to take them off the ship and send them over the railroads.

Q. You did not know, as I understood, what proportion of the men engaged in our fishery business were native-born Americans?—A. No, sir; my own experience is that most of the men go from the State of Maine.

CLOSE TIME.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What is your opinion as to the propriety of a close term up to the first of June?—A. Of course their net-fishing and trap-fishing on the Nova Scotia coast affect the supply just the same as ours. We are all at work on the small fish, and we all would be equally benefited by a close time. I don't think there is anything to be gained in the long run by trying to fish for mackerel South.

Q. In your opinion it would be better to have a close time?—A. I think we should be benefited in five or ten years; it would take nearly that time to see any appreciable benefit.

Q. Do you think the mackerel supply has been diminished?—A. I do.

Q. By taking them early in the spring?—A. Yes, and by destroying the hatching-grounds.

Q. They are not good, I take it, in the spring?—A. They seem to market very well when fresh; they are not good to use as salt fish. They are similar to shad and other kinds of fish that spawn at that season.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Is the principal part of the fishing done, from Cape Hatteras, for instance, to opposite New York, by Northern men?—A. Yes, sir; by these Maine and Massachusetts vessels; there are no others engaged in the mackerel fisheries, that I know of, in the States.

Q. Do you think the same schools of fish that are found at Cape Hatteras go on northward to Block Island and clear up to the British coasts?—

A. Oh, yes, we know they do; we follow them day after day; they easily make from 20 to 50 miles a day.

Q. So that from your experience you think it is perfectly clear that the same schools move along the whole coast to the northeast?—A. Yes, sir; we know they do.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. How far off from shore do these schools of mackerel that you have followed usually go?—A. On the map you can see very plainly. When they are running in spring they seem to leave the Gulf Stream and make directly for shoal soundings. In the winter the shoal water is colder, but when the water gets warmer they make for deeper water north and east until the spawning time comes. They follow the shoal soundings until they get to Maine, Massachusetts, or Nova Scotia, and in some instances I think they go as far as Labrador to spawn.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. How far off shore down at Hatteras and along the Jersey coast do you ordinarily get the most fish?—A. About 25 to 35 miles.

Q. Then when you get up to Block Island they are closer in, I suppose?—A. No, sir; not often. Some seasons there they run 60 miles off shore, and other seasons they run within 5 or 10 miles off shore.

Q. Taking the whole eastern coast of the United States together, what would be the distance off shore that you would expect to get the great bulk of mackerel, if you were going to fish for ten years right along?—A. I should imagine it would be about 40 miles from the coast.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. So on our shores you would not count the three-mile limit as of any value at all?—A. No, sir; but then there are exceptions.

Senator EDMUNDS. But I am speaking of it in a general way.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Is that true of British water?—A. No, sir; I don't think it is. Their coasts make differently, somehow. After the mackerel get in there they seem to be driven in-shore by a species of large fish that pursues them within 10 or 15 miles of the coast. At any rate, we don't go outside, because where we find fish there is no occasion to go further. Our average distance would perhaps be 5 miles up there.

Q. Suppose, in fishing up there 4 or 5 miles from the shore, outside of the three-mile shore-line, you run across a school of mackerel and the wind is toward the shore, how long does it take you to get into the three-mile limit?—A. A wind like that will cause us to drift nearly half a mile an hour.

Q. So that before you could gather in your school of mackerel you would be inside the three-mile limit?—A. With a very large school we would.

TAKING MACKEREL WITH PURSE-SEINE.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. From the time you begin to swing around a school of mackerel how long would it ordinarily take, in weather that is not very rough, to get them up so that you could put your ship under sail and stand off?

The WITNESS. To take them aboard?

Senator EDMUNDS. Suppose you were drifting in toward the three-mile limit.

A. It takes us usually about twenty minutes to get the fish ready for removal to the vessel, and then we can handle about 100 barrels an hour, with a very active crew. I should imagine they would consume nearly two hours, on the average, however, with a hundred barrels.

Q. Can you not get under way until they are all in?—A. No, sir; we have to lie still; we couldn't move 50 feet without tearing the net. A hundred barrels of fish is a very heavy mass, and we are obliged to use as light netting as possible on account of convenience in handling.

Q. How many fish were there in the largest number you ever took in one haul, if you call it a haul, with a purse-seine?—A. We have saved 600 barrels. In the Gulf of St. Lawrence the past year from one school we got 150 barrels. The schools run smaller there because the water is shoaler.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. EDWIN T. LEWIS.

GLOUCESTER, MASS, October 4, 1886.

Capt. EDWIN T. LEWIS sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Twenty-nine.

Q. Residence?—A. Booth Bay, Me.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fisherman.

Q. Are you master of a vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been engaged in fishing, whether as master or otherwise?—A. I think about fifteen years.

Q. Where have you chiefly conducted the business?—A. Here.

Q. I mean when at sea. Where did you catch your fish?—A. The most of them on this coast.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Have you ever fished in what we will call British water, that is to say, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the Grand Banks, &c.?—A. I have fished in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Q. Did you fish for mackerel, or cod?—A. For mackerel.

Q. How many seasons have you fished in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

A. Since I have been master of a vessel I have been there three seasons.

Q. How many while not master?—A. Two, I think.

Q. Making five altogether?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. During those five years where did you get the bulk of your mackerel?

The WITNESS. Inside or outside the three-mile limits?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

MAP.

Q. Have you seen, before, this map hanging on the wall of this room?

Q. From your experience do you understand this map to be correct, and that this blue represents the chief mackerel-fishing grounds?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How far out did you take the great bulk of your fish in the five years?—A. From five to six and eight miles, probably.

Q. Have you been up there this year?—A. I have.

Q. Have you had any difficulty?—A. Not any. We never harbored but once, going and coming, except in stress.

Q. Did you go through the Strait of Canso?—A. We did.

Q. You always do, I suppose, when you go up there, do you not?—A. Yes, sir.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. How many men did you employ this year?—A. I had 17.

Q. Did they go on shares?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. All the mackerel men do, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The share is the same as Captain Joyce stated, I suppose?—A. The shares are the same, but we go on a little different lay. Our crew gets a share, but they have a few expenses to pay extra.

Q. About how much do they make on a ten years' average?—A. I have only been master of a vessel about eight years. Probably they have made an average of $40 a month and better.

Q. For how many months?—A. For seven or eight months.

Q. What do they do the other four or five months?—A. Very few of them do anything; they lie by.

HOOK AND LINE vs. SEINE.

Q. Have you been a mackerel man all the time?—A. All the time. I was winter fishing one winter, haddocking.

Q. You fish, of course, with a purse seine?—A. Yes, sir,

Q. Do any of our fishing vessels, to your knowledge, fish for mackerel with a hook and line?—A. They do very little.

Q. Do you go fitted out to try to make a catch that way?—A. Yes, sir; we go fitted for both ways, but we only catch very few on the hook.

Q. Why?—A. Because we can't.

Q. You get more by seining?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why do you go fitted out with hooks at all yourself?—A. There are times when you can't see them; schools don't always show, and then we lay by, hooking.

Q. What depth of water do you generally get them in when you catch them with a hook?—A. We fish on about the same ground as we do with a purse seine.

Q. But they do not show on the surface?—A. No; sometimes we sweep around the vessel and get some in that way.

Q. In that case why do you not run out your seine and take them in?—A. We do.

Q. I am now speaking of hook fishing. When is it you risk a hook?

—A. They show at the surface when we catch them with the purse seine, and when they don't do that we touch them up with bait.

Q. And having got them there you purse them if you can?—A. If we can.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Taking all your mackerelmen together, according to your observation, do you think that the right to fish within the three-mile shore line is of any substantial value to the mackerel-fishing interest of the United States?—A. I do not.

Q. You would not be willing, then, to have the United States give the Canadians any valuable privilege in return for the right to fish within their three-mile shore line?—A. No, sir.

SALT AND FRESH FISH.

Q. Do you carry ice?—A. We do now on this shore; we never carried any that far.

Q. All your sailing fishermen use salt up there, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you assort your fish before you barrel them, or do you put them all together and assort them when you get home?—A. We put them in barrels and salt them.

Q. Without arranging them by numbers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long does it take you to run from Magdalen Islands here?—A. It will take from eight to ten days.

Q. How far is it?—A. About 700 miles, I should say.

Q. You cannot make more than 100 miles in twenty-four hours, on an average?—A. Not on an average; no.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Of what nationality are the crews you employ?—A. Mine are Americans, mostly from the State of Maine.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Do you find Canadian fishing vessels in the Gulf fishing on the same grounds where you fish?—A. Yes, sir; they fish on the same grounds we do. They fish inshore sometimes, and we do not.

Q. But, generally, were the Canadian vessels chiefly employed in fishing for mackerel inside, or outside the three miles?—A. This year they fished with us all the season. I didn't see but very few within the three-mile limit.

Q. They take their fish into what port?—A. To whatever port they sail from.

SALT AND FRESH FISH.

Q. They put up their fish in salt just the same as our fishermen do?—A. Yes, sir.

Senator EDMUNDS. I did not know but they took their fish fresh and carried them to a railway somewhere.

The WITNESS. Not that I know of.

Q. They get their salt and supplies from their own port?—A. I suppose they do, except I believe they get their purse-seines from the United States.

RELATIVE COST OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. Are the provincial vessels about the same size as ours?—A. About the same.

Q. And schooner-rigged?—A. Schooner-rigged.

Q. How do they compare in cost, so far as you know, with our vessels?—A. They only cost about two-thirds as much.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Do their men fish on shares?—A. The same as we do, I think; I am not sure.

Q. They have about the same lay, you suppose?—A. About the same.

MACKEREL FISHING.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What distance from shore have the bulk of your mackerel been taken up there this year?—A. About four to six miles.

Q. Taking it through the whole length of the coast, where have the bulk of the mackerel been taken in our own waters?—A. From 35 to 40 miles from the shore.

Q. In all your mackerel fishing together, where have you taken the bulk of your fish, in American, or Canadian waters?—A. In American waters.

Q. What proportion in American waters?—A. Nine-tenths.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Is that true of the great mass of the American mackerel fleet?—A. I don't know that; I have no experience.

Senator EDMUNDS. The statistics will show.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Have you any means of knowing about what proportion of the fishermen are native-born Americans?—A. No, I have not.

Q. Do the vessels that go out from here carry part of their crews from the Provinces, or do they take them all from here, as a general rule?—

A. Now they take them all from here; they are not allowed to take them down there.

Q. They are not allowed to employ them there?—A. No, sir.

FREE FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What is there that Canada can give us that will be an equivalent for the privilege to them of sending their fish into our market free?—A. There is nothing.

BAIT.

Q. Have you need to go in there to buy bait?—A. I don't use any bait.

Q. Do our cod-fishermen go in there to buy bait?—A. They can get along without it very well.

Q. So that, so far as you know, there is nothing Canada can give which would be regarded by you as an equivalent for a free market to them?—A. No, sir.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. RICHARD WARREN.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

Capt. RICHARD WARREN sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. In Gloucester.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fishing.

Q. What kind of fishing?—A. Mackerel, wholly.

Q. How long have you been in the business?—A. Thirty-five years.

Q. How long as master?—A. Twenty-six.

Q. Whereabouts have you fished mainly?—A. I have done most of my fishing for the last fifteen years on this coast; previous to that in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Q. Previous to 1871 you fished for how many years in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?—A. Nearly twenty years.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Taking the St. Lawrence fisheries, where did you get the bulk of your mackerel as respects the three-mile shore-line?—A. I should judge that for the twenty years I was inside the Bay of St. Lawrence I hardly saw the shore, being off the northwest point of Prince Edward's Island.

Q. You were a good many miles from that point?—A. Yes, sir; twenty to forty.

HABITS OF MACKEREL.

Q. Do the mackerel there have the habit of staying about the same particular place each year?—A. At that particular time we were hooking, not seining, and that used to be a very choice part of the St. Lawrence for us to fish. There are many men in the room now who used to fish there—old, experienced men—and we fished there years and years.

SUPPLIES.

Q. In that 20 years or so how many times in a season did you find it necessary to go into any British port for supplies other than wood and water, and for shelter and to repair damages?—A. I don't recollect during my first ten years down there that I ever went in for supplies; I might possibly have done so; but I did not go in for anything more than wood and water.

HOOK AND LINE vs. SEINE.

Q. When did the hook-and-line fishing from vessels chiefly stop, and you take up the purse or other kind of seine fishing?—A. I presume about 1875 there was quite a large majority went to seine fishing; I think it was in 1875.

Q. About how long are these purse seines?—A. Two hundred fathoms and upwards.

Q. How deep?—A. About 20 fathoms deep.

Q. So they would touch bottom in 20-fathom water?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What do they cost?—A. In the neighborhood of a thousand dollars, near that.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Did you fish in the St. Lawrence waters during the existence of the treaty of 1871?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And during that time, if I understand you, you fished outside of the three-miles?—A. There wasn't very much fishing, either. There were very few fish caught while I was there, and so I didn't remain long; I came out after I was there a short time.

Q. Have you fished there since?—A. I fished there six weeks; nearly two months.

Q. Have you had any difficulty with the authorities in any way in regard to your vessel?—A. No, sir; I haven't visited their harbors; I only visited one harbor during all the time I was down there.

Q. Did you see many Canadian fishermen down there?—A. I saw a good many.

Q. Where were they fishing?—A. In the same waters we were during the time I was there; I saw more or less of them every day.

Q. I should infer, from what you say, that, like our vessels, they catch the bulk of their mackerel by the present methods, with seines, and outside the three miles?—A. Wholly, so far as I know; very few mackerel are taken by Canadian vessels inside, I think.

Q. From your knowledge of that fishery do you consider the right for you and your fellow-fishermen to catch mackerel within three miles of the shore of any substantial value?—A. O, no, sir; it is a detriment to us to go inshore. That coast abounds in rocks, and the waters are shallow, especially along the east coast of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; and it is a detriment to go into those shallow waters, for they are about sure to lose their seines or tear them badly. It is an advantage to us to keep away from shore.

Q. The water is deep around Magdalen Islands, is it not?—A. No, sir; it is shallow, mostly.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. It is rocky, is it not?—A. Very rocky.

AVERAGE VOYAGE.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. How long does it take you to make a voyage?—A. Owing to circumstances.

Q. But take an average from four or five seasons together, what would you calculate to be the necessary time from the Magdalen Islands?

The WITNESS. Making the passage?

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes.

A. To go and return it would take about two weeks.

Q. That would be a round trip?—A. A round trip; that could be done easily in fourteen days.

Q. In an average year of, say, 20 years back, how many voyages would the Gloucester schooners be able to make up there and back?

A. It is pretty hard to get at the average, because they differ so much.

Often they make three voyages from here to the Gulf of St. Lawrence in a sailing vessel and back again.

Q. And sometimes, I suppose, they do not make more than one?—A. Yes, sir. I have made four by landing.

FREE FISH.

Q. I will ask you the same question that Mr. Frye has asked the other witnesses: Is there anything in the fishery way that you would consider to be an equivalent that Canada could give us for giving her the right to market both salt and fresh fish free into our ports?—A. No.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What is the effect of a free market upon our fisheries?—A. As far as I understand it, we certainly would be obliged to haul out of the business in a very short time; that would be the case, I think, with every one that follows it here in this part of the country.

Q. In your opinion, then, in ten or fifteen years' time it would destroy the fishery trade of our country?—A. Wholly.

Q. Would you go over there?—A. We should be obliged to if we wanted to continue in the fishing business.

RELATIVE COST OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. Why can we not compete with them?—A. It is impossible for us to do it on account of the difference between our systems of producing vessels and running them.

Q. Such as what?—A. They have a very different method of running them, and they fit them out differently, and the crews don't expect the same living.

Q. How much more should you say it would cost to build our vessels than theirs?—A. A new vessel of a hundred tons can be built there ready for sea at a cost of $6,300, and one of ours of the same tonnage would surely cost $10,000.

OUTFITS AND COST OF LIVING.

Q. How about outfits?—A. They live differently. We get the best there is in the market, in the shape of food of all kinds, to put aboard our vessels, but they go under a different system; they can eat a barrel of herring with a relish, at which our fishermen would turn up their noses. Our outfit costs nearly one-half more. They get flour very much cheaper, and they live so differently in every way. We use a barrel of beef every twenty days, and they would take two months in consuming it; they use it only once a day, when we have it on the table all the time. They don't have any luxuries at all.

Q. On the whole, how much more expensive should you say would be the whole cost of outfit and everything else for an American vessel than for a Canadian?—A. Fully one-third more, according to my judgment.

Q. Do they have any advantage of you in getting their mackerel to market more quickly?—A. That must be an advantage. They have not commenced, but, so far as my knowledge goes, another season they will supply our market nearly altogether.

INCREASE OF FRESH-FISH BUSINESS.

Q. What do you know, if anything, about the increase of the fresh-fish market in this country in the last ten years?—A. I know it has in-

Q. What effect has that had upon the salt-fish market?—A. It has reduced it, of course.

Q. Is there a constant and growing increase in the use of fresh fish in this country?—A. Yes; there is.

Q. Caused, I suppose, by the increased convenience in the transportation of fresh fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You can distribute fresh fish now all over the country by rail?—A. Yes, sir; whereas, a few years ago there was a very small quantity of fish shipped in that way.

Q. In your opinion will that trade continue to increase?—A. I don't see why it should not.

Q. Do you think, then, that the Canadians, under the item in the tariff act, "Fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," should be permitted to send in all these frozen fish?—A. I don't suppose they ought, but it appears that they have been.

CURING OF FRESH FISH AFTER ENTRY.

Q. Suppose a cargo of frozen halibut or any other kind of fish was brought here and landed as "Fish, fresh, for immediate consumption," the wholesaler who buys them transships them to Boston or New York, does he not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there any way for the custom-house officer here to follow them in order to see that they are not cured afterwards?—A. There is a way to follow them, but certainly I have never known anything of that kind to transpire.

Q. They can, and undoubtedly do, cure a great many of these fish that are so entered?—A. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

Q. If the market is very strong they will not lose them?—A. No, sir; they cure them. The fish can be brought in fresh to-day and salted to-morrow, and the public know nothing about it.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY OF 1870-'71.

Q. What has been the effect of the treaty of 1870-'71 upon the Canadian fisheries?—A. I haven't had much experience down there in the last few years; I have only been there one or two years.

Q. What effect has it had upon our business here?—A. You can see that every day without asking the question.

Q. What is the effect?—A. The amount of it is that we get in surplus fish here in town that we can't dispose of.

Q. Is it driving your fishermen out of the business?—A. Certainly; lots of them.

Q. How large is your fleet here now?—A. I don't know how large it is.

DUTY.

Q. What do you want of the United States Government so far as fisheries are concerned?—A. I should like to add to the duty.

Q. What do you say the duty ought to be?—A. I am not prepared to say what I think it ought to be, but I think it ought to be enough to keep the Canadian fish out and give the American fishermen a chance to live.

Q. Can the American people supply the American market?—A. I presume they can; they usually did before Canada got a fleet of fishermen of her own.

Q. In your opinion should there be a duty on frozen fish?—A. Yes, sir; there should be.

Q. Do you know anything about the retail market?—A. I know something about it.

EFFECT OF DUTY UPON THE CONSUMER.

Q. The fishermen sell to the wholesaler?—A. Usually, yes.

Q. And the wholesaler to the jobber. Now, what is the difference between the price the fisherman receives for his fish and what the consumer pays for his?—A. That is a pretty hard question for me to answer, because it varies so much; of course there is some considerable difference; at times there is a big difference, and then at other times there may be less.

Q. Does the fisherman average more than two-thirds of the price paid by the consumer?—A. Usually not, I think. That is putting it a little small perhaps; I should think they did a little better than that.

Q. From your experience does the duty on fish affect the price of fish to the consumer; I do not mean to the wholesaler?—A. Yes; it does.

Q. How?—A. I don't know as it does to the consumer, either.

Q. If there is any effect, is it not between the wholesaler and the fisherman?—A. That is just what it is usually; to the consumer, I don't know as it makes any difference.

CLOSE TIME.

Q. What do you say about close time for mackerel?—A. I think it would be a good plan to close it up to the 1st of June, or better still, I think, to the 1st of July.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. State your grounds for thinking so.—A. On account of the scarcity of fish, which results from catching so many fish early in the season and catching them before they have a chance to spawn.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. When they are carrying spawn do you think they are as good as they ought to be?—A. No, sir; of course they are not so good. Of course fresh fish readily find a market, but come to salt them and they are not of as much value.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Is mackerel roe ever eaten as shad and salmon roe?—A. It is eaten quite extensively, by New York folks especially.

HABITS OF MACKEREL.

Q. Do you think the same schools of mackerel go North from Hatteras and New Jersey all along this coast?—A. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that, because we have followed them from year to year right along the coast.

largest part of them are caught in our waters, that is, in the mackerel line.

Q. What proportion of the mackerel that are caught between Hatteras and Salem or Boston are sold as fresh fish, and what proportion are sold as salt fish, so far as you can form an estimate?—A. I really couldn't tell; that is something I never thought of. The majority we have caught are sold salted, because it is only for two months in the first of the season that they run fresh. Down this way most every one gets salt fish at this season, but in the early season most every one gets fresh fish. So really I could not tell what proportion would be sold fresh.

SPRING FISHING.

Q. Is your fleet here at Gloucester and along our shores here engaged largely in the spring fishing from Hatteras northward?—A. Usually there are about 100 sails of vessels engaged in that business from this port alone, I guess.

RATIO OF FISH CAUGHT IN PROVINCIAL WATERS TO THOSE CAUGHT IN UNITED STATES WATERS.

Q. Can you form an estimate of what proportion of salt fish for sale in our markets are caught in the British waters around the Provinces?—A. I presume three-fifths of them were caught there this year.

Senator FRYE (to Senator Saulsbury.) By "British waters" you do not mean within the three-mile shore line?

Senator SAULSBURY. No.

Q. Are the three-fifths you speak of brought here and thrown upon the market, or are they brought here in bond and transhipped to some other point largely?—A. Those mackerel caught in that vicinity are fetched here and salted and shipped all over the country.

Q. Are there not a great many of their fish that come here salted, having come in bond, and are transhipped without paying duty?—A. I am not aware of that fact; it may be so.

NATIONALITY OF THE FISHERMEN.

Q. You have been in the fishing business a good while and have a general knowledge of it; what proportion of the men engaged in fishing from our ports are native-born Americans?—A. I should judge somewhere about two-thirds.

Q. Have any of our vessels been in the habit of going out to the fishing grounds and reshipping men?—A. They have been in the habit some years ago of going down to the Provinces and shipping one or two men or four or five for each vessel.

Senator SAULSBURY. I understood from one of the captains that that is not admissible now.

The WITNESS. No, sir; it is not.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do they not allow you now to ship other men?—A. No, sir; if a man there wants to go a fishing on one of our vessels he has got to hunt up money enough to bring him to this end before he can ship.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. JOHN McQUIN.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

Capt. JOHN McQUIN sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS :

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Sixty-two.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. East Gloucester.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I have been ashore mostly for the last four years; for the last fifteen or sixteen years I was running to South America, and before that I was a fisherman.

Q. What business have you been engaged in ashore for the last four years?—A. Trading and fish business.

Q. Do you know of any importations of foreign fish from British ports?—A. Three years ago we brought one trip from the British Provinces.

Q. You deal almost entirely, I suppose, in American fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you deal in all kinds?—A. I am out of the business now.

Q. You did deal in cod?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And mackerel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Halibut?—A. No, sir; not halibut.

Q. Herring?—A. Some herring; very few.

HERRING.

Q. Is there much herring business done at this port?—A. Considerable in frozen herring in the winter.

Q. Where do they come from?—A. Some of them come from down to Grand Manan, and some from Newfoundland.

Q. What use is made of them?—A. They are used for bait partly, mostly so here. Some of them are peddled out for consumption in New York and Boston. A good many are used in Boston for bait.

Q. Those that are used for bait are used in cod-fishing?—A. Yes, cod and halibut.

Q. How extensive is that winter frozen-herring business? Or are they frozen by artificial means?—A. No, sir; they are frozen by frost. I should say there are from 35 to 40 vessels go every year; I don't know but more.

Q. Where are these herring taken at Grand Manan—inside the three-mile limit?—A. Yes, sir; they buy them.

Q. These vessels that go for them go as trading vessels instead of fishing vessels, do they?—A. Yes, sir; they go down as trading vessels and buy the herring from the natives.

Q. During the last winter have some of your vessels gone in that way?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they experience any difficulty with the authorities there about coming as trading vessels?—A. I think not, this last winter; I wasn't there myself, but I didn't hear of any.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. I only inquire for your general knowledge and observation. When you were engaged in the fishing business where did you fish?—A. When I was cod-fishing I fished on the Georges and down on what we call Brown's Bank; in mackerel fishing I always fished in North Bay, the St. Lawrence.

Q. Which side of Prince Edward's Island?—A. I always fished north of the island, not at the straits at all.

Q. How many years did you fish down there?—A. I think I was down there 13 years.

Q. What was the last year, as nearly as you can remember?—A. 1863.

Q. You fished substantially most of the time during the period of the existence of the reciprocity treaty of 1854?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did you catch your fish—I mean the bulk of them—in respect of the three-mile line?—A. We caught a very small portion of them inside the three miles.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You caught with a hock and line then?—A. Yes, sir; I never was seining; we fished mostly around the Magdalens, around Bank Bradley and Bank Orphan.

Q. Where did the other American fishermen, during the time that you were fishing there, catch the great bulk of their mackerel, as respects the in-shore line?—A. I should think they caught nine-tenths of them outside, off shore.

Q. Although you were then all hook fishermen?—A. Yes, sir. We used to be mostly altogether scattered in different places, in bunches.

Q. Of what substantial value, from your knowledge, experience, and observation, do you regard the right of American fishermen to fish within three miles of the provincial shores?—A. The way they fish now for mackerel I don't think it would be worth very much, because they are apt to lose more than they gain by tearing up their gearing. In fact, they can fish but very little with the seines they have. I never saw them seine until this year, and I shouldn't suppose they could get out very few fish inside the three miles.

Q. From your experience, as you have described it, it was not of any very essential value to you during the time when you had the right to fish within the three miles?—A. No, sir; it was not.

BAIT.

Q. How much better is fresh bait for codfish, say herrings that come here frozen, than salted bait, with which to catch cod on the Banks?—

A. For hand-line fishing around the Georges, of course salt bait ain't no account, but on the Banks, to go trawling, salt bait, clams, &c. hand-lines, are fully as good.

Q. As herring?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where would you get your clams?—A. Down East, at Portland; that is where they do get them all.

Q. You do not depend on British waters for clams?—A. No, sir. They come up to Portland every spring and get them by the thousand barrels and carry them down there for the Bankers.

HERRING.

Q. During the dozen years of the treaty of 1870-71 that expired last year, how many herring for food, instead of for bait, were taken by American fishermen in British waters?

The WITNESS. Do you mean caught?

Senator EDMUNDS. Caught when they went herring fishing; I don't mean when they went as traders and bought the product.—A. I shouldn't suppose there was more than one-tenth caught by American vessels.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Our vessels do not go herring fishing?—A. Very seldom. They buy them and pay the money for them.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. So that the American fishermen have so far no interest in the herring fisheries within the three miles?—A. No, sir; not for catching.

FIRST CASE OF THE DRUID.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You have been down there this summer?—A. Yes, sir; I was down there between two and three weeks in North Bay.

Q. Did you go down with a vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you go down for?—A. I went down to carry supplies to vessels down there, and to see if I could get a load of mackerel to bring home.

Q. What experience did you have down there, if any?—A. My experience was I didn't get a load of mackerel to bring home; they wouldn't let me get them; they wouldn't give me any privileges at all, only outside the three miles, the same as the fishermen had.

Q. You did not go down as a fisherman?—A. No, sir; I was made register.

Q. What did you try to do under register?—A. I tried to get a load of mackerel to bring home.

Q. Where did you try?—A. I tried down there, but the first hatch I went in they stopped me and kept me three days.

Q. On what pretense?—A. Because they said I had no business there, that is what the captain of the cutter said. I cleared for the Magdalen Islands; I hadn't reached there.

Q. But you had a register?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you not permitted to buy anything?—A. Yes, sir; I could buy anything, but I wasn't permitted to bring anything aboard the vessel; they wouldn't allow me to handle a barrel aboard the vessel; they wouldn't allow me to handle the hatches, had an armed guard aboard. I wasn't anchored two hours before they had an armed guard aboard.

Q. Did you show them your papers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did they have to say about them?—A. They said I had no business there, because I was in Malpeque, and I was going to the Magdalen Islands.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What date was that?—A. That was August 18, 1886, I think I have the date at home.

Q. Do you know the name of the cutter that held you?—A. The Hallett.

Q. Do you know the name of the captain?—A. I don't know his name. [A bystander said that the name of the captain was Norman.]

Q. Had you on your vessel at that time any purse-seine?—A. No.

Q. Any stock for fishing; hand-lines, or anything of the kind?—A. No, sir; I had salt, barrels, and provisions.

Q. Any bait for cod-fishing?—A. No, sir.

Senator Ed

Q. You had no fishing outfit of any kind?—A. No, sir; not for catching fish.

Q. You had a register?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And cleared from here?—A. For the Magdalen Islands, Harbor De Bar.

Q. While you were in there and these people were having you under guard, were any of our American fishing vessels coming in towards you to pass over their cargo?—A. The first night I got into the harbor there was quite a large fleet in there, but when the captain of the cutter came aboard and there was quite a number of skippers aboard he drove them away.

Q. Do you mean to say that he would not allow them to stay aboard your vessel?—A. Yes, sir; he drove them away.

Q. How did he drive them away?—A. He told them to get out of the cabin, to get out of the vessel, that they couldn't stay there; that is about the polite way he told them.

Q. Have you represented these circumstances to the State Department at Washington?—A. No, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What was the name of your vessel?—A. The Druid.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What was she; a schooner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. A vessel like a fishing vessel?—A. Yes, sir; she goes to the Banks every year.

Q. Was she your vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You were her owner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long were you in that place under surveillance?—A. I lay there two nights and a day. He wouldn't let me go until he telegraphed to Ottawa; he had to go back on the island to telegraph to ascertain whether he should seize me for being down there with supplies for American fishermen, and, as far as I could find out, the answer came back to let me go, but to see that I did not receive any thing inside of the three-mile limit. So the next morning when he went out I had to go; he wouldn't allow me to stay in the harbor any time; I had to go when the rest of the vessels went.

Q. He would not allow you to remain?—A. No, sir.

Q. And you were a merchant ship?—A. He wouldn't allow me to remain, and I had to go.

Q. What did you do after you got out?—A. I used to go out and sail around amongst the fishermen, and when they wanted anything I would let them have it outside the three-mile limit, if I had it.

Q. Did you finally take on a cargo?—A. We got 200 barrels from one man to bring home; that is all we got. If I hadn't been interfered with the first night I got in I think I might have got the biggest part of the load; but of course when the fleet went out they scattered, and most everybody was under the impression, from seeing the armed guard aboard, that I was seized, and so the most of them came off home with their fish, not knowing what had become of me.

Q. Had you gone into that bay with any previous understanding with any of these vessels?—A. No, sir.

Q. Had they, to your knowledge, been notified that you would be there on that occasion or about that time?

The WITNESS. Who? The cutters?

Senator EDMUNDS. The fishermen.

A. Some of them might have heard of it. There was one vessel from here that I told I was going down. The most important object I had in going down that cruise was to supply the vessel I had there myself, that I thought I could relieve and save her from coming back home; that was partly my object in going.

Q. Did you find her?—A. Yes, but she didn't have any fish; she had had hard luck.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Are you the owner of fishing vessels?—A. Of that one and part owner of another vessel that is in the bay seining.

Q. Do you fit them out for fishing every season?—A. I send them, I don't fit them.

Q. Do you know about the markets for fish?—A. Well, no, sir; I don't know much about them.

Q. What is the nationality of the crews of your vessels?—A. I should think about three-fourths of them are Americans.

Q. What proportion of them are naturalized citizens of the United States?—A. I don't know.

Q. That is, you think three-fourths are native Americans?—A. Natives and naturalized.

CANADIAN PRIVILEGES.

Q. From your experience down there is there any equivalent in the way of privilege that Canada can give us in return for a free market for her fish?—A. No, sir.

Q. What is there that our fishermen need down there that they have not?—A. Nothing except the privilege of buying provisions.

Q. Provisions alone?—A. Yes, sir.

BAIT.

Q. They can get along without buying bait, can they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that you do not regard it as a necessity to go within the three-mile limit to buy bait?—A. No, sir; I do not. I think where it benefits one it damages two by buying it.

INCREASE OF FRESH FISH.

Q. Has the fresh-fish market increased immensely the last ten years?—A. Yes, I think it has.

Q. By reason of easy transportation in refrigerator cars, &c.?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has that decreased the salt-fish market?—A. I think it has.

Q. Is that fresh-fish market increasing all the time?—A. Yes, I think it is.

Q. Fresh fish, whether frozen or not, are admitted free of duty now under the construction of the old law?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that Canada has a free market to that extent?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What proportion of our fresh fish are brought in here by Canada do you think?—A. I don't know as I can tell. They are increasing so fast that I don't know that I could come anywhere near it.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES.

Q. Do you think that the duty imposed upon fish has any effect upon the market to the consumer?—A. No, sir; I don't think it has.

Q. What, in your judgment, is the proportion of the retail price to the price that the fishermen get?—A. I should think two-fifths to three-fifths.

Q. And the fisherman's price is paid by the wholesaler?—A. Yes, sir.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Do most of the fishermen from Gloucester sail on shares now?—A. I think they do.

Q. Their share being one-half?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The owners furnishing the outfit and the vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

INSURANCE.

Q. What is the insurance on these fishing vessels?—A. It depends a good deal on the losses of vessels. We insure in mutual companies. Mr. Steel, the president of our company, can tell you about that.

Q. You ordinarily insure in a mutual?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is, one located here?—A. Yes, sir.

LIFE OF A FISHING VESSEL.

Q. What is the ordinary life of a fishing vessel?—A. They will last, if they never go ashore, or get hurt, so they will be good for 30 years, and some for 25 years, according to how they are equipped.

Q. They are built very strong, are they not?—A. Yes, sir. It depends on the material they are built of.

GLOUCESTER'S ANNUAL LOSS OF FISHERMEN AND VESSELS.

Q. What is your average loss of fishermen in this one town per year? What is your idea about it?—A. I should think it would average somewhere about 10 to 12 sail.

Q. I mean the men.—A. I should think somewhere about 100 or 150 a year.

Q. It is regarded, is it not, as a very hazardous business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. More so than any other business that a sailor goes into?—A. I don't know as it is, according to the number of men that go.

Q. How many men go out of this port?—A. I suppose 7,000 or 8,000.

Q. What proportion of those men should you say were residents here?—A. I should say one-half.

Q. What kind of fishermen are they?—A. They are first-rate men, most of them.

Q. Do they become skillful sailors?—A. Oh, yes.

SECOND CASE OF THE DRUID.

Q. Did you have any difficulty, after the difficulty you have described with your vessel, before you got home?

The WITNESS. On this last trip?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. Only the very night I went in they put an armed guard aboard and wouldn't allow any boats alongside. I could go anywhere I wanted after the first thirty-six hours, but nobody could come aboard after that.

Q. And the guard was put on your vessel every night?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. How many nights were you in after that?—A. I think I was in five or six nights. The last two nights I was there he didn't put any guard aboard; he didn't put any guard aboard until after dark, and the next night (Sunday night), he didn't put any aboard.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Did you go into the same anchorage every time?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. What was your object in going in?—A. The weather was bad, so I couldn't lie out; and the fishermen all went in.
 Q. You went in for safe harbor?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Did you have a young man with you as a passenger who went down with you?—A. No, sir; I took a young man from a vessel down there that went in one of Rowe & Jordan's vessels; I took him to bring him home. When I got into Canso I reported; he was in a hurry to get home to go to college, but they would not allow me to land him; they allowed it at first, but fetched him back, and I finally had to take him aboard and bring him home.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What was the ground of that?—A. They said I had no right to land him there; I had taken him aboard outside the three miles, too.
 Q. Do you mean when he came back?—A. No, sir; when he first came aboard, I mean.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. So that he had to let his college wait and come home with you?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What custom-house was that?—A. Port Hawkesbury.
 Q. That was about the latter part of August, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir. We sailed from here the 10th of August, and that was along about the 1st of September I guess, or somewhere in that vicinity.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. JEREMIAH HOPKINS.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fisherman.

Q. Master of a vessel?—A. Sometimes I am; yes, sir. At present I am a fisherman.

Q. How long have you been a fisherman, either as captain or in a different grade?—A. Thirty years.

Q. Where have your fishing operations been carried on?—A. In Cape Cod and here in Gloucester.

Q. Do you fish for cod, or mackerel, or both?—A. Both.

INSHORE FISHING.

Q. How many years, if any, have you fished in the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and what we ordinarily call British waters, although outside of the three miles?—A. About ten years out of the thirty.

Q. What ten years were those?—A. From 1857 to 1867.

Q. What were you fishing for at that time?—A. Mackerel.

Q. Where did you fish?—A. We fished off Magdalen and Prince Edward's Islands and in the Bay of Chaleur.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. With hook and line?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Where did you take the bulk of your fish in respect of the three miles from shore, inside or out?—A. Off Prince Edward's Island, mostly.

Q. How far off from land mostly?—A. Mostly from 3 to 10 or 15 miles.

Q. How was it in respect of other fishermen who were engaged about there at the same time? Where did they get the bulk of their fish—inside the three-mile shore line, or outside?—A. I should say outside the three-mile limit.

SUPPLIES.

Q. Did you find it necessary to go to Canadian ports very often for supplies or other things in the ten years you were down there?—A. At that time we did; at that time we used to fit out with barrels and salt down there.

Q. Do you know where the salt came from, whether it was American salt that had gone in under the reciprocity treaty?—A. I don't know.

EXTENT OF MACKEREL FISHERIES.

Q. How did the catch of those ten years in those waters compare with the last ten years?—A. The catches during those years were a good deal more than they have been during the last ten years.

Q. How many vessels do you think per year during those ten years were engaged in fishing up there?—A. I suppose there were 300 or 400 at that time.

Q. In round numbers how many are engaged in fishing down there now?—A. I shouldn't think there were over 100 or 150; I haven't been in the Bay fishing at all for the last ten years.

Q. Then you only know from what you see, vessels going out of this port?—A. Yes, sir.

INSHORE CODFISHING.

Q. Where have you carried on fishing chiefly during the last 10 years?—A. I have been cod-fishing on the Nova Scotia coast, around Shebourne, for the last five or six years.

Q. How far from land did you take your codfish?—A. From 15 to 20 miles.

Q. Have you ever fished for codfish inside the three-mile limit?—A. No, sir.

BAIT.

Q. What sort of bait have you used?—A. These last three years we have been using squid.

Q. Where did you get the squid?—A. At Provincetown, Cape Cod, and caught them on the ground after August.

Q. Right in the very place where you used it for bait?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I should not suppose the codfish would need to bite your hooks if the squid were so plentiful as that. What depth do you fish there?—

A. All the way from 55 to 90 fathoms.

FIRST CASE OF THE ABBIE A. SNOW.

Q. Did you have occasion to go ashore during those times you have been fishing down there?—A. Yes, sir; the last two or three years they have had to go into Shelburne; I was in there three weeks ago.

Q. What for?—A. Stress of weather, to take water, and such things as that, and to repair damages.

Q. Have you been molested in any way?—A. I have.

Q. Tell us all about that, and when it was.—A. I couldn't tell the date and the month the first time I was in there, but it was this year.

Q. By the way, give the name of your vessel.—A. The schooner Abbie A. Snow.

Q. Go on and state what happened.—A. The captain was taken sick; we went into Shelburne; the cutter wasn't there; the collector of the port told us we would have to enter the vessel; we entered her and he gave us permission to land the captain; then I took her myself, the captain being sick. We went out on the grounds and stopped ten days, and when we came back this cutter was there. We were coming alongside the wharf, as we had done before when we put the captain ashore, but we hadn't anchored when this cutter boarded us and told me to anchor. Very well, we anchored. "Are you master?" he says, and "How many on board?" I told him I was in the room of the master, at present. He asked what the vessel's name was; I told him. Says he, "How many men have you got?" I told him ten. "How many dories?" I told him four. He asked me what I came in for; I told him to fill water and for the captain. He says, "Why didn't you tell me this before, that you came in to get the captain?" Says he, "I want no insolence from you whatever." Said I, "I have given you no insolence." Said I, "You asked me the question how many boats and how many men, and I can't see as I have given you any insolence." "Well," he says, "you treat me as a gentleman, and I'll treat you as a gentleman." Says I, "I have treated you as a gentleman." He says, "I want no insolence from you; you remain on board, and I will go ashore and get the captain, and then you will enter your vessel, and fill your water, and proceed to sea." He says, "Your crew will remain on board until the vessel is entered." By that Captain Gill he came down, and I carried the papers to him, and he entered her and we filled our water and came out. The next trip I went down, which was about three weeks ago—

Q. By the way, do you know the name of the cutter and the captain?—A. Yes, sir; his name was Quigley.

Q. What was the name of the cutter?—A. The Terror.

SECOND CASE OF THE ABBIE A. SNOW.

The next voyage we went down before we were on the fishing ground at all; the weather was bad, and we put into port for shelter.

Q. What port?—A. Shelburne; and he was there. This is the second time that he has boarded us. We went around his stern, and he ordered us to luff up in the wind until he boarded us, and he came aboard and told us we would have to anchor. We went and anchored, and he lay down to a place called Sand Point, three or four miles from the town where the collector's office is, and he ordered us down alongside of him at Sand Point, and he gave me permission to fill some water. We came in in the morning early; hadn't been there twenty-four hours then. When 12 o'clock came and we were down below at dinner, his boat came alongside and told us to fill our water. We went on shore and filled water and came back, and because we didn't get under way right off he told us he wanted us to get out. I told him I wasn't in no hurry about going out. He says, "I am going out, and I want you to go out." "Well," said I, "we have the privilege of staying here twenty-four hours, don't we?" He says, "You have the privilege of staying here for nothing; now, you have filled your water you must go to sea." "Well," says I, "I have entered the vessel, and I don't know what more he wants." Said I, "I ain't in no hurry about going out; I don't want to go out until about dark."

Q. That was the same day you had come in?—A. Yes, sir; we came in about 9 o'clock and entered the vessel about 10 in the forenoon. At last he annoyed us so much that we got under way and went out, and he chased on behind us, and when we got within a quarter of a mile of the light-house we hauled down the jib, hove to, and when we did that he did so, too, and began to man his boat. I didn't want to lay my vessel liable to any seizure or anything, and so I got a little scared and kept her off, and calculated where the three miles was, and hove to there, and then if he took us he might. But after he found we were down off shore he let us alone.

THIRD CASE OF THE ABBIE A. SNOW.

Two nights after we were driven in again by the weather, and this time is where the trouble came.

Q. Did you lose your anchor?—A. No, sir; we just kedged over the bottom and went away from our trawls; it was blowing heavy. This time he came on board himself personally with men with cutlasses and revolvers, and left a guard on board, and then with cutlasses and revolvers took me in the stern of his boat and carried me ashore, entered the vessel, and gave me strict orders to allow no man to go on shore. When we got up to the collector's office he says to the collector, "This man is making this harbor a place to frequent," and he says, "if he comes in here any more I shall put him to a good deal of trouble." He told that to the collector of the port.

Q. That is what the captain of the cutter said to the collector?—A. Yes; "if he comes in here any more I shall put him to a great deal of trouble." So the next morning we got under way. The two times before this that he came on board he had no flag to represent any country or anything else, neither on his vessel nor in the stern of his boat, no flag whatever; I didn't know whether he was a naval officer or a car conductor.

Q. When he brought you back this last time what did you do?—A. We remained there until the next morning, and then got under way and left him.

Q. Was that the last of it?—A. That is the last I saw of him; that was a fortnight ago.

BAIT.

Q. Is it necessary now, in conducting the codfish business, to go into any of these places for bait?—A. No, sir; it is not.

Q. Is it really necessary to go in for any purpose except to find shelter or to repair damages suffered?—A. That is all I know of.

OUTFIT, CAPACITY, ETC., OF THE ABBIE A. SNOW.

Q. How do you get fresh water down there at Sand Point, Shelburne Harbor, for instance?—A. We carry our barrels ashore and get permission to fill them at the wells of private individuals.

Q. How many men do you carry on your vessel?—A. Ten, all told, including the captain.

Q. What is her tonnage?—A. Thirty-four tons.

Q. A small vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

CODFISH.

Q. How many pounds of codfish can you bring from the Banks?—A. She will bring about 50,600 pounds, but we haven't had that many this year; about 40,000 is the highest this year.

Q. How do you cure them on board?—A. We dress them, split them, and put them into the hold, and salt them in barrels.

METHOD OF CURING CODFISH.

Q. Do you kench them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How do fish cured that way compare with those cured on shore, in point of quality?—A. I think they are fully as good, that is, if they have been salted properly.

Q. Do you put on all the salt they will take when you kench them that way?—A. We have a kind of system of so many bushels of salt to what we call a tub of fish.

Q. Does it make a pickle?—A. It makes a pickle itself.

Q. So that when you get home they are in brine, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir; they are in brine.

Q. What is done with them when you get home? Are they treated any further?—A. They are salted in what is called butts—molasses hog-heads.

Q. I suppose that brine drains out and dries the fish?—A. No, sir; the brine is in there and keeps all the time.

Q. How long are they kept in that condition?—A. All the way from a month to two months; some keep them longer, and some shorter, according to the weather.

Q. What is the next step?—A. Then they are washed out and piled about two feet high on what they call water-horses; from the water-horses they go to the flakes and are dried.

Q. You think that a fish treated that way is just as good, if I understand you, as one that, if you had the privilege, you would carry on shore and put on a flake at Sand Point?—A. Yes, sir; they command a higher price in our markets than the dried fish—the way they are dried.

Q. So that, as I understand it, for your business it would be no object to have the right up there at any of those places to go ashore for the purpose of curing your fish?—A. Not one particle, sir.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. How far off shore up in those waters have you done your fishing this year?—A. All the way from ten to fifteen miles, sometimes twenty.

Q. Were there Canadian vessels up there fishing when you were there?—A. No, sir; there were some small boats inshore from us, all the way from three to eight miles off the land, but we didn't fish there.

Q. These small boats up there get the large part of their cod more than three miles out, do they not?—A. I think they catch them outside the three-mile limit. It may be that sometimes in the fall of the year fish will go further in.

FREE FISH.

Q. If I understand you, then, there is nothing of advantage to American fishermen to be had from the Canadian Provinces that would be an equivalent for allowing Canada to have the right to bring her fish into our markets free?—A. No, sir.

Q. You really do not seem to need anything from them, except shelter in stress of weather or in case of damage?—A. That is all, and the privilege of going ashore or making harbor; and then when a vessel is entered in port the crew ought to have permission to go wherever they please if they are in health. All other countries do that, and I don't know why the Dominion of Canada can't. I don't see why she has any more right to prohibit crews of vessels from visiting the shore than any other country.

THE ABBIE A. SNOW'S PAPERS.

Q. Your vessel, I suppose, had only the ordinary fishing papers?—A. That is all; the enrollment and license.

Q. Did you show the visiting officer your papers, or did he demand them?—A. He didn't demand them; I carried them to the custom-house, and the collector looked at the license, but nothing more.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Did you also have a permit to trade?—A. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. JOHN CHISHOLM.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

Capt. JOHN CHISHOLM sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Forty-four.

Q. Where do you live?—A. I live in Gloucester.

Q. Are you a native of the United States?—A. I was born on Cape Breton Island.

Q. Are you naturalized?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been naturalized?—A. Sixteen years.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fishing.

Q. How long have you been engaged in that occupation?—A. Twenty-two years in this country.

Q. Have you lived here all that time?—A. I have lived here the last sixteen years, and off and on before.

Q. What kind of fishing have you been engaged in?—A. Mackerel fishing.

Q. You have not fished for cod?—A. Not much since I have been master.

Q. How long have you been master?—A. Sixteen years.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Where have you fished for mackerel?—A. On the American coast.

Q. Have you fished in the waters of the Gulf of St Lawrence?—A. I did in 1879.

Q. You only fished up there one year?—A. I fished there in 1879, and also a little in 1882 and 1883.

Q. Where did you fish on those three occasions?—A. I fished from the mouth of the Bay of Chaleur, Point Miscou, down to Prince Edward Island.

Q. How far off shore did you conduct your operations?—A. We got all our first fare off shore.

Q. How far off shore?—A. From five to fifteen miles.

DIFFERENT FISHING GROUNDS.

Q. How large was your vessel?—A. Eighty-two tons.

Q. Did you fish with a purse-seine?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Other years when you fished up there where did you catch your fish?—A. We fished there a short time, and caught 130 barrels, most all inshore.

Q. Which year was that?—A. That was in 1882.

Q. Did you go home with only 130 barrels?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What would be a full fare?—A. Four hundred barrels.

Q. Then the third season where did you fish?—A. From Prince Edward's Island to the Strait of Canso, but didn't get any, and came home without any.

Q. About how much did you get for the 130 barrels that you captured in shore that year?—A. About $10 per barrel.

Q. How much profit did you make?—A. I can't tell exactly, for we made up the balance of the trip on the American coast coming home.

Q. When you got back to our coast you struck the fish again?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If you had only got this 130 barrels what kind of a fare would you have made?—A. I would have made a loss.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. From your knowledge of the fishing up there, captain, where do you say the great bulk of the mackerel that are caught by vessel with purse seines are caught, whether inside, or outside the three-mile line?—A. The great bulk is caught outside the three-mile limit; I was there in 1885, and I was there this year.

Q. Where did you fish in 1885?—A. I fished in the bend of the island, on what they call the west shore.

Q. When you fished there in 1885 was it before the first of July, or afterwards?—A. From the first of July until October.

Q. You fished outside of the three miles then, I suppose?—A. We got pretty near a third of our fish inside—what we call inside; I don't know as it was inside.

Q. Did anybody molest you? Were there any Canadian cruisers about there at that time?—A. Not in 1885.

—A. Twenty-one sail, I believe, at one time in 1865; some going and some coming.

Q. Where did they catch the most of their fish?—A. Some got most outside; some caught a few inside, I suppose.

Q. Do you think the right to fish inside the three miles is of any great value to the American fishermen?—A. I don't think it is any at all.

SEINE-FISHING.

Q. They all fish now with seines—without bait and without hook and line?—A. Without hook and line.

Q. I suppose it is much safer, saying nothing of the amount of fish to be caught, to fish off in deep water with those expensive seines, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What is the nationality of the majority of the people on your vessel, these ten men you have?—A. Four are from the Provinces; the rest are from the State of Maine and Gloucester.

Q. Did you pick up those four provincial men in the Provinces?—A. No, sir; I shipped them here; I sent them money in the spring to pay their passage here so as to ship with me.

Q. Are they people you knew?—A. Yes, sir; I knew them before.

Q. Did you send for them in the spring because you understood that you would not be allowed to take them on board up there, or because it was more convenient for your purposes to ship them here?—A. We would rather ship them here, and so I sent them money to bring them here. We are never short of men here; we can ship men here at any time.

OFF-SHORE FISHING.

Q. Where have you fished this year?—A. I fished from 5 to 15 and 20 miles off land.

Q. What land?—A. Prince Edward's Island and Nova Scotia.

Q. Was it codfish you caught this year?—A. No, sir; mackerel.

Q. Have you seen any Canadian vessels fishing this year?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did they chiefly fish—close inshore, or far out, like the rest?—A. They had the privilege of fishing inshore, but most of them fished with the Americans.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. How many trips did you make this season?—A. Two trips.

Q. Up there into those waters?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And all of your fish were taken without the three-mile shore line?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the result of the two trips? How many mackerel did you take?—A. I took 482 barrels the first trip, and 470 this last trip.

Q. And, as I understand you, the two times that you did fish within the three-mile shore line, the first trip you got 130 barrels, and the second you got none.—A. That is right.

BAIT.

Q. Is there any occasion for a cod-fisherman to go into the ports of Canada, except in bad weather, for wood or water or to repair?—A. No, sir.

Q. Can you get bait enough without going there?—A. Most always; they catch their squid on the Banks.

Q. How would clams do if you can get them?—A. The hand-line fishermen always use clams.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. And the trawl fishermen use salt bait, do they?—A. They use fresh bait.

Q. What kind of fishermen use salted bait?—A. Cod-fishermen use salted bait.

Q. They use clams?—A. Yes, sir.

FREE FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. During this year did you have any trouble up there?—A. No, sir.

Q. As a fisherman you do not know of anything that we need of Canada that you would be willing to give her in return for the privilege of sending her fish into our market free?—A. No, sir; I don't know of anything that we want of them.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What are the average wages that fishermen have made every year in the fishery business, year after year, say for the last ten years? I do not mean masters of vessels, but the men themselves.—A. I shouldn't think it would be far from $40 a month.

Q. The year through, or only during the fishing season?—A. The fishing season.

Q. Which is seven or eight months?—A. Seven months and a half for mackerel fishing.

Q. Do most of these from Gloucester sail on shares?—A. They all sail on shares.

CANADIAN METHODS CONTRASTED WITH AMERICAN.

Q. How does the cost of the outfit of an American fishing vessel compare with the cost of the outfit of a Canadian fishing vessel?—A. We feed our men better, and we pay them in cash as soon as the fish are weighed off; but down there the vessel-owners have stores and they pay their men out of the stores the year round.

Q. And have a big profit on the goods?—A. They have two profits, the cash price and the retail price.

Q. Does the Canadian fisherman have to wait for his money until the cargo is sold?—A. They have to wait; they settle only once a year.

Q. And the American fisherman is paid as soon as his trip is ended?—A. Every trip he is paid in cash.

CANADIAN WAGES.

Q. About curing the fish; do not Canadian people employ very much cheaper labor to cure their fish than Americans?—A. Yes, sir; it is cheaper.

Q. Do they employ women and children?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At how much per hour?—A. They probably pay a woman a shilling a day.

Q. What do you pay her?—A. We pay a woman 25 to 30 cents an hour on the wharf here.

CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. Do the Canadian vessels cost less than yours?—A. They can be built there at from $18 to $20 a ton; we have got to pay $45 a ton.

Q. And yours will cost about $100 a ton to fit for sea?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And theirs will cost about $60 a ton to fit for sea?—A. Yes, sir; and they receive a bounty.

BOUNTY.

Q. How much bounty do the Canadian fishermen receive?—A. I can't say; I think it is $1.80 a ton.

Q. The boatmen receive a bounty, too, do they not?—A. Yes, sir; as soon as they can prove that they have landed 1,200 pounds of fish.

PRIVILEGE OF LANDING IN CANADA.

Q. As a matter of fact, has there been any necessity whatever during the last 15 years for our fishermen to use the Canadian shores for drying purposes?—A. No, sir.

Q. So that that is a privilege which now is of no use?—A. No use. The fish have got to be salted before they are cured, and they are salted aboard the vessels.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES.

Q. You sell your fish here to the wholesaler?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. During the last 15 years has the business been profitable?—A. No, sir; the business has not been profitable.

Q. Take the whole 15 years together, have your vessels netted 10 per cent.; that is, 10 per cent. over and above insurance, deterioration, and everything?—A. No; I don't think they have.

RELATIVE COST OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You were speaking of the cost of construction of vessels in Canada and here. I think I understood you to say that the cost of a Canadian vessel was $25 to $30 per ton; that is for the hull, I suppose?—A. For the hull and spars.

Q. What do you say it would cost here?—A. Forty to forty-five dollars a ton.

Q. What is the reason for this difference in the cost of construction? Is it because our vessels are better built, or because the materials entering into the construction of them are subjected to duty in this country?—A. Labor is higher here, and we have got to pay for protection on the manila and everything.

Q. Is it, or not, true that the American fishing vessels are better finished and have more work expended upon them?—A. It may be so, and they may last longer, but for their purposes the British vessel is just as good.

Q. Then another item is the difference in cost of labor in curing the fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You say they employ women and children?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If the same class of labor in curing fish was employed here, what would the difference be principally? Would the difference in cost be so great as it is?—A. I don't know.

FISH CAUGHT IN AMERICAN AND CANADIAN WATERS.

Q. What proportion of the fish that are brought into this market do you estimate are caught in British waters?—A. I couldn't answer that very well. The large part of the mackerel this year have been caught in British waters; that is, beyond American waters. There are no cod-fish hardly caught in the British waters this year.

Q. Do you know anything about the proportion of salt and fresh fish that come into these markets?—A. No, sir; I do not.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. SYLVANUS SMITH.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

Capt. SYLVANUS SMITH sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Fifty-eight.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. In Gloucester.

Q. You have lived here a long time?—A. I am a native of the Cape, and I have lived here in this town thirty years.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I am carrying on the fishing business at present.

Q. Do you mean as master of a vessel?—A. No, sir; as owner and fitter. I was master of a vessel seventeen years, fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Q. Do you buy and sell fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And fit out vessels?—A. I own a fleet of vessels, and buy to some extent outside of the fish that my own vessels catch.

Q. How many vessels have you?—A. I have 13 at present.

Q. Have you ever been a fisherman yourself?—A. I went until I was 35 years of age; I began when I was 10 years old; I was master for 17 years.

Q. And you quit fishing what year?—A. In 1864.

TREATY OF 1854.

Q. Then you had experience in fishing both before the reciprocity treaty of 1854 and during its existence?—A. I was fishing in the Bay of St. Lawrence in 1849, and all the time after that until 1864.

Q. What was the effect of the treaty of 1854 on the American fishing interest?—A. Well, I don't know as there was any particular effect on it at all. There was some little point about the privilege we had in the fall of the year, in windy weather, of going into harbor, if we got a deal of fish, to cure them. Before the treaty they didn't allow us to do so. I never caught many fish inshore; very few were caught where I fished.

Q. Were you fishing for cod in those days?—A. I was cod-fishing on our shore the fore part of the year; after July we changed our business and went to mackerel fishing; that was the general custom at the time.

Q. But so far as the right to catch fish inside of the three miles was concerned, the treaty of 1854 made no practical difference?—A. I don't think it made much difference; occasionally there would be some fish inshore, and where they fished it might have affected them. Where I fished, mostly around the Magdalens, we fished where we were a mind to. In the fall sometimes the fish would get near the shore around Cape Breton, and there would be some days that the fish would be inshore; that would be along from the middle of October until November. The rest of the year the fish were mostly offshore.

INSHORE FISHERIES.

Q. Taking the general run of the year, in and out for ten or twenty years together, according to your observation and experience, the value of the inshore fishing is very small, is it not?—A. It is very small; that is, to a master of a vessel and fitter; I have been having vessels running since that time.

Q. While the treaty of 1871 was in operation, what occasion was there for fishermen to fish within three miles on those shores; how much practical advantage was that?—A. It wasn't any to me. I had several vessels along there during those years, and they made a failure of it, and came home to fish on our shores. Previous to this year, for the last ten years, mackerel have been plentiful on our shores; this year it has been almost a total failure; some few that went into the Bay didn't get anything.

PURSE-SEINES.

Q. Do your knowledge and information cause you to agree in opinion with the other gentlemen whom you have heard—and in fact with all the people we have seen, from Provincetown up—as to where the great bulk of the mackerel, take it year in and year out, caught in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, that they are caught outside of the three miles with purse-seines?—A. When I went there fishing we caught ours, as I say, outside the three miles; but I never went seining; knowing the character of the bottom there I shouldn't suppose it would be practicable to fish with a seine.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. You fished with hook and line?—A. With hook and line. I shouldn't suppose it would be practicable to fish with a seine there; it has a very rocky bottom and shoal water.

CURING FISH ASHORE.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Perhaps you have been along those shores up there enough to know whether or not they are occupied now by people?—A. I think it is pretty well settled all around the coast, so far as I know.

Q. In that case, under the old treaty, the question might arise whether you would be obliged to arrange with the shore-men for labor in drying your fish or anything else that you wanted done on shore, or otherwise it might be an invasion of the rights of private property.—A. That mode of fishing has much changed. There are no fish cured ashore; it is a thing of the past; I don't think there has been anything of the kind for thirty years.

Q. Are there not some cured ashore at St. Pierre?—A. Those are cured by the natives there, not by Americans.

KENCH-CURED AND PICKLE-CURED FISH.

Q. What do you think of the value, respectively, of shore-cured fish as compared with those that are kench-cured, as it is called I believe, and brought home and pickled?—A. For our market here their fish haven't much value. We have what we call the pickle-cured fish; that is what suits our market. Their market is more for the Brazils and West India market, and the foreign trade generally.

Q. How are they, in respect of quality, as a good food?—A. They are good food enough for the climate they go into, but they are not good for our trade here.

Q. What I want to get at is this: Assume that you keep house, or at least eat meals somewhere; if you want to have to-morrow morning for your breakfast the best possible salt codfish, would you have a good St. Pierre cured fish, or a kench-cured fish?—A. If I was going down to my warehouse to take out fish I should take out a Georges pickle-cured fish. In no case would I take a St. Pierre fish to carry it away because it is not the kind of fish that I want at all. They do cure some for table use to cut up and eat raw; sometimes a few are used that way.

Q. For the general consumption of people who eat fish you think the method of kench curing is just as good as any other?—A. We have no call in our trade for any other kind.

Q. Now come to exportation. The drier the salt fish is, I suppose the better it will bear a warm and humid climate?—A. They have to be dry-cured for exportation.

Q. Can you treat these kench-cured fish when you get them here at Gloucester in such a way that they could be sent to the West Indies or to the East Indies and not spoil?—A. They have to go through the process of pressing and drying more. One way would be to put them into brine in butts; the other way is to wash and dry them and put them out on the flakes several times in order to get the requisite dryness. At times we make large quantities for the Boston market; they are made by the same process that they make them at St. Pierre and Nova Scotia. I think they make a specialty of that, and I think the fish of that class are fully better than ours, because they make a large quantity of fish that way, and it is not often we make them. Sometimes when the market is poor we have a call from Boston.

Q. There is nothing in the fact that you bring them in in brine?—A. Our fish are handled in the same way that theirs are until they are brought ashore.

DUN FISH.

Q. Are these particular kind of fish we have been speaking of called the dun fish?—A. No; it is the age that gives the name of dun.

Q. Take a dry-cured fish and put it through the process, and it then becomes the dun fish?—A. It would after it had the age on it.

RECIPROCITY.

Q. From your observation what advantage would it be to the fishing interests of the United States to make this sort of an exchange between the United States and Canada: Canada to give us the right to cure fish on her shores, the right to ship fish by rail, the right to fish within her three mile shore line, the right to buy bait, tobacco, and everything else required by the fishermen; we, in return, to give the provincial men

BAIT.

Q. For the cod-fisheries, do you want to go there now for bait?—A. I have some seven or eight vessels that have been cod-fishing this year, and I think they have not been to the provincial ports at all for bait; they have caught most of their bait on the Banks.

Q. Have you generally sent out a quantity of clam bait?—A. We haven't fished that way, but we used to years ago.

Q. Clams are used on trawls?—A. Not a great deal.

Q. What do you use on trawls?—A. Sometimes we carry salt herring and mackerel, and they fish with what they call shack, and birds, too. I had a vessel that went this year that way—cut up small fish and anything of that kind for bait. Buying bait is a thing that has come up more recently. Vessels used to go to the Banks with salt bait, and fish with clams or with birds and shack and such bait as they could take from the fish. Some ten or fifteen years ago the vessels began to go in on the Bank trips and get their bait in Newfoundland. I am speaking more particularly of the Grand Banks. But I doubt if that has been any benefit to us. We have paid out a large amount of money there, while the Cape Cod vessels that have pursued the old way of fishing have made better voyages, I think, than ours have, because they have saved large expense; and if we are unable to get our bait there, there has been the case for some time, we will go back to the old method and adapt ourselves to circumstances.

Q. There is bait enough to be caught in our waters, is there not, taking clams, menhaden, and what herring we have?—A. We have no trouble in baiting our vessels without going there to buy it. The vessels have in past years often gone in there just because it has been the custom, and some of them started this year the same way, but after they found that they were prohibited from going in for bait they have adapted themselves to circumstances, and have got bait on our own coast and on the Banks.

Q. And I suppose it is rather a temptation, when there is the right of free entry, to the fishermen, because they rather like to go ashore at a pleasant little village and have a good little time?—A. We think that operates against us as owners.

SEIZURES.

Q. Have any of your fleet been molested or disturbed in any way since the expiration of the treaty?—A. None of my own fleet particularly. The Adams was a vessel from my wharf; she was owned by her captain.

Q. Where is the captain of the Adams?—A. The captain was not aboard at the time; it was Captain Lewis who was aboard. But both the captains are away.

Q. And none of the vessels in which you have an interest were disturbed?—A. I have had five vessels fishing in the Bay of St. Lawrence this year for the first time for several years. My fishermen have fished on this coast for mackerel for several years, but in the absence of mackerel on this coast they have had to go into the Bay with the rest of them. I have been advised that they got their fish, all of them, from 6 to 10 and 15 miles offshore, and, so far as cutters were concerned, they hardly saw one. They hadn't any occasion to go inshore, and, on the whole, they thought it was an advantage to be prohibited from going inshore.

COST OF VESSELS AND OUTFITS.

Q. About how many men compose the crews of your vessels?—A. Fifteen to eighteen in each.

Q. What would be about the average tonnage?—A. Seventy-five to eighty tons.

Q. What would be the average cost of those vessels, hull and spars?—A. Hull, spars, and sails, about $8,000 for mine.

Q. How much does the outfit cost?—A. About $2,500 to $3,000 with the seines.

LIFE OF SEINES.

Q. How long will one of these purse-seines last?—A. About 2 years, I should say.

Q. Then they get rotten?—A. Then they get rotten. They are made of very fine twine, and some portions of them have to be rounded in that time; perhaps in one season some portion will give out.

Q. Even when the net has met with no serious accident?—A. Yes, sir. Perhaps a third of it would have to be taken out the second year, out of the middle of it, the bunt.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What is the nationality of your crews?—A. From observation I should think about one-third are foreigners of different countries, and two-thirds American. I speak more particularly of the seining vessels. I think the seine fishermen are more largely American than the cod-fishermen; perhaps half of the cod-fishermen are Americans.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. And two-thirds in mackerel fishing?—A. Yes, sir. I have got one man that has about the whole of his crew Americans.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. I am taking it at large.—A. Taking it on an average.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON PRICES.

Q. Has there been any change in the retail prices of salt fish, so far as you have observed, which you can refer to the fact that a duty has been put on since 1885?—A. I don't know about the retail price; I am only familiar with the wholesale. So far as my knowledge goes, I know no difference.

Q. What has been the effect on the wholesale prices?—A. The duty went on a year ago last July; I think the price of codfish is about 25 per cent. lower than a year ago last July. As to mackerel, there has been a very short catch of mackerel, so few that there has been quite a large advance in price.

Q. Has the advance gone up quite beyond the duty?—A. You might say there has been comparatively no mackerel; there has been none on this coast; and, altogether, there has been a short catch, so that the duty has not affected it.

Q. Did you notice any sudden rise immediately after the 1st of July, 1885, in the wholesale prices of any kind of fish, as a consequence of the duty going on at that time?—A. There has been no rise in fish on that account.

Q. None of you dealers put up your prices on account of that fact?—A. No; it has been the other way. We had laid in large stocks of fish, the general impression being that we might get some advance, but it went the other way; it was ruinous, and our prices have gone down to almost nothing; that is, where fish fetched two years ago $3.50 a quintal, the price went down to $1.75; that is, while the duty was on, the price was $3.50, and the same fish went down to $1.75 and $2 for 114 pounds.

EFFECT OF QUALITY ON PRICES.

Q. How was the mackerel catch last year?—A. It was quite large last year. There is another thing that has affected the price, and that is the quality. Last year they were No. 2, and small ones at that, and the price was very low; this year the mackerel that have been caught are very large and of better quality. So that a portion of the advance in price has been due to quality.

Q. But the quantity has been much diminished?—A. Very much diminished; the catch has been very small. The statistics of the Fish Bureau show that.

FRESH AND SALT FISH.

Q. Where do you sell the most of your salt fish?—A. I sell mine on the markets here, to the dealers mostly.

Q. You do not ship to distant points?—A. Not to any great extent.

Q. Do you deal in fresh fish at all?—A. No more than that my vessels go fresh-fishing and their fish are sold to the dealers in Boston; that is all.

LAY.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. I would like to have you give the exact lay of the fishing business with your sailors, you own so many vessels.—A. In hand-line fishing each man has his own fish, and one man can make a large trip while another man will make quite a small one. Then they have what they call a half-line. The crew pay the cook's wages, the ice and the bait, and perhaps some other little bills, which are called stock charges. After those stock charges are taken out the rest is divided amongst the crew according to their catch.

Q. How divided? What proportion of the whole catch does the whole crew get—half?—A. One-half of their own catch; half of each man's catch. After taking out the stock charges the crew gets one-half of the whole.

Q. Then each man has of that half the proportion that he takes with his line?—A. Yes, sir. Among trawl fishermen some go that way, and some heave altogether and then average.

Q. Now mackerel.—A. In the mackerel fishery, taking the average of mackerel sold here and put into barrels, the barrels have to come out of the stock; some few other little trivial charges come out of the stock, and out of the remainder comes the cook's wages and the crew's half, and the rest is divided equally amongst them, the owners paying the master his commission. His lay is a percentage on stock, of 4 to 6 per cent., whatever he may ship for.

Q. That comes out of the owner?—A. That comes out of the owner.

Q. The owner furnishes the vessel and outfit, seines, &c.?—A. He furnishes everything.

Q. Insurance and everything of that kind?—A. Everything of that kind.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What are the average annual earnings of these fishermen?—A. I have not looked it up, but I should say that during the last two years $200 would be about an average.

PROFITS AND LOSSES.

Q. What have been, during the last ten or fifteen years, the average profits of your vessels engaged in that business?—A. I haven't figured it up that way. I know the average profits have been very small, and I believe it has been the other way.

Q. Losses?—A. There have been losses; during the last five or six years more particularly we lost. I can explain that in this way: Previous to the treaty of Washington the Canadian fleet was small, and the general business of this country of course was better. We then got some profit from our business. After the treaty of Washington had been in force some three or four or five years we began to feel the effect of their competition, in our cod-fishing more particularly; it has been ruinous to us, and I don't know but it has been so to them. They have a very large fleet of vessels, some 300 or 400 sail, I understand, and the business since then has been very poor. A great many people have gone out of the business, and some fishing towns have almost gone out of it.

CANADIAN COMPETITION.

Q. What is the reason you cannot compete with them?—A. Cheap labor is one thing. Five or six years ago—I don't know just the date—fish were quite high; every Nova Scotia banker that came here with fish sold them on the market without paying duty, and every man who was a carpenter went to the woods and got out wood to build a vessel with, so that every spring there were from 50 to 75 new vessels launched. Those vessels were built of spruce and cheap qualities of hard wood and were got up in every way cheap as to material. Those vessels were fitted out and manned. Of course their men went on the lay the same as ours, but they were fitted out cheaper. The iron, manila, and such stuff that went into the construction made their vessels cheaper. Then began the labor of curing fish. They hire their labor very cheap; our labor is costly, while theirs is of almost nominal value. The whole business is expensive with us compared with what it is with them. Our local taxation, as well as national, is high, and it has all got to come out of the proceeds of the business somewhere.

FREE FISH.

Q. Is it possible for Canada to give the fishermen of this country anything that you would regard as an equivalent for allowing her to come in here free of duty?—A. I can't see where there is anything.

Q. You do not know of anything you want?—A. I do not. All I should ask, as a vessel-owner, would be civilized treatment of our

SALT AND FRESH FISH.

Q. As a matter of fact, has not the immense increase in the consumption and sale of fresh fish injured the market for salt fish?—A. I think it has to some extent.

Q. Is not that fresh fish consumption increasing very rapidly?—A. I think it is increasing very fast; it is going to be a large business in the future. I think the fisheries in future will be the great business.

FROZEN FISH.

Q. As you understand, the fresh fish come in free and are frozen?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you want duty on fresh fish as well as salt?—A. I should think it would be very desirable. When a large quantity of fresh fish comes in they are put into houses and frozen, and they come in here very largely in the spring of the year. All down about the Bay of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Chaleur there are establishments that put up fish and send them into our markets, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and all the business centers, in a frozen state. Those fish are purchased, and increase to some extent the market, and are displacing salt fish.

RENEWAL OF THE TREATY OF 1870.

Q. Taking into consideration the greatly increased consumption of fresh fish and the improved means of preserving them fresh, what, in your opinion, would be the influence upon the fishery business of the United States of a renewal of the treaty of 1870 for ten or fifteen years to come?—A. I think that the renewal of the treaty would be very discouraging and very disastrous to our business. Canadian vessels wear out a good deal quicker than ours. After the treaty of 1855 expired their fleet almost went out of existence. They built more vessels afterwards for the fishing business. These they have now will soon wear out. If the business continues with a treaty, they will build up a larger fleet, and the consequence will be that ours will decrease in the same proportion that theirs will increase. This is what is shown by statistics.

Q. And the result will be that they will get the benefit of increased consumption and increased markets, instead of us getting it?—A. Yes, sir. I think their cheaper labor will do the business in the future with free markets. A good many fishing towns in this country went out of business, finding it impracticable to carry it on under the treaty of Washington.

DEPRESSED PRICES.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Is the very low price of fish now attributable, in your opinion, to the fact that less fish product is consumed in the United States than in former years, or to the fact that there is an excess of supply beyond demand for consumption?—A. I think the fresh fish has partly taken the place of salt fish, and then the large amount that has been put on the market is another element. There has been a large supply. Then perhaps there are some other influences, among which may be named the general depression of the business of the country. That, I think, would point towards a cause for the difference.

WAGES vs. LAY.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. At Provincetown and some other points we find on inquiry that the fishermen have demanded wages when for some years before they had been going on a lay. Whether or not the tendency of competition with Canada and a free market here will not be generally to cause the fishermen to demand monthly wages instead of a lay?—A. In the Bank fishing I don't think we could run our business except on the lay principle; the men must be partners in the voyage to make it successful.

Q. I was not asking as to the owners; I was asking whether or not the tendency of a free market for Canada and free and open competition with her would not make the business of fishing so uncertain that it would have a tendency to make the sailors demand wages instead of lay?—A. I think if the low prices continue as they are now they will have to have wages or else go out of the business.

Q. I want to go one step further: If the result is that the fishermen will demand wages instead of a lay, what will be the influence of that upon the owners of vessels?—A. We shall have to get out of the business.

Senator FRYE. That is what I supposed.

THE CASE OF THE D. J. ADAMS.

The WITNESS. I would like to make one little statement in regard to the Adams. While the Adams was tied to my wharf there was also a Nova Scotia schooner tied to the same wharf. We had had the Nova Scotiaman's fish several years under the old treaty, and he had come for such supplies and bait as he wanted. In the spring of the year we have our frozen bait, and our bankers take their supply of bait; and there was quite a number of Nova Scotia vessels came across here to get their bait for their Bank voyages. While he was taking his bait here and such supplies as he wanted the Adams lay to the same wharf—my wharf. Very naturally when the Adams went away on her next trip her captain had the impression that he was entitled to the same privileges down there that the Nova Scotia vessel had here. Having seen the Nova Scotia vessel take bait and other supplies here he went down into that port and took some small amount of bait there. In the early part of the year it was the general impression that our vessels were entitled to that privilege. Afterwards they learned differently and have kept away from there, and have had no cause to go there. The Adams had no need to go there, but that was one of the places she had been frequenting for bait and the captain of course thought he might as well go there for bait as anywhere else; he didn't know of any restrictions; he thought it was a mere matter of trade, that it was not fishing; and several of their vessels had been in our port here he thought he had the same right to go there.

HERRING.

Q. As a matter of fact, whenever we have obtained bait there we have bought it; we have not undertaken to catch it?—A. Yes, sir; we always buy bait in Newfoundland and Grand Manan.

Q. About this herring fishery, have our vessels for the last ten years engaged in that at all?—A. Not in the salt herring fishery; not to catch them, but to buy them, that is all. I don't think there are any vessels go from this port, unless it is in the fall of the year. The boats off the harbor catch them here. But the business of going into the provincial waters for herring is not pursued here.

Q. It is not pursued in the United States anywhere, is it?—A. No, sir. In 1854 and 1855 we used to go to the Magdalens for herring. I have been several voyages. But that was a poor quality of fish, and of late years there hasn't been any of that kind of fishing done.

Q. Our vessels simply go up there and purchase their bait?—A. They simply go on trading voyages.

Q. Do we have the same kind of herring in our waters that they have?—A. I don't know any difference. Sometimes on the Labrador coast they get fat herring. I don't know much about the salt herring, for I haven't had much to do with it.

RATIO OF FISH CAUGHT IN AMERICAN WATERS TO THOSE CAUGHT IN CANADIAN WATERS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You attribute the decline in the price of fish partly to the sale of fresh fish in our markets. What proportion of these fresh fish that are sold in our markets are caught in American waters, and what in British waters?—A. I haven't got much means of knowing, because their fresh fish go to the Western cities and New York and Philadelphia, and I don't know much about the quantity that goes there. We have but few here. We have had some few halibut trips landed here and sold to the dealers here, but otherwise I couldn't tell much about the proportion. I know at certain times of the year we have large quantities of fish come in from across the Lakes and New Brunswick, but I have no statistics as to the quantity.

Q. Do you know what proportion of the fish caught in American waters are sold as fresh fish?—A. No, I haven't any statistics on that; I couldn't say.

EXPORTATION OF FISH TO CANADA.

Q. You are engaged in the fish business; do you ever ship any fish to Canada?—A. I never did.

Q. Do you know whether or not there are any quantities shipped from the United States to Canada?—A. I shouldn't suppose there was. Some fish may be shipped up into Canada West; some of the Boston people may ship some there, but I shouldn't suppose to a very large extent. I don't know in regard to that.

EXTENT OF GLOUCESTER'S TRADE.

Q. What proportion of the fleet at this place is engaged in the mackerel fishery, as compared with the whole?—A. I should think about one-third.

Q. And the residue?—A. That is engaged in cod-fishing and catching bank halibut. I should say that there are some forty or fifty sail in the halibut fishery on the Georges and other Banks.

PROVINCIAL COMPETITION.

Q. Do the fisheries of the Provinces that are brought into competition with us apply to all kinds of fish, or simply to codfish and mackerel?—A. I think to all kinds. They send in a good many halibut, which they land on their shores and send by steamer to Boston. Last spring there was quite a large amount of fresh fish sent that way. I know at one time quite a large quantity.

WINTER FISHING.

Q. Is there any considerable proportion of your vessels engaged in winter fishing?—A. Most of my vessels are engaged in winter business on Georges Bank and up there. They take their bait here and go to the banks and back without making port.

THE RATTLER.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Do you know anything about the schooner Rattler that had some trouble up there? In the papers I have here she is said to belong to Gloucester.—A. I know the vessel and captain. I don't know any of the facts.

Q. Is the captain here?—A. I think not. Most of our mackerel captains are away.

THE HOWARD HOLBROOK.

Q. Is the schooner Howard Holbrook of this place?—A. She belongs to Howard & McKenzie of this place.

Q. She is not here?—A. She is not here.

THE HIGHLAND LIGHT.

Q. Do you know the Highland Light?—A. That belongs on Cape Cod somewhere.

Senator EDMUNDS. I see now; she belongs to Wellfleet.

THE A. R. CRITTENDEN.

Q. Then there is the A. R. Crittenden that is said to be of this port.—A. That belongs to Captain Chisholm.

Senator EDMUNDS. He did not tell us about that. Are any of the people present who were on board of her?

Captain CHISHOLM. The agent is here.

NUMBER OF GLOUCESTER VESSELS ENGAGED IN FISHING.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What is the number of vessels sailing from this port engaged in this business?—A. The whole number is about 440.

TESTIMONY OF SYLVESTER CUNNINGHAM.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 4, 1886.

SYLVESTER CUNNINGHAM sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Thirty-six.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. Gloucester.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fishing business and shipping fish.

Q. Are you the owner of any vessels?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many?—A. Ten.

Q. What kind of fishing are they engaged in?—A. They are engaged in the Georges fishery—mackerel and halibut.

Q. How long have you been in this business?—A. Thirteen years, as partner.

Q. Have you ever been a fisherman yourself?—A. No, sir.

Q. Your information about where the fish are caught, and all that, is derived from the reports of your captains, I suppose?—A. Entirely.

MACKEREL.

Q. Taking the mackerel fishery to begin with, during the time you have been in the business where have they been caught?—A. Until this year about all our mackerel have been caught on this shore. Whenever our vessels have been in provincial waters it has been very discouraging business; there have been no mackerel there of any amount, and, as a rule, what they caught were of very poor quality indeed. We have made a loss every year by sending vessels to the provincial waters. This year's catch on our shore has been almost a total failure, and our vessels have fished almost altogether in provincial waters since spring.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Whereabouts in provincial waters were those trips made which were failures before?—A. On very nearly the same ground they are fishing this year—Prince Edward Island and the Magdalens.

Q. They are fishing this year outside the provincial maritime line, of course?—A. Yes, sir.

THREAT OF SEIZURE.

Q. Have any of your vessels experienced any difficulties or unfair treatment?—A. No, we haven't had any reported at all. As a sample of what we have to contend with there I will state that I had a letter the other day from a man saying that if I didn't send him some $12 or $15 he should report one of our vessels for having landed a man, and have her seized.

FREE FISH.

Q. From your knowledge and observation in this business, how do you regard the value to Americans of fishing inshore, as compared with the value to Canadians of free fish, both salt and fresh?—A. It has no value essentially. It would be a convenience to do away with all these restrictions, but they have got nothing to offer us for free fish that has cash value. They can only offer us what would be a convenience.

Q. You do not regard the inshore fishery as of any practical consequence?—A. It is nothing we should be willing to pay anything for.

BAIT.

Q. How is it in respect of the question of bait?—A. The privilege of buying bait there is something we can do away with entirely. We have been in the habit more or less of running our halibut vessels into Nova Scotia and taking bait, but they can just as well take their bait from here; that is a mere custom, and not a necessity.

HALIBUT.

Q. Where is the halibut fishing chiefly conducted?—A. In what we call the Western Banks and the Grand Banks. All the halibut are caught perhaps from 80 to 100 miles from any shore, and sometimes several hundred miles. It is deep-sea fishing, or, rather, it is on the Banks a long distance from shore.

CODFISH.

Q. Now we will come to the cod fishery. Where are the cod that you have operated in caught chiefly?—A. They are caught on Georges Banks; that is a fishery that Gloucester has practically a monopoly of; that is about 130 miles from our Cape here.

Q. How many miles is it to the Grand Banks?—A. To the western edge of the Grand Banks it is about 750 miles, I think, and to the eastern edge it is about 900.

PORT PRIVILEGES.

Q. Take your Canadian Banks, the Grand Banks, and all the Banks that are off those British Provinces, and that are a long way from here; what is the necessity for fishing vessels having any right to enter the ports of Newfoundland? Is there any necessity, and if so, what is it for your vessels on the Grand Banks to go to the nearest British ports of Newfoundland, or wherever, otherwise than in case of storm or disaster, or to get wood and water?—A. Our Grand Banks fishermen during the last ten years have made a number of trips to Newfoundland for bait only, small herring or something of the kind, and it has been a disputed question for us whether it has not been an expensive business for us. It takes a great deal of time, and it causes a delay sometimes of three weeks, and sometimes they don't get bait; and they spend longer time than they need to sometimes, and we don't see that they get any more fish than those vessels that lie on the Bank and fish with other bait. So that we had about come to the conclusion before the expiration of this treaty that it was much better for our vessels to avoid going in for fresh bait. We think there is no necessity for it whatever.

BAIT.

Q. Do you get any squid on the Grand Banks?—A. Yes, sir; but at certain times the squid fail. A vessel arrived here a few days ago that didn't take any bait with her when she sailed from here, but she caught her squid there and caught her fish, and made a very short trip and a very good one; she made no delay at all.

Q. Is it usual for your vessels to go out without any bait at all?—A. No, but this vessel relied on squid and found plenty of them.

Q. She took that chance?—A. Yes, sir. The bait question would settle itself very quickly. We could very soon find a way to bait our vessels without any Canadian help whatever.

DUTY.

Q. Was there any rise in prices when the duty went on on the 1st of July, 1835, as a consequence of the expiration of the treaty?—A. There was a decline immediately, and has been a gradual decline from that time to the present. The price of fish is so low now that if we should allow Canadian fish to come in free, our vessels would not sail. The price is very low.

Q. We must hope that this is exceptional. What we want to get at is a broader period of time so as to calculate the average.—A. There has been a very low price, for codfish especially, ever since the abrogation of the treaty, extremely low. Mackerel are very high this year, but that is easily accounted for. The catch of mackerel to date is 56,000 barrels against, I think it was, 280,000 barrels last year and 330,000 barrels the year previous. So that accounts for the prices of mackerel.

COST OF VESSELS AND OUTFIT.

Q. How many vessels are you connected with in one way and another?—A. We only own ten. Of course, we handle the fish of a great many others; we buy a great many fish.

Q. Take those vessels that you own to begin with, what is their cost? The WITNESS. What would be their cost to-day?

Senator EDMUNDS. No; I mean the cost of building them and fitting them out.

A. The vessels would cost about $7,500 to $8,000, and it would cost about $2,500 more to fit them.

Q. They are about 75-ton vessels on an average?—A. About that, yes.

CREWS, AND THEIR NATIONALITY.

Q. What is the composition of their crews, and about how many men to a vessel?—A. They will average fourteen.

Q. What is the nationality of the crews?—A. Of course, I have no statistics.

Q. I mean your general idea; you see the men more or less.—A. I should think they were about one-half native born, and about one-fourth naturalized.

Q. And the other one-fourth foreigners of one sort and another?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of what nationality are the foreigners mostly?—A. We have quite a large number of Scandinavians; then we have quite a proportion from the Dominion, all along from Newfoundland up; and there are a few, not so many, Portuguese who come to the Georges fisheries. The south of Europe furnishes them.

Q. The Scandinavians have their homes here?—A. Yes, sir. The Dominion people also have homes here; it is the younger and more adventurous of them who come here, because they can have the handling of their own money and have a good time, but part of the time they go back home in the winter. It is only a question of a very few years before they are permanent citizens here. Of course no man can go as master until he is naturalized, so that is a constant incentive to them to become naturalized. And taking those that are masters, with those who want to become masters and have been masters, it makes a very large number of American citizens.

Q. Like candidates for office?—A. Yes, sir. So that a large proportion become naturalized citizens in a short time.

COMPENSATION OF CANADIAN FISHERMEN.

Q. Do you know how the business is conducted in the Dominion between the fishermen and the people who employ them?—A. I know in a general way. The bankers especially come in and land their fish; the fish are not weighed as they are taken out and cured; the men keep fishing the whole season, and their families keep drawing from the stores. So that before those fish are marketed and the voyage is ready to be settled the men are ready to start again, and by that time the store account has used up pretty much everything the men have earned.

Q. So that in substance they get store pay only?—A. Yes, sir. I suppose they get money enough to pay for what they actually have to have in the way of fuel and a few things like that, but practically they take the whole of it from the store. Here the codfish are landed and weighed in two hours from the time they are landed, and immediately every man goes in and takes his check.

COMPENSATION OF AMERICAN FISHERMEN.

Q. And about what do your crews make per year, taking a ten years' average?—A. The different kinds of fish share a little differently, but I should think it might make an average of $300 for the twelve months.

EXPORTATION OF FISH TO CANADA.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Where do you sell your fish principally, in this market?—A. No, sir. We buy largely outside. Our shipping business is a prominent feature of our trade.

Q. Do you sell to other countries?—A. No, sir; we market in the United States.

Q. Do you ship none to Canada?—A. We never ship any to Canada. There is a little trade with the border towns, but it is very small, and we have never done any of it.

COMPARATIVE COST OF AMERICAN AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. You have been in this business so long I would like for you to state a little more in detail the elements of the cost of Canadian outfits, wages, the profit to be made out of it by the Canadian fishermen, the cost of vessels, wages, supplies, taxes, &c., as compared with the like elements on our side. Make, in as condensed a way as you can, a comparative statement of the conditions that enter into that part of the problem.—A. Of course the first item is the cost of the vessel itself, which is about one-third less in Canada than here. Then there is a very large proportion of everything that we put on board the vessel that is dutiable. We did have a drawback on our salt. Of course in a series of years the duty makes a large difference in the expense of running the business. Then their system with their men makes a great difference.

Q. Take the articles that enter into ship-building, your cordage or manila; is that rope made in this country?—A. Yes, sir; it is manufactured here, but the raw material is imported with quite a large duty. Senator EDMUNDS. If it is real manila hemp it must be.

The WITNESS. We use the very best manila.

Q. The iron, bolts, and all that sort of thing are made here?—A. Yes, sir.

DUTY.

Q. When you speak of duties you assume that the price is increased on account of there being a duty on iron and iron manufactures?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But if the manufacture of iron in this country had reached a point where the market was fully supplied, or oversupplied, as it is with cod-fish, then why would not the duty drop out of consideration with reference to fish?—A. It would. It is only a question whether we have to pay more. The theory of the thing I don't care for.

Q. If you were to-day about to fit out a ship, and sent to Liverpool or London to buy your cordage, and there was no duty on it, how much less could you get it for than you can now?—A. I really couldn't tell you the difference. I know about what the duty is, and we simply claim that if the average duty on what we use is to be taken, we feel that we ought to be classed with the rest in a general way.

Q. That I agree to entirely, but I am getting at the statistical fact of the prices. Now take the bolts, spikes, anchors, and everything that enters into the iron-work of a vessel, do you know whether the same sort of things and of the same quality could be bought any cheaper in London than they can in New York or Philadelphia?—A. There are some things I don't know and some I do. For instance, I know a few years ago we bought our fish-hooks—not a very large item in amount—from Scotland. I think the duty was then about 45 per cent. ad valorem, and yet the Scotchmen shipped them over to us and they cost us duty paid less than the price we could buy them for here. But in the articles you mention, a good many of them, I am not able to say whether the duty makes much difference in the price or not.

Q. We make fish-hooks, do we not?—A. We made them then, but now we have stopped the importation.

Q. Now you can go on with what you were saying about the other items of comparison.

ELEMENTS OF INCREASED COST OF AMERICAN VESSELS.

A. The difference between our methods and theirs I think makes more difference in the cost than the duties. If we had the privilege of taking our crews and letting them live from our outfitting stores for six months of the year until the account was about to be squared, selling goods to them at our own prices, and all that sort of thing, we could carry on that sort of business and let the vessels lose and still have a profit on our whole business.

Then again the local taxes. Here in Gloucester we have a very heavy tax, about 2 per cent.; whereas I think I am correct in saying that the Canadians do not tax their vessels at all.

I think since the duty went into effect the total amount of their bounties is in the vicinity of $2,000,000. The bounty is not very large per vessel, but still in the aggregate $2,000,000 in a series of years is a great help to a small industry. France gives 10 francs on every quintal exported.

TAXES.

Q. The taxes paid here go to support schools and all the departments of a well-ordered city—water, police, &c.—which the families of your crews who live here enjoy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And your school money is entirely raised on property?—A. Entirely. It makes it very expensive, because in a town like Gloucester, with a large population who pay no taxes and who have a large number of children, the school tax is high and becomes a very important matter.

Q. And that in the Provinces is not a heavy tax at all?—A. I think they do not tax their vessels there at all.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You say your taxes are 2 per cent. on the cost of the vessel?—A. Yes, sir; more than that now. I don't think our fleet would sell to-day for what they tax it; I know it wouldn't.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That is, for the assessed value?—A. For the assessed value.

Senator SAULSBURY. In my State a vessel is not taxed at all for State, county, or municipal purposes. Why cannot the people of Gloucester be relieved from it as well as the people of Delaware? I know one gentleman who holds as part owner between thirty and forty vessels and has several hundred thousand dollars invested in coasting vessels, and he pays no State or county taxes upon those vessels.

Senator EDMUNDS. If the taxes are taken off of vessels here, the other people who live in this town and subsist upon this fishing industry will have to raise just as much money, and the taxes would only have to be levied on something else.

Senator SAULSBURY. I think property of every character and description, investments in real estate, vessels, or bonds and mortgages, ought to be taxed.

The WITNESS. The valuation of the town is low. Gloucester is a poor town, and the proportion of vessel property is of course exceedingly large as compared with the other property. If they should not tax vessels no one could afford to live in the town, the taxes would be so exorbitant on everything else. The tax is now $19 on $1,000, I think, and if they were to take out the $3,000,000 of vessel property it would make a very exorbitant tax on everything else.

Q. (By Senator EDMUNDS.) I suppose these captains and their crews live in houses that they own, on land that they own, and all the taxes taken off of personal property would fall back on real property, so that after all they would have to pay the taxes?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About what proportion of your local taxation is for school purposes?—A. I think about one-third.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM H. JORDAN.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

WILLIAM H. JORDAN sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Forty.

Q. Residence?—A. Gloucester.

Q. Occupation?—A. Fishing and vessel-owner.

Q. Owner of how many vessels?—A. Five.

Q. How long have you been in the fishing business?—A. I have been in the business, as partner, nineteen years.

Q. Do you deal and operate in all classes of fish?—A. Yes, sir.

COST OF FISHING VESSELS.

Q. What do these fishing vessels cost?—A. They average in cost about $7,300 to $8,300 or $8,500.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. That is about a hundred-ton vessel?—A. That is 100 tons, old measurement. By the new measurement—the Government measurement—they run from 65 to 95 and 100 tons, but more of them would be in the vicinity of 80 tons; that would be about the average.

COST OF OUTFIT.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. About what is the average cost of outfit?—A. For seining business perhaps about $2,500, and for cod-fishing and other parts of the business from $1,500 to $1,800 and $2,000.

Q. About how many men are carried on those vessels?—A. My vessels average about 15 men each.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Of what nationality are these men?—A. I should think two-thirds of them or in that vicinity are American citizens, and perhaps 15 per cent. of them are resident citizens.

Q. People who reside here but are not naturalized?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the rest are floating?—A. Yes, sir; foreigners.

CODFISH AND BAIT.

Q. Where do your vessels go for codfish?—A. They fish mostly the Grand Banks and the Georges Banks.

Q. Where do they get their bait?—A. They get their bait for Georges fishing along the American coast, and this year all of them have got it here.

Q. How was it during the ten years of the treaty of 1870-'71?—A. A small proportion of the Grand Banks trawlers got it from Canadian ports.

Q. Is there any difficulty in American vessels, now that they are excluded in fact, whether of right or not, from going into provincial ports to get bait, supplying themselves with bait otherwise?—A. No, sir. I have had less delay this year than on the average. Frequently the Grand Banks vessels are supplied with bait three to six weeks at a time.

Q. Along the Canadian shores when they were at liberty to do that? A. Yes, sir. I think if the vessels made arrangements to take the bait on their own shores it would benefit an industry that has not been fully developed.

Q. And result in equally successful catches of fish?—A. Yes, sir, and with much less delay. Then, again, the people fishing along our shores, those that have traps and weirs, are disposed to do all they can to make money; but among the Canadians a vessel will be allowed to lie a week without bait. The Canadians seem indifferent, and if they don't feel like fishing they won't.

PROVISIONS.

Q. Just tell us what is your outfit of provisions for a vessel going to the Grand Banks on a codfish trip, for instance. What is put on board for the food of the crew?—A. Flour, beef, pork, lard, butter, sugar, molasses, and canned goods of various kinds.

Q. Canned vegetables you mean?—A. Canned vegetables somewhat. Of course, different vessels vary in that respect to some extent; some carry prunes, most of them dried apples and condensed milk; in fact, almost all kinds of food one would have at home, only in preserved form. They also carry cabbages.

Q. What is the quality of the food that is put on?—A. The quality is good; the quality of the flour is the best; as to sugar, we sometimes send white sugar, but more frequently high grade yellow. The molasses is of good quality, not the best always; and butter is of good quality.

Q. Pork?—A. Pork is of the best quality; we send mostly clear pork, and pork shoulders; and the very best grade of plate beef we can buy; we also send pigs' feet and tripe somewhat.

Q. So that the whole outfit of food is thoroughly good?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Coffee and tea?—A. Yes, sir; pure coffee, and a nice quality of tea that sells for about 40 to 45 cents a pound. Strictly pure coffee and extracts and spices of all kinds.

CODFISH.

Q. In your codfish catching I suppose no question is ever raised in respect to the three-mile line?—A. No, sir.

Q. They are always caught offshore?—A. Yes, sir.

PORT PRIVILEGES.

Q. Then as to your cod-fishing vessels, is it of any practical consequence to you gentlemen engaged in this business, or to your crews, to have the right to go into their ports except for shelter and for wood and water?—A. It is not.

MACKEREL.

Q. Now we will come to the mackerel business. Where have your vessels during the last ten or fifteen years caught their mackerel?—A. During the last ten or fifteen years they have caught their mackerel almost entirely upon the American shores. Last year I had 5 to 8 or possibly

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. State your knowledge and information as to the proportion of mackerel taken inside the three mile line?

The WITNESS. In ordinary years?

Senator FRYE. Yes, take it for fifteen years together.

A. The proportion, in my estimation, would certainly not be over 5 per cent. with the large vessels, and I should think even less than that.

Q. Take the whole of the Gloucester mackerel fleet, and take it for ten or fifteen years together.—A. The average taken inside the three-mile limit is not 5 per cent. of the whole, taking the whole American fleet.

Q. It was so even during the time when they had the right to go inshore?—A. Yes, sir. It is very seldom that they are able to get the condition of bottom such that they can fish inside with safety. It has been tried, and they almost invariably tear their seines.

Q. How is it in respect to the location of the larger schools of fish; are they generally found more than three miles offshore?—A. Yes, sir; there are certain banks or places where they are located where they seem to meet more of them than they do inshore.

CASE OF THE GOLDEN HIND.

Q. Have any of your mackerel vessels been disturbed this year?—A. Yes, sir. The Golden Hind was fishing in the North Bay and discovered that their water was about out. They had less than a barrel left, and they attempted to go in to replenish their water. At the entrance to the Bay of Chaleur they were met by one of the Canadian cutters—I think the one commanded by Captain Quigley, I am not sure—and the cutter forbade him to enter the Bay. The Hind informed the cutter that she wished to get water, but Captain Quigley said that he would not allow her to enter, and gave the Hind the written instructions of the Canadian Government, and indorsed on them, "Don't enter the Bay of Chaleur." He didn't sign his name, but only added his initials.*

So the captain didn't dare enter. He was in distress for water for eight days before he got back on the fishing grounds, and during that time the other vessels had started for home, so that it was a substantial loss to the Hind of one fare of fish.

Q. Where is that paper that was given you?—A. I have it at my office.

Senator FRYE. I wish you would bring it in before we leave Gloucester.

The WITNESS. I will do so. I will state that the collector of the port here made a statement of this case to Secretary Bayard, and made a demand on the English Government for indemnity.

Q. About what time did this occur?—A. I think nearly about the first of August.

Q. Do you know whereabouts it was that the vessel was stopped?—A. I have a record of where it was, but don't recall it now; it was at the entrance to the Bay of Chaleur.

* The warning here spoken of is identically the same as the one a copy of which Senator Edmunds has from Mr. Bayard, except the indorsement in pencil, "Don't enter the Bay of Chaleur. M. S."

Q. Do you know whether at that time the Hind was within three miles of the shore?—A. She was outside the three miles.

Q. Standing in to the open bay?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How wide is that bay across from headland to headland?—A. I don't know. [A bystander said it was about 15 miles.]

Senator EDMUNDS. I have understood that it was nearer 20.

THE CASE OF THE ANNA M. JORDAN.

The WITNESS. There was another vessel that had some difficulty.

Q. (By Senator FRYE.) What vessel?—A. The schooner Anna M. Jordan. I think she went first to Eastport, and then attempted to go to Grand Manan, but they wouldn't allow her to enter at the port of St. Andrews. The captain owns part of the vessel, and he went ashore and asked permission to enter. They told him no; that fishermen had no business to enter, and if he came in he would be seized.

Q. That was at the custom-house at St. Andrews?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And so he did not undertake it?—A. He did not undertake it.

Q. Are those the only vessels of yours that have had any trouble this year?—A. I think so.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Take the mackerel fishery; what, if any, substantial value to the American fishing interest do you regard the right to catch mackerel within 3 miles of the Canadian shores?—A. I consider it of no value.

Q. And I understand from what you have have said that your opinion is, from your knowledge and experience, that it has never been of any substantial value as a means of catching fish?—A. Yes, sir; for some years past I have had my vessels going up for mackerel, and until this year they have always lost by going there; if they had remained home and fished as late as this year, if there had been any chance, they would have done much better.

THE TERROR.

Q. Have you any information as to whether any other American vessels have been excluded from the Bay of Chaleur this year?—A. I don't recall any special case. I have heard the matter spoken of in general once or twice.

Q. Do you understand that all have been kept out?—A. I understand that when the cutter Terror has been there it has not allowed any vessel to enter.

Q. What papers had your vessel?—A. She had a permit to touch and trade; all my vessels had that.

Q. But she had no particular clearance for any particular Canadian port?—A. No, sir.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES.

Q. How are the prices of fish this year?—A. The prices of codfish are lower than they have been for many years; the prices of mackerel are higher for certain grades. The catch of No. 1 mackerel this year has been smaller than it was last year. The catch has been probably in the vicinity of 12,000 barrels No. 1's, and last year it was 20,000 barrels. The price last year at this season was $18, and this year it is $17 and $17.25, with perhaps only two-thirds of the catch, and of course with very much smaller proportion of other grades in mackerel. No. 1 mackerel have been less this year with a smaller catch.

Q. Take it for codfish.—A. The prices of codfish, both wholesale and retail, have been very much less this year than last.

PRICES AFFECTED BY DUTY.

Q. Was there any observable immediate change in the prices on the 1st of July, 1885, when the duty was put on?—A. Prices were lower after that; the market seemed to be dull.

Q. But your market here, so far as you know, was not affected immediately by that fact?—A. No sir; we would have been very glad to take the old prices.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. I suppose your vessels are all alike here, on the same lay that has been described by the other witnesses?—A. Yes sir; I have only one vessel where part of the men were hired for wages.

CLOSE SEASON.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. You can state what you like on the question of a close season.—

A. It is the general impression, I suppose, that it is more desirable for the fishermen to have a close season than not to have it. But if it is for their interest, it is certainly for mine. I have looked into the question pretty carefully—perhaps no more so than masters of vessels—and it is my impression that it is not going to be for our advantage.

In the first place, our vessels perhaps will want to start earlier than the 1st of June, and I know of no reason why they cannot if they wish. If they start before the 1st of June they are liable to catch mackerel. Suppose those mackerel are landed on the 15th of June; how is any one going to prove that they were caught before the 1st of June? Suppose Gloucester will send out 100 vessels mackerel fishing. That is perhaps what they have sent South nearly every year for the past seven or eight years, and it may be more than that. They have taken almost entirely fresh mackerel, so that there has been no opportunity for accumulation of stock more than a few days at a time. I would say that up to the 1st of June, possibly, there are 5,000 barrels landed each year, and have been for the past few years; I think not so many this past year.

Q. Are you speaking now of salt, or fresh mackerel?—A. Of salt mackerel. Where they get fresh fish, of course they take that chance of getting a big fare with some one or two or three trips. On the whole, the Southern fishing business has been disastrous, and I think I have been engaged in it as much as any firm. I have had four or five vessels engaged in it, and they probably have been as fortunate as any; and I do not consider that the voyage South has been especially favorable. On the contrary, there has been this disadvantage: I think the mackerel are liable to be salted and taken on or before the first day of June. If a vessel should happen to be in Southern water about the 1st of May, so as to be prepared to take them on the 1st of June, if they saw a school on the 25th of May they would be liable to take them if they thought nobody saw them. The result will be that by the 15th of June usually, perhaps, we should have 5,000 barrels of mackerel landed, and probably a large portion of them consumed. We are quite likely to have by the 15th of June 20,000 or 30,000 barrels of poor mackerel; they are of very little value. It is only a small portion of the country that takes them, any way, and we should accumulate a stock.

I understand the object of a close season is to prevent taking the mackerel in the spawning season; but they do not spawn until after the 1st of June.

The object is also, as I understand, to keep a poor quality of mackerel out of the market. Very few mackerel, I think, are taken during the month of June, because they are spawning.

Q. Where do they begin to spawn South? You find them off Hatteras in March?—A. I don't know where they spawn. You find spawn in them. I believe the fishermen don't pretend to know.

Q. Your difficulty about the close season, if I understand you correctly, is that you look at the difficulty of its enforcement, and that instead of these fish that are caught before that time being disposed of, they will be packed in barrels in part?—A. I am afraid it will be that way, and certainly it will be impossible to tell, if the mackerel were landed about the 15th of June, that they were caught about the 25th of May. And then I don't see anything to prevent the danger of shipment from all over the Provinces about the 15th of June. The mackerel strike their shores from the 15th of May, and they can catch those fish at that time and salt them and keep them until the middle of June and keep them from our markets; whereas, if we are kept to the strict letter of the law, we won't be able to take many fish until after the 1st of July, and the Canadians will be able to get the advantage of the bare market.

Q. If the close season were on down here, you could go north and fish where the Canadians do—in the Gulf?—A. We might do that, I suppose. But the fish seem to follow the shore, and more and more fish are taken in traps and weirs on the Nova Scotia shores than are taken outside.

Q. So you think that this early fishing would not amount to anything up there outside of the three-mile limits?—A. No, sir.

Q. And that at that early time in the year it is the boats, &c., that take them?—A. Yes, sir. Our vessels have been there every year. A few vessels leave the southern fisheries about the 15th or 20th of May and go north, hoping to take fish on their passage to the North Bay; but there are many more failures than there are successful voyages. Last year I think there were thirty to forty vessels went there, and I guess not more than seven or eight caught trips.

MACKEREL AT SPAWNING TIME.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. These mackerel are carrying spawn nearly all the time from March up to June, are they not?—A. I don't know how early, but I presume they are.

Q. When they are actually spawning they do not make their appearance on the surface, but go deep?—A. I don't know that, but I presume that is the case.

Q. That is the reason you do not take them in the month of June with your nets—because they are on the bottom?—A. I presume so.

Q. While these fish are carrying spawn do you think they are good to eat?—A. No, sir; I think they are not good eating.

Q. They are very poor, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. After they have spawned in June they very rapidly recover their condition, do they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They feed on a little red insect?—A. That is their natural food.

Q. What is that called?—A. I have heard it called brit; it is also called red feed.

Q. So that in July the mackerel get fat?—A. Yes, sir.

CLOSE SEASON.

If you will allow me, I think there is no doubt but if we could prevent their being taken before the 1st or 10th of July it would be a good idea.

Q. They can be prevented from taking them during the month of June?—A. Yes, sir; but then the Canadians would get them, and in that way get the advantage of a bare market. You can't prevent this, I suppose, under the present tariff. Next year, perhaps, the first mackerel landed will be high priced.

Q. The theory of these other fishermen is all right, then, that the mackerel are poor and ought not to be taken, but that the law is liable to be violated?—A. Yes, sir.

EARLY CATCH OF MACKEREL.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Where are these fish that are caught in the Southern fisheries principally sold?—A. I suppose there is a small local trade in New York State and Pennsylvania, but I suppose their eventual destination is in some Southern market. The Southern markets demand a low-priced fish, which is necessarily a poor fish. Poor fish will keep better in a warm climate than fine fish. A poor No. 3 mackerel is a much better article for a warm climate than a good No. 1; they do not spoil so readily.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Can you not keep any mackerel that are properly salted a great while in any climate?—A. They don't keep so well.

Q. They get musty and rusty?—A. Yes, sir; the fat dries up, and they get oily and strong; they are sort of soaked in oil.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Is there not a large quantity of these fresh fish eaten by, especially the poorer classes of people in New York, Philadelphia, and other Eastern places?—A. Yes, sir; they are a great many. They are very cheap at times; the market is overstocked with them and they sell at a very low price, but are usually a pretty good kind of fish for fresh fish, that is, when there is a large supply. When they are so cheap the poor ones are thrown away, and the others are sold at a pretty good rate.

Q. Would not the effect, therefore, of breaking up this southern fishery be to deprive a large number of people, who now want to buy cheap fresh fish, of the opportunity to buy them?—A. I think it would deprive them of the opportunity to buy mackerel. I don't know but at that season of the year there is usually a large stock of fresh fish cheap—fresh herring and smelts, though of course smelts are not quite so cheap. And at different times there is most always an abundance of fresh fish.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES H. PEW.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

CHARLES H. PEW sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUMDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Fifty-one.

Q. You reside here at Gloucester?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. In the general fishing business; buying and selling goods.

Q. You are a vessel-owner?—A. Yes, sir; we have, I think, from 18 to 20 vessels.

Q. How long have you been in the fishing business?—A. Ever since 1849.

RECIPROCITY.

Q. Then you were in the business during the whole period of reciprocity under the treaty of 1854, and free fishery business under the treaty of 1870-'71?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the effect of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 upon the fishing interests here?—A. During the latter part of it, it interfered with it very much, depressed it.

Q. Describe how, whether the Canadian vessels increased in number.—A. The Canadian fleet increased. During the inflation period after the war prices were very high, but for the last two or three years the business was depressed. Our high prices caused a marked increase in the Nova Scotia fisheries; the fish were about all marketed to this country at that time.

Q. Did large quantities of them come to this port?—A. They commenced to increase very materially during the latter part of the reciprocity treaty; we had gone through the panic of 1857, and at that time the increase was not material from 1857 to 1861. During the first years of the war, 1860 and 1861, the business was very dull, but after prices began to look up and business became more prosperous the market increased, and finally for three or four years it doubled every year.

COMPARATIVE COST OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS AND OUTFITS.

Q. What are the elements, in your opinion, of the difference between the cost of a vessel, its rigging, outfit, &c., built by these Dominion people, and a Gloucester vessel?—A. It is principally a difference in the cost of labor and duties, and will amount to probably from $1,000 to $1,500.

Q. On each vessel?—A. On each vessel. In addition, there is a material difference in the running of the vessel from year to year. They have no duties nor taxes, and their labor is lower; that makes the running of the vessel very much less.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. How soon do your fishermen who bring fish to this port in your vessels get their pay and profit out of a trip?—A. Just as soon as they land.

Q. How do you understand that course of business to be in the Provinces?—A. It takes a long while before the fishermen get their money. As a general thing the fish have to be landed and marketed and the money received before the men are paid off. Sometimes it happens that they land their fish in the fall and do not receive a settlement in money until they are again ready to go the following year. Then, again, many of them take their compensation from the stores of the vessel owners on a running account, so that when the settlement comes it is substantially no settlement; their pay is all used up.

BAIT.

Q. Where do your cod-fishermen get their bait?—A. The larger part of them from Newport, around Block Island, and down as far as Portsmouth, and also down the coast of Maine, but not much. The larger part of the bait comes from Cape Cod.

Q. How has it been during the last ten years?—A. It has been the same.

Q. Your vessels, then, during that time have had very little, if any, occasion to go into Canadian ports for bait?—A. No, sir; they have not made a practice of doing it; it hasn't been common with them, though occasionally a vessel would do so. I think this year we have had only one or two out of our fleet of twenty vessels that have had occasion to call into Canadian ports at all, and then I don't think they had any object; it merely became convenient, perhaps, for them to go in.

THE CASE OF THE SHILOH.

Q. Did any of your vessels meet with any difficulty?—A. Those that went in did. One of the vessels upon the last trip, I think, went into Shelburne, and was going into harbor to make port, and was fired at by one of the English cutters. It was a stormy night.

Q. What was the name of the vessel?—A. The Shiloh.

Q. What time was that?—A. About the last of July or first of August. I think she will be in to-day.

Q. With the same captain on board who was on board at that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Senator EDMUNDS. If he comes in I would like to have you send him here.

The WITNESS. I want you to have his story.

Senator EDMUNDS. You may state his story as you understand it.

The WITNESS. As I understand, he went in from the Banks in stress of weather. He went into the lower bay at Shelburne, the settlement being farther up the bay. While going up to his anchorage ground the first thing he knew a shot was fired. He saw the cutter, but she had nothing to distinguish her from any ordinary vessel—no flag. The cutter came up and her captain put an armed guard aboard, and that guard was kept there all the time he was there. He stopped in at Louisburg, on Cape Breton. He had a man on board who was sick, and he was a little in doubt whether it would be policy to carry him back or to land him. He went in and had considerable trouble. He had to get permission from the Canadian authorities to allow him in port with a sick man. He had to have special permission. They wouldn't allow him to go ashore or to do anything at all, and kept a guard right around him all the time. All our vessels had instructions this year not to go into any Canadian port, because we held that it was practically of no advantage to us or to them to go into their ports—no advantage from a pecuniary point of view, because it always cost more than any benefit derived from it. I have a bill showing what it cost one of the vessels to go in, one of our fishing vessels, the schooner Ontario.

CANADIAN PORT CHARGES.

Senator EDMUNDS. This bill, it seems, is dated June, 1886, at St. John's, Newfoundland. It is rendered by Stephen March & Son against the vessel for what she had to pay when she went in, as well as for some things that they bought; I see that they bought some tobacco, &c. The light-dues were $20.64 on 86 tons, at 24 cents a ton. There is a charge for water rates, 86 tons, at 5 cents a ton, $4.30. That is not the price charged for going in to take water, but only the charge for going in. Harbor-master, $2. Entering and clearing at the custom-house, $1. Pilotage, inward and outward, $7.50. Then after some little items I see 70 cents for tobacco and linseed oil and a little tea. There is also a charge for 12 flour-barrels, amounting to a little over $6, and an advance to the captain. Then comes the commission on the whole thing at 5 per cent.; then a charge for exchange at 2 per cent., making a total, taking out the tobacco, the linseed oil, the tea, and flour-barrels, of $6.60 and $31.50. The aggregate was about $45 or $46 for merely going into that port, staying a day, and clearing out again.

The WITNESS. And pilotage, though they don't have to take any pilots. Then there is a charge for water rates, when we didn't take any water.

Q. I suppose she did not take any pilot?—A. No, sir; it was as if she had come in and anchored here at Gloucester; it is an open bay, just like it is here at Gloucester. So you see it is expensive business, and there is no earthly object in going into their ports. I talked to the captain of that vessel very hard about going in there.

GLOUCESTER PORT CHARGES.

Q. According to the course of business here and the practice of the Gloucester custom-house, what would be the charges on an 86-ton Canadian vessel that should come down here to fish more than three miles off-shore out here in the Atlantic Ocean, and had occasion to land in this harbor, cast anchor, and stay a day?—A. Simply for entering and reporting at the custom-house?

Q. How much would that be?—A. There would be no fee attached for them to report within twenty-four hours.

Q. So that if she merely cast anchor and departed within twenty-four hours there would be no fee at all?—A. None. We would be only too glad to have them come in to buy something. That bill I have shown you is a fair sample of the whole business of port charges against our vessels going into their ports. That is an original bill.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. For your codfish vessels do you regard the right of those vessels to go within three miles of the Canadian shores as of any consequence?—A. None whatever.

Q. Take your mackerel vessels; where, during the last fifteen years, for instance, have your mackerel been caught?—A. Off our American shores.

Q. Have you ever had any mackerel vessels going to the Bay?—A. Two, this year.

Q. Never before?—A. I don't think we have had any for ten to twelve years.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to where the American fishermen catch their mackerel up there, and as to how much necessity there is for them to go within the three miles?—A. I have a general knowledge.

Q. State your general knowledge.—A. I think if they kept five miles offshore it would be an advantage to the business. If our Government would put a steamer down there and drive them all offshore there would be more fish caught. I don't look upon it as any advantage at all to go into their harbors; it is a positive disadvantage to the whole business.

Q. Have the mackerel vessels returned that you have sent down there?—One of them has returned and gone back again; they are both down there now.

Q. Have you heard of either of them having any trouble?—A. No, sir; not at this time.

Q. They were under instructions, I suppose, not to go inside.—A. Yes, sir; their instructions are to keep out of the harbor altogether; of course they have to go in sometimes on account of stress of weather.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What proportion of your crews, on the average of a dozen years, are American citizens?—A. The larger part of them; nearly all. In fact I don't think one per cent. of our crews are foreigners. They are not all American-born, but people who make their homes in this country.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Naturalized?—A. Naturalized citizens, and living here.

Q. What proportion of them are American-born, do you think?—A. Very few now; probably not more than 10 to 12 per cent.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. State about the average number of men composing the crew of one of these vessels.—A. They average 15 to a vessel; that would be a fair average.

Q. And I suppose they go on the same lay as all the others have stated?—A. All of them go on shares.

FORTUNE BAY TROUBLES.

Q. Were you interested in any of the vessels that had difficulty in Fortune Bay, that old affair?—A. Yes, sir; it was our vessel, the Ontario; she was the one the gear of which the mob destroyed.

Q. She was in there at that time for bait, was she not?—A. She was under register, and went in there to buy herring for the market; perhaps the herring might be used as food; they went in to buy for general purposes. They usually go on winter voyages, winter after winter, but this year they thought they had the right to go down there, and so they took their seines and boats and hired men down there to fish for them. They were very successful, and they had herring enough, trapped or surrounded, to supply the whole fleet there, whilst the fleet there fishing with the old gear were not able to catch any, and that was the occasion of the mobbing and destruction of the property. There was no pretense of an excuse whatever; it was only because they said that our vessels were coming down there and taking the bread out of their children's mouths. All the years under the treaty we had the privilege of going in there for herring, although we bought them; they wouldn't allow us to catch them; they wouldn't allow us anywhere, even at St. John's. We had a vessel that was nearly sunk, her cable was cut, and she intended to catch her bait; that was the Concord. They were told if they came ashore they would be murdered.

BAIT.

Q. If there was any advantage in going in there for bait, why did your vessels go in; or were they merely going to bring the herring back here to sell, or what?—A. It is a matter of convenience perhaps on a voyage, a matter of habit. A man has been out to sea two or three months and he gets sort of tired and likes to run in and get the news from home, and get the papers, and take water, bait, and ice and water, and go off again.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. As I understand, you had, at this time, the right to go in, under the terms of the treaty, to catch bait?—A. Yes, sir; but the experience we had will prevent us from attempting it again.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Taking your whole knowledge of the business, what do you say as to the value, to our mackerel fishermen, of the right to go within the three-mile limit to fish?—A. I don't think it is of any value at all; I think it is a damage to go in.

CANADIAN PORT CHARGES.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you mean that those charges named in the bill you have exhibited to us are customary charges to the fishermen who run in there?—A. I never saw such a charge before this year; I think it was put on this year.

Q. During the time of the treaty they did not make those charges, did they?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether or not, under the laws, they have a right to make those charges?—A. No, I have no actual knowledge. I think it was said that this Mr. March named in that bill was a member of parliament there, and being a member of the legislature he had this privilege of making these charges, that being a special privilege.

Q. Do you know whether other vessels of ours have been compelled to pay such charges this year?—A. I don't know of any. I think but very few vessels have gone in there; I haven't heard of any others except ours.

FREE FISH.

Q. Do you know of anything that the Canadians can give us as an equivalent for allowing them a free market in this country for their fish?—A. Nothing.

Q. What would be, in your judgment, the effect on the market for the next twenty years if we were to give them that privilege?—A. I would transfer the headquarters of the fish business from our territory to theirs.

EFFECTS OF TREATIES.

Q. After the expiration of reciprocity what was the effect?—A. Their business decreased.

Q. During the pendency of the treaty of 1870-'71 did they make a heavy increase again?—A. Yes; from 1879 to 1882.

Q. Did they more than double their fleet?—A. Yes; doubled and trebled.

Q. What was the effect of that upon our fisheries?—A. It simply decreased our business very much and made it non-paying.

FRESH AND SALT FISH.

Q. Has the market for fresh fish increased immensely the last ten years?—A. Yes, it has increased from year to year.

Q. Has that had any effect on the salt-fish market?—A. It interferes with sales and prices.

Q. Under the decision of the present Secretary of the Treasury, fresh fish for immediate consumption are admitted free of duty?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Suppose all fish, salt and fresh, should be admitted free of duty, and that the increase observed for the last five years in the Canadian exportations to this country should be maintained, would it, in your opinion, be destructive of our fishery fleets?—A. Totally destructive. The business couldn't be carried on; it would be, I think, impossible; it would be simply a natural consequence.

DUTIES AND BOUNTIES.

We pay taxes and duties upon everything we use. We have high labor, while they have no duties, low labor, and in addition to that a bounty is paid their fishermen out of the money that this Government was swindled out of. France pays a bounty of 10 francs per quintal exported to other countries. We have fish that we sell for $1.50 and $2.25, while the French Government pays nearly $2 a quintal as a bounty for all the fish exported to other countries. A French fisherman got astray in a dory from his vessel, and was brought ashore in this vicinity, and the French Government sent a war vessel to bring him home. France can't spare even one man.

DUTIES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Q. Do you know whether or not all the countries to which we export fish have duties?—A. The whole of them have.

Q. They do not open their markets?—A. No; their duties are absolutely prohibitory. The duty is very large in Spain and Portugal, as well as in the West India Islands; we can't send any fish there, and never could.

WAGES OF WOMEN IN GLOUCESTER.

Q. You are one of the proprietors whose places we visited this morning?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I saw a number of women and girls at work there; what average wages do they get?—A. They get $6 a week.

WAGES OF MEN IN GLOUCESTER.

Q. I saw men at work there; what are their average wages?—A. They make about $10 a week.

Q. Do any of them get more than that?—A. Some get $13 and $14, and some get $8.

PRICES OF AMERICAN AND CANADIAN LABOR.

Q. When you land a cargo of fish and put it through the processes that we observed this morning, is there any labor connected with it for which you have to pay less than a dollar a day?—A. None whatever.

Q. It runs from that up to $2?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know at what cost that same kind of labor is performed by the Canadian fishermen in their country?—A. About one-half. They do not follow the same methods of curing and marketing fish that we do, though they do follow them as fast as they learn them. All their methods of catching, curing, and marketing are learned from this country. Their best masters have gone in our vessels and got their education as fishermen, and then during this last reciprocity treaty they went home and went as masters of vessels. Previous to that we used to have four or five skippers that belonged to Yarmouth and Shelburne, but they are all vessel-owners now down there. They copy our vessels and gearing and boats, and in fact everything that is progressive in their whole fishing business they have learned from us here.

AMERICAN AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. You spoke about the increased cost of our vessels over theirs on account of the increased cost of labor and the duties on certain materials. Is it not a fact that the American vessels cost a good deal more because they are better built vessels?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And built of harder wood?—A. Yes, sir; we use oak timber in the construction of our vessels, where they largely use spruce.

Senator EDMUNDS. The wages of shipwrights are higher with us.

The WITNESS. They average $2 a day upon most all American vessels, while with them the shipwrights only get from $1.25 to $1.50.

PRICES OF FISH.

Senator FRYE. The average prices of fish of various grades during a series of years, if made up in tabular form, it seems to me might show that food is about as cheap as it is possible to be.

Senator EDMUNDS. Mr. Pew could give us a table covering a dozen years or so.

The WITNESS. I can do it. I have a knowledge of the prices, and know that codfish of all kinds are cheaper this year than they ever have been before with the exception perhaps of one or two periods, say during the panic of 1857, and from 1860 to 1861, at the commencement of the war. When the duties went on a year ago last July the prices of mackerel, although they were $2 a barrel, went steadily down from $2 in June to $2.75 along about the first of August. And codfish just the same; they were $3.25 to $3.50 a quintal of 112 pounds, and they went right down in price notwithstanding the addition of the duty, and they are lower to-day than they have ever been in the history of the country. It is simply a question of supply and demand; there is an over-supply of codfish. We have enterprise and men enough to supply our own country with food products at very cheap prices.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What might be called the height of the fishing business here?—A. I should say September to October; September ordinarily.

Q. Then will you furnish us a table showing the wholesale prices of these various kinds of fish, all that you call by the general name of codfish, mackerel, halibut, and herring, in the month of September, taking the same date all around, so as to make an even comparison for 10 to 15 years back, and send it to us at your convenience?—A. I will.

HERRING.

To give you an illustration in regard to the duties on herring, Labrador herring are imported here, and last year they were sold as low as the duties on them. The duties were $2 a barrel, and they were sold at $2 a barrel. They had a most successful catch of them.

Q. On what part of the coast of Labrador are these herring taken?—A. South and east, opposite Newfoundland. The prices this year are from $5 to $6.

Q. What part of them are taken on the Labrador coast where we are still entitled to fish?—A. I don't know.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. We do not fish for them?—A. No, sir.

Q. What do those largest, handsomest herring, that we saw this morning, sell for now?—A. All prepared and put up and salted for market, about $3 a barrel.

Q. About how many pounds?—A. Two hundred pounds always in a barrel.

CODFISH.

Q. What do these smaller codfish sell for now per quintal?—A. For $2 to $2.25 per 112 pounds.

Q. They are rice fish?—A. Yes, sir; they are just as nice fish as are produced.

Q. What do the larger ones sell for?—A. At $3.50 per quintal.

Q. What do your boned fish sell for?—A. From 3½ to 5 cents a pound.

HERRING.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Referring to Labrador herring, the treaty of 1818 provides for our right to fish from the west and southwest along to the Straits of Belleisle indefinitely northward; were any of those herring caught in the Straits of Belleisle?—A. I think they were.

TREATY WITH DENMARK.

The WITNESS. Did Mr. Jordan speak to you about the discovery this year of a treaty with Denmark?

Senator EDMUNDS. No.

The WITNESS. Something has come out this year in reference to a treaty with Denmark which provides that we cannot navigate the water north of 60°, I think it is, and a war vessel destroyed his property this year and drove her home. She goes up on the coast of Greenland, and her voyage was broken up by a Danish man-of-war, I think. I think it was stated—of course this knowledge is general—that a treaty existed between this country and Denmark, by which our vessels had no right to go up there at all. At any rate, the vessel landed her fish on shore, they were destroyed by the man-of-war, and she was driven home.

Q. You do not mean that any Danish vessel undertook to prevent one of our vessels from fishing north of 60°?—A. I think so; I think she was driven home.

Q. It might be one thing for her to fish in the open sea north of 60° and another thing to go within the three-mile line.—A. I think they only went ashore simply to have less obstruction for the vessel when they went to clear the decks and such things, as they had always been in the habit of doing.

NEW ENGLAND FISHING INTERESTS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. About what proportion of the fishing interest of New England is centered at Gloucester?—A. I think from a fourth to a third; I guess one-third would come nearer to it.

[A by-stander stated that there were 1,600 fishing vessels in all, and 440 of them belonged to Gloucester.]

Q. To what do you attribute the decline of cod-fishing this season?—A. It is owing to the quantity of the catch. The modern appliances for catching fish improve from year to year; they use larger vessels, send larger crews, and consequently we catch more fish.

IMPORTATIONS OF FISH FROM CANADA.

Q. What proportion of the codfish brought to our markets are caught in provincial waters by provincial people?—A. I guess they brought none, or at any rate only a small percentage, this year. Since the treaty went out of operation they have brought very few.

Q. Then you do not attribute the decline in the prices of codfish to the importations from the Canadian Provinces?—A. No, sir; it is simply due to the laws of supply and demand. Of course people thought that with the expiration of this treaty, prices might improve, and so they caught a great many fish, and do now.

Q. I understand you to say that the price of mackerel has advanced this year?—A. Yes, for certain kinds.

Q. Is that attributable to the same cause, there not being a supply?—A. Yes, sir; an insufficient supply.

LOCAL TAXATION OF VESSELS.

Q. You spoke of the cost of our vessels as compared with Canadian vessels, the materials entering into construction having, some of them, to pay duty, and the cost of labor also being greater.—A. All the timber that goes into American vessels except ship timber has to pay duties.

Q. Is not one of our disadvantages local taxation?—A. You might take that view of it. You might take it as a disadvantage or as an advantage. It would open up a pretty wide field for discussion.

Q. Can you compete with Canadians, who do not pay any local tax on their vessels?—A. No, sir.

AMER

Q. Have you ever seen a fishing business in this country that has got statistics gotten up for it?—A. I think so. It has been done for 50,000 people.

INFOR

Q. Have any of the fishing boats on the part of these vessels?—A. I think they have. I think they have been of Gloucester ever since, although they are not as many as they were before, possibly can.

Q. There were in the year of any consequence?

AMERICAN CAPITAL INVESTED IN FISHERIES.

Q. Have you ever made an estimate of the capital invested in the fishing business in this country in the way boats and vessels?—A. There are statistics gotten up that give all that. It is a good many million dollars. It has been estimated, I think, that it gives employment to 500,000 people.

INFORMATION TO THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Q. Have any of the interruptions and irritations that have existed on the part of these vessels been made known to the Secretary of State?—

A. I think they have been; while Mr. Fabson was collector of the port of Gloucester everything was reported, and I think they are to day, although they are more important since the expiration of the treaty than they were before. They evidently make all the trouble that they possibly can.

Q. There were irritations before the expiration of the treaty?—A. None of any consequence.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Except the Fortune Bay affair and things of that kind?—A. There were some little things like that, but they were of no consequence.

NUMBER OF VESSELS IN BRITISH WATERS.

Q. How many vessels altogether do you think have gone to those northeastern waters to fish for mackerel, cod, and halibut this year?

The WITNESS. Where do you mean?

Senator EDMUNDS. I mean the Gulf of St. Lawrence and along the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador.

A. They don't go on that coast at all. The fleet that has gone into Nova Scotia waters are mackerel catchers, and occasionally they take a few halibut; the cod-fishers don't go there.

Q. What I want to get at is the number of vessels that, if they had the free right to go in as they had before, would have been in a situation where they might have used it.—A. It would depend altogether upon circumstances. Previous to this present year none would have gone if they had had the privilege.

[A bystander stated that there were 90 to 95 vessels from the port of Gloucester that had gone into the Canadian waters this year.]

HADDOCK, MACKEREL, AND HALIBUT.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Are haddock caught in our waters?—A. Yes, sir; and our vessels do not go up there for them. There is no fish they go there for except mackerel. The present year has been a marked exception. For fourteen years mackerel fishing has been on our shores, and it was a loss for them to go up there at all.

Q. Are haddock caught up there in their waters?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are they brought here by the Canadians?—A. I think not; they may be to a limited extent.

Q. Where are the halibut caught?—A. Sometimes 3 or 4 miles off-shore; very rarely inshore. They are caught off the Georges and in waters that are open to the fishermen of all the world.

Q. Are halibut sent here by the Canadians?—A. Only very little. They don't follow that business at all.

Q. Then the only Canadian fish, as I understand it, that come in competition with yours, are the mackerel and codfish?—A. Mackerel and codfish. The Canadian ports are closed, substantially, six months in the year by ice, during which time all their fishing grounds are full of ice; you can't get within a hundred miles of them. If the American fisheries were destroyed you could not get a substitute for them from the Canadians, only to a limited extent, because, as I say, their fishing grounds are closed up by ice, and they can't get in there until June. Their waters are unnavigable for some four or five months on account of the ice, and their ports all along down are so far north that they are substantially closed in the winter time.

Senator EDMUNDS. There is a great deal of the time that the Strait of Northumberland is closed.

DUTY.

The WITNESS. This fish question opens up a wide field for the consideration of political economists. From my observation I am led to the conclusion that, taking the duties as they are to-day, you might fairly say that the advantage, if anything, is in favor of the Canadians even with our duties against them.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. You are speaking of salt fish?—A. Salt and fresh, all kinds.

Q. There is no duty on fresh fish now?—A. No.

SALT AND FRESH FISH.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What proportion of the fish caught by our fishermen are fresh and what proportion salt?—A. I should say that in value perhaps 25 per cent. are fresh.

SOUTHERN MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. Do your vessels go down the Southern coast as far as Cape Hatteras?—A. Oh, yes; they go down there in the early spring, and follow along the coast during the summer and fish off the Georges.

Q. Does the whole fleet go there, or only a part?—A. Only a certain portion.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. They only go there for mackerel, I suppose?—A. Only for mackerel. They go as far south as Nantucket for codfish. Our business has been more largely the catching and marketing of codfish, because it has been generally more steady and there has been a larger demand for that class of fish.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES G. TARR.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

JAMES G. TARR sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Fifty-six.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. Gloucester.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Commission merchant.

Q. And owner of fishing vessels as well?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been in the business?—A. Thirty years.

Q. How many vessels have you?—A. Twelve.

Q. What kind of fishing have you been engaged in?—A. Mackerel, halibut, and codfish.

Q. Did your vessels fish for mackerel in what we, for short, call Dominion waters from 1870 on, during the time of free fish and free right to go in?—A. Yes, sir.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Where were the larger part of the mackerel up there taken during that time?—A. The larger part were reported by the captains to have been taken on Bank Bradley and Bank Orphan.

Q. How far from the shores?—A. From 15 to 20 miles.

Q. What portion of all the catch you know anything about of mackerel in those waters has been taken in the last ten or fifteen years inside of three miles from land?—A. About one-eighth of the catch of our vessels.

Q. Of what value would you regard the right of your vessels, and those of people similarly engaged, to fish for mackerel within 3 miles of the shore up there?—A. Very slight.

Q. Mackerel are now taken entirely by seine and not by bait with hook and line, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How far is it necessary for your vessels to go in toward the shore while engaged in mackerel fishing?

The WITNESS. To pursue fish?

Senator EDMUNDS. For any purpose.

A. Stress of weather, of course, is one of the causes for them to seek harbors, and for wood and water. This season we have sent but few, and those vessels have been so fitted that they have had no occasion to purchase anything ashore aside from wood and water.

Q. How much of an inconvenience or loss to your business has it been that they have not been allowed to go in this year?—A. None whatever.

COD-FISHING.

Q. Where has your cod-fishing been done?—A. Principally on the Georges Banks. We have had only one at the Grand Banks.

Q. The Georges are the nearest Banks to this port, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many miles is it to the Georges?—A. Two hundred or more.

Q. Take your Grand Banks fisheries and the Banks around Sable Island, &c., how far is it necessary for your cod-fishing vessels to go to Canadian ports?—A. Only for wood and water.

Q. And shelter, I suppose, in case of storm?—A. Yes, sir.

SHELTER.

Q. Do the vessels generally run in from the Grand Banks for shelter in case of storm?—A. No, sir.

Q. They are too far from land?—A. Yes, sir. So those off the Georges never run for shelter.

VESSELS AND CREWS.

Q. Is the size of your vessels about the same as has been mentioned by the other witnesses whom you have heard?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About what proportion of the crews are American citizens?—A. I think three-fifths of our crews are American citizens.

Q. You have about the same number to the vessel as the other witnesses have stated?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. From twelve to fifteen and twenty, and so on?—A. Yes, sir.

TREATY OF 1870-71.

Q. Taking the whole fishery question together, then, do you regard the rights that you have had while the treaty of 1870-71 was in force of any substantial value?—A. No, sir; for this reason: We have sent for thirteen years past on an average three vessels per season into the Gulf of St. Lawrence for mackerel; those vessels in that time, with all the advantages of free fishing, have not paid their way; they have run behind and haven't paid their bills.

MACKEREL CAUGHT IN AMERICAN WATERS AND IN CANADIAN.

Q. From 1870 down to this time what proportion of the whole catch of mackerel that comes to this port have been caught in these northern waters, as against the proportion caught in what we would call American waters, or along our own front?—A. I should judge the American catch in the provincial waters would not show more than one-fifth of the whole catch in the fifteen years.

Q. Then in a long series of years by far the largest part of the mackerel caught are taken off our own coast?—A. That has been my own experience.

Q. During all that period what proportion do you think of those that were caught in what are called Dominion waters were taken within three miles of the shore?—A. I think not more than one-eighth of the catch.

Q. How long have you been in the business?—A. Directly and indirectly since 1848.

Q. How many vessels have you?—A. Twelve.

AMERICAN FISHERY UNION.

Q. Have you any official connection with the fishery matters?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is that?—A. President of the American Fishery Union.

Q. What does that union comprise; what is it?—A. It is an organization which held a meeting at Gloucester two years ago next December, representing the whole of the New England fisheries. At that convention some seven or eight were chosen as directors, and I was president of that board.

NEW ENGLAND FISHERIES.

Q. When you say that it embraced the whole of the New England fisheries, do you mean that it includes shore-fishing with boats and vessels?—A. Boats and vessels; it includes the whole; everything on the New England coast.

Q. About what proportion of the American fishing interest is comprised in what you call the New England fisheries?

The WITNESS. To include the boat business?

Senator EDMUNDS. To include the boat business.

A. I should think it would be nearly 80 or 90 per cent.

Q. Are there any cod-fishing and mackerel or halibut fishing vessels fitted out in other Atlantic ports outside of New England?—A. Not that I know of, unless it is in the Gulf States and on the Pacific.

Q. I am speaking of the Atlantic.—A. No, sir; none that I know of, any amount.

Senator EDMUNDS. I am under the impression that there is possibly one in New York and possibly one in Philadelphia.

The WITNESS. There might be one in New London.

Senator EDMUNDS. That is in the New England district. Then, substantially, for the fishery question we are inquiring into—and you might include the whale fishery as well, but no matter for that—I understand that the fishery that brings us in contact with the British Provinces is carried on in New England within the province of your bureau?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; and I suppose you know, of course, that the fisheries are interested as we are.

Senator EDMUNDS. Yes, I understand that. But the lake fishery is mostly done in boats, is it not?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Q. And that is not within your New England American Fishery Union, is it?—A. No, sir; they are not in our organization, but so far as their fish are concerned I was surprised to learn at Sandusky and Toledo that their fresh-fish business causes them to be interested in the business on the New England coast.

Q. And then when you add to that the interests of Lake Superior, Lake Huron, and of the Wisconsin people, it increases the scope a great deal more?—A. Yes, sir.

COD-FISHING.

Q. Taking the first, or some line of inquiry you have heard us carry on here, you may tell us, beginning with cod-fishing vessels, where they go to fish.

The WITNESS. You would like my experience with my vessels in 1886?

Senator EDMUNDS. Take those vessels for the last ten years; where have they gone to fish?

A. Hand-line fishing on Georges Bank and other Banks nearer; the Western and Grand Banks.

Q. Where is the trawl fishing carried on for cod?—A. Mostly on the Western and Grand Banks.

TRAWLS AND HAND-LINES.

Q. Which is the more successful kind of fishing, trawl, or hand-line fishing?—A. I should think, for the owner, the hand-line fishing was the most favorable.

Q. How for the fishermen themselves? If they all go on the lay, why do you make that distinction?

A. The expense of fitting a vessel for trawling is greater to the owner; but I think, as a general thing, the men will make more for their share by setting thousands of hooks than they will by just attending to two.

Q. How long are these trawls?—A. If I understand rightly about it, when one of these large vessels has all her trawls out they will extend over some 5 miles.

Q. How long would each trawl be?—A. I could not say exactly about that; I am not so well posted.

Q. As we Yankees say, you can give a guess.—A. I could not tell you exactly; I do not know about that.

Senator EDMUNDS. Is there not a fisherman present who can tell about the ordinary length of a trawl line?

The WITNESS. It would be merely guess-work on my part. I am just informed by Captain Smith, now present, that they have about 25 or 30 lines upon a trawl, which average about 30 fathoms to a line.

Senator FRYE. Six feet being a fathom?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

BAIT.

Q. (By Senator EDMUNDS.) Have your cod-fish vessels had any necessary occasion to visit the British Provinces?

The WITNESS. Do you wish the experience of 1886?

Senator EDMUNDS. No; I am speaking now of the ten years past. We will come down to 1886 by itself.

A. They have always more or less taken bait from the Provinces lately in the season; the first of the season we get bait more on the American coast.

Q. How often have your people got bait in the British Provinces?—A. I should think their bait bills would amount to not less than $3,000, and from that to $5,000, for my fleet of vessels.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Is that the annual cost?—A. Yes, sir; that is the annual cost. I have the exact figures at hand.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That is near enough for our purposes. That privilege being denied you, how do you get bait; what do you do?—A. I shall have to tell you what we have done this year when denied that privilege. We have had five vessels down there at Grand Banks fishing in the year 1886, and with one exception they have not taken any bait on the Nov

Scotia shore. A made their trip Fortune Bay and once or twice, and made from one mentioned have Scotia shore. All their bait was taken here in March and April. They made their trip to the Western Banks and then came home and went to Fortune Bay and St. Pierre, Newfoundland, and took their bait there once or twice, and went to the Grand Banks. They have all of them made from one to three trips each, and with the one exception I have mentioned have not taken bait upon the Nova Scotia shore.

Q. How did the catch of the vessels that carried their bait from here compare with the one that got bait on the coast?—A. They got as many fish, if not more.

Q. But I suppose it is a saving of time in going to the shore if they can buy bait?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Taking the cod-fishery, then, what, in your opinion, is the value to the American fishing interest of the right to get bait on British shores?—A. Nothing whatever.

Q. You would not care anything about it?—A. No, sir; I do not think there is anything, any privilege whatever, that they could give us or deny us for which we would be willing to admit their fish free into our markets.

MACKEREL FISHERY.

Q. Now we come to the mackerel fishery; have your vessels been up into what we call British waters for mackerel during the last ten years?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where have those mackerel been caught?—A. They have been caught mostly on this shore.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. The American shore?—A. The American shore.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. I am speaking of those that have gone into what we call British waters. Where have the fish been caught down there?—A. Mostly upon this shore, except this present season; the largest part of the catch has been on this shore.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Senator FRYE. You did not understand the question exactly. The chairman asked you what proportion of the mackerel you captured in British waters were captured outside of the three-mile shore line, and what proportion inside of the three-mile shore line.

The WITNESS. None whatever have been caught within the three miles, to my knowledge.

Q. (By Senator EDMUNDS.) During any of the time?—A. No, sir.

Q. The best place to get them is more than three miles off shore?—A. Yes, sir.

MACKEREL CATCH.

I can state here in round figures, if they will be useful to you, that only four per cent. of the total catch of mackerel in the last 5 years has been taken in British waters, when we had the privilege to fish anywhere we pleased. The catch in British waters amounted to 75,000 barrels, and the total catch amounted to 1,800,000 barrels.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Taking the 75,000 barrels, how many of those barrels, according to your information, were caught within three miles of the British shore?—A. I should not think over 8 per cent.

Q. How far is it necessary for your vessels, that go to the Bay to fish for mackerel, to enter British waters within the three-mile shore line?—A. I should not think there was any necessity of them going within 5 miles, and from that to 10 and 15 miles.

Q. I mean for any purpose?—A. Not for any purpose really, according to my experience, only for shelter and water.

FUEL, SHELTER, AND WATER.

Our vessels are well provided, as a general thing, with fuel, and it is only necessary to go in for water and shelter, and we do not require shelter in the Bay of Chaleur anywhere until late in the season. In June and July they do not require that, even, and it is only occasionally that they would have to go in for water.

FRESH FISH.

Q. Do you bring catches of fresh mackerel from the Bay?—A. No, sir.

Q. It is too far for sailing vessels?—A. Too far.

Q. So that you would have no occasion to go ashore for ice?—A. None.

HALIBUT FISHERY.

Q. In your halibut fishery you carry the ice out from here always, do you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And stand right straight off for the halibut-fishing ground?—A. Yes, sir. We take from 25 to 40 tons to a vessel.

LANDING PRIVILEGES.

Q. Taking the cod-fishery, the mackerel fishery, and the whole thing together, how far do you regard as of any practical value to American fishing interests the right to go ashore or inside the three-mile limit except for shelter and for fresh water?—A. I should not think it was of any value whatever.

Q. You would not consider, then, that you would make any more money in your business, or that your fishermen would make any more in theirs—which is the same thing—if Canada were voluntarily to give you the free right to fish offshore and return as often as you wished?—A. No, sir; only it might be a convenience.

Q. But, of course, all the time your vessels were in port they would not be getting fish?—A. That is true.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What proportion of your men, taking it for 10 years together, are American citizens?—A. I should think about two-thirds.

Q. Those men have their residence here or in this neighborhood, somewhere along the American coast, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Their families and children, of course, have all the benefits of your schools and everything of that kind?—A. Yes, sir.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON PRICES.

Q. Do you know anything as to how the imposition of the duty, the 1st of July, on Canadian salt fish affected the price here?—A. It did not affect it at all.

Q. The prices were raised. Nobody raises the price but you know that you know.

WHOLESALE.

Q. Do you know the price of fish, as they are sold here, wherever they are sold, in the various places?—A. I should think the price would be the original cost of the fish.

Q. Do you know the price of fish, as they are sold here, wherever they are sold, in the various places?—A. I should think the price would be the original cost of the fish.

Q. Do you know the price of fish, as they are sold here, wherever they are sold, in the various places?—A. I should think the price would be the original cost of the fish.

Q. The prices were not any higher as a result?—A. No, sir.

Q. Nobody raised his prices on account of the change of duty in any way that you know of?—A. No, sir.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICES COMPARED.

Q. Do you know anything on the subject of how the wholesale prices of fish, as they are shipped from this market or bought from the fishermen, wherever they are sold to dealers, compare with the retail prices in the various places where they are sold to the consumers?—A. I should think the cost to the consumers would be four times as much as the original cost.

Q. Do you know whether the retail prices of fish, in the sense I am speaking about now, to the people who eat them, vary up and down with the wholesale prices?—A. I don't think they do.

Q. The retail prices are only affected, if at all, remotely and gradually, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir. To give you an illustration: Our vessels supply the Boston market with haddock. We have sold them at 30 to 40 cents a hundred, and yet the retail price is 6 to 8 cents a pound. Occasionally, when the market is not supplied quite rapidly enough, the price to us runs up to 2, 2½, and 3 cents a pound, but 3 cents a pound is a very large price for us as producers, and they rarely reach that price to the producer.

HADDOCK AND COD.

Q. Are haddock caught in the same places as cod?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They school together, and haddock are caught at one haul and cod at another?—A. No, sir; they generally catch haddock at a drift trawls.

BAIT.

Senator EDMUNDS. You can make any statement you desire.

The WITNESS. I would like to state that our vessels that have pursued our inshore or Georges fishing have produced more fish than usual, and not one of those vessels has bought any fresh bait whatever in the Provinces; all their bait has been taken upon our own American coast.

DIMINUTION OF FISH SUPPLY.

Q. I wish you would state, as far as you know or understand it, whether it is the experience or opinion of fishermen that the quantity of fish on Georges Banks has increased or diminished. I do not mean the year rather than another, but taking it for, say, 20 years. Has the supply kept up, or has the continual catching decreased the stock on the bank? I know the number varies from year to year more or less, but take it for a long period of years together.—A. I think during the last 20 years they have diminished.

Q. It takes longer to make a fare?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is the same true of the Grand Bank and Western Bank?—A. I think not as to the Western Bank; it might be, but the Grand Bank is what we call inexhaustible. It seems to be considered that that is what we shall have to rely upon in future for our codfish.

MACKEREL FISHERY IN BRITISH WATERS FOR 1885.

Senator FRYE. I want to ask Mr. Steele a question about the mackerel fishery of last year in the British waters, and as to where the fish were found in those waters.

THE WITNESS. During only a small part of the season, while the American fleet has been in the North Bay, or waters off the provincial shore, have mackerel been found in any abundance, but, fortunately, when found, were 10 to 20 miles from shore. Nearly all the past season the native shore-fishermen have been unable to take but very few mackerel, the fish keeping wide out from shore, beyond the reach of their small boats. The total catch this year by the provincial fishermen will be found to be one of the smallest for many years, so much so that during the middle of the season at most of the fishing stations they gave up the catch entirely, but later on, as prices advanced, they were stimulated to make further exertions, because for a short time mackerel drew in near the shore, saving them from what would have been a very disastrous season. These facts are well known by all interested in the business, and can easily be proven if necessary.

This season; up to the present time, adds still another year to the many past showing that the inshore fisheries of the Provinces are of no value to American fishermen.

QUANTITY OF MACKEREL TAKEN IN THE PAST FIVE YEARS.

Senator FRYE. State as to the amount of fish taken the past five years.

The WITNESS. This table will show that :

Year.	Total catch.	Catch of provincial shore.
	Barrels.	Barrels.
1881	391, 657
1882	378, 863
1883	226, 685	28
1884	476, 018	19
1885	378, 515	28
Total	1, 851, 738	75

These figures show that only about 4 per cent. of the aggregate catch were caught in provincial waters in the last five years, during which time American fishermen had the privilege to fish anywhere.

INSURANCE.

By Senator FRYE :

Q. You stated that you were president of an insurance company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you president of a mutual insurance company here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The bulk of your insurance is of what nature?—A. On fishing vessels.

Q. Stock, or mutual company?—A. Mutual.

Q. What is the average cost of insurance for those fishing vessels annually?—A. I should say annually about 9 to 10 per cent.

Q. Nine to 10 per cent. of the full value of the vessel?—A. Well, as valued by the directors.

Q. About what are your annual losses here in fishing vessels?—The losses to our Gloucester Mutual, I should think, would average somewhere in the vicinity of about 7 or 8 per cent.

ANNUAL LOSSES OF VESSELS AND MEN FROM THE GLOUCESTER FLEET.

Q. How many fishing vessels on the average are lost here every year?—
A. I should say 10 to 15.

Q. How many of the men are lost annually?—A. From all causes 100 to 150.

COMPARATIVE COST OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. Will you give a statement showing the comparative cost of a fishing vessel as between the United States and Canada?—A. A United States fisherman, a hundred-ton schooner, would cost about $80 per ton. A Nova Scotia vessel, I should say, would cost about $40 a ton.

Interest on the $8,000 capital invested in the United States vessel, which I should call a fair average for vessels, would be $480.

Insurance on the same, at 10 per cent., would be about, I should say, $800.

Insurance on the outfit, at 10 per cent., would be $180.

Deterioration marked off from our new vessels would be considered generally about 15 per cent.; the percentage is larger on fishing vessels than on the coasting vessels; they depreciate and deteriorate very rapidly. That I should call about 15 per cent.; 15 per cent. of $8,000 would be $1,200.

Taxes on the capital of an $8,000 vessel here in Gloucester at about 2 per cent.; what I call city taxes amount to about $160.

The outfits would be about $1,800 on an average. I would state here that our vessel outfits are all the way from $700 to $2,500, and average about $1,800. Two per cent. of that would be $36.

Duties, direct and indirect, upon vessels, outfit, clothing, and provisions, I should say about 30 per cent. Fishermen all wear woollen clothes, and it is a pretty heavy tax upon all.

As near as I can reckon, these items amount to about 30 per cent. on the whole.

Now, as to provincial vessels:

Interest on their capital would be $240 a year.

Interest upon outfits and insurance about $400.

Deterioration only about, I should say, 10 per cent. I don't think those vessels, as a general thing, deteriorate so much as ours, on account of the lateness of the season when they start, and they do not fish so late in the year; they might fish from five to seven months, where we take from ten to twelve. So that the deterioration is more rapid on our vessels.

Duties, indirect and direct, as above, upon English vessels, none, with the exception of spirits.

Taxes, none.

BOUNTY.

Q. Besides that, do they pay a bounty to their fishermen?—A. Yes, but I may be mistaken, but I think in round numbers it amounts to some $2,000,000. I forget the amount, but I know it is a large amount.

EFFECT OF TREATY OF 1854.

Q. During the pendency of the treaty of 1854 what effect did it have upon the American fishery fleet?—A. We did not feel the effect of that reciprocity as much as we did of the recent treaty, first, on account of there not being the vessels in the business at the commencement of the treaty; and then, as the Senator has just suggested, we had a bounty which expired, if I remember, in 1866, of nearly half a million dollars paid to the fishing interests, of which Gloucester received probably something like $130,000 to $150,000.

INSHORE FISHERY.

Then, if you will remember, in the year 1866—I want to say a little in regard to the valuation of the inshore fishery—they charged us 10 cents per ton as license for the privilege of fishing within the three miles. Then we had some three hundred and odd licenses. In 1868 the license was carried up to $1 a ton. Then the number of licenses was reduced and came down to 150 sail that availed themselves of that privilege. In 1869, when the license went up to $2 a ton, it was almost prohibitory. There were only about 13 vessels took that license.

CANADIAN LICENSES TO FISH.

Q. That was the Canadian license for fishing in their waters?—A. Yes. I only state this to show the little value we put upon that inshore fishing in those 3 or 4 years up to 1870, with the $2 prohibitory license. They would not pay that amount for that privilege; they didn't think it worth it. The number of licenses had dwindled down from 300 to 13.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY OF 1854.

As far as the treaty was concerned we did not feel the disadvantage at first, because at first we had a bounty, as I say, and then the English fleet was very small indeed. But they were afterwards stimulated.

TREATY OF 1870-'71.

Q. Now come to the other treaty.—A. After the other treaty of 1870 of course they increased rapidly. They are almost fourfold I might say, while we have really diminished.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Have you diminished in tonnage as well as the number of vessels?—A. I should think we have diminished more in number than in tonnage, because our vessels have been built on a larger scale; but of course I have not those statistics and have only general knowledge.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Was your actual increase in tonnage the last 6 or 8 years at all proportion to the increase in the demand for fish product?—A. No, not at all.

Q. Suppose you had supplied the American market the last 10 years how much larger would the fleet be than it is to-day?—A. I should think it would be one-third larger. I think we have the facilities on our coast and in our harbors to take all the fish that the people of the United States want, even if our population amounted to 100,000,000, if we could only have the demand for the catch.

GRAND BANKS INEXHAUSTIBLE.

Q. In your judgment would the price of fish be increased to the consumer?—A. I think not. It is well said that when the New England fishermen go to the Grand Bank will clean up the Grand Bank.

Q. What, to come in fresh, for instance, to us. I think business is going years. What all over the country fish will take people like to eat in order.

FREE FISH.

Q. What, in your judgment, has been the effect of allowing fresh fish to come in free for general market under this clause of the tariff, "Fish, fresh, for immediate consumption"?—A. I think it has been a detriment to us. I think they ought not to come in free. I think the fresh-fish business is going to be the largest part of the business within twenty years. What with the refrigerator store-houses and cars, taking them all over the country as they do, I think the time is coming when fresh fish will take precedence of salt fish, because, as a general thing, people like to eat fresh fish in the room of salt if they can get them in good order.

FRESH HALIBUT ON ICE.

Q. We saw this morning a cargo of halibut being landed at your wharves; how long had those halibut probably been on that vessel?—A. Probably a fortnight or three weeks.

Q. Were they in good condition as they were landed?—A. I should say that they were; yes.

Q. And they had been kept in ice?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Keeping them in ice is a new thing, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. After those fish were landed they were boxed in ice?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For what market?—A. Principally for Boston and New York.

Q. When they arrive in New York and Boston, what is done with them?—A. They are distributed all over the country to the consumers.

Q. In refrigerator cars?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And preserved in refrigerators in the market?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. For how long may those fish be kept in good condition?—A. An indefinite period, I should say; as long as they can be kept frozen, whether one year, or two, or three.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. They are frozen at New York and Boston?—A. Yes, sir; they have a refrigerating store-house in Boston where they are frozen, and remain, I think, an indefinite period.

SMOKED HALIBUT.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Suppose this cargo of halibut which was being landed here this morning should be boxed and sent to New York, is there anything to prevent the smoking of all those halibut?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is there any way in which your collector here could follow those halibut and see that they were not cured?—A. I think not.

Q. So that those fresh fish which are brought in frozen may, without any difficulty at all, be transported elsewhere and cured?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have the various methods of freezing fish and having refrigerators on cars and on fishing vessels been in existence?—A. For ten or fifteen years in connection with fresh halibut, I should think.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Do you know whether, as a matter of fact, those fish that are sent to New York and Boston in ice are subsequently smoked and put on the market as dried and salt fish?—A. I could not say.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. I suppose, as a matter of fact, many of these halibut that come in fresh—the gray halibut or gray parts of halibut—are subsequently smoked?—A. Yes, sir. I will say that these halibut that come in here are smoked right here, and of course it could be done other places as well, if they wished.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Why are they smoked here?—A. Because they make a business of smoking them here.

Q. Out of that cargo of, say, 24,000 or 25,000 pounds, how many fish would be smoked? Would it depend on the market in New York?—A. I think it depends on the market in New York and Boston. When they run low, as a general thing, they go to the cutters, and are cut up and made smoked halibut of.

Q. So that these people whom we saw have these halibut this morning, if they found that they could not get a profit in New York and Boston, would cut them up?—A. Yes, sir. They have a regular agreement with cutters to take so many all the time when they are not marketable, and that depends on the condition of the fish.

SMOKING ESTABLISHMENTS AT GLOUCESTER.

Q. If I understand you, that smoking-establishment is here at Gloucester?—A. There are some two or three establishments here.

Q. How extensive are those smoking-works?—A. Quite extensive. They smoke millions of pounds every year. The vessels go out to Flemish Cap, two-thirds across the Atlantic, and the halibut they get are all salted and cut up on board the vessel; they then come here, and of course are only suitable for smoking.

Senator FRYE. They pay duty.

Senator EDMUNDS. They come in American vessels.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. If they came in Canadian vessels now they would not pay any duty?—A. No; they can be packed in ice, and also preserved by smoking

DUTIES UPON ARTICLES ENTERING INTO THE CONSTRUCTION OF VESSELS.

I heard the Senator speak in regard to what duties we are paying. I think I can give you a little information in regard to the construction of our vessels.

Senator EDMUNDS. State it, if you wish to.

The WITNESS. The duty on cables and cordage is about 20 to 25 per cent.

CABLES AND CORDAGE.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Are the cables and cordage you use imported?—A. No, sir; they are manufactured in this country, but the tax I speak of is the tax on the raw material, what we call raw manila hemp or manila grass, as it is sometimes called. There is no vessel sails that uses so many pounds as fishermen, on account of their 300 to 900 fathoms of 9-inch cable, which weighs a good many thousands pounds. In fitting out a vessel they will use 6,500 to 8,500 pounds of that manila, which is a very heavy tax.

Q. Do you know taken off the purchase that clear to your question. Combining power, and I think costs to manufacture sustain that or not in the hands to-day of manila grass.

Q. You know the cost. I don't think we

The WITNESS. If we are to pay duty, but it would save the duty Senator EDMUNDS. The WITNESS. A cent out a saving of 1 to 2 would be on anchors of a fishing vessel.

I would say now that would on the manufacture of this country on account of the cable and pliable; that Russia.

Q. Do you know if that duty that is paid on the raw material were taken off the purchaser whether the cordage would cost any less? Is that clear to your mind?—A. Well, I don't know. Of course it is a question. Combinations are very strong in New York with the money power, and I think to-day manila is two or three cents higher than it costs to manufacture it on account of the ring. Whether they could sustain that or not with the duty off, I don't know. But really we are in the hands to-day of, say, four men, who control the whole importation of manila grass.

Q. You know the experience in taking off the duty from tea and coffee?—A. I don't think we should feel any benefit to take it off.

DUTY TAKEN OFF BY SHIPPING ACT.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that the duty was all taken off to fishermen, in what was known as our shipping bill, at the last session of Congress?

The WITNESS. Was it?

Senator FRYE. Yes; that is to say, under the law passed last winter a fishing vessel now has all the benefits which were given to our ships built for foreign trade.

The WITNESS. Do I understand you that there is no duty paid upon any manila we now use upon vessels?

Senator FRYE. I do not know whether it would include manila. A drawback is allowed.

The WITNESS. We have never had any drawback here.

Senator FRYE. Then the law has not been enforced.

The WITNESS. It takes effect some time in the future.

Senator FRYE. I know I had a provision put in the bill in the Senate which extended to fishermen all the privileges allowed to vessels built for the foreign trade, so that your vessels have the same privileges that are allowed to vessels engaged in foreign trade.

Senator EDMUNDS. Does that apply to the manila brought in for cordage?

Senator FRYE. That would be American cordage.

Senator EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly, if he bought his cordage in London he would find he could not get it any cheaper.

ANCHORS AND CHAINS.

The WITNESS. If we wanted chains to-day for the vessel we would have to pay duty, but if the vessel should go into Halifax and buy them it would save the duty.

Senator EDMUNDS. How much would it save?

The WITNESS. A cent or a cent and a half a pound; not over 2 cents; but a saving of 1 to 2 cents a pound on chains is quite an item. So it would be on anchors or any iron in the construction or running of a fishing vessel.

RUSSIAN BOLT ROPE.

I would say now that there is a duty on Russia bolt rope of 3 cents a pound on the manufactured article, because we can't manufacture it in this country on account of not having the Russia tar, which makes it so supple and pliable; that quality is given to it by the tar that they use in Russia.

FISH-HOOKS.

I heard some gentleman ask this morning about hooks. There is a duty of 45 per cent. on hooks manufactured in a foreign country, and yet they won't allow you to import steel, from which hooks are made, without paying a duty of 60 per cent. I don't know why it is. Why should there be a duty of 45 per cent. on the manufactured article, and 60 per cent. on the raw material? We could compete in this country in the manufacture of fish-hooks if we only had that raw material cheaper.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Are the American hooks made from imported steel?—A. Not so much now as they used to be; the duty is 20 high.

Q. Is there any difficulty in manufacturing American steel that is good for fish-hooks?—A. They do not seem to prove so good as a general thing. No hook that we can get is equal to the imported Scotch hook.

Q. That is on account of the Scotch wire, I suppose?—A. On account of the Scotch wire.

WIRE ROPE.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What articles are there entering into the construction and equipment of one of your fishing vessels which have to pay duty, besides cordage, iron, &c.?—A. I have spoken, of course, of the anchors and chains; then there is wire rope, on which there is a duty of something like 45 or 78 per cent.

Q. Do you use much of that?—A. We are using more and more in the standing rigging of the vessel, and we are trying it as an experiment for cables.

Q. And there is a duty on the raw material that enters into your cordage?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, if those duties were taken off of the manila and other things, ought you not to be able to buy those things cheaper in this market than now?—A. Yes; I should say of course there would be a great saving.

DUTIES ON ARTICLES OF CONSTRUCTION AND OUTFIT.

Q. Can you form an estimate of the amount of duties paid upon a vessel, say of 100 tons, upon the material entering into her construction and outfit?—A. I should say, to the best of my judgment, it would be 30 to 35 per cent.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That is, if the whole duty is charged to the person who puts it on the ship?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And whether it is or not is the question?—A. That is it.

RATIO OF MARRIED TO UNMARRIED FISHERMEN.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Some inquiry has been made about the number of fishermen who would like to ascertain, as a matter of information, about the number of men engaged in fishing, as to whether they are men usually of families, or whether a large proportion are single men?—A. A large proportion of them are single men, young men, on account of the hazardous character of the business than obliged to go man gets to be sel. So, as a sue the fish, w men.

Q. What pr years of age?— vessels we pass were, from eig men that we ha mackerel catch fresh-halibut bu business.

character of the business. A younger class of men go in the fresh-fish business than in other kinds of fishing, as a general thing. They are obliged to go over the rail and get into a boat and go out, and after a man gets to be over 35 he wants to remain aboard and fish from the vessel. So, as a general thing, where they have to leave the vessel to pursue the fish, whether mackerel or trawling, they generally have younger men.

Q. What proportion of your fishermen do you suppose are over forty years of age?—A. I should think about one-third. If you noticed the vessels we passed this morning you saw what young-looking men they were, from eighteen to twenty-two, I should think. The best class of men that we have for fishing, I think, as a whole, are employed in our mackerel catchers, and the next grade I should say would be in the fresh-halibut business, or in the fresh-fish business anyway; it is a quicker business.

FISHERMEN GOOD MATERIAL FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. On the whole, what kind of sailors are they?—A. I don't think the world can produce better.

Q. During the last war did they take any part in the conflict?—A. Yes, sir; by the hundreds. I don't think there was a naval vessel afloat in those times in which the fishermen of New England were not represented. We sent a regiment of soldiers from Gloucester. That has been a characteristic in our wars, especially during the war of 1812, where we responded at Marblehead, and braver men and more daring I don't think ever existed.

NATURALIZED CANADIANS.

Q. How do you find the Canadians who come here and learn the trade of fishing, as you all agree about thinking they do? How do you find them after they become naturalized citizens? Are they of American sentiment?

The WITNESS. You refer more to the men from Nova Scotia, I presume.

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. Yes, sir; you had a fair sample yesterday, on the stand, of one of our naturalized citizens. Quite a number of these men are now men of property, and some of them are our best citizens, and as true and loyal Americans as I am myself, or any other man in Gloucester. I think their whole interest is with us.

FISHERIES OF GLOUCESTER SINCE JANUARY 1, 1885.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Have you responded to the letter directed to you by the subcommittee?—A. Yes, sir; I have the statements here.

Q. You may give us, then, first, the whole number of vessels licensed at this port since January 1, 1885, in the fishing business.—A. Above 20 tons there were 384 vessels, amounting to 26,499 tons; under 20 tons there were 54 vessels, amounting to 609 tons; in all, 438 vessels, 47,038 tonnage.

Q. Were any of them propelled by steam?—A. None of them propelled by steam; all propelled by sail.

NUMBER OF VESSELS CLEARED FROM GLOUCESTER FOR BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN PORTS.

Q. Now you may state the whole number of vessels cleared for any of the ports of the British North American Provinces during the same time.—A.:

Q. Do you know what proportion of these were fishing vessels?—A. None of them were fishing vessels.

PAPERS TAKEN BY FISHING VESSELS.

Q. As to those fishing vessels, what papers did they take out?—A. They took out an enrollment and license, and in a majority of the cases this year they have taken out a permit to touch and trade.

Q. Have you a form for one of those permits to touch and trade?—A. I have. This is the form:

Cat. No. 488.

Q. Do you know whether those permits to trade have been recognized by the British authorities?—A. In all cases that have been reported to the office they have not been.

Senator FRYE. You may make that permit to touch and trade a part of your evidence.

The WITNESS. You will see by the blank form that it is good for only one voyage. Two hundred and fifty-four fishing vessels have taken permits to touch and trade, issued under section 4364, Revised Statutes, and no fishing vessel has taken regular clearance. Three hundred and fifty-nine permits were granted.

IMPORTATIONS OF FRESH FISH AND DUTIES COLLECTED.

Q. Now you may state the total number of pounds of fish imported during the year.—A. The total number of pounds of fresh fish imported during the year was 1,186,700, and the duties collected on 28,464 pounds amounted to $142.22.

Q. How did you happen to collect the duties on any?—A. Those were the halibut that were not fit for the market and went to the cutters; on that my predecessor, Captain Babson, was allowed to collect the duties. He made the point with the Treasury Department that all should pay, but the Department decided that only those that were used for smoking or curing should pay the duty.

Q. The reason why Captain Babson was able to get at the proportion of that cargo of halibut that was cured was because they were cured here in Gloucester, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; 224,000 pounds of those fresh fish were halibut, and 962,700 pounds were fresh herring.

Q. Suppose, instead of being cured here, they had been sent to New York, would the collector have known anything about it?—A. Nothing at all, and none of the duties would have been collected.

Q. Is there any difficulty about bringing cargoes in here, entering them here, and shipping them to any port of the country?—A. No, sir; they can be boxed in ice and entered "for immediate consumption."

Q. And the fact that the collector did succeed in getting the duty on 28,464 pounds was because they were cured here right under your eyes?—A. Yes, sir; we could see them. We had a person attend to the delivery of the cargo, and on all that were not shipped off we collected duties.

STATEMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA VESSELS ENTERING AND CLEARING AT PORT OF GLOUCESTER.

Q. Have you any other statement that you have prepared?—A. I have a statement here in relation to the Nova Scotia vessels entering and clearing at this port for the purpose of fitting out this last spring, when our vessels in the Canadian ports were refused that privilege.

Q. Please give us that statement.—A. It is as follows:

Statement of Nova Scotia vessels entering and clearing at port of Gloucester, having visited said port for purpose of fitting.

Vessels.	Tons.	No. of men.	Entered.	Cleared.

The schooner Circassian, of Argyle, was fitted with bait, stores, and provisions for cod-fishing. The schooners Maria, of Argyle, and Roseneath and Byron, of Pubnico, were cod-fishermen. The other three were mackerel fishermen.

Q. These were English vessels?—A. All English vessels.

AMERICAN PORT PRIVILEGES AND CHARGES.

Q. Is there anything to prevent a Canadian vessel from coming here and lying at this port as long as she pleases?—A. They are obliged to report within 24 hours to the boarding officer, and are obliged to enter within 48 hours, unless detained here by stress of weather.

Q. What is the charge for entry?—A. Three cents a ton for tonnage dues; the entering and clearance fees would be 5.67 cents, I think.

Q. Is there anything in the custom-house rules or regulations to prevent their men from landing and going where they please?—A. No, sir.

Q. In other words, the Canadian vessel has the same privilege that an American vessel has?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To buy bait or anything else?—A. Yes, sir.

THE CASES OF THE SCHOONERS RATTLER, CRITTENDEN, AND MOLLIE ADAMS.

The WITNESS. I was inquired of yesterday in regard to the schooners Rattler, Crittenden, and Mollie Adams.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Are those statements which you have filed in your office?—A. Yes, sir; they are copies of the depositions of the masters that I took and forwarded to the Department.

Senator EDMUNDS. You may make those a part of your testimony.

The following are the papers referred to:

Affidavit of Augustus F. Cunningham as to the Rattler.

I, Augustus F. Cunningham, master of schooner Rattler, of Gloucester, being duly sworn, do depose and say:

That on Thursday, July 8, 1886, we sailed from Gloucester on a mackerel cruise. On Tuesday, August 3, having secured a fare of mackerel and while on our passage home, at 7 p. m., the wind loaded, with two lar Scotia, for shelter.

Just inside of the Terror, Captain Quigley came alongside, and harbor. My reply was of owner and capital bidding any of the tions. Boarding us, men on board of us must enter at the cut a revolver and a boarder to risk the day. Above short, the mainmen to fire a revolver on board the Terror, from the Terror, coming each of his two men Quigley were that I officer at Shelburne. The mainsail. The boatain Quigley on board in the night, and ordered house there. I asked house. His reply was your return show your vessel was in charge of will allow the captain his dory and two men, off in their dory, and if ere shoot him as the case did not allow a vessel and why the law was were a benefit to America. At daylight we got under four more armed men came on shore with L. Atwood, who, after inquiry entered and cleared the me to exhibit my clearance. I would state that when entered just ahead of us night, which showed presentment in Canadian Halifax informed me in American vessels. During the whole of the detention, to the satisfaction I deem my treatment international courtesy the signed by Capt A. F. passenger.

Affidavit of

I, Joseph E. Graham, do depose and say: That in the month of July my passage home from the treaty of 1818, I stopped at place informed me that receiving this information were on short rations the straits two of my men the straits, as I could not. Returning through the Strait Melgrave, and duly at 7 p. m., the wind blowing hard, the sea being rough, and our vessel being deeply loaded, with two large seine-boats on deck, we put into the harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, for shelter.

Just inside of the harbor we were hove-to by a gun fired from the Canadian cruiser Terror, Captain Quigley, and came to anchor. Immediately a boat from the Terror came alongside, and its commander, Lieutenant Bennett, asked why we were in the harbor. My reply was, "For shelter." Taking then the name of our vessel, names of owner and captain, where from, where bound, and how many fish we had, and forbidding any of the crew to go on shore, he returned to the Terror for further instructions. Boarding us again after a lapse of perhaps forty-five minutes, he put two armed men on board of us, asked for our crew-list, and said if I remained until morning I must enter at the custom-house, but if I could sail in the night, to tell his men to fire a revolver and a boat would be sent to take them off. At 12 o'clock that night, preferring to risk the dangers of the sea to the danger of seizure, I ordered the anchor hove short, the mainsail hoisted preparatory to sailing, and told one of the Terror's men to fire a revolver, which he did. Receiving no reply and seeing no signs of life on board the Terror, I ordered the revolver, to be fired again. This brought a boat from the Terror, commanded by Lieutenant Bennett, who boarded my schooner, gave each of his two men on board an extra revolver, and told me the orders of Captain Quigley were that I should not leave the port until I had reported to the customs officer at Shelburne. Upon receipt of these orders, I paid out the chain and lowered the mainsail. The boat went back to the Terror and immediately returned with Captain Quigley on board. He denied the permission given me by his first officer to sail in the night, and ordered me to go to Shelburne and enter, and clear at the custom-house there. I asked him how I should go, as we were 8 miles distant from the custom-house. His reply was, I "don't care, sir, how you go, but you must go there, and on your return show your clearance to me or suffer the consequences." He told me my vessel was in charge of his two men, and to them he gave these orders: "Gunner, you will allow the captain to proceed to Shelburne with the vessel, come to anchor, take his dory and two men, no more, and go on shore to enter; allow them to bring nothing off in their dory, and if a man puts his hand on the wheel to go to sea, chop his arm off or shoot him as the case may require." I asked him if the law was not very strict that did not allow a vessel arriving at night after office hours to proceed before daylight, and why the law was thus enforced. He replied, "To prove that Canadian harbors were a benefit to American fishermen."

At daylight we got under way and started for Shelburne, and Lieutenant Bennett and four more armed men came on board. We arrived at Shelburne about 4:30 o'clock a. m. I went on shore with Lieutenant Bennett and his boat's crew, and woke up Collector Atwood, who, after inquiring of the lieutenant if there were any charges against me, entered and cleared the vessel. On my return to the vessel the lieutenant requested me to exhibit my clearance, which I did, and we were then allowed to depart.

I would state that when we first entered the harbor of Shelburne a Canadian vessel entered just ahead of us, and she was unmolested, sailing at her pleasure during the night, which showed plainly that an American vessel was not accorded the same treatment in Canadian ports as are Canadian vessels, although, as the collector at Halifax informed me in June last, the same laws apply to Canadian vessels as to American vessels.

During the whole difficulty my language was respectful, and I quietly submitted to the detention, to the sarcastic language and overbearing conduct of Captain Quigley; but I deem my treatment and detention severe and unjust, and an outrage upon the international courtesy that should exist between two friendly nations.

Affidavit of Joseph E. Graham as to the case of the Crittenden.

I, Joseph E. Graham, master of schooner A. R. Crittenden, of Gloucester, being duly sworn, do depose and say:

That in the month of July last, I think on the 21st day, I was in the Straits of Canso on my passage home from a fishing trip. Thinking I had a right to fill water under the treaty of 1818, I stopped at Steep Creek for that purpose. The customs officer at that place informed me that if I filled any water, my vessel would be seized, and upon receiving this information I immediately sailed without water, and in consequence there were on short rations of water during the passage home. In my passage through the straits two of my men went on shore. I was then continuing my passage through the straits, as I made no stop after leaving Steep Creek.

Returning through the straits on my second voyage, say on August 4, I stopped at Port Malgrave, and duly entered and cleared, and one of the men who had gone on shore the previous trip came on board. On my passage home from the second trip, say August 27, while coming through the Straits of Canso, a lack of wind disabled us to stem the strong tide, and to prevent going on shore, we came to anchor at Port Mulgrave. Upon going on shore I was informed that my vessel was seized for landing men and filling water, and a fine of $400 imposed, which I deposited with the collector of customs. I protested against the payment of said fine, believing that I violated neither treaty nor law, preferring, as my action shows, to put my crew on short water rations rather than do anything illegal.

JOSEPH E. GRAHAM,
Master of Schooner A. R. Crittenden.

We, Robert Sawyer, Robert Jameson, Alonzo Callahan, of the crew of schooner A. R. Crittenden, having knowledge of the facts contained in within affidavit, do swear that within affidavit is true in every particular.

Affidavit of Solomon Jacobs as to the case of the Mollie Adams.

I, Solomon Jacobs, master of schooner Mollie Adams, of Gloucester, being duly sworn, do depose and say: That I arrived at Port Mulgrave, Straits of Canso, N. S., on August 31 on my way home from a fishing voyage, in want of water, our water-tank having been burst by the laboring of the vessel caused by the heavy weather during the passage from the fishing grounds; I duly entered at the custom-house and asked permission of the collector to purchase two or three barrels to put some water in for the passage home. He answered that he could not allow us to buy anything, not even the barrels, and if we did, our vessel would be seized. We were therefore obliged to start for home with but 75 gallons of water (which we had in barrels on board) for a crew of eighteen men, for a passage of 500 miles. I protest against such treatment as severe, and if not in violation of the treaty of 1818, certainly in violation of the common charity of mankind. In trying to make some other harbor on our way up the Cape shore in hopes to replenish our scant supply of water, a gale of wind was encountered, which not only prevented our making any port, but caused damage to the vessel and loss of about ($700) seven hundred dollars' worth of mackerel from the deck and the smashing of two seine boats worth ($500) five hundred dollars. Had we been supplied with water we should have been offshore with our vessel, and would have been in condition and situation to avoid the damage sustained. By struggling to keep off the rocks we sustained all this damage.

TESTIMONY OF FITZ J. BABSON.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

FITZ J. BABSON sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Fifty-eight years.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. At Gloucester.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. At present I am handling real estate and doing some little literary work; I was formerly collector of the port of Gloucester for seventeen years.

Q. Have you had any acquaintance with the fishing business as carried on at this port?—A. I have.

GENERAL HISTORY OF THE FISHING BUSINESS.

Q. Explain to the committee in your own way the nature of these fishing fleets—how they are fitted out, where they fish, and give whatever facts or information you possess concerning the value to our fishermen of the right to fish within the inshore lines of the British Possessions of North America.—A. I have been present at the hearing of the testimony before this committee yesterday and to-day, and I will say that the testimony I have heard in regard to the fitting of the vessels by those who are practically engaged in that business is substantially true. I would like to make some statements in regard to the history of the fishing business from the time of the first treaty down to the present, and give to the committee as many of my own views as I have in my mind and as many facts as I have become possessed of by observation.

Q. You can go on in your own way.—A. In the first place, the treaty of 1783 between the United States and England defined the rights of the United States upon the land as well as upon the ocean. By that treaty we find that the American fishermen were given the entire right to fish along the shores of the present Dominion and Newfoundland without any hindrance whatever. They were to occupy the same grounds and to have the same rights that they had as colonists.

After the war would like to cal position of the Br considered to be with our rights a and the banks in ever, though by t they appear there had no right to d war of 1812 term menced to harrass The treaty of I treaty Mr. Rush shores of the Don deprive our people water, shelter, and Q. DOMINION FISHERIES

There is no doubt stimulated after th reason: Their fisher ions to that time, I and the mackerel fis United States as a fr apal market for ma tent that towards ge fleet of vessels tion of that treaty

After the war of 1812 England repudiated the treaty of 1783, and I would like to call attention to the treaty of 1783 in order to show the position of the English Government at that time in regard to what they considered to be their rights on the ocean. They gave us, together with our rights along the shores, the right to fish on the Grand Banks and the banks in the ocean, over which they had no jurisdiction whatever, though by the language of the treaty jurisdiction is assumed, and they appear there as giving us privileges of that kind, when in fact they had no right to do so. As early as 1815 Great Britain claimed that the war of 1812 terminated our right to the inshore fisheries, and commenced to harass and capture our fishing vessels.

The treaty of 1818 was made after the fall of Napoleon. In that treaty Mr. Rush and Mr. Gallatin conceded the right to fish on the shores of the Dominion, but the language of the treaty was such as to deprive our people of all rights to go into their ports except for wood, water, shelter, and for the repair of damages.

Q. By "our people" you mean purely fishing people?—A. Fishing vessels entirely.

THE TREATY OF 1818 A BASIS FOR SUBSEQUENT NEGOTIATIONS.

There is one point which, I think, is of great importance in connection with the policy of the English Government. In all treaties made subsequent to 1818 they have used the language of that treaty as the basis of their negotiations, and in those treaties have always referred to "the rights and privileges granted to the fishermen of the United States by the treaty of 1818," and have then proceeded to the other privileges and provisions of those subsequent treaties. We have had within the last six or seven years an example of what the language of that treaty conveys. We have rights in common with British fishermen on the coast of Canada and Newfoundland, and those rights in common have been construed by the English Government, through Lord Salisbury, at the head of that Government, at the time of the Fortune Bay trouble, as being restricted and abridged by the colonial laws. The colonial laws of Newfoundland, for instance, in the matter of the herring fishery, provide that there shall be no herring taken by or in a seine from the 30th of October until the 25th of the following April. That would entirely debar our people, even if we had the treaty of Washington in operation to-day, from taking any herring on those coasts, as our people use seines for this purpose, and under the gill-net process, which the local law allows, we could not pursue the business. (See Ex. Doc. No. 84, May 17, 1880; alleged outrages at Fortune Bay; message of President Hayes.)

DOMINION FISHERIES STIMULATED BY THE TREATY OF 1854.

There is no doubt whatever that the fisheries of the Dominion were stimulated after the treaty of 1854 went into operation, and for this reason: Their fisheries had been conducted in boats almost entirely previous to that time, had been carried on in small boats from the shore, and the mackerel fisheries had not amounted to much. But having the United States as a free market, and the United States being the principal market for mackerel, their fisheries were stimulated to such an extent that towards the end of that treaty, in 1866, they had a very large fleet of vessels engaged in the mackerel fishery. After the termination of that treaty those vessels gradually went into other business, until at last it amounted to very little. But when the treaty of 1873 came into effect then it was that, having our free markets and a knowledge of the value of the mackerel fishery, their fleets increased. I have here some statistics that were gathered by the committee that visited Washington during the last session of Congress, in which I find, from Canadian sources, that in 1873 they had about 402 vessels and about 9,000 boats; that in 1885 they had somewhere in the vicinity of 1,117 vessels and 28,472 boats, an increase of almost 300 per cent. I also find from the same statistics that in 1873 the fishing tonnage of the United States was about 109,519, and in 1884 it was 76,137 tons, a loss amounting to 33,382 tons, or a fraction over 30 per cent.

COD-FISHING OUTSIDE OF NATIONAL JURISDICTION.

It has been assumed by the English Government that we pursued the cod-fisheries inshore along their coasts, but I think that the committee by an examination of the map will see that the cod-fishery is pursued almost entirely on the banks outside of all national jurisdiction. The only use we make of their shores in this fishery is to go in for bait.

BAIT.

That matter of going in for bait is one which has caused a great deal of trouble on that coast. In the Fortune Bay case, when our vessels attempted to take herring for bait, they were driven off by the mob, and they found that it was impossible to take herring or any other fish on that shore, because it deprived the inhabitants of about their only means of living. Newfoundland has no agriculture of any consequence, no commerce, and no manufactures; she has nothing but this fishing, and the people who live along the shores must either have this fishing or must starve. Our people have been in the habit of going there for bait, and it was well known that the inhabitants would rather our people would come there and buy bait than not. But I think it must be admitted that the whole action of the Canadian Government in this direction has largely a political basis. The interests of those poor fishermen are not to any extent represented in their public prints or their parliamentary debates.

HALIBUT.

The halibut fishery at one time was quite extensive on Georges Banks, but at present we do not catch many halibut there, but codfish and haddock and mackerel in their season. Nearly all of the halibut are brought in preserved in ice, and they are becoming a luxury in the market. A few vessels flitch their halibut and salt them in bulk in the vessel. These are smoked, and in this form are fully equal to smoked salmon in flavor and richness.

FRESH FISH.

I wish to say one word at this point in regard to the matter of fresh fish. By the tariff act the language "fish, fresh, for consumption," or "for daily consumption," was intended to refer to fish brought into port to be eaten by the local inhabitants. In 1861, when this clause was inserted in the tariff, we were not packing our fish in ice to the extent we are now, and it was not known to the legislators to what extent this business would grow. year has been carried along in subsequent enactments from time to time, without, perhaps, an inquiry into the matter, so that to-day we have it upon the tariff list, "fish, fresh, for daily consumption, free."

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Is the word "daily" used?—A. Yes, sir.

Senator FRYE. It is not "daily"; it is "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption"; that is the present language.

Senator EDMUNDS. I suspect that Mr. Babson has taken the language from some book of regulations, and not the statute.

The WITNESS. I take the language from the Customs and Tariff Regulations of the Bureau of Statistics.

Senator FRYE. I am sure that in the statutes you will find it "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

Senator EDMUNDS (to the witness). You can go on.

The WITNESS. The question of immediate consumption, of course, as applied to fish, was construed—and I have so decided in my official character as collector—to mean fish that could be consumed without any artificial process of preservation, that could be consumed immediately upon being landed. The schooner Neskaleta came into this port with a load of halibut. As collector, I imposed duties, under the present tariff, on that halibut as for preserved fish, on the ground that it was not fresh in the sense contemplated by the tariff law when providing that fresh fish should be admitted free. The question was, of course, referred to the Treasury Department, and the decision came that it was to be considered as "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption." The regulation concerning importation of fish is this: that the fish shall be landed, but if it is smoked or salted it shall be dutiable. It would be utterly impossible for the custom-house officials to follow the fish to any other place to see how they were treated or in what manner they were disposed of. Therefore it seemed to be almost an anomaly in the decision that fresh fish after passing out of the hands of the customs officials should be considered free under that clause, in the manner in which the Treasury Department ruled. But still that was the ruling of the Department, and we had to submit to it. I have in my mind, however, a very strong impression that it never was intended by the tariff act to make that disposition of ice-preserved fish.

Senator EDMUNDS. I have referred to the Revised Statutes of 1873, and find that the language is, "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption."

The WITNESS. It has been seen by the committee to-day that the fish when landed from the vessels are certainly three or four weeks old. They cannot, therefore, be fresh fish, and they may be kept six or seven weeks. It has been said here in evidence that Mr. Snow and others have buildings in New York where they keep fish months and months.

Senator EDMUNDS. No doubt the construction of the language would refer to fish unsalted.

The WITNESS. Fish in their natural state and without artificial preservation I should consider fresh fish.

Senator SAULSBURY. "Fresh" is used in contradistinction to "salt," I think.

The WITNESS. Canada imposes a duty of 1 cent per pound on all fish, fresh or salted.

MACKEREL FISHING.

Years ago, when we fished for mackerel with hook and line only, our vessels went into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and they used to carry menhaden for bait. The menhaden did not go further north than the Maine shores, and consequently were not available to the British fishermen. The vessels used to carry from 50 to 100 barrels of bait to the bay. It was ground fine, and being of an oily nature would keep near the surface.

Senator EDMUNDS. That is what we call chump.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir. They would throw the bait overboard, and that would attract the fish and keep them together. The vessels would not go any farther from shore than it was necessary to go for the fish. The vessels of the United States used to take a great many mackerel, perhaps, nearer inshore than they do now. But when the seine came into operation, then, of course, the whole system changed. As a rule our vessels use no bait whatever now; they carry seines, and very few indeed have anything to do with the hook.

SEINE FISHING.

In seining operations, as explained, they are obliged to have deep water. I have had numerous statements from the captains of vessels as to injuries to their seines by attempting to seine anywhere near the shore, when we had a right to do so under the treaty of Washington. They have not been able to use their seines to any great extent near the shore, even when the fish have been there.

MACKEREL—WHERE TAKEN.

Speaking of mackerel and where they are taken, in 1881 and 1882 we took so many off our own coast that we had no vessels at all in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I think we had only one or two, or perhaps three, in 1881, and one in 1882; those are all the vessels we had there to take mackerel in those years. It is very apparent, therefore, that only in such exceptional years as this, 1886, for instance, the gulf fishery is of any value to us. Last year there were some 405,000 barrels of mackerel taken, and only some 26,000 taken in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, only about 6,000 of which were taken inside of the three miles. In regard to the taking within three miles, I will state that some few years ago I suggested to the Treasury Department the propriety of issuing a circular to the collectors of ports calling upon them to procure from the captains of vessels statements as to where their fish were procured and how many were taken within and how many without the three miles. Those statements should be on the files of the Department now. If so, they are correct, and will show very clearly just the amount of mackerel taken within and without the limit.

VALUE OF FISH AS COMPARED WITH COST OF TAKING.

In listening to the evidence to-day I did not hear any of the fishermen or captains of vessels state anything as to the relative value of the fish as compared with the expense of producing them. There is but little doubt—and compilations have been made by various fishermen here in Gloucester—taking into consideration the wear and tear, insurance, a fair rate of wages for the crews, and other expenses, and selling the fish at a fair valuation, that the product of the fish, taken as a whole, will amount to any more than the expenditures. Fish, like any other raw material, are valueless in the ocean until caught. There is another point in connection with this subject which it may be well to consider as bearing upon or a farm, or with a certain are not sure of attached to it. being able to d nently; they are are twenty or fo produce the fish cannot agree to tity, it seems to their inshore fish statistics by whi return for anyth the Halifax Com part of the Engl would certainly i broadly made th actually add that

UNCERTAINTY OF MARKET.

When we have them a guarantee f in the alleged treat as bearing upon treaties, and that is this: Take a factory, for instance, or a farm, or almost any other kind of business, and we will find that with a certain amount of material we will have certain results. But we are not sure of results in the fishing business. There is no certainty attached to it. It is a precarious business. And as regards Canada being able to deliver anything to us, the fish are not there permanently; they are inside the three-mile limit to-day and to-morrow they are twenty or forty miles off. Then, again, it costs Canada nothing to produce the fish. They are not property in hand. The Canadians cannot agree to deliver any amount; and being such an uncertain quantity, it seems to me that it would be impossible to measure the value of their inshore fisheries, and impossible that they could give any sort of statistics by which we could be assured of any adequate and certain return for anything we might pay for privileges. When I was before the Halifax Commission I found that the general impression on the part of the English managers was that by the increase of duties we would certainly increase the price of the mackerel. The assertion was broadly made that if we added $10 to the duties on mackerel we should actually add that amount to the price to the consumer.

AVERAGE PRICE OF MACKEREL UNDER DIFFERENT TREATIES.

As that matter has come before the committee, I would say that I have a table, that I compiled myself from the best authenticated sources, of the prices of mackerel. For twelve years, from 1842 to and including 1853, the duties were $2 in gold per barrel, and mackerel, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, averaged $10.42, $7.56, and $5.06, respectively. Under the reciprocity treaty for thirteen years the gold value was $13.57 for No. 1, $9.76 for No. 2, and $6.37 for No. 3. The average prices for the period between the termination of reciprocity and the treaty of Washington were $14.16 for No. 1, $8.31 for No. 2, and $6.24 for No. 3. The prices for the period from the treaty of Washington to the present time have averaged per barrel $14.98 for No. 1, $8.37 for No. 2, and $5.85 for No. 3.

That will show that the duties that have been imposed under our tariff laws have not had the effect to raise the prices at all. Supply and demand has been the governing cause, as is distinctly shown this year.

LEGISLATION SHOULD BE IN THE INTEREST OF THE PRODUCER.

I wish to make this point very strongly: that Gloucester represents the producing interest. The fish that are sold from the vessels in Gloucester net the fishermen from a half cent, perhaps, up to 2 or 2½ cents a pound. Any future legislation affecting the prices between producer and consumer ought to apply to the wholesale merchant, the retailer, and the transportation company, rather than to the producing fisherman, who earns less than $300 a year, for it would be a hardship to put him in connection with the details of a trade that might affect him unfavorably, perhaps, in certain seasons, and give a wrong impression as to the cause of the high price the distant consumer may have to pay for his fish.

UNCERTAINTY OF THE FISHING BUSINESS UNDER CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION.

When we have a treaty of reciprocity with Canada we simply give them a guarantee for twenty years—I think that is the time proposed in the alleged treaty that has appeared in the newspapers—that they can pursue their business and know what time they have before them and what they are going to do. But take the case in the United States. We have no guarantee here, only from Congress to Congress, of any certainty of the perpetuity of our fishing business; our vessel-owners who have their money invested in vessels have no guarantee from the United States Government whatever of the perpetuity of their business. Our foreign trade has almost gone from us. The men who compose the crews largely of the vessels engaged in that trade are not the men who emigrate to this country and stay here; they may almost be said to constitute a population with no nationality, giving their allegiance to the best price paid for their service.

OUR NAVY TO BE RECRUITED FROM OUR FISHERMEN.

The United States to-day, as a consequence, has no proper material from which to create a navy except that now engaged in the fishing business. The value of the fisheries as a basis for a navy is sustained by all history of maritime nations, and would receive the indorsement of every experienced officer in our own Navy.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE IN THE FISHING BUSINESS.

If Gloucester, Newburyport, Beverly, Salem, or any of these towns along the coast where I have been could only have a guarantee from the United States Government that their business could be pursued without interference, and that they could have the market of the United States without being subjected to onerous competition, they would feel that it would afford them a reasonable profit, and it would tend largely to inspire confidence in them and increase the business. Confidence is the great thing that is needed to-day. I know the anxiety of our people. I know how they have felt here for years, and of course I can speak understandingly of this matter. I do not know what can be done, unless Congress should pass a law, if possible, to do so—I do not know, but hope it can be done—that for the future the United States will regard all these fisheries as belonging exclusively to ourselves, and they are not to be made the subject of treaty negotiations with any nation. We have our organizations and associations for the protection of things on shore, but at the same time the Government is not expending a single cent for the benefit of these seafaring men. Our coasting trade has never been subject to the competition of foreigners. The fisheries should be placed upon the same basis, and from them both would be constituted a marine force equal to every emergency of peace or war.

BOUNTIES TO FISHERMEN.

There is no class of men so well trained for the sea as these fishermen, and there is no other nation of any consequence in the world that has not for years paid and is now paying its fishermen a bounty in some form. Canada is paying, out of the interest on the $5,500,000 paid her by our Government, and will continue to pay, a bounty to her fishermen of $5 or $10 each. She pays out annually to her fishermen in bounties something like $200,000 or $300,000. She has some 60,000 men who are available to England as sailors in case of war, and upon those men England can draw to recruit her navy. As has been stated to-day, these young men who come here from the Provinces you find young, able, and willing to work. It would cost at least $2,000 to raise any one of

I suppose the case by the United States in consideration of the case shows the manner in which also a permit to the treaty of 1818, it is on the coast, under that treaty, claim that Canada is a treaty by passing a law to impose penalties on those who are doing nothing to enforce the provisions of that treaty.

Do you not think that reasonable regulations to distinguish them from others, for instance, making all proper arrangements, but I do not think that our vessels as will be at custom-house which will cost $400 if they fail to do so between Mr. Evans and Salisbury was at the time he resisted Mr. Evans when he came into port, and that bounty was paid. By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. If they do not get naturalized after coming here, we do not secure their services in case of war with England.—A. Of course we know that no man can command an American vessel unless he is naturalized.

SERVICES OF THE FISHERMEN IN CASE OF WAR.

Q. You are speaking of the value of this fishing education in case of war. If they are not naturalized American citizens, of course they could not fight against their own country, no matter how long they had been catching fish for us.—A. That is true; but they do get naturalized; that is almost a necessity; the best men among them are those who naturally aspire to command vessels, and it is a necessity for them to become naturalized in order to have their ambition satisfied in that regard.

RIGHTS OF FISHERMEN UNDER THE TREATIES.

I suppose the committee are versed in the nature of the papers issued by the United States to our vessels. I have with me here, for the consideration of the committee, what is called a shipping paper, that simply shows the manner in which the men ship on board our vessels. I have also a permit to touch and trade. As we are now acting under the treaty of 1818, it is very apparent that we have our rights there on that coast, under that treaty, to go in for wood, water, and shelter. Now I claim that Canada has no right to abridge any of our rights under that treaty by passing any law, customs or otherwise; nor has she any right to impose penalties for alleged violations of such laws, when our vessels are doing nothing more than they have the right to do under the guarantees of that treaty.

Q. Do you not think the British have a fair right to make proper and reasonable regulations in respect of vessels of this character, in order to distinguish them from trading vessels that might be engaged in smuggling, for instance?—A. I consider that they would have a right to make all proper and necessary inspections through their local officers; but I do not think they have a right to impose any such regulation upon our vessels as will oblige them to report their arrival immediately to a custom-house which may be five or ten miles away, subject to a fine of $400 if they fail to do so. That question was discussed in the argument between Mr. Evarts and Lord Salisbury in the Fortune Bay case. Lord Salisbury was at that time at the head of the English Government, and he resisted Mr. Evarts's claim. Afterwards, however, when Mr. Gladstone came into power, the demand was acceded to, and $75,000 indemnity was paid. In the course of his argument in that case Mr. Evarts maintained vigorously that no local law of the Dominion or of Newfoundland could in any way impair the rights of our vessels by imposing any disabilities upon them when acting in conformity with the terms of the treaty.

Q. Does not the treaty provide that they may make reasonable regulations?—A. Such regulations as shall prevent them from abusing the privileges.

Q. Then the question becomes, what is reasonable under the circumstances?—A. Yes.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Who is to judge of that?—A. The United States and Great Britain, who are the supreme powers and who agreed to that treaty—the Dominion. They have, however, put their own construction upon it. In former years, under the permit to touch and trade, any fishing vessel could go into a Canadian port, and if she had failed to get a full trip, or had any other reason for so doing, she might partially load with oats, potatoes, or other products of those Provinces, and there was no question whatever in regard to it. We acquired no commercial rights whatever by the treaty of Washington (simply the right to take fish within three miles of the shore). The laws of Canada were the same then as now; we had the treaty right to fish within her jurisdiction; we now, under the treaty of 1818, go in for wood, water, and shelter.

If it is necessary now to report at the custom-house to show the character of our business when we go for shelter, why not then when we went to fish or to buy bait? The treaty of 1818 had been in existence sixty-eight years, and our vessels have exercised their treaty rights under it without customs interference until now. There is a reason for this sudden action. Under the treaty of Washington we received no commercial privileges whatever. They had just as much right to impose these regulations making it necessary for our vessels to report, or to refuse to recognize the authority of the United States as exhibited in permits to touch and trade, as they have now. But this is used at present for a purpose—to force us into a reciprocity treaty. There is no question whatever about it. Their parliamentary debates show it. The United States has provided that a vessel with a fishing license has a right to have a permit to touch and trade, and with such a permit she has a right to go into a foreign port, to a Dominion port, and there and then exercise the same rights that she would have under a register.

Q. She becomes for that purpose a trading vessel?—A. If the captain of a vessel sees fit to change the character of his voyage by the operation of that paper he can, and when he returns to the United States he will have to pay entrance fees and tonnage dues as he would have to do under a register. If he does not use his permit to touch and trade, it has no effect whatever. At the same time vessels which have such permits have a perfect right to go in and buy. The Dominion of Canada, however, has said that she would not recognize this authority of the United States, and it has been set at defiance, and our Government has made no remonstrance. I have made every endeavor I could, as an individual, to get some definition of the rights of our people in this respect, but have never yet been able to do it from the present Administration.

The act of Canada in refusing American vessels, having proper authority from the United States, to trade in foreign ports, (viz: a permit to touch and trade,) is absolute non-intercourse, and should be regarded as such by our Government.

THE HERRING FISHERY.

The herring fishery is pursued almost entirely as a mercantile trading action. Our vessels go there and buy the herring, or hire men to catch them. If that fishing should fail, the inhabitants would have to starve. In the course of my visits to the Dominion I have learned that about those coasts the inhabitants for years and years have had aid from the Government, and that the entering of our vessels to buy bait was a consideration of great value to the poor fishermen along the coast. So, as the taking of herring is concerned it is of no real value to our people.

It is fully as economical as herring as it is to catch herring, as we can have no measure.

Q. You speak of the concurrence of the fishery with that the inshore. Have you any measure of the people? I understand that at night. Is it true that along the coast a few years ago the fish were offered to sell in houses, boats, and up the business here.

The Prince Edward shores of Nova Scotia, buckwheat, and potatoes, and thus alternate.

Q. Is there a large occupation?—A. Yes.

Q. I wanted to know the number of fisheries by Canada. The number of the Atlantic fishery of 1880. According to the States employed a large number of men.

The minister of marine department for the fisheries.

Number of men employed	...

In the matter of the number of foreign vessels, the report of Prof. G. Brown is indeed in ascertaining.

It is fully as economical to pay the local operative fishermen for the herring as it is to take them ourselves. Therefore, as a practical fishery, herring, as we obtain them, cannot be considered as a fishery, and can have no measure of value as a fishery concession.

VALUE OF THE INSHORE FISHERIES.

Q. You speak of the inshore fisheries; I think there is a very general concurrence of testimony that has been elicited before us to the effect that the inshore fisheries are of very little value to our fishermen. Have you any means of ascertaining what their value is to the Canadian people? I understand that their fishermen go out in the day and return at night. Is it a valuable fishery to that class of Canadians who live along the coast?—A. Not of great value. I think it is but a very few years ago that an American located on Prince Edward Island offered to sell his whole establishment, consisting of wharves, warehouses, boats, and everything of the kind, for about $3,000. He gave up the business himself and went away.

FISHING AND FARMING.

The Prince Edward Island people and some of the people along the shores of Nova Scotia do some farming. They can raise turnips, oats, buckwheat, and potatoes, and can also go out fishing from the shores, and thus alternate their farm work to some extent with fishing.

Q. Is there a large number of fishermen engaged in that alternate occupation?—A. Yes, quite a number.

EXTENT OF THE FISHERIES.

Q. I wanted to secure an estimate of the value put upon these fisheries by Canada.—A. In making up what might be called the statistics of the Atlantic fisheries at present I have consulted the census reports of 1880. According to that census the fishery industries of the United States employed about 130,426 persons, of whom 101,684 were fishermen.

The Canadian valuation is as follows:

Extent and value of the Canadian fisheries.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, May 28, 1886.

The minister of marine and fisheries has laid upon the table the report of the fisheries department for the year 1885:

Number of men employed	59,403
Number of vessels	1,117
Number of boats	28,472
Value of vessels	$2,021,633
Value of boats	852,257
Value of nets, &c.	1,219,264
Total value of the fishing plant	6,697,460
Total yield of the fisheries, 1885	17,702,973

NATIONALITY OF THE FISHERMEN.

In the matter of the nationality of the fishermen we find that the number of foreign fishermen in the United States, according to the report of Prof. G. Brown Goode—and Professor Goode was very thorough indeed in ascertaining all the facts connected with his census report—excluding the 5,000 negroes and 8,000 Indians and Esquimaux, those who were considered not to be native born, did not exceed 12 per cent. of the whole number. That is the official report.

I do not know what other points there may be in regard to which the committee may desire information; but if there is any question you wish to ask I shall be very happy indeed to answer it if I can.

INSHORE FISHERIES.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Did you see the returns where it had been undertaken to ascertain what proportion of the fish were taken inside the three-mile shore line?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know what they showed?—A. They showed a very small percentage indeed, not more than one-eighth or one-tenth of the catch in the Gulf.

Q. That is, out of the whole catch in the Gulf not more than one-eighth or one-tenth was taken within the three miles?—A. Yes.

THE HEADLAND QUESTION.

The question of the headlands is, of course, one that is, I think, of national importance. Our rights should be settled by the United States asserting and maintaining some position. Our fishermen have been uncertain as to their rights in many cases on account of the lack of any position having been taken by our Government with reference to their rights in those waters, and where there have been disputes our fishermen have had trouble on that account.

SEIZURE OF A VESSEL AT SHELBURNE.

A very short time ago a report was forwarded to the State Department, through Mr. Steele, the president of the Fisheries Union, in regard to a seizure at Shelburne. I made the report for the captain, who told me that he went into Shelburne Harbor last March, and when he anchored off the quay they seized his vessel, when he had only been in twenty-four hours without reporting to the custom-house. He went in at 3 o'clock at night. The practice here in Gloucester has been that if vessels are here but twenty-four hours they are never expected to make any direct report to the custom-house; if they make a report to the boarding officer it will be sufficient, as per Customs Regulations, and in case of stress of weather it has never been considered right to force vessels to enter when putting into the outer harbor for shelter only. The customs laws of the United States are enforced upon the basis of common sense and common humanity.

THE HEADLAND QUESTION.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Has there been any claim asserted, practically, by the British Government, which sought to exclude our people from a line drawn from headland to headland, where it was more than three miles from shore?—A. There never has been, except up to the time of the correspondence between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett (May 10, 1845) in regard to that matter. The English Government withdrew from its first position on that question, but has never abandoned the claim.

Q. My question is, whether there has been any practical attempt to exclude our fishing vessels from a line drawn from headland to headland, where such a line would be more than three miles from the shore?—A. Not at all, so far as I know. It has been reported in newspapers that our vessels have been excluded this year from the Bay of Chaleur.

PRICES OF FISH TO THE CONSUMER.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. In this matter of fish, I take it that the fishermen alone deal with the wholesalers; that they sell alone to the wholesalers?—A. This shipping paper which I have brought for your inspection will show you the form in which the fishermen ship on board the vessels, and also authorize the disposal of their fish.

Q. That is not the question. To whom do the fishermen sell?—A. The fish are generally sold by the owner of the vessel.

Q. I mean the owner of a fishing vessel; to whom does he sell?—A. To men who are buying—wholesalers.

Q. You do not get at what I am after. The dealings between the men who take the fish and the men who buy are between the owners of the fishing vessels and the wholesalers, are they not?—A. They are.

Q. Do you understand that the retailer's price is affected to any extent by the wholesaler's price?—A. Of course it must be affected somewhat. In this market the retail price for codfish is 7 or 8 cents a pound when they are bought from the vessel for 2 or 3. Of course, after the fish leave the hands of the producer, the owner of the vessel, there is no question at all but that if the prices are increased at all they are increased by the cost of transportation and by the middlemen who handle the fish until they get to the hands of the consumers.

Q. So far as your experience goes, has the duty affected the price to the consumer at all?—A. It has not to any extent. The whole matter of the fisheries is regulated by supply and demand; there is no question about that. The experience of almost forty or fifty years will show that. In 1831, with only about 12,000,000 inhabitants in the United States, we took with hooks about as many mackerel as we have taken any other year—383,658 barrels. The average catch for sixty years has been about 200,000 barrels yearly by the Massachusetts fleet. No man ever got rich by the actual production of fish alone.

HOW THE TARIFF AFFECTS THE FISHING INTEREST.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. If, as you say, the price depends entirely upon the supply and demand, how does the tariff question affect the interests of the fishermen at all, either as protecting them or otherwise?—A. I will tell you. A year or two ago, all at once, some twenty or thirty English vessels came into this harbor. Before their arrival fish had been selling at about $2.50 per hundred pounds; they ran the prices down to about $1.60 and $1.38 per hundred pounds, I think. It is the spasmodic influx, the bringing in at unexpected times, you may say, that affects the prices in a particular case. Then there is the want of confidence, the not knowing how, as you might say; competition is going to come and how large it is going to be; that also affects the people. If our people could have the United States for their market, without intervention from foreigners, Gloucester would send out 1,500 vessels, whereas she now has less than 500.

Q. I am fully aware that prohibition would afford protection to American fishermen; but I ask whether the present tariff does afford any protection to the fishermen here, if the law of supply and demand regulates the price?—A. It does in this way, as I say: If Canada had our free markets, such a condition of things would stimulate, as it always has done, the building of vessels and retention of their people at home; while, on the contrary, if we have protection, and are assured of it, our vessels will be built here, and foreigners will come here and go fishing, and our business will increase. In other words, we will do the business instead of foreigners doing it. Canada has had five and one-half millions of dollars paid her for nothing in the last twelve years. She has had nearly six millions more remitted in duties. She has had, and is having to-day, our free-markets for her ice-preserved fish, worth hundreds of thousands of dollars to her yearly. She is allowed with perfect impunity to place her own construction on treaties, to limit our rights, to seize and fine our vessels for alleged violation of the technicalities of local laws, and set at defiance the official marine documents of the United States, while our own fishermen ask only for the same tariff protection that is afforded every other producing industry in the country, and no special privileges whatever, and beg and pray they may not be slaughtered by their own Government; and this is their only plea, while their business affords the Government its only power on the ocean.

Q. You mean by protection the exclusive right to use our market?—A. The exclusive right at least that the present duty and a duty on fresh fish would afford. This is a national question. It is a matter almost of self-preservation. I feel really that the United States should look to its fisheries and its coasting trade for its marine power, and that in no other way can it be sustained unless our people have that guarantee.

Q. I am not considering the question as to the prohibition of foreign vessels coming here. What I desire to know is whether, in your opinion, the existing tariff upon salt fish does in fact afford any relief or protection to American fishermen?—A. I think it does. It really gives them that confidence which they actually need, and the margin of duty gives them something of an equality with the Canadian producer.

BRITISH COMPETITION.

Q. Does it operate at all to exclude the Canadian fish from our markets?—A. Not when the supply here is short. If the supply here is short they can afford to pay the American duties and bring in their fish.

Q. But if the American supply is liberal, then you think they would not send so many?—A. The American fleet is large enough at present to regulate the price of fish. Here come two vessels into Boston Harbor, we will say—one American and the other Canadian. They have 500 barrels of mackerel each, of the same quality, taken at the same place. The American sells his mackerel at the same price as the other, at $10 per barrel, making $5,000. He takes his money and goes about his business. The foreigner has to take his $5,000 and go up to the custom-house in Boston and pay $1,000 duties. The difference between these two operations is very apparent. The British vessel, after paying duties, cannot make so much as the American, and our fishing business is stimulated to that extent. The original wholesale buyer does not ask the transport because the English transportation men. As long, therefore, and the supply of consumer; but let come from Canada the consumer will not ask the transportation merchant $2 more for the English mackerel because the English captain paid $2 per barrel duties, neither does the transportation merchant ask the retailer or the retailer the consumer. As long, therefore, as the American fishermen, by their own competition and the supply of fish, regulate the price, the duties will not affect the consumer; but let the American fleet disappear and our supply of fish come from Canada, she will have a monopoly, and, duties or no duties, the consumer will have to pay her price for his fish.

Q. The British vessel-owner cannot make so much, of course, provided the expenses of his catch are as great. But the testimony taken by us is to the effect that there is a very considerable difference in the outlay for wages, living expenses, and the like.—A. There is no question about that.

Q. If that is true, might they still not afford to pay the duty and compete with us?—A. I take the ground that they can afford to pay the duties and compete with us to some extent. But if we consider the naked question of whether the price of fish is increased by the duty, I say it is not. But taking the surrounding circumstances and considering what would come from the effect of having those duties, then I say our fishermen are going to hold their own or increase. Our fleet has been decreasing, while theirs has been increasing under the system by which they had our free markets. On the contrary, when they did not have our free markets the figures show that their fleet decreased and ours gained.

Q. Do you know whether their fleet is now increasing or decreasing since the 1st of January last, for instance?—A. No, I could not say to-day.

Q. Whether it is increasing or diminishing since the operation of the present tariff law?—A. I have not at hand the Canadian statistics. Nova Scotia alone had 143 schooners built in 1883. That is a large fleet for that small province.

The two maps here referred to are filed for the use of the committee.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM A. WILCOX.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

WILLIAM A. WILCOX sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Forty-seven.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. Gloucester.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. I am agent of the United States Fish Commission, also manager of the American Fish Bureau.

Q. How long have you been engaged in the fish business?—A. Since 1873.

Q. What branches of the business have you been in since that time?—A. The same that I am in now since 1874.

Q. Describe what you do.—A. It is my duty to keep a statistical record of the arrival and receipts of all vessels in Gloucester engaged in the fishing business; I have done that since I have been here, a year ago last January; also, through correspondents and agents at all other ports, from Prince Edward Island, on the extreme east, as far as Philadelphia, on the south, to ascertain the arrivals and receipts at other ports; also to ascertain all general information, where the fleets are, what they are doing, with what success they are meeting, as well as to secure all the statistics possible both here and elsewhere.

Q. So that it has been your duty to get all obtainable information in connection with your position in the Fish Commission of the United States and the American Fish Bureau, as it comes to your knowledge from time to time, as to the whereabouts of fishing vessels, what they are doing, with what success they are meeting, &c.?—A. As far as possible, yes.

Q. Have you kept records and made tables of this information?—A. I have. I have the name and cargo of every vessel that has arrived in Gloucester since I have been here, since a year ago last January, and a daily record from all the other leading ports, as I have received them, from day to day.

Q. Do you compile these records so as to show the yearly returns of cargoes?—A. I compile them, so far as Gloucester is concerned, once a week, showing the arrivals from the various fishing grounds; I also compile monthly, quarterly, semi annual, and yearly statements at the close of the season.

STATEMENT CALLED FOR.

Senator EDMUNDS. We should be glad to have you make a tabulated statement, if you will be kind enough, at your convenient leisure, which you can send to me hereafter, unless you have it made now, of the results of these fishing operations since you began to keep this record, as to the quantity of fish taken by American vessels and by foreign vessels, the places where they were taken by American vessels, whether inshore or offshore, and the value of those fish; in short, a summarized statement of information bearing upon the points you have heard us discussing here.

The WITNESS. I shall be pleased to do so. So far as my work here is concerned, since I have been here in Gloucester, everything has been reported to the United States Fish Commission, at Washington.

Q. How long have you lived in Gloucester?—A. Since a year ago last January.

Q. Where before that?—A. In Boston.

Q. What business were you in in Boston?—A. I have been in the same business since 1874.

Q. Did you fit out vessels?—A. No, sir; I have only just been engaged in this business of collecting and compiling statistical and general information in regard to the fisheries.

ies—what proportion, in your opinion, of the mackerel caught by American fishing vessels in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and adjacent waters have been taken within three miles of the shore?—A. That I couldn't say. As far as the amount of mackerel taken off the Nova Scotia and other provincial shores is concerned, it is not far from $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the gross catch for the last five years. I have kept the accounts very closely in regard to that.

MACKEREL CAUGHT IN AMERICAN AND PROVINCIAL WATERS.

The gross catch from 1881 to 1885 amounts to 1,797,583 barrels of salt mackerel.

Q. Where?—A. Landed in the United States, caught by the New England fishing fleet from all ports; of which only 75,711 barrels were taken from the provincial waters off Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. What proportion of that was taken within the three-mile line I could not state.

Q. You have not the means of knowing?—A. Except in a general way, from conversation with fishermen; they would always say scarcely any at all, or very little.

Q. Did you hear them say that before the 1st of July, 1885?—A. I have always heard them say that, as a general thing, very few fish were taken near the shore; that the water was shallow, and there was great danger of tearing the seines; and that the fish were more apt to be outside than inside.

CHARTS.

Q. Did you help make these charts hanging on the wall of this room, showing the fishing grounds, &c.?—A. Yes, sir.

Senator EDMUNDS. One of them, containing the tables, I wish you would file with the clerk of the committee.

Q. Who helped you make these charts?—A. Captain Joyce, of the steamer Novelty.

Q. Has everything that has been put on there by you and Captain Joyce been put on truly and according to your best knowledge, information, and belief?—A. As far as we knew. I do not pretend to be an expert on the fishing of the Provinces; I just assisted Captain Joyce. He was a practical fisherman, and he outlined it and I put in the statistics, and also assisted in making them; but Captain Joyce mainly was the expert to lay out the ground. I have never been over the ground.

Q. When were these charts made?—A. Last winter, I think, along about January. All the statistical portions and comparisons I made.

Q. What would be the expense of getting duplicates of these charts?—A. Five or six dollars.

SALT AND FRESH FISH.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Will your statistics show the proportion of fresh to salt fish?—A. No, sir; the fresh fish I have paid very little attention to, with the exception of fresh halibut, for the last year and a half, since I have been here, and I have no statistics of fresh fish at all that are complete. I have paid attention only to salt and dried fish.

Senator EDMUNDS. Later on we will examine Mr. Earll at Washington. He belongs to the Fish Commission; he will furnish statistics for us.

By Senator FRYE :

Q. I understood you to say that these minutes on one of these charts were taken from statistics?—A. Yes, sir.

MACKEREL CATCH FOR 1885.

Q. Is the statement correct immediately below these words: "Mackerel catch by the United States vessels for the season of 1885"?—A. That is correct so far as I know.

Senator FRYE. That statement is as follows:

	Barrels.
Amount of mackerel taken within three miles of the provincial shores	6,564
Total amount taken in the Gulf of St. Lawrence	37,633
Amount taken off the United States coast	37,515
Total catch by the American fleet	40,149

Q. That was during the continuance of the treaty and the restoration of it by Mr. Bayard?—A. Yes, in 1885. This also includes the total catch of fresh mackerel for the season. That is made up from the returns by the captains of vessels at the close of the season.

OCTOBER "CENTURY" ARTICLE IN REGARD TO GLOUCESTER FISHERIES.

Q. Who is Captain Collins?—A. Capt. J. W. Collins is at present employed by the United States Fish Commission. He is captain of the Fish Commission schooner Grampus.

Q. What is his special business?—A. He is subject to the orders of Professor Baird.

Q. Engaged in the fishery business all the time and gathering statistics?—A. Sometimes he is in Washington engaged there, and sometimes at sea, wherever he is ordered by the United States Fish Commission.

Q. Did you read the article in the Century written by him?—A. I did.

Q. What number of the Century?—A. October, 1886.

Q. Did you examine the article carefully?—A. I did not. I glanced over it very hurriedly, coming down on the train from Boston.

Q. Do the statements contained therein agree with the knowledge you possess, so far as you have investigated?—A. From glancing over it hurriedly I should say they do.

Q. It is a pretty important statement of facts, is it not?—A. Yes, I consider it so.

Senator FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the chairman of the subcommittee be requested to communicate with Captain Collins, and have him verify the article contained in the October number of the Century on this question, and that after being verified it be admitted as evidence before the committee.

Senator EDMUNDS. If there is no objection an order of that kind may be entered on the minutes.

TESTIMONY OF BENJAMIN H. SPINNEY.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

BENJAMIN H. SPINNEY sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. I will be twenty-nine next December.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. I reside at Gloucester.

Q. How long have you lived here?—A. I was born and brought up here.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fishing.

Q. Have you been in that business all the time?—A. Yes, sir. I have been more extensively interested in the business during the last eight years.

Q. How many vessels have you?—A. I have three.

Q. What kind of fisheries are they engaged in?—A. I have got one to Georges, and one to the Banks salt fishing, and one catching halibut.

CASE OF THE EVERETT STEELE.

Q. Have you had any of your vessels interfered with by the people of the Provinces?—A. The Everett Steele was seized in Shelburne.

Q. I suppose you were not on her at the time?—A. No, sir; I was not on board.

Q. What was the name of the master?—A. Charles H. Forbes.

Q. Where is he now?—A. He has gone home.

Q. Where is his home?—A. He lives in Nova Scotia.

Q. Is he an American citizen?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You can state what happened to the Everett Steele, according to your information.—A. The vessel fitted out here and sailed, I think, on the 23d of August. She was fitted for three months, and supposed to make a voyage for the rest of the season.

Q. What kind of fishing was she going on?—A. She was going on a salt trip.

Q. For mackerel, or cod?—A. Codfish. She was full of salt and had her provisions and all her gear for the necessary length of time it was expected she would be out. She sailed, and she baited at the Isle of Shoals, and went down. She fished, I think the master said, four or five days, when his water got out or nearly so, and he went in. I believe his pumps also got out of repair and a few of his blocks, and he went in to Shelburne to fill up his water and repair his pumps and blocks. There he was seized by this Captain Quigley, I believe his name is, and kept there about twenty-four hours. There was a part of the crew left; they wouldn't stop; that is, if they couldn't go on to make up a voyage. They had been fishing off the shore about 15 miles, and when it came bad weather they ran in under Sand Point; that is, about 9 miles from the custom-house; and Captain Quigley said it would be necessary for them to report, and he should compel them to every time they came in. The vessel has always been down there, and days before had the privilege of going in in bad weather and lying there until it was suitable weather to fish. So the men they mutinized, the theory that if they couldn't have the shelter of the port they couldn't remain any longer, and part of them left. He brought his vessel home, and had five men left besides himself when he got here. The voyage had to be abandoned.

CANADIAN PORT REQUIREMENTS.

Q. Had your vessels been required to report before this year?—A. No, sir; not under a fishing license. I had one schooner that went herringing to Newfoundland one winter, and she carried some stuff down to trade, and whatever port she made it was necessary to report.

Q. I suppose that vessel had a permit to touch and trade?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But when your vessels are merely going on a fishing trip under a fishing license and want to go in for shelter or repairs, they have never been required, as I understand you, to report until this case?—A. No, sir.

TESTIMONY OF CAPT. EDWIN JOYCE.

GLOUCESTER, MASS., October 5, 1886.

Capt. EDWIN JOYCE sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Thirty-one.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. Swan's Island, Maine.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Fishing; mackerel seining.

Q. How long have you been in that business?—A. About fourteen years.

Q. Have you been fishing this year?—A. Yes, sir.

CASE OF THE MORO CASTLE.

Q. What vessel have you been in?—A. The Moro Castle.

Q. Is that a schooner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About how many tons?—A. About eighty-four tons.

Q. Have you been interfered with or molested by the Canadians in any way?—A. Yes, sir; they took our schooner about the 11th of September, at Port Mulgrave, in the Strait of Canso.

Q. You were in the Strait of Canso at that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What were you doing?—A. We were going through there; had some idea of coming home; didn't know whether we would or not certainly.

Q. Were you under way?—A. We had been anchored about fifteen minutes when we were seized.

Q. What part of the strait were you in?—A. We were about half-way through.

Q. What did you anchor for?—A. The tide turned against us, and the wind was moderate and calm, but we had to tow in to keep from going back again to where we had come from. We towed some hour and half, I guess, with a boat, to get in.

Q. That is, towed with your own boat?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that the only reason why you anchored?—A. Yes, sir; that was the reason why we anchored.

Q. Had you undertaken to have any communication with the shore?—

A. No, sir.

Q. What took place there after you had anchored?—A. As soon as we had got the sails furled the collector of customs come aboard and says, "I am going to inform you, captain, that I have seized your vessel in the Queen's name." He says, "It isn't anything that you have done, but it is something that was done in 1884." That is what he stated at that time.

Q. What did he say was done in 1884?—A. He said he didn't know what it was; he said the claim was sent from Chester, Nova Scotia, and he had orders from Ottawa to seize the schooner if she came there, but what the claim was he didn't know.

Q. What happened then?—A. He then ordered us to take the schooner across to Port Hawkesbury; that is on the other side of the Strait. I told him if it was for something I hadn't done, that I should refuse to do it; if he wanted the schooner taken over he would have to take her over that night, as we had just towed in. But he said it would be some expense for the owners for him to put on a gang to take her over. I told him if he would wait until morning, and there was a breeze of wind to do it at that time, to save expenses to the owners we would take her across.

Q. How far across?—A. About a mile and a half, I think.

Q. Does the tide set pretty strong through that strait?—A. It does in the spring; I think there is about a knot and a half or two knots tide any time.

Q. Did you stay all night there where you lay?—A. Yes, sir; we did. He had two of the cutter's men and the custom-house officer, Mr. Burneau, stop aboard all night.

Q. What took place in the morning?—A. In the morning we took her across and anchored her at Port Hawkesbury, with only one watchman aboard at that time. The cutter came up and he had another watchman put on board the schooner, and we lay there some three days and the cutter lay alongside of us. I guess this was Saturday night. Monday morning I telegraphed to her owners in Gloucester, and they telegraphed back that they had telegraphed to the consul-general at Halifax, and for me to act under his advice.

Q. What was this armed cutter that lay alongside of you?—A. It was an armed cutter; one of these sailing cutters that they have down there this season, named the Houlette.

Q. How long did you lie at Port Hawkesbury, and what took place?—

A. We lay there, I think, some four or five days before they took the schooner in to the wharf; they then took her in to the wharf, and the cutter left as soon as we were taken in. We lay a couple of days to the wharf before they stripped the schooner, and then the custom-house officer said he was going to take the schooner and shut her up, and that the consul general would have to look out for us.

Q. What did you do then?—A. So I went and saw Consul Clough. I had seen him before, and he made arrangements to send us home on the steamer.

Q. So you had to leave your vessel and come home?—A. Yes, sir. While I was there I wanted the collector of customs to give me a statement in writing as to what he would release the vessel for, and I would send it home to the owners. He said, "There is no need of that; you can telegraph to the owners, and they will do all that is needful." I got him to figure it up to see what she could be released for, and finally he said that on the claims against her they would release her on deposit of $1,000.

Q. What did you have on board at that time—anything besides your outfit?—A. We had about 39 barrels of mackerel.

Q. How long had you been down in those waters?—A. About five weeks.

Q. Before you left Port Hawkesbury did you learn of what the vessel was accused?—A. No, sir; we couldn't find out. I found out that they had two claims against her this season. This English detective that was there said he had claims enough against the vessel to take her and four just like her, allowing they had done just the same thing.

Q. Did he tell you what that claim was?—A. He didn't tell what it was.

Q. You spoke of two claims made against her this season; what were those? Do you know?—A. One was for getting stores at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, to go home. We were bound home and hadn't enough stores to get home with, and we went in and got some stores, enough at least to get home with, some $44 worth, I think.

Q. Was that the same trip?—A. No, sir; that was the trip before, in July.

TIGNISH.

Q. Did you pay any harbor and port dues, pilotage, or anything of the kind, at Tignish?—A. No, sir; we did not. There is no harbor there, and I never knew of their having a custom-house there.

Q. What sort of a place is Tignish?—A. It is just a straight coast along there; there is a little boat harbor there that takes, I think, about 6 feet of water, but our schooner draws 10 and 11.

Q. How much of a village is it?—A. There is no village there at all, just scattering buildings.

Q. Any store?—A. Yes, sir; a little store kept by an American fish firm there, by the name of Myrick.

Q. Did you see any custom-house there when you went ashore?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see any custom-house officers?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you see any British flag?—A. No, sir; nothing to indicate a custom-house in any way or shape.

MIRAMICHI.

Q. What was the other thing they said you did this year?—A. They had a claim on us about getting salt out of Miramichi.

Q. What were the circumstances about that?—A. We got some salt out of a Nova Scotia schooner named the Zelia.

Q. Was that in the port of Miramichi?—A. Yes, I suppose so; I don't know. We were, I suppose, some 20 miles from the custom-house. The square-riggers that come here go up the river 20 miles.

Q. You were at the mouth of the river?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much salt did you get?—A. We had 15 barrels of salt.

Q. You bought it from a Nova Scotia vessel that had some?—A. We didn't buy it at all; we simply got the salt from a brother of our owner and I got the salt of him and never paid for no salt. He just simply said for me to tell his brother, and I never paid for the salt, and never took the scratch of a pen for it.

Q. You were in need of a little more salt?—A. Yes, sir. They had been there the year before and exchanged salt with each other, and he said it was all right.

Q. Did you ship?—A. No.

TESTIMONY OF ORIN B. WHITTEN.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

ORIN B. WHITTEN sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you live?—Answer. I live in Portland.

Q. How long have you resided here?—A. Twenty years.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fish business.

Q. In what direction, or in what capacity?—A. We are owners of vessels.

Q. How many?—A. We have 14 or 15 now that we are interested in.

Q. Are you in business in any other way than the fishing business?—A. That is all.

Q. What is the character of the vessels you own?—A. They are cod and mackerel fishing vessels.

AMERICAN MACKEREL VESSELS AND OUTFITS.

Q. What is the average tonnage of a mackerel-fishing vessel?—A. I should say 60 tons; that is only an estimate, of course.

Q. What do they cost per ton ready for business?—A. I should say that the average cost of a vessel ready for sea would be, with all fishing appliances, about $10,000. I get this information somewhat from others.

Q. That is over a hundred dollars a ton?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That includes appliances?—A. That includes appliances.

Q. What would it be without the appliances, ready for fishing?—A. Perhaps about $8,000.

Q. What is the character of the vessels as to quality?—A. The very best.

Q. Made of hard wood?—A. Made of hard wood.

Q. Oak?—A. Oak.

Q. Made substantial and strong?—A. Made first-class; yes, sir.

CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. What is your knowledge of the Canadian vessels engaged in the same business? Are you acquainted with them?—A. I am not fully acquainted. I have seen Canadian vessels. They are made mostly of spruce, soft wood.

Q. Have you any idea what they cost per ton as compared with yours?—A. Probably they wouldn't cost half as much as ours.

MACKEREL—WHERE TAKEN.

Q. How many vessels have you engaged in the mackerel fisheries?—A. We have some vessels that go cod-fishing in the early part of the season, and for mackerel in the latter part.

Q. Where have you been in the habit of fishing for mackerel?—A. Mostly on this shore.

Q. How long have you been engaged in it?—A. About twenty years.

Q. During those twenty years you have been so engaged what proportion of your mackerel have been taken in American waters?—A. We never have made much of a business of sending vessels into the Bay; about all our mackerel have been taken here during the last twelve years.

Q. Where here, as a rule?—A. Anywhere from Cape Cod to the Bay of Fundy.

Q. And what proportion of those taken in our waters were taken within the three-mile shore line?—A. As far as my knowledge goes, I think a very small proportion was taken within that limit.

Q. State, as nearly as you can, what percentage.—A. I should judge not over 10 per cent.

SEINES.

Q. What has been the difficulty, during the last ten or fifteen years, of fishing for mackerel within the three-mile shore line?—A. The only difficulty in using a purse-seine is on account of the water being shallow.

Q. It is dangerous to the seines?—A. Yes.

Q. The bottoms are generally rocky on our coast?—A. Yes, sir; they don't like to take the chances with a seine worth from $1,000 to $1,200.

Q. Does the same difficulty prevail in the Canadian waters?—A. It does.

Q. So far as your experience extends with the fishermen of Portland, how much of their fishing is done in the English waters for mackerel?—A. Very little.

Q. And during the last fifteen or twenty years what proportion of it has been done within the three-mile shore line since the invention of the purse-seine?

The WITNESS. In the English waters?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. Oh, very little indeed has been done within the three miles.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. If there was a treaty existing to-day by which you had the right to go in the Canadian waters within the three-mile shore-line, would any of your vessels go there to fish?—A. I think perhaps there might be localities where

COD AND HALIBUT.

Q. Where do your vessels take cod?—A. At the Western Bank, mostly, and Quereau.

Q. Do you fish for halibut?—A. We do not.

BAIT.

Q. In fishing in Canadian waters for halibut—I do not mean in waters within their jurisdiction, but off their coast on the Banks—what necessity is there for your fishermen to go into their ports for bait?—A. Not any whatever. All our vessels for cod-fishing use salt bait, which we get here, and about all the fishing done in Maine is done with the use of salt bait.

Q. What kind?—A. Clams; the same as the Nova Scotia people use.

Q. So that that privilege of going to buy bait into English waters is, in your opinion, worth nothing?—A. Not to us here; for what we call the dory fishing, hand-line fishing; that is about all we do here.

Q. You do not trawl?—A. We trawl some, but very little.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Why do you require a different bait in trawling?—A. On the trawl they use a fresh bait; the trawl extends a long distance.

Q. But if a cod will bite a salted clam at the end of a hand line, why not on the trawl?—A. No doubt he would bite it, but still, where these vessels go they come to anchor and drill for their fish, and they take a long string of gearing and thousands of hooks, and they use fresh bait because they think the fish will take it more readily than salt bait.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Is there any necessity of going into the ports of Canada to get fresh bait?—A. It is not necessary; they can get it here and take it with them. There are thousands and thousands of barrels caught no further off than Wood Island.

CANADIAN PORT PRIVILEGES.

Q. Do you consider valuable the privilege of going into Canadian ports to buy bait?—A. I do not consider it of any value at all. The vessels that go there with salt bait get their trips a good deal quicker than if they had had to go for fresh bait, because sometimes they have to go a hundred miles for fresh bait, and before they get back to their fishing grounds the bait may spoil. Then, again, it is an inconvenience in this way: When the crews go ashore they almost invariably make drafts on account of certain things they want. So, on the whole, I take it that it would be better for us to send all our vessels with salt bait to the Banks than it would be to depend on fresh bait on the Nova Scotia shore.

Q. Then, so far as the Canadian ports are concerned, other than for purposes of shelter, water, wood and repairs of damages, it would be better for the fishermen of Maine if they were not permitted to go in at all?—A. I think so; I don't think there is any occasion for them going in for shelter, because our vessels are far from there. Perhaps they might be able to go in in case of a storm, but generally during the fishing season we have no occasion whatever for shelter or water—that is, for our vessels from here.

FREE FISH.

Q. What can Canada give the Maine fishermen, so far as you know, that would be an equivalent for our market to them?

The WITNESS. Our market free to them?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

A. Not anything. I can't see anything that they have to give us to offset the advantage they would gain by a free market here.

Q. Do you know anything that would be valuable to the Maine fishermen that could form the basis of a treaty with Canada reciprocal in its character?—A. I do not.

VESSELS AND OUTFITS.

Q. What does your outfit cost?

The WITNESS. That is, just the provisions, you mean, or the barrels, salt, and everything?

Senator FRYE. Take the whole outfit.

The WITNESS. The seines, too?

Senator FRYE. Leave them out. The fitting out you make for a voyage.

A. For a Bank trip they might cost, taking the dories, the salt, bait, and lines, $1,200.

Q. And does that include provisions?—A. Yes; I think $1,200 to $1,500 would perhaps cover the whole.

Q. How would the Canadian outfit compare with yours in cost?—A. I cannot say.

Q. You do not know?—A. Only what I gather from what I have heard.

Q. You may state from the best information you have from fishermen.—A. From the best information I have from fishermen they can fit a great deal cheaper than we can; they live differently.

Q. More cheaply?—A. Yes, sir. We are a sort of progressive people, and even the fishermen want the best there is, so that we have to fit our vessels with the very best possible.

PROVISIONS.

Q. What do you put on board your fishermen for food?—A. The same almost as we have at hotels.

Q. Coffee and tea?—A. Yes, sir; and pork. When they live at home they live off the market; when they get in off a trip they generally go to market for fresh food, vegetables, &c. Some even take condensed milk, tamarinds, apples, and everything of that kind.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. On what terms do your vessels engage in fishing?—A. They say on what we call half-line; that is, the owners of the vessels furnish the vessel with everything required to catch fish, and the crew have one-half the proceeds of the fish, and out of their half they pay the cook wages and one-half the bait bill.

Q. When do they get their pay?—As soon as the fish are sold. For instance, if a vessel comes in to-day with mackerel, just as soon as they are sold the crew, as a general thing, are settled with; or, if they leave before the mackerel are sold, they are settled with when they return.

Q. Are they paid in cash?—A. They are.

Q. Do you know whether or not the Canadian fishermen are paid out of stores?—A. I am told that they live out of the stores altogether.

EFFECT OF DUTY UPON THE CONSUMER.

Q. When your vessels come in they sell their cargoes of fish to the wholesaler, do they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then what becomes of them?—A. If they are codfish they are cured and put into the market, and then they are shipped all over the country. Our mackerel are packed ready for market, and then they are shipped all over the country.

Q. Do you deal to any extent in fresh fish?—A. Not any.

Q. What, in your opinion, is the effect of the present duty upon the price of fish to the consumer?—A. It has no effect whatever.

Q. If there is any effect it is between the fishermen and the wholesaler?—A. Yes, sir; I do not think the consumer has to pay any more with duty than he would without.

Q. Have you ever noticed that the duty had increased, or that the absence of duty has decreased, the price of fish to the consumer during the last fifteen years?—A. I don't know that the duty has anything to do with it whatever. In fact, it is strange that salt fish were never so low as they are at the present time with the duty on.

FREE FISH.

Q. Then, if the duty does not affect the prices of fish to the consumer, what is your objection to opening our markets to the Canadians and allowing them to bring in their fish free?—A. Well, I believe that New England is sufficiently equipped now so that we can furnish this country with all the fish it wants. I believe if you open this market free to the Canadians it will encourage them to increase the number of their fishermen. They, of course, can feed their men cheaper than we can, and as a general thing they can catch their fish cheaper than we can; and if they come into this market free it is going to have some effect upon the amount of fish we bring in. I believe this is an industry that is worth protecting. Here are millions of dollars invested in this business, and I believe New England is entirely able to furnish all the fish required, and so I don't believe we ought to do anything whereby we will increase an industry to foreigners at the expense of our own people. You can see that the materials entering into the construction of their vessels cost so much less with them than with us, and their manner of living is so much less costly; and taking everything into consideration, with the tariff of duties that we have to pay upon everything that enters into the construction of our vessels, it would seem to me to be impossible for us to compete with them if they had the privilege of bringing their fish in here free. It would have a tendency to increase their fleet; for the last eight or ten years their fleet has actually increased about 33 per cent. and ours has fallen off. Of course there has been a cause for this.

FISHERY BUSINESS OF GLOUCESTER AND PORTLAND.

Q. That was under the influence of the treaty of 1871?—A. Yes, sir. This is a very large business. You have been to Gloucester and have seen the extent of it there. We consider ourselves second in the fish business, and year before last we came, I think, within 8,000 barrels of taking as many mackerel as they did at Gloucester. We took 101,000 and they 109,000.

DUTY ON SALT FISH.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Have any Canadian salt fish come to Portland within a year?—A. Yes, sir; most every month they come here.

Q. Both mackerel and cod?—A. Both mackerel and cod.

Q. Who do you think bears the duty that is paid on cod now? Does it fall on the Canadian shipper, or fisherman, or does it fall on the wholesale dealer who buys it of the Canadian?—A. I think it falls on the one who brings it here.

COD AND MACKEREL FISHERIES OF MAINE.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. How many fishing vessels do you think there are in Maine engaged in the mackerel and cod fisheries?—A. I estimate, from my best knowledge, taking all there are in the fishing business, perhaps 600 sail.

Q. They average about how many men to a vessel?—A. Ten.

Q. Do not yours average more than 10?—A. Yes, sir; I was taking small ones and all. Our mackerel catchers will average about 15 or 16.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What proportion of your men are American citizens? I do not mean born here.—A. Take our mackerel catchers, and I think that I can safely say that seven-eighths of them belong here in Maine. Our cod-fishermen may be somewhat different, because we have some that come from Nova Scotia to ship in our vessels; still, when they come here a great many of them remain and become citizens. Our mackerel fishery is more in the hands of our own people.

Q. What kind of sailors are these?—A. Good sailors; no better. I think I have got vessels that haven't a single man on them but American.

FREE FISH.

Q. What, in your judgment, would be the effect of a treaty giving our markets free to Canada for 15 or 20 years?—A. I think the business would have to be abandoned by Americans.

Q. Where would the fishermen go?—A. They would go to Nova Scotia. You would find that the fish would become a luxury, instead of cheap food as they are now, for it is almost impossible for us to get along now. In fact, the duties are not as high as they ought to be. There ought to be a change made in some way, it seems to me, because the duty of $2 has not a sufficient effect in keeping them out.

Q. The duty is very low?—A. Very low. Fifty-six cents a quintal is a small object, of course, but it is not enough to pay for the difference that we have to have between our methods of fitting and furnishing our vessels and theirs.

FRESH FISH.

Q. Has the market for fresh fish been increasing very heavily?—A. Very much.

Q. Have you noticed that it has had any effect on the market for salt fish?—A. Perhaps it may have had some little effect, but still, all the fish that are caught are sold after a while.

Q. Have not the methods of preserving fish fresh and putting them upon the markets changed entirely within the last 10 or 15 years?—A. They have entirely.

FROZEN FISH.

Q. They are now taken in refrigerator cars, after having been frozen and transported all over the country?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that our fish may be preserved by freezing or by being packed in ice almost as well as by being cured?—A. They can be preserved a long time. I suppose they can be carried a fortnight, and I don't know but longer, and by a certain process they can be preserved a year, in the ice refrigerators.

Q. If a cargo of fish comes in and is entered at Portland, is there any difficulty about transporting them to the city of Lewiston and there having them all cured?—A. None at all.

Q. So that the law is very easy to be evaded?—A. Yes, sir.

DUTY.

Q. What, in your opinion, ought to be done as to fresh fish?—A. I don't know as I am prepared to say; perhaps others know more about that than I do.

Q. I mean as to the imposition of a duty.—A. I think there ought to be a duty upon fresh fish.

Q. That is, upon fish landed in a frozen condition?—A. Yes, certainly; they are really as much preserved as salt fish.

EXPORTATION OF FISH.

Q. Do you export any fish?—A. We do some; that is done mostly through commission merchants; the fish go to the West Indies principally. We make a great many of our fish for export.

Q. Is there any country to which you export fish in which you are not met with a duty?—A. We do not do enough of that business to be acquainted with it.

CLOSE SEASON.

Q. I want to ask you your own opinion, and the opinion of the Maine fishermen, as to a close season.—A. I am glad you asked me about that. I am sure that is the only salvation for the mackerel business. I can assure you that unless there is something done to protect the fisheries in the early part of the season it will only be a few years until the mackerel business will be a thing of the past.

Q. Why?—A. Because taking the fish in their spawning season destroys them; not only that, but taking a fleet of vessels and going into a school of fish, must, of course, drive them away; the larger fish go offshore and seek some other place. For instance, I sometimes believe that the cause of there being so many fish in the Canadian waters this year is on account of our fleet of 180 sailing vessels going south and scattering them, and driving them away; really chasing them.

Q. Do you think those mackerel are good for anything to eat when they are carrying spawn?—A. Not when they are carrying spawn.

Q. When they deposit their spawn they go deeper, do they not, so that you cannot take them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that in the months of April and May, in your opinion, they are not fit to eat?—A. They are not; they are very poor; they are not fit for an article of food, although they are carried to New York in abundance and eaten. Still, I do not believe they are fit to eat; and not only that, but I believe every one of those fish you catch is destroying a better fish, and in fact destroying thousands of fish.

HABITS OF MACKEREL.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What time do the mackerel first appear on this coast?—A. About the first or middle of June.

Q. Do they spawn after they get here?—A. As a general thing, I don't think they do; there may be a few exceptions, but as a general thing I think the fish spawn previous to June.

Q. Do you think they spawn farther south?—A. Farther south; yes.

Q. Do you believe that the fish that were found off Hatteras last March, for instance, and so along up the coast off Maryland, Delaware, and New Jersey, and off Block Island, are the same ones?—A. I do.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What do you understand to be the opinion of the mackerel fishermen of Maine as to this question of a close time?—A. I believe that I could get ninety-nine out of one hundred to say that that is one thing that ought to be done, to make a close season. I am sure that this is the opinion of the great majority of all fishermen in Maine.

Q. Is that early fishing conducted by any fishermen except those of Maine and Massachusetts?—A. No, sir.

Q. None in New York?—A. None in New York.

Q. And none farther south?—A. None farther south.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Do those fish spawn in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?—A. I don't think they do.

Q. You think when they are first found in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is after they have finished their spawning?—A. Yes, I think so.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Have any of your vessels met with any difficulty down there?—A. Not any.

Q. They have not been within the three-mile shore line?—A. I presume not. We have had two or three there fishing, but we gave them instructions not to fish within the three miles, and I presume they have not.

Q. Have you pursued any mackerel fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

The WITNESS. This year?

Senator FRYE. Yes.

Q. Was there any necessity for doing so?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were there any other Portland fishermen up there?—A. Some.

Q. Did they fish within that limit?—A. I don't think they did; I think they all had instructions to avoid it. Even if they had desired to fish so near shore the water is so shallow that they could not do it with safety.

Q. With seines?—A. No, sir; not with seines. That is about all the way it is done now.

CLOSE SEASON.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What would be the effect upon the consumers of fresh fish if we were to have a close season? Do you suppose they could procure any other fish as cheap as those?—A. I should think it would give the people of the South a much better chance to market their shad caught off the Jersey shore.

Q. I understood you to say that there was a large quantity of fresh fish caught in the spring and consumed in New York and at other points?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of course they are consumed by the poorer classes of the city and surrounding country. I say, can they find anything else as a substitute so cheap as those?—A. I think so. I think other fish are as plentiful as those. The shad caught on the Jersey shore would have a better market; and the codfish and haddock which they catch there are abundant. I don't see why they couldn't find a substitute. It is not always, you know, that they are cheap. For instance, last year mackerel were quite high there; they were scarce for a time, and there were not so many carried in as there were the year before. The year before they were brought in in abundance, and I have been told there were more destroyed than eaten. That is where the difficulty is; destroying so many in the schools.

IMPORTATIONS OF SALT AND FRESH FISH FROM CANADA.

Q. What proportion of the fish that arrive at this port are sent by the Canadians or Provinces?

The WITNESS. The proportion sent here?

Senator SAULSBURY. Yes.

A. Very few mackerel are sent here from the Provinces, but quite a number of cod are brought in.

Q. I am speaking of fresh fish.—A. I think the amount of fresh fish brought in from there is very limited.

Q. What proportion do you suppose of the fresh fish that are sent to Boston and other different ports of New England are caught by Canadians and citizens of the Provinces?—A. All I know is what I saw in the papers recently, that they had been sending a great many fresh fish there, but probably it is a small proportion of what are caught, because we have a great many vessels here and in Boston that are fresh-fish vessels and do nothing else.

Q. What proportion of the salt mackerel sold at this port and the various ports of New England and other points are caught by the Canadians, compared with those caught by vessels belonging to this country?—A. I could state exactly if I had the statistics; my judgment would be perhaps 20 per cent.

Q. Has the present tariff upon Canadian fish tended to restrict the exportation of salt fish from Canada?—A. I think not. I think they have a certain quality that has to seek this market. Large codfish for packing purposes and export come here almost exclusively you might say. Their small fish they ship directly to the West Indies.

Q. Then the tariff has not furnished any protection to the fishermen of New England, as I understand?—A. Not particularly. It is no protection.

UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Q. You spoke of the relative cost of your vessels and of Canadian vessels, and said that Canadian vessels would not cost more than one-half of ours. What is the reason of that? Have you better vessels?—A. We have better vessels; we have vessels built of oak and hard wood.

Q. Take one of your vessels of really just about the same value as a Canadian vessel, and what would it cost here?—A. I don't exactly understand.

Senator EDMUNDS. Built the same way and of the same material, I suppose.

Senator SAULSBURY. I mean of just the same intrinsic value, say $5,000. If the Canadian vessel was worth $5,000, what kind of a vessel would $5,000 expended here build, of the same kind and out of the same material?

A. I don't know as I could answer that intelligently, because I don't know that I am sufficiently acquainted with the building of vessels.

DUTIES.

Q. You spoke of the duties upon articles entering into the construction of your vessels as one of the items of increased cost. Do you know about what duties would be paid upon the materials of a vessel that costs $10,000?—A. It is my impression that it is about 30 per cent upon the material, is it not?

Q. Upon such material as is dutiable, but all the material that goes into a vessel is not subject to duty?—A. No, not all.

Q. What articles that enter into the construction and equipment of a vessel are subject to duty?—A. The iron, I suppose, hemp, riggings, and sails.

Q. And anchors, I suppose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fish business.

Q. How long have you been the owner of vessels?—A. For eighteen years.

Q. For the last ten or twelve years what kind of business have your vessels been engaged in?—A. Mostly in the mackerel business.

Q. Any in the cod?—A. No, sir.

MACKEREL—WHERE TAKEN.

Q. During the last twelve or fifteen years where have the bulk of your mackerel been taken?—A. On the American shore.

Q. How far out?—A. They have been taken inshore and offshore.

Q. What proportion outside of the three-mile line along our shore?—A. I could not say as to that.

Q. A very much greater proportion than inside?—A. I think so, on account of the shoal water.

Q. Do all your vessels use seines for mackerel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you go South in March?—A. Yes, sir; I send four or five vessels.

Q. How long do they pursue the mackerel-fishing business in the season?—A. They start about the 15th of March and they get back about the 1st of June.

VESSELS AND OUTFITS.

Q. What is the average tonnage of your mackerel vessels?—A. Seventy-five tons.

Q. What is their average cost ready for business?

The WITNESS. Taking seines and everything?

Senator FRYE. No; rigged for sea.

A. About $9,500 apiece.

Q. Are they built of white oak?—A. They are.

Q. They are substantially built, to stand the sea?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What does the average outfit for a season cost?—A. From $1,200 to $1,500; some more and some less.

Q. That does not include the seines?—A. No; that is for the season, the whole season, not for the Southern season, and includes provisions.

Q. What kind of provisions do you furnish your men?—A. Good; about the same as we have to home ourselves.

INSHORE FISHING.

Q. Have you during the last ten years engaged in catching mackerel in English waters?—A. Yes, sir, but very little; most of our vessels are fished on this shore.

Q. Any within the three-mile inshore line of Canada?—A. No, sir; I think not.

Q. Where have you been fishing this year?—A. I have had six vessels in the Bay of Chaleur, and the rest have been on this shore.

Q. Did those that were in the Bay of Chaleur fish inshore?—A. No,

Q. What has been the result of this season's operations?—A. It has been almost a complete failure on this shore, and about the same at the Bay of Chaleur.

Q. As a mackerel fisherman do you have any necessity for your men going into Canadian ports?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you desire them to go in there?—A. I do not.

Q. Is there any occasion to fish within the three-mile shore-line?—A. No.

BAIT.

Q. In your opinion, based on your eighteen years' experience in the mackerel fishery, is the privilege of fishing within the three-mile shore line of the Canadian coast of any value?—A. No, sir.

Q. Is the privilege of buying bait worth anything to you?—A. No, sir.

FREE FISH AND DUTIES.

Q. Do you know of anything in the fishery business that you desire of Canada, and which she can give you, that would be regarded by you as an equivalent for free markets for her in this country?—A. Nothing.

Q. What have you to say about the duty on fish?—A. I think if Canada is given free fish we shall have to give up the business to Canada, and she will have a monopoly of it.

Q. Suppose a treaty was made with Canada by which for fifteen years she could have free entry of our market, what would be the result upon the fishermen of Maine?—A. The result would be that they would do the fish business and we should have no fishing fleet.

Q. If you continued in the fishing business you would go over there?—A. I should go over there or go out of the business; I should have to go out if I staid here.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What are the average annual earnings of men in your business?—A. They haven't earned anything this year to amount to anything.

Q. Taking it right through for ten or twelve years, what do you think would be the average earnings?—A. One hundred and fifty dollars or $200 during a season.

Q. What is the season?—A. From the 15th of March until the 1st of November.

Q. What do these men do in the interim?—A. They go to sea, coasting, and go in foreign vessels, and some go to fishing.

CREWS.

Q. How many men do you have in all your vessels and boats?—A. Probably in vessels or boats some four hundred or five hundred.

Q. How many men will your mackerel vessels average?—A. They will average about sixteen men to a vessel.

Q. That would give you about three hundred for your mackerel fleet?—A. I should think about six hundred or seven hundred then. These small boats don't carry more than three to five men.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What is the nationality of those men; that is, what proportion of them are American citizens?—A. I should say seven-eighths of my men are Americans.

Q. What kind of sailors are these that you employ?—A. First class in every respect.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Do all of your men go on what is called "the lay"?—A. They do; that is, in the large vessels; in the small vessels they go differently.

Q. How in the small vessels?—A. They find their own food and give the vessel one-fifth, and they get all the fish. We furnish all the fittings, and they give me one-fifth of the product of the voyage.

PROFITS OF MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. For the last twelve years, during the life of the treaty of Washington, what has been the business of mackerel fishing as to profits?—A. Vessels that were kept inshore have been quite profitable on the average; but every vessel that I have sent to the Bay of St. Lawrence has been unprofitable and run in debt.

Q. Then you have no desire to send mackerel fishermen up into the Bay of St. Lawrence?—A. No, sir; not if I can help it.

Q. Whether they fish inshore or offshore?—A. No, sir.

DUTY UPON ARTIFICIALLY FROZEN FISH.

Q. What is your opinion as to duty upon artificially frozen fish?—A. I think the middleman makes all the money, and the consumer pays just the same.

Q. Whether there is duty or not?—A. Whether there is duty or not; that is my opinion.

Q. In your opinion should there be a duty on artificially frozen fish?—A. There should.

Q. Why?—A. Because an artificially frozen fish you can keep a long time and ship it into the interior, and salt it if you are a mind to, and then it becomes salt fish. It is clear that that could be done very easily.

FISH IN ICE.

Q. Is there any difficulty about freezing these fish so as to send them with perfect safety all over the country wherever railroads reach?—A. Not in refrigerator cars; they could put them in ice here, and then send them in refrigerator cars and keep them all winter.

Q. Most of the vessels engaged in the fresh-fish business take ice?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they preserve them where they catch them?—A. They do.

Q. I suppose a mackerel lying on deck without ice will spoil in a day, will it not?—A. Yes; on a hot day.

CANNED FISH.

Q. Do you have anything to do with the fresh-fish business?—A. Yes, sir; I can fresh fish; that is all.

Q. For what market?—A. For the United States market, all over the country.

Q. What are those—mackerel?—A. Mackerel; yes.

Q. Do you export any?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you export any fish at all?—A. A very few salt mackerel.

CLOSE TERM.

Q. What is your opinion of a close term?—A. I think we ought to have a close term.

Q. Why?—A. To protect the fish; to keep from destroying them around New York. There is a certain season that they catch four times what can be consumed, and the extra ones are thrown back into the water dead. I think that prevents the rest of the country from getting those fish later on for salt fish.

BAIT.

Q. From your experience in the fishing business do you think that our fishermen from Maine on the Banks off the Canadian shores, the Grand Banks, and others, have any necessity for going into port to buy bait?—A. I should think not.

Q. What bait do they use?—A. Our fishermen here use salt clams.

Q. They take them from here, do they not?—A. Yes, sir: and then we have weirs all along the coast from here down to Eastport; they could get their bait there. A number of these vessels, two or three that I know of, were seized, and they could have got their bait here just as well as not, and in that way have avoided seizure. If there had not been that report in the papers that they were allowed to go in there and get bait, they would not have gone in and been seized.

Q. In your opinion, what is the privilege of buying bait in Canadian ports worth to the Maine fishermen?—A. Not a cent.

Q. Whether or not you concur with Captain Whitten that, as a rule, the voyages would be more successful if they did not touch in Canadian ports at all for any reason?—A. I think they would.

Q. Is there anything that you know of that is desirable for our fishermen that Canada can give us?—A. Nothing.

Q. Do you know of anything that, so far as fish are concerned, either the catchers of fish, the owners of vessels, or the consumers of fish, can receive from Canada as an equivalent for a free market?—A. No, I don't know of anything.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON THE CONSUMER.

Q. What is your opinion as to effect of a duty upon the fish that the consumer actually receives?—A. I think that the receivers in Boston, where they have free fish, make more profit; it goes into the hands of the middlemen, and the consumer gets nothing.

Q. So that if the duty has any effect, either Canada pays the duty herself and it is chargeable entirely to her, or it is a matter in which the wholesaler and fisherman alone are interested?—A. That is it.

Q. The retailer it does not affect?—A. It does not; his prices are just the same.

Q. It is a small duty now, only averaging about 15 per cent.?—A. That is about it.

Q. If the same duty were put on fresh fish, in your opinion, would it affect the market price as between the retailer and consumer?—A. I don't think it would; I think the middleman and retailer would make the profit every time. The price would be the same to the consumer.

Q. Who do you think at the present time pays that duty—the Canadians, or the men who buy the fish here?—A. I think the Canadians pay it.

Q. What is your opinion of the fishing interests of Nova Scotia?—A. I could not say there is a great decrease. The fishing business is not altogether what it was.

Q. What has happened to the fishing business there?—A. It has increased.

Q. Nova Scotia?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So I have been told.

Q. What is the fishing business?—A. It is a duty on the fish.

Q. There is a duty on the fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Even to lumber?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Senator FRYE. The WITNESS.

Q. Does not the duty affect the fishing business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In building the fishery?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in all your fishing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In curing the fish?—A. Yes, sir; about the same.

Q. Are you aware of any other women and children?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that the duty affects the fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that the duty affects the fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. While your fishermen are curing the fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is a fact.

Q. So that all the fish from Canada, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

By Senator FRYE.

Q. You say you are from the Bay of Chaleur?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have they had any success?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The British have?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have they made any progress?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have they made any progress?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have all been cured?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, but some came from the States?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Didn't have a barrel?—A. Yes, sir.

DECREASE OF AMERICAN FISHERIES.

Q. What is your knowledge as to the increase or decrease of the fishing interests of Maine during the pendency of the treaty of Washington?—A. I could not tell the exact percentage, but there has been a great decrease. A great many vessels were formerly engaged in the fishing business, which, so far as that business is concerned, are extinct altogether.

Q. What has been the effect upon the fisheries of Canada?—A. They have increased their fleet tenfold I should say.

Q. Nova Scotia increased very largely, did she not, a few years ago?—A. Yes, sir. I think one winter they built eighty first-class vessels; so I have been told.

SHIP-BUILDING.

Q. What is the reason you cannot compete with Canada in the fishing business?—A. Because our vessels and their fittings cost more. There is a duty on everything that goes into the construction of a vessel even to lumber; there is a duty on that, isn't there?

Senator FRYE. I guess we don't pay much duty on lumber.

The WITNESS. On everything else there is a duty.

Q. Does not the difference in wages really make more difference than anything else?—A. That makes a great difference.

Q. In building your vessels do you not pay your ship carpenters greatly more than the Canadians pay their ship carpenters?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And in all your wages do you not pay more than Canadians?—A. Yes, sir.

WAGES.

Q. In curing the fish on our shore, do you not pay about $2 a day?—A. Yes, sir; about that.

Q. Are you aware that the Canadians cure their fish with the help of women and children, who work for very small wages?—A. I have heard that; yes, sir.

Q. And that they take their pay out of a store?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that they wait for their pay an indefinite length of time, while your fishermen get theirs as soon as the cargo is weighed out?—A. That is a fact.

Q. So that all those differences exist, and they are all in favor of Canada, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

BAY OF CHALEUR.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. You say you had some vessels fishing for mackerel this year in Bay of Chaleur?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have they had any difficulty?—A. No, sir.

Q. The British have not attempted to keep them out of the Bay entirely?—A. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Q. Have they made more than one trip?—A. One of them has made two trips.

Q. Have all been back once?—A. Yes, sir. They are all at home now, but some came home that didn't have any fish at all; one vessel didn't have a barrel, and she went down there some three or four weeks ago.

Q. Do you know how far up the Bay westward they went?—A. I do not. They did not go within the three-mile limits, at all events.

Q. Is any one of your captains in town now who fished in the Bay of Chaleur?—A. No, sir.

Q. What time of the year were they there?—A. They were there about the 25th of July until the middle of September.

Q. Did they get good fares?—A. No, sir; two came home with full fares, and the others made broken voyages. The whole thing was unprofitable, and I guess that is the case with the majority of the fleet. Of course some few vessels have done very well, indeed, but taking the fleet all through there has been a loss.

Q. All those who fished up there anywhere, as well in the Gulf as in the Bay of Chaleur, you mean?—A. Yes, sir. Taking the average there has been a large loss to the vessel owners.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Has that loss resulted from the scarcity of fish in those waters?—A. Yes; I presume so.

Q. Are the fish that are sent here from Canada usually consigned to commission merchants for sale?—A. Yes, sir, they are.

Q. Those commission merchants sell them upon commission to the jobbers?—A. They sell on a commission, but I have heard that some of them get together, and the commission merchant sells to the wholesale dealer, and they divide the profits; that is what I have heard they do. Of course that all comes out of the Canadians, I suppose.

Q. Do you know that that is the case?—A. No, I don't know, only that is what I have heard.

Q. You say the tariff is paid by the Canadians. If there was no tariff upon those Canadian fish, would not the commission merchant sell to jobber at a cheaper rate than he does now with the tariff?—A. No, sir; because he would want a bigger profit.

Q. The question is whether he could not do it and get his regular commissions?—A. It is not handled by commission merchants. These commission merchants sell to the wholesale fish dealers. They take the thing in hand and sell to the retailer; and by the time it gets to the consumer the price is just the same: it don't make any difference whether they pay $4 or $5; and you will find it so right straight through the country.

Q. I want to find out whether the commission merchant who sells to the wholesale dealer, if there were no tariff, would not be able to sell to the jobber, retaining his regular commissions, if he did a fair and legitimate business?—A. Yes, if they would do that; but we find by experience that when those fish get into the retailers' hands and they are retailed there is no difference.

Q. I want to know whether or not, by doing a legitimate business, the commission merchant could not sell to the jobber at a lower rate than he does sell, and the jobber sell to the grocer at a lower rate than he does, if he did not have the duty to pay?

The WITNESS. Do you mean Canadian fish?

Senator SAULSBURY. Yes.

A. I presume the cost of their vessels is less than ours, and they can produce fish cheaper than we can because they don't pay any tariff on anything that goes into the construction of their vessels.

Q. Has the whatever to A same if there fore; we had No. 3 mackere that we could price. But the they could not that was neces that we can s time; we have Scotia in the w Take it for the a failure on thi at New York an Before this year down at their lo

DUTY.

Q. Has the tariff existing upon Canadian fish afforded any protection whatever to American fishermen? Would not their fish come just the same if there was no tariff?—A. No. Take last year and the year before; we had a large fleet of vessels fishing, and we could then sell No. 3 mackerel at $3.50 a barrel, and we caught them so plentifully that we could make money by delivering them to the country at that price. But the Canadians could not send that kind of fish here because they could not afford to pay the $2 duty; still our fishermen caught all that was necessary, and there were thousands of barrels left over, so that we can supply the markets of this country with fish for a long time; we have fleet enough to do it without asking anything of Nova Scotia in the way of supplies and opening our markets free for them. Take it for the last three years. Of course this year there has been a failure on this shore, and I think that is on account of their fishing at New York and destroying so many fish. Take it for the last 10 years. Before this year we have had plenty of fish, and fish have been away down at their lowest point.

CO-OPERATIVE ORGANIZATIONS.

Q. With reference to the southern fishery business, I understand you to say that you are in favor of a close season?—A. I am.

Q. Have the fishermen of New England any association among themselves by which they can regulate their trade?

The WITNESS. Any association?

Senator SAULSBURY. Yes.

A. Yes, sir; they have in New York what they call the Fishmongers' Association.

Q. Have they not an association at Gloucester, of which Mr. Steele is president, embracing the entire fishing interests of this section?

Senator FRYE. Senator Saulsbury refers to the American Fishermen's Union.

A. Oh, yes.

SOUTHERN MACKEREL FISHING.

Q. (By Senator SAULSBURY.) I want to inquire if the fishermen, through their association, could not, by themselves, without any intervention of law, regulate that business.

A. No, and I will tell you why: Because if one goes all want to go. There are about a dozen or half dozen that can go south and make money fishing; but if they do there will be a hundred or one hundred and fifty all go after them.

Q. They are not all members of that association, I suppose?—A. Those are the fishermen themselves and the captains that want to go. There are many vessels owned by captains who have no agent, like myself; when they go it is pretty hard work to keep ours back.

Q. Then you want a law to make you behave yourselves?—A. That is what I think. Going out there is a lottery; it has always been unprofitable.

MACKEREL AND CODFISH.

Q. Has the whole supply of salt codfish this year been in excess of the demand? I mean including not only the catch by your own fishermen, but also those that have come to us from Canada?

The WITNESS. This year?

Senator SAULSBURY. Yes.

The WITNESS. Do you mean both codfish and mackerel?

Senator SAULSBURY. Yes.

A. The supply has been in excess of the demand.

Q. By what?—A. There has been enough mackerel to supply the market, because there were a great many old mackerel left over last year and the year before.

Q. Has not the price of mackerel been unusually high this season?—

A. Yes, sir; it has been high compared to other things, but it has been a great deal higher in years before. The high price is, of course, owing to the scarcity on this shore. By some means or other they have left this shore this year. Last year I packed 23,000 barrels of mackerel; this year I packed about 3,000. That is the difference.

HABITS OF MACKEREL.

Q. You are of opinion that the mackerel which are off Hatteras and down that section of the coast are the same mackerel that come up along here?—A. They are, without doubt.

Senator SAULSBURY. I believe that Professor Baird entertains the theory that the fish come in from the sea to different points along the shore.

The WITNESS. I think they will come up here if allowed. But if you take one hundred and fifty vessels down there with purse seines, the fish don't have much chance to get here; they go away down off shore and go into the Bay of St Lawrence. I think they ought to be let alone until the 1st of June, and that is just about the same in effect as the 1st of July, because the 1st of June is the spawning season and those fish then protect themselves; you don't see them. In the month of June no mackerel are caught to amount to anything except small ones, and those that contain spawn. You may take quite a catch of No. 3 mackerel in June, but it is very seldom you get any in June. That is my experience, and I guess that is the experience of every one in the mackerel business. The mackerel begin to spawn about the 1st of June, and we don't get any of any consequence until the 1st of July. Along about the 10th of July we begin to catch them again in quantities.

Q. How did you fish—on a lay?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been in the fish business?—A. I have been in it off and on for 22 years.

Q. Where have you been in the habit of fishing?—A. Cod-fishing, on the Western Banks and the Banks of Nova Scotia.

BAIT.

Q. When you have fished in the waters off the Canadian coast what bait have you used?—A. Principally clams except what bait we caught on the ground where we caught our fish.

Q. You were fishing all through the pendency of the treaty of 1871; during that time did you buy bait of the Canadians?—A. I never bought a bill of bait from the Canadians in my life.

Q. Is there any necessity for buying bait of them?—A. I can't say that there is.

Q. Do you agree with Captain Whitten that, take it on the whole, it is a detriment to waste time to go in to buy bait and out again, and all that sort of thing?—A. Yes, sir; a great waste.

Q. Then, in your judgment, the privilege of purchasing bait from the Canadians is worthless?—A. Yes, sir; we consider it an injury.

Q. Were you up there this season with your vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time did you go?—A. I left home about the 20th of April.

Q. How long were you up there?—A. I returned, I think, the 18th day of June.

CASE OF THE CITY POINT.

Q. Did you have any trouble?—A. Not that voyage; I did the next voyage.

Q. When did you go the next voyage?—A. I left on the 28th of June.

Q. What is the name of your vessel?—A. The City Point.

Q. Give the committee the history of your last trip.—A. We left Bremen, where I belong, about sixty miles east of here, on the 28th or 29th of June, I believe it was the 28th, and arrived at Shelburne, Nova Scotia. On the night following the day we sailed we took a very heavy breeze, and the vessel sprang a leak and had some of her rigging carried away. On the 30th of June, about 4 o'clock, we came into Shelburne.

Q. What did you go in there for?—A. We went in there to have the vessel repaired, to put some calking down and renew some rigging that had been carried away, and to refill some of our water, and other small things. When I left home I had received the impression from the papers that I had the privilege to go in and out, as we had done before, and of course I went in there, and was probably more careless in some things than I otherwise would have been.

Q. What took place?—A. We came to anchor about 4 o'clock about five miles from the town. We had to refill our water that we had used from the time we left Portland up to that time. It is a great inconvenience to fill water, except when the tide is up, and there was no chance of getting water at town without taking it out of some well, and hiring somebody to haul it, and making it sort of inconvenient and expensive, so we stopped to refill water before proceeding to town. While they were finishing refilling the water (there was only one large cask that had to be filled) I took two men, with my papers in my pocket, and started to go to town, thinking it was all right as long as I entered within the twenty-four hours. I had always been given to understand that it was all right if I entered in twenty-four hours. In the mean time some of our men had gone ashore; and so, as I proceeded up the harbor, I met Captain Quigley, of the cutter Terror, who ordered me to go back to my vessel, and so I went back. I wasn't driven back exactly, but I wanted to go anyway to see what he wanted, as much as anything. I went back to the vessel, and he came on board and asked me where I was from, where I was bound, &c., and took a report. Then he asked me what I had been doing, and I told him that I had been refilling water. He asked me where I was bound, and I told him up to town to report and see about getting some work-hands to repair damages. Then he asked if I knew that I had broken the law and was liable to a fine of $400; I told him I was not. Then he ordered me to get the vessel under way and start for town. I told him some of my men were ashore; he told me it didn't make any difference, to go to work with what I had. So I got the vessel under way; we didn't hurry much about it, so his crew lent us a hand, and we proceeded up the harbor and came to anchor about 8 o'clock in the evening under the bows of the cutter Terror. I then went ashore and entered the vessel, somewhere about 9 o'clock p. m., in the custom-house. I had been there before, and was acquainted with the collector, and knew that he would generally accommodate me if I came there late and wanted to enter. He said, going up the harbor, that it was lucky for me that I had some calking to have done.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. That is, the captain of the Terror?—A. Yes, sir; the captain of the Terror said that it was lucky for me that I had some calking to have done, or he would make trouble for me. He said I should get my calking done as soon as possible, and get ready to proceed to sea. So I engaged workmen that night, and next morning they came aboard, and about noon, I think it was, I went ashore to clear. The custom-house officer said he couldn't clear until he had seen the captain of the Terror. The captain of the Terror had gone down the shore, and he returned some time during the afternoon. Then I found that he had preferred charges against me for allowing my men to go ashore with clothes-bags, so stated, though there wasn't any one on the vessel at the time who had occasion to go ashore with clothes-bags; I had two men, though, that belonged there. Then he said that he couldn't let me go until he had advices from Ottawa. It seemed to me that he wanted to keep me there as long as he could; he didn't prefer charges against me or wire to Ottawa until I was ready for sea. He gave me to understand then that he thought he would get orders to let me go, but his orders were to seize the vessel. So after we were there a day or so they fined the vessel $400. He said that on payment of the same he would release the vessel. That was the dispatch that came to the collector at Shelburne. I saw the dispatch and took a copy of it: "We fine the vessel $400, and on payment of the same she may be released."

Q. That came from the minister of marine?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Foster. He would not allow any of the men ashore while the vessel lay in the stream, and he told me not to allow any of the men to go ashore. He told him that I would try to keep them from going ashore, but fishermen as a rule are rather an independent class and they might not be according to orders when I had gone. He said if they went ashore they would go at the muzzle of the revolver. One of his men shortly after was a little bit annoyed, and he called me alongside the cutter. I went to go ashore and told me if my men meddled with his men aboard his craft not be very particular about the affair, and the United States it under protest would not let me take any fees, wharfage, or other charges, not allow the vessel to be wired back to the custom-house to be there. The custom-house officer was there, and then the cutter found I had never been there. He told me to do it, and I went miles down the harbor to sail, and Saturday he said to him if they could proceed to sea on the vessel, it would be no trouble. He told me, and I went to call for them. He said, "No, I didn't ask for them." Monday morning the men on, and I went to the cutter, the captain told me to escort us down the harbor, no trouble"; I believed in taking those men on the cutter there at the time. He got the men aboard, and you ought to have been very much frightened. He was, in so many words, standing right over me, and he wanted to let me take the blame on to me. He said, "I have to go without this spring?" Said, "this spring?" He said, "your vessel." I said, "day you were here, I told you any such vessel. We had some vessel. You were in Liverpool, and you entered your vessel at the entrance and cleared, that I had been there. He said, "papers you can see, and if it hadn't been for me there, you could ascertain it. He said, "let me go. But he said, "to indicate to me the time I went up to aboard his craft they would get a saber-cut over the head, and it might not be very pleasant for them. Then, after we had got through the affair, and the owners of the vessel had paid the fine through the United States consul at Halifax, I believe, or deposited the amount of it under protest, and wired Shelburne to release the vessel, he said he would not let me go until I had paid the expenses of detention, constable fees, wharfage, &c. I then telegraphed the owners that he would not allow the vessel to go until the expenses had been paid, and they wired back to pay the expenses, and I paid the bill. I went to the custom-house to clear the vessel, because I didn't know what the bills were. The custom-house officer said he would take a check from a merchant there, as I had no money. Then I went out to see what the bills were, and then I cleared the vessel. As soon as the captain of the cutter found I had cleared, he said, "Now you are just as liable as you ever were." He wouldn't give me time to do my business as I wanted to do it, and hurried me off. I had two men that belonged about four miles down the harbor, and this was on Monday morning that I cleared to sail, and Saturday one of those men went to the collector and asked him if they could go home, and if he would let me call for them as I proceeded to sea on Monday. He said he would; he guessed there would be no trouble. So, to be sure about it, the men came back to me and told me, and I went up to the collector myself and asked him if I could call for them. He said yes. I said, "Then give me a permit, will you?" No, I didn't ask him for a permit that morning; I am mistaken. It was Monday morning. But when I got cleared I got the permit to take those men on, and I went down to the wharf where the vessel lay. In the mean time, the captain of the cutter had ordered his mate and a boat's crew to escort us down to the light to see that we "did not get into any trouble"; I believe that was the expression he used. He said we couldn't take those men on. So then I produced this permit. The collector stood there at the time. The captain of the cutter said that we ought to have got the men aboard Saturday. The collector spoke up and said, "Yes, you ought to have got the men aboard Saturday"; he apparently was very much frightened by the captain of the Terror, at least he told me he was, in so many words; he said, "You understand there is a man standing right over me if I don't go straight"; he commenced to throw the blame on to me. I talked to them some, and at last they concluded to let me take the men on as I proceeded to sea. At first he said I would have to go without them. Then he says, "What time were you in here this spring?" Said he, "Was it in May?" I said, "I wasn't in here this spring." He said, "Yes, you were in here this spring, and never entered your vessel." I said, "I was not." He said, "You told me the other day you were here this spring." Said I, "I beg your pardon, I never told you any such thing." He allowed I did, and never entered the vessel. We had some little talk, but it didn't amount to much. He said, "You were in Liverpool this spring." Said I, "Yes." He said, "You never entered your vessel." Said I, "I did." He said, "I want to see the entrance and clearance." I said, "They didn't give me anything"; that I had been there several times, and I never got any entrance or clearance. He said, "I want to see them." Said I, "If I have got the papers you can see them." Then he thought he would stop me again, and if it hadn't been for Mr. Attwood, the collector, he would have detained me there some length of time, I don't know how long. He said he could ascertain easily by wiring to Liverpool. So they concluded to let me go. But his whole actions during the time I was there seemed to indicate to me that he wanted to waste all my time he could; from the time I went up town to repair he never preferred any charge against me until I got through repairs; when I got through with them he brought the charges against me one at a time to make them last as long as he could. I told him once, when we were talking, that I had always supposed I had 24 hours to enter the vessel, which had never been denied me before, and that I only filled water down there because I couldn't get it at town very conveniently. He said, "Captain, you will get into trouble every time you come in here." Said I, "For any purpose?" He said, "Yes, you will get into trouble every time you come in here." Then I wanted to buy some rigging to replace some that had been carried away by the breeze, coming across, but he wouldn't let me get it. He said I ought to have bought it before I left home. I told him I didn't need it then, and didn't know that it would be needed. But he refused to let me have any repairs any further than the calking, at least anything that I asked for.

Q. He would not allow you to purchase any rigging?—A. No, sir; although the collector told me I could. He said I should not. So, sooner than get into any further trouble, I went without it. As I say, I was hurried off because I expected every minute he would bring up something else against me, and I knew my crew didn't feel very well about it, and they were liable to make trouble, being so indignant, and that the sooner I got out of it the better. So I went to sea, and made a voyage.

Coming home we met with some little trouble, met a gale of wind that tore our sails to pieces, and we went in to Halifax. Come daylight next morning the first vessel I saw was the Terror, but he never came near me there. I went to see the consul-general as soon as I went ashore, before it was time to enter at the custom-house, and I made a statement of the facts before him. I got my repairs, and after entering the custom-house and clearing I went to sea, but Captain Quigley did not come near me at that time.

Q. How much did you have to pay at Shelburne for constable's fees and expenses and all those exactions, besides the fine of $400?—A. $42.38, I believe, if I remember right.

Q. You staid up in the town in the custody of the captain of the Terror from what time to what time?—A. From the 30th of June up to, I think it was, the 10th of July.

Senator FRYE. About ten days.

The WITNESS. I may be mistaken. We were taken in his custody shortly after we arrived, and we were there twelve days; so it must have been the 11th of July, I think.

Q. (By Senator EDMUNDS.) How long would it have taken you to make your repairs so that you could have sailed, except for that interference?—A. About half a day. They commenced in the morning, and near noon I went ashore to clear.

Q. You would have got off within twenty-four hours if you had been left alone?—A. Yes, sir; I should have got off that afternoon. When he stopped the vessel of course I did less repairing than I otherwise would have done, and knocked the workmen off; I let them do what I could get along with without the vessel sinking, and went to clear from the custom-house, but he wouldn't clear me.

A. No, sir; I don't; I never made any estimate. The owner of the vessel is here, and probably he can give it to you better than I can. That is rather out of my line of business.

CANADIAN PORT PRIVILEGES.

Q. Is that the only trouble you ever had with the Canadians?—A. Yes, sir; that is the principal trouble; about all.

Q. Did you ever have any difficulty before up there about entering or clearing, or anything of the kind?—A. I was in Shelburne once, and didn't enter the vessel right off, and Mr. Attwood asked me if I wasn't coming up to enter the vessel; he said I ought not to lay too long; and that is about all that was ever said.

Q. What is the understanding among you fishermen; that you have twenty-four hours in which to enter the vessel?—A. I understand now that we have not.

Q. What has been the understanding?—A. That we had twenty-four hours.

Q. Have they practiced upon that understanding?—A. The most of them practiced not entering at all; a great many never bothered; I generally entered. I said most of them practiced not entering at all; perhaps I am wrong. Some of them didn't know that they had any right to enter. But this year I think they were anticipating some trouble, and so far as I know I think they all entered. I was in Liverpool this spring, and my vessel lay at Brooklyn, the adjoining town, and we had to go to Liverpool to enter. We got in at night and lay until the next afternoon. I asked the collector how long I could lay, and he told me I could lay as long as I had a mind to. They didn't give me any harbor regulations, didn't tell me what I should do or not do. He didn't tell me I should come in immediately and enter the vessel as soon as I arrived there. He seemed to be a very nice man, quite like a gentleman; that was Mr. Dunlap, of Liverpool.

Senator SAULSBURY. The Liverpool the witness has been speaking of is not Liverpool in England?

Senator FRYE. No; Liverpool, Nova Scotia.

TESTIMONY OF T. C. LEWIS.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

T. C. LEWIS sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you live?—Answer. Portland.

Q. How long have you lived here?—A. Twenty-five years.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fish business.

Q. Owner of a vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been in the fish business?—A. About twenty years.

Q. In Portland?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many vessels are you interested in?—A. I think I am interested in fourteen or fifteen; I am not certain.

- Q. What is their average tonnage?—A. Perhaps sixty-five tons.
 Q. Good class of vessels?—A. We think so.
 Q. What kind of fishing are you engaged in?—A. Cod and mackerel fishing.

MACKEREL, WHERE TAKEN.

- Q. During the last twenty years, where have you caught the bulk of your mackerel?—A. On this shore.
 Q. On the American shore?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Outside the shore line?—A. Principally.
 Q. As a rule, for the last ten years, the mackerel have been taken outside, have they not?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Fishing with seines, you do not regard it as safe, do you, to fish in shoal water or where there is a rugged bottom?—A. No, sir.

COD, WHERE TAKEN.

- Q. And where have you pursued your cod-fisheries?—A. At the Western Banks and Quebec.
 Q. Off the English coast?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Have you fished every year off the Canadian coast for cod during the last twenty years?—A. Yes, sir.

BAIT.

- Q. Where did you get your bait?—A. Here.
 Q. What kind?—A. Clam bait.
 Q. Do you ever buy any bait of them?—A. I think we have in two or three instances perhaps.
 Q. Did you buy any bait of them while the treaty of Washington was in force?—A. I think in two or three instances we did, on short trips.
 Q. Is there any need of the Maine fishermen purchasing bait of the Canadians?—A. Not in our line of fishery.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

- Q. What is the privilege contained in the treaty, of fishing within three miles of the shore line, worth to American fishermen?—A. If you speak of State of Maine fishermen, it is worth very little.

CANADIAN PORT PRIVILEGES.

- Q. Have you any occasions to go into their ports for anything?—A. No, sir.
 Q. If you have the right to go in for shelter in a storm, or for repairs in case of having suffered damage, and to obtain water or purchase wood, is there any other one you desire?—A. No, sir.

FREE FISH.

- Q. Is there anything you know of, in the interest of American fishermen, that the Canadians can give you that would be regarded by you as an equivalent for a free market for them?—A. No, sir.

BAIT.

Q. What kind of bait do you use?—A. Clam bait.

Q. And do not the Nova Scotians use the same?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many Nova Scotians have been into this port buying bait this season?—A. The State of Maine has furnished between 12,000 and 15,000 barrels of clam bait to Nova Scotia this year, and every year for the last number of years since they have increased their fleet.

Q. How many vessels would that supply?—A. On an average it takes about 50 barrels to a vessel for the first trip, and about 30 to 40 on the second.

Q. Has there ever been any difficulty about the Canadian fishermen during the last year coming here and buying all the bait they pleased?

—A. No, sir.

Q. Have they ever been interfered with?—A. No, sir.

Q. Has anybody ever refused to sell them bait?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have they ever been troubled about entrances and clearances, and things of that kind?—A. No, sir; it would be impossible for them, without bait from the State of Maine, to continue their cod-fishery business and the hand-line business, as we look at it; they have no grounds on their coast to produce bait; they depend upon the State of Maine for their bait, and have done so for the last 15 or 20 years—that is, the State of Maine principally; they get some few from Massachusetts, but their principal supply is from the State of Maine.

Q. What kind of fish require fresh bait?—A. The halibut fishery and crawl fishery; that is, they formerly thought they could do better with fresh bait, but we have sent out trawlers this year, and they used salt bait entirely, and we found that we could have better success with salt bait than to waste time running for fresh bait.

Q. So that, on the whole, it is better for the fishermen of this country to provide themselves with salt bait before going, even though they are trawling?—A. Yes, sir; that is our experience here.

Q. What do they use for halibut, as a rule?—A. They use very little fresh bait usually, for they can't get it until they catch a few fish, and then they use the trash, as they call it.

Q. So that there is no need, even in fishing for halibut, to get fresh bait, squid, or anything?—A. Not being acquainted with the halibut fishery, I am not able to state whether it is a necessity or not.

FRESH AND SALT FISH.

Q. What have you done with your mackerel that you have taken? Have you sold them fresh, or salt?—A. Salt.

Q. Do you export any?—A. No, sir.

Q. Where is your market?—A. The market is all over this country.

Q. Have you dealt any in fresh fish?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know what effect the greatly increased consumption of fresh fish has had upon the salt-fish business?—A. I think it has decreased somewhat the consumption of salt fish.

EFFECT OF DUTY ON THE CONSUMER.

Q. There is a duty on salt fish, and practically none on fresh. In your opinion, who pays that duty?—A. I think it comes out of the Nova Scotia fishermen.

Q. According to your experience in the fish business, does the duty on fish increase the price to the consumer?—A. No, sir.

Q. If it affects anybody, it is somebody outside of Canada; it is the wholesaler and not the consumer?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know what proportion the price paid the fisherman bears to the price paid by the consumer? If I bought a mackerel, for instance, to-day of the retailer, what proportion of the price of that mackerel does the fisherman get who caught it?—A. Well, on an average, I think he gets less than one-half.

Q. Does he get over two-fifths?—A. I don't think he would get over two-fifths on an average.

LAY.

Q. Do your fishermen work on the lay?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. All of them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that the custom among the Maine fishermen?—A. Yes, sir. I think many of the vessels in the eastern portion of the State, at Bucksport and Lemoine, hire their men for the voyage.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. How many men do you employ in all?—A. Perhaps 400 or 500.

Q. What proportion of your sailors are American citizens; i do not say American born, but American citizens?—A. In our seining there is a large proportion of naturalized citizens.

Q. Four-fifths, or what?—A. I should say three-fourths.

Q. In your cod-fisheries how would it be?—A. A smaller proportion; perhaps not more than half. But those men are coming this way to settle here; that is the tendency and result of their coming; they remain here.

Q. What would you look for as the result of an active, young, intelligent Canadian coming in here and engaging in the business? What is the general result? Does he become an American citizen?—A. He becomes an American citizen, yes.

Q. I suppose his ambition cannot be gratified to command a vessel unless he does become an American citizen?—A. No, sir.

Q. What kind of sailors are these?—A. Good sailors.

CANADIAN COMPETITION.

Q. What is the reason you cannot compete with Canada in fishing?—

A. Well, they have cheaper vessels, cheaper outfits, and they are very much nearer the fishing grounds than we are, which makes quite a difference; and they live very differently on board their vessels.

Q. More cheaply?—A. More cheaply, and very much more different.

COMPENSATION OF FISHERMEN.

Q. Are not all their wages less than the wages paid in this country?—

A. They know very little about wages. As I understand, they live a sort of serfdom; they go in their vessels, and they and their families are barely kept alive during the voyage.

Q. They receive store pay?—A. Yes, sir; they receive very little money; perhaps know very little about money any way. We pay our men in money as soon as the fish are sold and the voyage is settled.

Q. What have your men averaged, for the fishery seasons for the last ten years, for their pay?—A. I should think perhaps about $250.

Q. How long is the season?—A. It commences on the first of April and closes in October.

Q. What do the fishermen generally do in the interim?—A. Quite a portion of them follow the sea; some go winter fishing; some go into the woods to chop, and some remain at home.

PRICES OF FISH.

Q. Have you ever noticed that the fishery treaty of 1871 had any effect upon the prices of fish?—A. No, sir; I don't think it had any effect upon the prices of fish.

Q. As a matter of fact are not fish lower this year than last?—A. They are low; lower, I think, than they have been any time since I have been in the business.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Does that apply to mackerel fishing?—A. No, sir; cod-fishing.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. Mackerel have been higher this year on account of the scarcity?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then it is not the duty which troubles you at all in this matter of fish; it is that the freedom from duty encourages the Canadians to increase their fleet and increase the number of fish they catch, and thus reduce the price of your mackerel?—A. Yes, sir. I don't know just the per cent., but I think their fleet has more than doubled in the last ten years.

Q. That was a mistake made by the gentleman who preceded you?—A. It has more than doubled.

Q. That was very largely the case during the life of the treaty of Washington?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did not Nova Scotia make a very heavy increase in two years there?—A. Very heavy.

FRESH FISH.

Q. In your opinion what would be the result of a treaty which should provide that for fifteen or twenty years our markets should be entirely free to the Canadians for fish?—A. The present generation of Maine fishermen would all go out; they would be obliged to.

Q. Give up the business?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have any of your vessels had any trouble there this season?—A. No, sir.

Q. Have any of them been into the Canadian ports?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then I understand you there is nothing, so far as you are engaged in the fishing business, that you want of Canada?—A. No, sir.

CLOSE SEASON.

Q. What do you say about the close season?—A. I believe that we should have it.

Q. Why?—A. It has been very well stated here that the spawn fish are prevented from coming on to our coast to spawn, as they naturally would if they were let alone.

Q. The fish that come when they are carrying spawn are small and poor, are they not?—A. No, sir; they are large and poor.

Q. In your opinion, is there any difficulty about supplying cheap fresh fish in the months of April and May, even if there is a close time on mackerel?—A. No, sir.

EXTENT OF MACKEREL FISHERY.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What is the number of sail engaged in the fishing business at this port?—A. I think we have about 150 sail on the books of the Portland Mutual Insurance Company; that may not be far from the number of vessels from this port.

INSURANCE.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What is the average cost of insurance in mutual companies?—A. The last ten years I think it has been about, perhaps less than, 2 per cent. for the season.

Q. How is it that the average in Gloucester is 9 per cent.?—A. They do much more winter fishing, Georges fishing, which is much more hazardous than ours.

A BYSTANDER. Their season is shorter, too.

The WITNESS. We are in trouble now; we have two vessels ashore at Malpeque; I am just arranging to-day to send a diver there; I have telegraphed to Halifax to ascertain if they would allow it; we have not received any answer; we understand they will not allow us to remove the ballast. They are very nice vessels, and we insured them for about $11,000.

Q. What is the ballast?—A. It is rock.

Q. You understand that they do not allow you to remove that ballast of rock?—A. We understand so. I am president of the insurance company, and I engaged a diver to go to-night, on the chance of being permitted to remove the ballast. We have an agent at Malpeque who has endeavored to engage divers, but they have none, or would not furnish any; they said their divers were busily engaged and could not accommodate him. Therefore we are at their mercy, and if we are not allowed to send divers from here we must lose the vessels.

Q. Where is Malpeque?—A. On the north side of Prince Edward Island.

LOCAL TAXATION OF VESSELS.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. Are your vessels here properly subject to taxation for local purposes? In some of the States they do not subject them to local taxes.—A. Yes, sir; they are subject to taxation.

Q. What is the rate of taxation?—A. About 2½ per cent.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. How do they assess those vessels—at full value?—A. No, sir.

Q. About how much?—A. When a vessel is new they make the assessment at nearly its full value, but the assessment is reduced quite fast as the years go by.

Q. Is it reduced faster than the depreciation of the vessel?—A. Yes, sir; and at 20 years they drop it out.

DEPRECIATION OF FISHING VESSELS.

Q. What do you account the annual depreciation of a fisherman?—

A. The first five years the depreciation would be from 5 to 8 per cent., and at the present outlook it would be much more than that.

Q. The depreciation would be very much larger on those vessels engaged in winter fisheries, would it not?—A. Yes, somewhat larger.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What is the average life of your fishing vessels?—A. The average life before retopping, as we term it, is about 15 years; then they have to be retopped; the bottom, of course, never rots, being saturated with salt.

Senator SAULSBURY. That is all.

The WITNESS. There is one point I would like to bring out.

EXPORTATIONS, AND TRANSSHIPMENTS.

Senator SAULSBURY. State anything you desire.

The WITNESS. In regard to Nova Scotia interfering now with our export business; they are cutting us off very much from our export business.

By Mr. FRYE:

Q. How?—A. By bringing their fish here and having them go through our custom-house free of duty, and shipping them to ports that we have formerly supplied with fish; while they don't allow us to bring a barrel of fish from the Bay over their railroad, we are allowing them to bring here all the fish they choose and reship them to the West Indies free of duty and expense, and shutting us off from that trade.

Q. You are not aware that any restriction has been placed upon them in our country in relation to that transit?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. And you are aware of the fact that they do not allow us to land any of our cargoes and transship there?—A. Not any this year.

Q. And I suppose it is further a fact that nearly all their fresh fish are sent in that way to Boston market, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

CANADIAN PORT PRIVILEGES.

Q. Would it be an advantage for our fishermen to land there and ship to Boston?—A. It would if they were fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. We formerly landed cargoes at Shediac, and refitted and sailed.

Q. That has all been cut off since the treaty of Washington?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Saulsbury insists that that point applies to all other classes of property.—A. I presume all classes of property would be subject to the same. I think they are much more indebted to us for the two privileges of bait and reshipment of fish than for any they can give to us.

Q. They do not make the same application to all registered vessels that desire to enter; it is only the fishing vessels?—A. Only the fishing vessels.

Q. Is there anything else you desire to state?—A. No, sir.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE TREFETHEN.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

GEORGE TREFETHEN sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you live?—Answer. Portland.

Q. How old are you?—A. Almost fifty-seven.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fish dealer.

Q. How long have you been in the business?—A. Thirty-four years.

Q. Are you an owner of fishing vessels?—A. No, sir; I am not an owner of fishing vessels now; I do own one piece of a fishing vessel; I formerly owned a dozen or more pieces.

Q. So that your principal business is dealing in fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind of fish?—A. Dry, salt, and pickle fish, and all kinds of sea fish.

Q. Are you a wholesaler?—A. Yes, sir.

EFFECT OF DUTY UPON CONSUMER.

Q. What, in your experience, is the difference between the wholesale price of fish and the price which the consumer pays?—A. I think at present the prices of dry fish are nearly a hundred per cent. more than the first cost.

Q. In your opinion, does the duty upon salt fish affect the price of fish to the consumer?—A. No, sir; I don't think it does.

Q. Who do you think pays the duty?—A. I think the men that ship them here pay it.

Q. The Canadians?—A. The Canadians.

Q. But if it has any effect at all it is only between the Canadians and fishermen?—A. Perhaps there ought to be a little qualification in that respect; it may have a slight effect on the purchaser. The amount of fish brought in from Nova Scotia, compared with the amount taken by our own people, is small; I do not see how it could have a perceptible effect except in rare instances when we are short of catch and they have a large catch.

Q. Now, as to fresh fish: Do you know the difference between the prices of the wholesaler and the prices of the retailer for fresh fish?—A. Somewhat.

Q. What is the relation of those to each other?—A. I should say about threefold.

Q. That is to say, the consumer pays threefold more than the wholesaler pays?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If there was a duty upon fresh fish, do you think it would affect the consumer at all?—A. Hardly; the amount is so small in comparison with our own catch that it does not seem to have any significance relation to it.

FRESH FISH IN ICE.

Q. Under the present construction of the tariff allowing "fish, fresh for immediate consumption," to come in free, and under modern processes, is there any difficulty about keeping fresh fish on shipboard ten days or a fortnight?—A. Not any.

Q. And then taking them in refrigerator cars to Boston and New York?—A. None at all, practically.

Q. So that practically fresh fish could be kept as fresh fish for months?—

A. Yes, sir; they are practically cured.

DUTY.

Q. Do you know of any reason, if there is duty on frozen fish, why there should not be on fresh?—A. I do not.

Q. In bringing a cargo of fresh fish from Canada is there any difficulty at all in sending them to Boston or any other place whatever, and immediately curing the whole cargo?—A. I don't see any reason why it can't be done.

Q. And thus escape the duty?—A. I think the Canadians charge us a duty on fresh fish, the same as on salt.

Q. Yes, they do. Do you know of any nation that does not charge us a duty if we send them fish?—A. I do not; and some of them are pretty hard chargers, too.

BAIT.

Q. Are you familiar with the fishery business?—A. I think I am.

Q. Is there any necessity of our going into Canadian ports to buy bait for cod-fishing on the Banks?—A. I don't think there is except in rare instances. I can conceive of a case where it would be beneficial to go into a Canadian port for fresh bait.

Q. Such as what?—A. A vessel leaving port here with fresh bait, going trawling, meeting adverse winds or bad weather, the bait might become injured before they got on the fishing grounds, or before they used the bait; in such a case it might be advantageous to be able to run into a near port instead of going a long way home to renew the supply. I think it is rarely that would happen, but occasionally it might. I think the strongest reason, perhaps, for our vessels going into Canadian ports is having Canadian men aboard, Nova Scotians, that want to see their families; they want to go home, and they make an excuse half the time that they want to get some bait, when they only want to go into port and have a good time.

Q. You being acquainted with the fishing business, if you had twenty vessels engaged in the cod-fisheries which should you prefer, that the captains of your cod-fishermen should every season go into Canadian ports to buy bait, or that they should take bait originally when they leave here, and not go into Canadian ports except for shelter, repairs, wood and water?—A. I should prefer that they should keep away from the ports.

Q. You think it would be more profitable?—A. I do. From 1852 to 1855 I was part owner of eight or ten cod-fishermen and mackerel fishermen, and was somewhat interested in the business. I do not think in my knowledge we ever bought a barrel of bait of Canada.

Q. And part of that time you had the privilege?—A. Part of the time we had the privilege.

AMERICAN AND CANADIAN RECIPROCAL PRIVILEGES.

Q. Do you know anything that our fishermen require from Canada in this matter of fishing?—A. We require the privilege of their ports in case of stress of weather.

Q. I mean outside of what we are entitled to under the treaty.—A. I don't think of anything else. It might be an advantage to us to ship our mackerel home, to have commercial privileges the same as our merchant marine has; I don't see why we shouldn't be entitled to them.

Q. Do you know whether these fishermen generally take permits to touch and trade?—A. Several of them did this spring, but it amounted to nothing.

Q. The Canadian authorities would not recognize them?—A. No, sir.

FREE FISH.

Q. What would be the effect upon our fisheries if Canada should obtain a treaty which would give her our market free for 15 or 20 years?—A. I think it would be virtually the extinction of our Bank fisheries, our mackerel fisheries. We should probably continue the shore fishing with smaller vessels and small boats. We are suffering now from the effects of the large increase the last two or three years of the continuance of that treaty.

Q. In consequence of the increase of the Canadian fleet?—A. Yes, sir; that is where we are suffering now. They are going to die, but they die hard. They have their vessels and are keeping them afloat as long as possible in hopes to accomplish another reciprocity treaty. That is one thing that has created an over supply of fish, principally Bank fish. If they are allowed to increase and have our markets free, it seems to me that it will be the extinction of our fisheries; I don't see anything else in store for us. They are feeling very bad about paying this duty, and it goes pretty hard with them with the low prices. I buy quite a large lot of Nova Scotia fish myself; I have had one or two cargoes a month for the last three months. They bring them here and we buy them.

DUTY.

Q. Who pays the duty—you, or they?—A. I know that I don't. I furnish the money to do it, but it comes out of the price of the fish. We buy their fish at a little less than we buy our own.

Q. Even with the duty on?—A. Yes, sir.

BAIT.

Q. Have they been in the habit of coming in here, without let or hindrance, to buy bait?—A. Yes, sir; to buy anything they want, and lay 24 hours or 48, or a week if they want to, in the lower harbor, without let or hindrance, without entering.

Q. Has any trouble ever been made with them this year about it all?—A. The only case I have heard of was at Booth Bay.

PROVINCIAL FISH.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You say you deal in Nova Scotia; what proportion of the fish that come to this market are fish caught by the Provinces?—A. I should say that in my business I buy perhaps a quarter part of Nova Scotia fish.

Q. What kind of fish are those?—A. Codfish principally; very little mackerel come here from Nova Scotia.

Q. Do you think that the quantity of fish from Canada and Nova Scotia that comes to this market affects the price at all?—A. Well, I think they have an effect; they are a class of fish that comes here in direct competition with another class that our people cure here.

Q. I am speaking now of the cod and mackerel?—A. The codfish principally. The mackerel might as well be left out, as far as the competition of this port is concerned with Nova Scotia; they don't bring them here; they send them to New York, Chicago, and Boston directly from Halifax and those ports there; but they do not come to Portland. I think I can safely say that there have not been a thousand barrels of Nova Scotia mackerel landed in Portland from Nova Scotia vessels in two years; I don't know of it, and I think I should know if that had been the case.

HERRING.

Q. Do you catch any herring with your fishermen from here?—A. Oh, yes, thousands of barrels are caught in the fall of the year, about this time. If you were to walk down upon our wharves at this time you would see fish-packing establishments surrounded by barrels of herring that have just been landed.

Q. Do you think the herring caught in the waters of the Provinces and Canada affect the prices of herring in the market?—A. I don't see how they can very materially; the price is so very low that after they pay the duty there don't seem to be anything left.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. What is the price of herring?—A. About $3 a barrel here.

Q. How many pounds?—A. Two hundred pounds. The fish business is away down at the lowest possible grade of existence.

MACKEREL.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. That does not apply the present year to mackerel, does it?—A. No; the prices are high, but the mackerel are scarce, so it does not help the fisherman.

Q. The price of fish, like every other commodity, depends upon supply and demand?—A. Just so.

FRESH FISH AND HADDIES.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. I suppose that most of the fresh fish they send here come by rail, do they not?—A. The most of them come by rail and steamer. Most of the fresh fish that are brought from the Provinces come by steamer to Boston from Yarmouth and Halifax.

Q. They do not come to Portland much?—A. Some come on the St. John steamer from Digby and St. John, principally halibut. But the St. John people buy more fresh in Portland and in Boston than we buy of them. They depend upon us for their winter haddies. They come to Boston and buy thousands and thousands of pounds of fresh haddock. The Canadian Government has put an extra duty upon haddies cured in the United States in order to protect their people there. The duty has been made high, and yet they can come over to Boston and buy fresh haddock, take them to St. John and smoke them, and ship them to Ottawa, Montreal, and everywhere else in that country at a half percent less than we can, and still make a profit. That involves a little hancing.

CANADIAN DUTY ON HADDIES.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. How are they able to do that?—A. The Canadian Government puts a special duty on haddies.

Q. And you have to pay the duty when you send them there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The duty in Canada, you think, bears upon you who send the fish in there?—A. Yes, naturally.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN A. EMERY.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

JOHN A. EMERY sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. What is your business?—Answer. I am in the salt business, and am a vessel-owner and commission merchant.

Q. Are your vessels engaged in fishing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been engaged in that business?—A. I have been engaged in this business about ten years.

BAIT, ETC.

Q. You have heard the testimony touching what we desire from Canada, the necessities of our buying bait there, and touching the effect of free fish, and all that sort of thing, from several gentlemen who have testified, have you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you agree with them?—A. I do. I can't see that there is any necessity of our vessels going in there for bait. I think they get more bait of us than we get of them.

CLOSE TIME.

Q. I wanted to ask especially your opinion about a close time.—A. My opinion is that if we don't have a close time the mackerel will disappear from this coast. Such an immense fleet of vessels going down there and breaking them up in their spawning season, when they first appear off Cape Hatteras or Cape Henry, I think has the effect to drive them off the coast, broad off, so that the large mackerel don't care to come on this shore at all. I think that has been especially the case this year. And of course, taking so many mackerel full of spawn, in time will tend to cut off the supply; I think they will disappear on this coast altogether unless something is done to prevent it.

Q. They take porgies and mackerel indiscriminately, do they not?—A. Yes, sir. There have been no porgies on this coast for many years.

MACKEREL SPAWNING.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. Do the mackerel spawn on this coast here?—A. I couldn't say to that; I think they used to before we drove them away; I think they used to spawn around Cape Cod and Nantucket, but I can't say of my own knowledge; that is the impression I have always had.

Q. According to your information are any mackerel taken off your shores here, the nearest mackerel fisheries to this port, that contain spawn fully developed and about ready to be cast, at any time of the year?—A. I think they have taken them off Cape Cod; they used to, but haven't taken any this year, and very few the year before. But I can't say as to that so well as some of the gentlemen who have been in the business longer.

FREE FISH.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. In your judgment what would be the effect of a treaty with Canada by which she was given our markets free for a certain period, say fifteen or twenty years?—A. I know I should go out of the business.

Q. Why would you go out of the business?—A. We can't compete with them. They are building up their fleet at the expense of ours.

Q. Your opinion is that it would be destructive to our fishery interests?—A. That is my opinion. When I was a young lad I remember that our fishermen were prosperous, but now some of them have gone out of the business entirely.

COD AND MACKEREL.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. How far off this shore are mackerel taken?—A. The mackerel appear on this shore about the 10th of July, and are caught from 10 to 50 miles off-shore.

Q. Have you any hand-line fishing?—A. Not now for mackerel.

Q. The fishing is all done by seines?—A. Yes, sir. There is some shore cod-fishing on this shore. They catch those nearer.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. How many vessels have you in the business?—A. I think I have an interest now in fifteen.

Q. Both cod and mackerel fishing vessels?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About the same classes of vessels that have been described by the other gentlemen?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About the same number of men to each vessel?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About the same proportion of American citizens?—A. Yes, sir. I am interested in small pieces with some of these gentlemen who have testified.

Q. Have any of your vessels been disturbed in the Provinces this year?—A. I think not.

Q. How many vessels this year have you had going into the North Bay, or what we call the Bay of St. Lawrence?—A. Six or seven; six, I think.

Q. They went for mackerel, I suppose?—A. They went for mackerel.

Q. Did they get fair fares?—A. Two of them got pretty near full fares. The rest of them came home with broken trips, which is very unprofitable.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. And they were taken, I suppose, as a matter of course, outside of the three-mile limit?—A. They can't fish inside the three-mile limit. There isn't water enough, as a rule.

Q. Your mackerel vessels, during the time you have been engaged in the business, I suppose, have not caught fish to any extent within the limit?—A. Not until this year. Very few vessels that I have been interested in went to the Bay of St. Lawrence at all. It is only this year that the mackerel have gone there for a number of years. I think they have been driven off our coast. It has been a very unfortunate feature that they went this year and the year before.

Q. Has it been any serious inconvenience to your vessel in the mackerel fishery up there that they have not been allowed to go inside of the three-mile limit, except for wood, water, &c.?—A. Oh, no, sir; they couldn't fish within the three miles.

TESTIMONY OF HORACE M. SARGENT.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

HORACE M. SARGENT sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. Falmouth.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fitting business.

Q. Falmouth is close by Portland, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you the owner of any vessels?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many are you interested in?—A. I own pieces of about fifteen fishermen, and I own a large fleet of coasters, about twenty-five vessels.

CASE OF THE ELLA M. DOUGHTY.

Q. Did any of your vessels get into any difficulty this season?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What?—A. The schooner Ella M. Doughty.

Q. What was the difficulty?—A. The captain left Portland with fresh bait aboard to go halibutting. He had been a trip before of over a week, and got quite a large fare. He went back to the same grounds in hopes to get another fare. But they had moved by the time he got there, and so he started to go further up the coast. When he got up the coast he fell in with the ice, and put into Pictou for harbor. While in there the custom-house authorities sent a boat off alongside and told him he would have to enter at the custom-house, which he did. He lay there a spell, and came out and tried to get up the coast from there further, but the ice drove him into St. Anne's. I think he tried three times to get out. The second time when he was trying to get out, his bait was getting poor, and one of their fishermen came alongside and offered to sell him some fresh bait. As he had one of these permits to touch and trade, which he supposed was all sufficient to buy with, he bought the bait. These fellows that he bought the bait of went to the store there to do some trading, and the storeman asked them where they got the American money. They told him, and then the storeman made complaint against the Doughty. She had to put back again to St. Anne on account of the ice, and finally had to make up into the upper harbor. The captain didn't know that there was any custom-house there. He said there was a farm-house away up in the field where the man lived who pretended to be a custom-house officer. That man came down and seized the vessel, and the captain and crew came home. Since then he gave a bond of $400 for not entering, and $200 for some other expenses (I don't know exactly what they were), and a $3,000 bond for the vessel.

Q. You gave bond to release the vessel and she has come home?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has anything been done about it?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Putnam is attending the case, and I suppose it will come up for trial this month.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. At what place?—A. At Halifax.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. How much bait did he buy?—A. He bought $10 worth; bought it very cheap; I believe he bought ten barrels at $1 a barrel. He had one of these permits to touch and trade, which he showed, but they told him it wasn't good for anything. It was my understanding when he left port here that with that permit he could touch and buy anything.

Senator FRYE. The fact is that a telegram came from the State Department that it was good.

The WITNESS. I think so; we were led to think so.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. What time in the year was it that that vessel was seized?—A. I think it was in the month of May.

Q. She was in the Northumberland Strait, near Pictou?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. If it had not been for the ice driving her in she would not have had any occasion to buy bait?—A. No, sir; but, of course, it is very convenient for the halibut catchers to go in and buy bait.

BAIT.

Q. What kind of bait is used for halibut?—A. Herring mostly; when they can get herring they fish with it altogether, but when they cannot they fish and catch haddock and cod, or anything they can get, and cut them up for bait. But herring will catch more halibut than this trash will.

TESTIMONY OF N. O. CRAM.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

N. O. CRAM sworn and examined.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Question. What is your age?—Answer. Seventy-three.

Q. Where do you reside?—A. Portland.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Commission merchant.

Q. You deal in fish as well?—A. Yes, sir; I have for the last 40 years.

Q. Are you interested in any fishing vessels?—A. No, sir.

Q. Are you acquainted with the fishing business?—A. I think I am in some measure; I have had such connection with it that I have more or less knowledge.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. From your knowledge of the fishing business in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and along the Dominion shores, what do you think is the value to American fishermen of the right to fish within three miles of the shore?—A. I shouldn't judge it was of great value, because in deeper water there are more fish; and then, again, there is great risk in fishing within the limits; they lose their seines, and it is dangerous navigation. I don't consider it of any value.

FISHING TRADE.

Q. Do you receive consignments of fish from the British Provinces?—A. No, sir; I buy more particularly here, and have been in the habit of buying and shipping.

Q. Where do you ship to chiefly?—A. To Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and west of that; to Cincinnati some.

Q. Do you make any foreign shipments?—A. No, sir; not of late years.

CLOSE SEASON.

Q. Have you any knowledge or information on the subject of what is called the close season for mackerel?—A. I think I have.

Q. Will you state it, please?—A. I think it is the death of summer fishing; it was so this year.

Q. Will you state why you think so?—A. Because they meet them south of New York and Sandy Hook, follow them up with seines, and head off the spawn fish. The large ones will escape; they have cleared out and left, and haven't shown themselves along the coast from spring until now, but they have in great abundance shown themselves down in North Bay; there has been an unusual supply there this year; some vessels have been very successful down there in taking them.

Q. Have our vessels in the southern fishery at the beginning of the mackerel season been more numerous this year than formerly?—A. I think they were quite as numerous, if not more so.

Q. But they have been in the habit of fishing when the mackerel first appeared south of New York for a good many years, have they not?—A. Yes, sir; but I don't believe there are fifteen sail of vessel on an average, out of Maine and Massachusetts, in ten years, that have paid their bills in that spring fishing. But the fact is that after lying at home all winter the crews become impatient and want to get away and so the vessels are sent to the south for the early catch, but I am satisfied that it would be better for them not to go. Take this last year; not 10 per cent. have paid their bills, in my opinion. What fish they take are poor then. The vessels break up the schools and get them wild, and the most of them that don't go broad off will before they get up to the Georges and Shoals go off and come down below.

Q. What is the grade of fish that they catch first south of New York?—A. Very poor, indeed; No. 3.

Q. How would they be graded in the market here?—A. No. 3's, and very poor at that. If the mackerel could be allowed to take their natural course and come up along Nantucket and Cape Cod and then spawn all along undisturbed, the increase would show itself in two or three years very manifestly both in the quantity and in the quality.

QUALITY OF PROVINCIAL FISH.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. You are in the habit of purchasing fish. I wanted to inquire the character of the fish you buy that are caught in the waters of the Dominion. Are they a better quality of mackerel than those caught on our shores?—A. I don't think the Canadian fish are so good.

Q. Is the average Canadian mackerel a better fish than those caught by us?—A. I don't think they compare with ours in quality. They get a great many poor fish off the Provinces.

Q. The reason of my inquiry is that you stated that you thought that the southern fishery deprived us of the best fish, and that the best fish did not come to our shores, but went up on the Dominion shores. But now I understand you to say that the quality of the Canadian fish is not superior to the fish caught in our waters?—A. No, sir; it is not. Those fish that have been driven off this year are being taken now, and are getting to be a better quality than they were a month or two ago. I have a great many of them that have come from the Bay, and they have been distributed around through the country. The quality of late has rather improved.

By Senator EDMUNDS:

Q. When you say that our fish are better in quality, I suppose you leave out this early catch of No. 3's, and speak of the catch later in the season?—A. Yes, sir; later in the season, when the fish are around here and are undisturbed, they appear very much better. Then, again, being so recently taken, they don't discolor, as in the North Bay. Those fish we get there, if they lie any length of time, become dark.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. As a dealer in fish do you in fact pay more, or less, for fish caught in the Canadian waters than you do for the mackerel caught here?—A. We pay very much more for the mackerel caught here. I bought fish to-day and paid very much more for those that are taken here. They sometimes catch a few along here, but there has been no supply whatever. We pay very materially higher for those caught here this year than we do for the Bays.

Q. Do you deal in fresh fish?—A. No, sir.

By Senator FRYE:

Q. As a matter of fact I suppose there is better feed on our coast for mackerel than on the Canadian coast?—A. Oh, yes.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES D. THOMS.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

CHARLES D. THOMS sworn and examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Where do you live?—Answer. In Portland.

Q. How old are you?—A. Sixty-three.

Q. What is your business?—A. Fish business.

Q. Are you the owner of vessels?—A. I am.

Q. How many?—A. Nine, I believe; seven in the mackerel fishery, and two shore fishing.

Q. How long have you been engaged in shore fishing?—A. Forty-three years; since 1843.

MACKEREL, WHERE TAKEN.

Q. Where have you during those forty-three years pursued the business of fishing for mackerel?—A. Mostly on this shore.

Q. What proportion of the mackerel taken during that forty-three years have been taken on our shore?—A. Nine-tenths of them.

Q. How frequently have you been into Canadian waters for mackerel? I mean the waters off the Canadian coast.—A. I have not been into the Canadian waters for mackerel before this year for, I think, eight or nine years; I have had two in there this year.

Q. Where did those two fish in there this year?—A. In the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

THREE-MILE LIMIT.

Q. Within the three-mile shore line?—A. No, sir; that is, I suppose not. I instructed them not to when they went. I have a vessel down there now that cost me $10,000.

Q. Is it safe to fish down there within the three-mile shore line with purse-seines?—A. No, sir; it is not.

Q. Could it possibly be profitable to take mackerel within the three-mile limit off the Canadian coast?—A. No, sir.

Q. Then you have no desire that your mackerel fishermen shall be permitted to go inside?—A. No, sir.

CODFISH.

Q. How is it about the codfisheries? Where have you fished for cod during the forty-three years?—A. I haven't had much to do with cod-fish during the last number of years.

Q. When you did?—A. My vessels are all mackerel catchers, except some small vessels that fish along shore. I have been running them winter fishing.

Q. Where have you pursued that?—A. Off here. Last year I ran to La Have, on the Nova Scotia shore.

BAIT.

Q. When you fished for cod off the Canadian shore have you had any occasion to buy bait from the Canadians?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you wish for the privilege of buying bait?—A. Not any.

Q. Is it worth anything to the fishermen of Maine to be permitted to buy bait there?—A. I don't consider it so.

Q. Do you agree with these other gentlemen that have testified that in their judgment, it would be more profitable if they never went into Canadian ports for any such purpose?—A. Yes, sir; I do.

Q. Do you take your bait with you from here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What kind of bait?—A. Salt bait.

THE CASE OF THE ELIZA A. THOMS.

Q. What is the name of your vessel that got into trouble down there?—A. The Eliza A. Thoms; she is ashore in Malpeque.

Q. Did she go ashore in a storm?—A. Yes, sir; collided with another vessel, and they are ashore there together.

Q. That is one of the vessels that the insurance man (T. C. Lewis) was speaking about?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you agree with him in his account of the impossibility of obtaining divers down there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And also that a diver will be sent from here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you had any instructions of any kind from Canada that you cannot be permitted to use a diver there?—A. No, sir. The insurance agent there is doing the whole thing. My vessel had 140 barrels under deck, and they got a permit to land them. They thought they were going to ship them home, but when they came to ship them the authorities would not allow it, nor would they allow the seines or boats to be shipped at first, though they afterwards did give a permit to ship them through by rail.

Q. They seized them in the first place and put a keeper aboard?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What have they done with the seines?—A. They are coming home by another vessel. They wouldn't allow the mackerel to come by vessel; they will come by rail, and it will cost us 85 cents a barrel to get them by rail.

Q. Why would they not allow them to come by vessel?—A. I don't know. I suppose it to be something about allowing a vessel to go in there and buy and reship materials.

Q. Do their fishermen have any difficulty of that kind here in our ports?—A. No, sir.

BAIT.

Q. Have they been buying as much bait here as they pleased this season?—A. Yes, sir; I have sold them in former years hundreds of dollars' worth; I haven't for the last three or four years.

Q. Did they buy a good deal this season?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you any idea how much?—A. I should think some 6,000 or 7,000 barrels altogether.

FREE FISH.

Q. Do you want a treaty with Canada by which you shall be permitted to buy bait there, and hire men, and transship, as a price for giving her a free market with us?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know anything that Canada can give to America which you would regard as an equivalent for a free market for Canada in this country?—A. I don't know of anything.

Q. What, in your opinion, would be the result of a provision in a treaty that should give a free market to Canada for fish in the United States for fifteen or twenty years?—A. It would ruin us; we should have to go out of the business, all of us.

NATIONALITY OF FISHERMEN.

Q. What proportion of the sailors employed in the fish business here in the State of Maine, so far as you know, are American citizens?—A. Probably in the mackerel fishing more than three-fourths; but in the cod-fishing probably there would not be quite so many; perhaps half.

Q. Do the Canadians who come here, the young men, make good citizens?—A. They make smart men.

Q. They are generally the more enterprising Canadians who come here, are they not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is the general result when they come over and commence fishing here; do they become American citizens?—A. They have to become American citizens when they come to take charge of vessels.

Q. And I suppose most of them have an ambition to take command of vessels?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And as a result do they not become naturalized?—A. They do; sir.

DUTY.

Q. You are a man of long experience in this business of fishing; who do you think pays the duty on fish, the Canadian, or the consumer?—A. I think the Canadian has to pay it.

Q. Do you think there should be a duty on frozen fish?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why?—A. Because they mix up duty with everything we send there; we can't ship any fresh fish there unless we pay duty on them.

Q. We do ship some there and pay duty, do we not?—A. Yes, sir; our smoked fish go there, and they put such a duty on us that it costs all the market.

Q. When you ship fish to Canada who pays the duty?—A. We have to pay the duty; that is, it comes out of us. They pay it, but it comes out of us; it comes out of the fish. We used to ship fish to Canada years ago when they were free of duty and could make something out of them; but when this treaty expired they put such a duty on our fresh fish that we can't afford to do it now.

Q. That is, the duty which you pay and the price which you get for the fish will not allow you to do it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know of any country to which we export fish where there is not a duty against us?—A. No, sir.

Q. You say that to allow Canada to have our markets free for 15 or 20 years would ruin us; why?—A. Because we can't compete with her.

Q. Why not?—A. They can furnish fish cheaper than we can.

CANADIAN COMPETITION.

Q. Why?—A. It does not cost them so much to catch the fish.

Q. Why?—A. Their vessels don't cost so much, and catching fish don't cost so much.

Q. Do they not pay as much wages as we do?—A. I don't think they do. Their fishermen are all glad to come here and fish because they say they can get more; when they come here they get their cash; we have to pay cash.

Q. Don't they?—A. I understand they do not; the fishermen that belong there tell me that they do not.

Q. Do they have to take store pay?—A. Yes, sir; and the salt fish are cured and the mackerel are cured by the women and boys.

Q. Do you know what those women and boys get?—A. I don't know but they don't get so much as our men here.

Q. What do you pay your men here?—A. All the way from $2 to a day for experienced men.

Q. You do not employ any women, do you?—A. No, sir.

RELATIVE VALUE OF COD AND MACKEREL FISHERIES.

By Senator SAULSBURY:

Q. What is the relative value of the cod and mackerel fisheries? Which is the more valuable?—A. Mackerel.

Q. Is the aggregate amount of mackerel taken worth more than cod?—A. Some years; this year the cod is worth more. But generally in the other way, and there is the most money in mackerel.

FURTHER TESTIMONY OF ORIN B. WHITTEN.

PORTLAND, ME., October 6, 1886.

ORIN B. WHITTEN recalled and further examined.

By Senator FRYE:

Question. Have you information in regard to the seizure of another Portland vessel?—Answer. I have.

THE CASE OF THE GEORGE W. CUSHING.

Q. What is her name?—A. The schooner George W. Cushing.

Q. You may state the circumstances.—A. I saw the owner of the vessel to-night, and, by the way, he is confined to his house by a severe cold, so that he cannot appear before the committee. He stated that the vessel went down on the Nova Scotia shore and put into a place called Sand Point, some ten miles below Shelburne. Shelburne, I believe, is a port of entry. She got there some time during the evening, and two of the crew left the vessel and went on shore. It happened that the Terror, Captain Quigley, was there, and he boarded the schooner in the night and ordered her up to Shelburne. At Shelburne he placed her alongside the wharf, chained her to the wharf, and there he kept her some ten days, and they paid a fine of $400, and she was released. The vessel came home, the trip was broken up, and the crew got dissatisfied and disheartened. That is all that trip amounted to.

Q. What did she go in there for?—A. I think he told me that it was their intention to go in there for bait. They had the impression, from what they had heard from time to time, that they had the right to enter; but still she didn't go in.

Q. She had not done anything and had not obtained anything?—A. Hadn't done or obtained anything, only two of the crew had gone ashore.

CASE OF THE C. B. HARRINGTON.

Q. Was there another Portland vessel seized?—A. One called the C. B. Harrington was seized about the same time, and I know that she paid a fine of $400.

Q. Do you know what she did?—A. I think she bought some bait.

Q. Do you know of any other Portland vessel?—A. Those are the only ones I know.

Q. Other than those that have been mentioned?—A. That is all.

Q. The owner of the George W. Cushing, with whom you had the interview, was not able to come here on account of sickness?—A. He was not able to come on account of suffering from a severe sore throat and cold.

APPENDIX.

LETTER FROM THE COLLECTOR OF THE PORT OF BOSTON, WITH ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS SUBMITTED IN WRITING BY THE SUBCOMMITTEE.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BOSTON, MASS.,
Collector's Office, October 5, 1886.

SIR: With further reference to your letter of the 28th ultimo, I have the honor to transmit with this, in response to your request, the following described statements:

A.—Replying to inquiries, (1) The whole number of vessels licensed at this port since January 1, 1885, for the fishing trade; (2) The aggregate tonnage of the same; (3) Whether any of them are propelled by steam.

A note is added to this statement in reply to your third inquiry, that the licenses issued were exclusively to sailing vessels. Also, reply, in part, to your sixth inquiry, that it is estimated that not exceeding 6 of the vessels licensed for the fisheries had permits to "touch and trade," and that there were not any other trading papers issued to such licensed vessels.

B and C.—Replying to inquiries, (4) The whole number of vessels cleared from this port for ports in the British North American Provinces from January 1, 1885 to September 30, 1886; (5) American and foreign vessels, separately, class, number, and tonnage of each class, and whether in ballast or with cargoes; (6) None of the merchant vessels named in statements B and C had fishing licenses.

D.—Replying to inquiries, (7) The total number of pounds of fresh fish imported into this port from the British North American Provinces January 1, 1885, to September 30, 1886. There were no duties assessed upon fresh fish, excepting upon fresh sturgeon, as such fish are not for immediate consumption in the condition in which they are imported. (8) The total number of barrels or pounds, respectively, of pickled or salted fish imported from the same ports during the same time, with the amount of duty to which the several classes were subject.

Very respectfully,

L. SALTONSTALL,
Collector.

LETTER FROM THE COLLECTOR OF THE PORT OF PORTLAND, ME., WITH ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS IN WRITING SUBMITTED BY THE SUBCOMMITTEE.CUSTOM-HOUSE, PORTLAND, ME.,
Collector's Office, October 9, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 6th instant requesting information on matters having reference to the "Fisheries question, &c."

Herewith I respectfully submit answers to your inquiries in the order and number in which you propound them, viz:

First. "The whole number of vessels licensed at this port since January 1, 1885, to this date for the fishing trade."

Answer. One hundred forty-nine.

Second. "The aggregate tonnage of the same."

Answer. Seven thousand five hundred and sixty-nine and ninety-seven one-hundredths gross, 6,989.62 net.

Third. "Whether any of them are propelled by steam."

Answer. Three propelled by steam; 478.21 gross tons, 290.81 net tons.

Fourth. "The whole number of vessels cleared from this port for any of the ports of the British North American Provinces since the same date."

Answer. Forty-eight American and 293 British vessels.

Fifth. "The character of said vessels, respectively, whether steam or sail; as to the sailing vessels, the kind of craft and the total tonnage."

Answer. The American vessels cleared were engaged in the foreign carrying trade, and were sailing vessels; total tonnage, 12,341. The British vessels, part of them engaged in bringing fish to this market, fresh and salt, and returning with ballast only, and part of them bringing lumber, plaster, and coal, and returning in ballast. These were all sailing vessels, schooner rigged; tonnage, 36,059.

Sixth. "Whether any such fishing vessels had also trading papers of any kind, either regular clearances or other, and whether any of such merchant vessels had fishing licenses."

Answer. Seven vessels licensed for the fisheries took a permit to "touch and trade," but no clearance or other papers, except usual enrollment and license of vessel. The date and names of the vessels taking "permits to touch and trade" within the period named are as follows, viz: January 1, 1885, schooner Rozella; August 7, 1885, schooner J. W. Bickford; January 11, 1886, schooner Forest Maid; May 15, schooners George W. Pierce and Gertie May; May 27, schooner Annie Sargent; June 7, 1886, schooner Lilla B. Fernald.

STATISTICAL AND OTHER INFORMATION SUBMITTED TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE BY JAMES GIFFORD, Esq., DEPUTY COLLECTOR AT PROVINCETOWN, MASS., IN CONNECTION WITH HIS TESTIMONY.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

"The act 45, chapter 18, authorizes the payment of a sum of $150,000 as an aid to develop the sea-fisheries, to encourage the building and fitting out of improved fishing craft, as well as to ameliorate the condition of the fishermen. This grant is to be expended under regulations of the governor and council, and in such installments as may be directed in each year.

"An order in council, adopted 11th of December, 1882, provides that (1) Canadian fishing vessels of 10 tons and upwards, which have been engaged in the sea-fisheries during a period of three months, shall be entitled to a bounty of $2 per ton up to 50 tons, one-half of said bounty being payable to the owner and one-half to the crew; (2) Canadian fishing boats which have been engaged in the sea-fisheries during a period of three months and caught not less than 2,500 of sea fish per man, exclusive * * * shall be entitled to receive a bounty at the rate of $2.50 per man, one-fifth being payable to the owner or owners of the boat, and four-fifths to be divided equally between the men."

The above order relating to boats was superseded by another order in council, passed May 2, 1883, doubling the payments to boats, i. e., making the bounty $5 per man, boat fisherman, and that, so far as I am informed, is the amount now paid. The boat must have not less than 14 feet keel to entitle her to the bounty.

Under foregoing provisions there was paid in 1873—

On tonnage of vessels, 27,611 ton, 786 vessels..... $54,975 50

⁷ Catch by small boats included.

As we have frequent inquiries as to the fleet of vessels in the cod fishery, amount of catch, &c., we have prepared a table of reports from the numerous New England ports. It will be found of interest as showing the number of the larger vessels engaged in the catch, and while showing only two-thirds of the total catch, at least one-third being caught by small boats fishing on the near home banks and fishing grounds, it will give some idea of the amount and value of this industry. We think these figures prove that for the capital employed this industry ranks among the most important in the country, giving employment to a large number of persons afloat and on shore, and supplying for the masses a cheap and healthful food. As we have never seen any previous records of the codfish fleet, we have no table of comparisons with former years; the number of vessels from most of the ports is small compared with reports of years ago, while others have largely increased. The increased facilities and manner of the catch with a large increase in small boats has amply made up for losses in tonnage. It is generally admitted by dealers and fishermen that more fish are caught at the present time than in any past years. The receipts in Boston, while showing a falling off in some varieties (principally those from the Provinces), in the aggregate show the usual average amount has been received, the Boston market having been well supplied at all times with every variety of salt-water fish found in northern waters.

Mackerel.—The season opened by the early or southern fleet sailing in March, first catch reported by schooner Edward E. Webster, 25,000 fish April 2. The record of the fleet will be found in the report of the various fleets and shows another financially disastrous early catch, some of the vessels returning without fish, very few with profit. We have in previous reports mentioned the injurious effects of this branch of the catch even when followed at a profit, a large catch of poor fish injuring the demand later in the season. The past few years fully demonstrates that the sooner this early catch is abandoned the better it will be for all interested. The first catch in the weirs at Cape Cod April 26; first new salt mackerel arrived in Boston May 10. The market for new stock ranged from $5 to $6 a barrel, vessels doing only fairly up to July 1, the fish and fleet being scattered from Cape Cod to Jeffrey's Banks. Early in July an unprecedented large body of mackerel appeared in Massachusetts Bay, at our very doors. The oldest dealers and fishermen report never having known them so plenty. They continued in the Bay until the close of the season in December, during which time the entire fleet did well, while many of them made remarkable "stocks," as will be seen in the reports of individual vessels. The catch was noticeable for the absence of large and very small fish; its excellent quality, however, causing an active demand for immediate consumption. The catch in the North Bay and provincial waters by the American fleet was almost an entire failure, numerous vessels returning without a single barrel. Fortunately but a small number of vessels visited those waters and, not finding fish, returned in time to secure enough of the home catch to save them from a disastrous season. The total catch of inspected barrels by the Massachusetts fleet is the largest since 1874, amounting to 255,986 barrels. This season's catch has been exceeded but ten times since 1804. The total catch by the New England fleet is 349,674 inspected barrels, a gain over the previous year of 99,861 barrels on the Massachusetts catch and total gain of 129,075 barrels. In addition to our own large catch there has been imported at this port from the Provinces 105,730 barrels, against 84,213 the previous year.

Total amount of mackerel received in Boston during 1880 from domestic and foreign ports, with home catch, 196,493 inspected barrels.

Herring.—Most of our supply is from the provinces, and yearly since 1876 the catch shows a decrease, the imports of 1880 being less than half that of five years ago. This is accounted for by the failure of the leading herring fisheries in provincial waters. The catch off the New England shore was also much less than that of 1879. Even with the reduced supply, prices have ruled low, caused by the abundance of mackerel.

Codfish.—The Grand and Western Bank fleets from New England ports, numbering 222 sail, with few exceptions, made but one trip to the Grand Banks; only ten sail fished in North Bay. All returned in safety with full fares. The Georges and North-east shore fleet, numbering 517 sail of the larger class, have had a fairly prosperous season, and with the numerous small vessels and boats have amply supplied the increased demand, leaving less than the usual supply on hand at the close of the season. With the late method of packing in neat, clean, attractive packages, has naturally followed an increased demand for home use; this has been of great advantage to the producer. Bank fish ruled most of the season at $3.50 to $3.75, Georges and Shores from $4.75 to $5.50 a quintal.

Salmon.—Our receipts show a large decrease, caused by a very small catch in provincial waters. The catch in American waters on the Pacific has been good and prices there low. The high rates of railroad transportation has prevented but slight receipts from that quarter.

Box herring.—About the usual amount of near 500,000 boxes has been received and distributed. This large amount has not at all times fully supplied the demand. The manufacture of the small herring, usually used for smoking, has drawn largely from the supply that would otherwise be boxed. Over 1,000 hands are now employed at Eastport, Me., in putting up sardines; there are also numerous factories at other points.

Other varieties of fish, it will be seen by the table of monthly receipts, about the usual amount has been received. They present no special feature of interest.

United States Fish Commission.—This branch of the Government, but a little older than the bureau, is steadily and quietly working for the benefit of the fishing industry in its various branches.

We wish here to return the thanks of the Boston dealers for the care and interest shown in their products at the late Berlin Exhibition. It is a source of gratification to all citizens, and more particularly to those engaged in the fish industry, that this country, from taking but little interest in the industry as compared with other nations a few years ago, has been acknowledged before the world as at the head, and worthy to receive the highest award of the exhibit, for which we are indebted, in a large measure, to the commission. Already good results are shown from the exhibit made by Boston dealers. Of the field work of the commission many good results have been accomplished; during the past season the artificial propagation of the various salt water fish has been successfully carried on, among which for the first time that of the valuable Spanish mackerel is of much importance, its spawning place even heretofore unknown. When we recall the endless amount of trouble and expense as well as millions of money paid in the past by treaties and awards to other countries for the privilege of fishing in provincial waters, the value of the thorough knowledge of fish propagation will be appreciated, as shown in, the following extract from the last report of Prof. Spencer F. Baird, United States Fish Commissioner. "We have at our command the means of so improving and increasing the American fisheries as to obviate the necessity in the future of asking a participation in the inshore fisheries of the British provinces, and thus enable us to dispense with fishing treaties or fishery relations of any kind with the British or other Governments." The last improvement that has come under our notice is one that, if it continues to do all that it gives promise of doing, will be of great value to the fisherman and revolutionize the present manner of catching ground fish. We allude to the use of gill-nets in cod-fishing. As is well known the Norwegians take more than half the number and two-thirds of the total weight of their catch of cod by gill-nets, yet it has been unknown to our fisherman until the present month. The Commissioner having provided the Norway net for them to experiment with, Capt. George H. Martin, of Gloucester, has been using them to good advantage in Ipswich Bay, fishing with two dories, two nets to a dory, nets each 50 fathoms long, 3 fathoms deep, suspended by glass balls or floats at any required depth. Nets of 10-inch mesh are set the same as herring nets, being set in the morning or during the day, and are hauled the next morning. As yet no fish caught except at night, and only the largest cod; the catch for the three first trials, with unfavorable weather was, respectively, 4,000, 6,000, and 7,000 pounds. Captain Martin is much pleased with his success, and has ordered new nets. These nets can be used on the Grand Banks or in 50 fathoms of water, as well as in Ipswich Bay, where at present used only in 8 to 15 fathoms. We may not be surprised in the near future to see the old and much-condemned as well as expensive method of trawling superseded by the gill-nets introduced by the United States Fish Commission.

Foreign exports.—From the early history of the fishing industry this branch has been of importance; of late years it has steadily shown a decline, the leading cause of which is found in the constantly increasing domestic demand. This year prices have ruled low at the West India ports, with small inducements to shippers to increase the business, which is yet of some considerable importance, amounting the past year to $600,000.

Fresh fish.—Our report and tables of receipts, number of vessels and crew, having been confined to salt or cured fish, we wish briefly to call attention to the importance and steady growth of the fresh-fish business. During the past year the market has at all times been well supplied with the leading varieties of fresh salt-water fish. Cod and pollock show a small falling off in the receipts, haddock a gain, hake a large increase; the total amount of the receipts of these fish for the past year is not far from 30,000,000 pounds. The abundance of mackerel at our doors most of the season resulted in the receiving and distribution throughout the country of 75,000 barrels of fresh mackerel. Day after day for weeks from 1,000 to 2,000 barrels were received. Notwithstanding this unusually large production, all were used fresh. For the first year in the history of the business not a week during the year has passed but fresh mackerel could be bought at reasonable prices. Salmon were in lighter receipt, yet the market was well supplied. Other varieties of fish have been of an average catch

The aggregate amount of this branch of the business, not far from $2,000,000, shows an increase over the previous year.

Boston Fish Bureau.—In closing the sixth annual report we wish to refer to its institution and past work. Previous to its organization the only record of the fishing industry were through the yearly reports of the State inspector-general of fish, with no concentration of daily or weekly reports of receipts or information in regard to the operations of the fleets during the fishing season, except such as individual firms procured. In June, 1875, the late Mr. Franklin Snow, with the sagacity and public spirit for which he was noted, called the dealers together, offering them suitable rooms for the required needs of an association free of rent for a year, and the bureau was organized. Since our last annual report we have been called to mourn the loss of its founder. For twenty-eight years he was one of the leaders in the trade, ever known at the front in good works and numerous institutions for the benefit of others, as well as the many business enterprises of which he was the founder or connected with. He has been and long will be missed as well by the humble fisherman that received his kind look and word as those having large business transactions with him.

Each year since its organization the bureau reports have been fuller and of more interest, for which we are largely indebted to our correspondents the entire length of the coast. At first looking with suspicion on its aim and object, they have long since found out its object is for the benefit of the fishing industry, its doors ever open to the fisherman to give him the latest information procured as to the location of the fleets, fish, or other desired information. From many letters in regard to our daily reports we extract the following from a producer and dealer in Maine: "We have derived much important information from your full and able reports of the growing and valuable interest, the production of fish, giving to the producer and dealer a line of information not elsewhere found, which aids the fisherman, packer, and dealer in each department."

To all who have helped to make our reports of interest, and kindly furnished us with statistics at the close of the year, we return our sincere thanks, with the hope that the record of the coming season business may be more favorable than the one just closed.

Secretary.

SEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOSTON FISH BUREAU, JANUARY, 1882.

NEW ENGLAND FISHERIES.

Of the numerous industries of New England that of the fisheries is no doubt the oldest, and possesses much of historic and present interest to others than those particularly engaged in it. At numerous times much has been written of it yet its history, particularly the statistical portion is much broken, many of the old records having been destroyed, with no copies in existence. As early as 1619 we find the abundance of fish in the waters of Massachusetts Bay had attracted attention in Europe. The Pilgrims going from Leyden to England in that year to solicit consent of King James to their going to America, the king inquired, "What profit might arise?" the brief reply was simply "Fishing." To which King James responded, "So God have my soul, 'tis an honest trade; 'twas the Apostles' own calling." The request was granted. To the fisheries the credit is given of saving the infant colony from starvation; that the first free schools were supported with an income from the fisheries; that the Government has always recognized the patriotism, bravery, and important services rendered the Navy in time of need by the fishermen, are all matters well known. With the growth of the country nearly all the seaport towns had quite large fleets engaged in fishing, with numerous vessels engaged in foreign trade, of which fish products formed a large proportion. For many generations the business was carried on in its primitive way with no marked change until quite recently.

Of late years many new industries have sprung up that in size far surpass that of the fisheries. A large number of ports have given up the business, others have but few vessels. The business is gradually being concentrated to a few ports, the export business (with the exception of an occasional cargo) confined to Boston.

Although fewer ports and smaller fleets are engaged at present the business continues of importance, with probably as many fish caught at present as at any previous time.

The many new ways of preparing the catch for the market give employment ashore to a large number of persons, the increased facilities for a catch making good any decrease in the number of vessels, with fully as many persons employed afloat and ashore as at any previous time with twice as many sail.

Before turning to the present it may be of interest to note a few of the changes and contrast the past with the present.

In the past, as at the present time, Boston was known as the chief port of distribution for all varieties of salt-water fish found in New England or Provincial waters. Here, in olden time, the fishermen came with their products, selling the same to the grocers or from the vessels and taken inland by teams that came from Vermont, New Hampshire, and other parts of the country loaded with grain, pork, and other provisions. Dry fish was handled loose or tied up in bundles, while mackerel and other pickled fish were shipped in barrels, halves, or quarters. For many years the catch was made in the most primitive manner, for cod and other ground fish the hook and hand-line only being used, the mackerel catch was taken by the gaff or by "drailing," the latter mode by having poles suspended from the side of the vessel, with hook and line attached, the vessel being under sail or no catch was made; later the hook and hand-line, or "jigging." With these few appliances a large amount of business was annually carried on, the catch, with the exception of the Grand Bank cod fleet, being confined chiefly to the New England coast.

Although Boston was the great point for a market and the distribution of the catch, there was not a single exclusive wholesale salt-fish store in the city until 1807. In that year Mr. Ebenezer Nickerson opened the first store of the kind, it being located on Long Wharf. For fifteen years this was the only store engaged in the business; in 1830 two other firms were started. From this commencement the business grew, the grocers giving it up to those exclusively engaged. New firms started from time to time, as the business increased.

From the first settlement of Boston up to 1835 the fresh-fish business was only carried on in a retail manner by boats lying at the docks, and teams standing about the market; ice was not used, and the canning of fish had probably not been thought of. During the summer season the trade was confined to a near-home demand. During the winter it was teamed inward as far as Albany and Montreal. The catch came from Massachusetts Bay, and was supplied by the small fishing vessels from this and neighboring ports. During cold weather, in a frozen state, it was brought to market by teams from Cape Ann and ports between. The oyster business was of small proportion, and carried on from two small hulks covered in and used for storage below and above. The oysters mostly came from Cape Cod, never from south of New York, and from July to September no oysters were sold in Boston. As the demand for fresh fish increased better facilities were needed to handle the catch, and the first wholesale fresh-fish store was opened on Long Wharf in 1835, Messrs. Holbrook, Smith & Co. being the pioneers. Their business was mostly during the winter and spring months; through the warm weather it was confined to pickled, dry, or smoked fish. In 1838 this firm removed to Commercial Wharf, being the first firm so engaged on that wharf, which, at the present time, is the headquarters of the trade, with thirty-five wholesale firms engaged in the immediate vicinity.

Up to 1845 the catch of ground fish was solely by hook and hand line. About that year the trawl was first introduced by fishermen that had used or seen them used off the coast of Ireland. During 1880 the gill nets were introduced with good result by the United States Fish Commission. At the present time all three of the methods are used by the market fishermen. In the mackerel catch the purse seine superseded all previous methods, and is now almost exclusively used. Its use is said to date from 1835, although it did not come into general use for a number of years.

As we have previously alluded to the decrease in the number of vessels engaged in the catch, as not necessarily causing a like decrease in the amount of the industry or of the products, it is of interest to note, with only one exception, the largest catch of mackerel on record, as inspected in Massachusetts, was in 1851. In that year with the hook and line 329,000 barrels were caught by a fleet of 853 vessels, hailing from thirty Massachusetts ports, with 87 vessels from other States—a total of 940 vessels manned by 9,993 fishermen. During the past year, with the purse seine, a catch of 391,657 barrels was made with a fleet numbering 298 sail from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine, with 4,258 fishermen engaged. We do not propose to discuss the question as to the benefit or injury to the business by the new modes of capture, only to show that the business is as productive at the present time, with half the number of vessels engaged, as in past years. The tables attached will show that the fleets are of no small size at the present time, and the business of no small importance.

The canning of fish of almost every eatable variety has yearly grown of importance, and is now of large proportion. This branch of the business dates only from 1845, in which year the canning of lobsters and shell-fish began in Maine, for some time the only State that packed fish in tin cans. It has been but a few years since the canning of fish began in Boston, yearly increasing in amount. Boneless fish, now well known, and neatly packed in packages of from five to thirty pounds each, is found in all the leading grocery stores from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This manner of preparing fish dates back many years with but little attention given to it for a long time. Of late years the demand from the fertilizing factories for the refuse left from cutting lessening the cost of preparation, with the cleanly manner of placing on the market and the saving in freight, has made it justly popular with the trade; the demand yearly increases. Its preparation, with the canning of fish, gives employment to a large number of men and women.

It hardly seems possible that an article so universally used as ice was unknown to the fish trade forty years ago. At the present time no market fisherman would think of starting on his trip (except in the winter) without ice any more than without bait or seine. During 1845 vessels first began carrying ice to sea with them and dealers to use it in packing fish for shipment; previous to that date its use was considered injurious to the fish. At the present time about 20,000,000 pounds are annually used by vessels and dealers. Through its use fresh fish are now shipped at all seasons of the year as far inland as Chicago.

As far back as we find any record of the fishing business, we find the use of nets of some kind in taking the catch. In past years those used by the New England fishermen were mostly "home made." During the winter or stormy season the fishermen with wife and family found plenty of work in making nets. Of late years their work in the various branches of the fisheries has largely increased. They are now nearly all factory-made of a great variety, including the fine flax-thread net of the shell fishery, the larger purse seine of the mackerel and menhaden catch, the large driftnets of the Southern fisheries as well as numerous other varieties.

Two large factories in this city give employment to some 500 persons, mostly girls, furnishing most of the seines and nets used on the Western lakes and rivers as well as the Atlantic coast fisheries, with some demand for export. The first factory in Boston was started in 1842; from that date until 1865 the nets were all hand-made. In the latter year machinery was first introduced in their manufacture in this city and is now almost exclusively used. We have briefly alluded to the various branches of the fishing industry. Another branch largely represented in Boston is that of the Provincial catch sent to the Boston market for sale. Our tables of monthly receipts will show the amount of the past year, which is less than the average of late years, caused by the partial failure of their catch. The earliest record of the importation of mackerel that we find is of 7 barrels in 1821. From that date up to 1831 only a few hundred barrels were annually imported. In the latter year, 1831, increasing up to 1841 to 10,887; from that year until 1849 the records were destroyed by fire. In the latter year it had increased to 138,505 barrels; and yearly, from that date, from 50,000 to 100,000 barrels of mackerel, with a large amount of all the other varieties of fish caught in the Provinces find a ready market in Boston.

The late Capt. T. J. Jones is credited with being one of the first pioneers in the importation of fish from the Provinces, being engaged as master of the Boston and Halifax mail packet from 1834 until 1844. He early introduced the importation of fish and lived to see his efforts grow into a large and important branch of the business.

REPORT.—1881.

OFFICE OF BOSTON FISH BUREAU, 176 ATLANTIC AVENUE,
Boston, January 2, 1882.

Our last annual report, showing a more prosperous condition of the fisheries than for a number of years, was closed with the "hope that the record of the coming season's business may be more favorable than the one just ended." We are pleased to open this report by calling attention to the tables attached, which speak for themselves, and show that the hope then expressed has been fulfilled, and the season of 1881 may justly be placed on record as the most successful one for years. The statistics of monthly receipts also show quite an increase of business by Boston dealers, and that this market has at all times been well supplied with nearly every variety of cured (salt-water) fish, taken in New England and provincial waters. That this fact is appreciated by the trade is evident in the steady gain of business, as shown in the table of receipts for the past five years.

There is probably no industry with like capital and number of persons engaged that yearly shows as great a loss of life and property. With no severe gales or storms, the past season yet shows considerable loss, and this must be recorded as the dark side of an otherwise prosperous year. The losses, as usual, nearly all fall on the bankers from Gloucester, that port losing 7 sail, with 43 men, the value of vessels and property $23,000, on which there was insurance of $20,493. The loss of life from other ports included aggregates a total of 50 men, while the loss of property has been limited to damaged sails and numerous seine-boats.

The number of sail, catch, and persons employed in the codfish and mackerel fishery vary but little from that of 1880; the catch reported by them in the aggregate, as well as individual vessels, shows a favorable gain. The catch has found a ready market at all seasons, with higher prices than for several years. Much encouragement is felt for the future, and from all sides we hear of active preparations for the business of 1882, with some addition to the number of sail, a number of which are new vessels.

Mackerel.—The catch opened unusually early, schooner Edward E. Webster on March 22 taking the first fare, 32,700 mackerel, 800 of which were large, balance medium and small. The first fare of new salt mackerel arrived in Boston May 9, one day earlier than in 1880, schooner Roger Williams landing 240 barrels that were caught off the Jersey coast. May 10, schooner J. S. McQuinn arrived with the first fare of fresh mackerel, 200 barrels caught southeast from Sandy Hook. First cargo arrived fresh same date in 1880. May 4 the first catch was made in the weirs at Cape Cod; previous year on April 26. March 25, schooner Lizzie K. Clark was capsized by a squall and lost, 20 miles from Barnegat; the crew were saved. This was the only mackerel vessel lost during the season. Although the season opened early the catch up to June was mostly taken South and sold fresh. The catch of cured mackerel reported at this office during the season, up to November, was as follows:

May	barrels..	1, 670
June	do.....	38, 683
July	do.....	81, 748
August	do.....	70, 424
September	do.....	71, 643
October	do.....	57, 268

A light catch in November brought the season to an early close, the total catch of the New England fleet, of 298 sail, being 391,657 barrels, of which 269,495 were packed and inspected in Massachusetts, a gain in the Massachusetts inspection of 19,534 barrels over 1880. This amount has been exceeded but five times in seventy-eight years.

As will be noticed, the catch off the New England coast opened a little later than usual, and continued good all the season, with the exception of 470 barrels the entire catch being taken off the United States coast. The size and quality were of an average, with more No. 1's, and an absence of the very small, or No. 4. The price opened for the first sale recorded being at $4.50 a barrel for large, $3.75 for medium, falling in June to $4 for packed, or early 3's; inspected 3's, 2's, and 1's selling through the season as follows: July, $3.25, $3.50 for 3's; $5.25, $5.50 for 2's. August, $3.25, 3's; $5.25, 2's. September, $4.25, 3's; $6.50, 2's; $16, 1's. October, $6, $8 to $9, $18. November, $6.50, $9, $19. December, $7.50, 3's; $9 to $10, 2's; $20, 1's.

The catch in Provincial waters being a failure, our imports show a falling off of 43,880 barrels. Fortunately very few American vessels visited them, securing only 470 barrels; they returned home in season to make a good record.

Codfish.—with which we may include the other varieties of ground fish, have been of an average catch, both off the New England coast as well as the Grand and Western Banks. The receipts in this market show quite a gain over the past few years. A steady increased home demand, with an average export shipment, has held prices firm at an advance of $1 to $1.25 a quintal over the previous year. Vessels that went to the Grand Banks made long voyages, yet generally returned with full fares, some exceptionally large; of which we notice schooner Willie McKay, of Provincetown, with 3,700 quintals, making a stock of $14,000.

Herring.—The shore catch of herring being much less than that of 1880, our domestic receipts show a decrease, which is made up from the Provinces; the total receipts a slight gain.

Salmon.—A failure of the catch in provincial waters accounts for small receipts. The decrease having been made up by receipts from California, our receipts showing a small gain.

Box herring.—The receipts, 612,422 boxes, are an increase of 168,825 boxes over that of 1880, and the largest on record. Large as this amount is it has all gone into consumption, and no stock remains on the market.

Other varieties of fish are without special change; with but few exceptions the receipts have been in excess of last year.

Fresh fish.—This branch of the fish business of Boston is now of considerable importance, annually handling some 30,000,000 pounds of fresh fish, and during the past year 70,000 barrels of fresh mackerel and 18,000 barrels of frozen herring. The catch has been an average one, at nearly all times supplying a demand from all parts of the country, as far west as Chicago, for the numerous varieties of salt-water fish found in these waters. The vessels and men engaged in this branch do not appear in our statistics.

Canned fish.—We have previously alluded to this branch of the business, of its commencement in the country. Until the past few years this market has been supplied with large quantities of goods packed at other ports, many of the factories being owned here. During the past two years the business of packing has been largely increased in this city; during the past season, of fresh mackerel, about 50,000 cases, or 2,200,000 1-pound cans, have been packed, and much of the time the demand has not been supplied. This branch of the business, buying and packing several hundred barrels a day, when the fish can be procured, is of much value to the vessels that give their attention to selling fresh. It is also of value in giving employment to large numbers of employes in the factories. Nearly all the usual varieties of fish found in our markets are now more or less packed in tin cans by our packers, all of which are meeting with favor and a constantly increasing demand.

Foreign imports and exports.—Our monthly table of receipts will show that this city continues to be a leading market for the fish productions of the Provinces. During the past year the receipts in most cases show a decrease, caused by the partial failure of the provincial catch.

Our foreign exports have been of an average amount. As long as the domestic demand yearly increases the want of large exports to dispose of the catch is not felt, as in past years.

As we close our report we wish to return our thanks to our numerous correspondents that have, from time to time, furnished us with information, and at the close of the season aided us in giving a complete record of the business by ports. We shall be happy to return the favor and do all in our power to aid the New England fishing industry.

EIGHTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOSTON FISH BUREAU, JANUARY, 1883.

REPORT.

OFFICE OF BOSTON FISH BUREAU,
Boston, January 1, 1883.

In presenting our eighth annual report, we take pleasure in once more reporting the fishing industry of New England in a more flourishing condition than for many years. The season just closed has been a successful and prosperous one to the producer, and a steady healthy demand with no failures of note has given the dealers no cause for complaint. The leading varieties of fish, with the regularity of the seasons, appeared in large bodies, each giving promise of more than an average catch. As the season advanced, the catch, from numerous causes, fell off much from general expectation, yet meeting the demands of the trade, and holding prices firm all the season. The dark side of the business must yearly be noticed. The losses of life and property the past year have been, with the exception of 1876, 1879, the largest for many years.

Seventeen vessels and 117 men have been lost during the year, all of which were in the cod or ground fishery, and nearly all from the single port of Gloucester; not any vessels or lives were lost in the mackerel fishery. Larger stocks have been made the past season than ever before known. We notice specially only two engaged in the mackerel catch; schooner Edward E. Webster, Capt. Solomon Jacobs, of Gloucester, sailed March 11, and hauled up November 11, just eight months engaged; her catch realized, gross, $30,750, or net $34,329; she carried a crew of 17 men. The stock of this vessel for the two previous years in the mackerel fishery was in 1880, $19,850; 1881, $26,950. The schooner Nellie N. Rowe, of the same port, made a stock the past year nearly if not quite as large; we regret not having the exact amount.

Our table of large stocks in the mackerel fishery mention over thirty others who have realized what would have been considered small fortunes not many years ago. The list might be extended to greater length; suffice to say all done well.

Many vessels in the cod and halibut fishery also have large records. We only notice a few of them. Schooner Grace L. Sears, of Gloucester, from December 31, 1881, to December 4, 1882, stocked in the halibut fishery, net, $26,426.81; the crew of 14 men shared, $916.11 each. Schooner H. B. Griffin, of the same port, caught 400,000 pounds of cod on the Banks, the largest single fare reported from that port. Schooner Willie McKay, of Provincetown, 436,800 pounds of codfish, stock about $19,000 for a single voyage. Many other vessels from the last port arrived home from the Banks with 250,000 to 300,000 pounds of cod each, realizing from $12,000 to $16,000 each.

With the success of the past two seasons it is not surprising that great confidence is felt in the future of the New England fisheries.

With present appliances for the catch not as many vessels are needed as in days of drailing and hand-line fishing, yet the cod and mackerel fleets have been largely increased and many more new vessels will be finished in time for the coming season's business. During the past year, 81 vessels have been built for the fishing fleets. Yearly more attention appears to be given to the fishing business, as one of the important industries of the country, and with the growth annually the demand increases for the products of the fisheries. The nation is largely indebted to Prof. Spencer F. Baird, Commissioner of United States Fisheries, for both the scientific knowledge and practical application of the propagation of the various food fishes of the United States, by which assurances are given that the steady growing demands of the country may be met. Through the reports of his field agents, made in the interest of the United States Census and Fish Commission, we, for the first time, have the opportunity of knowing the size and importance of the industry. As a matter of interest we have given the aggregate reports, which do not include the Gulf States or the large rivers of the interior. On pages 30 to 33 will be found the names of the leading fish taken south of New York and the catch for 1880. As so little is known of the fisheries in those waters we give the list entire.

Mackerel.—The total catch by the New England fleet amounted to 378,853 inspected barrels; of this 258,716 barrels are credited to Massachusetts. This amount has been exceeded but eight times during the past fifty years. The early fleet sailed from home ports in March, more vessels going South than for many years. The schooner Nellie N. Rowe took the first fare on March 31; the fish were of mixed sizes. First catch in 1881 was March 22. The first mackerel taken in the weirs at Cape Cod, April 20; previous year, on May 4. The first fare of salt mackerel direct from the fishing grounds arrived at Boston on May 4; in 1831, May 9. The fish were found quite plenty, and worked north slowly; the vessels that made an early start were more successful than for a number of years.

The season's catch is noticeable as having been of larger size and poorer quality than the previous year. As the season advanced the fish did not improve as usual, the fall catch being inferior to that of midsummer. The schooner Yankee Lass, of Boston, was the only vessel from the United States that fished in provincial waters; she returned with 275 barrels.

The catch by the provincial fishermen was the smallest for years, and accounts for the large decrease in the amount imported at this port. Prices have held firm with an upward tendency from the first of the season, and much higher than the previous year, selling unsuspected in June at $4; July, $6 to $7; August, $8 to $9; inspected selling in August, $6, $9, $12; September, $7, $10, $13; and in October and later, at $8, $11, $14, for No. 1's, 2's, and 3's. During September the catch rapidly fell off with few fish caught in October, and the fleet early gave it up. Although the total catch was extra large, a steady demand prevented any large accumulation; only a small amount remained on hand at the close of the year.

Codfish.—The total catch of cured fish by the New England fleet was 663,564 quintals of codfish, and 235,340 quintals of hake, haddock, pollock, and ensk; total of 898,904 quintals. The Grand Bank fleet, with few exceptions, made but one trip, returning with full fares. The catch of cod on Georges Banks and off the New England shore was less than the average. Hake have been more plenty than for many years. The shore catch of herring was much under the average.

Box herring.—Have been in larger receipt than any year that we have a record of: a steady demand has called for them on arrival and no amount of stock remains on hand.

Canned fish.—During the past few years this comparatively new branch of the business has grown to large size and importance.

In former years fresh fish often arrived on the market largely in excess of the demand, and had to be sold for almost nothing or thrown away, often the latter. Now the cannery men are always ready to take the catch at good prices, thereby adding thousands of dollars to the receipts of the fishermen as well as giving employment to a large number of hands on shore. As far back as 1844 fresh fish were canned in Boston, but only to a very limited extent up to 1880, since which time the amount canned is only limited by the supply of fish. The favor which it meets on the market speaks for itself, when for self-protection Boston firms in taking orders have been obliged to adopt the rule on receiving them, only, "subject to the pack," which in turn is subject to the abundance of the catch. The packing of American sardines may date from Eastport, Me., in 1876, in which year 4,000 cases were packed, mostly quarter cans packed in oil, 100 cans in a case. Yearly the business has grown until, in 1881, fifteen factories at Eastport and three at Lubec packed 190,000 cases, three-fourths of which were quarter boxes packed in oil, 100 cans in a case; one-eighth half cans in mustard, 50 cans in a case; one-eighth spiced sardines and sea trout. The past season, owing to the scarcity of fish, only 125,000 cases were packed, giving employment to 500 men and 700 boys and girls in addition to the fishermen engaged in providing the catch.

The foreign export trade has been smaller than for many years, especially the trade with Hayti, severe sickness in that island and the low prices prevailing here for coffee and logwood combining to produce this result. The smallness of this branch of trade, however, has not been felt by the dealers, owing to the unusually large home demand. Other branches of the trade are without special note.

During the past year the Boston market has, at nearly all times, been able to supply the country with everything in the way of salt-water fish, be it cured, canned, or fresh, and, as it is the only city that can do this, it continues to hold its old time prestige as a distributing point, both for domestic and imported fish. This fact is fully appreciated by the trade, as shown by the large receipts and the small amount of stock on hand at the close of the past year.

The new year opens with a small amount of stock on hand and an improved financial condition of both producer and dealer as the result of the year's business, thus giving renewed hope and encouragement to all interested in this important branch of the New England industries. We trust the day is far remote when less can be said for its prosperity.

W. A. WILCOX,
Secretary.

The fishing industry of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Great Lakes.

Most of the following notes and all the statistics have been taken from the advance Bulletin of the U. S. Census Reports for 1880. They were collected under the superintendence of Prof. Spencer F. Baird, U. S. Commissioner of Fisheries, and Prof. G. Brown Goode, by the following special agents: For the Atlantic coast and Lakes, R. E. Earle, J. W. Collins, A. Howard Clark, Fred. Mather, N. E. Atwood, F. W. True, Ernest Ingersoll, Col. Marshall McDonald, W. A. Wilcox; for the Pacific coast, by Prof. D. S. Jordan, James G. Swan, and Dr. T. H. Bean.

THE FISHERIES OF MAINE.

It is found that, if the oyster industry be neglected, Maine ranks second only to Massachusetts in the extent and value of her sea fisheries. If the weight of the products alone is considered, the six principal species, placed in the order of their importance, are as follows:

	Pounds.
Cod.....	56,004,325
Herring.....	34,695,192
Mackerel.....	31,694,455
Hake.....	24,447,730
Haddock.....	17,728,735
Lobster.....	14,334,182

However, the money value is considered, the relative importance of the species is somewhat different. The following arrangement represents the fisheries according to their value:

Herring fishery (including the sardine industry).....	$1,043,722
Mackerel fishery.....	659,304
Cod fishery.....	656,753
Lobster fishery.....	412,076
Hake fishery.....	278,336
Haddock fishery.....	225,395

The statistics are intended to represent the fishing interests for 1880. The first lobsters ever canned within the limits of the United States were put up in Eastport, in 1842, and, with the exception of a limited business in Boston at various times, Maine has always had a monopoly of the industry for the entire country. In 1880 none were carried outside of the State, and the table, therefore, shows the extent of the business for the United States. The entire lobster catch of Maine for the year is found to be 14,234,182 pounds, of which 4,739,898 pounds were sold fresh, and 9,494,284 pounds were put up by the 23 canneries located in different parts of the State. Several of these canneries were owned by Boston capitalists, but the great majority belonged to Portland dealers, who, in addition to their home interests, operated 17 canneries in the British Provinces. During the same season, according to the statistics furnished by them, they bought 10,588,578 pounds of live lobsters from the Provincial fishermen, from which they put up 2,198,024 cans of the various brands.

The sardine industry is peculiar to Maine. In fact, if we except the menhaden, put up in New Jersey several years ago, under the name of "shadines," and "club-fish," the industry was, up to 1880, confined exclusively to the village of Eastport. Though experiments were made in the preparation of herring as sardines as early as 1866, the business did not practically begin till 1875, since which time it has grown with remarkable rapidity. In 1880, as shown by the tables, it furnished employment to over 1,500 fishermen and factory hands, in addition to 376 fishermen belonging to New Brunswick, and the value of the products amounted to nearly $825,000.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Portsmouth, the only seaport of the State, in former years was quite largely interested in the fisheries, as producer, as well as having a large domestic and export trade. Of late years, in common with many other of the oldest settlements, the business has mostly moved to neighboring ports, and is limited to supplying the near home demand for fresh fish.

MASSACHUSETTS.

From the early settlement of the State to the present time has lead all others in capital, products, and number of employes engaged in the fishing industry, 20,117 persons being actively engaged in the numerous branches; 5,000 additional are engaged in the manufacture of nets, lines, fish-boxes, cooperage, building of fishing crafts. Including the families of fishermen and others dependent on the fisheries, at least 100,000 persons are supported from this industry.

The total value of the products for 1880 were, for fish alone, $5,054,900; shell fish, fish-oil, and guano, $997,512; whale fishery, $2,089,337; total, $8,141,750.

The total weights of fish caught that year amounted to 341,935,982 pounds, exclusive of any shell fish.

The years 1881 and 1882 have been far more prosperous than the one above mentioned, and would show large gains in products as well as vessel tonnage. About 75,000,000 pounds of ice and 70,000,000 pounds of salt are annually used in the fisheries of the State.

RHODE ISLAND.

The fishing industry of this State is chiefly confined to oysters, and its menhaden oil fisheries, with less attention paid to food fish. Total value of products, $350,915.

CONNECTICUT.

The value of the products for 1880 were as follows: Oysters, $710,875; fertilizers, $407,604; food fish, $338,387; total, $1,456,866.

THE FISHERIES OF NEW YORK.

New York takes an important part in the fisheries, coming fourth in the list of fish-producing States, with products valued at $4,380,565. In several special branches she holds a still more prominent position. Her menhaden fisheries are more extensive than those of any other State, and in 1880 the value of the oil, scrap, and compost reached $1,114,158, being more than half of the yield for the entire country. The value of the products of the oyster fisheries for the same period reached $1,577,050, which is greater than that for any of the other States, except Maryland, Virginia, and New Jersey. The New York fishermen secure annually larger quantities of both hard and soft clams than those of any other State; in 1880 the amount realized from the sale of these two species was $517,691. In the shad fisheries she ranks second on the list, the catch in 1880 reaching 2,733,600 pounds.

THE FISHERIES OF NEW JERSEY.

New Jersey produced in 1880 $3,176,589 worth of fishery products, taking the sixth place in the list of fish-producing States. In some of the special fisheries it takes a higher rank. Its oyster products, valued at $2,080,625, are exceeded only by those of Maryland and of Virginia. Its crab fisheries, from which the fishermen realize $162,612, are more extensive than those of any other State, while its quahaug (hard clam) fisheries are second only to those of New York. In the menhaden fisheries it stands fifth on the list, the oil, scrap, and compost produced in 1880 being valued at $146,286. Its river fisheries are of minor importance, the total yield being only 2,752,000 pounds, netting the fishermen $91,435.

THE FISHERIES OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Pennsylvania, though consuming large quantities of fishery products, has no important fishing grounds within its borders. The principal business connected with the fisheries is the oyster industry, for, though no oysters are produced in the waters of the State, a large number of persons are engaged in transporting oysters from the southern beds to Philadelphia, and others make a business of receiving, shelling, and

The sea fishing is confined to the capture of sea-bass and other species by a fleet of eight vessels that make occasional trips to the fishing grounds off Cape Henlopen during the summer months. Shad, sturgeon, and other less important species are taken in small quantities in the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers, and lake fish of different kinds are caught along the shores bordering Lake Erie.

THE FISHERIES OF DELAWARE.

The oyster industry, valued at $687,725, constitutes the principal fishery business of Delaware, over two-thirds of the money realized by the fishermen being derived from the capture and sale of this species. The other fishery interests of the State are very limited, being largely confined to the capture of salt-water species in the bays and sounds along the outer shore, and to the net-fishing for shad, sturgeon, and other species in Delaware River and its numerous tributaries.

THE FISHERIES OF THE SOUTHERN ATLANTIC STATES.

Probably no portion of the entire coast is so bountifully supplied with valuable food-fish and other edible species as are the sounds and bays of our southern Atlantic States. Fully three times as many persons are at present engaged in the fisheries of the district under consideration as in 1870, and the value of the products has more than quadrupled during the same period; yet the fact remains that in many localities, especially in the portion south of Albemarle Sound, North Carolina, the fisheries are practically undeveloped, and the people, as a rule, have little idea of the abundance of fish in the waters along their shores. There are many obstacles in the way of any extensive fishing business, such as the difficulty of procuring ice and the absence of proper shipping facilities; but there seems little doubt that when the people come to realize the importance of their fishing interests, these difficulties will be overcome, and many will find fishing a remunerative employment. In certain localities, as at Beaufort, Wilmington, and Charleston, a large business has sprung up, with profit to all concerned, but even here the industry is capable of much further development.

THE FISHERIES OF MARYLAND.

If the sea fisheries proper be taken as a standard, Maryland has an unimportant place among the fish-producing States; but if the oyster and river fisheries be included, in both of which she is extensively interested, she ranks second only to Massachusetts in the value of the products, and stands first on the list in the number of persons employed. Her 26,008 persons employed as fishermen and shoresmen produced in 1880 $5,221,715 worth of fishery products, while the 20,117 persons interested in the Massachusetts fisheries realized $8,141,750 as the result of their labors. This is easily explained by the fact that the fishing season is much shorter in the former than in the latter State, and that the fishermen are, as a rule, less energetic and less fully equipped for the work. Her oyster interests are more important than those of any other State, these, according to the report of Mr. R. H. Edmonds, furnishing employment to 23,402 persons, with 1,450 vessels and 1,825 boats, the value of the products amounting to $4,730,476. With so extensive a river system, it is natural to suppose that her fresh-water fisheries would be of peculiar importance, and such is indeed the case, for more shad are taken by her fishermen than by those of any other State, while she stands second only to North Carolina in the extent and value of her alewife (called herring) fisheries.

THE FISHERIES OF VIRGINIA.

Virginia comes seventh on the list of fish-producing States, the oyster, menhaden, and shad fisheries being the three branches in which her citizens are most extensively interested. In the first-named fishery she ranks second only to Maryland, having 16,315 persons employed, with products valued at $2,218,376. Her menhaden fisheries are of recent origin, but they have developed with remarkable rapidity. In 1880 the fleet numbered 102 sail, and the oil, scrap, and compost produced sold for $303,829. $2,213,500 pounds of menhaden being utilized in this way. The river fisheries are also important, furnishing employment to 2,641 persons, and over 3,000,000 pounds of shad and nearly 7,000,000 pounds of alewives (locally known as herring), with many other river species, were taken, the whole having a value of $272,828.

THE FISHERIES OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The large rivers and brackish sounds of North Carolina are visited annually by immense numbers of shad and alewives (commonly called herring), and in spring and early summer the fishing is extensive in many portions of the State. The principal fisheries, however, are near the junction of the Roanoke and Chowan Rivers, at the head of Albemarle Sound, and in the Neuse and the Tar Rivers. In the alewife fisheries the State ranks first on the list, with 15,520,000 pounds, netting the fishermen $142,784. The quantity of shad taken in 1880 was 3,221,263 pounds, being a little below the Maryland catch, but the price realized is so much greater that the value of the catch is more than double that for the Maryland fishery.¹ Its sea fisheries, when compared with those of the more northern States, are of little importance, though in the bays and sounds between Beaufort and Wilmington many follow fishing for a livelihood and secure annually large quantities of the various species. The mullet fisheries of North Carolina are second only to those of Florida, the catch in 1880 amounting to 3,368,000 pounds, valued at $80,500.

THE FISHERIES OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

South Carolina comes twentieth in the list of fish-producing States, with 1,005 fishermen and products valued at $212,482. She is, however, noted for her shrimp fisheries, these being more extensive than those of any other State, and nearly as important as those of all other States combined. In 1880 her fishermen secured 18,000 bushels, valued at $37,500. The principal fisheries are about Charleston, where several hundred negroes, with an occasional Spaniard, are engaged in fishing with hand-lines from vessels and small boats to supply the city with whiting, blackfish, and other species. A limited fishery occurs at Georgetown, and in the sounds about Beaufort, from which points a few fish are shipped to the interior cities. Beyond the places mentioned no sea fishery of importance occurs, though there is more or less fishing for local supply along all portions of the coast. Four hundred thousand pounds of alewives (locally known as herring), 207,600 pounds of shad, and 261,250 pounds of sturgeon, with considerable quantities of other species, were taken by the river fishermen, the largest fisheries being in the Edisto River and in the tributaries of Winyah Bay.

THE FISHERIES OF GEORGIA.

The sea fisheries of Georgia are as yet almost wholly undeveloped, and the State comes, next to Eastern Florida, lowest on the list of the Atlantic-bordering States. Immense numbers of edible fishes of various kinds gather in the numerous sounds and bays along the outer shore, but comparatively few are taken, and the people are largely dependent upon the fishermen of Western Florida for their supply. In 1880 the value of all sea products, exclusive of oysters, was only $19,225. The oysters taken were valued at $35,000, making a total value of the sea products $54,225. The river fisheries are more fully developed, and the Savannah, Ogeechee, and Altamaha yield considerable quantities of fresh-water and anadromous species. The principal fish taken are shad and sturgeon. Of the former: 252,000 pounds, and of the latter 354,000 pounds, were caught in 1880.

THE FISHERIES OF EASTERN FLORIDA.

The fisheries of Eastern Florida are so different from those of the Gulf coast that it has been thought desirable to treat the two regions separately. In the statistical tables given the figures refer only to the fisheries of the sounds and rivers tributary to the Atlantic. If the entire State be considered, Florida takes the fifteenth place on the list of fish-producing States, having, in 1880, 2,480 fishermen, with products valued at $636,378. Her principal fisheries are at Key West, where a fleet of 21 vessels is employed in the capture of groupers and red snappers for the Havana market. The sponge fisheries of the United States are confined exclusively to the west coast of Florida, where, according to Mr. Silas Stearns, special agent in charge of the fisheries of the Gulf States, 100 sail of vessels are engaged in the business, the value of the sponges taken in 1880 amounting to $200,750. The mullet fisheries also are of peculiar importance, the catch of the Gulf coast, according to Mr. Stearns, being four times that of Eastern Florida. The catch for the entire State in 1880 reached 3,494,333 pounds, valued at $123,508, this quantity representing nearly half of the mullet taken in the United States. Along the Atlantic coast the fishing is chiefly with hook and-line or cast-nets for local supply, the only commercial fishery of importance being in the Indian River, where 88,250 pounds of green turtle, valued at $6,000, were taken, of which the greater part was shipped to Northern markets. The shad fisheries of the Saint John's, though of recent origin, are quite extensive, 251,700 pounds, worth $20,136, being taken in 1880.

Of the 297,539,167 pounds of fishery products taken in the Southern Atlantic States, fully two-fifths, 124,231,240 pounds, are oyster meats, an allowance of 7 pounds being made for each bushel of shell oysters. Of the remainder, 92,194,800 pounds are menhaden, 32,184,372 pounds are alewives (commonly called herring), and 10,878,940 pounds are shad. These are the only species that are taken in quantities exceeding 5,000,000 pounds. Five other species, namely, the mullet, crab, bluefish, perch, and striped bass, are taken in quantities exceeding 2,000,000 pounds, while the catch in nine others ranges between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000.

¹ This is owing to the fact that most of the shad are marketed before the fishing in the more northern waters becomes extensive.—M. McDONALD.

PACIFIC COAST FISHERIES.

The fisheries of this coast are yearly receiving more attention and increasing in commercial value. At present they are chiefly confined to the salmon catch of California and Oregon, the seal fishery of Alaska, with considerable and increasing attention to the cod and halibut fishery. The total value of the products in 1880 amounted to $7,202,730; this included seals, oils, and other sea products. By the canning of 43,379,542 pounds of salmon, the value was increased $2,345,547, making the total commercial value of the fishing products $9,548,277; pounds of fish products, 181,548,920. Of the 16,745 persons employed, 7,910 were Eskimos, Aleuts, and Indians, and about 4,000 Chinese.

FISHERIES OF THE GREAT LAKES.

These fisheries are of much importance and value, abounding in a great variety of food-fish, the total catch of 1880 amounting to 68,742,000 pounds—whitefish leading with 21,463,000 pounds, over half of which came from Lake Michigan; herring came next, with 15,356,300 pounds, three-fourths of which were from Lake Erie; sturgeon, 7,012,100 pounds; trout, 6,804,600 pounds; numerous other varieties of less amount from all of the great lakes, making the grand total above given.

NINTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOSTON FISH BUREAU, JANUARY, 1884.

REPORT.

OFFICE OF BOSTON FISH BUREAU,
Boston, January, 1884.

Our last annual report mentioned the year 1882 as having been a successful and prosperous one to those engaged in the fishing business as producers or dealers. With the opening of the present year a good demand and satisfactory prices continued until the large catch of the previous year was exhausted, leaving the market in a good condition for the anticipated catch. With considerable addition of new vessels and better equipped fleet, and in a better financial condition than for several years, a prosperous season, with a large catch, was predicted.

Our report of large stocks and catches on page 15 will show that the expectations have, in a measure, been realized.

The catch of codfish by the Grand Bank fleet was the largest for years, the fleet returning with full fares, without loss of life, and only slight damage by storms.

The mackerel catch, in quantity or quality, has been only fairly satisfactory. A much reduced catch has met with an active demand, at prices higher than for the two previous years, which has largely compensated those engaged for the decrease in the catch; and many large stocks have been made, a few of which we have recorded.

The year closes with a sad record of losses of life and property. Numerous and severe gales on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, Georges Banks, Massachusetts Bay, also on the Western lakes and in the Chesapeake Bay, have all added to the long list of disasters and loss of life to the fishing fleets of the United States. In the severe gale from August 26 to the 30th on the Grand Banks a number of vessels, with 75 men were lost from the French fleet and vessels of the Provinces. The New England fleet escaped with small losses. October 30, a severe storm in Massachusetts Bay caused the loss of 8 men, and in property of 30 seines, numerous seine boats and dories, with other damage amounting to $55,000, all belonging to the mackerel fleet. The storm in November proved the most disastrous, and were mostly confined to the George Bank fleet from Gloucester, the total losses for the year being as follows:

The losses of life include 54 from dories, most of which were lost in the fog, many of them no doubt dying from starvation, when, with the expense of a few dollars for providing each dory with water and sealed cans of food, many lives and untold suffering might have been prevented. The Cape Ann Advertiser of July 13, in regard to the subject, says: "These kind of losses are becoming as familiar as a twice-told tale, and attract far too little attention. Forty-two men, in all, went astray in a fog in May and June, a dozen of whom are known to have been lost, and most of the others suffering all the pangs of death for many hours. Is it not time that some better scheme was devised for communication between the men at the trawls and their vessel and for supplying the necessities of the men while lost in the fogs?" As in the case of passenger vessels, a little legislation may be beneficial and save many lives. The large loss of life and property that is almost sure to follow winter fishing on Georges Banks also calls up the question, Should it not be discontinued during the inclement season of the year?

The number of vessels from each port will be found on pages 17 and 19. These represent vessels only engaged in the salt-fish trade. Boston and several other ports having large fleets engaged in supplying the country with fresh fish—of them we have no statistics, either men, vessels, or catch. During the past year Massachusetts has added 37 sail to the mackerel fishery, 25 to the cod fishery; Maine, 14 to the former and 8 to the latter; total, 87 new vessels to the New England fleets.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

For the first time in our reports this State does not appear. Her single port, that for so many years was largely interested in the fisheries, is now only represented in the fresh-fish trade, in which quite a business is carried on.

THE FISHING INDUSTRY.

Of late years not only this country but most foreign countries are paying increased attention to this industry. This will be noticed through the press and numerous publications, as well as the numerous exhibitions or fish fairs. The Dutch appear to have started the movement of fish fairs by holding one at Amsterdam in 1861. This was followed by others, as follows: Bergen, Norway, 1865; Arcachon and Boulogne, France, 1866; Hague, 1867; Gothenburg, 1867; Havre, 1868; Naples, 1871; London, 1878; Berlin, 1880; Norwich, England, 1881; London, 1883. These fairs have no doubt been of much value to the industry. The United States has been able to represent at the Berlin and late fair at London, through the management of the United States Fish Commission, receiving a large share of the honors, a large number of which came to exhibitors from this city; our dealers also receiving numerous prizes at Aalborg, Denmark, the past season. We trust the day is not far remote when we shall have a world's fish fair in this country, and Boston is the place for it.

CENSUS FISHING REPORT.

In our report of last year we gave nearly a full report from advance bulletins. As it was not complete, we reproduce a complete report of the fishing industry of the United States in 1880. The report was taken under direction of the United States Fish Commission, and is by far the most complete and reliable report of the fisheries ever made by the Government.

Mackerel.—Of the various branches of the fisheries this always receives the most attention. Our chart will be found of interest, as showing at a glance the great fluctuations in the catch and quality. The very small amount shown at the commencement is of historic interest when we recall those years as being unsafe to fish off our shores during a foreign war. The Massachusetts catch the past season amounted to 168,811 barrels against 258,382 barrels in 1882, a large decrease of 89,571 barrels. The southern fleet, numbering 129 sail, as usual of late years, started early, sailing March 12, landing the first catch in New York March 31. The early catch was followed with fair success; mostly being lauded fresh accounts for the small amount of cured fish reported as taken south. The fish were found to be abundant and of mixed sizes. As the season advanced the fleet worked off the New England shores, fewer fish constantly being seen. The fishermen, being of the opinion that a large body of mackerel were off this coast but did not show themselves, were not willing to leave the favored grounds of the past few years. About 50 sail went to North Bay in July, returning with poor reports and few fish. Later in the season, the catch not improving and more favorable reports having been received from North Bay, quite a fleet once more went there, returning with fine fares of fish of a fair quality and size. The total number of United States vessels fishing in North Bay during the season was 63, with a catch of 28,666 barrels. The catch off the New England shores amounted to 185,019 barrels; the southern catch, 13,000; total catch of salted mackerel by the New England fleet 226,685; a decrease of 152,178 barrels from that of the previous year. The schooner Edward E. Webster, Capt. Solomon Jacobs, as for several years, is once more "high line," with the following fine record: Sailed from Gloucester March 15; hauled up November 20; during which time, with a crew of 17 men, caught 2,160 barrels of mackerel that were salted, and 400,000 mackerel were sold fresh, realizing gross $27,440, or net $25,700, the crew sharing $709.75 each. During the season three trips were made to North Bay and 1,100 barrels of the catch taken there. Captain Jacobs adds to his report: "It is my opinion the body of large mackerel will be in North Bay in 1884 and the small fish off this shore." The catch of the Prince Edward Island fishermen is estimated as 10 per cent. over that of the previous year, with a slight improvement in quality. The Nova Scotia catch also shows an increase. Of the provincial catch, 75,226 barrels came to this market, against 37,616 in 1882.

Ground fish, in which we include cod, hake, haddock, cusk, and pollock, show a large gain over that of 1882, which also showed a gain of 123,877 quintals over that of 1881, the increase being largely of codfish from the Grand Banks. The catch of all kinds of ground fish off the New England shore has been light most of the season. The Grand Bank fleet returned from short voyages with full fares, some of them the largest ever known. A general depression in trade, lower prices of provisions, the revolution in Hayti, restricting the large foreign demand from that island, with a largely increased catch, have all had a tendency to depress the market, which shows the large decline from $5.50 to $6 of one year ago to $3.50 and $4 a quintal at the present time. The total catch of cured fish by the New England fleets amounted to 903,283 quintals of codfish and 156,215 quintals of hake and other cheap grades, against 663,564 of cod and 235,340 of low grades in 1882. The total catch this season is 1,659,498 quintals; gain over 1882, 160,594 quintals.

Pickled herring.—The domestic receipts show a falling off from last year, the shore-catch having been less than the average. This market has at nearly all times been well supplied from the catch of the Provinces, and the receipts have been the largest of which we have any record. Not for many years, if ever, has the market been as well supplied with Labrador herring as at the present. While the size is not as large as the Northeast shore herring, the quality is much superior. The present price is only about half that of the past few years. This fact is of importance to dealers and consumers, especially when the decreased catch and very small amount of mackerel is taken into consideration.

Box herring show a large decrease in receipts, and prices have been much higher than in 1882; a reduced catch and increased amount packed as American sardines account for the short supply during a large part of the year. The fall and winter catch has been fully an average one. Prices are again very low and the supply ample.

Alwives.—Receipts vary but little from 1882. A slight gain in both domestic and foreign.

Salmon.—During most of the year the supply was moderate and prices ruled high. This season's catch has been larger and prices are again lower.

Canned fish.—The canning of fish to an extensive amount dates back only a few years, yet, contrary to general expectation, the demand steadily increases, the amount packed in New England the past year having only been limited by the catch. Owing to the small and poor quality of the mackerel, factories have been obliged to shut down or pack other than fish products much of the time. Canned goods from the Boston factories received many honors at the recent exhibit at London, and, through that, numerous orders from Australia and other remote countries. The American-packed sardines grow in favor yearly, judging from the amount packed. The 18 factories at Eastport, Me., packed the past season 200,000 cases of 100 boxes each, two-thirds of them being packed in oil, one-third in mustard and spices. Three thousand barrels of Russian sardines were also packed. These factories alone gave employment to 1,200 men and women and 800 boys and girls, and some 500 fishermen to supply them with fish.

Other varieties of fish products are without special notice, the market having been able to fill orders for all salt-water products, dry, pickled, smoked, canned, or fresh, at nearly all times during the past year; also supplying the producers with salt, cooperage, hooks, lines, nets, oil-clothing, and all necessary outfit. Of fishing-nets, everything needed, from those large and strong enough for porpoises and sharks to the fine linen thread used in the shad fisheries, are manufactured in this city, supplying all parts of the country.

The near termination of the Washington ten-year fishing treaty with Great Britain is of importance, expiring July 1, 1885. The coming year practically closes any benefits either country may receive through it. The table on page 25 will be found of interest as showing the amount of fish yearly imported the past ten years. We trust some mutually satisfactory arrangement to all interested may be provided ere the termination of the treaty, that the harmonious relations of the past ten years may not be ¹ The tonnage for 1865 and 1866 is partly by new measurement and partly by old.

NOTE.—The mackerel licenses have not been issued separately since 1867, when a general fishing license was provided to replace cod and mackerel fisheries.

The following table has been prepared from the annual report of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, and are based on the custom-house returns.

Attention may be called to the importation duty free of 109,737,420 pounds of fresh fish, valued at $3,242,566. Nearly all of this came from Canada under the treaty of Washington.

The exports have constantly increased in quantity and value, due, doubtless, in some degree to the successful participation of the United States in the International Fishery Exhibitions held in Europe.

TENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOSTON FISH BUREAU, JANUARY, 1885.

REPORT.

OFFICE OF BOSTON FISH BUREAU,

Boston, January 1, 1885.

The year which has just closed has proved one of general depression in all lines of trade; and when to this is added an unprecedented yield in all food products, a low range of values has been the rule. Fish and the fish trade has proved no exception. While to the producers or fishermen and those interested with them this has been productive of greater or less losses, still the distributors or dealers may be said to have enjoyed a fairly successful season. Working generally on low values the quantities moved have been large, and business in this line has been done with a fair share of profit. Low prices have encouraged consumption, which has taken off stocks as they have been placed on the markets, and with but few exceptions stocks are well reduced and fairly in hand for the coming season.

Beginning with large and successful southern herring fisheries, we have had it followed by the most successful mackerel and codfish fisheries, as regards yield or product that have ever been recorded. While the foregoing is true as pertains to the work of our New England fishermen, and in some lines to those of Nova Scotia, the Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, and Labrador fisheries may be considered as partial failures.

In some lines the yield has been far below an average, but in the general heavy catch or production these shortages have been more than made up.

Mackerel.—The fleet engaged in this pursuit fitted and started at the usual time, and for a time the early catch was a fairly paying one.

The quality of the early caught fish was but ordinary and the size medium and small; the general run of the mackerel taken by our New England fleet was small, not more than one-quarter, at any time, being of good size; when in connection with this is taken the fact of one of the largest catches of mackerel ever known, it is not to be wondered at that prices should soon reach a point at which the fishermen were unable to find any profit in the business for themselves or those interested with them. This run of small fish appears to have extended along the Nova Scotia shores, the only points yielding large and fat fish being Prince Edward Island and Bay fisheries. Notwithstanding the enormous yield of the fishery, prices have been well maintained and stocks are well reduced.

First sales of uninspected salt mackerel were at $10 for large and $4 for small per barrel, selling in June at $2.50, $5, and $6.50 without barrel for small, medium, and large; July, $3.50 to $4 for mediums without barrel, and $7 to $7.50 for large; August, $3.75 to $5 cargo sales; September, $3 to $4 cargo sales; October, $3 to $4 cargo sales; November, 3's $3.25, 2's $7.12½ to $8, 1's $15 to $16 in fares; December, 3's $3.50 to $3.75, 2's $3.50, 1's $15 in fares. The catch on the Nova Scotia shores and Prince Edward Island has been much smaller than that of last year; first receipts from the island were on August 2, fish of good size, selling at $11. The general run of the fish from the island has been fair in size and they have ruled from $8 to $12 for un-culled; $8 to $11.50 for No. 3's; $10 to 14 for No. 2's; and $13 to $17 for No. 1's during the season. No stock has been carried over.

Nova Scotia mackerel have been more like those taken by our own fishermen, as regards size and condition; but few fat mackerel from this source; large 3's have ruled from $6.50 to $8.50 during the season.

Codfish.—In this article we have to note a large yield, and consequently low prices have been the rule for the season. With a yield of 1,001,303 quintals of codfish alone, it might reasonably be expected that prices should seek a level with those of other food products in which the yield has been large.

At the beginning of the year prices ranged at $3.50 for large dry Bank and $3 for medium; $3.25 for large pickle-cured and $2.50 for medium per quintal, but at the close the same grades of fish were selling at $2.50 for large dry and $2 for medium; $2 for large pickle-cured and $2 for medium per quintal, which is below the cost of production. While the yield of codfish has been so heavy, that of hake has been much below an average, and but for the low prices ruling for codfish, their value would be much enhanced; they have been ruling during the season at $1.75 to $2.50 per quintal.

With a small catch of hake, that of pollock has increased; these fish have ranged from $2 to $3 for slack salted, $1.25 to $1.87½ for heavy salted per quintal.

Owing to the low prices ruling, the consumption of dry fish has been largely increased.

Herring.—The early southern fisheries were fairly successful, which to a certain extent has curtailed the outlet for many of the cheaper grades of pickled herrings from this way. The catch on our shores has been comparatively a light one. Receipts of Georges Bay and Dalhousie have been about the average, while that of the large Nova Scotia shore splits has run short; the catch of Labradors has been almost a total failure, but 2,000 barrels received this year, as against upwards of 25,000 barrels a year since.

Salmon and trout.—The catch of these articles has been fully up to the average, prices have sympathized with other lines and have ruled low, showing some little improvement at the close and but little stock is being carried over. Price on salmon has ruled from $10 to $13 for Northern and $11 to $12 for California mess; $9.50 to $13 for trout.

Box herring.—The receipts in this line, 793,244 boxes, have been way above the average for our market. Prices have ruled low and stock has been kept well reduced.

Bloaters.—Supplies have been large, generally of good quality, ranging from 35 cents to $1.25 per box.

Haddies.—This article of food appears to be steadily growing in favor with consumers, and the supply has been taken up readily as placed on the market, ranging from 4½ to 6 cents per pound.

Canned fish.—In this connection may be taken such goods as American sardines, an article rapidly taking its place along with mackerel, salmon, &c., as a staple with the trade.

Sardines.—Owing to the general low range of prices, this article has suffered also and prices have been reduced to a point that has rendered it unprofitable for the packers, still the pack has reached upwards of 175,000 cases, mostly 1-4 oils. Price has ranged from $4.62 to $5.75 per case.

Canned mackerel.—In connection with this article, it is to be regretted that the packing, in past seasons, of poor goods, should have tended to curtail the demand for Canned lobsters.—The supply of this article has been light and prices have ranged from $1.40 per dozen at the opening to $1.85 at the close of the season.

The Washington ten-year treaty.—The Washington ten-year fishing treaty expires on July 1, 1885. We hope that some arrangement will be made by Congress if possible which will be agreeable to all parties interested and affected. The duty on imported fish products from July 1, at least until some action is taken upon same, will be as follows: mackerel 1 cent a pound; herring, pickled or salted, one-half cent per pound; salmon pickled, 1 cent per pound; other fish pickled in barrels, 1 cent per pound. Foreign caught fish imported, not in barrels or half barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried, salted or pickled, not especially enumerated or provided for in this act, 50 cents per 100 pounds. Anchovies and sardines packed in oil or otherwise in tin boxes, measuring not more than 5 inches long, 4 inches wide, and $3\frac{1}{4}$ inches deep, 10 cents per whole box; in half boxes, measuring not more than 5 inches long, 4 inches wide, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ deep, 5 cents each; in quarter boxes measuring not more than $4\frac{1}{4}$ inches long, $3\frac{1}{4}$ inches wide, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ deep, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents each; when imported in any other form, 40 per cent. ad valorem. Fish preserved in oil, except anchovies and sardines, 30 per centum ad valorem. Salmon and all other fish prepared or preserved, and prepared meats of all kinds not especially enumerated or provided for in this act, 25 per centum ad valorem. Oils, cod-liver, crude or refined seal, whale and fish oils, not elsewhere specified, 25 per cent.

It is easy for us at the close of the year to look back and see where we have made our mistakes, and miscalculated the contingencies of trade; at the same time it is well for us to study what we have been through and to lay out for the future line of action that which will enable us to avoid the mistakes of the past, and to build for the future, for ourselves and our city, a business which shall be enduring and profitable.

We can still point with pride to the fact that Boston still holds her proper place in the van, as a distributor of the enormous yield of our fisheries.

In closing our report we hereby return thanks to our many correspondents and friends for the assistance which they have so freely given us in the past and which we trust, we shall continue to receive in the future. We return the result of the year's business with our best wishes.

¹ Whole or part of catch landed at other ports.

Amount credited to each port is the amount packed there, regardless of catch of vessels hailing from there, which in many instances packed at other ports.

We find from a careful observation of facts that the shrinkage in packing amounts to about twenty pounds to the barrel, or 10 per cent. Inspectors and captains agree with us that this is fully enough to allow.

ELEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOSTON FISH BUREAU, JANUARY, 1886.
REPORT.

OFFICE OF BOSTON FISH BUREAU,
Boston, January 1, 1886.

In reviewing the fish trade for the past twelve months, it is with a feeling of satisfaction and pride that we are able to point to the fact that, in face of a large decrease in the catches of fish by the fleets, the receipts at Boston have held their own, proving beyond question that as a market for the different varieties of fish and as a distributing point its facilities are unequalled.

Low prices have been the rule in most lines during the year, bringing fish on a par with most food products.

The early Potomac herring fishery was fairly successful, but not as large as that of the year previous. The catches of mackerel and codfish have been fully up to the average, but when compared with the large catches of the year previous considerable shortage is noticed.

The falling off in the codfish catch we attribute, in a great measure, to the withdrawal of several large bank vessels from the codfishing business, on account of the poor encouragement offered by the low prices at the beginning of the season, and not on account of the scarcity of these fish, vessels arriving from Grand and Quebean Banks with fares averaging larger than those which arrived from there during the previous season. While this is true in regard to the catch of codfish, the shortage in the catch of mackerel is attributable to the fact that they were not as abundant in our waters as during the season of 1884. While the catch of mackerel on our New England shore has not been as large in 1885 as in the previous year, the catch in North Bay, or Bay St. Lawrence, has been larger, showing the mackerel were more abundant there the past year than in 1884.

During the past season there have been 44 vessels from New England ports engaged in the North Bay mackerel fishery, as against 108 during the season of 1884, the number of barrels of bay mackerel inspected during the past season being 27,672, as against 19,637 for the season of 1884. The catch of mackerel by the provincial fleet, on the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island shores, has been below an average in quantity, and this, in connection with the duty, accounts for the large shortage noticeable in the receipts of foreign mackerel, which shortage has been mainly on the poorer and smaller grades of fish, which could not well afford to pay the heavy duties exacted, and which have been used for the West India markets, in place of sending them to the States. All fat mackerel have been wanted and readily taken by the trade. According to the most reliable authorities, the catch of cod at Newfoundland has been up to the average in quantity. The receipts of codfish from Newfoundland, however, are not much of a factor in the fish trade of Boston, the most of their business being with Spain, Portugal, and Brazil, to which countries they send yearly enormous quantities of codfish.

The Labrador herring fishery has been an exceptionally good one, large quantities of herring of good size and excellent quality having been taken. About 15,000 barrels of them reached this market, and sold from $3.75 to $4.75 per barrel.

Mackerel.—The fleet made its usual early start for the southern fishery, the fishery, the first vessel to start being the schooner Mollie Adams, of Gloucester, on March 4. This is the earliest departure for the southern mackerel fishery on record. The first fare of fresh mackerel for the season (125 barrels) was taken in by the schooner Emma Brown, of Gloucester, at New York, on the afternoon of March 28, she being followed, a few minutes later, by the schooner Nellie N. Rowe, of Gloucester, with about the same amount of fish. Great rivalry exists among the fishermen as to who shall land the first fare of mackerel. The Rowe was successful in 1883 and 1884, landing the first fare at New York on March 31, 1883, and March 24, 1884.

During the subsequent mackerel fishing in southern waters enormous quantities of very small and inferior fish were taken into New York and Philadelphia, large quantities of which were sold for merely nothing, and many fares were taken to sea again and thrown overboard, resulting in a general loss to the fleet, although a lucky few did fairly well. We hope to see the bill prohibiting the importation or catching of mackerel between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of June become a law. This would put a stop to the catching of large quantities of very small mackerel, and would unquestionably be a benefit to all parties interested, whether dealers, fishermen, or consumers. The general run of the mackerel taken this season by our shore fleet has been better in size and quality than that of the year previous, there being but little difference between 2's and 3's, making dealers ready buyers of 3's as placed on the market. Prices have hardly ruled even with those for the year 1884, especially when quality and cull are considered. The first sale of new salt mackerel for the season was at New York, on April 6, at $3 per barrel, from pickle, with barrel; selling in cargo lots at Boston, in May, at from $2 to $2.75, from pickle, with barrel; in June, at from $2.75 to $3.75, from pickle, with barrel; in July, at from $3 to $4.25, from pickle, with barrel, for shores, and $9.75 to $13, from pickle, with barrel, for Block Islands; in August at $2.50 to $3 for 1's, $5 to $5.50 for 2's, and $10 to $12 for 1's, packed from vessel, for Massachusetts Bays; in September, at $5.50 to $6.25, from pickle, with barrel, and $3.25 to $4 for 3's, $6 to $6.50 for 2's, and $13 to $14 for 1's, packed from vessel, for Massachusetts Bays and Eastern Shores; in October, at from $6.25 to $7.50, from pickle, with barrel, for Massachusetts Bays and Eastern Shores, and in November, at $6 to $6.50, from pickle, with barrel, for Eastern Shores. Nova Scotia mackerel have sold from $6 to $8 per barrel; Prince Edward Island mackerel from $6 to $15 per barrel. The first receipts from the island were on July 13.

Large bodies of mackerel were on the Labrador coast during the past season, and there is no doubt that, if fishermen had been prepared and knew how to handle them, there would have been some fish from that section; some fine few lots received that were well handled proved of fine quality, and sold for $17.50 per barrel; they were of large size, and fat.

Herrings.—As has been stated, the Potomac herring fishery was a good one as far as the taking of herrings went; prices ruled low. Owing to the fact that the cheaper grades of herring, such as Dalhousie and George's Bay, of which in previous years we have received large quantities, would be almost entirely excluded by the duty of $1 per barrel, a great many more vessels were fitted out for Shore herring fishery than usual, hoping to make up as much as possible the difference caused by the imposition of the duty. We estimate the last season's catch at from 25,000 to 30,000 barrels, which is an unusually large catch. They sold during the season at from $2 to $2.50 per barrel in cargo lots according to contract. The frozen-herring industry, which is yet in its infancy, is developing rapidly. The principal fishing grounds are at Eastport, Grand Manan, New Brunswick, and Fortune Bay, Newfoundland. The receipts at Boston during the year 1885 were about 30,000 barrels, or 15,000,000 fish. These fish are used very extensively by the Georges Bank cod and haddock fishermen as bait during the winter season; large quantities are also used for food purposes, being shipped in a frozen state nearly all over the United States. The first vessel to arrive here with a cargo of them for the season of 1884-'85, being the Anna and Lilla, of Portland, from Eastport, with 150,000 fish, on December 18, 1884; the same vessel also brought the first cargo for the season of 1885-'86, 200,000 fish on December 17, 1885, from Eastport. They have been selling during the season at from 25 cents to $1.50 per hundred. The George's Bay and Nova Scotia splits have been almost an entire failure. Dalhousie herrings have not been saved this season, as the fishermen could not pay the duty exacted; none have been received in the States the past year.

Labrador herrings have been in good supply, and, as has been stated before, have sold from $3.75 to $4.75 per barrel; which seem like fair prices; still results to the fishermen have been poor.

Codfish.—The catch shows a falling off of some 10 per cent., and prices for the season have hardly ruled with those of 1884. The range of prices has been $2.75 to $3.75 per quintal for large dry fish, $2.50 to $3 per quintal for mediums, $2.50 to $3.50 for large picked fish, and $2.50 to $3 for mediums. Catches of pollock and cusk have been light, while the catch of hake has been somewhat larger than for the previous season, yet it has not been large enough to be called an average catch. The shortages in these varieties have not been missed by the trade, owing to the large supplies of low-priced codfish.

Salmon and trout.—The catches of these articles have been fully up to the usual average, and prices have been advanced just about the duties over those of 1884, salmon ranging from $10 to $15 for Northern, $8 to $13 for California; trout, $8 to $19 per barrel.

Box herrings.—The receipts in this line show some little falling off, mainly from the provinces; prices have ruled lower than for 1884.

Bloaters.—Bloaters have been in good supply; demand fair, and prices have ruled from 40 to 90 cents per box. While our receipts give small amount as coming from foreign ports, more than one-half of entire receipts are from New Brunswick, entered and duty paid at Eastport; same is also true of box herrings; over one-half of receipts from home ports are from New Brunswick.

Canned fish.—The popularity of these goods is steadily increasing with the consumers.

Canned mackerel.—As was to be expected, with care on the part of the packers, looking to the using of only good stock in its preparation, the season just closed has proved that the packers have not secured all the stock required by the trade; prices have ranged from 75 cents to $1 per dozen, and stocks have gone out quite clean.

Canned lobsters.—There has been a fair pack of this article; the opening price was $1.60 per dozen, but it has hardly been maintained, and sales at the close of the year were at $1.50 per dozen.

Sardines.—While the catch of fish suited to the packing of these goods has been a light one during the past season, prices have been well maintained and have no doubt left fair margins of profit to the packers; the outlet for these goods is steadily increasing.

Fresh fish.—Although we have never attempted to tabulate the statistics of the enormous quantities of fresh fish handled at Boston, we have during the past year taken account of the receipts of fresh mackerel, which amount to 43,843 barrels, received from the fleet direct, and from the Cape Cod weirs; there were 6,848 barrels forwarded by rail and boat from New York, and 2,964 barrels imported from the vicinity of Yarmouth and Barrington, N. S. There are now about thirty-five vessels hailing from Boston which are engaged in the fresh cod, haddock and halibut fisheries; these thirty-five, however, form but a very small proportion of the whole number of vessels actively engaged in supplying Boston market with fresh fish, a great many vessels from Gloucester and other ports landing fish here as well. The amount of fresh cod, haddock, and halibut landed at T Wharf alone during the year 1885 being 25,510,000 pounds, according to official figures given our agent. There are no reliable statistics which can be given of the large quantities of bluefish, salmon, smelts, &c., with which our market is supplied during their respective seasons.

We tender the result of the year's business with our best wishes, and return to our many correspondents and friends our sincere thanks for the assistance which has been so readily given us in the past, and of which we would ask a continuance.

F. F. BURGESS, Secretary.

No. 1.

*Mr. Bayard to Sir L. West.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 11, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your note of the 7th instant, with which you communicate, by the direction of the Earl of Iddesleigh, a copy of the report of a committee of the privy council of Canada, approved October 26 last, wherein the regret of the Canadian Government is expressed for the action of Captain Quigley, of the Canadian Government cruiser Terror, in lowering the flag of the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes whilst under detention by the customs authorities, in the harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, on October 11 last.

Before receiving this communication I had instructed the United States minister at London to make representation of this regrettable occurrence to Her Majesty's minister for foreign affairs, and desire now to express my satisfaction at the voluntary action of the Canadian authorities, which, it seems, was taken in October last, but of which I had no intimation until your note of the 7th instant was received.

I have, &c.,

T. F. BAYARD.

SIR: With reference to your note of the 11th ultimo, I have the honor to inform you that I am requested by the Earl of Iddesleigh to acquaint you that Her Majesty's Government have desired the Canadian Government to furnish them with a report on the circumstances attending the alleged inhospitable treatment of United States fishing schooners Laura Sayward and Jennie Seavers by the Canadian authorities.

I have, &c.,

SIR: With reference to your letters of the 19th and 20th October, I have the honor to transmit to you herewith reports from the Government of Canada relative to the cases of the United States fishing vessels Pearl Nelson and Everett Steele, which I have been instructed by the Earl of Iddesleigh to communicate to the United States Government.

I have, &c.,

The Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Stanhope.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA, November 29, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council of Canada, furnishing the report asked for in your telegraphic message of the 6th November, with reference to the detention of the American schooner Everett Steele, at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, for an infraction of the customs regulations of the Dominion.

I have, &c.,

LANSDOWNE.

[Inclosure No. 2 in note of January 6.]

Report of a committee of the honorable the privy council for Canada, approved by his excellency the governor-general, in council on the 18th November, 1886.

The committee of the privy council are in receipt of a telegram from the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies, in the words:

"United States Government protest against proceedings of Canadian authorities in the case of 'Pearl Nelson' and 'Everett Steele,' said to have put into Arichat and Shelburne, respectively, for purposes sanctioned by convention. Particulars by post. Send report soon as possible."

The minister of marine and fisheries, to whom the telegram was referred, submits that the schooner Everett Steele appears from the report of the collector of customs at Shelburne to have been at that port on the 25th March last, and sailed without reporting. On her return to Shelburne in September she was detained by the collector of customs for an infraction of the customs law.

The captain having assured the collector that he had been misled by the deputy harbor-master, who informed him his vessel could remain in port for twenty-four hours without entering, and that he had no intention of violating the customs regulations, this statement was reported to the minister of customs at Ottawa, when the vessel was at once allowed to proceed to sea, and that no evidence is given of any desire or intention of denying to the captain of the Everett Steele any treaty privileges he was entitled to enjoy.

The committee, concurring in the above, respectfully recommend that your excellency be moved to transmit a copy of this minute, if approved, to the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies.

All of which is respectfully submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk Privy Council.

[Inclosure No. 3 in note of January 6.]

The Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Stanhope.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA, November 29, 1886.

SIR: With reference to your telegraphic message of the 6th instant, asking to be furnished with a report in the case of the "Pearl Nelson" and "Everett Steele," I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council of Canada, embodying a report of my minister of marine and fisheries, to which is appended a copy of the correspondence which has passed between the commissioner of customs for Canada and the United States consul-general at Halifax relating to the case of the American schooner "Pearl Nelson."

I have, &c.,

LANSDOWNE.

[Inclosure No. 4 in note of January 6.]

Report of a committee of the honorable the privy council for Canada, approved by his excellency the governor-general in council, on the 18th November, 1886.

The committee of the privy council are in receipt of a telegram from the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies, in the words:

"United States Government protest against proceedings of Canadian authorities in case of 'Pearl Nelson' and 'Everett Steele,' said to have put into Arichat and Shelburne, respectively, for purposes sanctioned by convention. Particulars by post. Send report soon as possible."

The minister of marine and fisheries, to whom the telegram was referred, submits a copy of a letter addressed by the commissioner of customs for Canada to the consul-general of the United States at Halifax, and also a copy of Mr. Phelan's reply thereto.

The minister submits that it is clear, from Captain Kempt's affidavit, that he was guilty of an infraction of the customs regulations in allowing men to land from his vessel before she had been reported, and the minister of customs having favorably considered Captain Kempt's representations as to his ignorance of the customs regulations requiring that vessels should be reported before landing either men or cargo therefrom has remitted the fine of $200 which had been imposed in the case of the American schooner "Pearl Nelson."

The minister further submits that it would appear from the collector of customs' report that his remark that "he would seize the vessel" had reference solely to her violation of the customs law, and that no evidence is given of any desire or intention of denying to the captain of the "Pearl Nelson" any treaty privileges he was entitled to enjoy.

The committee, concurring in the above, respectfully recommend that your excellency be moved to transmit a copy of this minute, if approved, to the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies.

All which is respectfully submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk Privy Council, Canada.

Mr. Parmelee to Mr. Phelan.

OTTAWA, October 22, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, re seizure of the American schooner "Pearl Nelson" for an infraction of the customs laws, &c.

The commissioner of customs' report in connection with this matter, which has been approved by the minister of customs, reads as follows:

"The undersigned, having examined this case, has come to the conclusion that the captain of the vessel did violate the provisions of sections 25 and 180 of 'the customs act, 1883,' by landing a number of his crew before going to the custom-house to report; that his plea of having come into port solely from stress of weather is inconsistent with the circumstances, and is denied by the collector of customs, who reports that 'the night was one of the finest and most moderate experienced there this summer, and that 'his crew were landed only in the morning.' That even if the 'stress of weather' plea was sustained by facts it would not exempt him from the legal requirement of reporting his vessel before 'breaking bulk' or landing his crew, and it is evident that there was nothing to hinder his reporting, as the crew appear to have had no difficulty in handling the vessel's boats; that it was very easy for the crew or any of them to have taken valuable contraband goods ashore on their persons in the absence of any customs officer at the landing-place. Inasmuch, however, as there is no charge of actual smuggling preferred against the vessel, the undersigned respectfully recommends that the deposit of $200 be refunded, deducting therefrom any expenses incurred.

"J. JOHNSON."

I trust the above may be considered a satisfactory answer to your letter referred to. I have, &c.,

W. G. PARMELEE,
Assistant Commissioner.

HALIFAX, November 2, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 24th ultimo, concerning the action of the customs department of Canada in the case of the American schooner "Pearl Nelson," and to say I was much pleased at the decision arrived at in that case. I have informed the Government of the United States that the fine in the case referred to was ordered to be refunded.

I have also to say that the Department of State, in acknowledging the receipt of a dispatch from me setting forth that you had placed all the papers in the cases of the American schooners "Crittenden" and "Holbrook" in my hands for perusal, said "The attention of Mr. Parmelee in referring the matter to you is appreciated. It shows a proper spirit."

I trust the department of customs will pass on the other cases as soon as possible.
I have, &c.

CANADA, GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Ottawa, December 4, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your dispatch of the 12th of October last, transmitting a copy of a letter with its inclosure from the foreign office, requesting to be furnished with a report in the case of the United States fishing vessel "Crittenden," I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council of Canada embodying a report of my minister of marine and fisheries, to which is appended a statement of the customs officer at Steep Creek on the subject.

I have, &c.,

LANDSDOWNE.

[Inclosure No. 2 in note of January 19.]

Certified copy of a report of a committee of the honorable the privy council, approved by his excellency the governor-general in council, on the 16th November, 1886.

The committee of the privy council have had under consideration, a dispatch, dated 12th October, 1886, from the secretary of state for the colonies, transmitting a copy of a letter from Mr. Bayard, United States Secretary of State, to the British minister at Washington, calling attention to an alleged denial of the rights guaranteed by the convention of 1818 in the case of the American fishing schooner "Crittenden" by the customs officer at Steep Creek, in the Straits of Canso, Nova Scotia.

The minister of marine and fisheries, to whom the dispatch and inclosure were referred, submits a statement of the customs officer at Steep Creek, and observes that the captain of the "Crittenden" violated the customs laws by neglecting to enter his vessel, as requested by the customs officer, and in landing and shipping a man clearly exceeded any treaty provision he was entitled to avail himself of.

It would appear that the remark made by the customs officer "that he would seize the vessel" had reference solely to the captain's violation of the customs regulations, and, the minister submits, cannot be construed into a denial of any treaty privileges the master was entitled to enjoy.

The committee, concurring in the above, respectfully recommended that your excellency be moved to inform the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies in the sense of the report of the minister of marine and fisheries.

All which is respectfully submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk Privy Council.

Inclosure No. 3 in note of January 19.]

STEEP CREEK, November 1, 1886.

SIR: Yours of the 28th of October came to hand to-day, and, in reply, can state to you that part of the crew of the schooner "Crittenden" came on shore at Steep Creek and landed their barrels and filled them with water. I went direct to the men who were filling the barrels, and told them to come and enter before taking wood and water. They said they would not enter or make any report. I told them that I would seize the schooner "Crittenden" for violating the customs laws. They said they would risk that, as the schooner was now out of the way about 3 miles from my station down the straits, and it was impossible for me to board the vessel. They also landed a man the same day with his effects, and on their return from Gloucester to the bay St. Lawrence they shipped a man. Was looking out for the vessel, but could not catch her. I reported the case to the collector of customs at Port Hawkesbury, and on the schooner "Crittenden's" return from the Bay St. Lawrence she was seized, and Collector Bonrinot got the affidavits of the captain of the said schooner and also of some of the crew, which he stated to the department. I was in the office at the time when Collector Bonrinot received a telegram from the department to release the schooner "Crittenden" on the deposit of $400.

I remain, &c.,

JAMES H. CARR,
Pro Collector.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 27, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of an affidavit of the captain and two members of the crew of the schooner "Sarah H. Prior," of Boston, stating the refusal of the captain of the Canadian revenue cutter "Critic" to permit the restoration to the former vessel, in the port of Malpeque, Prince Edward's Island of her large seine, which she had lost at sea, and which had been found by the captain of a Canadian vessel, who offered to return the seine to the Prior, but was prevented from doing so by the captain of the "Critic."

This act of prevention, the reason for which is not disclosed, practically disabled the Prior, and she was compelled to return home without having completed her voyage, and in debt.

I have the honor to ask that Her Majesty's Government cause investigation of this case to be made.

I have, &c.,

Mr. Prior to Mr. Bayard.

BOSTON, December 28, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I wrote to Senator W. P. Frye, setting forth in my letter the facts contained in the affidavit inclosed. He wrote me to have it sworn to and to send it to you, which I have done. Will you please let me know what course is best to pursue in regard to it, whether to enter a claim or not? I think it is a clear, strong case, and the claim would be a just one, and will be pleased to receive your advice in the matter.

Yours, very truly,

P. H. PRIOR.

Hon. THOS. F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State.

[Inclosure No. 2 in note of January 27.]

Affidavit of the captain and crew of the schooner "Sarah H. Prior."

On this 28th day of December, A. D. 1886, personally appeared before me Captain Thomas McLaughlin, master, and George F. Little and Charles Finnegan, two of the crew, of the schooner "Sarah H. Prior," of Boston, and being duly sworn, signed and made oath to the following statement of facts:

On September 10, 1886, the schooner "Sarah H. Prior," while running for Malpeque, Prince Edward Island, and about seven miles from that port, lost her large seine. Four days afterwards the schooner "John Ingalls," of Halifax, N. S., Captain Wolfe, came into Malpeque and had the seine on board, which she had picked up at sea. Captain Wolfe offered to deliver the seine to Captain McLaughlin in consideration of twenty-five dollars, which offer the latter accepted and paid him the money. The Canadian revenue cutter "Critie," Captain McLearn, was lying at Malpeque at the time, and Captain McLaughlin went to see him, to ascertain if there would be any trouble in delivering the seine. Captain McLearn would not allow the captain of the "John Ingalls" to give up the seine, so the latter returned the twenty-five dollars to Captain McLaughlin.

The schooner "Sarah H. Prior" had two seines, one large and one small size. It was the large one which she lost and the schooner "John Ingalls" picked up. She had to leave Malpeque without it, and consequently came home with a broken voyage and in debt.

THOS. McLAUGHLIN,
GEORGE F. LITTLE,
CHARLES FINNÉGAN.

SUFFOLK, ss :

BOSTON, December 28, 1886.

Personally appeared before me Thomas McLaughlin, George F. Little, and Charles Finnegan, who signed and made oath that the foregoing statement was true.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA,
November 9, 1886. (Received November 22.)

SIR: With reference to Earl Granville's dispatch of the 24th June last, respecting the fisheries question and inclosing copies of two letters from the foreign office and one from the United States minister in London, addressed to the secretary of state for foreign affairs, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council of Canada concurring in a report of the minister of justice dealing with the points raised by Mr. Phelps in his note of the 2d June last on the subject of the seizure of the United States fishing vessel David J. Adams, near Digby, Nova Scotia.

I have, &c.,

LANSDOWNE.

Certified copy of a report of a committee of the honorable the privy council for Canada, approved by his excellency the administrator of the Government in council on the 2d November, 1886.

The Committee of the privy council have had under consideration a dispatch dated 24th June, 1886, from the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies respecting the fisheries question, and inclosing copies of letters on the subject from the foreign office to the colonial office, and of one from Mr. Phelps to the secretary of state for foreign affairs.

The minister of justice, to whom the dispatch and inclosures were referred, submits a report thereon herewith.

The committee concur in the said report, and advise that your Excellency be moved to transmit a copy thereof, if approved, to the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies.

All of which is submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk Privy Council, Canada.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, OTTAWA,
July 22, 1886.

To his Excellency the Administrator of the Government in Council:

With reference to the dispatch of the 24th June last from the secretary of state for the colonies to your excellency, respecting the fisheries question, and inclosing copies of letters on the subject from the foreign office to the colonial office and of one from Mr. Phelps to the secretary of state for foreign affairs, the undersigned has the honor to report as follows:

The letter of Mr. Phelps seems designed to present to Earl Rosebery the case of the David J. Adams, the fishing vessel seized a short time ago near Digby, in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Phelps intimates that he has received from his Government a copy of the report of the consul-general of the United States at Halifax, giving full details and depositions relating to the seizure, and that that report and the evidence annexed to it, appear fully to sustain the points which he had submitted to Earl Rosebery at an interview which he had had a short time before the date of his letter.

The report of the consul-general and the depositions referred to seem not to have been presented to Earl Rosebery, and their contents can only be inferred from the statements made in Mr. Phelps's letter.

These statements appear to be based on the assertions made by the persons interested in the vessel by way of defense against the complaint under which she was seized, but cannot be regarded as presenting a full or accurate representation of the case. The undersigned submits the facts in regard to this vessel as they are alleged by those on whose testimony the Government of Canada can rely to sustain the seizure and detention.

THE OFFENSE AS TO THE TREATY AND FISHERY LAWS.

The David J. Adams was a United States fishing vessel. Whether, as alleged in her behalf, her occupation was deep-sea fishing or not, and whether, as suggested, she had not been engaged, nor was intended to be engaged, in fishing in any limit prescribed by the treaty of 1818 or not, are questions which do not, in the opinion of the undersigned, affect the validity of the seizure, and of the proceedings subsequent thereto, for reasons which will be hereafter stated, but in so far as they may be deemed material to the defense they are questions of fact, which remain to be proved in the vice-admiralty court at Halifax, in which the proceedings for the vessel's condemnation are pending, and in respect of which proof is now being taken, and inasmuch as the trial has not been concluded (much less a decision reached), it is perhaps premature for Mr. Phelps to claim the restoration of the vessel, and to assert a right to damages for her detention, on the assumption of the supposed facts before referred to.

It is alleged in the evidence on behalf of the prosecution that the David J. Adams, being a United States fishing vessel, on the morning of the 5th of May, 1886, was in what is called the Annapolis Basin, which is a harbor on the northwest coast of Nova Scotia. She was several miles within the Basin, and the excuse suggested (that the captain and crew may have been there through a misapprehension as to the locality) by the words of Mr. Phelps's letter, "Digby is a small fishing settlement, and its harbor not defined," is unworthy of much consideration.

Digby is not a fishing settlement, although some of the people on the neighboring shores engage in fishing. It is a town with a population of about 2,000 persons. Its harbor is formed by the Annapolis Basin, which is a large inlet of the Bay of Fundy, and the entrance to it consists of a narrow strait marked by conspicuous headlands, which are little more than a mile apart. The entrance is called "Digby Gut," and for all purposes connected with this inquiry the harbor is one of the best defined in America.

The David J. Adams was, on the morning of the 5th day of May, 1886, as has already been stated, several miles within the Gut. She was not there for the purpose of "shelter," or "repairs," nor to "purchase wood," nor to obtain water. She remained there during the 5th and the 6th of May, 1886; she was lying at anchor about half a mile from the shore, at a locality called "Clements West."

On the morning of the 6th of May, 1886, the captain made application to the owners of a fishing weir near where he was laying for bait, and purchased 4½ barrels of that article. He also purchased and took on board about 2 tons of ice. While waiting at anchor for these purposes the name of the vessel's "hailing place" was kept covered by canvas, and this concealment continued while she afterwards sailed down past Digby.

One of the crew represented to the persons attending the weir that the vessel belonged to the neighboring Province of New Brunswick. The captain told the owner of the weir, when the treaty was spoken of by the latter, that the vessel was under British register. The captain said he would wait until the next morning to get more bait from the catch in the weir which was expected that day. At daybreak, however, on the morning of the 7th of May, 1886, the Government steamer Lansdowne arrived off Digby, and the David J. Adams got under way without waiting to take in the additional supply of bait, and sailed down the Basin towards the Gut.

Before she had passed Digby she was boarded by the first officer of the Lansdowne, and to him the captain made the following statement: That he had come to that place to see his people, as he had formerly belonged there, that he had no fresh bait on board, and that he was from the "Banks," and bound for Eastport, Me. The officer of the Lansdowne told him he had no business there, and asked him if he knew the law. His reply was, "Yes."

A few hours afterwards, and while the David J. Adams was still inside the Gut, the officer of the Lansdowne, ascertaining that the statements of the captain were untrue, and that bait had been purchased by him within the harbor on the previous day, returned to the David J. Adams, charged the captain with the offense, and received for his reply the assertion that the charge was false, and that the person who gave the information was a "liar."

The officer looked into the hold of the vessel and found the herring which had been purchased the day before, and which, of course, was perfectly fresh; but the captain declared that this "bait" was ten days old.

The officer of the Lansdowne returned to his ship, reported the facts, and went again to the Adams, accompanied by another officer, who also looked at the bait. Both returned to the Lansdowne, and then conveyed to the Adams the direction that to representation of the vessel as they are alleged to rely to sustain the seizure.

NAVY LAWS.

Whether, as alleged in the report, as suggested, she was fishing in any limit prohibited, in the opinion of the court, in the proceedings subsequent to the seizure, it may be deemed sufficient to be proved in the case of the vessel's condemnation. As taken, and inasmuch as it is perhaps premature to assert a right to facts before referred to, that the David J. Adams, on the 5th of May, 1886, was in the northwest coast of the fishing settlement, and people on the neighboring coast about 2,000 persons. Its outlet of the Bay of Fundy, conspicuous headlands, called "Digby Gut," and one of the best defined in the herring which had been freshly fresh; but the captain reported the facts, and went to also looked at the bait. The Adams the direction that she should come to Digby and anchor near the Lansdowne. This was, in fact, the seizure.

These are the circumstances by which the seizure was, in the opinion of Mr. Phelps, "much aggravated," and which make it seem very apparent to him, that the seizure was not made for the purpose of enforcing any right or redressing any wrong.

The fact that the seizure was preceded by visitations and searches was due to the statements of the master and the reluctance of the officers of the Lansdowne to enforce the law until they had ascertained to a demonstration that the offense had been committed and that the captain's statements were untrue.

THE OFFENSE AS TO CUSTOMS LAWS.

The David J. Adams, as already stated, was in harbor upwards of forty-eight hours, and when seized was proceeding to sea without having been reported at any customs-house. Her business was not such as to make it her interest to attract the attention of the Canadian authorities, and it is not difficult, therefore, to conjecture the reason why she was not so reported, or to see that the reason put forward, that Digby is but "a small fishing settlement and its harbor not defined," is a disingenuous one. In going to the weir to purchase bait the vessel passed the custom-house at Digby almost within hailing distance. When at the weir she was within 1 or 2 miles of another custom-house (at Clementsport), and within about 15 miles of another (at Annapolis). The master has not asserted that he did not know the law on this subject, as it is established that he knew the law in relation to the restriction on foreign fishing vessels.

The provisions of the customs act of Canada on this subject are not essentially different from those of his own country. The captain and crew were ashore during the 5th and 6th of May, 1886. The following provisions of the customs act of Canada apply:

"The master of every vessel coming from any port or place out of Canada, or coastwise, and entering any port in Canada, whether laden or in ballast, shall go without delay, when such vessel is anchored or moored, to the custom-house for the port of place of entry where he arrives, and there make a report in writing to the collector or other proper officer of the arrival and voyage of such vessel, stating her name, country, and tonnage, the port of registry, the name of the master, the country of the owners, the number and names of the passengers, if any, the number of the crew, and whether the vessel is laden or in ballast, and, if laden, the marks and numbers of every package and parcel of goods on board, and where the same was laden, and the particulars of any goods stowed loose, and where and to whom consigned, and where any and what goods, if any, have been laden or unladen, or bulk has been broken, during the voyage, what part of the cargo, and the number and names of the passengers which are intended to be landed at that port, and what and whom at any other port in Canada, and what part of the cargo, if any, is intended to be exported in the same vessel, and what surplus stores remain on board as far as any of such particulars are or can be known to him." (46 Vic., cap. 12, sec. 25.)

"The master shall at the time of making his report, if required by the officer of customs, produce to him the bills of lading of the cargo, or true copies thereof, and shall make and subscribe an affidavit referring to his report, and declaring that all the statements made in the report are true, and shall further answer all such questions concerning the vessel and cargo, and the crew, and the voyage, as are demanded of him by such officer, and shall, if required, make the substance of any such answer part of his report." (46 Vic., cap. 12, sec. 25.)

"If any goods are unladen from any vessel before such report is made, or if the master fails to make such report, or makes an untrue report, or does not truly answer the questions demanded of him, as provided in the next preceding section, he shall incur a penalty of $400, and the vessel may be detained until such penalty is paid." (46 Vic., cap. 12, sec. 28.)

PROCEEDINGS FOLLOWING THE SEIZURE.

These have been made the subject of complaint by Mr. Phelps, although the explanations which were given in the previous memorandum of the undersigned (in reference to the letters of Mr. Bayard to her majesty's minister at Washington), and in the report on the same subject of the minister of marine and fisheries, laid before his excellency the governor-general on the 14th June ultimo, coupled with a disavowal, by the Canadian Government, of any intention that the proceedings in such cases should be unnecessarily harsh or pursued in a punitive spirit, might have been expected to be sufficient. After the seizure was made, the commander of the Lansdowne took the David J. Adams across the Bay of Fundy to St. John, a distance of about forty miles. He appears to have had the impression that, as his duties would not permit him to remain at Digby, the vessel would not be secure from rescue, which has in several cases occurred after the seizure of fishing vessels. He believed she would be more secure in the harbor of St. John, and that the legal proceedings, which in due course would follow, could be taken there. He was immediately directed, however, to return with the vessel to Digby, as it seemed more in order, and more in compliance with the statutes relating to the subject, that she should be detained in the place of seizure, and that the legal proceedings should be taken in the vice-admiralty court of the province where the offense was committed. It does not seem to be claimed by the United States authorities that any damage to the vessel, or that any injury or inconvenience to any one concerned, was occasioned by this removal to St. John, and by her return to Digby, occupying as they did but a few hours, and yet this circumstance seems to be relied on as "aggravating the seizure" and as depriving it of the character of a seizure made "to enforce a right or to redress a wrong."

Another ground of complaint is that in Digby, "the paper alleged to be the legal precept for the capture and detention of the vessel was nailed to her mast in such a manner as to prevent its contents being read" and that "the request of the captain, and of the United States consul-general, to be allowed to detach the writ from the mast, for the purpose of learning its contents was positively refused by the provincial official in charge; that the United States' consul-general was not able to learn from the commander of the Lansdowne the nature of the complaint against the vessel, and that his respectful application to that effect was fruitless."

(1) As to the position of the paper on the mast. It is not a fact that it was nailed to the vessel's mast "in such a manner as to prevent its contents being read." It was nailed there for the purpose of being read, and could have been read.

(2) As to the refusal to allow it to be detached, such refusal was not intended as a discourtesy, but was legitimate and proper. The paper purported to be, and was, a copy of the writ of summons and warrant, which were then in the registry of the vice-admiralty court at Halifax. It was attached to the mast by the officer of the court, in accordance with the rules and procedure of that court. The purposes for which it was so attached did not admit of any consent for its removal.

(3) As to the desire of the captain and of the United States consul-general to ascertain the contents of the paper, the original was in the registry of the court, accessible to every person, and the registry is within eighty yards of the consul-general's office. All the reasons for the seizure and detention were made, however, to the captain, days before the paper arrived to be placed on the mast, and, before the consul-general arrived at Digby, these reasons were not only matters of public notoriety, but had been published in the newspapers of the province, and in hundreds of other newspapers circulating throughout Canada and the United States. The captain and the consul-general did not need, therefore, to take the paper from the mast in order to learn the causes of the seizure and detention.

(4) As to the application of the consul-general having been fruitless, the fact has transpired that he had reported the seizure and its causes to his Government before the application was made. It has been already explained in the previous memorandum of the undersigned, and in the report of the minister of marine and fisheries, that the application was for a specific statement of the charges, and that it was made to an officer who had neither the legal acquirements nor the authority to state them in a more specific form than that in which he had already stated them. The commander of the Lansdowne requested the consul-general to make his request to the minister of marine and fisheries, and, if he had done so, the specific statement which he had desired could have been furnished in an hour. It is hoped that the explanation already made, and the precautions which have been taken against even the appearance of discourtesy in the future, will, on consideration, be found to be satisfactory.

INCIDENTS OF THE CUSTOMS' SEIZURE.

Mr. Phelps presents the following views with respect to the claim that the David J. Adams besides violating the treaty and the statutes relating to "fishing by foreign vessels" is liable to be detained for the penalty under the customs law.

(1) That this claim indicates the consciousness that the vessel could not be forfeited for the offense against the treaty and fishing laws. This supposition is groundless. It is by no means uncommon in legal proceedings, both in Canada and the United States, for such proceedings to be based on more than one charge, although any one of the charges would in itself, if sustained, be sufficient for the purpose of the complainant. The success of this litigation, like that of all litigation, must depend not merely on the rights of the parties but on the proof which may be adduced as to a right having been infringed. In this instance it appears from Mr. Phelps's letter that the facts which are to be made the subject of proof are evidently in dispute, and the Government of Canada could, with propriety, assert both its claims, so that both of them should not be lost by any miscarriage of justice in regard to one of them. This was likewise the proper course to be taken, in view of the fact that an appeal might at any time be made to the Government by the owners of the David J. Adams for remission of the forfeiture incurred in respect of the fishery laws. The following is a section of the Canadian statute relating to fishing by foreign vessels:

"In cases of seizure under this act, the governor in council may direct a stay of proceedings, and in cases of condemnation may relieve from the penalty in whole or in part, and on such terms as are deemed right." (31 Vic., cap. 61, sec. 19.)

It seemed necessary and proper to make at once any claim founded on infraction of the customs laws, in view of the possible termination of the proceedings by executive interference under this enactment. It would surely not be expected that the Government of Canada should wait until the termination of the proceedings under the fishery acts, before asserting its claim to the penalty under the customs act. The owners of the offending vessel and all concerned were entitled to know as soon as they could be made aware what the claims of the Government were in relation to the vessel, and they might fairly urge that any which were not disclosed were waived.

(2) Mr. Phelps remarks that this charge is "not the one on which the vessel was seized" and "was an after-thought." The vessel was seized by the commander of the Lansdowne for a violation of the fishery laws before the customs authorities had any knowledge that such a vessel had entered into the port, or had attempted to leave it, and the commander was not aware at that time whether the David J. Adams had made proper entry or not. A few hours afterwards, however, the collector of customs at Digby ascertained the facts, and on the facts being made known to the head of his department at Ottawa, was immediately instructed to take such steps as might be necessary to assert the claim for the penalty which had been incurred. The collector did so.

(3) Mr. Phelps asserts that the charge of breach of the customs law is not the one which must now be principally relied on for condemnation. It is true that condemnation does not necessarily follow. The penalty prescribed is a forfeiture of $400, on payment of which the owners are entitled to the release of the vessel. If Mr. Phelps means by the expression just quoted, that the customs offense cannot be relied on in respect to the penalty claimed, and that the vessel cannot be detained until that penalty is paid, it can only be said that in this contention the Canadian Government does not concur. Section 39 of the customs act, before quoted, is explicit on that point.

(4) It is also urged that the offense was, at most, "only an accidental and clearly technical breach of a custom-house regulation, by which no harm was intended, and from which no harm came, and would in ordinary cases be easily condoned by an apology, and perhaps payment of costs." What has already been said under the heading "the offense (as to the customs laws)" presents the contention opposed to the offense being considered as accidental. The master of the David J. Adams showed by his language and conduct that what he did he did with design, and with the knowledge that he was violating the laws of the country. He could not have complied with the customs law without frustrating the purposes for which he had gone into port.

As to the breach being a "technical" one, it must "be remembered that with thousands of miles of coast indented, as the coasts of Canada are, by hundreds of harbors and inlets, it is impossible to enforce the fishery law without a strict enforcement of the customs laws. This difficulty was not unforeseen by the framers of the treaty of 1818, who provided that the fishermen should be "under such restrictions as might be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish * * * or in any other manner whatever abusing the privilege reserved to them." No naval force which could be equipped by the Dominion would of itself be sufficient for the enforcement of the fishery laws.

Foreign fishing vessels are allowed by the treaty to enter the harbors and inlets of Canada, but they are allowed to do so only for specified purposes. In order to confine them to those purposes it is necessary to insist on the observance of the customs laws, which are enforced by officers all along the coast. A strict enforcement of the customs laws, and one consistent with the treaty, would require that, even when coming into port for the purposes for which such vessels are allowed to enter our waters, a report should be made at the customs-house, but this has not been insisted on in all cases; when the customs laws are enforced against those who enter for other than legitimate purposes, and who choose to violate both the fishery laws and customs laws, the Government is far within its right, and should not be asked to accept an apology and payment of costs. It may be observed here, as affecting Mr. Phelps's demands for restoration and damages, that the apology and costs have never been tendered, and that Mr. Phelps seems to be of opinion that they are not called for.

(5) Mr. Phelps is informed by the consul-general at Halifax that it is "conceded by the customs authorities there that foreign fishing vessels have for forty years been accustomed to go in and out of the bay at pleasure, and he never been required to send ashore and report when they had no business with the port and made no landing, and that no seizure had ever before been made or claim against them for so doing." Nothing of this kind is or could be conceded by the customs authorities there or elsewhere in Canada.

The bay referred to, the Annapolis Basin, is like all the other harbors of Canada, except that it is unusually well defined and land-locked and furnished with customs-houses. Neither there nor anywhere else have foreign fishing vessels been accustomed to go in and out at pleasure without reporting. If they had been so permitted the fishery laws could not have been enforced, and there would have been no protection against illicit trading. While the reciprocity treaty of 1854 and the fishery clauses of the Washington treaty were in force, the convention of 1818 being, of course, suspended, considerable laxity was allowed to the United States fishing vessels, much greater than the terms of those treaties entitled them to, but the consul-general is greatly mistaken when he supposes that at other times the customs laws were not enforced, and that seizures of foreign fishing vessels were not made for omitting to report. Abundant evidence on this point can be had.

In 1839 Mr. Vail, the Acting Secretary of State (United States) reported that most of the seizures, which then were considered numerous, were for alleged violation of the customs laws (Papers relating to the Treaty of Washington, vol. vi, p. 283, Washington edition). From a letter of the United States consul at Charlottetown, dated August 19, 1870, to the United States consul-general at Montreal, it appears that it was the practice of the United States fishermen at that time to make regular entry at the port to which they resorted. The consul said, "Here the fishermen enter and clear, and take out permits to land their mackerel from the collector, and as their mackerel is a free article in this island, there can be no illicit trade."

In the year 1870, two United States fishing vessels, the H. W. Lewis and the Granada, were seized on like charges in Canadian waters.

What Mr. Phelps styles "a custom-house regulation" is an act of the Parliament of Canada, and has for many years been in force in all the provinces of the Dominion. It is one which the Government cannot at all alter or repeal, and which its officers are not at liberty to disregard.

(6) It is suggested, though not asserted, in the letter of Mr. Phelps, that the penalty cannot reasonably be insisted on, because a new rule has been suddenly adopted without notice. The rule, as before observed, is not a new one, nor is its enforcement a novelty. As the Government of the United States choose to put an end to the arrangement under which the fishermen of that country were accustomed to frequent Canadian waters with so much freedom, the obligation of giving notice to those fishermen that their rights were thereafter, by the action of their own Government, to be greatly restricted, and that they must not infringe the laws of Canada, was surely a duty incumbent on the Government of the United States rather than on that of Canada. This point cannot be better expressed than in the language reported to have been recently used by Mr. Bayard, the United States Secretary of State, in his reply to the owners of the George Cushing, a vessel recently seized on a similar charge: "You are well aware that questions are now pending between this Government and that of Great Britain in relation to the justification of the rights of American fishing vessels in the territorial waters of British North America, and we shall relax no effort to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. In the meantime it is the duty and manifest interest of all American citizens entering Canadian jurisdiction to ascertain and obey the laws and regulations there in force. For all unlawful depredations of property or commercial rights this Government will expect to procure redress and compensation for the innocent sufferers."

INTERPRETATION OF THE TREATY.

Mr. Phelps, after commenting in the language already quoted from his letter on the claim for the customs penalty, treats, as the only question, whether the vessel is to be forfeited for purchasing bait to be used in lawful fishing. In following his argument on this point, it should be borne in mind, as already stated, that in so far as the fact of the bait having been intended to be used in lawful fishing is material to the case, that is a fact which is not admitted. It is one in respect of which the burden of proof is on the owners of the vessel, and it is one on which the owners of the vessel have not yet obtained an adjudication by the tribunal before which the case has gone.

Mr. Phelps admits "that if the language of the treaty of 1818 is to be interpreted literally, rather than according to its spirit and plain intent, a vessel engaged in fishing would be prohibited from entering a Canadian port for any purpose whatever, except to obtain wood or water, or to repair damages, or to seek shelter."

It is claimed on the part of the Government of Canada that this is not only the language of the treaty of 1818, but "its spirit and plain intent." To establish this contention it should be sufficient to point to the clear, unambiguous words of the treaty. To those clear and unambiguous words Mr. Phelps seeks to attach a hidden meaning by suggesting that certain "preposterous consequences" might ensue from giving them their ordinary construction. He says that with such a construction a vessel might be forfeited for entering a port "to post a letter, to send a telegram, to buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness, or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants, &c."

There are probably few treaties or statutes, the literal enforcement of which might not in certain circumstances, produce consequences worthy of being described as preposterous.

At most, this argument can only suggest that, in regard to this treaty, as in regard to every enactment, its enforcement should not be insisted on where accidental hardships or "preposterous consequences" are likely to ensue. Equity and a natural sense of justice would doubtless lead the Government with which the treaty was made to abstain from its rigid enforcement for inadvertent offenses, although the right so to enforce it might be beyond question. It is for this reason that, inasmuch as the enforcement of this treaty to some extent devolves on the government of Canada, the Parliament of the Dominion has in one of the sections already quoted of the statute relating to fishing by foreign vessels (31 Vic., cap. 61, sec. 19) intrusted the executive with power to mitigate the severity of those provisions when an appeal to executive interference can be justified. In relation to every law of a penal character the same power for the same purpose is vested in the executive. Mr. Phelps will find it difficult, however, to discover any authority among the jurists of his own country or of Great Britain, or among the writers on international law, for the position that, against the plain words of a treaty or statute, an interpretation is to be sought which will obviate all chances of hardship and render unnecessary the exercise of the executive power before mentioned.

It might fairly be urged against his argument that the convention of 1818 is less than an attempt to change its plain meaning than even a statute would be. The latter is a declaration of its will by the supreme authority of the state, the former was a compact deliberately and solemnly made by two parties, each of whom expressed what he was willing to concede, and by what terms it was willing to be bound. If the purposes for which the United States desired that their fishing vessels should have the right to enter British American waters included other than those expressed, their desire cannot avail them now, nor be a pretext for a special interpretation after they assented to the words "and for no other purpose whatever." If it was "preposterous" that their fishermen should be precluded from entering provincial waters "to post a letter" or for any other of the purposes which Mr. Phelps mentions, they would probably never have assented to a treaty framed as this was. Having done so they cannot now urge that their language was "preposterous" and that its effect must be destroyed by resort to "interpretation."

But that which Mr. Phelps calls "literal interpretation" is by no means so preposterous as he suggests, when the purpose and object of the treaty come to be considered. While it was not desired to interfere with ordinary commercial intercourse between the people of the two countries, the deliberate and declared purpose existed on the part of Great Britain, and the willingness existed on the part of the United States, to secure absolutely and free from the possibility of encroachment the fisheries of the British possessions in America to the people of those possessions, excepting as to certain localities, in respect of which special provisions were made. To effect this it was merely necessary that there should be a joint declaration of the right which was to be established, but that means should be taken to preserve that right. For this purpose a distinction was necessarily drawn between the United States vessels engaged in commerce and those engaged in fishing. While the former had free access to our coasts, the latter were placed under a strict prohibition.

The purpose was to prevent the fisheries from being poached on, and to preserve them to "the subjects of his Britannic Majesty in North America, not only for the pursuit of fishing within the waters adjacent to the coast (which ear under the law of nations be done by any country), but as a basis of supplies for the pursuit of fishing in the deep sea." For this purpose it was necessary to keep out foreign fishing vessels, excepting in cases of dire necessity, no matter under what pretext they might desire to come in. The fishermen could not be preserved to our people if every one of the United States fishing vessels that were accustomed to swarm along our coasts could claim the right to enter our harbors "to post a letter, or send a telegram, or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood, or pestilence," or to "buy medicine," or to "purchase a new rope."

The slightest acquaintance with the negotiations which led to the treaty of 1818, and with the state of the fishery question preceding it, induces the belief that if the United States negotiators had suggested these as purposes for which their vessels should be allowed to enter our waters, the proposal would have been rejected as "preposterous," to quote Mr. Phelps's own words. But Mr. Phelps appears to have overlooked an important part of the case when he suggested that it is a "preposterous" construction of the treaty, which would lead to the purchase of bait being prohibited. So far from such a construction being against "its spirit and plain intent," no other meaning would accord with that spirit and intent. If we adopt one of the methods contended for by Mr. Phelps of arriving at the true meaning of the treaty, namely, having reference to the "attending circumstances," &c., we find that so far from its being considered by the framers of the treaty that a prohibition of the right to obtain bait would be a "preposterous" and an extreme instance, a proposition was made by the United States negotiators that the proviso should read thus: "Provided, however, That American fishermen shall be permitted to enter such bays and harbors for the purpose only of obtaining shelter, wood, water, and bait;" and the insertion of the word "bait" was resisted by the British negotiators and struck out. After this, how can it be contended that any rule of interpretation would be sound which would give to United States fishermen the very permission which was sought for on their behalf during the negotiations successfully resisted by the British representatives and deliberately rejected by the framers of the convention?

It is a well-known fact that the negotiations preceding the treaty had reference very largely to the deep-sea fisheries, and that the right to purchase bait in the harbors of the British possessions for the deep-sea fishing was one which the United States fishermen were intentionally excluded from. Referring to the difficulties which subsequently arose from an enforcement of the treaty, an American author says:

"It will be seen that most of those difficulties arose from a change in the character of the fisheries; cod being caught on the banks, were seldom pursued within the 3-mile limit, and yet it was to cod, and perhaps halibut, that all the early negotiations had referred.

"The mackerel fishing had now sprung up in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and had proved extremely profitable. This was at that time an inshore fishery." (Schuyler's American Diplomacy, page 411.)

In further amplification of this argument, the undersigned would refer to the views set forth in the memorandum before mentioned in the letters of Mr. Bayard in May last, and to those presented in the report of the minister of marine and fisheries, approved on the 14th June ultimo.

While believing, however, that Mr. Phelps cannot, by resort to any such matters, successfully establish a different construction for the treaty from that which its words present, the undersigned submits that Mr. Phelps is mistaken as to the right to resort to any matters outside the treaty itself to modify its plain words. Mr. Phelps expresses his contention thus: "It seems to me clear that the treaty may be considered in accordance with those ordinary and well settled rules, applicable to all written instruments, which without such salutary assistance must constantly fail of their purpose. By these rules the letter often gives way to the intent, or rather is only used to ascertain the intent, and the whole document will be taken together and will be considered in connection with the attending circumstances, the situation of the parties, and the object in view, and thus the literal meaning of an isolated clause is often shown not to be the meaning really understood or intended." It may be readily admitted that such rules of interpretation exist, but when are they to be applied? Only when interpretation is necessary—when the words are plain in their ordinary meaning, the task of interpretation does not begin. Vattel says in reference to the "interpretation of treaties":

"The first general maxim of interpretation is that it is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation. When the deed is worded in clear and precise terms, when its meaning is evident and leads to no absurd conclusion, there can be no reason for refusing to admit the meaning which such deed naturally presents. To go elsewhere in search of conjectures in order to restrict or extend it is but an attempt to elude it.

"Those cavilers who dispute the sense of a clear and determinate article are accustomed to seek their frivolous subterfuges in the pretended intentions and views which they attribute to its author. It would be very often dangerous to enter with them into the discussion of these supposed views that are pointed out in the piece itself. The following rule is better calculated to foil such cavilers, and will at once cut short all chicanery: If he who could and ought to have explained himself clearly and fully has not done it, it is the worse for him; he cannot be allowed to introduce subsequent restrictions which he has not expressed. This is a maxim of the Roman law, 'Pactionem obscuram us usure [?] iis nocere] in quorum fuit potestate legem apertius conscribere.' The equity of this rule is glaringly obvious, and its necessity is not less evident." (Vattel's Interpretation of Treaties, lib. ii, chap. 17.)

Sedgwick, the American writer on the "Construction of Statutes" (and treaties are construed by much the same rules as statutes), says, at page 194: "The rule is, as we shall constantly see, cardinal and universal; but if the statute is plain and au-have been rejected as Phelps appears to say that it is a "preposterous chase of bait being spirit and plain intent."

If we adopt one of the meanings of the treaty, &c., we find that so far prohibition of the right stance, a proposition was read thus: "Provided, for such bays and harbors bait," and the insertion and struck out. After would be sound which was sought for on the British representation?

of Statutes" (and treaties at page 194: "The rule is, the statute is plain and an-ambiguous, there is no room for construction or interpretation. The legislature has spoken; their interpretation is free from doubt, and their will must be obeyed. "It may be proper," it has been said in Kentucky, "in giving a construction to a statute, to look to the effects and consequences when its provisions are ambiguous or the legislative intention is doubtful. But when the law is clear and explicit and its provisions are susceptible of but one interpretation, if evil, can only be avoided by a change of the law itself, to be effected by legislative and not judicial action. "So, too," it is said by the Supreme Court of the United States, "where a law is plain and unambiguous, whether it be expressed in general or limited terms, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction."

At the tribunal of arbitration at Genoa,* held under the Washington treaty in 1872, a similar question arose. Counsel for Her Majesty's Government presented a supplemental argument, in which the ordinary rules for the interpretation of treaties were invoked. Mr. Evarts, one of the counsel for the United States and afterwards Secretary of State, made a supplemental reply, in which the following passage occurs: "At the close of the special argument we find a general presentation of canons for the construction of treaties and some general observations as to the light or the controlling reason under which these rules of the treaty should be construed. These suggestions may be briefly dismissed. It certainly would be a very great reproach to these nations which had deliberately fixed upon three propositions as expressive of the law of nations, in their judgment, for the purposes of this trial, that a resort to general instructions for the purpose of interpretation was necessary. Eleven canons of interpretation drawn from Vattel are presented in order, and then several of them as the case suits, are applied as valuable in elucidating this or that point of the rules. But the learned counsel has omitted to bring to your notice the first and most general rule of Vattel, which being once understood would, as we think, dispense with any consideration of these subordinate canons which Vattel has introduced to be used only in case his first general rule does not apply. This first proposition is that 'it is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation.'" (Washington Treaty Papers, vol. iii, pp. 446-7.)

In a letter of Mr. Hamilton Fish to the United States minister in England on the same subject, dated April 16, 1872, the following view was set forth: "Further than this, it appears to me that the principles of English and American law (and they are substantially the same) regarding the construction of statutes and treaties, and of written instruments generally, would preclude the seeking of evidence of intent outside the instrument itself. It might be a painful trial on which to enter in seeking the opinions and recollections of parties, to bring into conflict the different expectations of those who were engaged in the negotiation of an instrument." (Washington Treaty Papers, vol. ii, p. 473.)

But even at this barrier the difficulty in following Mr. Phelps's argument, by which he seeks to reach the interpretation he desires, does not end. After taking a view of the treaty which all authorities thus forbid, he says: "Thus regarded, it appears to me clear that the words 'for no other purpose whatever,' as employed in the treaty, mean for no other purpose inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty." Taken in that sense the words would leave no meaning, for no other purpose would be consistent with the treaty, excepting those mentioned. He proceeds, "or prejudicial to the interests of the provinces or their inhabitants." If the United States authorities are the judges as to what is prejudicial to those interests, the treaty will have very little value; if the provinces are to be the judges, it is most prejudicial to their interests that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into their harbors on any pretext, and it is fatal to their fishery interests that these fishermen, with whom they have to compete at such a disadvantage in the markets of the United States, should be allowed to enter for supplies and bait, even for the pursuit of the deep sea fisheries. Before concluding his remarks on this subject, the undersigned would refer to a passage in the answer on behalf of the United States to the case of Her Majesty's Government as presented to the Halifax Fisheries Commission in 1877: "The various incidental and reciprocal advantages of the treaty, such as the privileges of traffic, purchasing, bait and other supplies, are not the subject of compensation, because the treaty of Washington confers no such rights on the inhabitants of the United States, who now enjoy them merely by sufferance, and who can at any time be deprived of them by the enforcement of existing laws or the re-enactment of former oppressive statutes."

Mr. Phelps has made a lengthy citation from the Imperial act, 59 George III, cap.

38, for the purpose of establishing—

1st. That the penalty of forfeiture was not incurred by any entry into British ports, unless accompanied by fishing, or preparing to fish, within the prohibited limits.

2d. That it was not the intention of Parliament, or its understanding of the treaty, that any other entry should be regarded as an infraction of the provisions of that act.

* Geneva.

As regards the latter point, it seems to be effectually disposed of by the quotation which Mr. Phelps has made. The act permits fishermen of the United States to enter into the bays or harbors of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America for the purposes named in the treaty, "and for no other purpose whatever," and after enacting the penalty of forfeiture in regard to certain offenses, provides a penalty of £200 sterling against any person otherwise offending against the act. It cannot, therefore, be successfully contended that Parliament intended to permit entry into the British American waters for the purchase of bait, or for any other than the purposes specified in the treaty.

As to the first point, it is to be observed that the penalty of forfeiture was expressly pronounced as applicable to the offense of fishing or preparing to fish. It may be that forfeiture is incurred by other illegal entry, contrary to the treaty and contrary to the statute. It may also be contended that preparing, within the prohibited limits, to fish in any place is the offense at which the penalty is aimed, or it may be that the preparing within these waters to fish is evidence of preparing to fish within the prohibited waters under the Imperial statute, and especially under the Canadian statute, which places the burden of proof on the defendant.

The undersigned does not propose at this time to enter into any elaborate argument to show the grounds on which the penalty of forfeiture is available, because that question is one which is more suitable for determination by the courts, to whose decision it has been referred in the very case under consideration.

The decision in the case of the David J. Adams will be soon pronounced, and as the Government of Canada will be bound by the ultimate judgment of competent authority on this question, and cannot be expected to acquiesce in the view of the United States Government without such a judgment, any argument of the case in diplomatic form would be premature and futile.

In order, however, to show that Mr. Phelps is in error when he assumes that the practical construction hitherto given to the treaty is in accordance with his views, it is as well to state that in the year 1815 the commander of one of Her Majesty's ships of war seized four United States fishing vessels (see Sabine on Fisheries), and again in 1817 the Imperial Government acted on the view that they had the right to seize foreign vessels encroaching on the fishing grounds. Instructions were issued by Great Britain to seize foreign vessels fishing or at anchor in any of the harbors or creeks in the British North American possessions, or within their maritime jurisdiction, and send them to Halifax for adjudication. Several vessels were seized and information was fully communicated to the Government of the United States. This, it will be remembered, was not only before the treaty, but before the Imperial act above referred to.

The following were the words of the admiralty instructions then issued:

"On your meeting with any foreign vessels, fishing or at anchor in any of the harbors or creeks in His Majesty's North American Provinces, or within our maritime jurisdiction, you will seize and send such vessel so trespassing to Halifax for adjudication, unless it should clearly appear that they have been obliged to put in there in consequence of distress, acquainting me with the cause of such seizure and every other particular, to enable me to give all information to the lords commissioners of the Admiralty."

Under these instructions eleven or twelve American fishing vessels were seized in Nova Scotia on June 8, 1817, in consequence of their frequenting some of the harbors of that province.

In 1818 the fishing vessels Mabby and Washington were seized and condemned for entering and harboring in British American waters.

In 1835 the Java, Independence, Magnolia, and Hart were seized and confiscated, the principal charge being that they were within British American waters without legal cause.

In 1840 the Papineau and Mary were seized and sold for purchasing bait.

In the spring of 1819 a United States fishing vessel named the Charles was seized and condemned in the vice-admiralty court in New Brunswick for having resorted to a harbor of that province after warning and without necessity.

In the year 1871 the United States fishing vessel J. H. Nickerson was seized for having purchased bait within three marine miles of Nova Scotian shore, and condemned by the judgment of Sir William Young, chief justice of Nova Scotia and judge of the court of vice-admiralty. The following is a passage from his judgment:

"The vessel went in, not to obtain water or men, as the allegation says, but to purchase or procure bait (which, as I take it, is a preparing to fish), and it was contended that they had a right to do so, and that no forfeiture accrued on such entering. The answer is, that if a privilege to enter our harbors for bait was to be conceded to American fishermen it ought to have been in the treaty, and it is too important a matter to have been accidentally overlooked. We knew, indeed, from the state papers that it was not overlooked; that it was suggested and declined. But the court, as I have already intimated, does not insist upon that as a reason for its judgment. What may of by the quotation United States to enter is in America for the over," and after enacts a penalty of £200. It cannot, therefore, entry into the British the purposes specified be fairly and justly insisted on is, that beyond the four purposes specified in the treaty—shelter, repairs, water, and wood—here is another purpose or claim not specified, while the treaty itself declares that no such other purpose shall be received to justify an entry. It appears to me an inevitable conclusion that the J. H. Nickerson, in entering the Bay of Ingonish for the purpose of procuring bait while there, became liable to forfeiture, and upon the true construction of the treaty and acts of Parliament was legally seized." (Vide Halifax Com., vol. iii, p. 3398, Washington edition.)

In view of these seizures and of this decision it is difficult to understand the following passages in the letter of Mr. Phelps:

"The practical construction given to the treaty, down to the present time, has been in entire accord with the conclusions thus deduced from the act of Parliament. The British Government has repeatedly refused to allow interference with American fishing vessels, unless for illegal fishing, and has given explicit orders to the contrary."

"Judicial authority upon the question is to the same effect. That the purchase of bait by American fishermen in the provincial ports has been a common practice is well known, but in no case, so far as I can ascertain, has a seizure of an American vessel ever been enforced on the ground of the purchase of bait or of any other supplies. On the hearing before the Halifax Fishery Commission in 1877-'78, this question was discussed and no case could be produced of any such condemnation. Vessels shown to have been condemned were in all cases adjudged guilty, either of fishing or preparing to fish within the prohibited limits."

Although Mr. Phelps is under the impression that "in the hearing before the Halifax Fishery Commission in 1877 this question was discussed and no case could be produced of any such condemnation," the fact appears in the records of that Commission, as published by the Government of the United States, that on a discussion which there arose, the instances above mentioned were nearly all cited, and the judgment of Sir William Young in the case of the J. H. Nickerson was presented in full, and it now appears among the papers of that Commission. (See vol. iii, Documents and Proceedings of Halifax Commission, page 3398, Washington edition.) The decision in the case of the J. H. Nickerson was subsequent to that in the case of the White Pawn mentioned, to the exclusion of all the other cases referred to by Mr. Phelps. Whether that decision should be reaffirmed or not is a question more suitable for judicial determination than for discussion here.

RIGHT OF THE DOMINION PARLIAMENT TO MAKE FISHERY ENACTMENTS.

Mr. Phelps deems it unnecessary to point out that it is not in the power of the Canadian Parliament to alter or enlarge the provisions of the act of the Imperial Parliament, or to give to the treaty either a construction or a legal effect not warranted by that act.

No attempt has ever been made by the Parliament of Canada, or by that of any of the provinces to give a "construction" to the treaty, but the undersigned submits that the right of the Parliament of Canada, with the royal assent given in the manner provided in the constitution, to pass an act on this subject to give that treaty effect, or to protect the people of Canada from the infringement of the treaty provisions is clear beyond question. An act of that parliament, duly passed according to constitutional forms, has as much the force of law in Canada, and binds as fully offenders who may come within its jurisdiction any act of the Imperial Parliament.

The efforts made on the part of the Government of the United States to deny and refute the validity of colonial statutes on this subject have been continued for many years, and in every instance have been set at naught by the Imperial authorities and by the judicial tribunals.

In May, 1870, this vain contention was completely abandoned, a circular was issued by the Treasury Department at Washington, in which circular the persons to whom it was sent were authorized and directed to inform all masters of fishing vessels that the authorities of the Dominion of Canada had resolved to terminate the system of granting fishing licenses to foreign vessels.

The circular proceeds to state the terms of the treaty of 1818 in order that United States fishermen might be informed of the limitation thereby placed on their privileges. It proceeds further to set out at large the Canadian act of 1868, relating to fishing by foreign vessels, which has been hereinbefore referred to.

The fishermen of the United States were by that circular expressly warned of the nature of the Canadian statute, which it is now once more pretended is without force, but no intimation was given to those fishermen that these provisions were nugatory and would be resisted by the United States Government. Lest there should be any misapprehension on that subject, however, on June 9 of the same year, less than a month after that circular, another circular was issued from the same Department stating again the terms of the treaty of 1818, and then containing the following paragraph: "Fishermen of the United States are bound to respect the British laws for the regulation and preservation of the fisheries to the same extent to which they are applicable to British and Canadian fishermen." The same circular, noticing the change made in the Canadian fishery act of 1868 by the amendment of 1870, makes this observation: "It will be observed that the warning formerly given is not required under the amended act, but that vessels trespassing are liable to seizure without such warning."

THE CANADIAN STATUTE OF 1886.

Mr. Phelps is again under an erroneous impression with regard to the statute introduced at the last session of the Dominion Parliament.

He is informed that "since the seizure" the Canadian authorities have pressed, or are pressing, through the Canadian Parliament in much haste, an act which is designed, for the first time in the history of the legislature under this treaty, to make the facts upon which the American vessels have been seized illegal, and to authorize proceedings against them therefor.

The following observations are appropriate in relation to this passage of Mr. Phelps's letter:

(1) The act which he refers to was not passed with haste. It was passed through the two houses in the usual manner, and with the observance of all the usual forms. Its passage occupied probably more time than was occupied in the passage through the Congress of the United States of a measure which possesses much the same character, and which will be referred to hereafter.

(2) The act has no bearing on the seizures referred to.

(3) It does not make any act illegal which was legal before, but declares what penalty attaches to the offenses which were already prohibited. It may be observed in reference to the charges of "undue haste," and of "legislating for the first time in the history of the legislation under the treaty," that before the statute referred to had become law the United States Congress passed a statute containing the following section:

"That whenever any foreign country whose vessels have been placed on the same footing in the ports of United States as American vessels (the coastwise trade excepted) shall deny to any vessel of the United States any of the commercial privileges accorded to national vessels in the harbors, ports, or waters of such foreign country, the President, on receiving satisfactory information of the continuance of such discriminations against any vessel of the United States, is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, excluding, on and after such time as he may indicate, from the exercise of such commercial privileges in the ports of the United States as are denied to American vessels in the ports of each foreign country, all vessels of such foreign country of a similar character to the vessels of the United States thus discriminated against, and suspending such concessions previously granted to the vessels of such country; and on and after the date named in such proclamation for it to take effect, if the master, officer, or agent of any vessel of such foreign country excluded by said proclamation from the exercise of any commercial privileges shall do any act prohibited by said proclamation in the ports, harbors, or waters of the United States for or on account of such vessel, such vessel and its rigging, tackle, furniture and boats and all the goods on board, shall be liable to seizure and to forfeiture to the United States; and any person opposing any officer of the United States in the enforcement of this act, or aiding and abetting any other person in such opposition, shall forfeit $500 and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years." (Sec. 17 of act No. 85 of Congress, 1886.)

This enactment has all the features of hostility which Mr. Phelps has stigmatized as "unprecedented in the history of legislation under the treaty."

ENFORCEMENT OF THE ACTS WITHOUT NOTICE.

Mr. Phelps insists upon what he regards as "obvious grounds of reason and justice" and "upon common principles of equity, that previous notice should have been given of the new stringent restrictions" it was intended to enforce.

It has already been shown that no new restrictions have been attempted. The case of the David J. Adams is proceeding under the statutes which have been enforced during the whole time when the treaty had operation.

It is true that for a short time prior to the treaty of Washington, and when expectations existed of such a treaty being arrived at, the instructions of 1870, which are cited by Mr. Phelps, were issued by the Imperial authorities. It is likewise true that under these instructions the rights of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada were not insisted on in their entirety. These instructions were obviously applicable to the particular time at which and the particular circumstances under which they were issued by Her Majesty's Government.

But it is obviously unfair to invoke them now under wholly different circumstances as establishing a "practical construction" of the treaty, or as affording any ground for claiming that the indulgence which they extended should be perpetual.

The fishery clauses of the Treaty of Washington were annulled by a notice from the Government of the United States, and, as has already been urged, it would seem to have been the duty of that Government, rather than of the Government of Canada, to have warned its own people of the consequences which must ensue. This was done in 1870 by the circulars from the Treasury Department at Washington, and might well have been done at this time.

Mr. Phelps has been pleased to stigmatize "the action of the Canadian authority in seizing and still detaining the David J. Adams" as not only unfriendly and discourteous, but altogether unwarrantable.

He proceeds to state that that vessel "had violated no existing law," although his letter cites the statute which she had directly and plainly violated; and he states that she "had incurred no penalty that any known statute imposed"; while he has directed at large the words which inflict a penalty for the violation of that statute. He declares it seems impossible for him to escape the conclusion that "this and similar seizures were made by the Canadian authorities for the deliberate purpose of harassing and embarrassing the American fishing vessels in the pursuit of their lawful employment," and that the injury is very much aggravated by the motives which appear to have prompted it.

He professes to have found the real source of the difficulty in the "irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people, on account of the termination by the United States Government of the Washington treaty," and in a desire to drive the United States "by harassing and annoying their fishermen into the adoption of a new treaty, by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free," and he declares that "this scheme is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is unjustifiable in principle."

He might, perhaps, have more accurately stated the real source of the difficulty, had he suggested that the United States authorities have long endeavored, and are still endeavoring, to obtain that which by their solemn treaty they deliberately renounced, and to deprive the Canadian people of that which by treaty the Canadian people lawfully acquired.

The people of the British North American Provinces ever since the year 1818 (with the exception of those periods in which the reciprocity treaty and the fishery clauses of the Washington treaty prevailed), have, at enormous expense, and with great difficulty, been protecting their fisheries against encroachments by fishermen of the United States, carried on under every form and pretext, and aided by such denunciations as Mr. Phelps has thought proper to reproduce on this occasion. They value no less now than they formerly did the rights which were secured to them by the treaty, and they are still indisposed to yield those rights, either to individual aggression or official demands.

The course of the Canadian Government, since the rescision of the fishery clauses of the Washington treaty, has been such as hardly to merit the aspersions which Mr. Phelps has used. In order to avoid irritation and to meet a desire which the Government represented by Mr. Phelps professed to entertain for the settlement of all questions which could reawaken controversy, they canceled for six months after the expiration of those clauses all the benefits which the United States fishermen had enjoyed under them, although, during that interval, the Government of the United States enforced against Canadian fishermen the laws which those fishery clauses had suspended.

Mr. Bayard, the United States Secretary of State, has made some recognition of these facts in a letter which he is reported to have written recently to the owners of the David J. Adams. He says:

"More than one year ago I sought to protect our citizens engaged in fishing from results which might attend any possible misunderstanding between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States as to the measure of their mutual rights and privileges in the territorial waters of British North America. After the termination of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, in June last, it seemed to me then, and seems to me now, very hard that differences of opinion between the two Governments should cause loss to honest citizens, whose line of obedience might be thus rendered vague and uncertain, and their property be brought into jeopardy. Influenced by this feeling, I procured a temporary arrangement which secured our fishermen full enjoyment of all Canadian fisheries, free from molestation, during a period which would permit discussion of a just international settlement of the whole fishery question; but other counsels prevailed, and my efforts further to protect fishermen from such trouble as you now suffer were unavailing."

At the end of the interval of six months the United States authorities concluded to refrain from any attempt to negotiate for larger fishery rights for their people, and they have continued to enforce their customs laws against the fishermen and people of Canada.

The least they could have been expected to do under these circumstances was to leave to the people of Canada the full and unquestioned enjoyment of the rights secured to them by treaty. The Government of Canada has simply insisted upon those rights and has presented to the legal tribunals its claim to have them enforced.

The insinuations of ulterior motives, the imputations of unfriendly dispositions, and the singularly inaccurate representation of all the leading features of the questions under discussion, may, it has been assumed, be passed by with little more comment. They are hardly likely to induce Her Majesty's Government to sacrifice the rights which they have heretofore helped our people to protect, and they are too familiar to awaken indignation or surprise.

The undersigned respectfully recommends that the substance of this memorandum, if approved, be forwarded to the secretary of state for the colonies, for the information of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR: With reference to your notes of the 19th and 20th of October last, I have the honor to transmit to you herewith copy of a dispatch from the governor-general of Canada to Her Majesty's secretary of state for the colonies relative to the cases of the American fishing vessels "Pearl Nelson" and "Everett Steele," which I am instructed by Her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs to communicate to the United States Government.

The Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Stanhope.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, December 20, 1886.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your dispatch of the 23d of November in regard to the case of the "Everett Steele" and "Pearl Nelson," recently detained at Shelburne and Arichat, Nova Scotia, for non-compliance with the customs regulations of the Dominion.

The circumstances under which the conduct of these vessels attracted the attention of the customs authorities were set out in the privy council orders of the 18th of November, certified copies of which were forwarded to you under cover of my dispatches of the 29th November.

The information contained in these documents was obtained in order to comply with the request for a report on these two cases which you had addressed to me by telegram on a previous date. I have now carefully examined the fuller statements made by Mr. Bayard, both as to the facts and as to the considerations by which the conduct of the local officials should in his opinion have been governed. You will I think find, on reference to the privy council orders already before you, that the arguments advanced by Mr. Bayard have been sufficiently met by the observations of my minister of marine and fisheries, whose reports are embodied in these orders.

It is not disputed that the "Everett Steele" was in Shelburne Harbor on the 25th March and sailed thence without reporting. In consequence of this omission on the master's part his vessel was, on her return to Shelburne, in September, detained by the collector. The master having explained that his presence in the harbor had been occasioned by stress of weather and that his failure to report was inadvertent, and this explanation having been telegraphed to the minister of marine at Ottawa, the vessel was at once allowed to proceed to sea; her release took place at noon on the day following that of her detention.

In the case of the "Pearl Nelson" it is not denied that nine of her crew were landed in Arichat Harbor at a late hour in the evening of her arrival and before the master had reported to the custom-house. It is obvious that if men were to be allowed to go on shore, under such circumstances, without notification to the authorities, great facilities would be offered for landing contraband goods, and there can be no question that the master, by permitting his men to land, was guilty of a violation of sections 25 and 180 of the customs act. There seems to be reason to doubt his statement that he was driven into Arichat by stress of weather; but, be this as it may, the fact of his having entered the harbor for a lawful purpose would not carry with it a right to evade the law to which all vessels frequenting Canadian ports are amenable. In this case, as in that of the "Everett Steele," already referred to, the statement of the master that his offense was due to inadvertence was accepted, and the fine imposed at once remitted.

I observe that in his dispatch relating to the first of these cases Mr. Bayard insists with much earnestness upon the fact that certain "prerogatives" of access to the territorial waters of the Dominion were specially reserved under the convention of 1818 to the fishermen of the United States, and that a vessel entering a Canadian harbor for any purpose coming within the terms of article 1 of that convention has as much right to be in that harbor as she would have to be upon the high seas, and he proceeds to institute a comparison between the detention of the "Everett Steele" and the wrongful seizure of a vessel on the high seas upon the suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade. Mr. Bayard further calls attention to the special consideration to which, from the circumstances of their profession, the fishermen of the United States are, in his opinion, entitled, and he dwells upon the extent of injury which would result to them if they were debarred from the exercise of any of the rights assured to them by treaty or convention.

I observe that in Sir Julian Pannefote's letter inclosed in your dispatch it is stated that the secretary of state for foreign affairs wishes to urge upon the Dominion Government the great importance of issuing stringent instructions to its officials not to interfere with any of the privileges expressly reserved to United States fishermen under Article 1 of the convention of 1818.

I trust that the explanations which I have already been able to give in regard to the cases of these vessels will have satisfied you that the facts disclosed do not show any necessity for the issuing of instructions other than those already circulated to the local officials intrusted with the execution of the customs and fishery law.

There is certainly no desire on the part of my Government (nor, I believe, does the conduct of the local officials justify the assumption that such a desire exists) to curtail in any respect the privileges enjoyed by United States fishermen in Canadian waters. It cannot on the other hand be contended that because these privileges exist, and are admitted by the Government of the Dominion, those who enjoy them are to be allowed immunity from the regulations to which all vessels resorting to Canadian waters are without exception subjected under the customs act of 1883 and the different statutes relating to the fisheries of the Dominion.

In both of the cases under consideration there was a clear and undoubted violation of the law, and the local officials would have been culpable if they had omitted to notice it. That there was no animus on their part or on that of the Canadian Government is, I think, clearly proved by the promptitude with which the circumstances were investigated and the readiness shown to overlook the offense, and to remit the penalty incurred, as soon as proof was forthcoming that the offense had been unintentionally committed. In support of this view I would draw your attention to the letter (see inclosure to my dispatch of 29th November) of Mr. Phelan, the consul-general of the United States at Halifax, who has expressed his own satisfaction at the action of the authorities in the case of the "Pearl Nelson," and who also refers to a communication received by him from the Department of State, in which it is stated that the conduct of the assistant commissioner of customs in dealing with two other cases of a somewhat similar complexion "shows a proper spirit."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 12, 1886.

SIR: * * * I have already written you asking whether from the British foreign office you could obtain a copy of the report first made by the officer in command of the Canadian vessel by whom the schooner David J. Adams was seized, and you will perceive from the reply of Mr. Graham, who represents the Canadian Government in the suit in the vice-admiralty court at Halifax, that he declines to promise to produce the reports made by these officers at the time of the seizure, in which the causes for such action would naturally be set forth.

In the course of your correspondence or conversation with Lord Iddesleigh it might be well to draw his attention to the difficulties thrown in the way of the American fishermen in not being permitted to learn the nature and extent of the offense with which they were charged, and so be compelled to go to trial without those certainties of allegation which are held in courts of justice to be incumbent upon the claimant before he is entitled to recover in any suit.

It really appears that this method of Canadian procedure is belittling the important principles involved in the international question now under consideration between the United States and Great Britain.

I am, &c.,

T. F. BAYARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, December 3, 1886. (Received December 14.)

SIR: Referring to your several instructions on the subject of the Canadian fisheries, numbered, respectively, 452 * * * I have the honor to inform you that on the 27th November I addressed a note to Lord Iddesleigh, Her Majesty's secretary of state for foreign affairs, inclosing a copy of your instructions, No. 452, relative to the case of the "Marion Grimes."

On the 30th November I had an interview with his lordship, in which the subject of the instruction above mentioned was discussed.

On the 2d December I addressed to him another note in pursuance of instruction No. 458, asking that the solicitors for the owners of the fishing vessel "David J. Adams" may be furnished, for use in the suit concerning that vessel now pending at Halifax, with copies of the original reports mentioned in that instruction, showing the charges upon which the seizure was originally made.

I have this day received from Lord Iddesleigh a note, dated November 30, in reply to mine addressed to him on the 11th of September last, on the subject of the same fisheries, a copy of which has heretofore been transmitted to you.

And I have now sent a note to Lord Iddesleigh acknowledging the receipt of his communication, and saying that I should at an early date submit to him some considerations in reply.

I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of my notes above referred to, dated November 27, December 2, and of Lord Iddesleigh's note of November 30.

I have, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, November 27, 1886.

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an instruction, under date of November 6, 1886, received by me from the Secretary of State of the United States, relative to the case of the United States fishing vessel the "Marion Grimes."

The subject is so fully presented in this document, a copy of which I am authorized by the Secretary to place in the hands of your lordship, that I can add nothing to what is therein set forth, except to request your lordship's early attention to the case, which appears to be a very flagrant violation of the rights secured to American fishermen under the treaty of 1818.

I have, &c.,

C. J. PHELPS.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 393.]

Mr. Phelps to Lord Iddesleigh.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, December 2, 1886.

MY LORD: Referring to the conversation I had the honor to hold with your lordship on the 30th November, relative to the request of my Government that the owners of the "David J. Adams" may be furnished with a copy of the original reports, stating the charges on which that vessel was seized by the Canadian authorities, I desire now to place before you in writing the grounds upon which this request is preferred.

It will be in the recollection of your lordship, from the previous correspondence relative to the case of the Adams, that the vessel was first taken possession of for the alleged offense of having purchased a small quantity of bait within the port of Digby, in Nova Scotia, to be used in lawful fishing. That later on a further charge was made against the vessel of a violation of some custom-house regulation, which it is not claimed, so far as I can learn, was ever before insisted on in a similar case. I think I have made it clear in my note of the 2d of June last, addressed to Lord Rosebery, then foreign secretary, that no act of the English or of the Canadian Parliament existed at the time of this seizure which legally justified it on the ground of the purchase of bait, even if such an act would have been authorized by the treaty of 1818. And it is a natural and strong inference, as I have in that communication pointed out, that the charge of violation of custom-house regulations was an afterthought, brought forward in order to sustain proceedings commenced on a different charge and found untenable.

In the suit that is now going on in the admiralty court at Halifax, for the purpose of condemning the vessel, still further charges have been added. And the Government of Canada seek to avail themselves of a clause in the act of the Canadian Parliament of May 22, 1868, which is in these words: "In case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made or as to whether the person seizing was or was not authorized to seize under this act * * * the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be on the owner or claimant."

I cannot quote this provision without saying that it is, in my judgment, in violation of the principles of natural justice, as well as of those of the common law. That a man should be charged by police or executive officers with the commission of an offense and then be condemned upon trial unless he can prove himself to be innocent is a proposition that is incompatible with the fundamental ideas upon which the administration of justice proceeds. But it is sought in the present case to carry the proposition much further, and to hold that the party inculpated must not only prove himself innocent of the offense on which his vessel was seized, but also of all other charges upon which it might have been seized that may be afterwards brought forward and set up at the trial.

Conceiving that if the clause I have quoted from the act of 1868 can have effect (if allowed any effect at all) only upon the charge on which the vessel was originally seized, and that seizure for one offense cannot be regarded as prima facie evidence of guilt of another, the counsel for the owners of the vessel have applied to the prosecuting officers to be furnished with a copy of the reports made to the Government of Canada in connection with the seizure of the vessel, either by Captain Scott, the seizing officer, or by the collector of customs at Digby, in order that it might be known to the defendant and be shown on trial what the charges are on which the seizure was grounded, and which the defendant is required to disprove. This most reasonable request has been refused by the prosecuting officers.

Under these circumstances, I am instructed by my Government to request of Her Majesty's Government that the solicitors for the owners of the "David J. Adams" in the suit pending in Halifax may be furnished, for the purposes of the trial thereof, with copies of the reports above mentioned. And I beg to remind your lordship that there is no time to be lost in giving the proper direction if it is to be in season for the trial, which, as I am informed, is being pressed.

I have, &c.,

E. J. PHELPS.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 393.]

The Earl of Idlesleigh to Mr. Phelps.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 30, 1886.

SIR: I have given my careful consideration to the contents of the note of the 11th September last, which you were good enough to address to me in reply to mine of the 1st of the same month, on the subject of the North American fisheries.

The question, as you are aware, has for some time past engaged the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government, and the notes which have been addressed to you in relation to it, both by my predecessor and by himself, have amply evinced the earnest desire of Her Majesty's Government to arrive at some equitable settlement of the controversy. It is, therefore, with feelings of disappointment that they do not find in your note under reply any indication of a wish on the part of your Government to enter upon negotiations based on the principle of mutual concessions, but rather a suggestion that some ad interim construction of the terms of the existing treaty should, if possible, be reached, which might for the present remove the chance of disputes; in fact, that Her Majesty's Government, in order to allay the differences which have arisen, should temporarily abandon the exercise of the treaty rights which they claim, and which they conceive to be indisputable. For Her Majesty's Government are unable to perceive any ambiguity in the terms of Article I of the convention of 1818, nor have they as yet been informed in what respects the construction placed upon that instrument by the Government of the United States differs from their own. They would, therefore, be glad to learn in the first place whether the Government of the United States contest that, by Article I of the convention, United States fishermen are prohibited from entering British North American bays or harbors on those parts of the coast, referred to in the second part of the article in question, for any purposes save those of shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water.

Before proceeding to make some observations upon the other points dealt with in your note, I have the honor to state that I do not propose in the present communication to refer to the cases of the schooners "Thomas F. Bayard" and "Mascoot," to which you allude.

The privileges manifestly secured to United States fishermen by the convention of 1818 in Newfoundland, Labrador, and the Magdalen Islands are not contested by Her Majesty's Government, who, whilst determined to uphold the rights of Her Majesty's North American subjects, as defined in the convention, are no less anxious and resolved to maintain in their full integrity the facilities for prosecuting the fishing industry on certain limited portions of the coast which are expressly granted to citizens of the United States. The communications on the subject of these two schooners, which I have requested Her Majesty's minister at Washington to address commission of an offence upon which the defendant must not only prove himself innocent, but also of all other offences afterwards brought for.

aged the serious attention been addressed to you have amply evinced the equitable settlement of the fact that they do not part of your Government concessions, but rather of the existing treaty remove the chance of display the differences which treaty rights which they Her Majesty's Government of the convention of the construction placed as differs from their own. whether the Government of ion, United States fisheries or harbors on those article in question, for any wood, and obtaining water. her points dealt with in the present communication and "Mascot," to which men by the convention of and are not contested by uphold the rights of Her Majesty, are no less anxious for prosecuting the fisheries expressly granted to be the subject of these two at Washington to address to Mr. Bayard, cannot, I think, have failed to afford to your Government satisfactory assurance in this respect.

Reverting now to your note under reply, I beg to offer the following observations on its contents:

In the first place, you take exception to my predecessor having declined to discuss the case of the "David J. Adams," on the ground that it was still sub judice, and you state that your Government are unable to accede to the proposition contained in my note of the 1st of September last, to the effect that "it is clearly right, according to practice and precedent, that such diplomatic action should be suspended pending the completion of the judicial inquiry."

In regard to this point, it is to be remembered that there are three questions calling for investigation in the case of the "David J. Adams:"

(1) What were the acts committed which led to the seizure of the vessel?

(2) Was her seizure for such acts warranted by any existing laws?

(3) If so, are those laws in derogation of the treaty rights of the United States?

It is evident that the first two questions must be the subject of inquiry before the third can be profitably discussed, and that those two questions can only be satisfactorily disposed of by a judicial inquiry. Far from claiming that the United States Government would be bound by the construction which the British tribunals might place on the treaty, I stated in my note of the 1st September that if that decision should be adverse to the views of your Government it would not preclude further discussion between the two Governments and the adjustment of the question by diplomatic action.

I may further remark that the very proposition advanced in my note of the 1st of September last, and to which exception is taken in your reply, has, on a previous occasion, been distinctly asserted by the Government of the United States under precisely similar circumstances, that is to say, in 1870, in relation to the seizure of American fishing vessels in Canadian waters for alleged violation of the convention of 1818.

In a dispatch of the 29th of October, 1870, to Mr. W. A. Dart, United States consul-general at Montreal (which is printed at page 431 of the volume for that year of the Foreign Relations of the United States, and which formed part of the correspondence referred to by Mr. Bayard in his note to Sir L. West of the 20th of May last), Mr. Fish expressed himself as follows:

"It is the duty of the owners of the vessels to defend their interests before the courts at their own expense, and without special assistance from the Government at this stage of affairs. It is for those tribunals to construe the statutes under which they act. If the construction they adopt shall appear to be in contravention of our treaties with Great Britain, or to be (which cannot be anticipated) plainly erroneous in a case admitting of no reasonable doubt, it will then become the duty of the Government—a duty which it will not be slow to discharge—to avail itself of all necessary means for obtaining redress."

Her Majesty's Government, therefore, still adhere to their view that any diplomatic discussion as to the legality of the seizure of the "David J. Adams" would be premature until the case has been judicially decided.

It is further stated in your note that "the absence of any statute authorizing proceedings or providing a penalty against American fishing vessels for purchasing bait or supplies in a Canadian port to be used in lawful fishing" affords "the most satisfactory evidence that up to the time of the present controversy no such construction has been given to the treaty by the British or by the colonial parliament as is now sought to be maintained."

Her Majesty's Government are quite unable to accede to this view, and I must express my regret that no reply has yet been received from your Government to the arguments on this and all the other points in controversy, which are contained in the able and elaborate report (as you courteously describe it) of the Canadian minister of marine and fisheries, of which my predecessor communicated to you a copy.

In that report reference is made to the argument of Mr. Bayard, drawn from the fact that the proposal of the British negotiators of the convention of 1818, to the effect that American fishing vessels should carry no merchandise, was rejected by the American negotiators; and it is shown that the above proposal had no application to American vessels resorting to the Canadian coasts, but only to those exercising the right of inshore fishing and of landing for the drying and curing of fish on parts of the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador.

The report, on the other hand, shows that the United States negotiators proposed that the right of "procuring bait" should be added to the enumeration of the four objects for which the United States fishing vessels might be allowed to enter Canadian waters; and that such proposal was rejected by the British negotiators, thus showing that there could be no doubt in the minds of either party at the time that the "procuring of bait" was prohibited by the terms of the article. The report, moreover, recalls the important fact that the United States Government admitted, in the case submitted by them before the Halifax Commission in 1877, that neither the convention of 1818 nor the treaty of Washington conferred any right or privilege of trading on American fishermen; that the "various incidental and reciprocal advantages of the treaty, such as the privileges of traffic, purchasing bait and other supplies are not the subject of compensation, because the treaty of Washington confers no such rights on the inhabitants of the United States, who now enjoy them merely by sufferance, and who cannot at any time be deprived of them."

This view was confirmed by the ruling of the commissioners. Whilst I have felt myself bound to place the preceding observations before you in reply to the arguments contained in your note, I beg leave to say that Her Majesty's Government would willingly have left such points of technical detail and construction for the consideration of a commission properly constituted to examine them, as well as to suggest a means for either modifying their application or substituting for them some new arrangement of a mutually satisfactory nature.

I gather, however, from your note that, in the opinion of your Government, although a revision of treaty stipulations on the basis of mutual concessions was desired by the United States before the present disputes arose, yet the present time is inopportune for various reasons, among which you mention the irritation created in the United States by the belief that the action of the Canadian Government has had for its object to force a new treaty on your Government.

Her Majesty's Government learn with much regret that such an impression should prevail, for every effort has been made by the Canadian Government to promote a friendly negotiation and to obviate the differences which have now arisen. Indeed, it is hardly necessary to remind you that, for six months following the denunciation by your Government of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, the North American fisheries were thrown open to citizens of the United States without any equivalent, in the expectation that the American Government would show their willingness to treat the question in a similar spirit of amity and good will.

Her Majesty's Government cannot but express a hope that the whole correspondence may be laid immediately before Congress, as they believe that its perusal would influence public opinion in the United States in favor of negotiating, before the commencement of the next fishing season, an arrangement based on mutual concessions, and which would therefore (to use the language of your note) "consist with the dignity, the interests, and the friendly relations of the two countries."

Her Majesty's Government cannot conceive that negotiations commenced with such an object and in such a spirit could fail to be successful; and they trust, therefore, that your Government will endeavor to obtain from Congress, which is about to assemble, the necessary powers to enable them to make to Her Majesty's Government some definite proposals for the negotiation of a mutually advantageous arrangement.

Further notice to British fishermen with respect to the exclusive fishery limits of France.

The French Government have intimated to Her Majesty's Government that the recent detention of English oyster smacks which entered Havre to pass Sunday there in fine weather, was effected by the maritime authority at that port for an infraction of Articles LXXXV and LXXXVI of the International Fishery Regulations of May 24, 1843, and that the minister of marine in Paris, on learning the circumstances, directed that the smacks should be immediately released, in consequence of the toleration which has for a long time existed in the United Kingdom and France as regards not enforcing the strict observance of these articles.

The French Government have given special instructions for preventing a recurrence of like circumstances, without a preliminary reference on the part of the authority at the port to the ministry of marine.

The French Government have further intimated that, in the event of their finding that the maintenance of the existing toleration gives rise to inconvenience, notice will be given to Her Majesty's Government, so as to allow of the latter issuing timely warning to British fishermen. SIR: On the 8th instant I received from the British minister at this capital a communication dated the 7th of this month, accompanied by a copy of the minutes of the honorable privy council of Canada, in relation to the action of Captain Quigley, of the Canadian cutter "Terror," in lowering the flag of the United States fishing schooner "Marion Grimes" whilst under detention by the customs authorities in Shelburne harbor, on the 11th of October last.

As this occurrence had been made the subject of an instruction to you by me, on the 6th ultimo, whereby you were requested to bring the incident to the attention of Her Majesty's Government, I hasten to inform you of the voluntary action of the Canadian Government, and of their expression of regret for the action of the officer referred to.

The copy of the correspondence and proceedings of the Canadian authorities discloses the dates of their action in the premises, of which, however, my earliest information was on the 8th instant, in the note of Sir Lionel West, a copy of which is herewith sent to you.

SIR: Referring to your instructions numbered 450 of October 29 and 458 of November 12, and also to my dispatch numbered 393 of December 3, I have the honor to inclose herewith the copy of a note which I have just received from the Earl of Iddesleigh in reply to mine of December 2 to his lordship, asking that the owners of the "David J. Adams" be furnished with copies of the original reports stating the charges on which that vessel was seized by the Canadian authorities. A copy of the latter note formed inclosure to my dispatch No. 393 aforesaid.

You will observe that Her Majesty's Government have not seen fit to interfere in the matter.

I have, &c.,

E. J. PHELPS.

[Inclosure in No. 416.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, January 11, 1887.

SIR: Her Majesty's Government have considered the request contained in your note of the 2d ultimo, to the effect that the owners of the "David J. Adams" may be furnished with copies of the original reports stating the charges on which that vessel was seized by the Canadian authorities; and I have now the honor to state to you that if the owners of this vessel are legally entitled to be furnished with those reports they can obtain them by the process of the courts; and there seems no ground for the interference of Her Majesty's Government with the ordinary course of justice.

As regards the means of obtaining information for the purposes of the defense, I would point out that in the report of the Canadian minister of marine and fishery, of which a copy was communicated to you on the 23d July last, it is stated that from a date immediately after the seizure "there was not the slightest difficulty in the United States consul-general, and those interested in the vessel, obtaining the fullest information," and that, "apart from the general knowledge of the offenses which it was claimed the master had committed, and which was furnished at the time of the seizure, the most technical and precise details were readily obtainable at the registry of the court, and from the solicitors of the Crown."

With respect to the statement in your note that a clause in the Canadian act of May 22, 1868, to the effect that, "In case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made, or as to whether the person seizing was or was not authorized to seize under this act, the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be on the owner or claimant," is in violation of the principles of national justice, as well as of those of the common law, I have to observe that the statute referred to is cap. 61 of 1868, which provides for the issue of licenses to foreign fishing vessels, and for the forfeiture of such vessels fishing without a license; and that the provisions of Article 10, to which you take exception, are commonly found in laws against smuggling, and are based on the rule of law that a man who pleads that he holds a license or other similar document shall be put to the proof of his plea and required to produce the document.

I beg leave to add that the provisions of that statute, so far as they relate to the issue of licenses, has been in operation since the year 1870.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, January 27, 1887.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 416, of the 12th instant, transmitting a copy of the note, dated the 11th, received by you from the late Lord Idlesleigh, in response to your note of December 2, 1886, requesting copies of the papers in the case of the "David J. Adams," has been received.

* * * * *

The concluding part of Lord Idlesleigh's note seems to demand attention, inasmuch as the argument employed to justify the provisions of Article 10 of the Canadian Statutes, cap. 61 of 1868, which throw on the claimant the burden of proving the illegality of a seizure, appears to rest upon the continued operation of Article 1 of that statute, relative to the issue of licenses to foreign fishing vessels. The note in question states "that the provisions of that statute, so far as they relate to the issue of licenses, has [have?] been in operation since the year 1870."

It appears from the correspondence exchanged in 1870 between this Department and Her Majesty's minister in Washington (see the volume of Foreign Relations, 1870, pp. 407-411) that on the 8th of January, 1870, an order in council of the Canadian Government decreed "that the system of granting fishing license to foreign vessels under the act 31 Vic., cap. 61, be discontinued, and that henceforth all foreign fishermen be prevented from fishing in the waters of Canada."

During the continuance of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington Canadian fishing licenses were not required for fishermen of the United States, and since the termination of those articles, July 1, 1885, this Department has not been advised of the resumption of the licensing system under the statute aforesaid.

The faulty construction of the last paragraph of Lord Iddesleigh's note, as transmitted with your No. 416, suggests the possibility of a clerical error in the preparation or transcription of that note, and that it may have been intended to state that the licensing provisions of the Statute, cap. 61, 1869, "have not been in operation since 1870," but in that case it is not easy to apply the argument advanced.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 27th ultimo relative to the case of the "Marion Grimes," stated to have been fined and detained at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in October last.

As other cases besides that of the "Marion Grimes" are alluded to in the documents forwarded in your note, it will be desirable to take each case separately, and inform you shortly of the steps which Her Majesty's Government have taken in regard to them.

In respect to the case of the "Marion Grimes," I have already received, through Her Majesty's secretary of state for the colonies, a copy of a dispatch from the Dominion Government, in which they express their regret at the action taken by Captain Quigley in hauling down the United States flag. I have transmitted a copy of this dispatch to Her Majesty's minister at Washington, with instructions to communicate it to Mr. Bayard, and I beg leave to now inclose a copy of it for your information.

Her Majesty's Government cannot doubt that, as respects the incident of the flag, the apology thus spontaneously tendered by the Canadian Government will be accepted by the United States Government in the friendly and conciliatory disposition in which it is offered, whilst as regards the other statements concerning Captain Quigley's conduct, Her Majesty's Government do not at present feel themselves in a position to express any opinion.

The Dominion Government have been requested to furnish a full report on the various circumstances alleged, and when this is received I shall have the honor to address a further communication to you upon the subject.

As concerns the case of the "Julia Ellen" and "Shiloh," it will probably suffice to communicate to you the inclosed copies of reports from the Canadian Government relative to these two vessels. These reports have already been sent to Her Majesty's minister at Washington for communication to Mr. Bayard.

The protest made by the United States Government in the case of the "Everett Steele" was not received in this country until the 1st ultimo; and although the Canadian Government have been requested by telegraph to furnish a report upon the circumstances alleged, sufficient time has not yet elapsed to enable Her Majesty's Government to be in possession of the facts as reported by the Dominion Government.

Her Majesty's Government greatly regret that incidents of the description alluded to should occur, and they can only renew the assurance conveyed to you in my note of the 30th ultimo, that whilst firmly resolved to uphold the undoubted treaty rights of Her Majesty's North American subjects in regard to the fisheries, they will also equally maintain the undoubted rights of United States fishermen to obtain shelter in Canadian ports, under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their abusing the privileges reserved to them by treaty.

I notice that in Mr. Bayard's note to you of the 6th ultimo, concerning the case of the "Marion Grimes," and also in his note to Sir L. West of the 19th October last, relative to the case of the "Everett Steele," an old discussion is revived which Her Majesty's Government had hoped was finally disposed of by the correspondence which took place on the subject in 1815 and 1816.

I allude to the argument that a right to the common enjoyment of the fisheries by Great Britain and the United States, after the separation of the latter from the mother country, was recognised by the treaty of 1783, although the exercise of that right was made subject to certain restrictions. I refer to this point merely to observe that the views of Her Majesty's Government in relation to it have not been modified in any way since the date of Lord Bathurst's note of the 30th of October, 1815, to Mr. John Quincy Adams.

SIR: With reference to my predecessor's note of the 30th of November last, I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a report from the Canadian minister of justice upon the seizure of the American fishing vessel "David J. Adams."

[Inclosure 3 in No. 423.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, January 26, 1887.

MY LORD: Various circumstances have rendered inconvenient an earlier reply to Lord Idlesleigh's note of November 12 on the subject of the North American fisheries, and the termination of the fishing season has postponed the more immediate necessity of the discussion; but it seems now very important that before the commencement of another season a distinct understanding should be reached between the United States Government and that of Her Majesty relative to the course to be pursued by the Canadian authorities towards American vessels.

It is not without surprise that I have read Lord Idlesleigh's remark, in the note above mentioned, referring to the treaty of 1818, that Her Majesty's Government "have not as yet been informed in what respect the construction placed upon that instrument by the Government of the United States differs from their own."

Had his lordship perused more attentively my note to his predecessor in office, Lord Rosebery, under date of June 2, 1886, to which reference was made in my note to Lord Idlesleigh of September 11, 1886, I think he could not have failed to apprehend distinctly the construction of that treaty for which the United States Government contends and the reasons and arguments upon which it is founded.

I have again respectfully to refer your lordship to my note to Lord Rosebery of June 2, 1886, for a very full and, I hope, clear exposition of the ground taken by the United States Government on that point. It is unnecessary to repeat it, and I am unable to add to it.

In reply to the observations in my note to Lord Iddesleigh of September 11, 1886, on the point whether such discussion should be suspended in these cases until the result of the judicial proceedings in respect to them should be made known, a proposition to which, as I stated in that note, the United States Government is unable to accede, his lordship cites in support of it some language of Mr. Fish, when Secretary of State of the United States, addressed to the United States consul-general at Montreal in May, 1870. From the view then expressed by Mr. Fish the United States Government has neither disposition nor occasion to dissent. But it cannot regard it as in any way applicable to the present case.

It is true beyond question that when a private vessel is seized for an alleged infraction of the laws of the country in which the seizure takes place, and the fact of the infraction, or the exact legal construction of the local statute claimed to be transgressed, is in dispute, and is in process of determination by the proper tribunal, the Government to which the vessel belongs will not usually interfere in advance of such determination and before acquiring the information on which it depends. And especially when it is not yet informed whether the conduct of the officer making the seizure will not be repudiated by the Government under which he acts, so that interference will be unnecessary. This is all, in effect, that was said by Mr. Fish on that occasion. In language immediately following that quoted by Lord Iddesleigh he remarks as follows (italics being mine):

"The present embarrassment is that while we have reports of several seizures upon grounds as stated by the interested parties, which seem to be in contravention of international law and special treaties relating to the fisheries, these alleged causes of seizure are regarded as pretensions of over zealous officers of the British navy and the colonial vessels, which will, as we hope and are bound in courtesy to expect, be repudiated by the courts, before which our vessels are to be brought for adjudication."

But in the present case the facts constituting the alleged infraction by the vessel seized are not in dispute, except some circumstances of alleged aggravation not material to the validity of the seizure. The original ground of the seizure was the purchase by the master of the vessel of a small quantity of bait from an inhabitant of Nova Scotia, to be used in lawful fishing. This purchase is not denied by the owners of the vessel, and the United States Government insists, first, that such an act is not in violation of the treaty of 1818, and second, that no then existing statute in Great Britain or Canada authorized any proceedings against the vessel for such an act, even if it could be regarded as in violation of the terms of the treaty, and no such statute has been as yet produced.

In respect to the charge subsequently brought against the Adams, and upon which many other vessels have been seized, that of a technical violation of the customs act, in omitting to report at the custom-house, though having no business at the port (and in some instances where the vessel seized was not within several miles of the landing), the United States Government claim, while not admitting that the omission to report was even a technical transgression of the act, that even if it were, no harm having been done or intended, the proceedings against the vessels for an inadvertence of that sort were in a high degree harsh, unreasonable and unfriendly, especially as for many years no such effect has been given to the act in respect to the fishing vessels, and no previous notice of a change in its construction has been promulgated.

It seems apparent, therefore, that the cases in question, as they are to be considered between the two Governments, present no points upon which the decision of the courts of Nova Scotia need be awaited or would be material.

Nor is it any longer open to the United States Government to anticipate that the acts complained of will (as said by Mr. Fish in the dispatch above quoted) be repudiated as the "pretensions of overzealous officers of the * * * colonial vessels," because they have been so many times repeated as to constitute a regular system of procedure, have been directed and approved by the Canadian Government, and have been in no wise disapproved or restrained by Her Majesty's Government, though repeatedly and earnestly protested against on the part of the United States.

It is therefore to Her Majesty's Government alone that the United States Government can look for consideration and redress. It cannot consent to become, directly or indirectly, a party to the proceedings complained of, nor to await their termination before the questions involved between the two Governments shall be dealt with. Those questions appear to the United States Government to stand upon higher grounds, and to be determined, in large part, at least, upon very different considerations from those upon which the courts of Nova Scotia must proceed in the pending litigation.

Lord Iddesleigh, in the note above referred to, proceeds to express regret that no reply has yet been received from the United States Government to the arguments on all the points in controversy contained in the report of the Canadian minister of marine and fisheries, of which Lord Rosebery had sent me a copy.

Inasmuch as Lord Iddesleigh and his predecessor, Lord Rosebery, have declined altogether, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to discuss these questions until the cases in which they arise shall have been judicially decided, and as the very elaborate arguments on the subject previously submitted by the United States Government, remain, therefore without reply it is not easy to perceive why further discussion of it on the part of the United States should be expected. So soon as Her Majesty's Government consent to enter upon the consideration of the points involved, any suggestions it may advance will receive immediate and respectful attention on the part of the United States. Till then further argument on that side would seem to be neither consistent nor proper.

Still less can the United States Government consent to be drawn, at any time, into a discussion of the subject with the colonial Government of Canada. The treaty in question, and all the international relations arising out of it, exist, only between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, and between those Governments only can they be dealt with. If, in entering upon that consideration of the subject which the United States have insisted upon, the arguments contained in the report of the Canadian minister should be advanced by Her Majesty's Government, I do not conceive that they will be found difficult to answer.

Two suggestions contained in that report are, however, specially noticed by Lord Iddesleigh, as being "in reply" to the arguments contained in my note. In quoting the substance of the contentions of the Canadian minister on the particular points referred to, I do not understand his lordship to depart from the conclusion of Her Majesty's Government he had previously announced, declining to enter upon the discussion of the cases in which the questions arise. He presents the observations of the report only as those of the Canadian minister made in the argument of points upon which Her Majesty's Government decline at present to enter.

I do not, therefore, feel called upon to make any answer to these suggestions; and more especially as it seems obvious that the subject cannot usefully be discussed upon one or two suggestions appertaining to it, and considered by themselves alone. While those mentioned by Lord Iddesleigh have undoubtedly their place in the general argument, it will be seen that they leave quite untouched most of the propositions and reasoning set forth in my note to Lord Rosebery above mentioned. It appears to me that the question cannot be satisfactorily treated aside from the cases in which they arise, and that when discussed the whole subject must be gone into in its entirety.

The United States Government is not able to concur in the favorable view taken by Lord Iddesleigh of the efforts of the Canadian Government "to promote a friendly negotiation." That the conduct of that Government has been directed to obtaining a revision of the existing treaty is not to be doubted; but its efforts have been of such a character as to preclude the prospect of a successful negotiation so long as they continue, and seriously to endanger the friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain.

Aside from the question as to the right of American vessels to purchase bait in Canadian ports, such a construction has been given to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain as amounts virtually to a declaration of almost complete non-intercourse with American vessels. The usual comity between friendly nations has been refused in their case, and in one instance, at least, the ordinary offices of humanity. The treaty of friendship and amity which, in return for very important concessions by the United States to Great Britain, reserved to the American vessels certain specified privileges has been construed to exclude them from all other intercourse common to civilized life and to universal maritime usage among nations not at war, as well as from the right to touch and trade accorded to all other vessels.

And quite aside from any question arising upon construction of the treaty, the provisions of the custom-house acts and regulations have been systematically enforced against American ships for alleged petty and technical violations of legal requirements in a manner so unreasonable, unfriendly, and unjust as to render the privileges accorded by the treaty practically nugatory.

It is not for a moment contended by the United States Government that American vessels should be exempt from those reasonable port and custom-house regulations which are in force in countries which such vessels have occasion to visit. If they choose to violate such requirements, their Government will not attempt to screen them from the just legal consequences.

But what the United States Government complain of in these cases is that existing regulations have been construed with a technical strictness, and enforced with a severity, in cases of inadvertent and accidental violation where no harm was done, which is both unusual and unnecessary, whereby the voyages of vessels have been broken up and heavy penalties incurred. That the liberal and reasonable construction of these laws that had prevailed for many years, and to which the fishermen had become accustomed, was changed without any notice given. And that every opportunity of unnecessary interference with the American fishing vessels, to the prejudice and destruction of their business, has been availed of. Whether, in any of these cases, a technical violation of some requirement of law had, upon close and severe construction, taken place, it is not easy to determine. But if such rules were generally enforced in such a manner in the ports of the world, no vessel could sail in safety without carrying a solicitor versed in the intricacies of revenue and port regulations.

It is unnecessary to specify the various cases referred to, as the facts in many of them have been already laid before her Majesty's Government.

Since the receipt of Lord Idlesleigh's note the United States Government has learned with grave regret that Her Majesty's assent has been given to the act of the Parliament of Canada, passed at its late session, entitled "An act further to amend the act respecting fishing by foreign vessels," which has been the subject of observation in the previous correspondence on the subject between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain.

By the provisions of this act any foreign ship, vessel, or boat (whether engaged in fishing or not) found within any harbor in Canada, or within 3 marine miles of "any of the coasts, bays, or creeks of Canada," may be brought into port by any of the officers or persons mentioned in the act, her cargo searched, and her master examined upon oath touching the cargo and voyage under a heavy penalty if the questions asked are not truly answered; and if such ship has entered such waters "for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention or by law of the United Kingdom or of Canada, for the time being in force, such ship, vessel, or boat and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo thereof shall be forfeited."

It has been pointed out in my note to Lord Idlesleigh, above mentioned, that the 3-mile limit referred to in this act is claimed by the Canadian Government to include considerable portions of the high seas, such as the Bay of Fundy, the Bay of Chaleur, and similar waters, by drawing the line from headland to headland, and that American fishermen had been excluded from those waters accordingly.

It has been seen also that the term "any purpose not permitted by treaty" is held by that Government to comprehend every possible act of human intercourse, except only the four purposes named in the treaty—shelter, repairs, wood, and water.

Under the provisions of the recent act, therefore, and the Canadian interpretation of the treaty, any American fishing vessel that may venture into a Canadian harbor, or may have occasion to pass through the very extensive waters thus comprehended, may be seized at the discretion of any one of numerous subordinate officers, carried into port, subjected to search and the examination of her master upon oath, her voyage broken up, and the vessel and cargo confiscated, if it shall be determined by the local authorities that she has ever even posted or received a letter or landed a passenger in any part of Her Majesty's dominions in America.

And it is publicly announced in Canada that a larger fleet of cruisers is being prepared by the authorities, and that greater vigilance will be exerted on their part in the next fishing season than in the last.

It is in the act to which the one above referred to is an amendment that is found the provision to which I drew attention in a note to Lord Idlesleigh of December 2, 1886, by which it is enacted that in case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made, the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be upon the owner or claimant.

In his reply to that note of January, 11, 1887, his lordship intimates that this provision is intended only to impose upon a person claiming a license the burden of proving it. But a reference to the act shows that such is by no means the restriction of the enactment. It refers in the broadest and clearest terms to any seizure that is made under the provisions of the act, which covers the whole subject of protection against illegal fishing; and it applies not only to the proof of a license to fish, but to all questions of fact whatever, necessary to a determination as to the legality of a seizure or the authority of the person making it.

It is quite unnecessary to point out what grave embarrassments may arise in the relations between the United States and Great Britain under such administration as is reasonably to be expected of the extraordinary provisions of this act and its amendment, upon which it is not important at this time further to comment.

It will be for Her Majesty's Government to determine how far its sanction and support will be given to further proceedings, such as the United States Government have now repeatedly complained of and have just ground to apprehend may be continued by the Canadian authorities.

It was with the earnest desire of obviating the impending difficulty, and of preventing collisions and dispute until such time as a permanent understanding between the two Governments could be reached, that I suggested, on the part of the United States, in my note to Lord Idlesleigh of September 11, 1886, that an ad interim construction of the terms of the treaty might be agreed on, to be carried out by instructions to be given on both sides without prejudice to the ultimate claims of either, and terminable at the pleasure of either. In an interview I had the honor to have with his Lordship, in which this suggestion was discussed, I derived the impression that he regarded it with favor. An outline of such an arrangement was therefore subsequently prepared by the United States Government, which, at the request of Lord Iddesleigh, was submitted to him.

But I observe, with some surprise, that in his note of November 30, last, his lordship refers to that proposal made in my note of 11th September, as a proposition that Her Majesty's Government "should temporarily abandon the exercise of the treaty rights which they claim and which they conceive to be indisputable."

In view of the very grave questions that exist as to the extent of those rights, in respect to which the views of the United States Government differ so widely from those insisted upon by Her Majesty's Government, it does not seem to me an unreasonable proposal that the two Governments, by a temporary and mutual concession, without prejudice, should endeavor to reach some middle ground of ad interim construction, by which existing friendly relations might be preserved, until some permanent treaty arrangements could be made.

The reasons why a revision of the treaty of 1818 cannot now, in the opinion of the United States Government, be hopefully undertaken, and which are set forth in my note to Lord Iddesleigh of September 11, have increased in force since that note was written.

I again respectfully commend the proposal above mentioned to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

I have, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: I received on the 29th ultimo a reply from the British minister at this capital to my notes to him of the 19th and 20th of October last relative to the cases of the American fishing vessels "Pearl Nelson" and "Everett Steele."

The note of Sir Lionel West serves only to inclose the communication of the Marquis of Lansdowne to Mr. Stanhope. Whilst the letter of Lord Lansdowne proceeds upon the assumption of grounds never accepted by this Government as the basis of discussion of the rights of our fishermen, and fails to admit the obvious and essential right of American fishermen to resort for purposes not abusive of the ancient privileges guaranteed by the treaty of 1818, in the Canadian bays and harbors, yet I am glad to see that the tone of his discussion indicates the growth of a disposition to consider the case of the American fishermen in a more friendly light than heretofore in the discussions of the past season.

The letters will be communicated to Congress as supplementary to the information heretofore laid before them by the President.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 8, 1887.—Ordered to be printed.

MR. EDMUNDS submitted the following

COMMUNICATION FROM SPENCER F. BAIRD, UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

U. S. COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1887.

SIR: I forward herewith, for your information, a copy of a communication from Mr. R. Edward Earll, in charge of the Division of Fisheries of this Commission, accompanied by a list of New England fishing vessels which have been inconvenienced in their fishing operations by the Canadian authorities during the past season; these being in addition to the vessels mentioned in the revised list of vessels involved in the controversy with the Canadian authorities, furnished to your committee on January 26 by the Secretary of State.

The papers containing the statements were received from the owners, masters, or agents of the vessels concerned, and, though not accompanied by affidavits, are believed to be correct.

Very respectfully, yours,

SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Commissioner.

HON. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

U. S. COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1887.

SIR: Some time since, at your request, I mailed circulars to owners or agents of all New England vessels employed in the food-fish fisheries. These called for full statistics of the vessels' operations during the year 1886, and, in addition, for statements of any inconveniences to which the vessels had been subjected by the recent action of the Canadian Government in denying to American fishing vessels the right to buy bait, ice, or other supplies in its ports, or in placing unusual restrictions on the use of its harbors for shelter.

A very large percentage of the replies to these circulars have already been received, and an examination of same shows that, in addition to the vessels mentioned in the revised list transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate on January 26, 1887, sixty-eight other New England fishing vessels have been subjected to treatment which neither the treaty of 1818 nor the principles of international law would seem to warrant.

I inclose for your consideration a list of these vessels, together with a brief abstract of the statements of the owners or masters regarding the treatment received. The statements were not accompanied by affidavits, but are believed to be entirely reliable. The name and address of the informant are given in each instance.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. EDWARD EARLL,
In Charge Division of Fisheries.

Prof. SPENCER F. BAIRD,
U. S. Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

PARTIAL LIST OF VESSELS INVOLVED IN THE FISHERIES CONTROVERSY WITH THE CANADIAN AUTHORITIES, FROM INFORMATION FURNISHED TO THE UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

[Supplementing a list transmitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, by the Secretary of State, January 26, 1887.]

- Eliza A. Thomas* (schooner).—Portland, Me.; E. S. Bibbs, master. Wrecked on Nova Scotia shore, and unable to obtain assistance. Crew not permitted to land or to save anything until permission was received from captain of cutter. Canadian officials placed guard over fish saved, and everything saved from wreck narrowly escaped confiscation. (From statements of C. D. Thomas, owner, Portland, Me.)
- Christina Ellsworth* (schooner).—Eastport, Me.; James Ellsworth, master. Entered Port Hastings, Cape Breton, for wood; anchored at 10 o'clock, and reported at custom-house. At 2 o'clock was boarded by captain of cutter Hector and ordered to sea, being forced to leave without wood. In every harbor entered was refused privilege of buying anything. Anchored under lee of land in no harbor, but was compelled to enter at custom-house. In no two harbors were the fees alike. (From statements of James Ellsworth, owner and master, Eastport, Me.)
- Mary E. Whorf* (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Simon Berrio, master. In July, 1886, lost seine off North Cape, Prince Edward Island, and not allowed to make any repairs on shore, causing a broken voyage and a long delay. Ran short of provisions, and being denied privilege of buying any on land, had to obtain from another American vessel. (From statements of Freeman A. Snow, owner, Wellfleet, Mass.)
- Stowell Sherman* (schooner).—Provincetown, Mass.; S. F. Hatch, master. Not allowed to purchase necessary supplies, and obliged to report at custom-houses, situated at distant and inconvenient places; ordered out of harbors in stress of weather, namely, out of Casumpec harbor, Prince Edward Island, nineteen hours after entry, and out of Malpeque harbor, Prince Edward Island, fifteen hours after entry, wind then blowing too hard to admit of fishing. Returned home with broken trip. (From statements of Samuel T. Hatch, owner and master, Provincetown, Mass.)
- Walter L. Rich* (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Obadiah Rich, master. Ordered out of Malpeque, P. E. I., in unsuitable weather for fishing, having been in harbor only 12 hours. Denied right to purchase provisions. Forced to enter at custom-house at Port Hawkesbury, C. B., on Sunday, collector fearing that vessel would leave before Monday and he would thereby lose his fee. (From statements of Obadiah Rich, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)
- Bertha D. Nickerson* (schooner).—Booth Bay, Me.; N. E. Nickerson, master. Occasioned considerable expense by being denied Canadian harbors to procure crew, and detained in spring while waiting for men to come from Nova Scotia. (From statements of S. Nickerson & Sons, owners, Booth Bay, Me.)
- Newell B. Hawes* (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Thomas C. Kennedy, master. Refused privilege of buying provisions in ports on Bay St. Lawrence, and in consequence obliged to leave for home with half a cargo. Made harbor at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in face of storm, at 5 p. m., and master immediately started for custom-house, 5 miles distant, meeting captain of cutter Terror on way, to whom he explained errand. On returning, found two armed men from cutter on his vessel. At 7 o'clock next morning was ordered to sea, but refused to go in the heavy fog. At 9 o'clock the fog lifted slightly and, though the barometer was very low and a storm imminent, vessel was forced to leave. Soon met the heavy gale, which split sails, causing considerable damage. Captain of Terror denied claim to right of remaining in harbor twenty-four hours. (From statements of T. C. Kennedy, part owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)

- Helen F. Tredick* (schooner).—Cape Porpoise, Me.; R. J. Numan, master. July 20, 1886, entered Port Latour, N. S., for shelter and water. Was ordered immediately to sea. (From statements of R. J. Numan, owner and master, Cape Porpoise, Me.)

- Gertrude Sammers* (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; N. S. Snow, master. Refused privilege of purchasing provisions, which resulted in injury to voyage. Found harbor regulations uncertain. Sometimes could remain in port twenty-four hours, again was ordered out in three hours. (From statements of N. S. Snow, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)
- Charles R. Washington* (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; Jesse S. Snow, master. Master was informed by collector at Ship Harbor, C. B., that if he bought provisions, even if actually necessary, he would be subject to a fine of $400 for each offense. Refused permission by the collector at Souris, P. E. I., to buy provisions, and was compelled to return home September 10, before close of fishing season. Was obliged to report at custom-house every time he entered a harbor, even if only for shelter. Found no regularity in the amount of fees demanded, this being apparently at the option of the collector. (From statements of Jesse S. Snow, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)
- John M. Ball* (schooner).—Provincetown, Mass.; N. W. Freeman, master. Driven out of Gulf of St. Lawrence to avoid fine of $400 for landing two men in the port of Malpeque, P. E. I. - Zephyr* (schooner).—Eastport, Me.; Warren Pulk, master. Cleared from Eastport, May 31, 1886, under register for West Isles, N. B., to buy herring. (From statements of Michael Burrows, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)

Senate Report No. 1981, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 28, 1887.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. FRYE, and Mr. MORGAN, managers on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3173) to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes, submitted the following

REPORT:

The managers on the part of the Senate of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on their disagreeing on the amendments proposed by the House to the bill (S. 3173) respecting the fisheries, respectfully report that the bill passed the Senate on the 24th day of January, 1887, and on February 23 was returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment striking out the whole of the Senate bill and proposing one entire House amendment in its place.

On the 24th the bill was laid before the Senate, and the House amendment was disagreed to and a committee of conference asked and the papers ordered to be printed.

On the 25th instant the House agreed to the conference, and on the 26th the managers on the part of the House met the Senate managers in the afternoon of that day, and the differences in the views of the two Houses fully discussed. The House conferees did not object to the substance of any part of the bill as it passed the Senate, so far as it goes, but the first part of the first section of the House amendment undertakes to restate the enumeration of the cases and injuries mentioned in the Senate bill by entirely dropping the classifications or groups of vessels made in the Senate bill, and to bring all vessels of the United States, of whatever character or class, within one definition.

The ground on which the Senate bill went in this respect was that United States fishing vessels purely had their rights regulated and measured by the treaty of 1818, as having the absolute right of fishing inshore in certain ports of the marine territories of the British dominions in North America and being prohibited from fishing in other ports, but still having the right to enter those other waters for the purposes enumerated in the treaty, and not to be abused with a view to fishing in prohibited waters.

The second classification of United States vessels made in the Senate bill covered precisely the same vessels, but having also a commercial character obtained by having not only a license to fish, but also under the laws of the United States a permit to touch and trade in foreign ports, and which, therefore, in their character as trading vessels, would not, as it was thought, be under the prohibitory provisions of the fishery treaty of 1818.

The third classification covered all other vessels of the United States not falling within the two preceding classes.

It was thought by the Senate, in passing the bill in that form, that a more clear understanding could be had of its application and enforcement than if all the vessels had been massed under one description. The Senate bill then proceeded to provide for cases not merely of the denial of treaty rights to purely fishing vessels, or the denial of lawful trading rights to fishing vessels otherwise to touch and trade or lawful rights to purely trading vessels, but to include also unjust vexation and harassment as well as exclusion from rights to trade accorded to the vessels of the most favored nation.

The House amendment applicable to the whole of this part of the subject purports to provide for the cases of vessels of the United States which "are denied in the ports or territorial waters of the British dominions in North America rights to which such vessels are entitled by treaty or by the law of nations or are denied the comity of treatment or the reasonable privileges usually accorded between neighboring and friendly nations."

It is, with great respect to the House of Representatives, thought by the Senate managers of the conference that this provision is not nearly so adequate to the condition of affairs as the provisions of the Senate bill which have been already described. There is no treaty in existence between the United States and Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the treatment of American vessels in British North American waters or ports, other than the provisions already referred to concerning purely fishing vessels and contained in the treaty of 1818, with possibly an exception as it respects one or two particular ports, and with the exception of such provisions as are contained in the treaty of 1871, which provisions in this last-named treaty are in these respects not applicable to the now existing difficulties. What positive rights "the law of nations" mentioned in the House amendment United States vessels entering British North American waters are entitled to the Senate managers think it would be somewhat difficult to define or explain. For, it is believed, by what is called the "law of nations" no vessel of the United States would have a right to enter British waters at all other than under an implied and tacit consent of the sovereign of that country, which could, at any moment, be positively withdrawn consistently with the understood sovereign rights of all nations. The Senate managers, therefore, think that this definition, measured by the law of nations, is really not much more than a definition measured by the will of the British Government so far as exclusion or the regulation of conduct in such waters might happen to go.

The next phrase in the House amendment proposed to take the place of the enumerations and descriptions mentioned in the Senate bill purports to provide for cases in which American vessels "are denied the comity of treatment or the reasonable privileges usually accorded between neighboring and friendly nations."

The Senate managers are of opinion that this phrase, so far as it applies to purely fishing vessels, may go beyond the treaty rights of such vessels as measured by the treaty of 1818. Whether the phrase was intended to include treatment and reasonable privileges secured between neighboring and friendly nations by treaty such as exists in respect of British vessels of Her Majesty's dominions in Europe in waters of the United States and American vessels in European British waters does not appear to be at all clear. If it be meant to cover such cases, then the provision would be entirely inapplicable to the case in hand. If it be meant to make the test that of the conduct of neighboring and friendly nations in the absence of a treaty concerning the respective rights of their vessels in the waters of the other, then the cases occurring in the last year of the treatment of American vessels in British waters of North America might be considered the standard to which this language would apply, for Great Britain is, in respect of her dominions of North America, a neighboring, and, in a public sense a friendly, nation. But if it were taken in general as applied to the general good neighborhood of nations, the standard would probably vary more or less, whatever country should be resorted to for finding the measurement of administration in regard to foreign vessels.

But, as has been before stated, the House managers, so far as we can understand, do not appear to find fault with the substance or the essential phraseology of the Senate bill.

The irreconcilable point of difference between the managers on the part of the two Houses is the insistence, on the part of the House managers, upon adding to the scope of the Senate bill, and so going beyond it, the further provision that, in case of injurious treatment to our vessels in British North American waters, it shall be within the competence of the President of the United States to absolutely stop intercourse not only by water, but by land, between the people of the United States and the people of the British territories adjacent, thus absolutely cutting off the continuous movement of railway trains from the British Provinces to any part of the United States, and, in effect, reciprocally from the United States to British dominions, either on the northern border of Minnesota, at the river Saint Mary, at Port Huron, at Detroit, at Grosse Isle, at Buffalo, at Niagara Falls, at Rouse's Point, at Highgate, Franklin, Richford, Troy, Derby, and Norton, on the northern border of Vermont, and on the northern and eastern borders of Maine; at all of which places it is understood there now exist interior railroad lines crossing the boundaries of the two countries—in some cases operated and practically owned by British subjects, and in other cases operated and practically owned by American citizens.

The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty to decline to go to this extent, and have thought it to be clear that the provisions for the protection of American interests set forth in the Senate bill, and in that part of the House amendment applicable to any British violation of the treaty of 1877, are entirely adequate to the peaceful end in view, and that there is no present justification for reposing in the Executive this further enormous power proposed by the House of Representatives in its amendment, and insisted upon by the House managers.

It seems clear to the Senate managers, and has not been controverted by the House managers, that the things the President is authorized to do by the Senate bill in the cases named are none of them in derogation, either directly or indirectly, of any treaty right, or of the peaceful business intercourse of nations, but that this Government in these respects is absolutely free to act in the manner proposed without being subject to the imputation that it is either in any way infringing the most liberal interpretation of any treaty or doing any act that nations at peace have not hitherto found themselves from time to time justified in doing, not in a spirit of belligerency, but merely as a matter of counter-vailing business regulations.

The Senate managers offered to the House managers to add to the Senate bill the provision contained in the House amendment providing that, if there should be any violation of Article 29 of the treaty of 1871 on the part of Great Britain, the President should be authorized reciproccally to withdraw from British subjects the benefits of the same article with certain changes of phraseology, which, it is understood, were satisfactory to the House managers.

The Senate managers also expressed their willingness to accede to the third section of the House amendment, although the propriety of its form and substance is open to very considerable question.

The result of the conference, therefore, has been that the House of Representatives, through its managers, not objecting to the Senate bill, but desiring to add a new and enlarged provision to the Senate bill and to adopt measures additional to those mentioned in the Senate bill, and not necessarily dependent thereon, and the Senate managers unwilling to go to that extent, and so disagreeing to the House proposition, decline to make even the provision that has passed the Senate in respect of the subject of the protection of our fishing and other vessels, and to which the House makes no objection so far as it goes, unless the Senate will consent to make further legislative provisions which it believes to be unwise. It would seem needless to say that such a pretension, made by one of two co-ordinate legislative bodies, is quite untenable.

The essential principle upon which the two houses have almost universally hitherto acted, and without which no legislation whatever could be accomplished when there was not perfect accord on all points, has been that when either house proposes legislation that is satisfactory to the other so far as it goes, and the other house desires to go further and make affirmative and additional law, if it cannot convince its co-ordinate body that it is desirable to go further, the house proposing the affirmative additional legislation must recede. This principle is vitally important to the independence of each house, and so indispensable to the practical legislation of the country that the Senate managers have felt it to be a paramount duty to refuse to accede to this further House proposition, both as unnecessary and unwise, and as in derogation of the equal rights of the two bodies.

The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty in this important matter to report this state of things at once to the Senate for its information.

JNO. T. MORGAN.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

MAY 10, 1888.—Injunction of secrecy removed and ordered to be printed.

MAY 7, 1888.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following

REPORT (EXECUTIVE No. 3)

ON THE TREATY (EX. M.) BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN, CONCERNING THE INTERPRETATION OF THE CONVENTION OF OCTOBER 20, 1818, SIGNED AT WASHINGTON FEBRUARY 15, 1888; WHICH, TOGETHER WITH THE VIEWS OF THE MINORITY ON THE SAME SUBJECT, SUBMITTED BY MR. MORGAN, WAS ORDERED TO BE PRINTED IN CONFIDENCE FOR THE USE OF THE SENATE.

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 20th February last, transmitting a proposed treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of the 20th October, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888, respectfully reports:

That it has had the said proposed treaty under careful and deliberate consideration and that it returns herewith a resolution in the ordinary form for its ratification, with the expression of its opinion that said resolution ought not to be adopted.

As preliminary to a consideration of the text of the treaty itself in various aspects, the committee thinks it proper to give a brief résumé of the history of the fisheries question and other matters relating to the intercourse between the United States and the British dominions of North America having more or less relation thereto.

Before the Revolution the inhabitants of all the British colonies in North America possessed, as a common right, the right of fishing on the coasts of British North America, and these rights were, in a broad sense, prescriptive and accustomed rights of property. At the end of the Revolution and by the treaty of peace of 1783, which adjusted the boundaries between the dominions of the two powers, it was (Article III)—

Agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish, and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not dry or cure the same on that island), and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

This was a grant or recognition of a property right agreed upon on consideration, viz, the adjustment of the boundaries and the other engagements into which the United States by that treaty entered. As to the open-sea fishing, it was merely a recognition of a right common to all nations, and as to the fishing within the municipal dominion of His Majesty on his coasts, bays, and creeks, it was an agreement that the rights theretofore existing in all British subjects should of right belong to those British subjects who, by force of the revolution, had become the citizens of an independent nation; and thus it was, in the partition of the territory, a reservation in favor of the people of the United States of a right which they, as British subjects, had theretofore lawfully enjoyed.

From 1783 until the war of 1812 between the two countries citizens of the United States continued to enjoy the ancient rights belonging to them as subjects of Great Britain before the Revolution and reserved to them as citizens of the United States after it, with the full freedom secured by the article last referred to. During this period of time other subjects of difference and negotiation arose between the two countries, which were disposed of by the treaties of 1794, with its explanatory articles, and of 1802; but the fishery provision of 1783 continued to exist unquestioned and apparently as having been, as it plainly purported to be, a treaty disposing of and adjusting property rights which had become by force of its own operation an executed contract.

The treaty of peace concluded on December 24, 1814, at the close of the war of 1812, provided:

First, for a restoration to each party of all countries, territories, etc. taken by either party during the war, without delay, saving some questions of islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy.

Secondly, it provided for disposition of prizes and prisoners of war.

Thirdly, it provided for questions of boundary and dominion regarding certain islands and for the settlement of the northeastern boundary and also for the northwestern boundary, etc. It made no reference whatever to any question touching the fisheries mentioned in the treaty of 1783.

The commercial treaty concluded on the 3d of July, 1815, between the two countries provided for reciprocal liberty of commerce between the territories of Great Britain in Europe and the territories of the United States, but left without any new treaty stipulation or obligation commercial intercourse between British dominions in North America and the United States remaining under the exclusive control of each.

But after the conclusion of the treaties following the war of 1812, there being then no treaty obligations or reciprocal laws in force between or in either of the countries respecting commercial intercourse, the British Government set up the pretension that the fishing rights recognized and secured to citizens of the United States by the treaty of 1783 had become abrogated in consequence of the war of 1812, which, on the principle of the war annulling all unexecuted engagements between the two belligerents, it was contended, annulled the fishing rights described in the treaty of 1783, and that the citizens of the United States had, therefore, no longer the right to fish in any of the British North American waters. This pretension led to the conclusion of the treaty of the 20th October, 1818, the fisheries article of which provided that (Article I)—

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty, claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company: And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks, of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, above described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

This arrangement divided, and limited in territorial extent, the fishing rights of the people of the United States, that had existed while they were British subjects and had been recognized and existed under the treaty of peace of 1783 until the war of 1812, and it provided for a continuance of the ancient rights of fishing on certain named parts of the coasts of British North America, and its islands, and in their bays, harbors, and creeks, etc. It also provided for a renunciation by the United States of pre-existing rights to take fish, etc., "within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors" of His Majesty's dominions in British North America, not included within the previously-mentioned limits, but with a proviso, as a reservation upon the renunciation of the right to fish, that the—American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purposes of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purposes whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

It will be observed that the ancient right continued in all its force in every bay, harbor, and creek of a described territory, and that the renunciation of the right to fish on other coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks is in the same language, and is perfectly correlative to the first, and that the line of British municipal dominion was recognized and stated to be a line 3 marine miles from these British coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors, and that this renunciation was, both in substance and form, a renunciation only of a right to fish and to exercise the incidents of the fishing, as drying, etc., and that the proviso to that renunciation admitted the American fishermen to enter such waters, bays, and harbors for the specific purposes necessary to them in their character as fishermen only, and not having the slightest reference, either expressly or by implication, to any fishing or other vessel of the United States and sailing under their flag, entering any port of His Majesty's dominions anywhere for any commercial or trading purpose. And these entries into exclusively British fishing waters fishing vessels (the only ones entitled to be there at all) were to be under such restrictions, and such only, as should be necessary to prevent their exercising the fishing rights that had been renounced and abusing the privileges of such entry so reserved; that is, by doing the renounced thing, viz, the taking and curing of fish, or violating the British laws excluding all American trading vessels.

It is to be kept clearly in view that at the time of the conclusion of this treaty of 1818, and for twelve years afterward, no American vessel had any right to enter any port of British North America, with the few exceptions named in the mutual arrangements of 1820 and 1823, hereinafter stated. The treaty of 1815 and the British laws and policy reserved the whole trade and intercourse with the ports of these colonies to her own vessels, and, reciprocally, there was no law or treaty of the United States which authorized the entry into ports (with the exceptions stated) of the United States of British vessels from British North American ports.

Thus it was that the treaty of 1818 omitted to make any mention of the ports in the British provinces in connection with the arrival or departure of American vessels, either fishing or other, and so it was a clear and necessary construction of the treaty of 1818 that the arrangements, conditions, and renunciations therein provided had no relation, one way or the other, to the exercise of what may be called commercial rights by the American fishing or other vessels in the waters or ports of British North America, for the status of things was such, that it could not be done in the case of any American vessel without regard to her character as a vessel engaged in fishing upon the high seas or in the British territorial waters, wherein, as was provided, she might continue to fish, or to her commercial character.

The right (except in the cases before stated) of the British to exclude such vessels and all others of the United States from her ports in British North America, as the matter stood until 1830, is fully conceded, and it is also conceded that during that time the only right of any vessel of the United States to enter the waters of British North America depended upon the treaty of 1818 alone, and in order to obtain the benefit of that treaty for such purposes, the American vessel must have been a fishing vessel, and must have resorted to those particular waters for some one of the purposes mentioned in the treaty, and no others.

The foregoing statement is, of course, subject to the limitation implied in whatever rights might have existed by the general law of nations in respect of vessels under circumstances requiring the exercise of humanity, etc. It must be also remarked that at the time of the conclusion of the treaty of 1818 the ports of British North America were very few and far between, and that there could be very little motive for American vessels, either fishing or other, to resort to such ports for the purposes of trade until the British colonial policy should have been abandoned or very largely modified.

The matter, then, under the treaty of 1818 was a very simple one and can be restated thus:

(1) No American vessel had any right to resort to British North American ports for any commercial or other purpose, and no British North American vessel had any right to resort to any port of the United States for such purposes.

(2) But American fishing vessels had a right to resort to certain of the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of that part of British North America described in the treaty of 1818 for all purposes of fishing which they had anciently enjoyed.

(3) But American fishing vessels, and fishing vessels only, had also a right to resort to all other British North American waters for the special purposes named in the treaty.

(4). The general result of this was, as to American fishing vessels, that they had, on all the British North American coasts and in all her bays and harbors, the right to shelter, to repair damages, and to obtain wood and water, but on certain named parts of the same coasts, etc., they had not the right to take or cure fish; and

(5) As a consequence of the situation embraced in the British laws and in that treaty, the matter of resorting to British North American ports either by American fishing or other vessels was entirely outside of and unaffected either way by that treaty.

From 1818 forward, until after the reciprocal arrangements of 1830 concerning commerce, it is not known that any serious difficulties occurred in respect of the rights of American fishermen pursuing their calling in those regions of the sea.

Two or three instances only of seizure appear to have occurred until after 1830 and none of those touched or raised the bay or headlands question. In 1835 the British Government brought to the notice of our own the complaints of the Canadian authorities concerning alleged infractions of the treaty of 1818 by our fishermen. These complaints did not involve the bay or headlands question or any commercial question, and the complaints were immediately attended to by our Government to the satisfaction of that of Great Britain (Ex. Doc. 100, Thirty-sixth Congress, first session, pp. 56 and 58).

In 1838-39 there were a few more seizures, but none of them appear to have raised the bay or headlands question. One was seized at the Gut of Canso but released; and none of these seizures appear to have involved any commercial or trade question excepting the Shetland, which, being driven inshore by a storm, anchored, and the master was enticed into selling a boy who came on board, a pair of trousers and a little tea and tobacco, for which the vessel was immediately seized, it being evident that the boy had been sent by the authorities to entrap the master (Ex. Doc. 100, Thirty-sixth Congress, first session, pp. 65 and 66); and excepting the Magnolia, which purchased a barrel of herring for bait; and excepting the Hart, which, running into Tusket Harbor in heavy weather, and while the master was on shore procuring wood and water, a British subject asked some of the crew to help him clear his nets. Some of the crew accordingly went on board the British vessel and assisted in clearing the nets, for which the British owner gave two barrels of fresh herring; and excepting the Eliza, which, being at anchor in a gale, carried away one of her larboard chains, and ran into Bevet Harbor, and got it repaired by a British subject, and was accordingly seized.

These instances are specially referred to to show that the bay and headlands question almost never practically arose, and that the offenses, if offenses they were, of the seized vessels, were of the most trivial and unimportant character, scarcely worthy the notice of a government.

In 1818 (and before the treaty of that year) Congress passed an act closing our ports against British vessels coming from colonial ports which were closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States (Stats., vol. 3, p. 432); and in 1820 Congress passed a supplementary act upon the same subject and upon the same principle of mutuality, applied particularly to British North American ports and certain West Indian ones (Stats., vol. 3, p. 602); and in 1823 Congress passed an act suspending the former acts so far as they applied to sundry ports named—the Canadian ones being St. John and St. Andrews, New Brunswick; Halifax, Nova Scotia; Quebec, Canada; and St. John's, Newfoundland.

But this act was passed with the condition that the enumerated British colonial ports should be open for the admission of the vessels of the United States, and provided that, if trade and intercourse should be interrupted by the British authority in those ports, similar action should be taken by the President in respect of our own.

The act of Congress of May 29, 1830, provided for opening of all American ports to certain British colonial vessels on a mutual opening of British colonial ports to American vessels. Section 2 of that act declared that—

Whenever the ports of the United States shall have been opened, under the authority given in the first section of this act, British vessels and their cargoes shall be admitted to an entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent, and north or east of the United States (Stats., v. 4, p. 420).

Pursuant to this act President Jackson, on the 5th of October, 1830, in accordance with a mutual understanding upon the subject with the Government of Great Britain, issued his proclamation, putting this act of 1830 into effect (Stats. V. 4, p. 817). And on the 18th of November, 1830, a British order in council was issued, declaring among other things—

That the ships of, and belonging to, the United States of America may import from the United States aforesaid into the British possessions abroad goods with produce of those States, and may export goods from the British possessions abroad to be carried to any foreign country whatever (British Foreign and State Papers, V. 17, p. 294).

It is clear that under this act of Congress all British vessels, without regard to their occupation, whether fishing or other, coming from British North America, were entitled to admission into our ports for all purposes of trade and commerce. Canadian fishing vessels had the same rights as any other, for they fell within the general description stated in the statute. So, too, reciprocally, our fishing vessels fell within the general description of "ships of and belonging to the United States." Before this time all American vessels were excluded from British North American ports with the then recent exception before stated; then, under this arrangement all ships of the United States were to be admitted into British North American ports. The former almost universal exclusion was abolished without reserve. If any literal reading of this British order in council can be suggested as of a narrower construction, it would destroy the mutuality of the action of the two governments and be unworthy of a government.

Surely no nation not in a state of vassalage would consent that its citizens or subjects should for a moment be treated in or by another nation in a less favorable way than it treated the citizens and subjects of the same class and occupation of such other nation.

From the conclusion of the treaty of 1818 down to nearly 1840, as we have seen, the incidents of collision or difficulty in respect of the rights of the purely American fishing vessels under that treaty were comparatively few; and, so far as the committee is advised, such incidents of difficulty as occurred did not arise under any bay or headland pretension of Great Britain, but came out of a few American vessels, from time to time having come within 3 miles of the British North American shores, being seized upon one accusation or another.

In the year 1836 the province of Nova Scotia passed laws of a more stringent and unjust character than any that had existed before, and in the year 1838 that province complained, in an address to the Queen, of American aggressions and asking for a naval force to prevent them. It appears that a British force was accordingly placed on the British North American coast and the seizures of American vessels became much more numerous. (See reports and papers on the subject, Senate Ex. Doc. 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session.)

It appears from these papers that most of the cases of British seizure were for alleged violations of the customs laws. That others of them were for violations of the privileges secured by the treaty of 1818, by coming within 3 miles of the shore; and so far as it is known, it was not until the 10th May, 1843, that any American vessel was seized for fishing more than 3 miles from the shore in a bay indenting the British North American coast.

But in the diplomatic correspondence of that period the pretension was asserted by the British Government that bays more than 6 miles wide, and of indefinite width, if bays indenting British shores, were within the exclusion of the treaty of 1818, and under this pretension the American fishing vessel The Washington was seized for fishing in the Bay of Fundy, but more than 3 miles from the shore. This pretension of the British Government was denied by our own, but no agreement upon the subject was come to.

This state of things, with more or less of collision and harassment to our fishing vessels, continued, but without very serious difficulty, until, in 1852, an attempt was made by the British Government to induce the United States to conclude a reciprocity treaty, which failing, the British Government sent a strong force of war steamers and sailing vessels to these waters for the alleged purpose of enforcing the provisions of the treaty of 1818, but, as was believed by the people and Government of the United States, intended not only for that, but as an overawing enterprise, which should frighten the American fishermen from resorting to British waters for any of the purposes mentioned in the treaty, and to so much disturb American fishing interests as to seriously cripple or destroy them, and thus lead the United States to enter into reciprocity with British North American provinces.

Documentary papers and discussions in the Senate at the time will show how fully this matter was understood, and how it was regarded by the people and Government of the United States. Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, thereupon issued a circular notice to American fishermen, in which he states what the rigid and strict construction of the treaty of 1818 would be, as claimed by the British, as it respected the entrance of fishing vessels into the bays or harbors indenting the British provinces. He stated the British pretension in respect of drawing lines from headland to headland and their asserted pretension of a right to capture all American fishermen who should follow their pursuits in bays inside of such lines. But he distinctly also stated, in the same circular, that he did not agree to the construction thus put by the British upon the treaty, or that it was conformable to the intention of the contracting parties; but he informed the public of the British pretension, "to the end that those concerned in American fisheries may perceive how the case at present stands and be on their guard." (H. R. Mis. Doc. No. 32, Forty-second Congress, second session.)

This circular of Mr. Webster was of July, 1852, and on the 23d August of the same year, twenty-two years after the laws of 1830, the provincial secretary of Nova Scotia issued a notice that "no American fishing vessels are entitled to commercial privileges in provincial ports," etc. (Memorandum respecting North American fisheries, prepared for the information of the American commissioners who negotiated the treaty of 1871).

Following these operations, the claims convention of the 8th of February, 1853, between the United States and Great Britain, was concluded, and under that convention the case of the Washington, seized for fishing in the Bay of Fundy, as before mentioned, was heard, and the empire decided that the true meaning of the treaty of 1818 made it lawful for the Washington to fish more than three miles from the shore in the Bay of Fundy, and in respect of the headland pretension he says:

That the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1812.

He refers to the convention of 1839 between France and Great Britain in respect of reciprocal fishing by the subjects of each country along the shores of the other, providing that their conventional arrangements shall exclude the fishermen of each from bays which do not exceed 10 miles in width within the shores of the other as a proper limit of the doctrine of headlands.

But upon this point (immaterial to the question before him) it is to be observed that the 10-mile headland arrangement between France and Great Britain was a mutual one, applying to the shores and bays of both countries along which the fishermen of each were accustomed to ply their calling, and if, therefore, that convention had agreed upon a distance of 10 miles from shore, and 20 miles for the width of the waters between headlands, it would have furnished no argument in respect of the principle of public law applicable to such questions or in respect of the ancient rights of the citizens of the United States in regard to the fisheries in northeastern waters, for the fishermen of each country were put upon a precisely equal footing in respect of the waters and ports of the other, which, on the British theory, strangely enough, has not existed between British and American fishermen since the act of Congress of 1830, and will not exist if the treaty under consideration should go into effect.

In 1854, however, the objects of British and Canadian desire were at last accomplished by the conclusion of the treaty of the 5th of June of that year, by which an extensive reciprocity, so called, of trade was agreed upon, and the right granted to the Americans to fish within the limits prohibited by the treaty of 1818 under a variety of restrictions and limitations, and a similar right granted to British fishermen in the waters of the United States north of latitude 36°.

In the same treaty were various other provisions respecting navigation of the St. Lawrence, American and Canadian canals, etc., and the treaty was terminable on notice after the expiration of ten years. The experience of the United States and their citizens under that treaty led Congress to terminate it in the winter of 1864-'65 by a vote of nearly 2 to 1 in the House of Representatives and by a vote of nearly 5 to 1 in the Senate.

The Canadian Government then for a few years resorted to a system of licensing American fishermen to fish in the waters from which they were excluded for fishing purposes by the treaty of 1818. For the first year the number of licenses is reported to have been 354, at 50 cents per ton. The next year, 1867, the license fee was made $1 per ton; the number of licenses is reported to have been 281. The next year, 1868-'69, the license fee was again doubled—$2 per ton—and in 1868 only 56 licenses were taken out, and in 1869 only 25.

In 1868 the Dominion Government proceeded to enact the most harsh and stringent laws on the subject of American fishermen calculated and, it is thought, undoubtedly designed to so harass American fishermen in the exercise of the rights reserved to them by the treaty of 1818 as to cripple and destroy their operations. Analogous legislation by Newfoundland in 1836 had led the United States to remonstrate against it as a "violation of the well-established principles of the common law of England and of the principles of all just powers and of all civilized nations, and seemed to be expressly designed to enable Her Majesty's authorities, with perfect impunity, to seize and confiscate American vessels and embezzle almost indiscriminately the property of our citizens employed in the fisheries on the coasts of the British Possessions" (Ex. Doc. 100, Thirty-second Congress, first session).

In 1870 the British Government informed our own that the Canadian Government would issue no more licenses to American fishermen; and, notwithstanding the decision of the umpire in the case of the Washington in 1853, announced the British claim to the exclusion of the American fishing vessels from coming within British headlands, without regard to the width of the bay between. (See Report on Foreign Relations, 1870).

Then came the treaty of 1871, devoted primarily to the Alabama claims, but which provided that for the period of ten years fishermen of the United States should have, in addition to their rights under the treaty of 1818, the right of British North American in-shore fishing under certain limitations, etc.; and the United States agreed to the free admission of British North American fishery products into our country, and it was also provided that the British fishermen might fish in certain American waters, and that the balance of alleged advantage to the United States in these respects should be settled by a commission.

This commission, as is well known, by the vote of the British commissioner and the Belgian umpire, and against the vote of the American commissioner, fixed the sum to be paid by the United States at $5,500,000. The gross injustice of this, as believed by the United States, led the Senate, on the 27th February, 1879, six years before the fisheries provision could expire by the terms of the treaty, to unanimously pass a resolution declaring that steps ought to be taken to provide for the earliest possible termination of these fishery arrangements by negotiations with the British Government to that end. It is understood that the President of the United States, in pursuance of this recommendation, endeavored to obtain the agreement of Great Britain to an immediate termination of these clauses in the treaty, but without success.

In February, 1883, however, as the period was approaching when these provisions could be terminated on notice, both houses of Congress unanimously (or certainly without any division) passed resolutions terminating Articles XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, XXX, and XXXII of said treaty, which articles covered the whole fishery subject as well as certain matters of navigation, etc. This termination took effect on July 1, 1885.

By the twenty-ninth article of the same treaty, which is still in force, the United States engaged that all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at certain ports named and destined for the British possessions in North America, should have entry and transit without the payment of duty, and it was reciprocally agreed on the part of Great Britain that all goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at any of the ports of British North America and destined for the United States, should also have the right of free entry and transit to the United States, etc.

That the foregoing mentioned article of the treaty of 1871 covered and included the transmission of fish from American fishing vessels as well as other goods is evident, not only from the plain and comprehensive language of the article, but from the statements of the formal British case laid before the Halifax Commission in 1877, wherein the right of the transshipment of fish from Canadian ports to the United States free of duty, covered by that article, was made the ground of claim for compensation.

But it will be seen on inspection of the treaty of 1871 that the fisheries articles of that treaty contained no provision either in respect of any commercial rights in Canadian ports or in respect of transshipments, and that the reciprocal transshipment article of the treaty was entirely separate and distinct from any question of fisheries or fish as such; but the proceedings before that commission distinctly demonstrated that under article 29 the right to transship fish was understood by the British to be included and without any conditions depending upon the force of any other of the articles of the treaty, and it is also to be observed that the fisheries articles, in respect of their duration and termination, are treated of separately and by themselves in article 33, which provided that they, as a group by themselves, might be terminated after ten years, on two years' notice, while the reciprocal transshipment article 29 was left to stand independently by itself.

It inevitably follows:

(1) That the right of American fishing vessels to transship their fish from Canadian ports to those of the United States was not derived from the fisheries articles and did not depend upon them.

(2) That such right clearly existed by force of article 29 and did not depend upon any other article, and

(3) That article 29, not having been terminated, the right of American fishing vessels to enter Canadian ports for the purpose of transshipping their cargoes is as clear and unquestionable as that of any other American vessels.

Under the treaty of 1871, with all the privileges granted to Americans in respect of fishing in British waters, the practical result was the diminution of American fishing interests and a corresponding large increase of the Canadian fishing interests, owing to the superior facilities of the Canadians in fishing near their own homes and their right guaranteed by that treaty to dispose of their fish in American ports free from all duties and impositions. It was this, doubtless, that led the British Government to refuse to terminate the fisheries article of 1871 when it had already obtained $5,500,000 as the established recompense for the superior (alleged) advantages obtained by American fishermen under that treaty.

After the final termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of 1871, it being apparent that the United States could not be persuaded or beguiled into a renewal of the so-called reciprocity with Canada, the former methods of unfriendly coercion and harassment were again resorted to and with great exaggeration. New Canadian laws, sanctioned by the home government, were enacted, calculated and evidently designed to effectually frustrate and destroy all the substantial rights that American fishermen were entitled to enjoy under the treaty of 1818, and to destroy the mutuality of the act of 1830 and the benefits of article 29 of the treaty of 1871.

Our Government remonstrated, at first mildly, and later on with something of the vigor that should belong to those intrusted with the defense of clear American rights. But these remonstrances, unaccompanied or followed by any further steps, were unavailing.

The President, in his annual message of December, 1885, in view of these circumstances, recommended to Congress the making provision for a commission to adjust and settle the difficulties and disputes thus arisen, but Congress did not see fit to do it, and the Senate, on the 13th of April, 1886, adopted a resolution by a majority of 25 declaring that, in its judgment, no such commission ought to be established; and by a resolution of the 24th of July, 1886, proceeded to order an investigation by its committee on foreign relations into the fishery question and into the unjust treatment of our fishermen and the circumstances connected therewith, with a view, as it may be presumed, to taking such measures on the report of its committee as the interests and honor of the United States should require.

That committee made an exhaustive investigation, and without any dissent from any of its members reported to the Senate, on the 19th of January, 1887, upon the subject, stating the history of these difficulties and the clear rights that it was thought belonged to the United States and to their citizens, and recommended the enactment of a law for the protection of American rights.

Such a law was enacted, the bill passing the Senate by a vote of 46 in the affirmative to 1 in the negative, and passing the House of Representatives with an enlarging amendment by a vote of 256 in the affirmative to 1 in the negative.

On the passage of this law the only difference between the two houses was that concerning the extent to which these defensive measures should go. This act of Congress was approved by the President on the 3d of March, 1887, and is in the following words:

AN ACT to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are then or lately have [been] unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States, (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved, March 3, 1857.

So far as is known to the committee, no step whatever was taken by the President to put this law into execution, but negotiations were initiated and continued, to the apparent end of accomplishing, what Congress had thought it unfit to undertake in such way, an adjustment of these difficulties by the diplomatic course of securing a part of American rights at the expense of yielding other and the most fundamental and important of them.

These negotiations culminated in the appointment by the President, during the recess of the Senate, on the 22d of November, 1857, only ten days before the meeting of Congress, of three "plenipotentiaries," to consider, with like plenipotentiaries appointed by Her Majesty, the whole subject, with a view of coming to a solution thereof.

These plenipotentiaries, thus created, began their real work at Washington while both houses of Congress were sitting, and without any communication by the President in his annual message on the meeting of Congress, or otherwise, of the fact that such important and extraordinary operations were in progress, or that very grave interests of the United States had been placed in the custody of gentlemen whose names had not even been communicated to it.

These "plenipotentiaries" came to a conclusion of their labors on the 15th of February, 1888, and the offices of "plenipotentiaries" terminated, and the result was reached without the advice and consent of the Senate having been asked or taken concerning the selection of these public ministers, and without any communication to either house of Congress concerning this most important subject.

It is not difficult to see that, in evil times, when the President of the United States may be under influence of foreign and adverse interests, such a course of procedure might result in great disaster to the interests and even the safety of our Government and people.

It is no answer to this suggestion to say that an arrangement thus concluded can not be valid or effectual without the advice and consent of the Senate, for the rights and interests of the people of the United States might be so neglected, misunderstood, abandoned, or sold by President's "plenipotentiaries" as to greatly embarrass, if not defeat, their ultimate re-assertion in better times and under better administrations, though it is hoped that such will not be the case in respect of these negotiations.

The document submitted to the Senate by the President as the outcome of these negotiations may, it is thought, well illustrate the dangers of such methods.

But holding in reserve, for the time being, these grave questions touching usurpations of unconstitutional powers, or the abuse of those that may be thought to exist on the part of the Executive, the committee thinks it sufficient for the present occasion to deal with the document itself.

The subject with which, according to the message of the President transmitting it, this document professes to deal, is "the settlement of the questions growing out of the rights claimed by American fishermen in British North American waters." And the document opens with the statement that it has to deal with "differences * * * concerning the interpretation of Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818." The article referred to appears in an earlier part of this report.

The language of this article is, as has often been stated in long discussions upon the subject, perfectly clear. And as it respects the territorial limits wherein American fishermen should no longer have their ancient right of fishing, there has not been and can not be any question capable of discussion, other than that which may arise from the use of the words "bays," etc., of Her Majesty's dominions.

The article itself, in clear and unmistakable language, recognized and adopted 3 miles from the shore as the extreme limit of municipal dominion and exclusion, but it also used the words "bays," etc.—British bays—as included within the prohibited territory.

For many years after the conclusion of this treaty of 1818 there does not appear to have been any difficulty in respect of the exercise of the rights of American fishermen in bays along the British North American coast that were more than 6 miles wide at their entrance, thus following the description embraced in the 3-mile designation of municipal boundary.

But when the Canadians found that they could not have the same advantages enjoyed by American citizens, fishermen, in introducing their fish and other products into the United States on the same terms as our own citizens, a system of restrictive claim was adopted, and the pretension was set up that any bay, no matter how wide, indenting British North America, was a British bay, and that the American fishermen were by the treaty of 1818 forbidden to fish therein, and in 1843 the first seizure under that claim occurred. The American fishing vessel Washington was the vessel. What was decided and settled in her case has already been stated.

From that day to this no instance has been brought to the attention of the committee (among all the various and very numerous seizures of American fishing vessels by the British authorities under the claim of violations of the treaty of 1818) of any seizure of any American fishing vessel for the act of fishing in any bay indenting the British North American coast more than 3 miles from the shore.

It is curious to note that in the opening British case before the Halifax Commission, no mention is made of the headlands question that had from time to time been a subject of theoretical discussion between the two Governments. But after the case had been presented the question was referred to, but it appears to have been dropped in view of the fact that fishing in such bays did not appear to be of any substantial value at that time. Thus the bay and headland matter stood when these last negotiations began.

The first article of the treaty now under consideration provides for the appointment of a mixed commission, to delimitate "the British waters, bays, creeks, and harbors of the coasts of Canada and of Newfoundland, as to which the United States, by Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain, renounced forever any liberty to take, dry, or cure fish."

Certainly a delimitation of 3 miles from the shore could not possibly be made more clear than it was by the treaty of 1818. Monuments can not be set up in the sea which shall separate the waters of Her Majesty's dominions from the waters belonging to the fishermen and all other people of the United States in common with the rest of mankind.

The only possible point must be to describe what were British bays, etc., and if this article had only been devoted to naming the bays, etc., that were less than 6 miles wide, there might have been some theoretic ground for such an operation. But the treaty easily dismisses all such as a part of the coast line, and proceeds to show that the 3-mile limit mentioned in the treaty of 1818 is not the one that is to define the rights of citizens of the United States, but that a new and different principle, entirely favorable to Great Britain, is to be adopted. To this end the third article of the treaty provides that the 3 marine miles mentioned in the treaty of 1818—shall be measured seaward from low-water mark; but at every bay, creek, or harbor, not otherwise specially provided for in this treaty, such 3 marine miles shall be measured seaward from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek, or harbor, in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed ten marine miles.

By this simple British process the 3 miles mentioned in the treaty of 1818 is nearly doubled and extended to 5 miles from either shore at the entrance or along the bays indenting the coast. It needs no comment to show that this provision is not an execution of the treaty of 1818, but is making, by an assumed construction or otherwise, a new one of entirely different dimensions and entirely in the interest of Her Majesty's Government.

But this is not all. The "plenipotentiaries" went still farther (not stopping at nearly doubling the area of British municipal dominion measured by the treaty of 1818), and agreed that many of (and perhaps all the valuable) great bays, much more than 10 miles in width, should be forevermore included in British municipal dominion, and that forevermore no American fisherman should have the right to drop a line or cast a seine therein.

These great bodies of water, thus given up to the British, are named in the treaty as follows: (1) The Baie des Chaleurs; (2) Bay of Miramichi; (3) Egmont Bay; (4) St. Ann's Bay; (5) Fortune Bay; (6) Sir Charles Hamilton Sound; (7) Barrington Bay; (8) Chedabucto Bay; (9) Mira Bay; (10) Placentia Bay; (11) St. Mary's Bay.

These agreements contained in article 4 of the treaty, as has been said, really cede (so far as the United States are concerned) to Great Britain forever the complete dominion over these numerous and, for fishing purposes, the most valuable of the bays along the coasts of British North America, and exclude forever all the American fishing vessels therefrom, except for the limited and narrow purposes mentioned in the treaty of 1818, and recognize that by force of the treaty of 1818 these are and always have been British waters, while it is thought by the committee that by the public law of nations these same waters will be open to the vessels of all other countries than our own, unless they, too, shall, from generosity or fear, or for some consideration, renounce their right to use the same.

The principle on which this article is formed is a recognition by the United States of the municipal and territorial sovereignty of Great Britain in and over all the other bays, etc., on the British North American coast, however large, in which, by this treaty, our citizens are to be admitted to fish, exterior to a line 3 miles from shore.

The article in terms professes to delimit the British bays mentioned in the treaty of 1818, and as it mentions eleven such bays even more than 10 miles wide, and some of which are 20 or more miles wide, it follows that the British contention of municipal dominion over all bays without regard to width, is acted upon, and that the right of Americans to fish in the few other wide bays not mentioned is a grant by the British Government.

If the Baie de Chaleurs is a now British bay, so also must be the bay of Fundy and all the rest. But if it be suggested that the "plenipotentiaries" renounced the right of fishing in these bays as public waters (for which no hint appears in the treaty) in consideration of supposed advantages gained to the United States by other provisions of the treaty, it is, the committee thinks, equally objectionable; and this entirely without regard to any present practical value or want of value of the fisheries therein. It is not thought by the committee to be suitable to the dignity or interests of the United States to renounce the right of its citizens to pursue business in any part of the public waters of the world. Such rights, the committee thinks, should neither be the subjects of purchase, sale, barter, nor gift.

The question of the extent of territorial dominion, as it respects the exercise of fishing rights in bays more than 6 miles wide indenting the shores of a country, must of course be determined by the law and practice of nations as they existed in the year 1818, at which time, as the committee thinks, the 3-miles limit from shores was recognized without regard to large indenting bays, except under very peculiar circumstances, such as the prescriptive exercise of dominion, etc. Whether, in view of recent inventions in the implements of warfare, it may not be politic for maritime nations to agree upon an enlargement of the boundaries of their territorial dominion seaward is a question well worthy of consideration, but it has no place in respect of the matters now in hand.

The supposed precedent for such agreements as are set up in this treaty, of the convention of 1882 (Ex. Doc. 113, p. 18), between Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, Denmark, France, and the Netherlands, is very far indeed from being such. That was for the police regulation of the fisheries in the North Sea, and on the coasts of all the contracting parties. It was limited to five years, and not perpetual, as this treaty is. It neither granted nor renounced any right. The freedom of navigation, etc., inside the 3-mile limit was reserved. The naval vessels of the respective powers were to enforce the regulation. For serious infractions not settled at sea the offending vessel was to be taken to a port of her own country for trial.

Such regulations as these just cited might well have formed a precedent for composing the differences between the United States and Great Britain; for, first, they did not admit territorial dominion as existing over bays more than 6 miles wide, but conferred it for the time being and for a limited purpose; second, they recognized the rights of fishing vessels to be considered as vessels entitled to the rights of all other vessels bearing the flag of their country, without regard to their occupation, so far as it respected every thing else than fishing; third, they placed the administration of these fishing affairs in the commanders of national vessels; and, fourth, they provided that an accused vessel should be taken to her own country for trial.

The contrast between this North Sea fisheries treaty, to which Great Britain was a party, and the one now before the Senate is vivid. They are substantially the opposites of each other in nearly every particular.

Nor does the treaty now before the Senate bear any material resemblance to the protocol proposed by Mr. Seward in 1866 (Ex. Doc. 113, p. 17), nor to the scheme sent by Mr. Bayard to Mr. Phelps in November, 1886 (Ex. Doc. 113, Fiftieth Congress, first session, p. 17).

The fifth article of the treaty, declaring that the treaty shall not be construed to include within common waters any interior portions of bays, etc., that "can not be reached from the sea without passing within the 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818," is very sweeping, and may cover a great deal more than the mere reading of it would imply to one uninstructed in the nature of the northeastern lands and waters, with their deep indenting bays, their many islands and islets, and their tremendous tides, the rise and fall of which, in many places, change the aspects of nature to an astonishing degree. But it is purely language making the test the capacity of passing within 3 miles of the shore, and plainly indicates that no matter how large may be the bay, no matter how wide apart may be its headlands, no matter how deep may be the waters between such headlands at high tide, if the ship-channel to it at low tide be within 3 miles of land it is an excluded bay.

Having now seen what the proposed treaty accomplishes in respect of "delimitation," we proceed to examine its provisions in respect of what American vessels engaged in fishing on the high seas may and may not do in British North American waters ascertained, enlarged, and defined as before stated, and in the ports on those coasts.

In order to understand more clearly the disastrous nature of what the "plenipotentiaries" have agreed to, it is valuable to consider and again state the situation of affairs existing in 1818, and to which the treaty of that year applies.

Before and at that time and down to 1830 no American vessel of any kind was as of right admitted to any British North American port, and no rights of commerce or trade existed (with the few exceptions before stated); and, reciprocally, no British North American vessel of any kind, fishing or other, was admitted to ports of the United States otherwise than as an act of mutuality in the cases stated. The treaties of 1794 and 1815 purposely left all these ports and all trade between British North America and the United States to be regulated according to the particular policy of each nation. Such is still the condition of things so far as any treaty obligation is concerned, excepting article 29 of the treaty of 1871.

In 1818, then, no American fishing vessel or any other American vessel could enter a port on any of the coasts of British North America, even where the full right of fishing in-shore existed. And the treaty of 1818, formed on that basis, was not intended to, and it did not in any way, touch the question of any trade or commercial right whatever, and of course made no distinction in these respects between fishing and other American vessels. It looked and spoke only in regard to the fact of the renunciation by the United States of their fishing rights in that part of the territorial waters of British North America named in the treaty, and, as an incident of that renunciation and as an incident only, it provided that American fishing vessels might enter those renounced waters, not to fish, but only for "the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and obtaining water;" and this right was to be exercised under such restrictions as should be necessary to prevent their fishing, etc., therein, or in any other manner abusing the privileges so reserved to them.

These words, "in any manner abusing the privilege of entry," clearly referred to the then existing state of British law which prevented all trade intercourse by foreign vessels with the provinces, and were intended to authorize such action on the part of Great Britain as should be justly necessary to prevent violations of British navigation and commercial laws.

But in the course of years, when after these mutual arrangements of a legislative character were made, the business and trade between the United States and British North America developed, the British North Americans, like their fellows in England, began to see that the American system of customs laws operated to the advantage of American citizens and industries and unfavorably to Canadian and British interests. They then commenced, and have since steadily continued (except during the intervals of so-called reciprocity, under the treaties of 1854 and 1871), a systematic and persistent course of hostile legislation and administration under the pretext of enforcing the restrictions of the treaty of 1818, well calculated, and designed, as the committee thinks is clear, to so embarrass and harass the citizens of the United States, engaged in the legal pursuit of fishing on the high seas as well as in the British North American waters reserved to them by the treaties of 1783 and 1818, as to drive them out of the business, and so to leave it all in British hands, or else to induce the United States, by such a course of unfriendly and even outrageous conduct, to allow the free entry of Canadian fish and other products into our markets as the price of their fair treatment of our fishermen.

Yet, during the last two or three years of this course of studied injustice and of outrage, while no American fishing vessel, even bearing a full commercial character under the laws of the United States and with the flag of the United States at the fore, could enter a port of British North America for any purpose without being exposed to seizure and forfeiture, or enter a British North American harbor for shelter or to repair damages or obtain wood and water without being subjected to this unjust and even outrageous treatment, the fishing vessels of British North America could lawfully and without molestation enter any harbor or port of the United States, sell or transship their cargoes, and do every kind of trade, and depart in peace.

This condition of things became so intolerable that, at last, the remonstrances of the Executive became vigorous and urgent, and on the 8th of December, 1886, the President sent to Congress the following message on the subject :

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, which is accompanied by the correspondence in relation to the rights of American fishermen in the British North American waters, and commend to your favorable consideration the suggestion that a commission be authorized by law to take perpetuating proofs of the losses sustained during the past year by American fishermen, owing to their unfriendly and unwarranted treatment by the local authorities of the maritime provinces of the Dominion of Canada.

I may have occasion hereafter to make further recommendations during the present session for such remedial legislation as may become necessary for the protection of the rights of our citizens engaged in the open-sea fisheries of the North Atlantic waters.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

Washington, December 8, 1886.

Justly influenced, doubtless, by this message and by the state of affairs shown in the documents accompanying it, and by the evidence taken by, and the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the same subject made on the 19th of January, 1887 (Rep. No. 1683, 49th Cong., 2d sess.), Congress came to the conclusion that the period of negotiation and unavailing remonstrance had passed, and with almost absolute unanimity and without any party division enacted the act of March 3, 1887, hereinbefore mentioned, by which the duty was imposed upon the President of withdrawing from British North American vessels, etc., those liberties and advantages which by the pre-existing laws they were enjoying in the harbors and ports of the United States, whenever and as often as it should appear to him that similar rights and liberties were denied the United States fishing vessels, etc., in the ports, etc., of British North America, or whenever it should appear to him that American fishing vessels should have been subjected to outrageous or unjust treatment in the exercise of the rights secured to them by the treaty of 1818.

All that remained unprovided for according to the sense of self-respect and of just policy on the part of the United States was to obtain indemnity from the British Government for the injuries that had thus far been committed.

In view of this state of affairs, thus briefly mentioned, we come to consider what the proposed treaty undertakes to provide in regard to American vessels engaged in fishing.

The first clause of Article X provides that American fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I shall conform to harbor regulations common to them and Canadian fishing vessels. This, by necessary implication, concedes the right on the part of the Canadians to subject United States fishing vessels resorting to a British North American bay for shelter from a tempest, to the municipal laws of Canada, no matter how far different those regulations may be from the provision in the treaty of 1818 giving to the British the right only to make such restrictions as should be necessary to prevent an abuse of the privilege of entry for the purpose stated.

This clause adopts the principle of the British contention in the Fortune Bay affair, which contention was that American vessels in Canadian waters, under either the treaty of 1818 or 1871, were subjected to all the municipal laws of that country. This British contention was successfully resisted by Mr. Evarts, then our Secretary of State, and the

and by the state of af-
and by the evidence

British Government paid an indemnity for an interference with our fishing vessels in respect of their being engaged in fishing in those waters contrary to the municipal statutes of Newfoundland.

This clause, then, gives away important American rights, and adopts the principle that under the treaty of 1818 American fishing vessels are subject to the full force of foreign municipal law. But this clause is, in part only, qualified by the next, which excuses them from reporting, entering, or clearing when putting into such bays for shelter or repairing damages, and when putting into the same outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or obtaining water, with certain exceptions even in respect of that excuse. But we think it may be safely assumed to be true that there are very few, if any, British North American bays or harbors that are not within the limits of established ports of entry, for doubtless (which is the case in the United States) the Dominion customs laws bring every part of the seashore, and all its bays and harbors, within the customs limits of some port of entry.

This modification, then, of the sweeping requirement of the first clause really amounts to nothing, and, indeed, can (if it does not already) by a simple legislative or administrative act of the Dominion government bring every bay and harbor and every part of the coast within the limits of established ports of entry, and thus again completely surrender the fishing vessels of the United States to every commercial regulation of the Dominion government which operates against them, while it gives them almost none of the benefits of commercial intercourse.

The next clause, also, further provides that American fishing vessels, when in these bays and harbors for shelter, etc., under the treaty of 1818, shall not be liable for harbor dues, etc. This is a mere statement of what results from the treaty of 1818, for it has no application to these vessels other than in their purely fishing character, and in that character they were not subjected by the treaty of 1818 to any such imposition, and could not be, for none of them were necessary to prevent their fishing or to prevent their smuggling.

Article X, then, taken as a whole, is a diminution instead of an enlargement of the rights of American fishing vessels under the treaty of 1818, and its modifying and limiting clauses would be only valuable in any case as a renunciation by Great Britain of a totally unfounded pretension.

Article XI provides, first, that American fishing vessels entering the ports, etc., of British North America under stress of weather or other casualty may unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to customs laws, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, or supplies damaged or lost by disaster, and in case of death or sickness, shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of a crew.

The most of these provisions are already clearly covered by the treaty of 1818, and all of them are covered by the real substance and spirit of the arrangement of 1830; and in respect of transshipment, by article 29 of the treaty of 1871. They are much more than covered by article 29 of the treaty of 1871, and are, in fact and effect, a voluntary abandonment on the part of the United States of the rights secured in respect of the transshipment of all American goods and merchandise arriving at any British North American port. That article uses language of the most comprehensive character, and it can not be doubted that under it a Canadian fishing vessel bringing a cargo of fish from the fishing-grounds to the south of Nantucket, or from any other place on the high seas or any British waters, to the ports of New York, Boston, or Portland, would be entitled to land them and transship them to Canada without the payment of any duty, and it is, of course, equally clear that a cargo of fish on board a fishing vessel of the United States, when brought from the fishing-grounds of the high seas or elsewhere to any British North American port, may, in like manner, be entered and transshipped to the United States without the payment of duty.

It would seem, then, that in respect of the clause of Article XI, now under consideration, as well as with respect of the clauses hereinbefore considered, that the Executive in negotiating this treaty had failed to remember, or had left out of view, what the present rights of citizens of the United States already clearly are under treaties now in force, and had proceeded upon the idea that every right that the United States is to obtain by force of this treaty is a new one, and is granted by Her Majesty's Government in consideration of the renunciation to her of the great bodies of water mentioned in the earlier articles of this treaty and of all commercial rights not mentioned in this treaty.

The next paragraph of Article XI provides that licenses in British North American ports shall be granted to United States fishing vessels on the homeward voyage only, to purchase such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, but such provisions shall not be obtained by barter nor purchased for resale or traffic. A Canadian fishing vessel, on whatever voyage, either outward or inward, may now lawfully purchase anything in a port of the United States that any citizen of the United States can purchase, and on the same terms, without any license whatever, and may dispose of any such purchase without any restriction. How does it happen that the United States are to buy, or to accept as an act of generosity, the privilege for our fishing vessels only when they are on the way home, sufficient food to preserve them from starvation, and under the restriction that, being without money, they must not obtain it by the exchange either of fish-hooks or wearing apparel?

If all vessels of the United States, including those engaged in the occupation of catching fish on the high seas, are now, under the arrangements of 1830, entitled as of right to trade in British North American ports, this clause of Article XI surrenders nearly the whole of such right; but if, under the arrangements of 1830 or otherwise, American vessels engaged in fishing on the high seas have no right of entry into British North American ports and no right to trade therein, and their enjoyment of such privileges depends upon the legislative policy of the British Dominion government, can the United States, with the least sentiment of self-respect or with the least regard to American honor, accept such a privilege, so limited, without on the other hand limiting the privileges of similar Dominion vessels in the ports of the United States?

The United States is under no treaty obligation whatever in respect of Dominion fishing or any other vessels, other than those contained in the treaty of 1871 and all those, whatever they may be, are strictly mutual. The committee thinks that such an arrangement as is here proposed, and which necessarily implies that there can be no other or greater rights of American vessels than those here described, is utterly inadmissible unless it be conceded that the business of American citizens carried on on the high seas, hundreds of miles, in many instances, from British North American coasts, is and ought to be subjected in British North American ports to the free will and pleasure of the government of that country and they are to have few of the rights that, by the common intercourse of nations, are accorded to the vessels of all countries as acts of hospitality and humanity, and which by treaty or legislative arrangements of nearly all nations are accorded to the citizens of each in the ports of the other upon perfectly mutual and equal terms, and never otherwise. If we are to buy hospitality why should we not sell it? If we are to submit to British regulations of any occupation on the high seas why should not British subjects in like manner submit to a similar control or exclusion of their vessels by the United States?

The last paragraph of Article XI appears to be thought by the President in his message communicating the treaty to give to our fishing vessels, whether on the homeward voyage or not, the right of purchasing provisions and supplies that ordinarily belongs to trading vessels. In this the committee thinks the President is much mistaken. The first clause of the paragraph provides for licenses to purchase supplies for "the homeward voyage." It then says that such vessels, having obtained the required licenses, shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful supplies as are ordinarily accorded to trading vessels.

If these last-mentioned words have the meaning imputed to them by the President, the words immediately preceding are absolutely useless and can have no meaning whatever; for the privilege, if expressed, is included within those afterwards used, and as the two phrases stand in immediate connection with each other, the absurdity of their insertion in such a case could not possibly have been overlooked by any intelligent person. And if such a really broad provision as is supposed was intended to be inserted in the treaty—one which was intended to completely reverse the whole British pretension upon the subject, and put our fishing vessels, for all purposes of provisions and supplies, upon the same footing that British fishing vessels occupy in the United States and that American trading vessels do in the British provinces—it certainly should, and probably would, have been stated in language incapable of sincere misunderstanding.

What the committee thinks it means is that an American fishing vessel, having obtained a license to purchase provisions on and for the homeward voyage, which is all that the first clause says or describes, viz, the mere act of obtaining the license upon application, such vessel, having obtained such license, shall, upon all occasions to which the license, viz, upon all occasions of the homeward voyage, be accorded facilities for doing what the license says she may. This, the committee thinks, is the literal and grammatical construction of the paragraph, and all that can be extracted from it by the ordinary principles of construction.

The whole of this article, then, as it appears to the committee, is one that would be totally derogatory to the honor and interests of the United States to agree to. The committee can never recommend or agree that any American vessel or citizen shall receive less free and favorable treatment in any foreign port whatever than is accorded to the vessels or subjects of such foreign country by the laws and policy of the United States.

The subject of commercial rights, viewed in another aspect, compels the inquiry whether it is not entirely absurd to consider that if a British port existed on the southwestern or western coast of Newfoundland, or on the coast of Labrador, in respect of which, by the treaty of 1818, there is no exclusion of American vessels from territorial waters, such American vessel could, so far as the treaty of 1818 is concerned, enter such port for all and the same purposes that any other American vessel could, and that, under the same treaty, 50 miles to the eastward on the southern coast of Newfoundland, the very same American vessel should not now have any right of entry for the same purpose?

The twelfth article of the treaty under consideration provides that—

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

If this article was intended to put Canadian fishing vessels upon the same footing only in American ports and waters that American vessels are put in Canadian ports and waters, there would be mutuality and equality, however narrow, in it. But this, evidently, was not the purpose of the article, for it is evident to the committee that Great Britain would not have consented to any such great diminution of the rights of her fishing vessels as they now exist in the ports and waters of the United States. The article itself, it will be seen, while somewhat obscure, is still drawn in such a way as only to be affirmative, and measures privileges, reserved and secured, and says nothing of conditions and limitations and nothing of ports, etc. But, however this may be, the committee does not think that it comports with the dignity or hospitality of the United States to deny to British North American fishing vessels or those of any other country the ordinary commercial rights, hospitalities, and humanities that are now supposed to be nearly universal among nations calling themselves civilized, unless, unhappily, they should be compelled to do so in order to induce just and hospitable treatment to the vessels of our own country.

The thirteenth article provides that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall make regulations for the conspicuous exhibition by every United States fishing vessel of its official number on its bows, and that no vessel shall be entitled to the licenses provided in the treaty which shall fail to comply with such regulations. This provision on its face and taken literally applies to every fishing vessel of the United States, whether it is ever to enter Canadian water or not, and it is a law to the Secretary of the Treasury of perpetual application.

But assuming, however mistaken the language may have been for this purpose, that it is only to apply to United States fishing vessels entering Canadian ports or waters, it is bad enough, for it proceeds upon the idea that vessels of the United States engaged in the occupation of fishing are to be put under a ban of specific apparel and appearance that is not imposed upon any other vessel.

By the article next preceding, and already commented upon, all Canadian fishing vessels are entitled in our waters to all the privileges that American fishing vessels are entitled to have in Canadian waters so far as it regards fishing, at least; but they are not required to be thus numbered and marked. A hundred Canadian fishing vessels may anchor in the harbor of Gloucester, the great fishing port of the United States, and be entitled to every right and every hospitality only upon the evidence of their papers, which show their nationality and that they are not pirates; but if a single American fishing vessel appears in the harbor of Halifax, and under the guns of Her Majesty's forts, she can not obtain any supplies, and her crew may starve at anchor unless upon each bow there is the number affixed by order of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. Certainly, American fishermen and, we should hope, every other American citizen would not be proud of such a distinction.

The fourteenth article of the treaty deals with the subject of penalties for fishing contrary to the treaty of 1818 and the first article of this treaty, and thereby the United States are to agree that such penalty may extend to forfeiture, etc. This is a singular provision (and probably unique) to be found in a treaty between two civilized nations, the general tenor of whose laws and the general social nature of whose institutions are very nearly homogeneous.

The article also provides for a limitation or an exception, as the case may be, of the legal penalties for other violations of fishery rights, three dollars a ton.

It also provides that the proceedings shall be summary and as inexpensive as practicable and that the trial shall be at the place of detention—the place of detention being left to the discretion of the seizing authorities, for without special provision the seized vessel could be taken to any port in the Dominion.

It then provides that security for costs shall not be required of the defense except when bail is offered; that is to say, that when a vessel with all its furniture, tackle, apparel, and cargo, and its captain and all its crew are seized and arrested and taken to a place of detention security for costs shall not be required until the arrested citizen of the United States shall desire to release his vessel or get out of prison.

This certainly must be only what every just government would provide of itself. The same may be said of all the other provisions of the article. They are all identical with or analogous to the practice of civilized governments, and rest upon common principles of good administration of justice. Surely they should need no treaty contract to bring them into practice.

The fifteenth article of the treaty is open and conditional, and provides that when the United States shall admit British North American fish oil, whale or seal oil, and fish of all kinds except fish preserved in oil, free of customs duties, the like products of the United States shall be admitted free into British North America, and it is also provided that in that case United States fishing vessels may be entitled—not to fish in-shore as the treaty of 1871 provided but—to annual licenses for the following purposes in British North America:

- (1) The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seals, supplies, etc.
- (2) The transshipment of catch.
- (3) The shipping of crews, but that supplies shall not be obtained in barter.
- (4) And that the like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing vessels of British North America on the Atlantic coast of the United States.

This is a much worse "reciprocity" than existed under the treaty of 1871, for while the treaty of 1871 was silent in respect of commercial rights in either country and left the matter of the commercial rights standing upon mutual legislative regulations of the two countries, the treaty limits the rights of the fishing vessels to certain specified forms and descriptions of commercial privileges, though it does seem to recognize the truth that would otherwise appear to have been forgotten.

the negotiations, that Canadian fishing vessels now have commercial rights and privileges in the ports of the United States.

The impolicy of the general provisions of article 15 have already been twice fully demonstrated, and, on the last occasion of the kind, were unanimously abrogated by Congress. It is thought needless to now go into a discussion of that subject.

We have thus briefly reviewed all the substantial articles of the treaty of positive obligation excepting Article IX, which declares that nothing in the treaty shall affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso. This article was evidently inserted on account of the renunciation by the United States of its rights in Chedabucto Bay—this bay being at the southern entrance of that strait.

It is almost unnecessary to say that the committee is fully sensible that in many matters of fair difference and of doubtful consideration between two governments, in order to arrive at an amicable composition thereof there must be mutual concessions, and that the same is true in respect of entering into new engagements for commercial and other intercourse between nations, in order that, in the last-named case, perfect mutuality of right and privilege may be had in respect of the same matters; but the committee does not think that the proposed treaty can be justified in this way.

This idea of concession was doubtless the ground and guide upon which the treaty of 1818 was founded. At the time of that treaty the United States claimed (and justly as the committee thinks) that the fishing rights recognized by the treaty of 1783 on all the shores of British North America were property rights and that they were not lost by the war of 1812, and that after the treaty of peace of 1814, which made no mention of the subject, those rights existed with all their original force.

The British Government insisted upon the contrary and that the right of citizens of the United States to fish in any British North American waters had been entirely lost. This led to a partition of the disputed territory—whether wise or unwise is immaterial to the present question—but in making this settlement the contracting parties had evidently in view the then understood law of nations, that territorial waters only extended to three miles from the shore; and they also had in view the then existing state of treaty and legal relations between Great Britain and the United States in respect of intercourse between the British North American Provinces and this country, and the treaty provided in clear terms where, in British waters, United States fishermen might fish and where they might not.

The only possible question that could fairly arise under the treaty of 1818 was the question what was a British bay. But the question, as a practical one, has been in all the sixty-nine years since the making of that treaty of little or no account; for, so far as is known, the only seizure of an American vessel by the British authorities for fishing more than 3 miles from the shore in a bay more than 6 miles wide was the seizure of the Washington, in 1843, and in that case, as has been before stated, the international umpire decided the seizure to have been an illegal and unjust one.

What American fishermen standing in all other respects on the footing of other Americans engaged in business on the sea, might do in their character as fishermen in the territorial waters and harbors of British North America was clearly stated, and in language that would seem to have been incapable of sincere misunderstanding.

The whole of the substance of the present state of the difficulty and discord has arisen from the course of the British and Canadian legislation and administration, directed against the vessels and fishermen of the United States in respect of their coming into British North American ports or harbors or within three miles of their shores, either under treaty rights or commercial rights.

In view of the plain history of these transactions and of the matters hereinbefore stated, it does not seem to the committee that the existing matters of difficulty are subjects for treaty negotiation; and such appears to have been the opinion of the Senate by its action and by the remarks of many of its members of both political parties and by the action of the House of Representatives upon and in the passage of the act of March 3, 1887, and its approval by the President.

No new event or situation of affairs has arisen since that time, and the only real questions subsisting between the two countries in respect of the subject were those of reclamations by the United States for outrages upon its citizens, for which this treaty makes no provision, and the question of whether the mutual arrangements of 1830 and the mutual rights of transit under the treaty of 1871 shall continue.

This treaty makes no provision for an indemnity. It does make provision for establishing for the full measure and limit of rights and privileges to be enjoyed by fishing vessels of the United States, whatever other character they may also have and appear in, in the ports and waters of British North America, and it thus surrenders rights and privileges that the committee thinks are clearly and fully established under the arrangements of 1830, and the treaty of 1871, or, if such rights and privileges can be claimed not to exist in these respects, that it provides, as of original and perpetual engagement, for the exclusion of the American vessels engaged in a particular occupation on the high seas from the ordinary humanities and hospitalities and equalities enjoyed in the British North American ports by all other vessels of the United States, and, so far as is known, all the vessels of every character of every other country, while at the same time British North American vessels engaged in the same occupation and in the same seas have, without restraint, every right and facility of commerce, hospitality, and immunity in all the ports of the United States. To enter into such an engagement, finally and perpetually, as this, the committee thinks contrary to the dignity and just interests of the United States.

The committee regrets that these conclusions do not meet the approval of all its members. It had hoped, as has been the case generally hitherto, that no influences or divisions of a nature coincident with the lines of political parties would enter into a matter of this character, and that, as was the case only a little more than a year ago, all Senators of all political parties would unite in standing firmly in the attitude taken in the winter of 1886-'87 and culminating in the act of March 3, 1887, and in declining, at whatever cost, to enter into any new engagements with the British Government that should leave any American citizen, engaged in whatever occupation or business, deprived of any right or privilege, other than fishing, in any British North American or other waters, that is or may be granted to citizens of the United States engaged in any other occupation, and that have been and are fully and freely granted by the United States to every British subject, whatever may be his occupation.

The committee thinks it due to the Senate to state that, contrary (as it believes) to the universal previous practice of the Executive in connection with the consideration of treaties when the Senate has asked for all the papers and information in detail concerning the progress of the negotiations, the Executive has not thought it for the "public interest," in this instance, to communicate all such papers and such detailed information to the Senate, although the Senate requested it; and it was stated in reply to the resolution of request that the deliberations of the plenipotentiaries were in confidence, and "that only results should be announced and such other matters as the joint protocolists should sign under the direction of the plenipotentiaries."

It is, however, stated that every point submitted to conference is covered by papers already in possession of the Senate, excepting the question of damages sustained by our fishermen, and which, it is stated, was met by a counter-claim for damages to British vessels in the Behring Sea. It is then added that—

To the discretion and control of the Executive are intrusted the initiation and conduct of the negotiation of treaties, and without the guaranty of mutual and implicit confidence between the agents, negotiations for the voluntary adjustment of vexed questions in controversy between nations could not hopefully be entered upon.

It thus appears to be claimed by the Executive that the Senate, without whose advice and consent no treaty can be concluded, has no right to be informed, confidentially, of the course of negotiations and discussions and the various propositions and arguments pro and con arising in the negotiation of a treaty. The committee feels it to be their duty to protest against any such assumption. It believes that such a claim is contrary to the essential nature of the constitutional relations between the President and the Senate on such subjects, and that it is the reverse of the continuous practice in such matters from the commencement of the Government to this time.

The principal points of the treaty, etc., that have been considered by the committee in the foregoing statement and discussion may be summarized substantially as follows:

SUMMARY.

I. The United States recognize as British territory and renounce forever all claim of independent right in all the great bays along the British North American coasts, named in the treaty, and admit that all such bays form a part of and are within British territorial sovereignty and jurisdiction.

II. Of the few of such great bays that are left to be visited by American fisherman the larger part are understood to be valueless, and some of them are subject to French fishery rights older than our own, if they are British bays.

III. If bay fishing is not profitable now it may be in the future.

IV. Whether profitable or not, the United States ought not to give up, upon any consideration whatever, the right of its vessels of every character to visit and carry on business in any part of the public seas.

V. The treaty surrenders the claim and right of the United States, which has been acted upon and exercised for now more than a century, of its vessels engaged in fishing or other occupations to visit and carry on their business in these great bays, and the principle of which claim and right has once been solemnly decided against Great Britain by a tribunal organized under a treaty with that Government.

VI. The new area of delimitation described in the treaty greatly increases the danger of our fishermen unintentionally invading prohibited waters, and thereby exposing them to seizures and penalties.

VII. The treaty, by its fifth article, renounces any right of the United States in any bay, etc., however large, that "can not be reached from the sea without passing within the 3 marine miles mentioned in article 1 of the convention of October 20, 1818," thus excluding vessels of the United States from all waters, however extensive, and the distance between whose headlands is however great, the sailing channel to which may happen to be within 3 miles of the shore.

VIII. The treaty is a complete surrender of any claim of a right now existing either under the treaty of 1783, the treaty of 1818, the acts of Congress and the British orders in council of 1830, or the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, for vessels of the United States engaged in fishing anywhere on the high seas, and even having a commercial character also, to enter any port of British North America for any commercial purpose whatever, and puts in the place of these clear rights, which, in respect of British fishing vessels, exist in the United States to the fullest extent, greatly restricted and conditional rights as arising solely from a present grant of Great Britain.

It binds the United States to be content with whatever is given by this treaty as the full measure of its rights, and to be content with it however, or until greater hospitality and freedom of intercourse can be obtained by further concessions or considerations on our part.

X. In the face of all this it leaves British North American fishing vessels possessed of all commercial rights in all the ports and waters of the United States.

XI. Whatever privileges of commerce, hospitality, or humanity are thus provided for in the treaty are to be obtained only upon condition that no fishing vessel of the United States shall receive any of them unless such fishing vessel shall, under regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, be branded with an official number on each bow, and that such regulation shall, before they become effectual, be communicated to Her Majesty's Government.

XII. It provides that general, and even then, much limited, commercial rights and rights of transshipment, as mentioned in article fifteen, shall be obtained only at the price of exempting all Canadian fishery products from our custom duties.

XIII. Its provisions concerning the executive and judicial treatment of American vessels and fishermen that may be seized or arrested for supposed illegal conduct are, to make the most of them, nothing other, and probably something less, than a statement of what the laws and conduct of any administration of every government professing to be civilized should adopt and exercise as an act of duty and justice.

XIV. Instead of diminishing sources of irritation and causes of difficulty, different interpretations and disputes, it will, the committee thinks, very largely increase them.

Various other suggestions adverse to the wisdom of ratifying this treaty might easily be made, but the committee does not think it necessary to go into them.

The committee can not but hope, that if these ill-advised negotiations, which, as is known to all the world, can not properly commit the United States in any degree until they shall have received the constitutional assent of the Senate, shall fail to meet the approval of this body, Her Majesty's Government will take measures to secure justice and fair treatment in her North American dominions to American vessels and American citizens, in all respects and under all circumstances, and that that Government will see the justice and propriety of according to American vessels engaged in the business of fishing all the commercial rights and facilities in her North American ports that are so freely and cheerfully accorded to her own in the ports of the United States, and that thus the friendship and good feeling which ought to exist between neighboring nations may be finally established and secured.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

UPON THE

Treaty signed on the 15th February, 1888, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain, dissenting from the report of the majority of that committee, which recommends that the Senate refuse to advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty.

The minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations dissent from the report of the majority recommending the rejection of the treaty with Great Britain dated February 15, 1888, and submitted to the Senate for its consideration, and present the following as their principal reasons for their dissent :

Two objections to this treaty were stated in committee.

(1) That it had been negotiated and signed by persons who were not duly empowered, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, to conduct and conclude a treaty.

(2) That the treaty, on its merits, should not be ratified by the Senate.

To meet the first objection, a member of the minority of the committee introduced the following resolution :

Resolved, That the treaty signed by Thomas F. Bayard, William L. Putnam, and James B. Angell, as plenipotentiaries of the United States, in conjunction with the British plenipotentiaries, on the 15th day of February, 1888, and sent to the Senate by the President as a treaty duly negotiated, for the consideration and action of the Senate, is properly authenticated as a treaty made by the President of the United States, acting within his constitutional powers, and is lawful and valid as a negotiation.

The purpose of this resolution was to bring before the Senate, in distinct form, the recommendation of the committee as to the merits of the treaty, apart from any collateral matter relating to the negotiation of the instrument.

In committee, this resolution was laid upon the table, and thereby any recommendation as to the question it presents, in answer to the first objection to the treaty, as above stated, was avoided.

The minority of the committee hold that it is entirely competent for a majority in the Senate to declare that the treaty has been negotiated and signed in a proper manner, and by persons duly qualified, or otherwise to return it to the President as a paper that does not call into exercise the powers and jurisdiction of the Senate upon the question of its ratification by them. And, if a majority in the Senate shall declare that the treaty is sent to the Senate by the President and is duly signed and authenticated, or if no objection to it on that ground is made, then the subject-matter of the treaty is in order and should be considered by the Senate.

It is not disputed, or, so far as the undersigned are informed, doubted, by any one that the Senate may accept and ratify, on the part of the United States, any treaty that the President has made with a foreign government, that he sends to the Senate for consideration, and may waive any informality attending its negotiation.

In accepting the paper sent to the Senate by the President as a treaty, and by referring the same to its committee, the Senate have virtually waived any informality, if there is any, in the negotiation and signing of the instrument, and the undersigned conceive that the whole duty of the committee was to consider and report upon the merits of the treaty.

The undersigned will, therefore, present their views upon the substance of the treaty, first, and will then state the reasons that force them to the conclusion that there can be no just ground for the rejection of the treaty, growing out of the manner of its negotiation.

If it is better for the country that the treaty should be ratified, the rejection of it for matters that are merely formal or technical, in so grave an emergency as is now presented in connection with this old and harassing controversy, would be a serious injury to the country.

The undersigned believe that it is better for our country that the treaty should be ratified, and they are equally convinced that the entire class of our people who are actively engaged in our North Atlantic fishing industry will be benefited by its ratification.

The first article of the treaty of 1818 is as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States, for the inhabitants thereof, to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, It is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly, indefinitely, along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company. And that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland hereabove described, and of the coast of Labrador; but, so soon as the same or any portion thereof shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish, on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

Articles 18 to 25, both inclusive, of the treaty of 1871, covered the whole subject of the fishing rights and liberties between the United States and the British North American colonies, "in addition" to those secured by the treaty of 1818. No other articles in the treaty of 1871 related to the fisheries, or the rights of fishermen. When the United States abrogated these articles, that completely ended the influence of that treaty over our fishing rights. Article 29 was not terminated, but it never had the least reference to the fisheries treaty of 1818, to enlarge its scope, change its meaning, or in any way to affect any right to which that treaty related. Yet, if that is not the true meaning of the 29th article of the treaty of 1871, this present treaty in no way affects that article, and it stands for all that it was ever worth in favor of our fishermen.

I.

GENERAL STATEMENT OF THE SITUATION WHICH HAS RESULTED FROM THE "MISUNDERSTANDING" AS TO THE TRUE MEANING OF THE TREATY OF 1818.

During seventy years the people of the United States and of the British North American provinces in the northeast have been frequently engaged in contention and dispute, in controversy and conflict, about the true interpretation of the fisheries treaty of 1818.

The most frequent and serious disagreements have arisen under the proviso to the first article, which is as follows:

Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, and of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

This proviso, as it was proposed by our negotiators, contained the words "and bait" after the word "water." These words were stricken out, with the consent of our Commissioners. The right to obtain bait was thus finally disposed of as a treaty right.

In this proviso the four distinct "privileges hereby reserved to" American fishermen are stated definitely, while "such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent" them in any manner from "abusing the privileges" reserved to them are not defined, except in the most general terms.

American fishermen are placed "under such restrictions" with no guaranty as to the jurisdiction, whether provincial or imperial, that shall promulgate and enforce them; or whether they shall be declared by legislative authority, or administered by executive authority or by the judiciary.

It was contemplated in this treaty that further definitions on these delicate questions should be settled, either by the future agreement of the treaty powers, or that Great Britain should choose the tribunals that would declare and enforce these "restrictions" against American fishermen, subject only to the requirement that they should be "such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

That controversies would arise under this uncertain definition of the power to prescribe restrictions to our fishermen in the enjoyment of positive treaty rights was as certain in 1818 as seventy years' experience has proven it to be, in an unfortunate history.

It was probably expected in 1818 that the good sense of the people and the good will of their Governments would enable them to arrange these indefinite "restrictions" by precedent and acquiescence, and thus adopt a series of regulations, the justice and propriety of which all would admit. But such hopes, if they were entertained, have been disappointed, and the eager rivalry that a very lucrative employment has stimulated has involved the people and their Governments in dangerous controversies as to the "restrictions" that were left without accurate definition in the proviso to the first article of the treaty of 1818.

Efforts have been made, that were for a time successful, to compose these and other troublesome questions growing out of article 1 of the treaty of 1818, by new treaty arrangements relating to the fisheries in British waters on the northeastern coasts.

In the treaty of 1854 the repose of these questions was secured for a time for the consideration of a liberal reciprocity extending to a variety of subjects. The right of the free navigation of the St. Lawrence River was included in that reciprocal agreement, and was made perpetual by the reciprocity treaty of 1871.

In the treaty of 1871 we again put these questions to rest for a time by the promise of enough money to equalize the possible advantages of the Canadian and other fisheries over those on our coast north of 39° north latitude.

Neither of these arrangements proved satisfactory to us as to the fisheries, and they were terminated by the United States.

In addition to these efforts, our diplomatists have employed every argument that seemed possible, through many years of laborious correspondence and conference, to find a ground of mutual understanding and consent as to the true interpretation of the treaty of 1818.

Without attempting to state all the cases of warnings, seizures, fines, and confiscations, of searches and captures and other rigorous applications of "restrictions" that have been visited upon our fishermen, it is painfully true that they have been very numerous, frequently very aggravated, and have caused our fishermen great expense and serious losses.

Every fishing season, when the reciprocity treaties were not in force, has added to these complications and rendered their solution more difficult.

That very little progress has been made in reaching a common basis of agreement in the solution of these contentions and conflicting constructions of the proviso in article 1 of the treaty of 1818, or in respect of the headland theory (which is based, as we understand, upon the language of that proviso and the preceding parts of that section, and not upon the principles of international law), is apparent from the citations of cases that have arisen since 1818, presently to be made.

Instead of a nearer approach to such an understanding as to a true and mutually acceptable construction of the first article of the treaty, a wider divergence of opinion and a more determined contention have characterized the diplomacy of both the treaty powers.

We seem now to have reached a point where we must seek to allay the growing bitterness of these differences by a friendly, sincere, and mutually respectful consideration of the positions assumed by each Government, or else we must enforce our views by vigorous measures of retaliation.

It seems to have become necessary to make such modifications of that treaty as are suggested by our changed commercial relations since 1818, and also by our methods of fishing with purse seines and of preserving fish in ice and saw, which have grown up into almost entirely new systems, with new attending wants, in the past thirty years.

The gradual abridgment of our right to land and cure fish on the shores of the British possessions, as the country along the shores should become populated, was provided for in the treaties of 1783, 1818, 1854, and 1871. This feature in a treaty is thought to be entirely novel. It relates to a future expected change in the condition of the then uninhabited coasts of British America. It certainly suggests in a forcible way that it was contemplated that future modifications of the treaties would be necessary to meet these changed conditions when they should occur.

The progress of civilization on the North American continent, with the necessary increase of commerce and of improvement in every industry, has wrought changes in the condition of the people which have demanded, from time to time, changes in the treaty relations of the adjoining countries that were indispensable.

The right of navigating the Mississippi and St. Lawrence Rivers, as now agreed upon, is a most forcible illustration of this necessity for an international policy, modified by international agreement, that will provide for the mutual wants and advantage of these adjoining countries as the occasion demands.

An inflexible adherence to the literal construction of ancient agreements that have become too narrow for the convenience of either country, whether it results from national jealousy or commercial rivalry, creates an incubus upon the progress of the communities concerned that is derogatory to those who refuse to yield their prejudices.

Mr. Bayard, in presenting to the consideration of the British Government the reasons for a more liberal interpretation of the treaty of 1818, and for an enlargement of the privileges of our fishermen in the colonial ports, strongly urged the necessity for this relaxation of the strict and literal construction placed by that Government on that treaty, because of the growth of the commerce of both countries, the building of vast lines of railways, the increase of population, the enlarged demand for the products of the fisheries, and the more intimate commercial and social relations of the people.

Such considerations demand careful attention, and are, of themselves, sufficient reasons to induce both Governments to lay aside prejudices and resentments, and to induce their people to cultivate friendly relations, rather than to put their welfare at hazard by fostering ill-will towards each other, resulting in continual strife.

To show the very serious results of a different policy, the undersigned present the following statement of cases that have arisen out of the conflicting views as to the meaning of the first article of the treaty of 1818. It is probably far short of the full list of cases that have actually occurred, but it is large enough to disclose the fact that wide and serious differences have existed since 1819 in the interpretation of that treaty, attended with complaints and remonstrances and protests, followed by diplomatic correspondence, and at times threatening the gravest consequences to the peace of the two countries.

In all the long list of cases that are here referred to only in one case, that of The Washington, seized for fishing in the Bay of Fundy in 1843, has any reparation been made for any wrong done our fishermen under the treaty of 1818.

Reparation was not, indeed, demanded in any such case until 1886.

The following lists are taken from the subjoined correspondence of Secretary Bayard and Professor Baird with Mr. Edmunds, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

U. S. COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,

Washington, D. C., February 5, 1887.

SIR: I forward herewith, for your information, a copy of a communication from Mr. R. Edward Earll, in charge of the Division of Fisheries of this Commission, accompanied by a list of New England fishing vessels which have been inconvenienced in their fishing operations by the Canadian authorities during the past season; these being in addition to the vessels mentioned in the revised list of vessels involved in the controversy with the Canadian authorities, furnished to your committee on January 25 by the Secretary of State.

The papers containing the statements were received from the owners, masters, or agents of the vessels concerned, and, though not accompanied by affidavits, are believed to be correct.

Very respectfully, yours,

SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,

Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

U. S. COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,

Washington, D. C., February 5, 1887.

SIR: Sometime since, at your request, I mailed circulars to owners or agents of all New England vessels employed in the food-fish fisheries. These called for full statistics of the vessels' operations during the year 1886, and, in addition, for statements of any inconveniences to which the vessels had been subjected by the recent action of the Canadian Government in denying to American fishing vessels the right to buy bait, ice, or other supplies in its ports, or in placing unusual restrictions on the use of its harbors for shelter.

A very large percentage of the replies to these circulars have already been received, and an examination of same shows that, in addition to the vessels mentioned in the revised list transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate on January 26, 1887, sixty-eight other New England fishing vessels have been subjected to treatment which neither the treaty of 1818 nor the principles of international law would seem to warrant.

I inclose for your consideration a list of these vessels, together with a brief abstract of the statements of the owners or masters regarding the treatment received. The statements were not accompanied by affidavits, but are believed to be entirely reliable. The name and address of the informant are given in each instance.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. EDWARD EARLE,
In charge Division of Fisheries.

Prof. SPENCER F. BAIRD,
U. S. Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

PARTIAL LIST OF VESSELS INVOLVED IN THE FISHERIES CONTROVERSY WITH THE CANADIAN AUTHORITIES, FROM INFORMATION FURNISHED TO THE UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

[Supplementing a list transmitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, by the Secretary of State, January 20, 1887.]

1. Eliza A. Thomas (schooner). Portland, Me.; E. S. Bibbs, master. Wrecked on Nova Scotia shore, and unable to obtain assistance. Crew not permitted to land or to save anything until permission was received from captain of enter. Canadian officials placed guard over fish saved, and everything saved from wreck narrowly escaped confiscation. (From statements of C. D. Thomas, owner, Portland, Me.)
2. Christina Ellsworth (schooner). Eastport, Me.; James Ellsworth, master. Entered Port Hastings, Cape Breton, for wood; anchored at 10 o'clock, and reported at custom-house. At 2 o'clock was boarded by captain of enter Hector and ordered to sea, being forced to leave without wood. In every harbor entered was refused privilege of buying anything. Anchored under lee of land in no harbor, but was compelled to enter at custom-house. In no two harbors were the fees alike. (From statements of James Ellsworth, owner and master, Eastport, Me.)
3. Mary E. Whorf (schooner). Wellfleet, Mass.; Simon Berrio, master. In July, 1886, lost seine off North Cape, Prince Edward Island, and not allowed to make any repairs on shore, causing a broken voyage and a long delay. Ran short of provisions, and being denied privilege of buying any on land, had to obtain from another American vessel. (From statements of Freeman A. Snow, owner, Wellfleet, Mass.)
4. Stowell Sherman (schooner). Provincetown, Mass.; S. F. Hatch, master. Not allowed to purchase necessary supplies, and obliged to report at custom-houses, situated at distant and inconvenient places; ordered out of harbors in stress of weather, namely, out of Cascumpee harbor, Prince Edward Island, nineteen hours after entry, and out of Malpeque harbor, Prince Edward Island, fifteen hours after entry, wind then blowing too hard to admit of fishing. Returned home with broken trip. (From statements of Samuel T. Hatch, owner and master, Provincetown, Mass.)

5. Walter L. Rich (schooner). Wellfleet, Mass.; Obadiah Rich, master. Ordered out of Malpeque, P. E. I., in unsuitable weather for fishing, having been in harbor only twelve hours. (From statements of Obadiah Rich, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)
6. Bertha D. Nickerson (schooner). Booth Bay, Me.; N. E. Nickerson, master. Occasioned considerable expense by being denied Canadian harbors to procure crew, and detained in spring while waiting for men to come from Nova Scotia. (From statements of S. Nickerson & Sons, owners, Booth Bay, Me.)
7. Newell B. Hayes (schooner). Wellfleet, Mass.; Thomas C. Kennedy, master. Refused privilege of buying provisions in ports on Bay Saint Lawrence, and in consequence obliged to leave for home with half a cargo. Made harbor at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, in face of storm, at 5 p. m., and master immediately started for custom-house, 5 miles distant, meeting captain of cutter Terror on way, to whom he explained errand. On returning, found two armed men from cutter on his vessel. At 7 o'clock next morning was ordered to sea, but refused to go in the heavy fog. At 9 o'clock the fog lifted slightly, and, though the barometer was very low and a storm imminent, vessel was forced to leave. Soon met the heavy gale, which split sails, causing considerable damage. Captain of Terror denied claim to right of remaining in harbor twenty-four hours. (From statements of T. C. Kennedy, part owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)

I., to buy provisions, and was compelled to return home September 10, before close of fishing season. Was obliged to report at custom-house every time he entered a harbor, even if only for shelter. Frye, owner and master, Boston, Mass.)

In 1886 700 vessels were boarded, and 1,362 in 1887, to investigate their conduct, of which 30 were brought to the attention of the British Government.

These lists comprise, in all, nearly 400 vessels that have been involved in seizures and other interferences growing out of disputed constructions of the treaty of 1818.

That so many cases have arisen out of this conflict of opinion is, in part, fairly attributable to an aggressive temper on the part of the Canadians, which has not been successfully restrained by the Government of Great Britain, and to an obstinate adherence to the letter of the treaty, to the sacrifice of its spirit and to the prejudice of the "liberties" and "privileges" secured by its terms to American fishermen, as our Government understands the matter.

The treaty had reference to extensive lines of sea-coast upon which the bays, harbors, and creeks were as well known by name and location in 1818 as they are now, but they were not exactly described in that instrument.

It can not be assumed, at least in our diplomacy, that it is irrational or uncandid for the British Government to contend that the entrance of these places, so well known, was intended to designate a base-line from which to measure the 3-mile limit, within which we forever renounced the right to take or cure or dry fish.

Our construction has been that we did not renounce these "liberties" in the bays, harbors, and creeks, except within 3 miles of the coasts thereof, while the British contention has been that the word "coasts" in the treaty relates only to the open sea-coasts, and not to the coasts of bays, harbors, and creeks that are claimed and controlled by the provincial governments as territorial waters.

The British contention is also fortified by the argument, as they insist, that, in the proviso to article 1 of the treaty, our right to enter for shelter, wood, water, and repairs, is limited to "bays or harbors" and does not extend to "creeks" or to "coasts," and that these were not opened to our right of entry, because of the difficulty of enforcing the "restrictions" upon the use of these privileges, to which we gave our consent in the treaty, on the coasts and creeks, at places remote from their ports.

It has been the duty of our diplomatists, forced upon them by the importance of our interests, to endeavor to overcome these contentions of the British Government, and to insist upon a more liberal construction of the treaty.

The task has not been an easy one, and the progress we have made is scarcely discernible; for no admitted change in British opinion seems to have been accomplished in respect of the exclusion, from our treaty rights of fishery, of the creeks, bays, and harbors whose names, limits, and location were known, and were recognized by their laws as territorial waters in 1818, except in reference to the Bay of Fundy.

In 1854 and in 1871 we submerged these questions beneath others of great importance, and paid heavily, in reciprocal tariff arrangements in one case, and in money in the other instance, for the security and protection of our fishermen against the British head-land theory, as they claimed it, in territorial waters, and for the right of inshore fishing.

On the other branch of the subject, relating to the promulgation and enforcement of "such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent * * * abusing the privileges * * * reserved to" American fishermen, the cases have been more numerous, the discussions more heated, the interferences with our fishermen and their vessels, and with other vessels, more annoying and damaging, than those that have arisen under the head-land theory.

In most of these cases the provincial courts, or the privy council of the local governments, have made decisions, or statements, expounding their laws, both provincial and imperial, and insisting upon their right and jurisdiction, under the treaty, to do all that has been done by them to our fishermen, except in the affair of Fortune Bay.

What is sometimes termed the reciprocity of 1830, by which the interdiction on commercial intercourse between the North American British Provinces and the United States was relieved, and commercial intercourse was established on a liberal footing, gave to our merchant ships extensive privileges that the treaty of 1818, under the British construction, denied to our fishing vessels.

This so-called reciprocity was not established by positive law in either country; but, under the proclamation of President Jackson, authorized by law, and under the orders of the Privy Council of Great Britain, the liberties of commerce were mutually accorded to the merchant ships of each country in the ports of the other. We will hereafter refer more particularly to that arrangement.

Many of our fishing vessels being licensed, under our laws, to touch and trade in foreign ports, our Government has since claimed for them in Canadian ports the hospitality accorded to our other merchant vessels and all the liberties that they enjoy.

This reasonable claim was based upon the new conditions of our commercial intercourse with Canada as established by "the reciprocity of 1830,"

It was met with the declaration that American fishermen and their vessels had only the rights, in Canadian waters and ports, that are expressly reserved to them under the treaty of 1818; and that all other rights are denied to them by that treaty; and the further insistence that the United States can confer no other rights upon them, in those waters, than such as the treaty gives them in their character as fishermen.

This question has led to serious disagreement and has been unavoidably mixed up with the question of the proper construction of the treaty of 1818.

This blending of these subjects has resulted, in part, from the enlarged privileges secured to our fishermen in the treaties of 1854 and 1871, and from the British laws and regulations, under which no express distinction is made between fishing vessels and purely commercial vessels as to entrance and clearance; port and harbor dues; pilotage and tonnage dues; the right to demand manifests and to inspect cargoes.

They employ their regulations, prescribed for commercial vessels, to prevent fishing vessels from having shelter for more than twenty-four hours in a bay or harbor; or from obtaining water or wood, or making repairs, unless they have been duly entered in the custom-house and have conformed to all the regulations that apply to merchant vessels.

The denial of every commercial privilege to our fishermen, even to the supply of wants that humanity demands, while imposing upon them every "restriction" that merchant vessels were required to endure, naturally excited the indignation of our people.

The contrast between the treatment, in these respects, of merchant vessels of all nations (including those of the United States) and our fishing vessels was painful and unjust, as it was unnecessary, and placed the men engaged in an honorable and highly useful pursuit under the ban of unjust and unfriendly discrimination, and branded them as persons against whom there was a general and recognized suspicion of bad character or of unworthy designs.

During the interval between 1818 and 1830 the treaty of 1818 furnished the only rule, equitable or legal, for the admeasurement of the rights of our fishermen.

Since 1830, except when the treaties of 1854 and 1871 were in force, the British Government, instead of relaxing the "restrictions" upon our fishermen, has increased them, and has been very alert in confining them to the strict letter of the treaty of 1818, whenever that has operated, as to their fishing and other liberties and privileges.

II.

WHETHER IT IS OUR WISEST AND SAFEST POLICY TO RESORT TO THE LAWS OF NATIONS, ENFORCED BY ALL MEASURES THAT MAY BE NECESSARY, OR TO TREATY ARRANGEMENTS, FOR THE REGULATION, GENERALLY, OF OUR FISHING RIGHTS?

It is quite clear that, until we are free from the obligations of the treaty of 1818, they are a part of our supreme law, which no department of our own Government can violate without violating our Constitution.

As the treaty is perpetual in the renunciation of our right of common fishery, partitioned to us as an appanage of the country whose independence we established, we can not, by any means short of a successful war, re-instate the United States, by our own act, in the enjoyment of the right that was so renounced.

We can free ourselves of any embarrassment arising out of the treaty of 1818, as to our fishermen, licensed to touch and trade, by repealing it, but nobody seems to desire such a course of action, or to court the situation in which it would place both countries.

The struggle, in such an event, would be at once renewed under retaliatory laws (if this treaty is rejected); but every movement in such a policy would be very costly to the people of both countries, and, as a probable result, would eventuate in war.

So, we must live under the treaty and be constantly embroiled with the British Government as to its proper interpretation; or we must reform that interpretation by a fair and just agreement with that Government; or we must repeal or abandon it, and then rely upon retaliation to redress our wrongs.

The demand of our fishermen for an enlargement of their commercial privileges, to correspond with those of our merchant vessels, and for a more liberal hospitality in their bays, is the pith and essence of our demand for a more liberal interpretation of the treaty of 1818.

This demand has to a great degree grown out of the changed conditions, both of fishing ventures and commercial intercourse, with the British provinces since 1830.

It was not considered in 1818, but it can not be denied consideration now, in view of these changed conditions.

It is insisted by some that the treaty of 1818 gives no commercial rights to our fishing vessels; that it relates only to fishing rights and to some incidental privileges of hospitality accorded to our fishermen; that there is no need to amend the treaty so as to secure them commercial rights; and that these should be secured, and would be, through our legislative powers of retaliation upon the commerce of the British possessions.

If we infuse into that treaty the substance of this demand, it must be done by an agreement, in the nature of an amendment, that furnishes some reciprocal concession to the people of the British possessions concerned in the fisheries; otherwise we will fail to gain their consent to it.

If we stand upon that treaty without amendment, as a fishing treaty, insisting that it has nothing to do with the commercial privileges of our fishing vessels, and that it leaves us free to demand for them the same commercial privileges that we accord to Canadian fishermen, we place this demand alone upon the ground of international comity, which is in no sense a substantial right, and is outside of all treaty agreements.

We would then have the treaty prohibition against our fishing vessels entering Canadian bays and harbors for "any other purpose whatever" than to buy wood, obtain water, make repairs, and find shelter; while their commercial privileges would entitle them to enter the ports of these bays and harbors for any lawful commercial purpose; and this would result from our act in giving them, under our laws, the double character of fishermen and merchantmen.

The British Government treats this proposition as a mere attempt to evade the treaty of 1818, and, in that view, they insist upon its rigid enforcement. They quote the restrictions of the treaty of 1818 as being obligatory upon the United States, and insist that we can not change the character of a vessel from a fisherman to a merchantman by giving to such vessel any form of license, enrollment, registry, or sea papers, in addition to such as place it in the class of a fishing vessel.

However illiberal such a contention may be, they certainly claim the right, under the treaty, and outside of it as well, to deny all entrance of our fishing vessels to their bays and harbors, except in their character as fishermen. As vessels of commerce, the British Government claims that they enter the ports by comity alone. As fishing vessels, they admit that they enter the bays and harbors by right, under the treaty, but only for the purposes to which the treaty of 1818 restricts them.

We do not intend to lay down what we may believe to be the limits of jurisdiction over adjacent seas that are said to be secured to the Governments owning the coasts by the laws of nations. Chancellor Kent, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Seward, and many other great lawyers and statesmen of our country have advocated theories on this subject quite at variance with the 3-mile boundary of our right of jurisdiction seaward from the coast. This question needs to be handled with great circumspection. This is a very important matter.

A vast extent of the coast of the Pacific, reaching to the arctic circle, and destined to become a more important fishing-ground than the Atlantic coasts, must be affected by the principles of international law which the United States shall assert as defining the limits seaward from the coasts of our exclusive right to fish for seals and sea-otters, whales, and the many varieties of food-fishes that swarm along the coasts of Behring Sea and Straits. We might find, in that quarter, a very inconvenient application of the doctrine that, by the law of nations, the three-mile limit of the exclusive right of fishery is to follow and be measured from the sinuosities of the coasts of the bays, creeks, and harbors that exceed six miles in width at the entrance; and an equally inconvenient application of our claim for full commercial privileges in Canadian ports for our fishermen, when applied to British Columbian fishermen in our Pacific ports, which are nearer to them than to our fisheries in Alaska.

No allusion is made in the treaty of 1818 to the laws of nations as furnishing canons for its interpretation; and we infer that its meaning is to be gathered alone from its context and the circumstances that attended its adoption.

The undersigned believe that the interpretation of that treaty, which has led to its reformation in the treaty now before the Senate, is far in advance of anything that any American diplomat has officially demanded of the British Government, and will lead to a full and amicable adjustment of all troubles of the sort that have heretofore arisen; and that it will open the way for a liberal and neighborly agreement as to such differences as may hereafter arise, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

In this interpretation and reformation of our existing treaty, the United States make no committals as to the exclusive rights of fishing under the laws of nations that may affect our interests in the Pacific and the Gulf of Mexico in the future; nor do they place the delimitations of the fishing-grounds, or the alleged commercial rights of our fishermen, upon any principle of the international law that may be quoted against us at Victoria (within a very short distance of our northern border), or along the extensive sea-coast between Puget Sound and Alaska, our great Pacific fishery.

The undersigned prefer the certainty which this treaty has secured as to our specific rights in the fisheries of the Atlantic coasts of North America to the uncertainty of the international law as to all those questions, which will leave in bitter dispute our rights and liberties both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks, and in Behring's Sea and Straits.

The undersigned believe that the treaty now under consideration affords a better foundation for both our fishing and commercial rights than any that can be stated as resting alone upon international law, or upon comity secured by retaliatory laws and maintained by the fluctuating interests of commerce, that are very unstable.

Those who assert that it is not the duty, and is scarcely the right, of the President to resort to negotiations, in preference to the retaliation provided for in existing laws, in order to secure commercial rights to fishermen in Canadian ports, are not willing that their privileges shall be enlarged and converted into rights secured by treaty. They prefer the chances of greater success through legislation that will intimidate the British Government or greatly embarrass British commerce. This seems to indicate that they rely for success more upon British cupidity and the fear that Government has of the consequences of war, than upon its sense of justice, or its good faith in keeping treaty obligations.

Whether or not this may be true, it is very obvious, as the undersigned believe, that the advantages we are supposed to enjoy under such circumstances would be quite as available for the increase of our commercial privileges by retaliatory laws, after this treaty is ratified, as they are at present. Our good faith is no more pledged in this treaty than it is in the treaty of 1818.

This treaty does not bind us to advance no claim hereafter to increased commercial privileges in favor of our fishermen. The spirit in which it is framed is one of conformity, in our treaty relations, to the progressive interests and necessities of the country, so that a further increase of commercial privileges would naturally result from the policy of both countries; as is shown by the fact of the negotiation of this treaty, when such increase should appear to be, as it will be, mutually advantageous.

III.

AN IMPORTANT PRECEDENT FOR THIS TREATY IN THE ARRANGEMENT OFFERED BY MR. SEWARD IN 1866 TO THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

There is a very important precedent for the plan of this treaty, and for some of its leading features, in the protocol proposed in 1866 by Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, through Mr. Adams, our minister to Great Britain. The letter of Mr. Seward and the protocol are as follows:

Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams.

No. 1737.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 10, 1866.

SIR: I send you a copy of a very suggestive letter from Mr. Richard D. Cutts, who, perhaps you are aware, was employed as surveyor for marking, on the part of the United States, the fishery limits under the reciprocity treaty. Mr. Cutts's long familiarity with that subject practically and theoretically entitles his suggestions to respect.

It is desirable to avoid any collision or misunderstanding with Great Britain on the subject growing out of the termination of the reciprocity treaty. With this view I inclose a draught of a protocol, which you may propose to Lord Clarendon for a temporary regulation of the matter. If he should agree to it, it may be signed. When signed it is desirable that the instructions referred to in the concluding paragraph should at once be dispatched by the British Government.

As the fishing season is at hand, the collisions which might be apprehended may occur when that season advances.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Draught protocol communicated by Mr. Adams to the Earl of Clarendon in 1866.

Whereas in the first article of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, concluded and signed in London on the 26th October, 1818, it was declared that—

“The United States hereby renounce, forever, any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within certain limits heretofore mentioned;”

And whereas differences have arisen in regard to the extent of the above-mentioned renunciation, the Government of the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, being equally desirous of avoiding further misunderstanding, have agreed to appoint, and do hereby authorize the appointment, of a mixed commission for the following purposes, namely:

(1) To agree upon and define, by a series of lines, the limits which shall separate the exclusive from the common right of fishery, on the coasts and in the seas adjacent,

of the British North American colonies, in conformity with the first article of the convention of 1818. The said lines to be regularly numbered, duly described, and also clearly marked on charts prepared in duplicate for the purpose.

(2) To agree upon and establish such regulations as may be necessary and proper to secure to the fishermen of the United States the privilege of entering bays and harbors for the purpose of shelter; and of repairing damages therein; of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water; and to agree upon and establish such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent the abuse of the privilege reserved by said convention to fishermen of the United States.

(3) To agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial and judgment with as little expense as possible, for the violation of rights and the transgression of the limits and restrictions which may be hereby adopted.

Provided, however, that the limits, restrictions, and regulations which may be agreed upon by the said commission shall not be final, nor have any effect, until so jointly confirmed and declared by the United States and Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, either by treaty or by laws mutually acknowledged and accepted by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, and by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain.

Pending a different arrangement on the subject, the United States Government engages to give all proper orders to officers in its employment; and Her Britannic Majesty's Government engages to instruct the proper colonial or other British officers to abstain from hostile acts against British and United States fishermen respectively.

This protocol was offered by Mr. Seward, as a modus vivendi, after the termination of the treaty of 1854 had thrown us back upon that of 1818, as to our fishery rights. He offered it, also, for acceptance by Great Britain as the basis of a new treaty of interpretation and regulation of those rights.

Mr. Seward's recommendation of a mixed commission, (1) "to agree upon and define by a series of lines" the fishing limits, in conformity with the first article of the convention of 1818; (2) "to agree upon and establish such regulations as may be necessary and proper to secure the fishermen of the United States the privilege of entering bays and harbors" under the proviso to the treaty; and (3) "to agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial," etc., "for violations of rights and transgressions of limits and restrictions," etc., indicates an earnest apprehension on his part that no settlement could be reached by ordinary negotiations; that the treaty could not be amicably kept unless it was amended; and that the amendments he proposed would cure the defects of the indefinite description of the rights and restrictions and fishing limits that were too generally stated in the treaty of 1818.

He saw the increasing danger of the situation, and came boldly forward to provide against its results.

The cordial manner in which these three propositions were then received by the British Government, as a basis of agreement, inspired the efforts of the present administration to renew the negotiation on this plan as the basis of a new treaty.

IV.

MEASURES OF HOSTILITY, EITHER COMMERCIAL OR ACTUAL, ARE NOT PREFERABLE TO THE TREATY BEFORE THE SENATE.

The undersigned have found no opinion expressed by any of our diplomatists in their official correspondence that the proper interpretation of article 1 of the treaty of 1818 could be otherwise secured than by a further agreement, as to its meaning, between the treaty powers.

If we demand a still more favorable agreement than that presented in this convention now under consideration, we shall probably encounter many more years of controversy and negotiation before a better result can be reached.

If, laying aside all treaty agreements, we attempt to coerce a better understanding and less grievous practices than we have already suffered through commercial retaliation, we shall find that the cost to our own people is far greater than the entire value of the fisheries.

If we resort to war, or to measures that may lead to hostilities, upon what precise definition of our rights and grievances will we justify such grave proceedings, either to our own people, or before the nations of the earth? We believe that no man can safely venture to formulate such a declaration.

Unless we can clearly state the causes that justify a war for the redress of grievances, or the clear definition of the right we seek to assert or defend, we have no right to subject the country to the perils, or even the apprehensions, of hostilities.

It has never been stated by any administration, or diplomatist, or by Congress that any one case, or that all the cases that have grown out of our disputes with Great Britain about the treaty of 1818, gave a just ground for retaliation, reprisals, or war.

The undersigned think it can not be safely denied that in article 10, 12, 13, and 14 of this treaty we have gained advantages and privileges of a very important character. In them is found the full concession of every claim to fishing rights we have ever made, as being within the letter or the spirit of the treaty of 1818 that is now of any practical value; and the methods provided for their administration are quite as satisfactory as any we have ever claimed under our interpretation of that treaty. For convenience of reference we insert those articles in this paper, as follows:

ARTICLE X.

United States fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I of this treaty shall conform to harbor regulations common to them and to fishing vessels of Canada or of Newfoundland.

They need not report, enter, or clear when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, nor when putting into the same, outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or of obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein, may be required to report, enter, or clear; and no vessel shall be excused hereby from giving due information to boarding officers.

They shall not be liable in any such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage; nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, shall they be liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues; but this enumeration shall not permit other charges inconsistent with the enjoyment of the liberties reserved or secured by the Convention of October 20, 1818.

ARTICLE XI.

United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the Eastern and Northeastern coasts of Canada or of the coasts of Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty may unload, reload, tranship, or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews.

Licenses to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, shall be granted to United States fishing vessels in such ports, promptly upon application and without charge; and such vessels having obtained licenses in the manner aforesaid shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to the trading vessels; but such provisions or supplies shall not be obtained by barter, nor purchased for resale or traffic.

ARTICLE XIII.

The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall make regulations providing for the conspicuous exhibition, by every United States fishing vessel, of its official number on each bow; and any such vessel, required by law to have an official number, and failing to comply with such regulations, shall not be entitled to the licenses provided for in this treaty.

Such regulations shall be communicated to Her Majesty's Government previously to their taking effect.

ARTICLE XIV.

The penalties for unlawfully fishing in the waters, bays, creeks, and harbors, referred to in Article I of this treaty, may extend to forfeiture of the boat or vessel, and appurtenances, and also of the supplies and cargo aboard when the offense was committed; and for preparing in such waters to unlawfully fish therein, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not to exceed those for unlawfully fishing; and for any other violation of the laws of Great Britain, Canada, or Newfoundland relating to the right of fishery in such waters, bays, creeks, or harbors, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not exceeding in all three dollars for every ton of the boat or vessel concerned. The boat or vessel may be holden for such penalties and forfeitures.

The proceedings shall be summary and as inexpensive as practicable. The trial (except on appeal) shall be at the place of detention, unless the judge shall, on request of the defense, order it to be held at some other place adjudged by him more convenient. Security for costs shall not be required of the defense, except when bail is offered. Reasonable bail shall be accepted. There shall be proper appeals available to the defense only; and the evidence at the trial may be used on appeal.

Judgments of forfeiture shall be reviewed by the Governor-General of Canada in council, or the governor in council of Newfoundland, before the same are executed.

We accord (in Article 12) to the fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland the same privileges on the Atlantic coasts of the United States that are secured to our fishing vessels by this treaty, without admitting them to fish within 3 miles of the coasts of the bays, harbors, or creeks along that sea-coast.

This treaty secures to our fishermen the free navigation of the Strait of Canso.

Article 15 secures to us the option to acquire very important commercial privileges to our fishermen whenever Congress shall conclude that they are worth the money that we may otherwise collect in duties on fish.

Congress may never make this concession; but the power to acquire these privileges, as permanent treaty rights, may become very valuable to us when the diminishing products of the fisheries in the waters adjacent to the eastern coasts of the United States and of Canada and Newfoundland increase in value, because they will be required to supply the needs of 100,000,000 of people in the United States and 30,000,000 of people in the Dominion of Canada.

This article is suggested by a wise forecast of the future necessities of our fishermen, as well as those of the people of the United States, when our population is greatly increased, and the supply of food is to be distributed to such a vast multitude of people that the allowance, per capita, will be, accordingly, diminished.

The treaty now before the Senate is one of reciprocal concessions.

The unconditional concessions to the fishermen are not strictly commercial, but they give them great assistance in their business and in the means of relieving any distress which may befall them.

Can we ever hope to engraft on the treaty of 1818 any new agreement for commercial privileges to our fishermen without giving an equivalent in some liberty or privilege that Great Britain will claim for her fishermen?

This question is answered by the fact that we renounced in 1818 the best part of the fisheries that were of the fruits of the war for independence in order to make the residue a permanent right; and in 1854 and 1871 we agreed to pay heavily for a temporary suspension of the restrictions and limitations of the treaty of 1818.

We have made four fisheries treaties with Great Britain, in 1783, 1818, 1854, and 1871, and in none of them has any commercial privilege been secured to our fishermen. No serious effort has been made to secure such privileges prior to the negotiation now before the Senate. All that we have heretofore secured to our fishermen has been the privilege of inshore fishing, of curing and drying fish on certain parts of the British coasts, more or less restricted and changed in each successive treaty, and the right to buy wood, obtain water, make repairs, and find shelter.

Now, we find, according to the testimony of everybody concerned, and the thoroughly considered report of our Committee on Foreign Relations, made after a searching investigation conducted upon our coasts, and upon the testimony of experts laid before the Senate, that the inshore fisheries, for which we have paid and suffered so much, are of no value to us, and that the privilege of purchasing bait from the Canadians is an injury to our fishing interests rather than a benefit.

These declarations, which were true, show that many of the contentions and strifes we have had over this subject, for seventy years, have been about a claim of rights and privileges that are no longer of any advantage to us.

They prove that we need only such advantages, or privileges, for our fishermen on the Canadian coasts as are enjoyed by our merchant vessels, and that these are not very important to them.

Purse-seining has revolutionized the mackerel fishery almost entirely, and has largely affected the herring fishery, and has given to our fishermen great advantages in "the catch." But Canadian capital and energy will not long permit us to do all the purse or deep-water seining.

The freezing of fish on shipboard, so as to get them fresh to our markets, is of recent date, but is a very important change in the fishing business. In this the Canadians have no greater advantages than our fishermen.

These two improvements in the fishing business, with the added power of steam, which has been applied to sea navigation since 1818, have produced the revolution in these pursuits which renders it more convenient to have commercial rights for some of our fishing vessels, but has removed the necessity to have fishing privileges within three miles of any of the coasts or in the bays of the British possessions that are not classed as great arms of the sea.

The history of the controversies that have found a final solution in the treaty now before the Senate, and the explanation of the bearing of the treaty upon those questions, are so clearly and ably stated by Hon. W. L. Putnam, in a letter dated April 16, 1888, that we append it to this report (Appendix E).

Mr. Putnam being one of our plenipotentiaries who negotiated this treaty, his review of the diplomatic and legislative history is an important exposition of the merits of this subject.

V.

THIS TREATY COMPARED WITH THE COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENT STYLED "THE RECIPROCITY OF 1830."

This treaty proposes liberal reciprocity to us, confined to fishing interests, and gives us all the time we may choose to claim in which to consider our best interests and determine whether we will accept or reject the overture.

The right of choosing between this proffered commercial reciprocity and the privileges accorded to us under what is termed "the reciprocity of 1830" is a decided advantage in favor of our fishermen.

The products of our fisheries in Canadian waters are not permitted to enter Canadian ports on any ships of the United States by the British proclamation of November 5, 1830. That proclamation declares "that the ships of and belonging to the said United States of America may import from the United States aforesaid into the British possessions abroad goods the produce of those States, and may export goods from the British possessions abroad to be carried to any foreign country whatever."

This cannot apply to fishery products taken or purchased in the Canadian waters or ports, and was not intended in any manner to add to the four purposes for which our fishermen may enter Canadian ports under the treaty of 1818, as we understand that proclamation, or to repeal that treaty.

This proclamation was a month later than that made by President Jackson, and was the British response to our proclamation, under which "British vessels and their cargoes are admitted to an entry into the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent and north or east of the United States." The full text of these proclamations is hereto appended as Appendices A and B.

These proclamations set forth the entire concurrent action of the two Governments (which is called the reciprocity of 1830). There having been no change in the situation since that time, that is "the reciprocity" which still exists, as matter of law.

The broad liberality of our concession is in very striking contrast with that of Great Britain; but we have lived under this inequality of rights for more than fifty years, without a serious protest until within three years, and the complaints we have made arose from the British construction of our fishing rights and not of our commercial rights under that reciprocity.

Our fishing vessels are equally barred (under the British contention) by the treaty of 1818, and by the British proclamation of November 5, 1830, from entering their ports with cargoes of fish taken in Canadian waters, without reference to the rights to touch and trade or to any other commercial character, that we may give them under our laws. To gain these rights for our fishermen, we have a choice of grave alternatives.

But the cost of the naval and military preparation that would be necessary to give confidence to our own people, in supporting any extreme demand or stringent measures connected with this subject, would be greater than the whole value of these fisheries for the next half century.

VI.

THE PRESIDENT HAS ONLY PERFORMED A PLAIN DUTY, IN THE INTERESTS OF ALL THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, AND TO THE SENATE IS LEFT THE RESPONSIBILITY.

The undersigned do not find it necessary to answer in detail the various objections urged in committee by the Senators opposed to the ratification of this treaty, because no amendment was offered to indicate that the treaty could be so improved as to gain the support of any member of the majority of the committee.

The undersigned understand that the dissent from this negotiation is directed to it as an entirety. This dissent is based, in part, upon the opinion of some members of the majority that the President should not have entered upon any negotiation, in view of the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 3d day of February, 1886, and the opinion of Congress as it was expressed in the non-intercourse act approved March 3, 1887. That resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two Governments on the coasts of the United States and British North America, ought not to be provided for by Congress.

This resolution related, as we understand it, solely to the question whether such negotiation should be conducted by commissioners, under an act of Congress, or by the President, under his constitutional power to make treaties.

The Senate adhered to its constitutional power to ratify or reject a treaty, and insisted that the President should make any negotiation he might see fit to conduct in such form and under such conditions that the power of the Senate over such subjects should not be interfered with.

The retaliatory act of Congress above mentioned was not intended, and could not have been intended, to instruct the President as to the will of the legislature in a matter over which Congress has no authority—the negotiation, ratification, or promulgation of a treaty.

Congress has the right to declare that in some or all of the hundreds of cases that have occurred in which the treaty of 1818 has been in question, it has been violated, and that retaliation, reprisals, or war shall follow such abuses until they are compensated, and they shall cease. Such a declaration as to the violation of the treaty was distinently made in the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, on the 19th of January, 1887. We quote from that report, as follows :

It will be seen, from the correspondence and papers submitted by the President, in his message on the subject, of the 8th of December last (Ex. Doc. No. 19, Forty-ninth Congress, second session), and from the testimony taken by the committee, that some of these instances of seizure or detention, or of driving vessels away by threats, etc., were in clear violation of the treaty of 1818, and that others were on such slender and technical grounds, either as applied to fishing rights or commercial rights, as to make it impossible to believe that they were made with the large and just object of protecting substantial rights against real and substantial invasion, but must have been made either under the stimulus of the cupidity of the seizing officer, sharpened and made safe by the extraordinary legislation to which the committee has referred, whereby the seizing officer, no matter how unjust or illegal his procedure may have been, is made practically secure from the necessity of making substantial redress to the party wronged, or of punishment, or else they must have arisen from a systematic disposition on the part of the Dominion authorities to vex and harass American fishing and other vessels so as to produce such a state of embarrassment and inconvenience with respect to intercourse with the provinces as to coerce the United States into arrangements of general reciprocity with the Dominion.

But Congress did not follow up this bold declaration of that committee with a demand for redress, or with any provision of law that was based upon the fact that the treaty of 1818 had been violated by Great Britain. It was our commercial rights that Congress undertook to protect.

The committee did not ask the Senate to pass a bill that would commit the country, if it should become a law, to a state of actual hostility towards Great Britain, or even to a firm declaration that Great Britain had violated the treaty of 1818 in the manner and with the motives stated in the foregoing extract from their report.

Congress was either satisfied that no occasion had arisen which would justify decisive measures, such as retaliation, reprisals, or war, in resentment for any actual violation of the treaty, or else it sought to evade its just responsibility to the country by increasing the powers of the President to retaliate on British commerce, and by throwing upon him the responsibility of deciding whether the "recent" conduct of that Government and of the provinces demanded of the United States that any retaliation should be proclaimed and enforced.

The House of Representatives demanded broader powers for the President than the Senate would agree to, but both houses hastened to devolve upon him the decision of the whole question of our treaty relations with Great Britain, and gave him the discretion to employ all necessary means to put his decision in force.

This is the law that Congress enacted to meet that aggravated state of affairs, as described in the report of the Senate committee :

AN ACT to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing-vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have [been] unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved, March 3, 1887.

This law relates to past offenses as well as to those that may hereafter occur. As to past offenses, Congress abdicated its authority to declare that they constituted just grounds for retaliation, and left that matter solely to the discretion of the President or else Congress intended that the President should have these powers to meet a case of emergency, and should also employ his constitutional power of making treaties (which Congress could not control) as a part of "his discretion" in providing a way through which the evils complained of should be remedied.

The undersigned can not impute to Congress that its purpose, in devolving upon the President these broad discretionary powers and conditional duties, was to forbid, or to embarrass, the free exercise by him of his constitutional power to make treaties, with the advice and consent of the Senate, or that these extraordinary powers were given him to enable Congress to escape its just responsibility for measures that were necessary for the protection of the honor of the country or the interests of the people.

If the President had resorted to retaliatory measures against Canadian commerce, under this act of March 3, 1887, without having attempted any negotiation with Great Britain, the open way that was indicated by Mr. Seward's protocol in 1865, to which we have referred, and the favorable impression it made on the British Government, would have been pointed out by an indignant people as an abandoned opportunity for an amicable agreement with Great Britain, and he would have been amenable to just censure.

But, aside from this, his duty to humanity, as well as to his country, forbade him from exposing the interests and prosperity of 65,000,000 of people to danger, by hasty or extreme measures of retaliation, while it was possible to reach a just settlement of our disputes with Great Britain over matters that concern only a few thousand people, who would be more benefited by such an agreement than they could be by retaliatory laws.

The President has succeeded in making provision for a settlement of these long-standing disputes on terms that are just and reasonable, as we are satisfied—a much better settlement than has been even attempted heretofore, and one that will increase, in the future, the liberality of commerce with Canada.

If the Senate shall decline to ratify this treaty there will remain no doubt that it assumes all the responsibility for what may hereafter result from the proper employment by the President of the retaliatory powers that Congress has conferred upon him.

If the proper use of those powers is considered by Great Britain as a violation of the treaty of 1818, in demanding for our fishermen greater liberties and privileges than that treaty secured to them, and that we are enforcing that demand through commercial duress, the Senate will also take whatever responsibility may belong to that situation.

Congress declined to say in the act of March 3, 1887, that the rights of American fishermen had been denied or abridged, but left it to the President to determine that question. If this treaty is rejected, it is beyond dispute that retaliation is the only means, short of war, by which we can redress our wrongs, if we have suffered any. The Senate, in rejecting this treaty, will affirm that such wrongs exist, which Congress did not so assert, and, because thereof, will force the President to proclaim non-intercourse.

VII.

THE PROTOCOL TO THE TREATY IS AN HONORABLE AND FRIENDLY OFFER-
TURE OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT, AND SHOULD BE ALLOWED TO DEVELOP, BY ACTUAL EXPERIENCE, WHETHER THIS TREATY
WILL BE BENEFICIAL TO OUR FISHERIES AND COMMERCE.

In view of a possible disagreement between the Senate and President as to the value of this treaty to our fishermen, the undersigned respectfully call the attention of the Senate to the importance of postponing its consideration until the next December session of Congress.

The protocol to the treaty, suggested and offered by the British plenipotentiaries, tenders to our fishermen very liberal commercial privileges in Canadian ports for two years.

This overture is equivalent, almost, to a guaranty that during this period the British Government, in conjunction with the provincial goveriments, will prevent the recurrence of the interferences with our fishermen that have given them such serious disquietude. It will also put into practice, substantially, all the provisions of the present treaty, except those relating to the delimitation of fishing boundaries.

A single fishing season, under such conditions, will demonstrate that this treaty is a failure, or else that it is of great value to the country.

The advantage of such experience is manifest, and we should not rashly trust to our opinions, which must be largely conjectural, when we can fortify them or disprove their soundness by a short delay in our action, which does not commit us, in the least degree, either for or against the treaty.

The British Government has exerted a restraining influence during the whole period since 1818 over the provincial governments as to their demands and proceedings under that treaty. That Government has encouraged liberality in the conduct of the fishermen and in commercial interchange between the United States and the provinces; seeing that the prosperity of those countries greatly depended on such a policy.

It has not been an easy task to restrain the people of the provinces to a course of moderation. Political reasons, not always favorable to the Crown, and the jealousies of rival interests in fishing rights held in common by the people of two countries, and even the lingering hatreds engendered by our Revolutionary war, have been active in promoting discord in these colonies. Great Britain never before had so capital an interest in fostering the loyalty of the Canadians. The Suez Canal is scarcely more important to the interests of that Empire than the Canadian Pacific Railway.

But other interests of the most important character inspire the British Government with an earnest purpose to cultivate the closest friendship with the people of Canada.

It is evidently the true policy of the British Government to satisfy the people of these provinces that the treaty now before the Senate will be of advantage to them, because of the additional liberty of commerce that it extends to our fishermen; and this was doubtless a strong inducement to that Government to offer voluntarily to us the privileges stated in the protocol to the treaty.

We have almost as great an interest in affording to our people the opportunity of a practical test of the advantage of these privileges offered in this protocol.

In matters of such moment we can not justify a rejection of such a proposition, not requiring our formal acceptance to make it available, on the ground that we could not, without dishonor, permit such a course, resulting in such possible advantages to us, even for one fishing season, and then reject the treaty.

We have not in any way invited or suggested this offer of the British Government, and we are not asked to accept it. It proposes, for a time, to liberalize the commercial privileges of our fishermen in the provincial ports, for reasons satisfactory to the British Government.

If we should hasten our action on this treaty with the purpose of preventing an effort of that Government to satisfy Her Majesty's subjects that a liberal policy towards us is the best, or even of convincing our people by experience that such a policy is also best for us, we would incur greater discredit by such action than could possibly attend our rejection of the treaty, after a fair trial of the British expedient presented in this protocol had satisfied our people that the treaty should not be ratified.

VIII.

THE HEADLAND THEORY, AS APPLICABLE TO THE BAYS, HARBORS, AND CREEKS THAT ARE CLAIMED AS TERRITORIAL WATERS, HAS NOT BEEN ABANDONED BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT, EXCEPT IN THIS TREATY. IT WAS A VITAL QUESTION WHEN THIS NEGOTIATION WAS ENTERED UPON.

It is insisted by some that Great Britain had abandoned the headland theory, and that it was obsolete when this treaty was made.

The undersigned do not understand that the British headland theory, as applied to the bays, harbors, and creeks that had geographical names and limits, and were included by British or provincial laws within the local jurisdictions in 1818, has been abandoned by Great Britain. Outside of a limit of 3 miles from the headlands of such indentations of the sea-coast it was abandoned as early as 1815, in the case of the American fishing vessels that were warned off the coast by the British man-of-war Josseur.

Our claims could not be fairly predicated, diplomatically, on such an admission by Great Britain as to the base-line from which the 3-mile limit is to be measured.

That being still an open question, the claims of either side were a necessary feature in the negotiation of this treaty.

If our contention was indisputably just, a peremptory demand for its allowance was the only course we could adopt. Such a demand, we believe, has never been formally made by this Government. Congress certainly has never affirmed the indisputable justice of our claim. The United States have preferred to let this question, with all the others that have arisen under the treaty of 1818, continue in reach of discussion and negotiation.

In that situation the present administration found this controversy.

Mr. Bayard proposed to the British Government that the 3-mile fishing limit should be measured, in the bays that were 10 miles or less in width, from that point nearest the entrance where the shores are 10 miles distant from each other. He found his support for that offer in the arrangement between Great Britain and other European nations for fishing in the bays and harbors of their respective coasts along the North Atlantic and the northern seas.

It being generally conceded that the limit of local jurisdiction extended 3 miles from the coast out into the sea, and that this distance was adopted because it measured the range of artillery in ancient times, it is obvious that when the range of artillery is extended to 5 miles it is due to the security of bays and harbors reaching far inland that treaty arrangements fixing a new measurement should have some reference to the increased limits for the protection of the people residing along such shores corresponding with the improved range of artillery.

This offer made no allusion to any headland theory that the British Government had ever asserted; still it was directly opposed to assertions of that theory which Great Britain had often made, and called forth the following "observation" from the Marquis of Salisbury upon the proffer made by Mr. Bayard:

A reference to the action of the United States Government, and to the admission made by their statesmen in regard [to] bays on the American coasts, strengthens this view; and the case of the English ship Grange shows that the Government of the United States, in 1793, claimed Delaware Bay as being within territorial waters.

Mr. Bayard contends that the rule, which he asks to have set up, was adopted by the umpire of the commission, appointed under the convention of 1853, in the case of the United States fishing schooner Washington; that it was by him applied to the Bay of Fundy, and that it is for this reason applicable to other Canadian bays.

It is submitted, however, that as one of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy is in the territory of the United States, any rules of international law applicable to that bay are not therefore equally applicable to other bays the headlands of which are both within the territory of the same power.

This provision would involve a surrender of fishing rights which have always been regarded as the exclusive property of Canada, and would make common fishing-grounds of the territorial waters which, by the law of nations, have been invariably regarded both in Great Britain and the United States as belonging to the adjacent country. In the case, for instance, of the Bate des Chaleurs, a peculiarly well-marked and almost land-locked indentation of the Canadian coast, the 10-mile limit would be drawn from points in the heart of Canadian territory, and almost 70 miles from the natural entrance or mouth of the bay. This would be done in spite of the fact that, both by imperial legislation and by judicial interpretation, this bay has been declared to form a part of the territory of Canada. (See Imperial Statute, 14 and 15 Vict., cap. 63; and Monatt v. McPhee, 5 Sup. Court of Canada Reports, p. 66.)

From this statement of the British contention, it appears that the headland theory was still adhered to by that Government in March, 1887, but it was admitted that it had been relaxed as to the Bay of Fundy for special reasons.

Mr. Bayard's reply to the "observations" of the Marquis of Salisbury, which is set forth on pages 56 to 60, inclusive, of Senate Executive Document No. 113, first session of Fiftieth Congress, refutes the force of those "observations" by citing precedents furnished by the conduct of the British Government in this matter, and the decision of the umpire in the cases of the Washington and the Argus, in which he wholly discarded the headland theory and made an award in favor of the owner.

But these counter-statements only served to show that the headland theory, in its application to bays within the jurisdictional limits, was still in controversy between the two Governments, and that there was little disposition on the part of the British Government to yield, as there was on our part to admit, the justice of that construction of the treaty of 1818.

These contentions made it necessary that a better understanding should be reached; and if the two Governments could not accomplish this by negotiation, it was certain that increasing strife and broils between their people would seriously endanger the commerce of each, and would expose both countries to the peril of being driven into hostilities by the designs of vicious men, or through the angry contentions of well-meaning persons.

IX.

THE CLOSE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE PEOPLE OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES IN THE USE OF THE COMMON RIGHT OF FISHERY MAKE IT IMPERATIVE TO REGULATE THEIR ASSOCIATION BY FRIENDLY AGREEMENT RATHER THAN BY RETALIATORY LAWS.

Mutual and amicable agreement between the two Governments, clearly understood and faithfully executed, is the only way in which the people of Newfoundland and Canada and of the United States can ever peacefully enjoy, in common, the valuable rights of fishery.

Reciprocity, in some form, is an element in every treaty made for the settlement of questions that are sincerely in dispute between independent powers. In all of our treaties with Great Britain, relating to the extra-territorial rights, liberties, or privileges of each in the other's country or jurisdiction, reciprocity has been conspicuously stated as a leading motive and purpose. The provisional treaty of peace of November 30, 1782, sets out with this declaration:

Whereas reciprocal advantages and mutual convenience are found by experience to form the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between States, it is agreed to form the articles of the proposed treaty on such principles of liberal equity and reciprocity as that, partial advantages (those seeds of discord) being excluded, such a beneficial and satisfactory intercourse between the two countries may be established as to promise and secure to both perpetual peace and harmony.

This declaration was repeated, in substance, in the definitive treaty of peace of September 3, 1783.

In both these treaties the right of fishery was defined as between the people of both countries, the United States expressly yielding some of the liberties they had enjoyed in common with the colonies that remained subject to the British Crown on the coasts of Newfoundland as as to curing and drying fish on that island.

The treaty of October 20, 1818, was made "to cement the good understanding which happily exists between" the two Governments. In that treaty we renounced our right of fishery on certain coasts, etc., but regained the right to cure and dry fish on a part of the southern coasts of Newfoundland.

Under that treaty, which was reciprocal, misunderstanding arose to its meaning, and the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was made, in part "to avoid further misunderstanding between their respective citizens and subjects in regard to the extent of the right of fishing on the coasts of British North America secured by Article I of the Convention" of 1818, and "to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective territories and people."

The extensive reciprocity of this treaty continued for twelve years.

At its termination by the United States the "misunderstandings" under the treaty of 1818 again arose, when that convention became then, as it is now, the measure of our treaty rights.

The treaty of 1871 was made so as "to provide for an amicable settlement of causes of difference between the two countries," and arbitration and reciprocity pervaded every one of its forty-three articles.

In all the wide range of our treaty engagements with the treaty powers of the world there is scarcely one that does not contain some mutual advantage or reciprocal concession, and they cover every subject that has been suggested, in the experience of mankind, as being fit or convenient to be settled by international agreement rather than to be left under the control or security that might be afforded by the laws enacted by the respective countries, which they could alter or repeal at pleasure.

Now we are again admitted to the field of "misunderstanding," "in regard to the extent of the right of fishing on the coasts of British North America," with an increased number of cases of seizures and interferences with our fishermen growing out of those disputes, and the question is, whether we shall abandon all efforts to remove these misunderstandings by further agreements, or shall we treat every claim we make as a sine qua non, and its refusal an ultimatum, and resort, as the first expedient, to retaliatory legislation to enforce it. That failing, shall we stop and abandon the claim, or prepare for its support by coercive measures?

Retaliation may secure just dealing between nations whose interests are entirely distinct and separate; but that is not our situation toward the people or the governments of Canada or Newfoundland.

X.

THE CHARACTER AND VALUE OF THE FISHERIES ON THE COAST OF LABRADOR AND THE BANKS OF NEWFOUNDLAND, AND THE INCREASING DEMAND FOR FOOD-FISHES TO SUPPLY THE WANTS OF THE PEOPLE.

The inshore fishing along the coasts of Labrador are the best we have in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, while that along the southern and western shores of Newfoundland is far better than any along the coasts of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

Our plenipotentiaries who negotiated the treaty of 1818 mention these facts to show that we lost nothing of value when we gave up the inshore fisheries of Nova Scotia, and gained much advantage by having access to the shores of Labrador, as will hereafter appear in this report.

Mr. Sabine, in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1852, gives a very interesting account of the fisheries on the northeastern coast, from which we make the following extracts, found in Senate Ex. Doc. 22, second session Thirty-second Congress

An account of the fishing-grounds has been reserved for the conclusion. Of those near our cities, and visited for the purpose of supplying our markets with fish to be consumed fresh, it is unnecessary to speak. Those within the limits of British America, and secured to us by treaty, as well as those on the eastern coasts of Maine, are less generally known and may properly claim attention. Of the distant, Newfoundland is the oldest. That vessels from Boston fished there as early as the year 1645 is a fact preserved in the journal of Governor Winthrop. The "great bank," which has been so long resorted to, is said to be about 200 miles broad and nearly 600 miles long. In gales the sea is very high, and dense fogs are prevalent. The water is from 25 to 95 fathoms deep. The edges of the bank are abrupt and composed of rough rocks. The best fishing-grounds are between the latitudes of 42° and 46° north. The "bankers," as the vessels employed there are called, anchor in the open sea, at a great distance from the land, and pursue their hazardous and lonely employment, exposed to perils hardly known elsewhere. The fish are caught with hooks and lines, and (the operations of splitting and dressing performed) are salted in bulk in the hold, from day to day, until the cargo is completed. The bank fish are larger than those taken on the shores of Newfoundland, but are not often so well cured. The first American vessel which was fitted for the Labrador fishery sailed from Newburyport toward the close of the last century. The business, once undertaken, was pursued with great energy, and several hundred vessels were engaged in it annually previous to the war of 1812. A voyage to Labrador, unlike a trip to the Banks of Newfoundland, is not without pleasant incidents, even to landsmen. The coast is frequented for a distance of 10 or 12 degrees of latitude. It has been preferred to any other on account of its security and a general certainty of affording a supply of fish. Arriving in some harbor early in June, an American vessel is moored and remains quietly at anchor until a full "fare" has been obtained, or until the departure of the fish requires the master to seek another inlet.

The fishing is done entirely in boats, and the number usually employed is one for about 30 tons of the vessel's register. Here, under the management of an experienced and skillful master, everything may be rendered systematic and regular. As soon as the vessel has been secured by the necessary anchors, her sails and light rigging are stowed away, her decks cleared, her boats fitted, and a day or two spent in fowling and sailing, under color of exploring the surrounding waters and fixing upon proper stations for the boats, and the master announces to his crew that they must try their luck with the hook and line. Each boat has now assigned to it a skipper or master, and one man. At the time designated, the master departs with his boats, to test the qualities of his men, and to mark out for them a course for their future procedure.

Nothing could be more injurious to men, who are brought into such intimate association by their common right of fishing on those distant shores, than a policy of their governments which would cause them to make reprisals, the stronger against the weaker.

Hon. Robert J. Walker, whose ability as a statesman is nowhere seriously questioned, in a letter to Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, dated April 24, 1868, thus describes the value of the fisheries as sources of food supply. He says:

But there are other most important considerations connected with extended coasts and great fisheries. The fisheries are capable of furnishing more and cheaper food than the land.

The reasons are—

(1) The ocean surface is nearly four times that of the land, the area being 145,000,000 square miles of ocean surface to 52,000,000 of land.

(2) The ocean everywhere produces fish, from the equator to the pole, the profusion of submarine animals increasing as you go north up to a point but 433 miles from the pole and believed to extend there, whereas, in consequence of mountains, deserts, and the temperature of the surface of the earth in very high latitudes, less than half its surface can be cultivated so as to produce food in any appreciable quantities.

(3) The temperature of the ocean, in high latitudes, being much warmer than that of the land surface, there is increased profusion of submarine animal life, especially in the Arctic and Atlantic Seas, where, on account of extreme cold, the land surface produces no food. In warm latitudes the deep-sea temperature diminishes with the depth, until a certain point, below which it maintains an equable temperature of 40° Fahrenheit. The temperature of the ocean in latitude 70° (many degrees warmer than the land surface) is the same in all depths. There are wonderful provisions for the multiplication of animal life in the ocean, and it moderates both heat and cold. These are additional reasons in favor of the existence of a Polar Sea, filled with a far greater profusion of submarine animal life than any other seas, and, as a consequence, possessing far the best fisheries. Indeed, as fish progress northward, on account of the better ocean temperature there, as also, because the marine food there is more abundant, there can be little doubt that the open Polar Sea will furnish fisheries of incredible value.

(4) The ocean produces food in all latitudes for the support of animal submarine life. These are squid (the principal food of the whale), also abundance of nutritious sea-grasses, etc., upon which the fish feed. Besides, as the earth is more and more cultivated, and farms, as well as towns and cities, drained by creeks and rivers to the seas, the submarine food is correspondingly augmented. Even in mid-ocean the phosphorescence observed there is produced by the presence in the water of myriads of living animals.

(5) Whilst the earth produces food by plowing its surface only a few inches deep, the ocean supplies myriads of fish, tier on tier, thousands of fathoms deep. Thus, the registered take of herrings in the Scotch fisheries, in 1861, was 900,000,000, whilst that of Norway, in the latitude of Iceland and Greenland, was far greater.

Perhaps, however, the main reason why the ocean produces so much more food for man than the land is, that whilst land animals only give birth to one or two of their young at a time, some fish produce millions of ova, to be matured into life. Thus, a female cod has been found to contain 3,400,000 ova; and other fish ova varying from several millions to 36,000. Hence, the vast success attending the increased production of fish by transfer, by sowing the spawn, and other methods known to ichthyology.

Nothing could more certainly lessen the food supply of the people, which, after all, is the basis of all human progress, than to promote strife amongst fishermen visiting the same waters. A policy that leads to such a result is an injustice to the human family.

No wealth, national or personal, can be justly earned when it comes from diminishing the supply of human food.

With all our vast excess of cereals and of animal food we still need all the fish we can gather from the oceans and seas for the comfort and economy of living, especially among the industrial classes of our rapidly increasing population. The Atlantic and Pacific fisheries rank in importance along with the production of beef, mutton, and pork as a source of food supply, and as a competitive element in the food markets even of this abundant country.

Our fishing rights and liberties along the coasts of Labrador and Newfoundland, as fixed by the treaty of 1818, are rights to be enjoyed in common with the British people, and are such as no other nation has. They are partnership rights, in the intimate character of the association, in their labors and privileges, of our fishermen with theirs. No two nations were ever drawn into a closer relationship, or one in which good-will and mutual forbearance were more essential to the profitable pursuit of a great industry, than that established between us by the joint struggles of the colonies, confirmed by the treaty of 1783, and renewed, as to ports of Labrador and Newfoundland, almost without restriction, by the treaty of 1818.

As to this, by far the most essential part of the rights reserved to us in that treaty, we can no more preserve and enjoy its value to us, under the plan of reprisals, through retaliatory laws, upon British commerce, than copartners can promote their joint business interests by each one attempting constantly to destroy the value of the other partner's share in the venture.

Our vessels and theirs are anchored side by side in the bays, or follow the same schools of fish, and capture them wherever they are found along these coasts. One fisherman entices the fish around his vessel with bait and another comes in and takes what he can with his lines or nets, just as if the whole business was a copartnership.

If these vessels belong to countries that are arrayed in commercial hostility based upon retaliatory laws and ready to break out, upon slight provocation, into a war, their friendly association will be impossible.

XI.

THE USE OF FLEETS TO INTERPRET A TREATY.

Under the misunderstandings of the past we have on both sides sent fleets to these waters to protect our fishermen against each other, and against the unfriendly conduct of the local governments; fleets to enforce agreements that the governments concerned could not expound by a mutual understanding.

If these questions are left open, and commercial war is inaugurated through measures of retaliation, how many ships and guns is it supposed will be needed to keep the peace between our fishermen on the coasts of Labrador and Newfoundland?

The danger in this direction does not come from the desire of either Government to promote a war, but from their inability to prevent its initiation through the personal hostilities of men associated in the use of common rights and privileges, and stimulated by rivalries which are encouraged by laws of retaliation enacted by their respective Governments.

These are some of the dangers against which this treaty wisely makes safe provision.

XII.

THE AREA YIELDED BY THE DELIMITATIONS OF THIS TREATY, AS COMPARED WITH THOSE YIELDED BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT ON THEIR CONSTRUCTION OF THE LIMITS OF OUR "RENUNCIATION" UNDER THE TREATY OF 1818.

It is alleged by some that this treaty yields to the British Government 50,000 square miles of exclusive fishing-grounds beyond what we yielded in the treaty of 1818.

Taking the contention of the United States that no headland theory is to be found in the treaty of 1818, and that the exclusive fishing limit is a line 3 miles from the shore, at low water, that enters all harbors, bays, and creeks that are more than 6 miles wide at the entrance, and follows the sinuosities of the coast thereof, this estimate of the area surrendered in this treaty is greatly exaggerated.

This is the narrowest limit to which we have confined our renunciation in the treaty of 1818, of the common right of fishery, in our contentions with Great Britain.

The total area as to which we renounced the common right of fishing, according to this construction of that treaty, is 16,424 nautical square miles.

The additional area of renunciation under the delimitations of the proposed treaty, now before the Senate, is 1,127 square miles, being $6\frac{8}{10}$ per cent. addition to the former area of exclusion.

The total area of bays, creeks, and harbors not more than 6 miles wide at their mouths is about 6,599 square miles, and is included in the above-mentioned measurement of 16,424 square miles.

The British claim as the true construction of the agreement in the treaty of 1818, that it fixed the line within which we renounced the common right of fishery at the distance, measured seaward, of 3 miles from the entrance of all bays, harbors, and creeks of His Majesty's dominions. This would add an area of 3,489 square miles to the exclusive fishing grounds claimed by the British Government, while the area in which we have renounced the common right of fishing in those bays, harbors, and creeks under the proposed treaty now before the Senate is 1,127 square miles.

Thus, under the British contention that Government yields, in this treaty, 3,489 square miles of exclusive fishing waters to the people of the United States as a common fishery, and we yield 1,127 square miles to the British Government as exclusive fishing waters, which we now claim to enjoy with the U. S. as a common fishery under our construction of the treaty of 1818, which they refuse to admit.

They yield more than two-thirds of their claim to us, and we yield less than one-third of our claim to them, for the sake of settling forever a dispute that has lasted for seventy years, and has been in every way a costly and disturbing contention to our people. (See official statement from the Coast Survey, marked D.)

If these disputed areas were the richest fisheries in the world, the settlement of our respective rights in them, as arranged in the treaty now before the Senate, should be welcomed by the American people with entire satisfaction.

When we know, from the examination and report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, that this disputed area is of no real advantage to our fishermen, and that this statement is supported by conclusive evidence, furnished by the Halifax Commission, and by Professor Baird, our former Commissioner of Fisheries, no ground seems to be left for the contention of those who oppose this settlement.

XIII.

THE VIEWS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AS TO THE PROPER EXECUTION OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF MARCH 3, 1887, OPPOSED TO THOSE OF THE CAPITALISTS WHO CONTROL OUR FISHING INDUSTRY AND REAP THE GREATEST ADVANTAGES FROM THEM.

The president of the American Fishery Union, in 1887, brought the subject of retaliation to the attention of the President of the United States, and insisted that it should be applied only to the exclusion of British-American fishing products from the markets of the United States. To that demand the President of the United States replied as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1887.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter lately addressed to me, and have given full consideration to the expression of the views and wishes therein contained in relation to the existing differences between the Government of Great Britain and the United States growing out of the refusal to award to our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises the privileges to which they are entitled either under treaty stipulations or the guaranties of international comity and neighborly concession. I sincerely trust the apprehension you express of unjust and unfriendly treatment of American fishermen lawfully found in Canadian waters will not be realized; but if such apprehension should prove to be well founded, I earnestly hope that no fault or inconsiderate action of any of our citizens will in the least weaken the just position of our Government, or deprive us of the universal sympathy and support to which we should be entitled.

The action of this administration since June, 1885, when the fishery articles of the treaty of 1871 were terminated under the notification which had two years before been given by our Government, has been fully disclosed by the correspondence between the representatives and the appropriate departments of the respective Governments, with which I am apprised by your letter you are entirely familiar. An examination of this correspondence has doubtless satisfied you that in no case have the rights or privileges of American fishermen been overlooked or neglected, but that, on the contrary, they have been sedulously insisted upon and cared for by every means within the control of the executive branch of the Government.

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, authorizing a course of retaliation, through executive action, in the event of a continuance on the part of the British-American authorities of unfriendly conduct and treaty violations affecting American fishermen, has devolved upon the President of the United States exceedingly grave and solemn responsibilities, comprehending highly important consequences to our national character and dignity, and involving extremely valuable commercial intercourse between the British possessions in North America and the people of the United States.

I understand the main purpose of your letter is to suggest that, in case recourse to the retaliatory measures authorized by this act should be invited by unjust treatment of our fishermen in the future, the object of such retaliation might be fully accomplished by "prohibiting Canadian-caught fish from entry into the ports of the United States."

The existing controversy is one in which two nations are the parties concerned. The retaliation contemplated by the act of Congress is to be enforced, not to protect solely any particular interest, however meritorious or valuable, but to maintain the national honor and thus protect all our people. In this view the violation of American fishery rights and unjust or unfriendly acts towards a portion of our citizens engaged in this business is but the occasion for action, and constitutes a national affront which gives birth to or may justify retaliation. This measure once resorted to, its effectiveness and value may well depend upon the thoroughness and extent of its application; and in the performance of international duties, the enforcement of international rights, and the protection of our citizens, this Government and the people of the United States must act as a unit, all intent upon attaining the best result of retaliation upon the basis of a maintenance of national honor and duty.

The nation seeking by any means to maintain its honor, dignity, and integrity, is engaged in protecting the rights of the people; and if, in such efforts, particular interests are injured and special advantages forfeited, these things should be patriotically borne for the public good. An immense volume of population, manufactures and agricultural productions, and the marine tonnage and railways to which these have given activity, all largely the result of intercourse between the United States and British America, and the natural growth of a full half century of good neighborhood and friendly communication, form an aggregate of material wealth and incidental relation of most impressive magnitude. I fully appreciate these things, and am not unmindful of the great number of our people who are concerned in such vast and diversified interests.

In the performance of the serious duty which Congress has imposed upon me, and in the exercise, upon just occasion, of the power conferred under the act referred to, I shall deem myself bound to inflict no unnecessary damage or injury upon any portion of our people; but I shall, nevertheless, be unflinchingly guided by a sense of what the self-respect and dignity of the nation demand. In the maintenance of these and in the support of the honor of the Government, beneath which every citizen may repose in safety, no sacrifice of personal or private interests shall be considered as against the general welfare.

Yours, very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

GEORGE STEELE,

President American Fishery Union, and others,

Gloucester, Mass.

From this letter, to which the minority of the committee refer with great satisfaction, as a correct exposition of the duties that Congress has imposed upon the President in the enforcement of our laws of retaliation, it will be seen that the present administration will treat this subject in the same sense that Congress has treated it, as a question of national concern, and not as a means of promoting the pecuniary interests of those who control and derive the chief benefit of our fisheries, such as the owners and outfitters of fishing fleets, and warehousemen and those engaged in salting, drying, and canning fish for the interior markets.

The hardy fishermen of the United States will, we believe, also be protected in the administration of our retaliatory laws, and other similar statutes, against the common practice that speculators in the fishing industry now resort to of placing their vessels in charge of captains and crews imported from Canada, because they can underbid our fishermen in the matter of wages.

This practice is a far more serious injury to our fishermen and to the people of the United States than would come from yielding twice the area of fishing waters that are yielded by the delimitations of this treaty, even if they were good fishing waters. It has already compelled many of our best fishermen to withdraw from this, and to seek a living in other pursuits.

XIV.

THE QUESTION OF THE BRITISH HEADLAND THEORY, AS TO SMALLER BAYS AND HARBORS ALONG THE COASTS, AND THE LIMITS OF OUR RENUNCIATION OF THE RIGHTS OF FISHING, AND THE NATURE OF THE RESTRICTIONS UPON THE RIGHTS OF OUR FISHERMEN TO ENTER THE BAYS AND HARBORS OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA, ARE MATTERS OF DISPUTED RIGHT. ADMISSIONS MADE HERETOFORE BY AMERICAN DIPLOMATISTS, AS TO THE DIFFICULTY OF CONSTRUING, GRAMMATICALLY, THE TEXT OF THE TREATY OF 1818, GIVE COLOR TO THE BRITISH CONSTRUCTION, AND PROVE, AT LEAST, ITS SINCERITY.

It is boldly asserted, in opposition to this treaty, that there is no sort of equivalent for the 1,127 square miles of fishing waters that we concede by the fixed lines of delimitation in this treaty. This assertion impeaches both the right of the British Government and the sincerity of its claim of the headland theory, as it applies to bays more than 6 miles wide at the entrance. Nevertheless that assertion is much weakened by the official opinions of eminent American publicists, communicated to the British Government.

If the territorial claims of both Governments were sincerely asserted, as we believe they were, in reference to the fishing waters, the modification of them by mutual consent has always been held in the conduct of nations as a good equivalent, moving from each to the other, for the concessions mutually made. This doctrine is also applied by the courts as between individuals to support agreements based on the consideration of yielding or settling disputed claims.

In contrast with the assertion of the utter want of reason in the claims of Great Britain, based on the headland theory, we find many strong declarations of our Government. Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, on December 30, 1816, admitted that a discussion of rights should be avoided when mutual concessions were necessary to bring the treaty powers to a mutual agreement. He said to Mr. Bagot:

In providing for the accommodation of the citizens of the United States engaged in the fisheries on the coasts of His Britannic Majesty's colonies on conditions advantageous to both parties, I concur in the sentiment that it is desirable to avoid a discussion of their respective rights, and to proceed, in a spirit of conciliation, to examine what arrangement will be adequate to the object. The discussion which has already taken place between our Governments has, it is presumed, placed the claim of each party in a just light.

Our claim then was that we had a common right of fishery, on all the coasts, with the people of the British North American Possessions.

The British Government then claimed that the war of 1812-'15 had destroyed all our claims in such fisheries. On the 28th of July, 1818, Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, instructed Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush as follows:

The President authorizes you to agree to an article whereby the United States will desist from the liberty of fishing, and curing, and drying fish within the British jurisdiction generally, upon condition that it shall be secured as a permanent right, not liable to be impaired by any future war, from Cape Ray to Ramea Islands, and from Mount Joli, on the Salvador coast, through the straits of Belle Isle, indefinitely north, along the coast; the right to extend as well to curing and drying the fish as to fishing.

This instruction was certainly much more liberal to the subjects of Great Britain than the first article of the treaty that was made under it. But the instruction stated the demand of the United States, and the British have a right to argue, at least, that the treaty was intended to conform to it as to the principles involved in it.

Claiming absolutely the right to enjoy these fisheries in common with the Canadians, and basing our claim upon the highest considerations of justice, we were met with the counter-claim of Great Britain, that all our fishing rights in Canadian waters were granted to us by the treaty of 1783, and that that treaty had been abrogated by war. In this dispute, which was vital, we found so much reason for an adjustment, that our plenipotentiaries offered to Great Britain the surrender of our rights to the extent they were renounced in the treaty of 1818.

Our plenipotentiaries, in explaining the treaty to our Government, say:

It will also be perceived that we insisted on the clause by which the United States renounce their right to the fisheries relinquished by the convention, that clause being omitted in the first British counter-project.

We insisted on it with the view: (1) Of preventing any implication that the fisheries secured to us were a new grant and of placing the permanence of the rights secured and of those renounced precisely on the same footing; (2) of its being expressly stated that our renunciation extended only to the distance of three miles from the coasts.

The reasons they assigned for the importance of this point bring into serious doubt the question whether this renunciation extended to the ocean coasts, or the coasts of the bays. They are as follows:

This last point was the more important, as, with the exception of the fishery in open boats within certain harbors, it appeared from the communications above mentioned, that the fishing-ground on the whole coast of Nova Scotia is more than three miles from the shores; whilst, on the contrary, it is almost universally close to the shore on the coasts of Labrador. It is in that point of view that the privilege of entering the ports for shelter is useful, and it is hoped that, with that provision, a considerable portion of the actual fisheries ON THAT COAST (of Nova Scotia) will, notwithstanding the renunciation, be preserved.

In view of these declarations of our plenipotentiaries, who negotiated the treaty of 1818, no censure can be due to Daniel Webster for having expressed the opinion, in what is termed his "proclamation" to our fishermen, that "it would appear that, by a strict and rigid constriction of this article" (of the treaty of 1818), "fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays," etc., and that "it was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England, since the United States had usually considered that these vast inlets or recesses of the ocean ought to be open to American fishermen, as free as the sea itself, to within three miles of the shore."

It was not until March, 1845, that the Bay of Fundy was declared open to our fisheries by the British Government, on condition "that they do not approach, except in cases specified in the treaty of 1818, within three miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick."

On the 17th September, 1845, the governor of Nova Scotia was instructed by the British Government that the permission to fish that had been conceded to us in the Bay of Fundy did not extend "to the Bay of Chaleur and other large bays of similar character on the coast of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick," and that they "still adhere to the strict letter of the treaties," of which Mr. Webster afterwards spoke in his circular letter in 1852.

Many other disputations have occurred over the meaning of this treaty, as to the extent of the renunciation of our fishing rights within 3 miles of the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of the British North American possessions, and we are not aware that any of them have been definitively settled. Mr. Everett, minister to Great Britain, on the 25th March, 1845, replied to the letter of Lord Aberdeen, stating the action of the British Government in relation to our right to fish in the Bay of Fundy, in which Lord Aberdeen said:

The undersigned will confine himself to stating that, after the most deliberate reconsideration of the subject, and with every desire to do full justice to the United States, and to view the claims put forward on behalf of the United States citizens in the most favorable light, Her Majesty's Government are nevertheless still constrained to deny the right of United States citizens, under the treaty of 1818, to fish in that part of the Bay of Fundy which, from its geographical position, may properly be considered as included within the British possessions.

Her Majesty's Government still maintain—and in this they are fortified by high legal authority—that the Bay of Fundy is rightfully claimed by Great Britain as a bay within the meaning of the treaty of 1818, and they equally maintain the position which was laid down in the note of the undersigned, dated the 15th of April last, that with regard to the other bays on the British American coasts no United States fisherman has, under that convention, the right to fish within 3 miles of the entrance of such bays as designated by a line drawn from headland to headland at that entrance.

That treaty was then 27 years old. It is now 70. But Mr. Edward Everett, instead of recommending war as the means of meeting this flat denial of our rights, that are now considered so clear as to be indisputable, replied to Lord Aberdeen, in the same spirit that subsequently pervaded Mr. Webster's circular (above quoted), as follows:

Speaking of the attitude of the United States as to the British construction of the treaty of 1818, he says:

While they have ever been prepared to admit, that in the letter of one expression of that instrument there is some reason for claiming a right to exclude United States fishermen from the Bay of Fundy (it being difficult to deny to that arm of the sea the name of "bay," which long geographical usage has assigned to it), they have ever strenuously maintained that it is only on their own construction of the entire article that its known design in reference to the regulation of the fisheries admits of being carried into effect.

Will Mr. Everett also be censured for finding difficulties in the head-land theory of the British Government (so clearly stated by Lord Aberdeen) that staggered Mr. Webster's honest mind in 1852?

A still more conspicuous and deliberate presentation of the difficulty of arriving at a satisfactory construction of the first article of the treaty of 1818, and of the propriety and necessity of an agreement with Great Britain, as to its true meaning, is found in the letter of Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, to Mr. Welsh, our minister to England, of September 27, 1878. Mr. Evarts says:

If the benevolent method of arbitration between nations is to commend itself as a discreet and practical disposition of international disputes, it must be by a due maintenance of the safety and integrity of the transaction, in the essential point of the award observing the limits of the submission.

But this Government is not at liberty to treat the fisheries award as of this limited interest and operation in the relations of the two countries, to the important, permanent, and difficult contention on the subject of the fisheries, which for sixty years has, at intervals, pressed itself upon the attention of the two Governments and disquieted their people. The temporary arrangement of the fisheries by the treaty of Washington is terminable, at the pleasure of either party, in less than seven years from now.

And he then proceeds to argue that if this Government acquiesced in the measure of damages assessed by the Commission, our rights might be prejudiced after the twelve years' period expired. Referring, further on in the dispatch, to the historical aspect of the matter, Mr. Evarts said:

Our diplomatic intercourse has unfolded the views of successive British and American cabinets upon the conflicting claims of mere right on the one side and the other, and at the same time evinced on both sides an amicable preference for practical and peaceful enjoyment of the fisheries, compatibly with a common interest, rather than a sacrifice of such common interest to a purpose of insisting upon extreme right at a loss on both sides of what was to each the advantage sought by the contention.

In this disposition the two countries have inclined more and more to retire from irreconcilable disputations as to the true intent covered by the somewhat careless and certainly incomplete, text of the convention of 1818, and to look at the true elements of profits and prosperity in the fisheries themselves, which alone, to the one side or the other, made the shares of their respective participation therein worthy of dispute. This sensible and friendly view of the matter in dispute was greatly assisted by the experience of the provincial populations of a period of common enjoyment of the fisheries without attention to any sea-line of demarkation, but with a certain distribution of industrial and economical advantages in the prosecution and the product of this common enjoyment.

Here is almost an exact repetition of Mr. Webster's declaration of 1852 as to the unsatisfactory and uncertain character of the convention of 1818, especially to the "sea-line of demarkation."

As to the representations made by the Secretary of State to the British minister in Washington in the cases of the Joseph Story and David J. Adams, in notes dated respectively the 10th and 20th of May, 1886, the Earl of Roseberry communicated to Sir Lionel West a report of the Canadian minister of marine and fisheries, copy of which was communicated to Mr. Bayard by Mr. Harding, British chargé d'affaires, on August 2, 1886. From this report the following in reply to Mr. Bayard's argument for commercial privileges is here quoted:

In addition to this evidence, it must be remembered that the United States Government admitted, in the case submitted by them before the Halifax Commission in 1877, that neither the Convention of 1818 nor the Treaty of Washington conferred any right or privilege of trading on American fishermen. The British case claimed compensation for the privilege which had been given since the ratification of the latter treaty to United States fishing vessels "to transfer cargoes, to outfit vessels, by supplies, obtain ice, engage sailors, procure bait, and traffic generally in British ports and harbors."

This claim was, however, successfully resisted, and in the United States case it maintained "that the various incidental and reciprocal advantages of the treaty such as the privileges of traffic, purchasing bait and other supplies, are not the subject of compensation, because the Treaty of Washington confers no such rights on the inhabitants of the United States, who now enjoy them merely by sufferance, and who can at any time be deprived of them by the enforcement of existing laws or the re-enactment of former oppressive statutes. Moreover, the treaty does not provide for any possible compensation for such privileges."

Still later a reply to the representations made by Mr. Phelps, at London, was written by the Canadian minister of justice. From his reply we quote the following:

But even at this barrier the difficulty in following Mr. Phelps's argument by which he seeks to reach the interpretation he desires, does not end. After taking a view of the treaty which all authorities thus forbid, he says: "Thus regarded, it appears me clear that the words 'for no other purpose whatever,' as employed in the treaty mean for no other purpose inconsistent with the provisions of the treaty." Taken that sense the words would have no meaning, for no other purpose would be consistent with the treaty, excepting those mentioned. He proceeds, "or prejudicial to the interests of the provinces or their inhabitants." If the United States authorities the judges as to what is prejudicial to those interests, the treaty will have very little value; if the provinces are to be the judges, it is most prejudicial to their interests that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into the harbors on pretext, and it is fatal to their fishery interests that these fishermen, with whom they have to compete at such a disadvantage in the markets of the United States, should be allowed to enter for supplies and bait, even for the pursuit of the deep-sea fisheries. Before concluding his remarks on this subject, the undersigned would refer to a passage in the answer on behalf of the United States to the case of Her Majesty's Government as presented to the Halifax Fisheries Commission in 1877: "The vari-incidental and reciprocal advantages of the treaty, such as the privileges of traffic, purchasing bait and other supplies, are not the subject of compensation, because the treaty of Washington confers no such rights on the inhabitants of the United States, who now enjoy them merely by sufferance, and who can at any time be deprived of them by the enforcement of existing laws or the re-enforcement of former oppressive statutes."

If the proclamation of 1830 and the order in council of that year extended to the fishing vessels engaged in the fisheries adjacent to the British Provinces on the North Atlantic and repealed the treaty of 1818, in its restrictive parts, the position taken by the United States before the Halifax Commission was a serious error.

XV.

A PRECEDENT WAS ESTABLISHED BY PRESIDENT JACKSON IN 1834 AS TO THE WISDOM OF FORBEARANCE IN COMMERCIAL RETALIATION, OR IN MAKING REPRISALS FOR A WILLFUL VIOLATION OF TREATY OBLIGATIONS, AS TO THE MEANING OF WHICH THERE WAS NO DISPUTE, RATHER THAN DISTURB SERIOUSLY THE INTERESTS OF OUR PEOPLE.

The results of a firm but pacific policy in demanding a compliance with treaty obligations with friendly powers are strongly exemplified in the conduct of President Jackson, in reference to the treaty of July 4, 1831, with the French Government.

By that treaty France acknowledged an indebtedness to the United States of 25,000,000 francs, payable in six annual instalments, with interest, the first due February 7, 1833. The Chamber of Deputies, by a majority of eight, refused to enable the King to carry out the treaty by withholding the necessary appropriation. This was on the alleged ground that our plenipotentiary, having a superior knowledge of the facts, had obtained an undue advantage of the French negotiator in the terms of the treaty.

The reply of Mr. Livingston, that he had obtained the information on which he had acted almost exclusively on papers obtained in France, was a conclusive vindication of that good and eminent man.

This and subsequent refusals of the deputies, together with irritating expressions of the French Government, caused the withdrawal of diplomatic intercourse with that Government. And demands of the French deputies that President Jackson should withdraw certain forcible comments made by him in his messages to Congress on this subject gave him just cause for indignation.

In view, however, of the serious results that always follow reprisals, retorsions, and retaliations, even under the heat of a just indignation for a flagrant wrong, President Jackson thus advised Congress, in his sixth annual message (1834), as to the policy of such action :

Our institutions are essentially pacific. Peace and friendly intercourse with all nations are as much the desire of our Government as they are the interest of our people. But these objects are not to be permanently secured by surrendering the rights of our citizens, or permitting solemn treaties for their indemnity in cases of flagrant wrong to be abrogated or set aside.

It is undoubtedly in the power of Congress seriously to affect the agricultural and manufacturing interests of France by the passage of laws relating to her trade with the United States. Her products, manufactures, and tonnage may be subjected to heavy duties in our ports, or all commercial intercourse with her may be suspended. But there are powerful and, to my mind, conclusive objections to this mode of proceeding. We can not embarrass or cut off the trade of France without at the same time, in some degree, embarrassing or cutting off our own trade. The injury of such a warfare must fall, though unequally, upon our own citizens, and could not but impair the means of the Government, and weaken that united sentiment in support of the rights and honor of the nation which must now pervade every bosom.

Nor is it impossible that such a course of legislation would introduce once more into our national councils these disturbing questions in relation to the tariff of duties which have been so recently put to rest ; besides, by every measure adopted by the Government of the United States, with the view of injuring France, the clear perception of right which will induce our own people, and the rulers and people of all other nations, even of France herself, to pronounce our quarrel just, will be obscured, and the support rendered to us, in a final resort to more decisive measures, will be more limited and equivocal.

There is but one point in the controversy, and upon that the whole civilized world must pronounce France to be in the wrong. We insist that she shall pay us a sum of money which she has acknowledged to be due, and of the justice of this demand there can be but one opinion among mankind. True policy would seem to dictate that the question at issue should be kept thus disencumbered, and that not the slightest pretense should be given to France to persist in her refusal to make payment by any act on our part affecting the interests of her people. The question should be left as it is now, in such an attitude that when France fulfills her treaty stipulations all controversy will be at an end.

XVI.

BY THE DELIMITATIONS FIXED IN THIS TREATY WE YIELD NOTHING THAT IS OF ANY VALUE TO OUR FISHERMEN. WHAT WE YIELD IS OF VALUE TO THE BRITISH PROVINCES AS A MEANS OF CONDUCTING THEIR LOCAL GOVERNMENTS. THE TREATY IS A JUST AND FAIR SETTLEMENT.

The treaty now before the Senate wisely and reasonably provides for the settlement of all disputed questions that have been under discussion by the two Governments, and adds greatly to the privileges of our fishermen in the British-American ports.

In a published letter of the chief counsel of the "outfitters" and owners of fishing vessels—Mr. Woodbury—he says, that "the right to fish on the coast of Nova Scotia, within the 3-mile limit, our fishermen consider of no value whatever."

The report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of January 19, 1887, on the value of inshore fishing rights, and the right to take or buy bait, to which reference has been made, shows conclusively that they are of no value to our fishermen. In their report, the committee say:

From the investigations made by the committee during the last summer and fall, and as the result of the great mass of testimony taken by it and herewith returned, the committee believe it to be clear, beyond all dispute, that the right to fish within 3 miles of the Dominion shores is of no practical advantage whatever to American fishermen. The cod and halibut fishing has been for many years almost entirely carried on at long distances from the shores, in the deep waters, on banks, etc.; and it is believed that were there absolute liberty for Americans to fish, without restriction or regulation of any kind, within 3 miles of the Dominion shores, no such fisherman would ever think of going there for the purpose of catching cod or halibut.

"As regards the obtaining of bait for this class of fishing, the testimony taken by the committee in its inquiries clearly demonstrates that there is no necessity whatever for American fishermen to resort to Canadian waters for that purpose. Clam bait is found in immense quantities in our own waters, and there have been instances, so frequent and continuous as to amount to a habit, of the Canadian themselves resorting to American waters or ports for the purpose of obtaining it. The squid bait is found on the very banks where the fishing goes on. So that the instances would be extremely rare when any American fishing vessel would wish to resort to a Dominion port for the purpose of buying bait for this kind of fishing

"It was also proved before the committee that, with the rarest exceptions, it would be absolutely injurious to the pecuniary interests of all concerned for American vessels to resort to Dominion ports or waters, except in need or distress, for the time taken in such departures from the cod and halibut grounds, or from direct sailing to and from them, is so great that, with or without the difference of port expenses, time and money are both lost in such visits.

"In respect of the mackerel fishery the committee finds, as will be seen from the evidence referred to, that its course and methods have of late years entirely changed. While it used to be carried on by vessels fishing with hook and line, and sometimes near the shores, it is now almost entirely carried on by the use of immense seines, called purse-seines, of great length and descending many fathoms into the water. This gear is very expensive, and a fishing vessel does not usually carry more than one or two. The danger of fishing near the shore with such seines is so great, on account of striking rocks and reefs, that it is regarded as extremely hazardous ever to undertake it. Besides this, the large schools of mackerel, to the taking of which this great apparatus is best adapted, are almost always found more than 3 miles from land, either in great bays and gulfs or entirely out at sea.

There will be found accompanying this report (see Appendix) statements showing the total catch of mackerel during certain years and the parts of the seas where they have been taken; and it will also be seen from the evidence that in general the mackerel fisheries by Americans in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and in the Bay of Chaleur have not been remunerative.

In view of all these facts, well known to the great body of the citizens of the United States engaged in fisheries and embracing every variety of interest connected therewith, from the wholesale dealer, vessel owner, and outfitter, to that portion of the crew who receive the smallest share of the venture, it must be considered as conclusively established that there would be no material value whatever in the grant by the British Government to American fishermen of absolutely free fishing; and in this conclusion it will be seen, by a reference to the testimony, that all these interests fully concur.

When we consider that the inshore fisheries are of no value and that the right to take bait, or to buy it, is worse than useless to our people, the alleged surrender of fishing territory to the British in this treaty is of far less consequence to us than the surrender we made in 1854, to get these privileges, by purchasing with reciprocity the repose of the British contentions, restrictions, and exclusions, at a cost to our revenues of nearly $10,000,000; and in 1871, by a purchase with $5,500,000 in money, and a great sum in the loss of revenues on fish imported from Canada.

We have paid for everything we have got from Great Britain, since 1783, in connection with the fisheries. That concession was the last thing we got under our strict demand for the right. It is the last thing we will ever get, without compensation, until we go to war to regain our attitude of 1783.

The extract from the report of the Senate committee, above copied, shows that in such a war we would be fighting over a subject that is utterly barren of any actual value to the American people—a war in which the principles involved would have no relation to rights secured by international laws, but would relate only to the meaning of words in a treaty, that were put there by the mutual consent of two enlightened Governments.

This treaty closes the discussion on the subject of delimitation of fishing boundaries, a matter that was, in some sort, provided for in the treaty of 1854.

It presents a fair and equitable settlement of questions that have been in dispute for seventy years.

It gives our fishermen, as an equivalent for the concessions we make, largely increased privileges, as navigators, beyond the narrow and inhospitable provisions of the treaty of 1818.

And, for the first time that such a thing was ever attempted, this treaty proposes to open the door to wide commercial privileges for our fishermen, based on concessions that concern them alone.

The modus vivendi provided in the protocol enables our fishermen, during two fishing seasons, to compare the value of the very broad commercial privileges therein accorded with the price of annual license at $1.50 per ton on their ships. A fisherman, outfitting with all he needs to sustain his business in Canadian ports, and having the privilege of sending his fares to our market under bond, over railroads and through such ports as would be easily reached, would be able to make so many more voyages that the annual license of $1.50 a ton on his ship would be reduced to 30 cents or 40 cents per ton on the voyage. If the business will not bear such a tax in compensation for such privileges, it is scarcely worth a war, or a serious disturbance of good will with our neighbors, to secure these commercial advantages to our fishermen.

We venture to repeat the recommendation that the Senate will await the developments that even one fishing season will make under this protocol before taking final action on the treaty.

XVII.

THERE IS NO FAULT IN THE MANNER OF NEGOTIATING THIS TREATY, AND THE PRESIDENT HAS NOT IN ANY WAY EXCEEDED HIS CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS, OR WITHHELD ANY COURTESY DUE TO THE SENATE IN RESPECT OF THE AGENTS SELECTED BY HIM TO CONDUCT THE NEGOTIATION, OR IN THE TIME OR PLACE OF NEGOTIATING OR CONCLUDING THE TREATY.

On the other question, as to the form in which this negotiation has been conducted and the authority of the two plenipotentiaries, Mr. Putnam and Mr. Angell, to act, without a confirmation by the Senate, we rely upon the precedents cited in the annexed brief of cases that seem to conclude any question on this point.

The table hereto appended, marked C, will furnish an easy reference to all the appointments of diplomatic agents to negotiate and conclude conventions, agreements, and treaties with foreign powers since 1792. The whole number of persons appointed or recognized by the President, without the concurrence or advice of the Senate, or the express authority of Congress, as agents to conduct negotiations and conclude treaties is four hundred and thirty-eight. Three have been appointed by the Secretary of State and thirty-two have been appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It will be seen that an interval of fifty-three years, between 1827 and 1880, occurred during which the President did not ask the consent of the Senate to any such appointment.

The following important appointments and many others were made when the Senate was in session :

March 2, 1793.—David Humphries. By Washington. Commissioned plenipotentiary to treat with Algiers. Congress adjourned on that day.

January 26, 1832.—Edmund Roberts. By Jackson. Commissioner to treat with Cochín China and Siam. Congress in session.

May 3, 1838.—Nathaniel Niles. By Van Buren. Special agent to negotiate treaty with Sardinia. Congress in session.

March 28, 1846.—A. Dudley Mann. By Polk. Special agent to treat with sundry States of Germany. Congress in session.

The constitutional power of the President to select the agents through whom he will conduct such business, is not affected by the fact that the Senate is or is not in session at the time of such appointment, or while the negotiation is being conducted; or the fact that he may prefer to withhold, even from the Senate, or from other countries, the fact that he is treating with a particular power, or on a special subject.

The secret-service fund that Congress votes to the Department of State annually is that from which such agents are usually paid. That is the most important reasons for such appropriations.

The following is a summary of Appendix C :

Persons appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate :

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas by an act of Congress of the United States, passed on the 29th day of May, 1830, it is provided that whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Government of Great Britain will open the ports of its colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama Islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer Islands, to the vessels of the United States, for an indefinite or for a limited term; that the vessels of the United States, and their cargoes, on entering the colonial ports aforesaid, shall not be subject to other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, or charges of any other description, than would be imposed on British vessels or their cargoes, arriving in the said colonial possessions from the United States; that the vessels of the United States may import into the said colonial possessions from the United States any article or articles which could be imported in a British vessel into the said possessions from the the United States, and that the vessels of the United States may export from the British colonies aforementioned, to any country whatever, other than the dominions or possessions of Great Britain, any article or articles, that can be exported therefrom in a British vessel, to any country other than the British dominions or possessions aforesaid—leaving the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions or possessions on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is—that then, and in such case, the President of the United States shall be authorized, at any time before the next session of Congress, to issue his proclamation declaring that he has received such evidence, and that thereupon, and from the date of such proclamation, the ports of the United States shall be opened indefinitely, or for a term fixed, as the case may be, to British vessels coming from the said British colonial possessions, and their cargoes subject to no other or higher duty of tonnage or impost or charge of any description whatever than would be levied on the vessels of the United States or their cargoes arriving from the said British possessions, and that it shall be lawful for the said British vessels to import into the United States, and to export therefrom, any article or articles which may be imported or exported in vessels of the United States, and that the act entitled “An act concerning navigation,” passed on the 18th day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, an act supplementary thereto, passed the fifteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and an act entitled “An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British ports,” passed on the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, shall, in such case, be suspended or absolutely repealed, as the case may require:

And whereas by the said act it is further provided that, whenever the ports of the United States shall have been opened under the authority thereby given, British vessels and their cargoes shall be admitted to an entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent, and north or east of the United States:

And whereas satisfactory evidence has been received by the President of the United States that whenever he shall give effect to the provisions of the act aforesaid, the Government of Great Britain will open for an indefinite period the ports in its colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama Islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer Islands, to the vessels of the United States, and their cargoes, upon the terms and according to the requisitions of the aforesaid act of Congress:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Jackson, President of the United States of America, do hereby declare and proclaim that such evidence has been received by me; and that, by the operation of the act of Congress passed on the 29th day of May, 1830, the ports of the United States are, from the date of this proclamation, open to British vessels coming from the said British possessions, and their cargoes, upon the terms set forth in the said act, the act entitled "An act concerning navigation," passed on the 18th day of April, 1818, the act supplementary thereto, passed the 15th day of May, 1820, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British ports," passed the first day of March, 1823, are absolutely repealed, and British vessels and their cargoes are admitted to an entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain on or near the North American continent and north or east of the United States.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 5th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1830, and the 55th of the Independence of the United States.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By the President:

M. VAN BUREN,
Secretary of State.

CIRCULAR TO THE COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 6, 1830.

SIR: You will perceive by the proclamation of the President herewith transmitted that from and after the date thereof the act entitled "An act concerning navigation," passed on the 18th of April, 1818; an act supplementary thereto, passed the 15th of May, 1820; and an act entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British ports," passed on the 1st of March, 1823, are absolutely repealed; and the ports of the United States are opened to British vessels and their cargoes coming from the British colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama Islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer Islands; also from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain on or near the North American continent and north or east of the United States.

By virtue of the authority of this proclamation, and in conformity with the arrangement made between the United States and Great Britain, and under the sanction of the President, you are instructed to admit to entry such vessels, being laden with the productions of Great Britain, or her said colonies, subject to the same duties of tonnage and impost and other charges as are levied on the vessels of the United States or their cargoes arriving from the said British colonies. You will also grant clearances to British vessels for the several ports of the aforesaid colonial possessions of Great Britain, such vessels being laden with such articles as may be exported from the United States in vessels of the United States; and British vessels coming from the said British colonial possessions may also be cleared for foreign ports and places other than those in the said British colonial possessions, being laden with such articles as may be exported from the United States in vessels of the United States.

APPENDIX B.

ORDER IN COUNCIL.

AT THE COURT AT ST. JAMES',

November 5, 1830.

Present: The King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas, By a certain act of Parliament, passed in the 6th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, entitled "An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad," after reciting that "by the law of navigation foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions to be carried to any foreign country whatever, and that it is expedient that such permission should be subject to certain conditions, it is therefore enacted that the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships shall be limited to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, shall grant the like privilege of trading with these possessions to British ships, or which, not having colonial possessions, shall place the commerce and navigation of this country and of its possessions abroad upon the footing of the most favored nation, unless his Majesty, by his order in council, shall in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shall not in all respects be fulfilled by such foreign country.

And whereas, by a certain order of his said late Majesty in council, bearing date the 27th July, 1826, after reciting that the conditions mentioned and referred to in the said act of Parliament had not in all respects been fulfilled by the Government of the United States of America, and that, therefore, the privileges so granted as aforesaid by the law of navigation to foreign ships could not lawfully be exercised or enjoyed by the ships of the United States aforesaid unless His Majesty, by his order in council, should grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of the United States aforesaid, his said late Majesty did, in pursuance of the powers in him vested by the said act, grant the privileges aforesaid to the ships of the said United States, but did thereby provide and declare that such privileges should absolutely cease and determine in His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and South America, and in certain other of His Majesty's possessions abroad, upon and from certain days in the said order for that purpose appointed, and which are long since passed:

And whereas, by a certain other order of his said late Majesty in council, bearing date the 16th of July, 1827, the said last mentioned order was confirmed;

And whereas, in pursuance of the acts of Parliament in that behalf made and provided, his said late Majesty, by a certain order in council bearing date the 21st day of July, 1823, and by the said order in council bearing date the 27th day of July, 1826, was pleased to order that there should be charged on all vessels of the said United States which should enter any of the ports of His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies or America, with articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said States, certain duties of tonnage and of customs therein particularly specified;

And whereas, it hath been made to appear to His Majesty in council, that the restrictions heretofore imposed by the laws of the United States aforesaid, upon British vessels navigating between the said States and His Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and America, have been repealed, and that the discriminating duties of tonnage and of customs heretofore imposed by the laws of the said United States upon British vessels and their cargoes, entering the ports of the said States from His Majesty's said possessions, have also been repealed; and that the ports of the United States are now open to British vessels and their cargoes, coming from His Majesty's possessions aforesaid;

His Majesty doth, therefore, with the advice of his privy council, and in pursuance and exercise of the powers so vested in him, as aforesaid, by the said act so passed in the sixth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, or by any other act or acts of Parliament, declare that the said recited orders in council of the 21st day of July, 1823, and of the 27th day of July, 1826, and the said order in council of the 16th day of July, 1827 (so far as the such last mentioned order relates to the said United States), shall be, and the same are hereby, respectively revoked:

And His Majesty doth further, by the advice aforesaid, and in pursuance of the powers aforesaid, declare that the ships of and belonging to the United States of America may import from the United States aforesaid into the British possessions abroad goods the produce of those States, and may export goods from the British possessions abroad to be carried to any foreign country whatever.

And the right honorable the lords commissioners of His Majesty's treasury, and the Right Honorable Sir George Murray, one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state, are to give the necessary directions herein, as to them may respectively appertain.

THE PENDING TREATY.

REVIEW OF THE FISHERIES NEGOTIATIONS BY W. L. PUTNAM—HISTORICAL AND EXPLANATORY—FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE CONTROVERSY TO THE PRESENT TIME—WHAT THE TREATY UNDERTAKES TO DO—HOSTILE CRITICISM MET.

We give below a valuable review of "The Fisheries Negotiations—Historical and Explanatory," by the Hon. William L. Putnam, of the commissioners who framed the pending treaty. The paper was prepared for the Portland Fraternity Club and read at a recent meeting. It is an important contribution to the present discussion, and meets adverse criticisms which have been made upon the work of the commission.

Concerning the provisions of the convention of 1818, that our fishermen may enter the bays or harbors of Her Majesty's dominions in Newfoundland and eastern Canada "for the purposes of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and for no other purposes whatever," and are liable to "such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges" reserved to them, confusion has arisen in Canada and also in the United States—on the Canadian side by converting this limitation of a guaranteed privilege into a universal one, and on our side by overlooking the indubitable fact that the practice of nations recognizes a broad line between fishing vessels and ordinary merchant vessels, granting to each class privileges not possessed by the other. From a time at least as early as A. D. 1826 to the present the claim of Nova Scotia, and afterwards of Canada, has been inflexible, that a fishing vessel is sui generis, and, if foreign, has no privileges within British bays and harbors, except those specifically authorized by some law of Great Britain or of her dominions, or by treaty, or by the strictest rules of humanity; though at times this claim has lain dormant in part, and Great Britain herself has not quite countenanced its practical exercise to its full extent. During all this period this construction, although often complained of by the United States, never has been practically overthrown by us in any particular.

Very soon after the ratification of the convention of 1818 the British Parliament passed the statute, chapter 33, George III, which condemned to forfeiture vessels of the United States, and of all other nations foreign to Great Britain, fishing or "preparing to fish" within the prohibited waters. These words "preparing to fish" found in this early act have been the cause of many troubles, and are susceptible of a variety of construction. They have been found in every provincial and Dominion statute relating to this matter passed at different periods, four or five in all; and they have received the sanction of long practical acquiescence on the part of the United States, and, we may also add, the full and cordial approval of so distinguished an American law writer as Professor Pomeroy. On the 12th of March, 1836, nearly one year before President Jackson went out of office, there was passed the act of Nova Scotia, the model of all the legislation since enacted, at which is aimed the thirteenth article of the treaty just negotiated. This act was specially validated by royal orders in council, and provided that local officers might seize and bring into port vessels hovering on the coasts of Nova Scotia, and repeated the penalty of forfeiture for those fishing or "preparing to fish" within the prescribed waters. It also provided that no person should be admitted to claim the vessel seized without first giving security for costs not exceeding 60 pounds. It also threw on the owner the burden of proof in any suit touching the illegality of seizure. It so hampered the right of action for unjustifiable arrests of vessels as to render it substantially worthless; and it was so extreme in its provisions that the vessel could not be hailed without the consent of the person seizing her. All these provisions have been continued in every statute of the Dominion from that time to the present.

In A. D. 1838, 1839, and 1840, during the administration of Mr. Van Buren, and while John Forsyth was Secretary of State and Levi Woodbury Secretary of the Treasury, sixteen of our vessels were proceeded against at Halifax and all confiscated except one. During the first year of the next administration, and while Webster was Secretary of State, seven were seized and proceeded against, only two of which were restored. These prosecutions were under this statute of 1836. It is not certain that Mr. Forsyth knew of its existence until near the close of his term of office, when he made an earnest remonstrance against it. The records also fail to show that Webster in any way took notice of it; although after Webster retired from the Cabinet, Mr. Everett, while minister at London, under instructions from Mr. Upshur, then Secretary of State, reiterated the complaints of Mr. Forsyth. When Webster again became Secretary of State, and not long before he died, he made the famous speech at Marshfield, in which he said:

"It is not to be expected the United States would submit their rights to be adjudicated in the petty tribunals of the provinces, or that we shall allow our own vessels to be seized by constables or other petty officials, and condemned by the municipal courts of Quebec, Newfoundland, New Brunswick, or Canada."

Notwithstanding this, from the time the statute was enacted in A. D. 1836 till the present negotiations, not only was its repeal or modification not secured by the United States, and not only contrary to the phrases of Webster did the United States submit the rights of their vessels to be adjudicated in the tribunals of the provinces and allow them to be seized by provincial constables and other provincial petty officers, but in A. D. 1868, and afterwards in A. D. 1870, the Dominion, without protest from us, re-enacted and intensified the law of 1836 by statutes ever since in force.

The disputes covering this first period from A. D. 1836 to A. D. 1854 were confined mainly to four questions:

(1) Whether great bays, like those of Chaleur and Fundy, were bays of the British dominions.

(2) Whether—and this was a broader question, though not perhaps wholly distinct—Great Britain could lawfully run a line from headland to headland, so as to shut in great bays like that of Prince Edward Island and that on the east coast of Cape Breton.

(3) Whether the provincial officers could drive out our vessels from provincial bays and harbors when, in the judgment of the authorities, they did not in fact need shelter or repairs; and

(4) The legislation already referred to.

These questions were not in all respects analogous to those which arose between A. D. 1866 and A. D. 1870, and which have again arisen in the last two years; but whatever they were, none of them were settled and all were postponed, and for the time being submerged in the reciprocity treaty of 1854. In A. D. 1866, at the expiration by notice from the United States of the treaty of 1854, the difficulties touching the fisheries were renewed, and they continued until suspended by the treaty of Washington of 1871.

During this period substantially every question arose which has been in dispute within the last two years; yet not one of them was permanently settled by Congress, the Executive of the United States, or by the Treaty of Washington. The consular correspondence in the summer of A. D. 1870 shows that our vessels were then for-bidden obtaining bait and all other supplies in Canada, and were excluded from Dominion ports except when putting in for the purposes expressly named in the Convention of 1818. Numerous seizures were made at that time, followed by forfeitures, one of which was the well known case of the J. H. Nickerson, a vessel proceeded against at Halifax for purchasing bait, while the United States took no action whatever concerning her and made no reclamation, so that she became a total loss to her owners. This period ended in the treaty of 1871, as did that which closed in A. D. 1854, without the United States securing favorable interpretation of any right in dispute.

The references to the treaties of 1854 and 1871 are merely for the necessary purpose of showing their bearing on the present status. Those negotiations were on a much broader scale, and may be said to have involved larger questions than those now under consideration; although everything which endangers in the least the harmony of nations must be regarded as touching the possibilities of great consequences. The nation would not brook that the high motives and great skill and experience of the gentlemen concerned in the formation of those treaties should not be at all times declared. The treaty of 1854 was a beneficent production of broad statesmanship, a blessing to the country, and its good results have come down to this date in the enlargement of commercial relations with Canada, which is among its legitimate issue, and has already long survived its own existence.

The negotiations of 1871, as well as the consequent proceedings at Geneva, were in the hands of practiced statesmen and jurists, led by a Secretary of State eminent alike for his private and public virtues. These citizens had been honored by the people with many trusts; but for their diplomatic accomplishments at Washington and the verdict at Geneva they will also be honored by history. While the purely accidental result of the Halifax commission must, in comparison, be regarded as the spluttering and flickering of a farthing candle, the exact cost of which is known but will soon be forgotten, the moral spectacles of the grander arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, and of the treaty which led to it, have given out a light which will shine on and on for the illumining of civilization so long as the English tongue shall be spoken. Considering all the great interests which those negotiators had in hand, it was not surprising that it was deemed by them sufficient to give the fisheries a temporary peace, which also they had reason to expect would become permanent. It is in no sense, therefore, in a depreciatory spirit that we refer to these events; but only because dry truth requires that their incidental effect on the issues with which we now have to deal should be clearly stated. The protocol of the conference of the commissioners held May 4, A. D. 1871, is as follows:

"The British commissioners stated that they were prepared to discuss the question of the fisheries, either in detail or generally, either to enter into an examination of the respective rights of the two countries under the treaty of 1818 and the general law of nations, or to approach at once the settlement of the question on a comprehensive basis."

Our commissioners selected the latter. The result was no issues in controversy concerning the fisheries were decided, and all were postponed; and a rule of negotiation was adopted for that topic, which has since, justly or unjustly, given great dissatisfaction to the interests involved.

It thus appears that this controversy commenced more than a half century since, and during that period nothing has been determined. After questions have continued so long unsettled and have been twice formally postponed, it necessarily remains that it is difficult for either party to press its full rights to a complete conclusion in all particulars. Traditions become fixed on one side or the other, systems of legislation accumulate which become inextricably involved with the general mass, and the contemporary facts and understandings are lost or assume new phases. Claims made by Great Britain, or by Nova Scotia or Canada in her name, have stood so long without definitive reversal that they gained such strength as to be in some particulars quite as difficult of disturbance as though originally based on sound principles and correct rules of construction.

This was the status of these questions when the present negotiations commenced; yet former administrations had not failed to give some indications of the suitable methods of meeting them. In the dispatch of Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, to Mr. Adams, then our minister at London, of April 10, A. D. 1866, Mr. Seward suggested a mixed commission for the following purposes:

"(1) To agree upon and define by a series of lines the limits which shall separate the exclusive from the common right of fishing on the coasts, and in the seas adjacent, of the British North American colonies, in conformity with the first article of the convention of 1818; the said lines to be regularly numbered, duly described, and also clearly marked on charts prepared in duplicate for the purpose.

"(2) To agree upon and establish such regulations as may be necessary and proper to secure to the fishermen of the United States the privilege of entering bays and harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and to agree upon and establish such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent the abuse of the privilege reserved by said convention to the fishermen of the United States.

"(3) To agree upon and recommend the penalties to be adjudged, and such proceedings and jurisdiction as may be necessary to secure a speedy trial and judgment with as little expense as possible for the violators of rights and the transgressors of the limits and restrictions which may be hereby adopted."

The "memorandum" prepared by the Department of State for the information of the commissioners who, on the part of the United States, assisted in negotiating the treaty of Washington of 1871, contained suggestions for adjustment in the following language:

"(1) By agreeing upon the terms upon which the whole of the reserved fishing-grounds may be thrown open to American fishermen, which might be accompanied with a repeal of the obnoxious laws and the abrogation of the disputed reservation as to ports, harbors, etc.; or, failing that,

"(2) By agreeing upon the construction of the disputed renunciation, upon the principles upon which a line should be run by a joint commission to exhibit the territory from which the American fishermen are to be excluded, and by repealing the obnoxious laws, and agreeing upon the measures to be taken for enforcing the colonial rights, the penalties to be inflicted for a forfeiture of the same, and a mixed tribunal to enforce the same. It may also be well to consider whether it should be further agreed that the fish taken in the waters open to both nations shall be admitted free of duty into the United States and the British North American colonies."

It will be observed that the suggestions of Mr. Seward were substantially repeated in the instructions of A. D. 1871, and were also embraced almost in terms in the proposals accompanying the dispatch of Mr. Bayard to Mr. Phelps of November 15, 1886; and the treaty just negotiated, it is believed, accomplishes all which was contemplated by them.

The words of delimitation of the convention of 1818 are as follows: "On or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America." The prohibition of 1818 covered in terms not only the coasts, but also the bays of the British dominion; so that a fair construction of the language could not be met by running a line which at all points followed the windings of the shore. Such was apparently the theory of Edward Bates, the umpire, in his opinion given in the case of the Washington, decided under the convention of 1853, wherein he used the following language: "The conclusion is therefore irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818." So also Mr. Everett in his note of May 25, A. D. 1844, said: "The vessels of the United States have a general right to approach all the bays in Her Majesty's colonial dominions within any distance not less than 3 miles." It is not, however, to be understood by this suggestion that the "headland" theory is at all accepted. That assumed to run a line shutting in all sinuosities of the coast, without considering whether or not particular headlands marked jurisdictional bays, or, in other words, bays which were properly parts of the British dominions, and it is now approved.

That there may be no misunderstanding, let us follow this distinction a little further. The Washington was seized in the Bay of Fundy in A. D. 1843, and that raised a question of the "bays," that is, whether the whole of Fundy was a part of the British dominions. The Argus was seized at nearly the same time in the great bend of Cape Breton. As the affidavits on file at Halifax show, she was captured less than 2 miles within a line from Cape North to Cow Bay; and that capture marked the "headland" disputes.

The opinion of the law officers of the Crown of 1811, in answer to the second and third queries, said, erroneously, of course: "The term 'headland' is used in the treaty to express the part of land we have before mentioned, including the interior of the bays and the indents of the coast." It may here be said that the same opinion in answer to the fourth query denied the free right of navigating the Gut of Canso. Mr. Stephenson, our minister at London, recognized the distinction in his note to Lord Palmerston of March 27, A. D. 1839, where he said: "The provincial authorities assume a right to exclude the vessels of the United States from all their bays, including those of Fundy and Chaleur, and likewise to prohibit their approach within 3 miles of a line drawn from headland to headland," etc. So Mr. Everett, in his note to Earl Aberdeen of May 25, A. D. 1844, admitted that it was "the intent of the treaty, as it is in itself reasonable, to have regard to the general line of the coast, and to consider its bays, creeks, and harbors, that is, the indentations usually so accounted, as included within that line."

Now, the present treaty apparently holds to the rule stated by Mr. Everett, except that it defines what has heretofore been undefined. This, of course, is subject to the qualification that, except in special cases, in A. D. 1818 jurisdiction bays were limited to those not exceeding 6 miles in width between their headlands, or even to narrower ones; while the present treaty has adopted the more modern rule of the 10 miles opening as a practical and not injurious solution of this whole dispute concerning bays and headlands.

Therefore, under the convention of 1818 the question arises in every case: What is a jurisdictional bay, that is, a British bay, or, in other words, a bay which was then a part "of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America?" This having been ascertained, another question arises, whether any bay which was not jurisdictional in A. D. 1818 has since become so inclosed by the growth of population that, on the principles by which we claim as our exclusive waters Chesapeake and Delaware bays and Long Island Sound, we may properly concede it to Great Britain according to its existing circumstances, as an inducement to a suitable and just arrangement of all questions of delimitation? With reference to this question, and indeed with reference to all this branch of the case, the United States, with its extensive coasts, its numerous bays, its rapidly increasing population and commercial interests can not wisely permit a narrow precedent.

The bay of Chaleur, the shores of which in A. D. 1818 were uninhabited, has by the advance of population become a part of the adjacent territory for all jurisdictional purposes; and it has ceased to be of special value to our vessels except for shelter or supplies. The same observations apply with greater force to the bay of Miramichi. The bays of Egmont and St. Ann's are hardly more than mere sinuosities of the coast; but they and the excluded parts of the Newfoundland bays are of no value to our vessels for fishing. It is not unreasonable to grant the release of all of them, in view of the fact that as to all other waters we remove long standing disputes. It is not to be overlooked that all these bays have long been claimed by Great Britain as of right.

At the mouths of all the bays designated in the treaty by name, the fourth article makes special lines of delimitation. There seems to be an impression with some that the exclusion is 3 miles seaward therefrom; but this is plainly erroneous. Each of these lines is run from one powerful light to another, except one terminus at Cape Smoke, which is a promontory over 700 feet in height. The external peripheries of visibility of these lights overlap each other very considerably on each of these lines, so that for our vessels danger is not where bays have been specifically released. This will be found at the 3-mile limit from the open shore, where it always has been. There is, however, confusion about this, and some debit the treaty just negotiated with the inevitable hazards consequential on the principles of that of 1818. If the commission of delimitation is appointed as the treaty provides, this commission, of course, will, as Mr. Seward and Mr. Fish foresaw, diminish the danger on the open coast, by giving on the charts which it prepares bearings of lights and other marked points; so that vessels by the aid of these bearings will be able to protect themselves in some degree. Nevertheless, there are the nights and thick weather, but the consequences of these are inherent in the principles of the convention of 1818, and will be diminished and not enlarged by the practical workings of the present treaty.

In the case of the Washington, Mr. Bates referred to the treaty between France and Great Britain of 1839, excluding from the common right of fishing all bays, the mouths of which did not exceed 10 miles in width, and indorsed this as a proper limit. In the treaty between France and Great Britain of 1867 the same limit was adopted; and it was approved by the common judgment of Great Britain, the German Empire, Belgium, Denmark, France, and the Netherlands, in the treaty concerning the North Sea fisheries, signed at The Hague May 6, A. D. 1882. With the weight of international consensus in its favor, and in view of the interest of the United States to aid precedents which will enable us to afford proper protection to our extensive coasts, and admitting the necessity of finding some practical method of delimitation, this rule seems on the whole convenient, wise, and not unjust. Moreover, considering the inability of our mackerel vessels, substantially all of which use the purse seine to fish in shallow waters along the coast, and that very few American fishermen, perhaps none, in the pursuit of halibut or cod desire to fish there, it is impossible to believe that this rule surrenders anything of essential value to us.

It is fair to add that the ten-mile rule was apparently not congenial to Canada. In the proposals made to Great Britain in the autumn of A. D. 1886, Mr. Bayard, after reciting substantially the suggestions made by Mr. Seward, and elaborating them, offered this rule; but the Marquis of Salisbury, in his reply of March 24, 1887, commented that this "would involve a surrender of fishing rights, which have always been regarded as the exclusive property of Canada."

The specific delimitations at several smaller bays will, on examination, be found to be in harmony with the views of the United States as to the proper results of the general rules of 1818. On the whole, by this part of the treaty a long and troublesome dispute affords promise of being ended without either party giving up anything of value.

Next, the treaty touches the matters which have involved our fishing vessels in their most serious troubles, fully covering reports to custom-houses, fees, and other charges, cases of disaster and distress, and incidental supplies such as merchant vessels buy. It is of course impossible to anticipate all the questions which may arise as between coterminal peoples, even with the most careful phraseology; and there are some matters which can not be confined within fixed terms without limiting the rights of one party or the other to an extent to which neither could be expected to submit. Among these is that discretion which must be exercised on the one side by the "skipper" who runs in for shelter in deciding whether or not it is prudent to put to sea, and on the other side by the revenue authorities in determining whether or not the vessel is hovering or loitering unlawfully within the waters of Canada. Such matters must in the main be disposed of satisfactorily by the practical operation of what is expressed and by the limitation imposed in the article which will immediately be considered.

The treaty next seeks to alleviate the hardships of the legal proceedings which various statutes of the province and the Dominion have imposed on foreign vessels. These statutes extended to fishing vessels systems of procedure which are with less injustice applied to merchantmen. The latter come voluntarily into port, and are ordinarily furnished either with credit or cash through their consignees, enabling them to protect themselves in case of litigation. Fishing vessels, however, especially those putting into strange waters merely for shelter, have no such aids and frequently have with them very little cash; and the result has been that the forms of proceedings, which might not be burdensome for merchantmen, have, with reference to fishing vessels, obstructed the course of justice. Through the intervention of counsel employed by the Secretary of State for observing the trials of the David J. Adams and the Ella M. Doughty, there have been received practical lessons in the difficulties surrounding fishing vessels under the statutes and proceedings of the courts of the Dominion. As already explained, these had been allowed to thrive so long without any successful effort on the part of the United States to prevent their growth, that they had become too deeply rooted in the general mass of Canadian legislation to permit their being entirely drawn out. It is believed, however, that so far as this article may fail to remove all these difficulties detail by detail, its limitation of penalties, except for illegal fishing or preparation therefor, will do very much to prevent injustice under any circumstances; while as to vessels poaching, it is for the interest of each Government that they shall be restrained by severe punishments.

To follow out the matter more in detail: A fishing vessel is seized in the Bay of St. Ann's, or up in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Under existing statutes, first of all, and before she can claim a trial or take testimony or other steps towards a trial, she is required to furnish security for costs not exceeding $240. The practical experience is that fishing vessels taken into strange ports are rarely provided with funds or credit, and therefore they are compelled to communicate with their owners for assistance, and by reason of the consequent delay are unable to take even the preliminary steps before the shareholders scatter and the witnesses are lost; because shareholders, not being ordinarily on wages, can not be held to a vessel moored to a pier. This provision of the Canadian law is not singular; in our own admiralty courts no person can ordinarily claim a fishing vessel, or whatever vessel she may be, without furnishing like security. Under the treaty this disappears; and in practice this relief will be found to be of great benefit to our fishermen.

Next, the courts into which all the cases of these fishing vessels have been brought are not provincial, but are Imperial vice-admiralty courts, established and governed by the uniform rules of the Imperial statute, although presided over by a local judge designated for that purpose. As a consequence, all the paraphernalia and fees of Imperial courts are met, and the progress of the trial requires the early disbursement of large sums of money common in all of them, but unknown in our own and in the provincial courts. These are necessarily so large that our consular correspondence shows the burden of securing the costs and advancing fees was alone sufficient in some instances to compel owners to abandon the defense of vessels of moderate value. The statutes to which we have already referred, moreover, stipulated that no vessel should be released on bail without the consent of the seizing officer; and, although it must be admitted that in practice this has not yet been found to create difficulty, it is annulled by the treaty. While it is impossible to anticipate or prevent all causes of legal delays and expenditures, yet there is no reasonable ground for denying that this thirteenth article will essentially moderate these enumerated rigors.

The punishment for illegally fishing in the prohibited waters has always been forfeiture of the vessel and the cargo aboard at the time of seizure. It was not possible, nor was it for the interests of either country, to demand that the penalty imposed on actual poachers should not be severe; but this article provides that only the cargo.

aboard at the time of the offense can be forfeited, and the provincials can not lie back until a vessel has taken a full cargo, and then sweep in the earnings of the entire trip for an offense committed perhaps at its inception. Moreover, the article provides the penalty shall not be enforced until reviewed by the governor-general in council, giving space for the passing away of temporary excitement and for a calm consideration of all mitigating circumstances. Also, from the passage of the statute of 1819 the penalty for illegally "preparing to fish" has been forfeited. This has at times been construed to extend not only to preparing to fish illegally, but also to a preparation within the Dominion waters for fishing elsewhere. The J. H. Nickerson, already referred to, was forfeited in A. D. 1870 on this principle, without any specific protest from the United States or any subsequent reclamation.

If the plenipotentiaries had been working new ground, in view of the indefiniteness of the words and of the fact that preparation is ordinarily accepted as of lower grade than actual accomplishment, it may be that the penalty of forfeiture under any circumstances for this offense would have been surrendered; but a statute which has stood for nearly seventy years without successful objection can not easily be wholly overthrown. The treaty, however, clearly eliminates every principle on which were based the forfeiture of the J. H. Nickerson and the proceedings against the Adams and the Doughty, and also, taking into consideration the other elements already referred to, it makes forfeiture the extreme penalty, but directs that the punishment shall be fixed by the court not exceeding the maximum, so that, if circumstances justify in any case, it may be reduced to a minimum. In lieu of all the other penalties rising to forfeiture, imposed by the Dominion statutes concerning the fisheries for technical offenses and offenses known and unknown, the maximum for all such will be $3 for every ton of the boat or vessel concerned. Under the provisions of this treaty the Ella M. Doughty, caught in the ice, would have gone free, and the David J. Adams, which ran across from Eastport into Digby basin for bait, if she had found herself snarled in the intricacies of foreign statutes and legal proceedings, had the option to pay $3 per ton, or less than $200—in other words, less than the amounts heretofore required as security for costs and to pay expenses of defense in the vice-admiralty court and go free—or she could have demanded a summary and inexpensive trial at the place of detention.

It should be borne in mind that the statutes of Canada which we have been discussing are not aimed particularly at vessels of the United States, but include all foreign fishing vessels. While in all respects, even with the modifications which the thirteenth article imposes on them, they are not our statutes, and therefore not what we would make them, yet several of these modifications are concessions from principles and provisions which are found in our own statutes, and concessions which we ourselves would not willingly make in behalf of foreign vessels. On the whole, a careful examination of this section, taken in the light of the ordinary methods of criminal proceedings wherever the common law exists, will show a present desire on the part of Great Britain and Canada to remove just cause of offense, and to cultivate the friendship of the United States; and take it by and large, the net result must be a modicum of those evils and misfortunes, through legal proceedings, which inevitably await strange vessels in foreign ports.

Concerning the fifteenth article, further reference to the protocol of May 4, 1871, of the joint commissioners who negotiated the treaty of Washington will show, as already explained, that the American commissioners preferred a settlement of the fishery questions "on a comprehensive basis." After setting out other propositions, pro and con, which were not agreed to, the protocol proceeds as follows:

"The subject of the fisheries was further discussed at the conferences held on the 20th, 22d, and 25th of March. The American commissioners stated that, if the value of the inshore fisheries could be ascertained, the United States might prefer to purchase for a sum of money the right to enjoy in perpetuity the use of those inshore fisheries in common with British fishermen."

Our commissioners afterwards named $1,000,000 as the sum they were prepared to offer. The British commissioners replied that this offer was inadequate, and made some other objections to it. Subsequently our commissioners proposed as an equivalent for the inshore fisheries that coal, salt, and fish should be reciprocally admitted free at once and lumber after the 1st of July, A. D. 1874. On the 17th of April the British commissioners replied that they regarded this latter offer as inadequate. Thereupon our commissioners withdrew it, and the equivalents were finally negotiated, as found in the treaty.

In framing the present convention this principle of negotiation seems to have been held by the United States not admissible, but it ought not be denied, if to purchase bait and in other ways make the shores of Canada and Newfoundland the base of our fishing operations have a pecuniary or property value to the United States, an equivalent thereof may justly be demanded by Great Britain. In any bargaining for the same, however, all the parties concerned should stand free and on equal footing. Great Britain in this article freely states what she is willing to accept, and if the convention is ratified, Congress may freely adopt its terms if it deems it for the interest of the country so to do.

The objections that the treaty does not secure privileges for bait, shipping men and transshipping fish are not considered here, as they have been fully discussed elsewhere. Also discussion of the other ill-founded objection that the treaty gives us nothing worth purchasing is omitted, because it makes no attempt to purchase anything. It gives no consideration whatever for the benefits which we receive under it.

Much has been said by the opponents of the treaty concerning the reciprocal arrangement of A. D. 1830; and indeed some of them apparently suppose a treaty with Great Britain was then made. The most convenient way of understanding that arrangement is to turn to Jackson's proclamation of May 29, A. D. 1830, by which it was brought to its completion; and its entire practical effect is made clear from the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury to the collectors of customs of October 6, A. D. 1830, and by the order in council of November 5 of the same year.

While this marked a long step forward in reciprocal arrangements with the neighboring provinces, so that it afforded the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, very just and persuasive arguments in favor of the most liberal treatment by Canada of our fishing vessels, yet its very letter, as well as its spirit, related exclusively to vessels engaged in commerce and to merchandise carried from the ports of one country to the ports of another. Not only did it not contemplate the purchase of fishing supplies to be used on the ocean and other facilities for fishing vessels, but its phraseology clearly excluded any such purpose. Are we any more entitled to demand under it as a right reciprocity in matters of this sort than Great Britain or Canada can demand under it reciprocity in the coasting trade or in the registering of vessels? And is there anything either in this reciprocal arrangement or in any other between the United States and Great Britain or Canada which renders the refusal to our fishermen of the special benefits of the near locality of Nova Scotia to the fishing grounds more unfriendly, in that sense which justifies retaliation, than our refusal to permit British, including Canadian, vessels to enter our coasting trade, while ours freely engage in the larger coasting trade of the British Empire; or than the refusal to permit the sale by the British, including the Canadians, of their vessels to our citizens with registration, while we may freely sell and register our vessels in any part of the British possessions? There is a wide gulf between this class of privileges which nations grant or refuse in accordance with their own broad or narrow views of their own interests and that class which affects the comfort of strangers and their property in foreign ports. All the latter the treaty just negotiated secures and perpetuates.

In the official pamphlet of the National Fishery Association of March 1, 1888, there is given on the twelfth page the following alternative for this treaty:

"It may be asked how shall we deal with this matter? What can be done to settle the fishery question between the British North American provinces and the United States? This can be done, and it has the sanction of the Forty-ninth Congress. Wipe out all legislative commercial arrangements and let us go back where we were, so far as commercial intercourse with the British provinces is concerned, when the treaty of 1818 was made. In other words, declare non-intercourse! Put Canada in the same relation to the United States as she was seventy years ago! Then our fishermen would have the same rights they have now under the treaty of 1818, and we should then be in a position to say to her: 'Are you willing this should continue, or do you prefer to deal with us on a fair basis and give to all our vessels, as we are willing to give to yours, full commercial rights in your ports?'"

It is not proposed here to dwell on this alternative nor to discuss the propriety of the assumption of a representative character by the National Fishery Association. But in the event the treaty is rejected, if the President heeds this demand, as perhaps under the law he may, neither the association, nor whomsoever it represents, if anybody, nor, more particularly, that part of the community which now fails to rise up against its pretensions, can justly complain.

The fishing interests of New England welcomed with great expectations the expiration of the treaty of 1871, which came about in June, A. D. 1885; but the result has shown how little the prosperity of these interests can rely on political events. The seasons of 1886 and 1887, so far as the mackerel catch was concerned, were disastrous through natural causes, both for our own fleets and for those of Nova Scotia, though less for the latter than for the former. Although the catch for these two seasons was only one-third of the catch for 1882 and 1883, yet the prices made no corresponding advance; so that the money aggregate for the two latter seasons, including all grades of mackerel, could not have been much in excess of one-third of that for the two earlier seasons named. With reference to cod and other ground fish, there was a considerable diminution in the catch for the seasons of 1886 and 1887, with an extremely low market in 1886 and a somewhat improved market in 1887, the net money yield for each being comparatively small. In neither branch of the fisheries, however, were these evils caused by Canadian complications. This is well understood with reference to mackerel, and becomes entirely plain as to cod when the fact is considered that in A. D. 1883, A. D. 1884, and A. D. 1885, the catch on the New England shores and George's Banks exceeded that on the Grand and Western Banks, while the reverse occurred in A. D. 1886 and A. D. 1887. Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in A. D. 1886, Sylvester Cunningham, of Gloucester, testified that—

"The price of fish is so low now that, if we should allow Canadian fish to come in free, our vessels would not sail. The price is very low."

Mr. O. B. Whitten, vice-president of the Fishery Union, also testified before the same committee, October 6, 1886, as follows:

"Q. Have you ever noticed that the duty has increased or that the absence of duty has decreased the price of fish to the consumer during the last fifteen years?"

"A. I do not know that the duty has anything to do with it whatever. In fact, it is strange that salt fish were never so low as they are at the present time with the duty on."

Mr. L. R. Campbell, deputy commissioner of labor for the State of Maine, in an interview with a reporter of the Kennebec Journal, on the 17th day of November last, said:

"The fishermen are in a worse condition to-day than they have been for a number of years, for the reason that they had two bad seasons in succession."

Indeed, the depressed condition of the fisheries for the last two years is too notorious to need evidencing, though the above explanation of its causes seem necessary.

In this state of financial losses and anxiety the fishing interests are, of course, not prone to welcome anything which will not, in their opinion, give them immediate financial relief; yet the writer speaks from a considerable personal knowledge when he says that whomsoever may have part in advancing the wholesome and beneficent treaty just negotiated can without trepidation trust himself in the hands of the fishermen of Maine, those who actually man our fleet, and to the sober second-thought of those who own the vessels.

It is to be hoped the present season will be one of prosperity for the cod and mackerel catchers on each side of the line. Our fishermen need it sorely; and the good humor which would flow therefrom would quickly flood out the recollections of the past ill-will and its consequent mischiefs.

PORTLAND, ME., April 16, 1888.

WILLIAM L. PUTNAM.
